Charge/s: False imprisonment, grievous bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The two female appellants were in a relationship with a man named Hill. There was a consistent pattern of domineering and violent conduct by Hill towards both appellants. The appellants were part of a plan to help Hill forcibly confine the complainant and cause her injury. At trial, they sought to admit expert evidence of 'battered woman syndrome' to support a claim of duress. The trial judge ruled that the evidence was inadmissible on the ground that the test for duress was objective and expert evidence of the state of mind of the appellants was therefore irrelevant.

Issue/s: Whether the expert evidence of battered woman syndrome ought to have been admissible to support a claim of duress.

Decision and Reasoning: King CJ (with whom Bollen and Legoe JJ agreed) held that the evidence ought to have been admissible and a re-trial was ordered. In reaching this decision, King CJ first held that the trial judge's reason did not provide a sound basis for excluding the evidence. It ignored the subjective aspect of the test for duress and it also misunderstood the main thrust of the proffered evidence. While the expert might have been in a position to comment on the state of mind of the appellants, the primary thrust of such evidence was to establish a pattern of responses commonly exhibited by battered women. At [23]:

'The proffered evidence is concerned not so much with the particular responses of these appellants as with what would be expected of women generally, that is to say women of reasonable firmness, who should find themselves in a domestic situation such as that in which the appellants were. It is designed to assist the court in assessing whether women of reasonable firmness would succumb to the pressure to participate in the offences. It also serves to explain why even a woman of reasonable firmness would not escape the situation rather than participate in criminal activity. As such it is relevant'.

Second, King CJ considered whether expert evidence of battered woman syndrome met the essential pre-requisite that it had been accepted by experts in the field of psychology or psychiatry as a scientifically accepted facet of psychology. Following significant consideration of scientific literature, at [24] and [26], King CJ held that the evidence was admissible:

'It is not sufficient, in order to justify the admission of expert evidence of the battered woman syndrome, as was argued by counsel for the appellant, that the ordinary juror would have no experience of the situation of a battered woman. Jurors are constantly expected to judge of situations, and of the behaviour of people in situations, which are outside their experience. Much conduct which occupies the attention of the criminal courts occurs in the criminal underworld, or in sordid conditions and situations, of which jurors would generally have no experience. It is not considered to be beyond the capacity of juries, or of the Court if it is the trier of the facts, to judge of the reactions and behaviour of people in those situations. Expert evidence of how life in criminal or sordid conditions might affect a person's responses to situations, would not be admitted.

'This is an area in which the courts must move with great caution. The admission of expert evidence of patterns of behaviour of normal human beings, even in abnormal situations or relations, is fraught with danger for the integrity of the trial process. The risk that, by degrees, trials, especially criminal trials, will become battle grounds for experts and that the capacity of juries and courts to discharge their fact-finding functions will be thereby impaired is to be taken seriously. I have considered anxiously whether the situation of the habitually battered woman is so special and so outside ordinary experience that the knowledge of experts should be made available to courts and juries called upon to judge behaviour in such situations. In the end, I have been impressed by what I have read of the insights which have been gained by special study of the subject, insights which I am sure would not be shared or shared fully by ordinary jurors. It seems to me that a just judgment of the actions of women in those situations requires that the court or jury have the benefit of the insights which have been gained'.

'Application for review of bail' – 'Bail' – 'Covid-19 delays' – 'Home detention' – 'No prior domestic violence convictions' – 'Special circumstances' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 2, Choke, suffocate or strangle a person in a domestic setting x 1.

Proceedings: Application for review of bail.

Issues: Whether special circumstances justified bail.

Facts: The male applicant and female victim were in a domestic relationship. The applicant was convicted of trespass offences and released on home detention bail. Within 48 hours of his release, the applicant was charged with three domestic violence offences, remanded in custody, and denied bail. The applicant applied for a review of the Magistrate's decision, arguing that if he was denied bail his time spent in custody would likely exceed the sentence imposed if convicted of the alleged domestic violence offences [1]-[3].

Decision and Reasoning: Bail granted.

Justice Parker found that special circumstances existed to justify the applicant's release on bail for two reasons:

1. The applicant's time spent in custody would likely exceed the sentence imposed if convicted.
2. The applicant was no longer in a relationship with the victim and the proposed home detention bail address was 13 km from the victim's home [1]-[2].

His Honour granted bail on strict home detention conditions, with electronic monitoring and a guarantee by the applicant's friend with whom he would be residing [2]. His Honour adopted the reasoning of Livesey J in Homsi v The Queen [2020] SASC 242, who found that a 'delay of… two years until… trial when combined with the fact that the complainant was no longer in a relationship with the applicant and that her whereabouts were not known to him was sufficient to amount to special circumstances' [23]. His Honour accepted the applicant's submission that 'based on the most recent District Court listings' the applicant faced two years in custody awaiting trial [10]. His Honour noted that this delay was due to Covid-19. Furthermore, His Honour found that the applicant's 'alleged conduct [was] less serious than… in Homsi' and noted that he had no prior domestic violence convictions [25], [27].

Homsi v The Queen* [2020] SASC 242 (8 December 2020) – South Australian Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Impact of covid19' – 'Special circumstances' – 'Strangulation' – 'Threat to kill' – 'Unlawful imprisonment' – 'Victim credibility' – 'Weapons'

Charges: 9 charges including aggravated assault, unlawful imprisonment and detention and unlawful choking under s 20A(1) of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA), most in circumstances of aggravation, that the applicant committed the offence knowing the complainant was a person with whom he was, or was formerly, in a relationship.

Facts: The applicant was in custody from April 2020. The charges relate to incidents of alleged violence towards the male applicant's female partner in November and December 2019. The November incidents included allegations of threatening and forcing the complainant to take her to a car using a knife and shooting her with a gel pellet gun repeatedly over a 2 hour period.

The December allegations include refusing the complainant permission to leave her apartment while seriously assaulting her, including hitting the complainant in the head twice with the blunt side of a machete, slapping her in the face, threatening her whilst holding the machete, stating that the applicant was "going to gaol today for murder", putting a blowtorch near the complainant's face and, later, holding a pillow against her face, restricting the complainant's breathing, causing her to fear that she might lose consciousness. On the same day, two superficial lacerations were caused to the complainant's throat with the machete, together with a large defensive laceration to the complainant's finger. She escaped and contacted police and a blowtorch and machete were recovered from the scene. Police abandoned a chase for safety reasons and the complainant was subsequently found to be resident in Victoria.

The applicant has a history of failure to comply with bail conditions. A prosecutor initially expressed concerns as to the complainant's credibility and did not oppose bail in the Magistrates Court, seemingly because the complainant visited the applicant in Victoria and has a serious drug dependency. At the time of the instant application these concerns were expressed as matters for trial.

Proceedings: Application for review of denial of bail.

Issues: As a prescribed applicant within the meaning of s 10(2) of the Bail Act 1985 (SA), the applicant must show "special circumstances" within the meaning of s 10A(1) of the Act.

Held: Application allowed:

1. Special circumstances exist for two reasons:
   (a) While the alleged offending is very serious, the applicant and the complainant are no longer in a relationship and the complainant's whereabouts are not known to the applicant. The prosecution accepts that there are issues regarding the credibility of the complainant.

   (b) The applicant has been in custody in connection with these matters since April 2020. The matter is unlikely to be tried until the first half of 2022, with the delays exacerbated by the recent lockdowns associated with the COVID-19 pandemic.

2. Bail is granted on strict home detention conditions, supported by a guarantee.

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Application for review of bail' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Strangulation' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Weapons'

Charges: Aggravated assault against a child or spouse x 8; Choke, suffocate or strangle a person in a domestic setting x 3; Aggravated threaten to kill or endanger life x 1; Aggravated assault that causes harm x 1.

Proceedings: Application for review of bail.

Facts: The allegations related to the applicant man's former domestic partner and their two year old daughter. The applicant was originally granted bail by a Magistrate in May 2020, which was then revoked on an application by the Director of Public Prosecutions to review the decision. An application for bail before the Chief Magistrate in September 2020 was refused. This review application related to a further refusal of an application for bail made in November 2020. The key factor that the respondent relied on was that the complainants had moved to Queensland.

Issues: Whether the complainants' move to Queensland altered the position such that it could be said there were "special circumstances", pursuant to s 10A of the Bail Act 1985 (SA).

Decision and reasoning: Bail was granted under strict home detention conditions.

The applicant was a prescribed person for the purposes of s 10A of the Bail Act 1985 (SA) which provides that bail is not to be granted unless the applicant demonstrates the existence of special circumstances justifying release on bail. The court was also required to have regard to the matters specified in s 10, including the gravity of the alleged offences (s 10(1)(a)) and the need that the victim may have, or perceive, for physical protection from the applicant (s 10(4)) (at [11]).

Not without hesitation, the Court was prepared to conclude that there was a fundamental change of circumstances with the complainants' relocation to Queensland. This, in combination with other matters, particularly the support from the applicant's father, the proposal of monitored, home detention bail in the applicant's family home and the applicant's lack of offending history outside of the relationship, was capable of amounting to special circumstances justifying the applicant's release on bail (at [31]). Had the complainants not moved to Queensland for their protection the Court would have refused bail (at [32]).

Brook v Police* [2020] SASC 131 (16 July 2020) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravating circumstances' – 'Appeal against conviction by magistrate' – 'Assault' – 'Child victim' – 'Stepchild in the family'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal.

Facts: The appellant man and the complainant's mother were domestic partners. The complainant (child) gave evidence that his mother told him it was not safe for him to be at home and told him to go to his father's house. The complainant did not leave the house and later had a verbal exchange with the appellant. The appellant grabbed the complainant by the throat, he then pushed him, and the complainant fell. The appellant straddled the complainant and punched him multiple times. The appellant relied on the defences of removing a trespasser and self-defence.

Grounds for appeal: (1) The magistrate wrongly rejected the appellant's barrister's application to appear as amicus curiae; (2) The magistrate erred in refusing to disqualify himself for apprehended bias; (3) The magistrate erred in his approach to witness evidence.

Decision and reasoning: Appeal allowed on Ground 3. Conviction quashed and matter remitted to a different magistrate. (1) Administration of justice overwhelmingly favoured giving leave to counsel to appear as amicus curiae. However, the magistrate's error in failing to allow counsel to appear did not cause a miscarriage of justice. (2) The course the magistrate took in relation to the trial, including allegedly referring to the complainant as the 'victim', did not establish any substantial ground for a reasonable apprehension of bias. (3) The magistrate based his rejection of the mother's evidence on the acceptance of the child's evidence. Appeal allowed based on errors in assessing witness evidence as well as a failure to consider the defence of removing a trespasser.

BRK v Police* [2020] SASC 116 (26 June 2020) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Children' – 'Home detention' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Property damage'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 1; property damage x 1; resist police x 1; breach of intervention order x 2

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Issue: Whether special circumstances exist.

Facts: The appellant man was sentenced to 5 months and 2 weeks imprisonment suspended after 2 months upon the appellant entering into a good behaviour bond for 2 years. At sentencing the appellant conceded incarceration was appropriate but argued it should either be wholly suspended under s 96 Sentencing Act 2017 (the 'Act') or served on home detention pursuant to s 71 of the Act.

The appellant and his daughter argued and she rang her mother (the victim and his former domestic partner) to ask her to collect her. The appellant was argumentative, aggressive and assaulted the victim by pushing her towards the wall. The appellant also damaged the victim's vehicle. A mental health assessment deemed the appellant suicidal (he had a history of depression and bi-polar disorder). He resisted police when arrested 5 days later and breached an intervention order by failing to attend the Safe Relationships Abuse Prevention Program, and sending a SMS message to the victim asking for a character reference.

Grounds: That the Magistrate erred:

1. By imposing a sentence that was manifestly excessive in that an immediate custodial sentence was imposed and the sentence was not wholly suspended;

2. In the alternative to ground 1, in declining to order that the custodial sentence be served on home detention under s 71;
3. In erring in the approach taken to the ‘sentencing hierarchy’, in particular, the interpretation and application of ss 71 and 96.
4. In the alternative to ground 3, in failing to provide adequate reasons for refusing to order that the appellant serve the custodial sentence on home detention.

Held:

1. The Magistrate erred in failing to consider whether the sentence of imprisonment should be served on home detention. Section 71(1)(b) of the Sentencing Act 2017 (SA) does not prevent a sentencing court from considering home detention where partial suspension is in contemplation.
2. The Magistrate erred in failing to provide adequate reasons for declining to order that the term of imprisonment be served on home detention.
3. The parties will be heard on the factual basis on which the Court should exercise its discretion when considering whether to re-sentence the appellant.

It is a benefit of suspension under s 96 that a bond with a duration longer than the period of incarceration can be imposed with scope for supervision and directed counselling to facilitate ongoing rehabilitation [98]. Home detention cannot be ‘partially’ ordered under s 71, only ordered for the whole term of a sentence of imprisonment. If some period of imprisonment is considered necessary home detention must be rejected in favour of partial suspension [101]. In deciding whether to make a home detention order, the paramount consideration is community safety, whether that is the offender’s family in the case of domestic violence or the community generally [102]. Another important factor is whether a home detention order "would, or may, affect public confidence in the administration of justice", in which case it must not be made. The sentencing court must consider the impact home detention is likely to have on the victim, spouse, domestic partner or any other person residing with the offender ([103]). The sentencing court must also reflect on whether home detention exposes the community and domestic violence victims to safety risks. The fact that the Magistrate was prepared to partially suspend the sentence suggested the appellant is not currently thought to represent an immediate threat. It also appeared that the appellant had been on bail without incident pending the outcome of this appeal [104].

As his Honour had little information about the steps taken to assist with the appellant's rehabilitation, the availability of courses or counselling for his difficulties in managing violence and intimate relationships, and his current work and family circumstances, he proposed to stand the matter over for further submissions or evidence on the factual basis on which the Court should exercise its discretion when considering whether to re-sentence the appellant [106].

Note: On 17 July 2020 the appellant withdrew this appeal with the result that the appeal was dismissed and the matter did not proceed to resentencing.

Coleman v Police* [2020] SASC 66 (30 April 2020) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Appeal against conviction' – 'Miscarriage of justice' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Plea of guilty' – 'Withdrawal and restoration of plea' – 'Withdrawal of legal representation'

Offences: Assault x 1

Proceedings: Appeal against conviction.

Issue: Whether the appellant's lack of legal representation when he entered guilty pleas amounted to a miscarriage of justice.

Facts: The appellant, an Aboriginal man, assaulted his female ex-partner by punching her three or four times in the face and throwing a shoe at her. He had been represented by different solicitors from the Aboriginal Legal Rights Movement in the Magistrates Court on at least four occasions with respect to the charge, but the matter had not been progressed. The appellant's solicitor withdrew from the file after the appellant indicated in open court that he wanted to plead guilty and "get it over and done with" [6]. The Magistrate informed the appellant that she was "likely, potentially to impose a period of imprisonment as a penalty" [6]. She sentenced him to five months' imprisonment and imposed an intervention order prohibiting him from contacting the victim, except for telephone or text contact for the purpose of child access arrangements. The appellant appealed on the ground that he had not been represented and therefore the Magistrate should not have accepted his guilty plea, and that the Magistrate misled him about the consequences that would flow from the pleas and induced the appellant to plead at the hearing.

Judgment: The judge dismissed the appeal, holding that there had been no miscarriage of justice due to lack of legal representation. The appellant understood the charges to which he was pleading, the Magistrate explained the seriousness of the offences and that the appellant was likely to receive a sentence of imprisonment, and the appellant volunteered his wish to plead [14]. The appellant had also been legally represented over the several months prior to the hearing and had accepted an opportunity to receive legal advice [20]. His Honour emphasised that the appellant was entitled to proceed unrepresented and that "the withdrawal of legal representation before the appellant entered his pleas is not, in isolation, a ground which can justify appellate interference" [20].

His Honour also held that there was no miscarriage of justice in respect of the appellant being induced to plea, because the appellant entered his pleas voluntarily, "free of any pressure or threat" [19].

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Application for review of bail' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relevance of covid-19 pandemic to bail application' – 'Weapon-protection order'

Offences: Aggravated assault x 2, contravention of intervention order

Proceedings: Application for review of bail

Issue: Whether special circumstances exist for the granting of bail.

Facts: The appellant man was charged with aggravated assault against his female former partner on two separate occasions and contravention of an intervention order. The appellant punched the back of the victim's head, struck her with a water bottle, and punched and kicked her in the head on several occasions. A Magistrate refused bail but the appellant sought a review of this decision, contending that special circumstances existed for the granting of bail, pursuant to s 10A Bail Act 1985 (SA).

Judgment: Kourakis CJ dismissed the appellant's application for review of the bail decision, holding that no combination of the appellant's circumstances was sufficient to constitute special circumstances indicating that he, as someone charged with assaulting a domestic partner in breach of an intervention order, should be admitted to bail [5]. His Honour did note the systematic and endemic disadvantage of Indigenous people [7] (particularly where they are imprisoned [8]) and the burden of being imprisoned during the COVID-19 pandemic with its attendant restrictions [9]. However, His Honour ultimately held that the presumption against bail applies to all bail (even home detention bail) [14] and the appellant failed to establish special circumstances. Furthermore, the appellant had breached bail orders and intervention orders in past and the charged offences were serious in themselves [4]. His Honour highlighted that "the underlying problem is not [the appellant's] relationship with the victim … but the alleged resort to violence in dealing with interpersonal conflict" [15]. His Honour did provide that a fresh review of the question of bail would arise, however, if it appeared in the future that a trial was a long way off or that the appellant's mental health was deteriorating [17].

Peel v Police [2020] SASC 48 (7 April 2020) – South Australian Supreme Court

'Breach of suspended sentence' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'Protection order'

Offences: Contravening a term of an intervention order x2; aggravated assault x1; failing to comply with a bail agreement x1; and driving under disqualification or suspension x 1

Type of Appeal: Appeal against sentence following breach of suspended sentence of imprisonment

Ground: The Sentencing Magistrate erred in the exercise of his discretion pursuant to s 114(3) of the Sentencing Act 2017 in that:

- the learned Magistrate did not give adequate or appropriate consideration to the terms of the section and the meaning of "proper grounds" therein; and
- gave undue weight to considerations personal to the Appellant including his criminal history, as opposed to the circumstances of the breach itself, such that the sentencing process miscarried.

Facts: The appellant man was convicted of two counts of contravening a term of an intervention order, aggravated assault, failing to comply with a bail agreement and driving under disqualification or suspension on 2 September 2019. He was sentenced to four months and 15 days imprisonment to be suspended after one month upon entering into a 15 months good behaviour bond. With backdating the bond was entered into on 13 September 2019. Since 17 October 2016 the appellant had been the subject of an intervention order for three years. Condition 3 of the order read "the defendant must not be within 100 metres of the protected persons". The appellant breached this order by being found with the protected person (his female former partner) in the front yard of his family member on 23 October 2019. He was visiting family and while he was at their home the protected person attended. He did not know she would be there and nothing untoward happened between them. It was a chance encounter and by not leaving immediately, the appellant was found to have breached a good behaviour bond and convicted of contravening a term of the intervention order. The Magistrate sentencing him to three weeks imprisonment and at the same time revoked the suspended sentence bond and ordering that the appellant serve the remaining time in imprisonment [3]. An application was made before the sentencing Magistrate providing that the Magistrate "should find that there were proper grounds to say that the failure to comply with the conditions of the suspended sentence bond should be excused and that no further action should be taken in respect to that failure" [4].

Judgment: The appeal was allowed and the suspended sentence of three months and 15 days was revoked. David AJ stated that "[t]he question whether there are proper grounds for excusing the breach is to be confined to the nature of the breach itself without any consideration of matters personal to the offender. That principle has been clearly stated in Heritage" [15]. The sentencing Magistrate was found to have gone beyond this principle and was instead influenced by the previous offending [15]. In considering this, the sentencing Magistrate was found to have erred.

Healy v Police* [2020] SASC 40 (19 March 2020) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Appeal against sentence' – 'General deterrence outweighed personal circumstances' – 'Good behaviour bond' – 'Intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Property settlement'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 1

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant man pleaded guilty to one count of aggravated assault upon his wife (complainant), with whom he was now separated. There was some variance about the facts. The prosecution alleged that the appellant and complainant were experiencing domestic difficulties. The complainant came into their bedroom, looking for her mobile phone. On the prosecution case, the appellant pushed her to the dresser and moved her face in the direction of her phone. Such conduct was clearly against her will and involved force ([4]-[5]).

The sentencing Magistrate regarded the offending as 'out of character' and unlikely to be repeated but was concerned about general deterrence for this type of behaviour, which involved violence towards female partners. He placed less reliance on personal deterrence and considered that the recording of a conviction could potentially affect the appellant's future employment. Nevertheless, he recorded a conviction on the basis of general deterrence ([7]), and sentenced the appellant to a $200 good behaviour bond for a period of 18 months.

Issue: The appellant appealed on the basis that the sentencing Magistrate erred in recording a conviction and did not consider the appellant's personal circumstances, including his low risk of re-offending, the impact of a conviction on his employment and the background of the offending ([8]-[9]).

Held: The appeal was dismissed. The appellant's personal circumstances were noted at [6]. He had no criminal history, had already spent 9 hours in custody, and was employed as an electrician. The appellant and his wife no longer lived together and Family Court proceedings in relation to their property were finalised. Further, there had been no contact between the parties as a result of an intervention order.

The Court dismissed the appeal as no error could be demonstrated. The sentencing Magistrate considered all matters relevant to the appellant's personal circumstances and was entitled to approach the matter by considering that general deterrence outweighed those matters. He was also entitled to be concerned about the prevalence and nature of domestic violence.

Rana v Police* [2020] SASC 21 (13 February 2020) – South Australian Supreme Court

'Application for revocation of an intervention order' – 'Legal representation and self-represented litigants' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Protected person' – 'Revocation of an intervention order' – 'Women'

Case type: Application for permission to appeal against a Magistrate's decision refusing an application for the revocation of an intervention order.

Facts: The appellant filed an application in the Magistrates Court for revocation of an intervention order that was issued against him in 2008. The appellant was absent at the application hearing. The intervention order involved allegations that 'the appellant sent letters to the protected person (a female), presented at the protected person's door on a number of occasions, caused the protected person to install additional security in her home and other matters' ([3]). The protected person maintained that she regularly did not feel safe and believed that the appellant was capable of inflicting harm as he was not mentally stable ([4]). The Magistrate noted that the appellant had significant mental health problems in the past, and summarily dismissed the application pursuant to s 26(4) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) ([8]. Under s 26(4), the Court may dismiss an application for revocation of a final intervention order without receiving submissions or evidence from the protected person if 1) it is satisfied the application is frivolous or vexatious; or 2) if not satisfied there has been a substantial change in the relevant circumstances since the order was issued or last varied ([9]).

Issue: The appellant sought permission to appeal against the Magistrate's decision to refuse his application for the revocation of the intervention order on 3 grounds:

- 'The Magistrate applied the wrong onus, as the burden of proof applied was proof beyond reasonable doubt rather than proof on the balance of probabilities;
- There was an apprehension of bias as the matter was decided in his absence; and
- A psychological report the appellant sought to tender on appeal stated he would benefit from release of the order.'

Held: David AJ refused permission to appeal and found that the Magistrate was open to summarily dismiss the appellant's application for the revocation of the intervention order ([16]). In respect of the first appeal ground, David AJ held that although the Magistrate did apply the incorrect onus, this could have only been in the appellant's favour. By applying the higher onus of proof beyond reasonable doubt, it was apparent that the Magistrate was satisfied on the balance of probabilities either that the application was frivolous or vexatious or he was not satisfied that there was a substantial change in the circumstances ([11]). In respect of the second appeal ground, his Honour found that the basis of the appellant's submissions in his affidavit did not go to the question of whether there had been a change in the relevant circumstances. Instead, the submissions indicated a preoccupation with past events ([12]). In respect of the third appeal ground, David AJ held that the psychologist's conclusion that the appellant 'is a different person now tha[n] in the past and would benefit from release of the order' fell short of there being a change in the relevant circumstances since the order was last issued. Consequently, there was no merit in the appeal ([13]-[15]).

Miller v Police [2020] SASC 20 (13 February 2020) – South Australian Supreme Court

'Application made out of time' – 'Costs' – 'Intervention order' – 'Recording'

Charges: 1 x contravening a term of an intervention order

Case type: Application for permission to appeal out of time against an order for costs made by a Magistrate.

Facts: The male applicant was charged with contravening a term of an intervention order, the protected person was called at trial by the prosecution to give evidence. The evidence included the victim's recording of an offending phone call, a copy of which was tendered. After she gave evidence, the prosecution closed its case and she was released. The Magistrate found a case to answer and the matter was adjourned. During the adjourned period, the victim was charged with property damage to the applicant's vehicle. Consequently, the applicant applied for the witness to be recalled to cross-examine her further because of this behaviour. The Magistrate allowed the prosecution case to be reopened and reversed his ruling that there was a case to answer in order that the victim might be cross-examined. The victim could not be found as she had been released from giving further evidence. The Court issued a witness summons for her return, however, she was not served the summons. It was clear that she believed the matter was finished at least to the extent that her participation was concerned ([2]-[4]).

The applicant sought his costs. The Magistrate ordered that no costs should be allowed with respect to all appearances and work done up to and inclusive of the date of trial, but costs were granted for a number of hearing attendances after that date, albeit at an amount lower than that sought by the applicant ([9]).

A police officer who attended the scene gave evidence of two tranches of the appellant's brother, Stephen's, statements and conduct:

- The first tranche was that Stephen 'loudly told police to leave the property and shut the front door'.
- The second was that when told the appellant was arrested for assaulting the complainant, Stephen stated 'If she's saying those things she needs to be dealt with. She needs to learn the Aboriginal way'.

Issue: The applicant sought permission to appeal the Magistrate's orders as to costs. This application was made around 4 months out of time. The applicant submitted that he should be awarded appropriate costs up to the time the Magistrate found there was a case to answer, and that there should not have been a reduction to the costs awarded for work done after the trial date.

Held: The applicant submitted that he was successful in the matter as no conviction was recorded and no finding of guilt was made. As a result, he contended that costs should follow the event and that he should be awarded appropriate costs up to the time that the Magistrate found that there was a case to answer ([10]). The respondent submitted that the question of costs is discretionary, and noted s 189 of the Criminal Procedure Act 1921 (SA).

In his reasons, the Magistrate indicated that in allowing the case to be reopened for further cross-examination of the victim, the matter had not been completed. It is uncertain how that cross-examination would have impacted his decision to find a case to answer. The alleged offending behaviour was presented by the victim's evidence and by way of recording. It might go to the question of credit or her attitude towards the applicant, but it is difficult to determine a scenario where that would disturb the relatively low threshold of finding a case to answer. Additionally, the Magistrate had to consider that a permanent stay of proceedings is not necessarily a completion of the matter. In light of these difficulties, David AJ held that the Magistrate did not fall into error in exercising his discretion as to costs ([10]-[13]), and consequently, dismissed the appeal.

Charges: 1 x aggravated recklessly causing serious harm

Case type: Application by the Attorney-General (SA) for an Extended Supervision Order (ESO) pursuant to s 7 of the Criminal Law (High Risk Offenders) Act 2015 (SA) (the HRO Act) in respect of the respondent for a 3-year term.

Facts: The male respondent was found guilty at trial of aggravated recklessly causing serious harm against his former domestic partner and was ultimately sentenced to 5 years' imprisonment ([5]). The respondent had a significant history of serious criminal offending, especially violent offending against women ([6]). His history included offences of non-consensual sexual penetration, armed robbery, aggravated unlawful wounding, possession of a weapon with intent to cause injury and fear, and unlawful assault causing bodily harm in circumstances of aggravation and breaching protective bail conditions. It was against this background and while subject to a suspended sentence, that the respondent was sentenced to the offending in question. The circumstances of that offending were that the respondent, while in an intoxicated state, stabbed the victim in the back and fled the house without rendering her assistance. The victim may have died within hours had she not been airlifted to Adelaide ([10]).

The applicant filed an application for an ESO under the terms of the HRO Act. An Interim Supervision Order was made pursuant to s 9 pending the determination of the application for an ESO, which was enlivened upon the respondent's release from custody in September 2018. Further, a psychiatric report pursuant to s 7(3) of the HRO Act was provided ([11]-[13]).

Issue: The applicant sought an ESO in respect of the respondent for a period of 3 years on the basis that he is a high risk offender who would present an appreciable risk to the community's safety if not supervised under such an order. The main issue for the Court, however, was the nature of the terms and conditions of the ESO, especially those relating to whether or not the respondent is restrained from leaving South Australia without permission ([3]).

The respondent accepted that he was a high risk offender pursuant to s 5 of the HRO Act, and did not oppose the making of an ESO provided that the order included the following conditions ([14]):

- The respondent may depart from South Australia with the intention of living in another State, and if he chooses to do so, he will not be subject to the order unless he returns to South Australia during the period of the order.
- The order will take effect if the respondent returns to South Australia.

The applicant submitted that the terms of the ESO as proposed by the respondent were beyond the scope of the Court's jurisdiction, would render it impossible to effectively supervise him when he is absent from South Australia, and would not protect the community's safety in an effective manner ([29]).

Held: The respondent was born in the dry community of Tjuntjuntjara in Western Australia ([15]), which is described as 'relatively stable and safe' and as 'one of the remotest communities in Australia' ([21]). The respondent's daughter, grandson and elderly, ill father also lived in that community. His father's family originally came from the A?angu Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara (APY) Lands in the remote north-west of South Australia. The respondent proposed that he would move between the Tjuntjuntjara community and Kurrawang, where he has other relatives. He also expressed an intention to live in Esperance ([15]-[16]).

The respondent submitted that given that Tjuntjuntjara is a dry community and he has family support and access to traditional healers, he could participate in men's business and would therefore unlikely reoffend ([17]). In his opinion, an ESO in the terms proposed by the applicant would require him to stay in South Australia, rendering it difficult to visit the APY Lands ([18]). Further, it was submitted that if he was prevented from living on or near his traditional lands, both on the APY Lands and in Western Australia, this would negatively affect him and increase his likelihood to reoffend, as he would be deprived of the opportunity to play a meaningful role in his culture and lore ([19]). While it was undoubtedly in the respondent's best interests that he be permitted to return to his homeland, Kelly J noted that the question was not 'simple', and required an analysis of the relevant provisions of the HRO Act ([26]-[28]).

Her Honour placed great reliance on the psychiatric report ([35]), which noted that the respondent was at high risk of further violent offending, due to his significant history of violent and sexual offending, his limited (and only very recent) insight into that behaviour, and his tendencies to minimise his behaviour and blame circumstances and victims for his past behaviour ([36]). It was also noted that the respondent was at a heightened risk of sexual offending due to his issues with childhood abuse and increased risk of violence ([37]). If the respondent returned to his traditional lands in South Australia, he would be at a greater risk of reoffending due to potential personal conflicts with other community members and the difficulties in accessing adequate supervision in remote communities. There would also be a real risk of the respondent resuming alcohol abuse without adequate supervision and therapy ([43]). Her Honour further considered therapies appropriate to the respondent's personality type, and concluded that he would benefit from a combination of traditional western psychological therapy and support provided by traditional healers ([44]-[46]). The further the respondent travels from Adelaide, the more difficult it would be for him to access the necessary therapy ([47]).

The psychiatric report also raised the issue of the respondent's desire to return to his traditional lands to fulfil his cultural obligations and identified some risk factors involved if he were to return ([48]). Importantly, the majority of the respondent's offending occurred when he was living on his traditional lands and when he was under the influence of alcohol ([49]). Even though Tjuntjuntjara is a dry community, other communities in which the respondent had expressed a desire to visit are not ([50]). Under the terms of the order proposed by the respondent, there would be no practical way for the Court to satisfy itself that the community is protected should he choose to visit or reside in South Australia ([53]), as South Australian supervisory authorities have no practical way of determining if he was to re-enter the APY Lands ([52]).

Her Honour held that an ESO for a 12-month term would adequately protect the community and enable the respondent to continue with appropriate rehabilitation and therapy ([55]). Her Honour also found that the respondent was a high risk offender who posed an appreciable risk to the community's safety if not supervised under the order, and that it would be outside the scope of the Court's jurisdiction to make an ESO in the terms requested by the respondent, and would render his effective supervision impossible when he is absent from South Australia ([33]).

'Children' – 'Cross-examination' – 'Domestic relationship' – 'Fair trial' – 'Intervention order' – 'Legal representation and self-represented litigants'

Charges: 3 x contravening a term of an intervention order contrary to s 31(2) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)

Case type: Appeal against conviction

Facts: The appellant, who was self-represented at trial, was convicted of three counts of contravening a term of an intervention order, contrary to section 31(2) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA). The protected person under the intervention order was the appellant's ex-partner, the victim ([1]). The agreed facts were that on 3 separate nights, the appellant attended the home of the victim's father where the victim and their daughter were residing. The appellant left letters addressed to the victim's father and old family photographs. Although he admitted to attending the premises, he argued that he genuinely believed that the victim and their daughter were residing at a different address ([2], [9]).

Under s 13B of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA), the appellant was not allowed to cross-examine the victim at trial unless it was done so by counsel. The Magistrate failed to refer to the appellant's rights under s 13B(b)(ii), which includes a reference to the Criminal Law (Legal Representation) Act 2001 (SA). Section 6(1a) of that Act provides that if a defendant who is not legally represented at trial applies to the Commission for legal assistance for the cross-examination of a s 13B witness in the trial, the Commission must, subject to qualifications, grant such assistance ([17]).

Although the Magistrate advised the appellant of his right to apply for legal aid ([14], [16]), he did not advise him that legal assistance must be granted to a defendant subject to certain qualifications (terms), and instead informed the appellant that he probably would not qualify for legal assistance ([18]). The trial was adjourned, and upon resumption, the appellant remained under the mistaken belief that he would not qualify for legal assistance and was not advised of s 6 of the Criminal Law (Legal Representation) Act 2001 (SA). The appellant was unable to test the victim's evidence in any way. Consequently, the Magistrate accepted her evidence and convicted the appellant ([21]).

Issue: The appellant appealed on the ground that the trial court did not properly and fully advise him of his right to obtain a counsel's assistance for the purpose of cross-examining the victim ([4]).

Held: Lovell J allowed the appeal and set aside the conviction. Her Honour remitted the matter for retrial before a different Magistrate and ordered the respondent to pay the appellant's appeal costs ([29]). Importantly, her Honour noted a trial judge's obligation to ensure that an accused self-represented person understands their rights and has all the necessary information in order to receive fair trial and make informed choices about his or her case ([22]-[23]). In the present instance, the appellant was required to be aware of and fully understand his rights provided for by s 13B and, by extension, s 6(1a) in order to receive a fair trial ([23]). The Magistrate was obliged to ensure that he fully understood that cross-examination of the victim could only occur if he employed counsel to do so on his behalf, and that if he applied to the Commission for legal assistance, they were bound by law to provide it, subject to any conditions they saw fit ([24]). The trial miscarried because the Magistrate failed to properly and fully advise the appellant of his right to obtain counsel's assistance for the purpose of cross-examination ([25]).

Siropoulos v Police* [2019] SASC 127 (19 July 2019) – South Australian Supreme Court

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Conditions' – 'Domestic relationship' – 'General deterrence' – 'Good behaviour bond' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk of re-offending' – 'Step child in family'

Charges: 1 x assault causing harm

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant was convicted of assault causing harm after having repeatedly punched the victim in the face, in the presence of her twin daughters from a previous relationship ([14]). The appellant and victim had been in a relationship for approximately 9 years. The relationship was marred by allegations of infidelity made by the appellant, and 'he felt betrayed and became very angry' upon discovering that the victim had regularly contacted another man ([13]). The victim's injuries were extensive ([16]), and she told the Court in her Victim Impact Statement that 'she was upset that the offending occurred unprovoked in her and her children's home' ([18]).

The appellant was sentenced to 14 months' imprisonment, which was reduced to a prison term of 8 months and 2 weeks as a result of his early guilty plea. The sentence was partially suspended, allowing the appellant's release after serving 4 months imprisonment upon him entering into a good behaviour bond for 2 years ([2]). The conditions of the bond are noted at [3], and included the requirements that he does not leave South Australia unless given permission by his Community Corrections Officer for specific purposes, and that he attend any programs and appointments as directed.

Issue: The appellant appealed against the sentence on the grounds that it was manifestly excessive and that it was manifestly unreasonable to not wholly suspend the prison sentence. He also appealed the condition of the partially suspended sentence bond requiring him not to leave South Australia without permission.

Held: Kourakis CJ noted the appellant's personal circumstances at [19]-[27]. He was aged 47 at the time of the offending, worked in the fishing industry, suffered a lengthy period of depression after his father's death, had numerous previous convictions of driving offences, and consumed an excessive amount of alcohol, particularly after his father's death and to numb his emotions during hostile relationships. Although the appellant has not consumed alcohol in over 3 years, he reported weekly use of cannabis ([23]). His mother was dependant on him and he also had a brother who suffers from schizophrenia ([20]). The appellant experienced anxiety and low self-esteem, as well as health issues. His psychologist opined that he exhibited dysfunctional personality traits, and experienced self-doubt and feelings of inadequacy ([25]). According to a violence risk assessment, the appellant was identified as likely to pose a Moderate-High risk of re-offending ([26]).

Having regard to the relative importance of general deterrence, Kourakis CJ held that the length of the prison sentence was not manifestly excessive. The appellant had reoffended despite the leniency that had been previously shown to him, and the victim's physical injuries were very serious. At [35], his Honour stated that '[p]ersonal and general deterrence must be given substantial relative weight in sentencing for assaults committed by men against women with whom they are, or have been, in a relationship, particularly when in a jealous rage'. The length of both the notional starting point and the actual prison term was well within the permissible range.

Kourakis CJ also found that the Magistrate's decision to partially suspend the sentence fell within the proper exercise of the sentencing decision ([36]), and that the Magistrate considered all relevant matters ([38]). It was not unreasonable for the Magistrate to conclude that the appellant's sentencing would be optimised by a combination of both punishment and deterrence effected by imprisonment for 4 months and rehabilitation over an 18-month period ([40]).

Kourakis CJ allowed the appeal only to the extent of removing the condition of the bond requiring the appellant to not leave South Australia unless given permission by his Community Corrections Officer, as such a condition was unreasonable. The appellant's home was in Melbourne, where his dependent mother resided and his brother received treatment for his mental illness. His Honour found that 'Australia is one nation and there is much movement between the south east corner of [South Australia] and Victoria'. His Honour also considered that there was 'no real connection between the condition that he obtain treatment and counselling and the obligation to obtain permission.' The appellant should be entitled to 'come and go from his own home, to help his mother as and when he sees fit, and to fish in Victorian waters without first obtaining permission' ([42]).

'Community protection' – 'Condign punishment' – 'Damaging property' – 'Domestic relationship' – 'General deterrence' – 'Manifestly excessive--assault police' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Step child in family - past domestic and family violence'

Charges: 2 x aggravated assault, 1 x contravening a term of an intervention order, 1 x property damage

Facts: The offending occurred in the context of a domestic relationship which was in the process of ending ([5]). At the relevant time, the appellant was subject to an intervention order ([11]). The appellant was living with his former domestic partner and her daughter (the protected person under that order). One count of aggravated assault involved the appellant punching his former domestic partner with a clenched first to her left shoulder in the presence of her daughter ([8]). The police were called to the house. The second count of aggravated assault involved the appellant punching the attending Sergeant numerous times, one of which was described as 'an unusual two-handed punch delivered in a jabbing manner'. The property damage occurred when the Sergeant's glasses were broken as a result of the altercation between the appellant and himself ([10]). The Magistrate found that the appellant's behaviour amounted to a breach of the intervention order, as he intimidated the daughter by assaulting her mother and the Sergeant in her presence, abusing her and conducting himself in a violent and abusive manner ([11]).

At trial, the Magistrate noted the appellant's personal circumstances at [13], referring to his age, his previous marriage, and his employment history. His character references indicated that he was a hardworking, honest person who made a positive contribution to his community ([14]). The appellant had a prior conviction for assault of a police officer for which he was ordered to perform 200 hours of community service within 10 months ([15]). The Magistrate did not refer to the circumstances that led to the making of the intervention order ([17]). In his view, specific and general deterrence were significant sentencing principles ([18]). His Honour also 'correctly observed' that the law is required to protect police officers when performing their duties, as well as domestic partners ([19]). Consequently, the Magistrate imposed convictions on all counts and sentenced the appellant to 6 months' imprisonment ([20]).

Issue: The appellant appealed against his sentence on 2 grounds, namely, 1) that the Magistrate failed to have regard to the appellant's lack of antecedents, age, community work, good character and the interests of justice in sentencing the appellant; and 2) that the sentence of 6 months' imprisonment was manifestly excessive.

Held: Hinton J allowed the appeal in part. His Honour considered each ground separately, and placed reliance on relevant case law and statistics from the New South Wales Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research. His Honour noted that the first ground of appeal was essentially a contention that the appellant's lack of antecedents, age, community work, and good character should have attracted a weight that resulted in a lesser sentence, or resulted in the sentence imposed being suspended in part or in whole ([21]). Referring to House v The King and R v Lutze, his Honour concluded that the submissions made in support of the first appeal ground should be treated as forming part of the submission in support of the second appeal ground ([24]).

As to the second appeal ground, his Honour found that the offending was 'particularly serious' and that the Magistrate correctly referred to the court's duty to protect vulnerable people from domestic violence ([29]). His Honour cited R v Saunders for the proposition that intervention orders and bail conditions can prevent acts of domestic violence, and that the violation of such orders and conditions can have profound consequences for the victim's sense of safety and security. Hinton J observed 'the effectiveness of intervention orders as a means of protecting members of the community will be undermined if the courts do not respond appropriately to their breach' ([33]).

Hinton J did not find the sentence of 6 months' imprisonment to be manifestly excessive per se. The appellant did not provide any explanation for his conduct or express remorse or contrition, and mitigating circumstances were absent. Although he is an intelligent person, his prior involvement with the courts and police should have been a clear reminder that such violent, abusive conduct towards his family and police is not tolerated ([40]). The appellant's prospects of rehabilitation were good, as he generally lived a 'good and productive life' and would likely continue to do so upon his release ([41]).

His Honour, however, found the requirement that 'he serve the entirety of the 6 month sentence so as to punish, to deter specifically and generally and to provide the protection' to be manifestly excessive. The Magistrate's approach was not reasonably open, having regard to the appellant's personal circumstances and, in particular, his age, antecedents, previous good character, work history and prospects of rehabilitation ([43]-[44]). The Magistrate appeared to focus on condign punishment to the exclusion of rehabilitation, and overlooked the appellant's likely response to supervision in the community for an extended period, which would have provided greater protection for the community ([44]).

In summary, the appeal was allowed, but to the limited extent of directing, pursuant to s 96(4) of the Sentencing Act 2017 (SA), that the appellant serve 16 weeks of his 6-month sentence in prison and suspend the remainder of the sentence on condition that he 1) enter into a good behaviour bond for 18 months; 2) be subject to supervision by a Community Corrections Officer; and 3) attend any counselling, treatment and therapeutic programs that deal with anger management and/or domestic violence as directed and deemed appropriate by his Community Corrections Officer ([45]).

Wondimu v Police* [2019] SASC 62 (18 April 2019) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'Bail conditions' – 'Breach' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Self-represented'

Charges: Stalking x 1; non-compliance with bail agreement x 3.

Case type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: On 2 November 2016, the appellant was arrested and charged with stalking his father-in-law. He was released on bail subject to conditions, one of which prohibited him contacting his then wife of 13 years, who was also the mother of his five children and the daughter of his father-in-law. On 10 November 2016, the appellant telephoned his wife, but did not leave a message. The appellant also sent 2 text messages on a separate occasion. As a result, he was arrested and charged with 3 counts of breaching the terms of his bail. The Magistrate found the appellant guilty, and imposed convictions in relation to each count and released him upon his entering into a 6 months' good behaviour bond in the sum of $500. The appellant appealed against the conviction and sentence. His appeal against conviction was over 40 weeks out of time.

Issue: This is an appeal against a conviction and sentence, where the appeal against conviction was made out of time. The appellant submitted that the relevant bail condition was unreasonable or unlawful for including the prohibition against contact with his wife when she was not the complainant. He also argued that he had not been competently represented by counsel at his trial.

Held: Upon the hearing of the appeal, the appellant was unrepresented. Hinton J noted that one of the purposes of conditions of a bail agreement is to prevent further offending ([33]). Hinton J was not satisfied that the impugned condition was legally unreasonable, as the evidence suggested a domestic disturbance between the appellant and his wife, a repeat of which the police intended to prevent by prohibiting contact. Further, Hinton J found that the validity of a bail agreement does not depend on the prosecution's success at trial of any charge to which the bail agreement relates. The fact that a person is charged is sufficient to subject him or her to bail ([36]).

Hinton J also found that it was open to the Magistrate to be satisfied of the appellant's guilt on Count 1 beyond reasonable doubt ([44]). His Honour noted that contact, in terms of communication, can be direct or indirect and that the evidence established that the call was made from the appellant's phone. His Honour found that it is irrelevant whether a mental element attaches to the act, as the offence of breaching a bail agreement pursuant to section 17 of the Bail Act 1985 (SA) is one of strict liability. A bail agreement, in his view, not only seeks to ensure compliance but also requires the accused to take positive steps to ensure compliance. To hold that an offence is one that has a mental element attaching to the act would undermine the requirement that an accused granted bail take positive steps to avoid an inadvertent breach ([43]).

His Honour refused to grant the appellant an extension of time in which to appeal against his convictions, as no explanation was provided for the delay and the appeal did not have sufficient prospects of success. His Honour held that the the appeal was, in effect, an effort to have the appellant's case re-tried so that he could adopt a different approach ([45]). The appeal against sentence was also dismissed. The appellant was obliged to take steps to ensure compliance with the bail conditions, which he failed to do ([46]-[51]).

Mathew (SA) Nominees Pty Ltd v Belconnen Automotive Pty Ltd* [2019] SASC 39 (21 March 2019) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Contract' – 'Costs' – 'Misleading conduct' – 'Specific performance'

Civil proceedings: claim by plaintiff for specific performance of motor vehicle purchase contracts; counterclaim by defendant for misleading conduct, jurisdictional challenge; and security for costs application by defendant.

Appeal type: appeal against Magistrate's reasons, security for costs order, and failure to make jurisdictional challenge order.

Facts: The plaintiff purchased three high performance Holden motor vehicles in the name of the plaintiff's company. Only two are relevant to this matter. The purchases were negotiated by Mr Mazzacano and two others. Mr Mazzacano, as a former Holden employee, was entitled to an employee discount scheme. The plaintiff's claims that he ordered the vehicles and was invoiced for each by the defendant ($42,927 and $44,467). He paid both the balance and deposit. The defendant contends that the plaintiff company was not entitled to access the discounts as the purchase was not for the benefit of Mr Mazzacano. The defendant did not deliver the vehicles but returned the purchase monies to the plaintiff. The plaintiff sought specific performance of its contracts with the defendant on 19 July 2017 and filed an application for summary judgment. The defendant filed a defence stating that the plaintiff was not entitled to the EPSA discount. The defendant subsequently filed an amended defence and counterclaim, and included a counterclaim for misleading conduct and the defendant filed interrogatories seeking clarification on the nature of the business being operated by the plaintiff asking 'what is the nature of the business that was being operated by the plaintiff during 2017'.

The defendants made a jurisdictional challenge and a security for costs application. The plaintiff appeals against orders granting security for costs and declining to order costs in relation to the defendant's jurisdictional challenge.

Issues:

1. The Magistrate's Reasons are inadequate in that they fail to address various issues raised by the plaintiff.
2. The Magistrate erred in his decision to order security for costs in giving no weight, or insufficient wait to various matters.
3. The Magistrate erred in ordering security for costs in an excessive amount, in particular having regard to the true quantum of the dispute, the inclusion of past the failure to make to make reductions for the costs of the counterclaim and the interruption caused by the failed jurisdiction application.
4. The magistrate erred in failing to make an order (in respect of the defendant's jurisdictional challenge that the defendant pay the plaintiff's costs of that application).

Decision and reasoning:

Dismissing the appeal, Doyle J held:

There was no error in relation to the Magistrate's exercise of his discretion to order security for costs per House v King (1936) 55 CLR 499.

The plaintiff did not establish that there was the potential for substantial injustice were permission to be refused and the orders for security left to stand.

Reasoning – appeal ground 1:

That a Magistrate attaches insufficient weight to a particular consideration is not, in itself, an allegation of error in the sense required by House v The King at [49]. That 'Appellate intervention in interlocutory decision making' should be 'truly exceptional at [50]. In relation to the alleged inadequacy of reasons in relation to both security for costs and the costs of the failed jurisdiction application, his Honour, held at [53] that 'in the case of interlocutory disputes, little by way of reasoning may be required'…'as long as the key planks in the judge's reasoning process leading to the relevant decision are apparent, that will generally suffice'. The Magistrate in their reasons, 'identified the plaintiff's status as a trustee company', the 'defendant's delay in bringing the application' and 'stated his conclusions in relation to the availability of security for past costs' at [55].In the event that a plaintiff is a trustee, a defendant 'should not be subjected to the potential complexity…expense and uncertainty, associated with having to resort to derivative rights in order to recover any costs' at [64]. The plaintiff did not identify whether it holds the properties in its own right or as trustee, and as such the Magistrate was right to attach significance to the consideration [75]. In relation to the Magistrate not giving any weight to the defendants' delay in bringing the application for security. While 'it is a well-established that applications for security should be brought promptly' [at 78], whether it is in the interests of justice to make an order for security is also a factor [at 82].

Other matters that were of some relevance to the discretion to order security was the absence of indication by the plaintiff that it would not be able to provide security, further there was no challenge to the bona fides or arguable merit of the plaintiff's claim including that he had paid the for the cars prior to the order for security for costs. At [104] it was open for the Magistrate to make a reduction to the quantum of security upon the existence of the counterclaim, however the amount ordered was not 'erroneously high'.

Conclusion as to security for costs:

- The plaintiff did not suggest that it was unable to provide security.
- The plaintiff having to meet its costs obligations flowing form the litigation constitutes an injustice or prejudice in this case.

Reasoning – appeal ground 2:

At [65] 'while it is significant, the context of an application for security, that a plaintiff is suing as trustee, it does not follow automatically that it will be appropriate that there be an order for security'.

Shahin v El-Shafei; El-Shafei v Shahin* [2018] SASC 167 (6 November 2018) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Disclosure' – 'Domestic, family or apprehended violence or for personal safety' – 'Orders and convictions' – 'Orders to restrain'

Proceeding: Private application for final intervention order.

Appeal type: Appeal against Magistrate's revocation of interim intervention order.

Facts: Mr Shahin is the owner of two adjacent properties, numbers 17 and 18. His family occupies number 17, while his sister occupies number 18. Dr El-Shafei owns number 19, which is adjacent to number 18. There have been ongoing disputes between the parties regarding a number of matters. Dr El-Shafei alleges he was assaulted by Mr Shahin, claiming a resulting wrist injury. Dr El-Shafei is charged with an offence relating to damage caused to the boundary fence. Following the dismissal of a police application for an intervention order, Dr El-Shafei filed a private application which proceeded ex parte withDr Cannon (then Deputy Magistrate) granting an interim order pursuant to s 21 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA). The application for a final intervention order was heard a week later by Magistrate Sheppard. The interim order was revoked and the matter referred back to Dr Cannon for further hearing. Dr Cannon declined to award costs of the intervention order application in favour of Mr Shahin. Mr Shahin filed a notice of appeal again Dr Cannon's dismissal of his application for costs. Dr El-Shafei subsequently filed a notice of appeal against Magistrate Sheppard's revocation of the interim intervention order on 29 June 2018. A second and third amended notice of appeal were filed by Dr El-Shafei on the 12 July and 5 September 2018. The second notice amended an incorrect identification of the parties. The third notice filed the day before the appeal hearing, was not served on Mr Shahin's representatives until the morning of the hearing.

Issues:

- Whether an applicant for an intervention order is required to make full and fair disclosure on the same basis as any other person seeking an ex parte order.
- Whether s 76A of the Criminal Procedure Act 1921 (SA) was available to set aside an interim intervention order or whether the operation of s 76A is precluded by s 26(5) Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)('IO Act').
- Whether Magistrate Sheppard erred in revoking the interim order or denied Dr El-Shafei procedural fairness by declining to adjourn proceedings until Dr El-Shafei arranged legal representation.
- Whether Dr Cannon misdirected himself as a matter of law and fact by referring to his own conduct rather than by inquiring whether Dr El-Shafei had acted in bad faith or unreasonably pursuant to s 189C of the Criminal Procedure Act 1921 (SA).

Decision and reasoning:

Permission to appeal

As a criminal proceeding (per R 4.07 of the Magistrates Court Act 1991 (SA), the jurisdiction conferred on by the IO Act is vested in the Criminal Division), any appeal relating to an intervention order is subject to s 42 of the Magistrates Court Act 1991 (SA) at [41]. S 42(1a) of the Magistrates Court Act 1991 (SA) does not preclude an appeal against interlocutory judgment in these circumstances. Per Sulan J in Groom v Police (No 3) [2013] SASC 93, the words "before commencement or completion of the trial" in s 42(1a)(c) have no operative effect unless there is a trial. Accordingly, 'the Court has power to grant permission for an interlocutory appeal if … there are special reasons why that would be in the interests of the administration of justice' at [45]. Granting permission, his Honour was satisfied special reasons existed due to the significant questions of law raised (ie the application of s 76A of the Criminal Procedure Act 1921 (SA) and validity of referring the matter for further hearing) at [48].

Dismissing Dr El-Shafei's appeal, Parker J held

'An applicant for an interim intervention order is not required to make full and fair disclosure in the same manner as an applicant for an ex parte order' at [76]. 'The relevant issue is not whether one party is more or less blameworthy than the other, but rather whether it is reasonable to suspect that an act of abuse may be committed' (grounds for issuing an intervention order per s 6 IO Act) at [77]. S 23 IO Act provides the Defendant with an opportunity to respond before the Court concludes whether a final order is appropriate at [78]. ‘There is a real risk that the imposition of a full and fair disclosure obligation in such an environment is likely to frustrate or impede the object of providing prompt intervention to protect those at risk of abuse’ at [78]. Given the impracticality of subjecting the police to full and fair disclosure, private applications should be under no greater obligation at [81].

S 26 IO Act does not operate to preclude the Court from exercising its powers under s 76A where the operation of s 76A is considered necessary to remedy an injustice. The power conferred by s 76A was available to the Magistrate at [109], [112].

- S 76A was not applied to frustrate the operation of a legislative scheme (the IO Act) but to rectify a situation considered unjust (Police v Clayton-Smith [2010] SASC 127 per Gray J).
- The requirement to award persons with a relevant interest an opportunity to be heard before the revocation or variation of an order, as enacted by s 26(5)(a) IO Act, exists at common law and is therefore a relevant consideration in applying s 76A at [107], [109], [112].
- Likewise, s 26(5)(b) does not extend the requirements of the common law as the same matters will be considered in making an order as in the varying or revoking that order at [110].

There was no process or outcome error in the decision of Magistrate Sheppard. Her Honour’s concern about the accuracy and timing of the information provided by Dr El-Shafei was a proper reason for revoking the interim order at [117]. As the ‘decisive issue was the reliability of the information put before the Court’ and as Dr El-Shafei was awarded ample opportunity to address those issues, he was not unfairly disadvantaged by a lack of legal representation at [129]. The orders of Magistrate Sheppard required a rehearing of the application for an interim order. A rehearing did not occur and the proceedings of 18 May 2018 before Dr Cannon therefore miscarried at [132]. If Dr El-Shafei pursues his application the matter should proceed to a hearing to determine whether a final order should be made (per s 23 IO Act) at [135].

Upholding Mr Shahin’s appeal against the dismissal of his costs application, Parker J held

There were not proper grounds to reject Dr El-Shafei’s application for costs as Dr Cannon ‘did not have sufficient information to decide whether or not Dr El-Shafei had acted in bad faith or unreasonably’ at [139]:

- Given Justice Parker’s finding that an applicant for an ex parte intervention order is not required to provide full and fair disclosure, Dr El-Shafei’s failure to provide all relevant information did not warrant a cost order against him at [137]-[138]

- While Dr El-Shafei may have caused the Court to be misled (a proper basis for setting aside the interim order), without a determination of the factual allegations made against him, Dr El-Shafei cannot be said to have acted in bad faith or unreasonably at [138]. That question should be determined if and when a final order is determined at [140].

Stone v Police [2018] SASC 147 (27 September 2018) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Contravention of an intervention order' – 'Evidence' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'Protection order'

Charges: Contravention of an intervention order x 2.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant was convicted after trial of two counts of contravening a term of an intervention order. After finding the evidence of the protected persons to be truthful and accurate, the Magistrate recorded convictions and imposed a good behaviour bond for 12 months.

Issues: The appellant appealed the convictions on a number of grounds including that the Magistrate erred in admitting evidence of past discreditable conduct, applied the wrong onus of proof in relation to the charges, placed undue reliance on the credibility of the protected person, impermissibly relied on evidence of a charge that was dismissed in finding the appellant guilty of the two charges, wrongly regulated the cross-examination of the appellant, and that the evidence was insufficient to support the convictions beyond reasonable doubt.

Decision and reasoning: Kelly J dismissed the appeal on the following grounds:

- The evidence of past discreditable conduct complained of was properly admitted.
- The Magistrate applied the proper onus of proof in finding the charges proven.
- The evidence was sufficient to satisfy the convictions.
- The Magistrate made proper assessments of the witnesses at trial, as required, and was entitled to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt as to the credibility of the protected person as a witness following his assessment of that person's evidence.
- The Magistrate did not rely on evidence relating to the dismissed charge in finding the appellant guilty of the two counts on which he was convicted.
- The cross-examination of the appellant at trial did not go beyond the bounds of fair and proper cross-examination.

White v Police* [2018] SASC 124 (5 September 2018) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Vulnerable people'

Appeal type: Appeal against decision of a magistrate to issue a final intervention order.

Facts: The police issued an interim intervention order against the appellant for the protection of Mr Larkins, his wife, his child and three other children in his care, all of whom lived in the same street as the appellant. The appellant and his wife (who had separated, but continued to live in the same house) had a poor relationship with Mr Larkins and his wife. Mr Larkins and his wife were Indigenous Australians. Mrs Larkins had been involved in Federal Court proceedings relating to unspecified issues with the appellant's wife.

The Magistrate was required to determine whether or not the interim intervention order should be confirmed as a final intervention order or a final intervention order be made in substitution. The order was declared to address a domestic violence concern. The Magistrate made a final intervention order against the appellant in substitution for the interim order, finding that it was reasonable to suspect that the appellant would, without intervention, commit acts of abuse against the protected persons and that it was appropriate in the circumstances to issue a final order. The protected persons were unchanged but the terms of the final intervention order differed somewhat from those of the interim order.

Issues: Whether a final intervention order should be made; Whether the Magistrate erred with respect to evidentiary matters and in applying the statutory requirements for making a final intervention order.

Decision and reasoning: It was entirely open to the Magistrate to accept the evidence of Mr Larkins and his wife on critical issues in preference to that of the appellant and his wife. The transcript showed that the appellant appeared angry and malevolent towards Mr Larkins and his family, displaying significant animosity with racial overtones towards them. It was reasonable to find that the appellant would commit further acts of abuse in the absence of an intervention order. In all the circumstances, the Magistrate's order was appropriate.

Dismissing the appeal, Nicholson J held that:

- The order made by the Magistrate was interlocutory and special reasons must be established in order to obtain leave to appeal.
- The features of a final intervention order, together with the fact that the appellant has no right to apply for a variation or revocation for at least 12 months, were sufficient to establish special reasons, at least where there is an arguable case on appeal.
- Bearing in mind the usual advantages possessed by a trial judge when assessing oral evidence, it was open to the Magistrate to make the findings of fact he made on the evidence that was before him.
- The Magistrate did not err with respect to the evidentiary matters complained of by the appellant.
- The Magistrate did not err in applying the statutory requirements of s 6 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA). The findings made in satisfaction of these requirements were open on the evidence.

Hussey v Police* [2018] SASC 122 (31 August 2018) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Children' – 'Damaging property' – 'Evidence' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'People with children' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charges: Breach of bail x 1; Property damage x 2; Assault causing harm x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction for assault.

Facts: The appellant and complainant had been in a relationship for about eight weeks. Each had one daughter. The complainant was woken by her daughter vomiting. The next day, the complainant and appellant argued. When the complainant told the appellant to leave her home, he became very angry and violent. The complainant alleges that the appellant kicked, punched and shoved her. She ran to her neighbour's house with her daughter and asked them to call the police. She could hear him ripping the flyscreens off her house. The Magistrate described the appellant and complainant as witnesses who 'gave their evidence clearly and with some passion, both of them without major discrepancies'. He found the appellant guilty of assault but not guilty of the property damage charges.

Issues: Whether the verdict was open on the evidence; Whether the Magistrate adequately explained why the appellant's evidence was rejected; Whether the magistrate's reasons were adequate.

Decision and reasoning: The appellant appealed the guilty verdict on the grounds that (1) the Magistrate's reasons were insufficient to explain his finding that 'Nothing was sufficient to justify a movement of the foot sufficiently hard to damage the side of her face. He could have extracted his foot without kicking her to the cheek'; (2) that the Magistrate did not explain why his evidence was rejected beyond reasonable doubt; and (3) that there was insufficient evidence for the Magistrate to have rejected beyond reasonable doubt his version of events, which should have led to the Magistrate entertaining a reasonable doubt as to his guilt in relation to the assault charge.

Bampton J held that, having read the evidence in its entirety and in accordance with the requirements referred to in M v the Queen [1994] HCA 63, the finding of guilt was not supported by the evidence. The state of the evidence was such that the prosecution failed to prove that the appellant intentionally applied force to the complainant causing 'harm to the tongue and cheek'. Her Honour held that the Magistrate did not adequately explain his finding of guilt and did not explain how the elements of assault were satisfied. The Magistrate's reasons were not underpinned by a reasoning process linking and justifying the findings made ([53]). There was reasonable doubt as to the appellant's guilt. It was not open to the Magistrate to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the appellant's guilt. Accordingly, the appeal was allowed, the verdict of guilty was set aside and a verdict of not guilty was substituted.

R v Hayes* [2018] SASC 114 (9 August 2018) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Bail' – 'Family law' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Intentionally causing harm x 1; Contravening an intervention order x 1.

Proceeding type: Prosecution appeal against grant of bail.

Facts: The respondent, an Aboriginal man, was charged with intentionally causing harm and contravening an intervention order. The respondent assaulted his former partner (the complainant) during an access visit to their son. The circumstances of aggravation included that the complainant was his ex-partner and the respondent used a coffee mug, to inflict injuries to the head and face of the victim ([5]). The respondent also had a criminal history for offences of violence and dishonesty ([9]). The respondent was a prescribed applicant within the meaning of s 10A of the Bail Act 1985 (SA) such that bail may not be granted unless special circumstances are established. The DPP contended that bail should not be granted due to the risk of re-offending (given the respondent's history of non-compliance with various court orders) and concerns for the complainant's safety ([15]).

Issues: Whether bail should be granted.

Decision and Reasoning: Kelly J dismissed the appeal. Special circumstances justifying release on bail included that the complainant no longer resided in the Court's jurisdiction ([17]), the likely trial date would not be for some time, and a recent report that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are highly over-represented in the remand population. According to the Australian Law Reform Commission Report No 133, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people continue to be over-represented in the remand population by a factor of over 11. However, a finding of special circumstances does not mean that bail is automatically granted. At [12], her Honour stated –

> 'Ordinarily, it may be expected that if special circumstances are established, then a grant of bail may follow but upon special circumstances being established, it will remain open to the bail authority to refuse bail if nonetheless, having regard in particular to the gravity of the offending, the likelihood that the prescribed applicant will re-offend, the likelihood that the prescribed applicant will interfere with a witness or evidence and the likelihood that he or she will abscond, the bail authority considers that bail should not be granted'.

Notwithstanding that the respondent was a prescribed applicant, her Honour held that there were special circumstances. It was therefore appropriate to grant the respondent bail on conditions of strict home detention ([18]).

Parish v Police* [2018] SASC 18 (27 February 2018) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Adequacy of reasons' – 'Magistrates court' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charges: Assault causing harm x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The complainant gave evidence that the appellant punched her from behind, pushed her to the floor, pushed her head into the floor and wall, and bit her on the cheek ([16]-[17]).

Issues: Whether the conviction was unreasonable or insupportable having regard to the evidence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed, and the matter was remitted for retrial before a different magistrate ([98]).

Lovell J described the case as an 'oath on oath' case ([10]). At [51]-[54], Lovell J provides a useful exposition of what is necessary for a Magistrate to include in a judgement to amount to adequate reasons. Simply summarising the evidence is not sufficient. The reasons must engage with conflicts in evidence and how those conflicts can be resolved.

Lovell J held that the Magistrate failed to provide adequate reasons in two areas. First, in accepting the evidence of a police officer and M's treating doctor without explaining how the Magistrate reconciled the inconsistencies between their evidence and M's evidence ([57]-[79]). Second, in dismissing the evidence of the appellant's uncle without explaining why ([80]-[86]).

B, JL v Police* [2017] SASC 9 (10 February 2017) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Intermediate sanctions' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnant people' – 'Protection orders' – 'Sentencing' – 'Women' – 'Young people'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and complainant were in a domestic relationship. They had a 7-month-old child and the complainant was pregnant with another child. The appellant was 17 years old at the time of the offences. An intervention order was in place requiring the appellant to not assault, harass, intimidate or threaten the complainant. The offence occurred when the appellant grabbed the complainant by the upper arms and squeezes them ([6]).

The Magistrate recorded a conviction and imposed a 12-month good behaviour bond.

Issues: Whether the magistrate erred in recording a conviction.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The conviction was set aside, and again imposed the 12-month good behaviour bond ([24]).

The appellant submitted that the magistrate failed to have sufficient regard to the appellant's youth and the purposes of the Young Offenders Act 1993 (SA), in particular the policy that there should be no unnecessary interruption of employment ([12]).

Stanley J emphasised that the appellant had a history of domestic violence and highlighted the need for general deterrence at [19]:

> Offences of violence by men against women are all too prevalent. All too often they result in harm but the deterrence of those offences will not be adequately achieved unless all offences of violence, whether they cause harm or not, are properly addressed.

Nonetheless, Stanley J held that the public interest in a conviction being recorded is diminished when the defendant is a youth ([18]). It was important that the appellant was now reconciled with the complainant and his ability to provide for her and their children would be diminished by recording a conviction ([22]).

R v Fox* [2017] SASC 5 (3 February 2017) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption against bail' – 'Protection orders' – 'Protective function' – 'Special circumstances'

Appeal Type: Appeal against refusal to grant bail.

Facts: The applicant and the female complainant had been in a relationship for 10 years. On 14 September 2016, the applicant was charged with using a dangerous article, aggravated assault with a weapon against his own child or spouse, and committing an assault aggravated by the use of an offensive weapon. These offences occurred in the context of the breakdown of the applicant and complainant's relationship and were committed against the complainant and her new partner. On 14 September 2016, an interim intervention order was made against the applicant. The applicant breached this order on two occasions.

The applicant was charged with two counts of contravening a term of an intervention order pursuant to s 31 of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) and one count of aggravated threat to cause harm. The applicant was a prescribed applicant pursuant to s 10A(2)(ba) of the Bail Act 1985 (SA) because he was charged with breaching an intervention order in circumstances involving violence. As such, there was a presumption against the grant of bail unless the applicant established the existence of special circumstances: s 10A(1). The magistrate refused to grant bail.

Issue/s: The magistrate erred in failing to find there were special circumstances.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Hinton J noted generally that Parliament's approach to an act of defiance to a protective order allegedly perpetrated in circumstances involving violence 'only tolerates release into the community on bail if special circumstances can be established' (see [16]). This is part of the community's recognition of the 'prevalence of domestic violence' and the need to insist on strict compliance with intervention orders to ensure they fulfil their protective purpose (see [17]).

His Honour continued that, 'special circumstances will only exist where the applicant can demonstrate that he or she does not pose the risk which Parliament had in contemplation in reversing the presumption and in relation to whom the denial of bail would result in consequences beyond the contemplation of Parliament'. The relevant risk here was 'of further defiance of an order and violence threatened or perpetrated in doing so' (see [19]).

The ability to fashion bail conditions which reduce the risk of offending and offer protection to the victim will not ordinarily amount to special circumstances (see [40]).

On the facts, Hinton J held that there were no special circumstances warranting the grant of bail. None of the sorts of special circumstances referred to in R v Buhlmann were present (see [20] of this case). The applicant had not pointed to any exceptional hardship that would result from his continued incarceration (see [42]).

Police v Martin* [2016] SASC 194 (14 December 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

*Note: this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Error of law' – 'Failure to provide inadequate reasons' – 'Intervention order' – 'Power to issue intervention orders' – 'Protection orders'

Appeal Type: Appeal against the imposition of a final intervention order.

Facts: The male appellant was having an affair with a married woman, Ms P, who told him her marriage was over. The appellant was concerned that she was not telling the truth. On 8 October 2015, after an argument, the appellant went to Ms P's home address at night. Being unable to see or raise her, he went to the backyard and called out to her. Ms P and her husband contacted the police. The appellant left without making any threat or committing any violence.

The next day, police approached the appellant and searched his vehicle. They found a can of OC spray (oleoresin capsicum spray), a hammer and a small knife, but it was agreed that he did not take these onto Ms P's premises. The appellant was charged with being on premises without lawful excuse and for the items in his car. A police interim intervention order was issued against him with respect to Ms P, her husband and their children. On 19 August 2016, the appellant pleaded guilty. Relevant to this appeal, on the same day, the magistrate imposed an intervention order pursuant to s 19A of the Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA).

Issue/s:

1. The magistrate did not give any, or adequate, reasons for issuing the intervention order.
2. The magistrate erred in the exercise of his discretion to issue the intervention order against the appellant pursuant to s 19A(1)Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Peek J held that s 19A of the Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 did not create a freestanding power to issue final intervention orders. At [24], His Honour stated that:

'Section 19A does no more than enable a court hearing substantive charges – in this case it happened to be a Magistrate – to issue an intervention order as if a complaint had been made under the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009; the critical question of whether an order is to be made pursuant to such a complaint (or "as if a complaint had been made") will depend on the substantive provisions of the Intervention Orders Act.'

Here, the sentencing magistrate made no reference to the requirements set out in the Intervention Orders Act. As such, it was impossible to assess whether the magistrate approached the matter incorrectly and failed to address the issues relevant to making a restraining order (see [33]-[34]). There was also an unacceptable risk that the magistrate took an incorrect approach to s 19A and failed to have sufficient regard to the requirements of the Intervention Orders Act (see [35]). Accordingly, the intervention order was quashed. The original police interim intervention order was declared to be continuing in force until it was withdrawn or a confirmation hearing convened.

Craill v Police* [2016] SASC 168 (4 November 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

*Note this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Aggravated assault' – 'Breaching bail' – 'Contravention of an intervention order' – 'Exposing children' – 'Listening to Victims' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Repeated contraventions of protection order' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suspended sentence'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault x 1; contravention of an intervention order x 9, breaching bail x 5.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant attended the home of the female victim (his former partner). An argument ensued. While holding their eight-week-old child, the appellant pushed the victim against the bedroom door by holding her throat (aggravated assault). The appellant was also charged with nine counts of failing to comply with a term of an intervention order and the five counts of breaching bail. The applicant was sentenced to five months and two weeks imprisonment. This also involved revoking a suspended sentence imposed for an offence of driving while disqualified. The breaching offences were five of the counts of contravening an intervention order and one of the counts of breaching bail.

Issue/s: Some of the grounds of appeal included –

1. The magistrate erred in the application of s 18A of the Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act 1988 (SA);
2. The magistrate erred in failing to find that there were no proper grounds to refrain from revoking a suspended sentence.
3. The magistrate erred in failing to have regard or sufficient regard to the complainant's attitude toward penalty;
4. The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

First, the magistrate did not err in the application of s 18A. It was appropriate and convenient to go directly to the single sentence imposed for the course of conduct constituting the breach and contravention charges. The magistrate treated this offending separately from the offending on the charge of aggravated assault. Any descent into further detail would have created unnecessary elaboration – R v Major applied: see [18].

Second, there was no error in the approach of the magistrate. One of the key submissions rejected by Stanley J was that proper grounds existed to refrain from revoking a suspended sentence because there was a marked disproportion between the seriousness of the offence constituting the breach and the sentence of imprisonment that would be activated. In rejecting this, Stanley J held that the breaching offences shared the same characteristic as the earlier offending; they involved the appellant failing to comply with a term or condition imposed on him. However, more importantly, there was not a marked disproportion between the seriousness of the breaching offences and the sentence of imprisonment activated. The contraventions of an intervention order were ‘serious offending’. As per Stanley J at [28]:

‘In R v McMutrie this Court said that a breach of a restraining order is a matter of particular gravity. The object of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) is the prevention of domestic and non-domestic abuse, and the exposure of children to the effects of such abuse. The principal instrument for achieving this objective is the making of intervention orders. The protective objects of the Act can only be achieved if courts are scrupulous in doing what they can to ensure that persons who are subject to such orders comply with them. The repeated breaches of those orders by the appellant demonstrate a persistent, blatant and contumelious disregard for the orders and the authorities that impose them. Crimes of domestic violence are often occasions for the exercise, or attempted exercise, of power over the victim by the offender. Breaches of intervention orders can be occasions for the offender to intimidate the victim with an implied threat that such orders will not protect them. The courts must act to contradict this impression’.

Third, there was no error in the approach taken by the magistrate to the victim’s attitude towards penalty. Stanley J noted that ‘[w]hile the attitude of the victim to an offence is not an irrelevant factor in sentencing, that attitude cannot be determinative of what constitutes an appropriate sentence. Moreover, this principle must be applied with considerable caution in cases of domestic violence’ ([33]). His Honour continued at [36]:

‘The reason for such caution is obvious. In situations of domestic violence a victim’s motivation for advocating a particular penalty is often influenced by their ongoing relationship with the defendant and an unhealthy relationship of dependency between them. Their attitude is often influenced by apprehension about the consequences for them in the future given a continuing relationship with the defendant. This attitude frequently fails to reflect what is in their best interests and what the court might consider appropriate in all the circumstances. It would be contrary to sound sentencing practice to place victims of domestic violence in the position where they hold, or appear to hold, the keys to the offender’s release. To place victims in that position is to impose on them a burden they ought not be required to bear’.

Finally, the sentence was not manifestly excessive. This was in circumstances where the aggravated offence was towards the lower end of the scale for that offence but it was still a serious offence, exacerbated by the presence of a small child; the aggravated assault was not mitigated by the expressed attitude of the victim; the repeated breaches of the intervention order constituted serious offending; the appellant did not have a favourable criminal history; and considerations of general and specific deterrence were particularly important here: see [52]-[53].

Thakur v Police (2016) SASR 180; [2016] SASC 75 (3 June 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Appeal' – 'Court not to allow appeal against order confirmed by consent unless consent was not freely given' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Protection orders'

Appeal Type: Appeal to set aside an interim intervention order.

Facts: On 13 January 2015, a magistrate issued an interim intervention order against the appellant protecting his wife. The appellant was reported for five breaches of this order. On 7 May, the appellant was interviewed by police in relation to those alleged breaches. The appellant provided the police with his phone and its passcode. On the same day, the prosecutor contacted the appellant's solicitor and offered to resolve the trial if the appellant consented to the confirmation of the intervention order. The prosecutor also offered not to proceed with the fresh charges in relation to the alleged breaches in those circumstances. The appellant's solicitor said his client agreed to this. After being charged with subsequent breaches, the appellant sought to appeal the confirmation of the order.

Issue/s: The appellant consented to the confirmation of the interim intervention order in error or by mistake because he believed there was no other satisfactory alternative available to him to recover his mobile telephone from police and thereby protect the confidentiality of commercially sensitive information.

Decision and Reasoning: To find 'special reasons' under s 42(1a)(c) of the Magistrates Court Act 1991 (SA) to allow an appeal against an interlocutory order, only an 'arguable' case needs to be demonstrated. The appellant's case was arguable (see [26]-[27]). Permission to appeal was granted.

However, the appeal was dismissed. At [38], Stanley J held that:

'a court will allow an appeal from the confirmation of an intervention order made pursuant to s 23(3) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) in circumstances where the defendant's consent was not freely given in the sense that the consent was not properly informed, was made inadvertently or was made by mistake or in error in the sense that the person giving the purported consent did not appreciate to what it was he or she was consenting'.

His Honour rejected the submission that 'it is sufficient to set aside the order that a defendant only establishes that he or she consented to the confirmation of the order without due consideration to material matters, if that proposition is understood as requiring merely a failure on the part of the defendant to direct his or her mind to some relevant consideration in giving consent' (see [39]).

Here, the appellant's consent was freely given. Stanley J did not accept that the appellant had no satisfactory alternative but to consent to the confirmation of the intervention order. He could have been under no misapprehension as to what it was consenting to (see [40]-[41]).

Police v Hodder [2016] SASC 70 (24 May 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Costs order' – 'Investigations before applying for protection order' – 'Police domestic violence' – 'Police protection order' – 'Reasonableness of police actions'

Case type: appeal against costs order following a magistrate's refusal to confirm an intervention order.

Facts: The respondent (Mr Hodder), his former wife (Ms Hodder) and her new partner (Mr Minchin) were police officers. Mr Minchin made an application for an intervention order against Mr Hodder alleging that Mr Hodder acted in a threatening and harassing manner towards him. The police obtained an interim intervention order on his behalf. After a trial, the magistrate found that Ms Hodder and Mr Minchin were not reliable witnesses. The magistrate found no basis for confirming the order and dismissed the application ([19]).

The magistrate ordered costs against the police for the whole of the proceedings, holding that they acted unreasonably in bringing and maintaining the proceedings ([20]).

Issues: Whether the magistrate erred by:

1. ordering costs when the police had not acted in bad faith or unreasonably;
2. awarding costs for the entirety of the proceedings; and
3. fixing costs above the scale.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was partly allowed.

On the first ground, Parker J held that the magistrate erred in finding that the police acted unreasonably. The prima facie position is that costs should not be awarded against a complainant in proceedings for a restraining order. The fact that the police could have investigated a matter further does not establish unreasonableness. Prosecutors should not prejudge the issue and should proceed where it is open to the court to accept the complainant as a credible witness ([37], [56]).

The second ground depended on whether it was reasonable for the police to continue the proceeding after the second day, when Mr Minchin's credibility had been damaged. The matter was remitted to the same magistrate to decide whether the police acted unreasonably in continuing with the application after the second day of the trial ([78]).

On the third ground, Parker J held that it was within the magistrate's discretion to award costs above the scale, having regard to the complexity of the evidence such as subpoenas and telephone recordings and the need to engage senior counsel ([88]).

Police v Kritcos* [2016] SASC 28 (10 March 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Confirmation of intervention order' – 'Emotional abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Interim intervention order'

Appeal Type: Appeal against a Magistrate's decision to revoke an interim intervention order.

Facts: An interim intervention order was made against the respondent (the appellant's former husband). A Magistrate dismissed an application to confirm the order and revoked the order. The alleged abuse consisted of three letters that the respondent sent to the appellant. One of the letters concerned renewal of their deceased pet dog's council registration and the attached dog tag. She believed that the respondent was making a point of using her address when he knew she did not want it disclosed and that the letter was a 'gratuitous and hurtful' reminder of the dog's death. During their marriage, they had intimidated the respondent's former wife by driving past her house. She was worried she would suffer similar harassment. The respondent denied all knowledge of the other letters. The appellant gave evidence which alleged prior acts of abuse by the respondent, including threats to kill and physical abuse. The Magistrate largely rejected this evidence as not proven, taking into account the fact that the appellant admitted lying in an affidavit previously filed in the Family Court. The Magistrate also rejected the respondent's explanation about sending the dog tag and found it was sent out of spite to upset the appellant.

Notwithstanding, while this conduct was spiteful, the Magistrate was not satisfied it resulted in emotional and psychological harm within the meaning of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (the Act). The Magistrate concluded that it was reasonable to suspect that the conduct would cause 'upset, annoyance and anger' but not harm. While the Magistrate found it was reasonable to suspect that the conduct would continue without intervention because the respondent's evidence 'did not provide any direct reassurance that the conduct will not continue' (See at [19]), he found that it would not be appropriate in the circumstances to confirm the order. He gave the respondent an opportunity to show he would not persist with the conduct. If the conduct persisted, the appellant could make an application for a further interim order. The Magistrate also noted the appellant was a personal trainer, coaches kick boxing and holds a black belt in martial arts.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the Magistrate erred in concluding that the letters did not amount to an act of abuse under the Act.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred in concluding that it was not appropriate to make an order in the circumstances.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The appellant submitted that the Magistrate erred by not having regard to the definition of emotional and psychological harm in the Act which includes 'distress, anxiety or fear that is more than trivial'. Doyle J held that while the Magistrate should have expressly referred to this definition, the Magistrate's finding was that, 'the correspondence was reasonably expected to cause "upset, annoyance and anger" in contradistinction to non-trivial "distress, anxiety or fear"' (see at [36]). The appellant also submitted that the Magistrate erred in 'approaching the issue of harm on the basis that he needed to be satisfied that the defendant's conduct was "intended to, and caused" harm. Doyle J concluded that the Magistrate had to consider three issues – 'First, whether the letters might reasonably be expected to cause harm (s 8(4)(j)) and then whether they were intended to, and did in fact, result in harm (s 8(2))' (see at [39]). His Honour concluded that the effect of the Magistrate's finding was that, 'the letters were neither intended to, nor did in fact, result in harm' and '(the Magistrate) appropriately addressed both the respondent's state of mind in engaging in the relevant conduct and the (subjective) impact of this conduct on the protected person' (see at [39]). In relation to the exclusion of other evidence relating to the history of the relationship, Doyle J held that the appellant was given several opportunities to detail the effect of the letters upon her.
2. The appellant submitted that the Magistrate failed to have regard to the principles set out in s 10 of the Act which are relevant to determining whether it is appropriate to make an order. In particular, the section makes clear that abuse can consist of isolated incidents. Doyle J stated at [44] – 'his Honour did not suggest that isolated instances could not constitute abuse. His reasoning was merely that on the facts of this case the letters (neither individually nor cumulatively) were not sufficient to constitute abuse.' In relation to the Magistrate's references to the appellant being a personal trainer and having martial arts qualifications, his Honour stated that this was a 'somewhat obscure' reference, but it was, 'probably best understood as being a reference to matters which might have given the protected person some level of personal confidence and physical prowess. While I consider these matters to have been of only marginal relevance, I do not think they are entirely irrelevant or that it was erroneous to take them into account' (see at [45]). The Magistrate's conclusion to give the respondent an opportunity to not persist with the relevant conduct is not a factor referred to in s 10(1) of the Act, but was nevertheless not irrelevant. It is a relevant consideration that the respondent is someone who might respond to an opportunity to change their behaviour. See finally at [48] –

'Here there was no proven act of past abuse. While the Magistrate accepted there was a reasonable suspicion abuse would occur in the future without intervention, it might be inferred that the Magistrate did not consider there to be a high likelihood of this occurring. Indeed, the Magistrate's judgment appears (from his reference to the contingency that his judgment might prove to be misplaced) to have been that the suspicion will probably not come to fruition. It is also relevant that while there was a suspicion of abuse in the broad sense contemplated by the Act (i.e. extending to emotional and psychological harm), the Magistrate made a positive finding that it was not reasonable to suspect that the defendant would cause physical harm to the protected person.

R v LI* [2016] SASC 4 (4 February 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Evidence' – 'Expert testimony' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charge/s: Murder.

Proceeding: Application to exclude expert evidence.

Facts: The defendant was tried for murdering his mother. His counsel sought to adduce expert psychiatric evidence relating to his relationships with his family, his mother as well as his childhood. The Director of Public Prosecutions sought to have this evidence excluded.

Issue/s: Whether the evidence fell outside the area of human knowledge or experience, such that a jury would be able to form a judgment about it without expert assistance.

Decision and Reasoning: The application was allowed and the evidence was excluded. It was not in dispute that the defendant caused his mother's death – the issue at trial related to self-defence. The evidence detailed his traumatic upbringing where he witnessed episodes of domestic violence. It explored the dynamics of the relationship between the accused and his mother. It did not detail any recognised psychiatric illness or disability that the accused suffered which would affect his capacity to give evidence or recollect events. Indeed, the psychiatrist was in fact impressed with the accused's ability to describe subtleties of his history in a way that convinced the psychiatrist that his account was accurate and that the relationship was abusive. The psychiatrist's view was that the case was 'unusual'. Blue J noted at [12] that the only 'expert' element of the report was the psychiatrist's view that the accused was fit to stand trial and that the mental impairment defence was not available. His Honour then distinguished the case of R v Runjanjic; R v Kontinnen (1992) 56 SASR 114; [1991] SASC 2951 (28 June 1991), where the Court held that expert evidence regarding the 'learned helplessness' associated with 'battered woman syndrome' were contrary to ordinary expectations of human behaviour such that juries could be misled without the assistance of expert evidence. The recent Queensland Court of Appeal decision of R v Jones [2015] QCA 161 (1 September 2015) was analogous. In that case, the proposed expert psychiatric evidence was found to be a matter of common knowledge. The same approach was adopted in this case. Many of the matters in the evidence simply detailed the history of the relationship and issues relating to Chinese family culture. These were not issues that needed explanation from a psychiatrist. See at [22] – 'The accused can give the evidence as he sees fit about the verbal or physical violence that he suffered at the hands of his mother. If that evidence is accepted by the jury it will be self-evident that the relationship between Mr Li and his mother was both complex and intense.'

Koay v Police* [2015] SASC 158 (7 October 2015) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault' – 'alleged prior violence' – 'Evidence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship evidence'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault.

Facts: The appellant, a woman, and the complainant, a man, met in 2011 and married in 2012. The appellant was on a spousal visa. The complainant's version of events involved the appellant coming into his bedroom at night when he was trying to sleep. He asked her to leave the room multiple times but she did not. He recorded some of the incident on his phone (and the recording was admitted in evidence). As they were grappling with a light switch, he claimed that the appellant punched and scratched him. He attempted to block the punches. He asked her to stop punching him. He suffered minor injuries. At trial, the appellant claimed that she acted in self-defence. She claimed that she was scared of him because he had previously been violent towards her, and that the reason for going into his bedroom was to discuss her visa.

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate erred by rejecting her claim of self-defence without the proper analysis required by s 15 of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The appellant submitted that rather than restricting himself to the events on the night, the Magistrate should have considered the evidence of alleged prior violence by the complainant to place context around the incident. The Magistrate noted that the appellant's claim that she was scared of the complainant lacked credibility, as she decided to enter his room in the middle of the night, notwithstanding his requests that she leave. The Magistrate found it difficult to accept her reason for going into the room (to discuss the visa) and also difficult to accept that the middle of the night was the most convenient time to do so. He described the appellant's evidence of self-defence as vague. It did not explain how the conduct was reasonable for her own defence. Vanstone J accepted the Magistrate's conclusions – the appellant made no attempt to directly address the elements required for self-defence in her evidence and she did not explain why, despite the complainant's requests, she did not leave the room. Vanstone J also held that the Magistrate was correct not to rely on the evidence of alleged prior violence inflicted by the complainant because it was not 'fleshed out in detail' (see at [18]) and there was nothing in this evidence which was relevant to the incident on the night.

Police v Baker* [2015] SASC 110 (30 July 2015) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Appeal' – 'Appeal against acquittal' – 'Assault' – 'Consent' – 'Evidence' – 'People living in regional, rural and remote communities' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Victim'

Charge/s: Assault.

Appeal type: Prosecution appeal against acquittal.

Facts: The respondent allegedly slapped his female companion in the face. This was witnessed by a police officer, whose evidence formed the basis of the prosecution case. The companion did not give evidence and at the time of the incident was not distressed. She informed the police officer that it was 'OK'. According to the officer, at the time of the incident, the companion did not want the respondent to be arrested. During the hearing, the Magistrate invited submissions as to whether the prosecution evidence was sufficient to ground consent or 'otherwise of having received force from the defendant' (see at [3]). The respondent was acquitted of the charge, with the Magistrate concluding that the prosecution's evidence was so lacking in weight or reliability that no reasonable tribunal of fact could safely convict (an R v Prasad (1979) 23 SASR 161; (1979) 2 A Crim R 45) direction). The Magistrate found a reasonable doubt about the 'lack of consent' element in the offence of assault. He noted that the prosecution's case was 'hampered' by the victim's failure to give evidence (See at [13]).

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate erred in finding that the prosecution's evidence lacked in weight or reliability and whether the Magistrate erred in finding a reasonable doubt as to the 'lack of consent' element.

Decision and Reasoning: The Court firstly noted the hesitance of appellate courts to interfere with Magistrates' decision to acquit. The appeal was dismissed for this reason but Nicholson J accepted the appellant's submissions relating to the trial process.

The Court accepted that there was a prima facie case to answer. The Magistrate gave no reasons regarding how he concluded that lack of consent could not be inferred beyond reasonable doubt. The appellant submitted that a reasonable tribunal of fact would not be able to ignore the inherent unlikelihood that a person would consent to being hit with the force as described by the police officer. Nicholson J accepted this submission, finding that the Prasad direction should not have been made and the case should have proceeded. The victim's lack of complaint, lack of cooperation with the police and her request that the respondent not be charged were evidentiary matters which may assist in determining whether she had consented to the slap. In fact, they were consistent with a finding that the victim was prepared to submit to the conduct. Importantly, Nicholson J noted at [24] – 'Submission and failure to complain are not the same as consent' and at [27] – 'Whilst each case will turn on its own facts, the mere fact that an alleged victim does not give evidence, will not necessarily mean that lack of consent cannot be proved beyond reasonable doubt.' However, while there were errors in the Magistrate's approach, there were no 'clear and compelling circumstances' ([27]) to interfere with the acquittal in this case.

Groom v Police* [2015] SASC 101 (14 July 2015) – South Australia Supreme Court

*Note: this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Construction of terms' – 'Contravention of intervention order' – 'Electronic listening device' – 'Evidence' –

'Interpretation of intervention order' – 'Protected person' – 'Public interest'

Charge/s: Contravention of intervention order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: An intervention order was in place between the appellant and his former partner. The breach arose from a conversation between the appellant and his former partner. The order prohibited discussions between the pair other than with respect to their child. In conversation, the appellant then brought up the appellant's ongoing court proceedings relating to the intervention order itself. At trial, the Magistrate admitted into evidence an audio recording of this conversation secretly made by his former partner. His former partner claimed she was advised by police to record communications between her and the appellant. Conversations between her and the appellant were usually unwitnessed by anyone else, which made previous complaints that she had made to police a case of her word against his and thus difficult to prove in court.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the conversation was permitted by the intervention order.
2. Whether the recording should have been excluded because it was unlawful pursuant to the Listening and Surveillance Devices Act 1972 (the Act). More specifically, whether the use of the device was in the public interest or for the protection of the former partner's lawful interests under section 7 of the Act.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The Court rejected an argument that the conversation was permitted by the intervention order. The topic of the conversation, (the intervention order itself) was not related to their child which was the only topic that the intervention order allowed them to discuss. See further at [47]-[58].

2. Nicholson J held: the conversation was a private conversation within the meaning of the Act; the former partner intended to use the device to record the conversation and that there was no consent to the conversation being recorded. The Court then considered whether the use of the device was in the public interest or for the protection of the former partner's lawful interests. While his Honour acknowledged that the breach was relatively minor, he noted that breaches of intervention orders are serious. In this case, the former partner had made many allegations of breaches but had encountered problems with proof. The Court accepted that the former partner held genuine concerns for her own safety. Nicholson J then made the following comments at [39]-[40] about how recording private conversations can be in a protected person's 'lawful interests' – '… there is no way of knowing how seriously an intervention order might be breached until the fact of breach takes place. Breaches of intervention orders are capable of constituting serious crimes. Irrespective of whether or not a serious crime is in contemplation, a court should more readily accept that the recording of a "private conversation" has been carried out in pursuit of a person's lawful interest in circumstances where that person has a genuine concern for their own safety. Domestic violence is a very serious problem in our community. It would appear that, at least, the recognition and reporting of domestic abuse, be it physical, psychological, or by threatening behaviour, is on the rise. An intervention order is a very important first step in protecting a person, usually a woman, who has been the subject of domestic abuse. Such an order gains much of its value in this respect according to the extent that it can be enforced. Respondents must be discouraged from infringing any such court order.'

The Court also accepted that the recording was in the public interest for two reasons. Firstly, that there is a public interest in, 'allowing a protected person… the ongoing protection available through the recording and documenting of interactions that result in breaches' (See at [44]). Secondly, that these recordings can assist the defence as well as the prosecution (see at [45]). It would also be possible for a defendant to make similar recordings to disprove a false allegation.

Murray v Police* [2015] SASC 64 (22 April 2015) – South Australia Supreme Court

*Note this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Assault' – 'Assaulting police' – 'Being unlawfully on premises' – 'Contravention of intervention order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Hindering or resisting police' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Prospects of rehabilitation' – 'Unlawful damage' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charge/s: Being unlawfully on premises, unlawful damage, assault (two counts), contravention of intervention order (three counts), hindering or resisting police (three counts), assault police (one count)

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The defendant was in an intermittent relationship with the victim. There were various incidents of verbal and physical violence over several years. This led the victim to apply for an intervention order which prohibited the defendant from approaching, contacting or communicating with the victim or her daughter. However, he returned to live with the victim on various occasions without the intervention order being changed. On the day in question, the defendant and the victim were arguing. The victim attempted to shut him out but he forced the door open, which knocked the victim onto the ground. He attempted to enter the victim's daughter's room multiple times to prevent her from calling the police. The daughter was pushing against it from the inside. He damaged various objects and threw a television across the room. He pushed the victim into a door frame and attempted to light a spray can while pointing it at the victim. He then pushed and attempted to punch two police officers, who had to use capsicum spray to subdue him. A psychiatrist diagnosed the defendant as suffering from an adjustment disorder with depressive features when he committed the offences. A single penalty for all offences of 14 months, 23 days' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 8 months was imposed. The defendant's history included one like offence of violence committed against the same victim. He had had previous long term relationships which did not involve violence. The Magistrate concluded that the defendant had no insight into the offences he committed, and that his prospects of rehabilitation were minimal.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. Blue J found that while the Magistrate was rightly appalled at the nature of the violence, insufficient weight was given to the defendant's prospects of rehabilitation given the fact he had previous relationships that did not involve violence. The Magistrate also erred in not taking into account the lack of prior convictions for violence before his relationship with the victim and the psychiatric illness that he was suffering. He also had the support of a former long-term partner. As such, taking into account his pleas of guilty, he was resentenced to 11 months and 19 days' imprisonment. This was suspended after the defendant served 5 months and five days upon entering into a good behaviour bond for 18 months.

Cook v Galloway* [2015] SASC 36 (6 March 2015) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Costs' – 'Family law' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Systems abuse'

Appeal Type: Appeal against dismissal of an application for the confirmation of an interim intervention order.

Facts: The appellant and the respondent were in a de facto relationship and had separated. While proceedings in the Family Court were on foot, the appellant applied for an interim intervention order that was granted, but not confirmed. The factual basis for the intervention order was a series of incidents following the end of the relationship, where the appellant alleged his former de facto partner had, among other things, sexually assaulted him and punched him (See at [8]-[18]).

Issue/s:

1. Whether the intervention order should have been confirmed.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred finding that the proceedings were brought unreasonably which led to an adverse costs order against the appellant.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of costs but otherwise dismissed.

1. Nicholson J found that the role of a Court in confirming an intervention order involves considering whether it is reasonable to suspect that the defendant, without intervention, will commit an act of abuse, and secondly, that the order is appropriate in the circumstances. His Honour acknowledged that the Magistrate neglected to make several findings of fact, and as such did not wholly follow the approach of Kourakis CJ in Police v Giles [2013] SASC 11 (15 January 2013). However, the Court held that the Magistrate was correct to conclude that there was no reasonable suspicion that abuse would occur in the future. The respondent lived away from the appellant and they rarely saw each other. Furthermore, the relationship was over and there was no longer any aggressive behaviour.
2. The Court held that the appellant's concerns were genuine, and called for determination by a Magistrate. Nicholson J noted that just because the application failed, this did not mean that the proceedings were brought unreasonably. The Court cited previous authority and noted the public policy concerns of making adverse costs orders against applicants in intervention order applications, as they may deter people from bringing worthy applications.

Stone v Police* [2015] SASC 28 (3 March 2015) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Contravention of intervention order' – 'Evidence' – 'Evidence of discreditable conduct'

Charge/s: Contravention of intervention order (two counts).

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The protected persons in the order were the appellant's neighbours, with whom the appellant had been in conflict for an extended period. There was a considerable amount of evidence admitted at trial regarding the history of the appellant's behaviour towards the complainants.

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate erred by admitting evidence of the appellant's prior discreditable conduct.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The Court found that the Magistrate did not give an adequate explanation of the purpose of the evidence of the appellant's prior behaviour towards the complainants. Furthermore, the Magistrate made no reference to s 34P of the Evidence Act 1929 which sets out rules regarding this type of evidence. The Court found that the evidence was 'highly prejudicial' to the appellant because it was similar to the offences which were the subject matter of the trial, and indicates that the accused has a propensity to commit offences of a similar nature. If it was to be used in that way, the Magistrate had to be satisfied that its probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect on the accused. Furthermore, no notice was given by the prosecution of their intention to adduce such evidence, and no direction was made by the Magistrate as to its use.

Fenton v Police* [2014] SASC 167 (7 November 2014) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault' – 'Alcohol' – 'Evidence of distress' – 'Expert testimony' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Uncooperative witness'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault – (Circumstance of aggravation: that the defendant committed the offence knowing the victim was his domestic partner.)

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The defendant assaulted the victim by pushing her onto the floor with his knees in her back, twisting her arms and forcing her face into the floor. At trial, the defendant claimed he was acting in self-defence. Both the defendant and the victim were severely intoxicated.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the Magistrate erred by not taking into account inconsistencies in the victim's evidence.
2. Whether the Magistrate should have left certain matters for expert evidence.
3. Whether the Magistrate erred by relying on evidence of the victim's distress as observed by police.

Decision and Reasoning: Blue J dismissed all grounds of appeal.

1. In relation to the inconsistencies in the victim's account, his Honour at [22] stated that the Magistrate in fact did consider this in relation to the victim's credibility as a witness, but it did not have a substantial impact on the case. The second ground of appeal, which was that the victim gave new information in cross-examination that she had not previously given in her witness statements was dismissed for similar reasons (See [26]). The third ground of appeal was that the Magistrate failed to have regard to the victim's 'guarded and defensive' answers during cross-examination. This was rejected – the Magistrate had the benefit of seeing the victim give evidence. It was open to him to make a favourable assessment of her credibility.
2. Blue J acknowledged that had the Magistrate gone further in making conclusions regarding the consistency of bruises to the victim's back with the victim's account and the potential effect of alcohol on self-control, this may have transgressed into the realms of expert evidence. However, the Magistrate only made limited use of his own common sense and experience when making conclusions with respect to the bruises on the victim's back and the potential impact of alcohol. It is common knowledge that - alcohol can reduce inhibitions which can lead to a loss of self-control and if a person is disposed to be aggressive, alcohol can lead a person to act aggressively. The Magistrate was entitled to make limited use of these observations without needing expert evidence.
3. On the defendant's version of events, the victim's distress was caused by embarrassment about, among other things, her own conduct of striking and slapping the defendant. Blue J held that it was not self-evident that a person in the victim's position would have exhibited distress as a result of embarrassment as submitted by the defendant. The Magistrate was not obliged to expressly reject this possibility. He used the evidence of distress legitimately.

Police v Siaosi* [2014] SASC 131 (5 September 2014) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Certainty of terms' – 'Conditions of orders' – 'Contravention of intervention order' – 'Impact of breach on offender' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Validity of terms in intervention order'

Charge/s: Contravention of intervention order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: An intervention order was made in favour of the appellant's former wife. The fifth term of the order prohibited the appellant from entering or remaining 'in the vicinity' of the property at which his former wife lived. The appellant formed a friendship with another woman who, by coincidence, lived quite close to his former wife's home. After visiting this property, the appellant realised that there was a direct line of sight between the backyard of his friend's property and his former wife's property. There was no direct route of access between the houses, and they were not addresses on the same street. The distance between the two houses was measured to be 26 metres. He was convicted of breaching the fifth term of the order.

Issue/s: Whether the fifth term which prohibited the appellant from being 'in the vicinity of' specified premises was void for uncertainty and whether it was a valid exercise of power under s 12(1) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (the Act).

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The term was void for uncertainty and not a valid exercise of power under the Act. Peek J held that mandatory terms in intervention orders must be 'clearly and specifically authorised by the words of s 12(1)' (See at [18]). The terms of intervention orders can leave the affected person in no doubt as to the meaning and extent of the order. His Honour noted that the term 'vicinity' is inherently imprecise, which is in contrast to s 12(1) of the Act which requires that orders be specific and certain. Police do not have powers to insert 'broad and vague terms' (See at [28]) which gives them a right to use their individual opinions to determine in a particular case whether a contravention of the term has occurred.

Callow v Police* [2014] SASC 8 (24 January 2014) – South Australia Supreme Court

*Note this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Aggravated assault' – 'Contravention of bail agreement' – 'Contravention of intervention order' – 'Criminal history' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Offender character references' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault (2 counts) – Circumstance of aggravation: that the applicant committed the offence knowing the victim was his wife, aggravated assault causing harm, driving while disqualified, contravention of bail agreement (5 counts), contravention of intervention order (5 counts), property damage.

Appeal Type: Application for extension of time to appeal against sentence.

Facts: See at [4] for a detailed factual summary of each offence. The assault offences involved the appellant kicking his wife while she was in bed and on a separate occasion punching her when she was on the couch recoiling from the applicant. The contravention of the intervention order counts all involved the applicant leaving voicemail messages for his wife. The applicant was sentenced to a single term of 1 month imprisonment for all offences. The remaining eight months were suspended with a good behaviour bond.

Issue/s: Whether the whole sentence should have been suspended.

Decision and Reasoning: The application was dismissed. The applicant submitted that the Magistrate should have suspended the whole sentence based on the mitigating factors which led the Magistrate to suspend most of it. The Magistrate placed large weight on the mitigating factors, including that the applicant runs a successful business which he uses to help pay child support, as well as favourable character references. In fact, the Court described the sentence as 'merciful' given that the offending was repetitive, protracted and serious, and included 'contumacious disregard' of court orders (See at [10]). The Court also upheld previous authority that deterrence is an important factor in sentencing where there is a history of domestic violence, particularly breaches of intervention orders.

F, S v Police* [2013] SASC 164 (1 November 2013) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Standard of proof'

Appeal Type: Appeal against confirmation of intervention order.

Facts: The Magistrate confirmed an intervention order made in favour of the appellant's ex-wife. Some of the alleged incidents of domestic violence included the appellant holding a screwdriver to his ex-wife's throat, swearing and throwing clothes and shoes around in arguments. The Magistrate made findings of fact in relation to each alleged incident. On that basis he found a reasonable suspicion that the appellant would, without intervention, commit an act of abuse against his ex-wife and that such an act would cause distress, anxiety or fear which was not trivial.

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate made proper findings of fact. Whether the Magistrate should have applied the higher standard of proof of 'beyond reasonable doubt', rather than the 'balance of probabilities'.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Magistrate set out the evidence very carefully, and in fact found that most of the alleged incidents were not sufficiently proven. The Court also found that the balance of probabilities is the correct standard, because the consequences of the imposition of an intervention order are 'not so grave as to warrant such a heavier onus' (at [18]). Finally, the Magistrate did not err by finding that the proven facts could amount to distress, anxiety or fear which is not trivial, because these considerations are somewhat subjective so the trier of fact has a distinct advantage.

Mullins v Police* [2013] SASC 148 (20 September 2013) – South Australia Supreme Court

*Note this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Aggravated assault' – 'Aggravating factor' – 'Breach of bail' – 'Contravention of intervention order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Double jeopardy and other charges' – 'Double jeopardy in sentencing' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Resisting police' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victim'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault (three counts), Contravention of intervention order (three counts), breach of bail (two counts), resisting police, damaging property.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant pleaded guilty to all 10 offences which were on four Magistrates' Court files. All of the offences were committed either against or in the presence of the appellant's partner (the mother of his child) in the context of arguments. The contravention of the intervention order arose from conduct that would have made his partner feel threatened, as opposed to a positive intention to make her feel threatened or any physical contact. A single sentence was imposed for each file and the four sentences were made cumulative. None of the sentences were suspended.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the Magistrate erred in ordering a sentence of imprisonment for the resist police charge.
2. Whether the sentence imposed on the appellant contravened the rule against double punishment.
3. How the appellant should be re-sentenced.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

1. One sentence of three months' imprisonment was imposed for the resist police and the first aggravated assault charge. The Magistrate made no reference to the facts of the resist police charge, which was in fact not particularly serious and only involved 'childish and idiotic' behaviour (see at [15]) and nothing more. Even though the aggravated assault charge required a sentence of imprisonment, this did not mean that the resist police charge also required a sentence of imprisonment. A similar conclusion was reached in relation to the second Magistrates' Court file, where the appellant was sentenced to one term of one month imprisonment for the breach of bail and contravention of intervention order offence. He should not have been punished for the breach of bail offence because he believed he was not in breach of bail, which was acknowledged by the Magistrate.

2. The facts that formed the basis of the contravention offence in the fourth file were the same facts that formed the basis of the aggravated assault charge. The facts that formed the basis of the second contravention offence relied on the same facts as the property damage charge. Therefore, Peek J found that there was both 'double charging' and 'double punishment'. Convictions were recorded for four offences when they only should have been recorded for two and a penalty imposed for four offences when it only should have been imposed for two. It may have been possible to charge alternative offences, but once pleas of guilty were taken the other count should have been dismissed. Peek J did acknowledge the problem that where a breach is particularly serious, the maximum penalty for a contravention offence is two years, while the maximum penalty for offences such as aggravated assault is higher. In that case, his Honour stated that the best option would be to lay the more serious charge with the contravention offence laid as an alternative charge, to be withdrawn upon a guilty plea to the more serious charge. Furthermore, the fact that the offender knew that the assault was also a contravention of an intervention order would be an aggravating factor in sentencing the more serious charge.

3. In resentencing, his Honour took into account the appellant's youth, minimal criminal history and good rehabilitation prospects. He also took into account the victim impact statement, in which the complainant stated she wished to maintain a relationship with the appellant and stated that she is 'not a victim'. His Honour described this as a 'mature and balanced view of the relationship'. However, relevant also was the need to protect domestic partners, the repeated nature of the offending and the need to ensure intervention orders are obeyed. The appellant was re-sentenced to 50 weeks' imprisonment, fully suspended.

'Adjournment' – 'Consent to confirmation of intervention order' – 'Interlocutory orders'

Appeal Type: Appeal against the order of a Magistrate.

Facts: With the appellant's consent, a Magistrate confirmed an interim intervention order which had been put in place against him in favour of his domestic partner pursuant to s 23(3) of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009. At the time of the hearing, the appellant was in custody and appeared unrepresented in the Magistrates' Court. On the day of the hearing, he did not have documentation relating to his case including an affidavit sworn by the applicant, and his responses to this affidavit. This was because he had attempted to have the documents brought to him in prison by a friend but permission was refused. The prosecution had not provided him with the affidavit. The Magistrate granted an adjournment until the afternoon, but refused to grant a longer adjournment.

Issue/s: Whether the appellant's consent to the intervention order was freely given and whether he could withdraw his consent and have the order set aside.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. Before deciding the main issue, the Court confirmed as a matter of procedure that the Magistrate's confirmation order was interlocutory in nature as it was capable of variation or revocation. As such, permission to appeal was required (See at [29]- [32]). The Court then found (at [40]) that had the longer adjournment been granted, no prejudice to the protected person would have occurred because the interim intervention order would have remained in place. Sulan J drew an analogy between consent under s 23(3) and admissions made in civil proceedings. As such, the corresponding principles that govern whether such admissions can be withdrawn became relevant. The Court found that the appellant's consent was given in circumstances, 'in which he considered that he had no satisfactory alternative but to agree', because of all the circumstances outlined above, the fact that he was partially unrepresented, as well as the fact that he was not aware that he could have applied for a further adjournment. As such, his consent was not freely given.

T, R v L, KC* [2013] SASC 51 (15 April 2013) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Family law proceedings' – 'Intersection of legal systems' – 'Jurisdiction of family court of australia' – 'Jurisdiction of state courts' – 'Protection order' – 'Self-represented litigants'

Appeal type: Appeal against Magistrate's decision to dismiss application for intervention order.

Facts: The appellant and respondent were separated and had two children. Orders were made in the Federal Magistrates Court in relation to custody, access and protection of their children ([4]). The orders provided that the children live with the appellant, that the respondent have limited access to the children, and preventing the respondent from bringing the children into contact with certain people ([5]-[6]).

The appellant sought an intervention order in the Magistrates Court restraining the respondent from contacting the children ([11]).

Issues: Whether the Magistrate erred in holding that the Family Court was the proper forum for the appellant to pursue the relief he seeks.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Family Court had jurisdiction over the proceedings and could amend the parenting orders if it considered appropriate ([18]-[19]). An intervention order made by the Magistrates Court would be invalid to the extent of inconsistency with the Family Law Act ([16]).

Police v Giles* [2013] SASC 11 (15 January 2013) – South Australia Supreme Court

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Evidence of prior abuse' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Reasonable suspicion'

Appeal Type: Police appeal against a Magistrate's refusal to confirm an interim intervention order.

Facts: The Magistrate refused to confirm an interim intervention order which had previously been made ex parte against the respondent in favour of his former de facto partner. At trial, there were disputed facts regarding various prior incidents of physical and verbal abuse. The Magistrate made no findings of fact about these incidents.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the Magistrate's failure to make findings of fact about these incidents amounted to an error of law.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred in finding that there was no reasonable suspicion that the respondent 'would if unrestrained commit an act of abuse which was to result in more than trivial emotional harm' (See at [4]). This appeal therefore concerned the meaning of 'trivial' distress, anxiety or fear and the degree of suspicion which is required.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

1. The Magistrate's failure to make factual findings amounted to an error of law because: they were important to determining the nature of the relationship; they affected the degree of anxiety that the respondent's former de facto partner may have felt about potential further acts of abuse and they were probative of further allegations made by his former de facto partner. Kourakis CJ noted at [29] that while proof of past acts of abuse is not a precondition to the making of an intervention order, the Act 'appears to contemplate that the court will make findings of fact about past events and provides that it is to make those findings on the balance of probabilities'. As such, a reasonable suspicion (under s 6) that an act of abuse will be committed must be based on findings of fact made on the balance of probabilities.

2. The Court found the Magistrate erred in finding that there was no reasonable suspicion in the circumstances. There is no requirement that the facts found by the Magistrate themselves constitute an act of abuse, that they be recent or that they occur before or after a relationship breakdown. An order could be made based on a statement of intention to commit an act of abuse, no matter who that statement was made to. While the timing of the acts is relevant, Kourakis CJ stated that depending on the circumstances, an event many years earlier could constitute a reasonable suspicion (See at [30]-[31]). A reasonable suspicion will include a suspicion that the 'defendant will act in a certain way' and a suspicion that those acts would have the prescribed effect on the protected person of something more than a trivial kind (See at [32]). In this case, the respondent's former de facto partner had anxiety that the respondent may kill her. This was not trivial and the Magistrate had erred in finding it was.

   Kourakis CJ then made several factual findings including that the appellant used a knife and verbally abused his former de facto partner and therefore found that the prescribed reasonable suspicion under the Act existed. His Honour then found that it would be appropriate in the circumstances to make the order.

'Alcohol' – 'Breach of restraining order' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threatening to cause harm' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charge/s: Breach of domestic violence restraining order, threatening to cause harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: In 1999, a domestic violence restraining order was made against the appellant in favour of his wife. In 2010, he called his wife, verbally abused her and threatened her partner. This conduct amounted to a breach of the order which prohibited him from contacting her in any way. His criminal history was relevant and included offences of violence against his wife and daughter, as well as many prior breaches of the restraining order. He had an alcohol problem. At the time of the offending, he had ceased taking anti-depressant medication and had increased his alcohol consumption. He was sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the Magistrate erred in imposing a sentence of imprisonment.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred in not partially suspending the sentence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed in respect of the partial suspension.

1. The appellant submitted, inter alia that as over 7 years had elapsed since the last breach of the order, the current offence should be seen as an isolated lapse and that the latest breach was relatively minor. This submission was rejected. Given the applicant's history of seven previous convictions for breach of the order, leniency was not warranted. White J then discussed the nature of breaches of restraining orders and noted that their purpose is to protect vulnerable family members. His Honour at [31] then drew an analogy between breaches of domestic violence restraining orders and driving while disqualified, in that, 'both involve some defiance of a court order; both negate the protection of the community which they were intended to achieve; and considerations of general and personal deterrence are important in each case.' Generally, the most appropriate penalty for driving while disqualified is imprisonment. His Honour (again at [31]) then drew some distinctions between the nature of the two offences. His Honour then concluded, notwithstanding the differences between the two types of offences, 'I consider that, having regard to the important role of domestic violence restraining orders and of the necessity of courts promoting respect for their own orders, a sentence of imprisonment may be appropriate in those cases, like the present, in which the order has been repeatedly breached and the offender has not taken advantage of the lenience previously extended to him. In cases of contumacious breaches of order, considerations of both general and personal deterrence are especially important' (see at [32]).
2. The Court agreed with the appellant's submission that the sentence should have been partially suspended. The appellant had complied with the order for a long period since 2003 and the latest offence did appear to be isolated. Furthermore, it was at the lower end of the scale of seriousness for offences of that type. The offence was also explained by the fact that the appellant was coming off anti-depressants' and was intoxicated (see further at [41]-[45]).

'Breach of bail' – 'Common assault' – 'Guilty plea' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnant women' – 'Programs for perpetrators' – 'Sentencing' – 'Trespass'

Charge/s: Common assault, trespass, breach of bail.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The defendant had been in a relationship with the victim for nine months. The victim was 8 weeks' pregnant at the time of the offending. The defendant was the father and aware of the pregnancy. While the defendant and the victim were having a conversation, the defendant became aggressive, at which point the defendant punched her in the left side of the head which caused her to fall to the ground. He then kicked her in the head while she lay on the ground, which caused her to pass out. While she suffered no permanent injury, she experienced extreme pain. After being arrested and placed on bail, the defendant breached this bail by trespassing because he wanted to see if his partner was with another man. He again breached bail by having a conversation with his partner. He pleaded guilty and was placed on an 18 month supervised good behaviour bond, which included conditions that he obey the directions of a Correctional Services Officer, particularly in relation to attending programs for mental health, anger management and domestic violence. The Magistrate stated that a term of imprisonment would have been appropriate but for the guilty plea.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. Gray J held that the Magistrate erred by not paying sufficient regard to the fact that this was an act of domestic violence against a young pregnant woman, which was not justified by the fact that the defendant was angry. While the defendant was not charged with an aggravated assault based on a domestic relationship, this remained a relevant factor. The mere fact that the defendant pleaded guilty should not have resulted in a term of imprisonment not being imposed. Indeed, other factors, such as the fact that it was an offence of domestic violence required consideration. His Honour's starting point for common assault was 6 months' imprisonment, which was reduced to 4 months' because of the guilty plea and remorse. His Honour then had regard to the lack of criminal history and evident remorse and suspended the sentence, upon the defendant entering into a three-year good behaviour bond to be supervised for 18 months. Conditions that he attend anger management, drug and alcohol abuse and domestic violence programs were included. The convictions for the other offences were confirmed but no further penalty was imposed.

'Aggravated assault' – 'Breach of bail' – 'Contravention of restraining order' – 'Evidence of prior abuse' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault (aggravating factor – that the offence was committed against the appellant's domestic partner), contravention of restraining order (two counts), breach of bail.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant's domestic partner believed the appellant was having an affair. She obtained documents from his computer. In attempting to get the documents back, the appellant pushed her backwards into a chair after grabbing her. The appellant prevented her from getting help by cutting the power to her telephone. She was fearful of the appellant. This conduct constituted the breach of the restraining order as well as the assault. After being arrested and released on bail with conditions that he not contact the victim, the appellant contacted the victim daily through the internet as well as by appearing at locations the victim drove to and sending her flowers. This conduct was in breach of bail and the restraining order. The offences were committed in the context of a background of domestic violence. The total effective sentence imposed was nine months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. While the victim suffered no physical injury, she was isolated, in considerable fear and subjected to physical force while the applicant prevented her from obtaining assistance. The fact that this incident was not unique was also relevant - the physical assaults she had suffered from the appellant in the past were an important consideration. See in particular the following comments by Duggan J at [16] – 'Personal and general deterrence play an important role in offences involving domestic violence. This is particularly so in the case of a repeat offender. Furthermore, Parliament has acknowledged the importance of deterrence in such cases by declaring that an offence of violence against a domestic partner is an aggravated offence attracting an increase in the maximum penalty over and above that applicable in the case of an offence of common assault. The fact that the assault constituted a breach of a restraining order made by the Court is a further factor to take into account in considering the single sentence imposed in respect of the assault and breach of restraining order.'

'Aggravated assault' – 'Domestic discipline' – 'Offences against children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Programs for perpetrators' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Aggravated Assault (aggravating factor – that the offence was committed knowing the victim of the offence was their child)

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant plead guilty and was convicted for the aggravated assault of his son. The appellant inflicted a substantial blow on the child, which left bruising and finger marks on his leg. However, he did not require any hospital treatment. It occurred in the context of the appellant attempting to discipline his son. The appellant's criminal history included a prior conviction for an assault in a domestic setting. He was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, fully suspended upon entering into a good behaviour bond for two years with conditions that he be under the supervision of a Community Corrections Officer and that he undertake counselling for drug issues, anger management and domestic violence issues.

Issue/s: One issue concerned whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld and the sentence was reduced to three months' imprisonment, fully suspended with the same bond conditions as fixed by the Magistrate. While acknowledging the appellant's criminal history, Nyland J found that this was an isolated incident in the context of the appellant attempting to discipline his son, and was not intended to cause any injury. As such, while the sentence was excessive, the Court agreed with the Magistrate that a sentence of imprisonment was appropriate – 'the court must make it clear, not only to the appellant but to others who might be like-minded, that violence of any kind to a child will not be tolerated' (see at [28]).

'Aggravated serious harm with intent' – 'Aggravating factor' – 'Bail' – 'Deterrence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'History of abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Aggravated serious harm with intent, aggravated assault causing harm, aggravated harm with intent. (Aggravating factors – that the appellant knew the victim was his de facto spouse).

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was on bail for an unrelated charge at the time of the offending. The first incident arose when the complainant went to collect the appellant (her de facto partner) due to the appellant's curfew as a condition of his bail. The appellant reacted angrily to this, which led to the assault. She was admitted to hospital for four days. The complainant's injuries were extremely serious with lasting effects including permanent facial and dental damage, ongoing amnesia, psychological issues and disfigurement. The appellant was arrested and eventually released on bail with conditions that he not approach or communicate with the complainant in any way. In breach of this bail, the appellant seriously assaulted the complainant again by punching her in the face, choking her, pulling her by the hair and throwing her into a mirror. The complainant again sustained serious injuries and required hospital treatment. There was a long history of domestic violence in the relationship, and one of the past incidents involved an assault by the appellant. The complainant called police but was unable to explain what occurred. When police returned the call, the appellant held a gun to the complainant's head. She told the police all was OK and hung up. At the time of the offending, the appellant was 27 and the complainant was 17. They had been in a relationship for some years and the police had been contacted about domestic violence three times in the 12 months prior. The appellant had relevant criminal history apart from the history of domestic violence. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 7 years and 8 months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Gray J (with whom Sulan J and White J agreed) discussed the causes of domestic violence and the preferred response of the courts. See at [27]- [28] -

'The causes of domestic violence are multiple. It has been recognised that relevant contributing factors include immaturity, mental illness, abnormal personality disorders, inhibition through drug abuse, poor anger management and lack of counselling and support. Courts have identified all of the above as common causative factors in modern times. Although imposing longer and longer terms of imprisonment does remove perpetrators from the community, domestic violence continues and its incidence increases. The imposing of sentences of imprisonment is a blunt instrument that does not adequately address the underlying causes of domestic violence in any real way.

The courts have long recognised that personal and general deterrence have a heightened significance when sentencing for the crimes of domestic violence. As King CJ observed in R v Banens (Unreported, Supreme Court of South Australia, King CJ, Legoe and Von Doussa JJ, 18 November 1987) at 7-8:

"The sentence which is imposed by the court for a crime of domestic violence is aimed, in large part, at deterring other people who may be involved in like situations. I think that, in a serious case of domestic violence, it is necessary for this Court to make clear, by actual intervention, to the public that the sentences imposed for this type of crime are calculated to provide effective deterrence to those who might be tempted to commit similar crimes. Not only must the penalties imposed operate, as far as such penalties can, as an effective deterrent, but it must be made clear to the public that the courts are imposing sentences having that effect. It is a question not only of actual deterrence but assurance to the public that deterrent penalties are being imposed."'

His Honour went onto comment on the vulnerability of victims at [29] – 'Domestic violence is predominantly directed by men toward women. The community expects the law to protect women, to protect the weak from the strong, and to protect the vulnerable from the oppressor. These are factors that have led the courts to treat crimes involving domestic violence as grave crimes. Parliament has enacted laws designed to provide protection to those subjected to domestic violence. Parliament has recognised that crimes involving violence and assault may be aggravated by a domestic situation.'

This was particularly relevant on these facts as the victim/complainant was only 17. She had made multiple complaints to police but had received little protection, other than the no contact and no alcohol conditions of the appellant's bail. The Court did not make use of the wide powers under s 11 of the Bail Act 1985. While the bail agreement indicated there was to be supervision by a Community Corrections Officer, there is no evidence that this occurred. Also, the appellant was not required to undertake counselling to address his violence, alcohol abuse and anger issues. As such, in this case, the no contact condition provided little protection and the complainant was left vulnerable and in danger. The Court concluded that the sentencing judge was correct to take a serious view of the appellant's conduct. Over the preceding 12 months, the appellant had 'bullied, victimised and brutalised his younger partner' (See at [41]) and had continued this conduct notwithstanding the fact that the complainant sought protection from police and the bail conditions. Personal deterrence was important as the appellant had not been deterred by earlier warnings. General deterrence was also particularly important. See finally at [42] where Gray J referred to the fact that Parliament has made an assault in a de facto relationship an aggravating factor, which draws attention to the seriousness of this conduct. The Courts should pay due attention to this factor in sentencing.

'Antecedents' – 'Character' – 'Common assault' – 'Deterrence' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Rehabilitation' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threatening life'

Charge/s: Common assault (two counts), threatening life.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The victim was the appellant's wife. There was a long history of physical and psychological abuse in the relationship. The assaults involved the appellant slapping and spitting on his wife. The threatening life offence involved the appellant holding a knife to his wife's throat. He was sentenced to two years and five months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of twelve months.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive. In particular, whether the sentence should have been suspended.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld and the appellant was re-sentenced to two years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 9 months. The appellant submitted that the sentencing judge erred in not sufficiently taking into account the time he spent in custody and in home detention and his prospects of rehabilitation. The respondent submitted that there was no error in the sentencing judge's approach, and that the charges had to be considered against the background of domestic violence that occurred over the period of a 17 year marriage. The respondent argued that this made general deterrence of paramount importance. Anderson J (Doyle CJ and Bleby J agreeing), agreed at [31] that general deterrence is a very important consideration in sentencing where there has been a history of domestic violence in the relationship. This was applied at [38], where Anderson J held that the history of domestic violence in the relationship and the importance of general deterrence could not justify suspending the sentence. However, the sentencing judge erred in assessing the appellant's prospects of rehabilitation as moderate. This was contradictory to the information that was before him, which included a lack of prior convictions and the fact the appellant no longer had a problem with alcohol abuse. The sentencing judge also erred by not specifying the extent to which he took the period of home detention into account.

*Note this case was decided under now superseded legislation however the case contains relevant statements of principle.

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Unlawful and malicious wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm'

Charge/s: Unlawful and malicious wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm.

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent, an Aboriginal man, was intoxicated and engaged in an argument with his de facto wife. He lost his temper and struck her on the head with the blade of a shovel which caused very serious injuries. He then threatened to break her legs, struck her on the knees with the shovel handle and struck her on the arm, which was already broken and in plaster. He had a relevant criminal history including offences of violence. He was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 10 months.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. Mitigating factors included the fact that the offence was committed on the spur of the moment while he was intoxicated and he was immediately remorseful (see at [9]). However, Doyle CJ (with whom Prior J and Vanstone J agreed) described the attack as 'brutal' and 'cowardly' (see at [10]). Doyle CJ then made the following comments at [12] –

'The court has said consistently that it must do what it can to protect women from violence by men. This applies just as much to violence within a domestic relationship as it does to violence in other situations. In cases like this the community expects, and protection of women requires, that the court should impose a sentence that is likely to deter the individual offender and to deter other potential offenders. The fact that the violence occurs on the spur of the moment is a relevant factor, but this is often true in the case of domestic violence. The impulsive nature of such offences is often offset by the fact that, as here, there is a pattern of violence within the particular relationship, or on the part of the particular offender. Mr Lennon's record makes it clear that he has not yet learned that violence towards women cannot be accepted.'

As such, while there was no error in the primary judge's reasoning, the sentence was too low. It was not justified by the mitigating factors in the context of the objective seriousness of the crime and the respondent's criminal history. The respondent's Aboriginality was acknowledged but no significance of that factor was identified. The Court held that the head sentence should have been twice what was imposed. There was a need for the Court to re-sentence because the original punishment was, 'so inadequate as to shake confidence in the administration of justice' (see at [18]). The appellant was then re-sentenced to four years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 20 months. While Doyle CJ was of the view that a longer non-parole period was warranted, this was not appropriate because the original non-parole date fixed by the trial judge was to expire within two weeks of the decision being handed down. To increase the non-parole period so close to this date would have been particularly harsh on the respondent.

'Aggravating factor' – 'Assault occasioning bodily actual harm' – 'Contravention of restraining order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threatening life'

Charge/s: Damaging property (two counts), contravention of restraining order (two counts), threatening life, assault occasioning actual bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant pleaded guilty in the District Court to all of the above charges. The victim was the appellant's estranged wife. Prior to the offences, there was domestic and family violence that led to the restraining order being obtained. The property damage offences involved the appellant damaging his wife's car. The threatening life and assault offences involved the appellant attending a house at which his wife was staying and producing a knife. He was allowed to enter the house after he handed over the knife and stated that he would not harm his wife. He then entered the house, grabbed his wife in a headlock and punched her in the face multiple times while threatening to kill her. She suffered a broken nose and black eye. The appellant's criminal history included various drug and assault offences. A psychiatrist concluded that the appellant had developed a depressive disorder associated with the deterioration of his relationship, which had caused him to act aggressively and violently towards his wife and children over some years. His condition had not stabilised. He was sentenced to three years and two months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The appellant submitted that the primary judge did not adequately consider the appellant's rehabilitation and had given undue weight to his criminal history and the comments of the psychiatrist. He submitted that the sentence should have been suspended. However, the appeal was not upheld for these reasons. Rather, the original sentence was set aside due to an error with calculating the maximum penalties for the property damage offences. In re-sentencing, Nyland J (with whom Gray J and Debelle J agreed) concluded that while the two property damage offences might not appear particularly serious, they should be treated as part of an escalating course of conduct which culminated in the assault, which caused serious injury and would have been a terrifying experience. Her Honour also noted that the fact the conduct was committed in breach of a domestic violence order was an aggravating factor. General deterrence was significant to 'bring home to others who might be like-minded that the courts will not tolerate this type of behaviour' (See at [21]).' He was re-sentenced to two years and nine months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of nine months. The reduced length of the sentence gave credit for the appellant's guilty plea and time already served in custody and on home detention bail. The non-parole period was reduced to take account of the positive reports from the psychiatrist about the appellant's rehabilitation, such that he was no longer a threat to his wife and personal deterrence was no longer necessary.

R v McMutrie* [2002] SASC 253 (8 August 2002) – South Australia Supreme Court

principle.

‘Aggravating factor’ – ‘Attempted murder’ – ‘Breach of restraining order’ – ‘Deterrence’ – ‘Double jeopardy and other charges’ – ‘People with mental illness’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Possession of a knife with intent to kill or to cause grievous bodily harm’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Unlawful wounding’

Charge/s: Attempted murder, wounding with intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm, unlawful wounding, breach of restraining order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant’s relationship with his former de facto partner had recently ended. The appellant approached her at a club because he wanted her to come outside to witness him attempt to cut his own throat. As he attempted to force her to leave, a struggle ensued and she was wounded by his knife. They had been in a relationship for 20 years. The appellant had a history of domestic violence, mental health issues and various other illnesses. His criminal history involved alcohol and drug related offending and prior breaches of restraining orders. He was acquitted of attempted murder and wounding with intent but convicted of unlawful wounding and possessing a knife with intent. The trial judge indicated that the possession of the knife and unlawful wounding offences arose out of the same events. He pleaded guilty to breaching the restraining order. He was sentenced for all three offences to three years’ imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the appellant was convicted twice for the same offending conduct, as the same facts were relied upon for the possess knife with intent charge and the unlawful wounding charge, such that the rule against double jeopardy was infringed.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal against conviction was upheld and the appeal against sentence was dismissed.

1. The Crown conceded that there was a risk of a miscarriage of justice and acknowledged that the jury may have relied on the same factual circumstances for both convictions. As such, the appellant would have been entitled to the defence of ‘autrefois acquit’. The conviction for the possess knife offence was therefore set aside.

2. In upholding the original sentence, Gray J (with whom Perry J and Williams J agreed) noted the lasting impacts of the history of domestic violence on the victim and their children. The Court held that an immediate custodial sentence was needed. See in particular these remarks at [15]-[18] –

'Domestic violence is not just physical abuse but includes a range of violent and abusive behaviours perpetrated by one person against another. A high percentage of victims are women and children. Domestic violence has existed for centuries. However over the last 30 years its prevalence has been increasingly recognised. This has caused considerable community and governmental concern. More recently legislation has evolved in an effort to protect the vulnerable…The law seeks to protect the innocent and vulnerable. The legislative scheme is directed towards providing protection. This protection is primarily provided through the mechanism of restraining orders (Now known as intervention orders). Restraining orders are the principal legal response to domestic violence. They are can be (sic) obtained expeditiously from a magistrate's court. The standard of proof is on the balance of probabilities. Orders can be tailored to the particular conduct of the abuser and breaches are a criminal offence. In this case the victim had obtained a restraining order. She had done all she could to protect herself. The breach of that order is a matter of particular gravity. The use of the knife to engender fear and wound was an aggravating feature to the appellant's crime. The gravity of his conduct called for the imposition of an immediate custodial sentence'

See furtherat [23] – 'A restraining order had been obtained to prevent the very conduct the subject of the wounding conviction. The need for personal deterrence is a significant factor in this case. The appellant needs to understand that court orders must be obeyed and that non compliance in circumstances of domestic violence will be viewed very seriously. General deterrence is also an important consideration in sentencing.'

District Court

R v TM [2023] SADC 55 (12 May 2023) – South Australian District Court

'Evidence issues' – 'Judge-alone trial' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnancy' – 'Pregnant people' – 'Rape' – 'Response to rape' – 'Sexual abuse' – 'Uncharged acts'

Charges: 6 x rape.

Proceedings: Judge alone trial.

Facts: The accused man and complainant woman were in a relationship for about 14 years. The six specific rapes subject of the charges arose over a 13-year period of their relationship, against a backdrop of violence and non-consensual intercourse.

The complainant alleged that the accused had raped her on multiple occasions, including while pregnant. The complainant alleged the accused was violent and aggressive towards her, verbally abusing her and pushing her around. The complainant gave evidence that their relationship went through periods where it improved – such as following their marriage - and that throughout the relationship they had both consensual and non-consensual sexual intercourse.

Reasoning and decision: Guilty on all counts.

Barklay J had regard to the forensic disadvantage for the accused involved with the age of the offending which applied only to the accused.

The credibility and reliability of the complainant were central to the case, and there was strong focus on the inconsistencies in her account of the six specific offences. Overall, Barklay J found that the complainant was persuasive and credible, providing a detailed account about events that had occurred years prior. While acknowledging that she was uncertain as to some details, this was not found to undermine her reliability as to the essential elements of the rape [102]. Barklay J particularly found her preparedness to give evidence that despite the rape she had consensual intercourse with him, that she had begun to accept the rape and that she didn't leave because she loved him, was hopeful and wanted to stay together for her family were hallmarks of a truthful and honest account, and that this evidence reinforced his perception of her honesty and truthfulness [100], [103].

Barklay J then turned to consider each charge separately. He emphasised that the other charged acts were only used to provide context to the alleged offences [105] and that the uncharged acts of continual violence and rape were only relevant to inform why and how the offending continued, why the complainant didn't report the acts and why the accused was able to act without concern that she would complain [106]. While there were inconsistencies, he found her detailed accounts compelling, and the discrepancies largely related to minor details that did not cause doubt as to the overall evidence.

Specifically, the defence's contention that the complainant would have left after the first rape were the allegations true was not accepted given the unpredictability of people's responses to rape and the complex emotions involved:

> [112] It was submitted by defence counsel that following the first incident of rape, if it had occurred, she would have left TM. I reject that submission. It is difficult to predict how a person will (or will not) respond to being raped. I do not think that it necessarily follows that she would have left the relationship. There is a combination of emotions that may follow a rape such that how a person reacts may not be predictable – including in this case shock, embarrassment and perhaps disbelief.

Similarly, the fact that one of the charges was not included in the initial police statement was not found to undermine her evidence of this rape, as Barklay J accepted that in taking the lengthy statement and collating a significant amount of information about the ongoing rape in the relationship (5 hour interview), it was possible that the one occasion may not have ended up in the statement or she may have thought she mentioned it and did not [123].

R v Fraser* [2020] SADC 127 (2 September 2020) – South Australian District Court

'Actus reus' – 'Mens rea' – 'Recklessness' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Choking, suffocating or strangling a person in a domestic setting x 1.

Proceedings: Application for ruling whether mens rea is an element of the offence.

Decision and reasoning: Mens rea is an element of the offence.

There is no Supreme Court authority that has considered the elements of this offence, and, in particular, whether mens rea is an element of the offence. The judge in this case agreed with the reasoning of the QCA in R v HBZ (2020) with respect to actus reas:

[17] In my view, the actus reus of choking, suffocating or strangling is the stopping, or significantly hindering or restricting of the complainant's breathing, whether by application of force or by other means.

[20] Even where the actus reus does not involve the application of pressure or force, for example, the luring of the victim into an airless chamber, the placing of a plastic bag over the victim's face, or the administration of a poison that causes an anaphylactic reaction, the resultant stopping or significantly hindering or restricting of the victim's breathing is not a separate element of the offence but is the very evidence required to prove that the conduct (the luring, placing of the bag, the administration of the poison) was the act of choking, suffocation or strangling.

[21] For these reasons I conclude that, if mens rea is an element of the offence, the intention accompanying the conduct must be an intention to stop or significantly hinder or restrict the victim's breathing.

[22] There is no express or implied exclusion of mens rea in s 20A. The offence in s 20A was created to avoid 'relying on existing offences such as causing harm or serious harm, endangering life or attempted murder'. All of those offences require proof of mens rea. In enacting s 20A as a substitute for those offences and in dispensing with any requirement to prove injury or harm and yet providing a maximum penalty of 7 years imprisonment, Parliament cannot have intended to dispense with the element of mens rea. However, the offence does not require proof of harm or injury and thus does not require proof of a specific intent with respect to the consequence of the prohibited conduct.

[23] The very act the accused intends to perform must be to stop, significantly hinder or restrict the complainant's breathing. The intention to choke, suffocate or strangle will generally be inferred from the conduct itself but may also be established by additional evidence.

[24] Accordingly, I conclude that the presumption that mens rea is required before a person can be held guilty of a grave criminal offence is not displaced in relation to s 20A of the CLCA. On a charge under that provision, the prosecution bears the onus of proving that the accused intended to choke, suffocate or strangle the complainant, that he, is intended to stop, significantly hinder or restrict the complainant's breathing.

[30] Accordingly, I consider it unlikely that Parliament would have intended to exclude recklessness as an alternative basis for liability …

[31] As there is no statutory definition of recklessness for the purposes of s 20A, and given the characterisation by Parliament of this offence as an indicator of escalation to domestic homicide, it is appropriate to apply the common law test for recklessness set out by the High Court in Crabbe.

[32] I rule that the elements of the offence under s 20A are:

- At the time of the alleged offence the accused was or had been, in a relationship with the complainant.
- The accused intentionally engaged in conduct which choked, suffocated or strangled the complainant; that is conduct that stopped or significantly hindered or restricted the complainant's respiration. In the alternative, the accused engaged in the conduct which choked, suffocated or strangled the complainant foreseeing that it was probable that this conduct would stop or significantly hinder or restrict the complainant's respiration.
- The complainant did not consent to being choked, suffocated or strangled.
- The act of choking, suffocating or strangling the complainant was done without lawful justification.

R v Rogers* [2020] SADC 72 (16 June 2020) – South Australian District Court

'Coercive control' – 'Controlling behaviour' – 'Credibility of complainant' – 'Evidence' – 'Non-fatal strangulation' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Step-children' – 'Victims as (alleged) perpetrators'

Charges: Causing harm with intent to cause harm x 1; damaging property x 1; assault x 1; rape x 2; assault causing harm x 1.

Facts: The accused man was charged with 6 offences alleged to have been committed against the complainant woman between 2016 and 2018 when they were in a 'romantic relationship' and were living together for periods of time. The offences included causing harm with intent to cause harm, damaging property, assault, rape, and assault causing harm. The alleged offences were committed in a domestic setting, at different addresses where the complainant resided with her 3 children, apart from periods on weekends or school holidays when they stayed with their respective fathers. The prosecution alleged that the relationship was characterised by the accused's violence and aggression, and that the complainant was trapped in a destructive cycle of physical violence, abuse, threats and controlling behaviour, which usually occurred in the presence of her young children. According to the prosecution, the charges are specific examples of a general pattern of behaviour demonstrated by the accused in the course of the relationship.

In relation to Count 1, the accused was alleged to have choked the complainant. He also punched and slapped her in the face (Count 3). Further, the complainant allegedly woke to the sensation of her vagina being penetrated (Count 4), and the accused further penetrated her with his fingers (Count 5). The accused also allegedly threw the complainant and stood on her ankle with his body weight, causing extreme pain (Count 6).

Held: Tracey J held that the prosecution failed to exclude the defence case as a reasonable possibility on any of the charges, and found the accused not guilty on each count ([281]-[282]). Much of the complainant's evidence was inconsistent and unreliable. Her Honour was troubled by the delay the complainant made in reporting Count 1 to police and the delay in providing the letter relied on by the prosecution as the accused's acknowledgment of the violent acts that had occurred the previous night ([234]). Whilst the letter could be interpreted as referring to the event where he strangled the complainant as she alleged, it could also be viewed as an apology for calling her a bad mother, threatening suicide, punching the wall and grabbing her arms as the defence alleged ([236]).

Much of the defence case was focused on blaming the complainant for issues in the relationship, consistent with the threatening and intimidating abuse she allegedly experienced. Her Honour rejected the defence argument that she was often the perpetrator of violence. The evidence in relation to the complainant's previous relationships did not demonstrate a propensity for violence or false reporting to police. It was clear that on some occasions, she had not been the instigator and/or was the victim. Tracey J also formed the impression that the accused exhibited manipulative behaviour ([272]). Moreover, behaviours, such as the complainant's contacting police, making statements on some occasions and not others, withdrawing complaints, denying incidents occurred, allowing the accused back into her life and seeking variation to intervention orders, are common features in serious domestic violence cases. Abusive and violent relationships give rise to behaviours that may appear too odd or counterintuitive to be believed ([273]).

Tracey J did not doubt that some aspects of the complainant's evidence were true or that she loved the accused. However, she did have difficulty assessing the complainant's evidence overall. Whilst she sometimes appeared to be focused and doing her best to describe the events, she also appeared distant, non-committal and prone to exaggeration. She was open about her methamphetamine use and the fact that she had used drugs in her home, albeit not in front of her children ([274]). At times, the complainant's manner seemed perplexing and her Honour had difficulty accepting her version of events as credible. The differences between her evidence and what she told police were troubling. Such inconsistencies could not be excused, even allowing for the passage of time, the frequent and repetitive nature of alleged abuse blurring a memory of an event, or the chaotic lifestyle that often accompanies drug use ([275]). It appeared much of her angst stemmed from the accused's relationship with another woman. The complainant's credibility was undermined by her initial refusal to accept the accuracy of texts she had sent to this woman and her denial that the relationship with the accused did not affect her, despite text messages to the contrary ([276]). Further, her Honour noted that although domestic violence victims may not seek attention for the injuries they sustain and may take extraordinary steps to conceal evidence of abuse, the complainant's graphic descriptions of her injuries and episodes of violence were not borne out by other evidence. There was no evidence from the complainant's consultations with doctors of any bruising or injury consistent with the allegations. Her daughter's distress, apparently in response to questions about drugs, raised the question of whether there had been some discussion between her and the complainant before giving evidence ([279]). Tracey J observed that the police officers who gave evidence appeared to be careful and impressive witnesses who would have assessed and recorded any sign of injury ([280]).

R v Hanks [2019] SADC 139 (16 September 2019) – South Australian District Court

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Propensity reasoning' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Uncharged acts'

Charges: 4 x assault causing harm (Counts 1-4), 1 x rape (Count 5), 2 x aggravated assault causing harm (Counts 6-7), 1 x aggravated assault (Count 8), 1 x aggravated creating likelihood of harm (Count 9)

Case type: Criminal trial by judge alone

Facts: The accused was charged with 4 counts of assault causing harm, 1 count of rape, 2 counts of aggravated assault causing harm, 1 count of aggravated assault and 1 count of aggravated creating likelihood of harm. The complainant was his former de facto partner ([1]). The prosecution argued that the charged acts were committed during their de facto relationship ([3]). The defence case, however, was that the relationship was not a violent one and that the charged acts of violence and rape did not take place ([5]).

Held: The accused was found guilty of Counts 1-5 and 7-9. Judge Chapman did not find him guilty of Count 6, but guilty of the alternative offence of aggravated assault ([188]-[221]). The complainant gave evidence that the accused suffered from alcohol and drug abuse, and would get emotional about his past, resulting in rage ([19]-[20]). Judge Chapman emphasised that she avoided using the evidence in any prejudicial way against the accused, such as to reason that he was generally violent and therefore must have committed the charged acts ([187]). Her Honour noted that the fact the accused used drugs did not mean that he was a bad person or had the propensity to commit the charged offences. Rather, her Honour stated that the evidence of his alcohol and/or drug use may only partly explain his aggressive behaviour towards the complainant and his inability to control outbursts of rage ([21]). Evidence of various uncharged acts was further discussed at [23]-[52]. Judge Chapman was satisfied that all the uncharged acts occurred as described by the complainant and showed that the charged acts did not "come out of the blue" ([185]).

R v Schmidt* [2017] SADC 98 (30 August 2017) – South Australian District Court

'Admissibility' – 'Evidence not accepted' – 'Jealousy' – 'Judge-only trial' – 'Strangulation' – 'Tendency evidence' – 'Uncharged acts of violence'

Charges: Aggravated serious criminal trespass in a place of residence x 1; Indecent assault x 1; Assault x 1; Theft x 1.

Case type: Trial by a single judge.

Facts: The complainant alleged that the accused entered her house, strangled her, grabbed her in the vagina, punched her in the face and stole her mobile phone ([23]-[[26]). The accused denied all the allegations ([6]).

Issues: Whether the accused should be convicted.

Decision and Reasoning: Judge Rice convicted the accused on counts 1, 2 and 4 ([56]). In relation to Count 3 (assault), Rice J found that it was not proved beyond reasonable doubt that the accused punched the complainant ([54]).

Evidence of uncharged acts of violence occurring earlier in the relationship was also admitted. The prosecution said that it showed that 'the accused had a tendency to act in a violent and controlling manner' towards the complainant ([12]). However, Judge Rice ignored the evidence on the basis that some of the complainant’s evidence was inconsistent, and was not supported by independent evidence ([20]).

Tasmania

Court of Criminal Appeal

Gee v Tasmania* [2022] TASCCA 1 (2 February 2022) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Admissibility of evidence' – 'Admissibility of prison telephone call recordings' – 'Admissions of guilt' – 'Appeal' – 'Credibility of victim' – 'Lies of victim' – 'Persistent family violence' – 'Post-offence conduct consistent with guilt' – 'Prison telephone calls'

Charges: Persistent family violence x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant was found guilty of persistent family violence [8]. He appealed on the following grounds:

1. The learned trial judge erred in fact and in law in ruling that the complainant's evidence be taken at a special hearing.
2. The learned trial judge erred in fact and in law in admitting into evidence the recorded content of phone calls made by the appellant to the complainant:
   - '…in finding that the probative value of the evidence was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the appellant';
   - '…in finding that it would not be unfair to admit the evidence having regard to its late disclosure'; and
   - '…in admitting the evidence conditional upon the State recalling the witness in circumstances where it had previously asserted in support of the application for special hearing that it would not do so under any circumstances' [7].

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal is dismissed.

Ground 1: The Court affirmed the trial judge's ruling on the special hearing, dismissing the first ground of appeal [32]. The trial judge had found that when faced with the prospect of giving evidence in court in the presence of the accused, the complainant experienced symptoms of anxiety that 'adversely affected' her ability to comprehend and respond to questions ‘to a significant degree’. The trial judge noted that the complainant’s anxiety manifested ‘itself physically by her shaking and becoming effectively unresponsive’. Therefore, the trial judge was satisfied that by requiring the complainant to give evidence ‘in the usual way’ she would likely ‘suffer severe emotional trauma’ and ‘be so intimidated or distressed as to be unable to give evidence… satisfactorily’. The trial judge explained that this was due to the nature of the complainant’s ‘relationship with the accused and… the subject matter’ [16].

Ground 2: The court dismissed the second ground of appeal, stating that ‘the evidence was highly probative, involving admissions of guilt, post-offence conduct consistent with guilt and evidence highlighting the complainant's credibility’ [48]. The court held that the complainant’s admitted lies did not mean none of her evidence was to be believed.

Otto v Tasmania* [2021] TASCCA 15 (16 December 2021) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

‘Accessory after the fact’ – ‘Application for leave to appeal’ – ‘Crown appeal against sentence’ – ‘Female perpetrator’ – ‘Murder’

Charges: Murder.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against conviction; Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant was convicted of the murder of her husband, the allegations being that she instigated her husband’s friend and her former lover Bradley Purkiss to commit the crime. The case against the applicant was solely circumstantial. The victim had been behaving erratically in the weeks leading up to the murder and the applicant and co-accused had spent a number of hours together on the afternoon before the murder. It was clear that the jury did not believe the applicant’s exculpatory statements in her police record of interview. The applicant and victim had been experiencing financial difficultied prior to the murder and she had reported to witnesses that her husband had mental and physical health issues which prevented him from working, and he was said to be an intimidating person. The applicant and Purkiss had a brief sexual relationship which ended prior to the murder, but they remained close. Text messages between Purkiss and the victim on the day of the murder were recovered from the victim’s phone, there was video evidence a man wearing a hood entered the applicant and victim’s home met after the murder and the CCV was disconnected after that person entered the home.

Grounds:

Application for leave to appeal – the verdict of the jury was unreasonable and cannot be supported with regards to the evidence (accepting a verdict of accessory after the fact should be substituted if successful).

Appeal against sentence – manifest inadequacy.

Decision and reasoning:

1. Leave granted and appeal allowed.
2. Verdict of guilty of murder set aside and verdict of being an accessory after the fact to murder substituted.
3. Sentence for murder set aside.*

Porter J (Brett and Geason JJ concurring) held that the question for the court was whether it was open for the jury to have excluded all reasonable hypotheses consistent with innocence. On the evidence before the jury it was not possible to exclude the hypothesis put by the applicant in argument.

*Note: On 17 December 2021, for the crime of being an accessory after the fact to murder, the Court recorded a conviction and sentenced the appellant to six years' imprisonment to commence on 30 May 2017. The Court ordered that she not be eligible for parole until she had served one half of that sentence.

McCall v Tasmania* [2021] TASCCA 11 (12 November 2021) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Accusations of infidelity' – 'Aggravated burglary' – 'Appeal against sentence' – 'Community protection' – 'Extensive criminal history' – 'Home invasion' – 'Manifestly excessive or inadequate' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People who are homeless' – 'People who are pregnant' – 'Sentence' – 'Sentencing'

Charges:

Incident 1: Aggravated burglary x 1, assault x 1, associated summary offences;

Incident 2: evading police x 1, dangerous driving x 1, associated summary offences.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The accused man appealed the sentences imposed by Brett J for offending arising out of two separate incidents. The first incident was of violent offending including aggravated burglary and assault towards his then domestic partner (pregnant with a former partner's child) and the violent invasion of the home of people with whom they were staying during a period of homelessness. The second incident related to the accused's attempts to avoid arrest for the first incident by engaging in dangerous driving while under police pursuit. The accused had an extensive criminal history "which manifests in persistent and serious violent offending" and "a lengthy history of traffic offending, including a number of convictions for disqualified driving, and convictions for evading police and negligent driving". Brett J noted that the only factors which could be taken into account in the accused's favour were his pleas of guilty and the principles of totality. The appellant argued that the 18-month delay between his arrest and sentence should have been taken into account in mitigation.

Issue: Were the sentences imposed (7 years total term of imprisonments, eligible for parole after 5 years, together with a driving disqualification for an aggregate of 6 years from the date of release) manifestly excessive?

Decision and Reasoning: Appeal dismissed.

Aggravating circumstances related to the first incident included:

- The aggravated burglary took the form of a very frightening home invasion.
- The victim of the assault was a pregnant woman.
- It was a prolonged assault.
- It amounted to domestic violence. [11]

Aggravating circumstances in relation to the dangerous driving included:

- The crime occurred on a Monday afternoon, when it was likely that there would be motorists and pedestrians on the streets of Penguin.
- A number of drivers had to swerve to avoid collisions.
- A number of pedestrians, including an elderly woman, were crossing roads when the appellant drove towards them.
- A number of police officers were involved in intercepting the appellant.
- The appellant drove for about 7 kilometres when evading the police.
- He ignored emergency lights and sirens.
- He continued to drive after the vehicle's tyres were deflated.

- He was a disqualified driver. [12]

The appellant was always likely to receive a term of imprisonment greater than the 18-month delay, negating any mitigation this factor might grant. [13]

Blow CJ, Jago J and Martin AJ observed:

> ….it cannot be said the impugned sentences, separately or in the aggregate, were out of proportion to the seriousness of the appellant's offending, particularly since provision was made for him to be eligible for parole two years before the expiration of the last sentence. [25]

Gordon v Tasmania* [2020] TASCCA 17 (2 December 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Manifest excess' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Traumatic childhood' – 'Verdins principles'

Charges: Wounding x 1; Common assault x 2.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female appellant had a traumatic childhood, being sexually abused by her father and exposed to domestic and family violence. She had a history of mental illness (including depression, borderline personality disorder and post-traumatic stress disorder), substance misuse (she had ceased drug use but was drinking heavily at the time of the offending), and a lengthy record of offending. The offences occurred during the course of an argument between the appellant and her mother, and related to feelings of love/betrayal the appellant felt towards her mother for her childhood. The appellant cut her mother's fringe with a knife and forced her head back onto the couch. She put her mother in a headlock and cut across her neck. The appellant threatened to stab a neighbour while holding two knives. The appellant was sentenced to 2 years imprisonment. The sentencing judge determined not to make an order that the appellant was eligible for parole. The appellant was made the subject of a community correction order for 12 months.

Grounds of appeal:

1. The sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. The sentencing judge erred in fact and/or law in determining that an order for parole eligibility ought not be made.

Held: The appeal was allowed on ground 2 and the appellant re-sentenced.

Ground 1: There was sufficient evidence in the forensic psychiatrist's report to establish a connection between the appellant's impaired mental functioning and its contribution to the offending: 6 Verdins principles discussed at [27]-[33], [39]-[46] and [47]-[50]. Nevertheless, the 2 year head sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive. It was not outside the range available to the sentencing judge. The appellant's traumatic childhood, presence of mental disorders, and the relationship issue which lay at the heart of the offending were more appropriately taken into account in whether relief ought to be afforded in relation to the service of 2 years' imprisonment (at [53]-[56]).

Ground 2: The appellant alleged that the sentencing judge misapplied certain material relevant to parole. However, the court declined to take the alleged factual errors further, instead allowing the appeal on other grounds (at [57]-[64]).

The failure to provide some relief from the full force of 2 years imprisonment was unreasonable and plainly unjust. The circumstances of the offences/offender called for some individualisation, these being: "the appellant's background of sexual abuse, her nature and extent of her illnesses, the underlying explanation for the attack on her mother, her remorse and the prospects of rehabilitation with sustained psychological therapy" (at [78]). The appellant was re-sentenced to 2 years' imprisonment, 8 months suspended on conditions including supervision of a probation officer in relation to drug/alcohol treatment, and undergoing medical, psychological or psychiatric assessment or treatment.

Tatnell v Tasmania* [2020] TASCCA 13 (7 August 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Appeal against conviction' – 'Assault' – 'Evidence' – 'Prior inconsistent statements' – 'Strangulation' – 'Trauma informed judicial practice'

Charges: Assault x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The male appellant was charged with 3 counts of assault against his wife during the course an argument. A jury found the appellant guilty of the first count, which included strangling his wife and punching the wall above her head, but not guilty of the other counts. The trial judge imposed a wholly suspended sentence of 12 months' imprisonment and made a community correction order.

Grounds of appeal: Whether inconsistencies between the complainant's description of the relevant events in evidence and that provided to police made the jury's verdict unsafe and unsatisfactory.

Held: Appeal was dismissed.

The jury was entitled to accept the complainant's explanation of the inconsistencies. This was particularly so given the jury's advantage of hearing the complainant give evidence and in the context of all the evidence (including objective evidence of strangulation). The jury's acceptance of this evidence was sufficient to support the verdict of guilt on count 1.

Parker v Tasmania* [2020] TASCCA 9 (12 June 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Guilty plea' – 'History of abuse' – 'People affected by alcohol misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Statistics' – 'Terminally ill victim' – 'Vulnerable victim'

Case type: Second appeal against sentence

Facts: This is a second sentencing appeal by the appellant man in respect of 2 counts of assault on his female partner (see Parker v Tasmania [2019] TASCCA 16 (8 October 2019) . He plead guilty and his plea to one count was accepted in satisfaction of a charge of causing grievous bodily harm. The appellant was sentenced by Blow CJ to 4 years' and 3 months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 2 years, 9 months. He appealed on grounds the sentence was manifestly excessive and that the sentencing judge erred in determined the factual basis for sentence. Blow CJ resentenced him to 3 months longer than the original sentence with the same non-parole period. The offences were recorded as family violence offences.

The appellant struck the complainant, a terminally ill cancer patient, in the head with a teapot, and then pushed her, causing her to fall over. The fall caused the complainant's hysterectomy wound to split open and her bowel to protrude. He had been drinking prior to the assaults. The appellant's version of events differed from the complainant's; the complainant's sworn evidence was found to be more reliable.

The appellant's lengthy criminal history included prior convictions for assault and for breaching family violence orders for violence towards an earlier partner and the current complainant. Factors in the appellant's favour included the fact that he pleaded guilty, phoned the ambulance and did not flee from the scene, and admitted what he had done to the 000 operator and police. He left the complainant alone and bleeding to ask a neighbour for a cigarette. He recognised his violence was associated with his alcohol problem and sought treatment. The complainant was vulnerable and suffered terrible physical and mental health consequences as a result of the appellant's actions ([11]). Aggravating features included that the assaults occurred in the context of a domestic relationship, the complainant suffered from a terminal illness and the appellant was her carer ([12]).

Ground: The second sentence was manifestly excessive.

Held: Appeal dismissed, Estcourt, Pearce and Geason JJ concurring.

Estcourt J considered Gregson v Tasmania [2018] TASCCA 14 , a case which considered comparative sentencing statistics. In considering the "yardstick" of the available statistical and comparable sentencing data, Estcourt J held that the sentence imposed on the appellant was "heavy", but not plainly unjust or unreasonable. The appellant was sentenced on the basis that he did not intend or foresee the serious harm to the complainant, but the consequences of the assault were nevertheless egregious ([29]). As the sentencing judge noted, the situation was worse than that of a drunken man assaulting a terminally ill partner, because the appellant knew that the complainant had an untreated abdominal hernia. This made the breach of trust even greater ([30]).

Pearce J did not characterise the sentence as "heavy". Whilst the appellant did not intend or foresee the terrible harm caused, the likelihood of such harm ought to have been obvious to any reasonable person with knowledge of the complainant's vulnerability ([35]).

Geason J agreed with Estcourt J's characterisation of the sentence as "heavy". His Honour noted that "this Court has on a number of occasions emphasised the importance of general deterrence in sentencing for offences involving the infliction of violence on the vulnerable", which frequently occur in a domestic or relationship setting, and that "[s]uch conduct requires a sentence that reflects the insidious nature of such offending, and the importance of protecting those vulnerable to such harm" ([41]).

Director of Public Prosecution v Johnson* [2020] TASCCA 4 (8 April 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Alcohol misuse' – 'Appeal against sentence' – 'Attempt to interfere with witness' – 'Coercive control' – 'Controlling, jealous and obsessive behaviours' – 'History of abuse' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Separation' – 'Stalking.' – 'Suffocation' – 'Use of family members'

Offences: Assault x 2; Stalking x 1; Attempt to interfere with a witness x 1; Breaching a family violence order x 15; Attempting to breach a family violence order x 23

Proceedings: Crown appeal against sentence

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate

Facts: The male respondent and female victim were in a relationship and had moved in together. The respondent was arrested for breaches of a protective order made for the benefit of the victim, sentenced and a 12-month family violence order was imposed consisting of full non-contact conditions. Nine days later, the respondent made contact with the victim in breach of the order, promising he had changed. The respondent called the victim telling her he had paid for a hotel for the two of them to meet. The victim agreed and when she arrived, they had consensual sexual intercourse. They then consumed a fair amount of alcohol. Later that evening, the victim received a text message from a male friend. The respondent became aggressive and claimed the victim had been cheating. He pushed her head onto the bed and struck her face four times, pulling a clump of hair out. The respondent went to the bathroom for a few minutes and when he returned, he pushed the victim's face into a pillow and sat on her back so that she couldn't move. The victim thought she was going to die. The respondent eventually let her go but grabbed her arm and told her she would never see her children again. The victim told the respondent that she had to use the bathroom; she went inside, locked the door and sat in the shower. The respondent banged on the door, but the victim came out when he stopped. She asked to be allowed to sleep; the respondent allowed her to while he was holding her arm.

The next morning, the victim called her sister to tell her what had happened, asking her to pick her up. The victim reported the matter to police. Over the next few days, the respondent sent torrents of text messages and made numerous calls to the victim, which ranged from threats to pleading. He later had his father pass two letters onto the victim, asking her to withdraw the charges and refuse to give evidence. The victim refused. The respondent was convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of twelve months.

Judgment: The court allowed the appeal, finding the sentence to be manifestly inadequate in that it "[fell] short of that required to adequately respond to the gravity of the offending" [41], and resentenced the respondent to three years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months. The court held that "Apart from the fact that the offending occurred in breach of court orders intended to protect a vulnerable female, the respondent's conduct involved acts of significant persistent violence including suffocation, followed by persistent attempts to have her drop the charges or refuse to give evidence; and stalking" [31]. The court emphasised that "Offending occurring in the privacy of the home, unseen, and away from help must be met with a penalty that serves as a warning to others that detection and conviction will result in severe consequences" [31].

The court condemned suffocation, providing that "The fact that the respondent's conduct included suffocation has significance to the assessment of the objective seriousness of the offending. Suffocation should be treated with the same level of seriousness as is afforded strangulation or throttling. Such conduct is inherently dangerous, and capable of causing serious consequences within a very short period. It renders victims incapable of acting to protect themselves … it is a form of dominance and control which has the potential to cause grave psychological harm, serious injury and even death" [33]. The court held this to be an aggravating factor, along with the fact that the offending occurred just 12 days after the respondent was released and that the respondent attempted to interfere with prosecution of the case [34]-[35]. The court noted that "the objective seriousness of the offending was very high encompassing serious assaults in circumstances where help was not available, followed by a series of attempts to avoid prosecution. Because that sort of interference has a probability of success, to the detriment of the safety of the victim and the frustration of community attempts to protect the vulnerable, gaol should be the inevitable consequence of such conduct" [37].

The court concluded that:

"the prosecution of family violence matters is notoriously difficult due to the vulnerability of victims to interference and pressure from perpetrators, with whom they will often have been in a relationship … the circumstances of this case make it an appropriate vehicle through which to assert a general principle that conduct directed at interfering in the prosecution of family violence matters so significantly erodes the administration of justice that it should attract a heavy sentence of imprisonment. This is important to encourage community participation in reporting such violence, and to provide confidence in the processes which follow reporting. The importance of this principle prevails over the matters referred to by the respondent in respect of his rehabilitation and parole" [55]. And further, "Prosecutions are the cornerstone of the system for the protection of victims. They serve to expose the offending, protect the victim and afford an opportunity for intervention directed towards the rehabilitation of the offender" [54] and that "A message needs to be sent to violent men in the community that serious assaults on females and intimidatory and stalking behaviour, and behaviour designed to persuade a witness not to give evidence, will result in considerable periods of imprisonment" [74].

Charges: Aggravated burglary and assault x 1; Common assault x 1.

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant man pleaded guilty to aggravated burglary and assault, and to a summary offence of common assault. He was sentenced to 2 years' and 6 months' imprisonment on various conditions. The crimes were committed in the context of a domestic relationship against his wife (the victim) and teenage son. The appellant and victim had separated after 22 years of marriage, and had 3 children. On the day of offending, the appellant attended the family home where the victim and children lived, having been denied contact with the youngest child, after having consumed a considerable amount of alcohol. He smashed into the home and choked and punched his wife and teenage child. The sentencing judge was satisfied that the appellant was not coping well with the dissolution of the marriage. The appellant had attempted suicide, and the family was concerned about his psychological state. He breached an agreement that he was not to attend the home without the victim's consent, and was therefore a trespasser. The sentencing judge made a family violence order and directed that the crimes and summary offence be recorded on the appellant's criminal record as family violence offences.

Issue: The appellant appealed against the sentence on the ground that it was manifestly excessive. It was also contended that the sentencing judge erred in his assessment and use of evidentiary material relevant to sentence. Underlying much of this submission was the complaint that the sentencing judge should have relied on a pre-sentence report which concluded that the appellant presented 'a low risk of future family violence'. The appellant also submitted that the sentencing judge misused or gave undue weight to statements in the Victim Impact Statements, in particular, the description of the effects of the act of choking.

Held: The learned judge's sentencing considerations were discussed again on appeal ([20]-[27]). The appellant had not previously committed any criminal offences and had a "significant potential for employment". Whilst the offending was not premeditated, the medical evidence stated that he was suffering from an adjustment disorder at the time of the offending. As to the likelihood of future violence, a psychologist used a ‘structured professional judgment tool’ (SARA) designed to predict intimate partner violence recidivism. Based on the SARA, the appellant was assessed at being at moderate risk of further violence towards the victim. The combination of the SARA and other ‘red-flag’ risk factors led the psychologist to conclude that the appellant still posed a risk to the victim. Further, notwithstanding his guilty plea and cooperation in the proceedings, the appellant lacked insight and remorse and minimised the severity of his conduct. There was a need for personal deterrence as his personality traits, such as narcissism, predisposed him to having a ‘severe explosive reaction to the relationship separation’.

The appellant contended that the sentencing judge should have accepted the assessment of the probation officer in the pre-sentence report over the SARA. The Court held that the sentencing judge was not bound to accept the officer’s assessment or the reliability of the appellant’s statements to the officer ([36]). The officer was not provided with the SARA conducted by the psychologist, and took the appellant’s statements at face value ([37]). The officer’s assessment therefore provided a less reliable basis for findings relevant to sentence than the SARA ([39]-[40]).

Further, there was no basis for concern that the sentencing judge misused the Victim Impact Statements. In his sentencing remarks, he noted the victim's description of the terror she experienced while being choked and said it was "clear" that she perceived the choking as a "potentially lethal attack and felt powerless" to stop the appellant. He also described the violence as "unexpected, explosive, and unrestrained", and concluded that the assault was "brutal" with the potential to inflict serious injury ([50]). In relation to strangulation, the sentencing judge found:

> "Attempted strangulation which does not result in death or physical injury, can still have long-term physical and psychological impact, and leave the victim susceptible to ongoing symptoms. In criminal assault such acts are generally used to subdue and force compliance by the victim without any real thought being given to the danger inherent in such conduct. Those dangers were clearly apparent in your actions in this case. Your rage and lack of restraint meant that you had no real capacity to judge or moderate your attack, and the complainant was therefore in real danger of serious injury or worse."

The Court of Appeal held that there was ample foundation in the evidence to support the sentencing judge’s remarks. His Honour correctly regarded the choking as a "particularly concerning aspect" of the assault, and appropriately considered the dangers attached to the appellant's conduct as part of his overall assessment of the gravity of the offending ([52]-[53]). He also observed that the appellant's conduct "constituted an extremely serious episode of family violence" ([63]). The Court of Appeal acknowledged that the choking of female victims by male offenders is understood by criminal courts as a "prevalent and dangerous feature of violence perpetrated in domestic circumstances" ([53]). Victims of domestic violence are vulnerable and the crimes are often committed in breach of the sanctity and safety of the family home ([64]). It referred to DPP v Foster and Gregson v Tasmania as support for the propositions that women in domestic circumstances are particularly vulnerable and violent behaviour by men towards women "must be condemned and discouraged" ([65]).

Consequently, the appeal was dismissed. Notwithstanding the appellant's prospects of successful rehabilitation, he engaged in dangerous and distressing conduct against his wife and child and remains an ongoing risk of future violence ([66]-[70]).

Parker v Tasmania* [2019] TASCCA 16 (8 October 2019) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal *(This decision was the subject of an unsuccessful appeal - Parker v Tasmania [2020] TASCCA 9 (12 June 2020))

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Physical harm and violence'

Charge(s): Assualt; Causing grievous bodily harm

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence

Grounds:

- 1a. The sentencing judge erred by making factual findings inconsistent with the unchallenged assertions of fact by the defence;
- 1b. The findings of fact made were objectively more serious than those asserted by the defence and led to the imposition of a sentence that was manifestly excessive
- 2. The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Facts: Appellant man pleaded guilty to two counts of assault against his then female domestic partner. The plea of one of the counts was accepted by the Crown in satisfaction of a charge of causing grievous bodily harm. The appellant was convicted and sentenced to four years and three months imprisonment with a non-parole period of two years and nine months.

The appellant and complainant had been in a domestic relationship for about five years. The complainant was diagnosed with terminal ovarian cancer in May 2017, whilst the appellant was in prison for driving offences from April to August 2017. The complainant had treatment and on the appellant's release he was her carer. She had a number of hospitalisations and had had a hysterectomy in July. On 27 September the appellant and complainant had a prolonged argument after he had been drinking all day. The appellant struck the complaint in the back of the head with a teapot during the course of an argument. He then pushed the complainant over, causing her to strike her head on a hard item of furniture. The fall caused her surgical wound to rupture and her bowel to protrude. The complainant required immediate surgical treatment and was later assessed that have suffered an evisceration of her small bowel, an abrasion to her nose, a laceration to the back of her head, grazes to her hands and left knee, and was developing bruises [8]. The appellant was heavily intoxicated at the time of the offence.

Judgment: The appellant's sentence was quashed and the matter was remitted to the sentencing judge for resentencing.

Counsel for the appellant submitted that "there were a number of inconsistencies between the facts asserted to the sentencing judge by the Crown and the defence" [11]. Justice Pearce noted that the only difference that was of consequence was the immediate circumstances of the assaults as the circumstances would inform the objective gravity of the assaults and the appellant's culpability. Reviewing the sentencing judge's reasons, Pearce J found that "the sentencing judge either did not realise, or ignored, the inconsistencies" between the versions [15]. By ignoring these inconsistencies, the "exercise of the sentencing discretion miscarried" [22]. Given that the sentencing judge imposed sentence on the basis of disputed facts, the first ground of appeal succeeded [22]. Although the first ground succeeded, Pearce J provided that "[n]o assessment of the remaining grounds of appeal asserting that the sentence is manifestly excessive can be undertaken until the proper factual basis of sentence is determined" [23].

Director of Public Prosecutions v Foster [2019] TASCCA 15 (12 September 2019) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Appeal' – 'Coercive control' – 'Domestic relationship' – 'Family violence order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: 5 x assault; 1 x demanding property with menaces with intent to steal

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The respondent pleaded not guilty to 5 counts of assault and 1 count of demanding property with menaces with intent to steal. The offences committed by the respondent occurred during the course of a domestic relationship. He was found not guilty of 3 counts of assault, but guilty of the remaining counts. The learned sentencing judge sentenced the respondent to 16 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of half of that term. His Honour also made a Family Violence Order.

The DPP appealed against the sentence on the sole ground that it was manifestly inadequate. The appellant submitted that the respondent committed 2 serious assaults, both of which were prolonged and involved strangulation. The crime of demanding property with menaces with intent to steal was arguably serious as it was committed during a prolonged attack and involved threats to kill the complainant and her children. It was also submitted that these matters were not isolated as they occurred in the context of a violent and abusive relationship ([13]).

Issue: The question for the Court was whether the sentence was manifestly excessive or inadequate.

Held: The sentence of 16 months' imprisonment was found to be manifestly inadequate, having regard to the seriousness of the offending in the context of the domestic relationship ([42]). Estcourt J accepted that appellant's submissions as 'undoubtedly correct' ([19]). Each incident involved 'vicious and cowardly attacks by the respondent on a woman'. The respondent had convictions for violent offences, including ones of family violence. Citing an article by Heather Douglas and Robin Fitzgerald, his Honour observed that 'strangulation is a form of power and control that can have devastating psychological long-term effects on its victims in addition to a potentially fatal outcome' ([26]). It can cause loss of consciousness and lead to a sudden death ([27]). Further, the respondent's prior convictions indicated that the present offences were not isolated or unusual. He did not plead guilty and did not show any remorse ([28]). His Honour allowed the appeal, set aside the sentencing order and imposed a new sentence of 2 years and 6 months' imprisonment, with parole eligibility after serving half of that sentence. The Family Violence Order made by the learned sentencing judge was undisturbed ([36]-[37]). Brett J and Marshall AJ agreed with Estcourt J's reasons.

Gregson v Tasmania* [2018] TASCCA 14 (31 August 2018) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Coercive control' – 'History of domestic violence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Vulnerable grounds' – 'Women'

Charges: Assault x 2.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant had violently attacked his vulnerable female partner with whom he was in a domestic relationship. The parties were arguing, mostly about the appellant's intoxication and his lifestyle, characterised by his drug and alcohol abuse. The appellant delivered numerous forceful punches to the victim's face, and shortly afterwards, returned and delivered more forceful blows to her head. She did not sustain any fractures, but the conduct was unprovoked and caused her to suffer nightmares. Estcourt J sentenced the appellant to two years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months.

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

The appellant submitted that:

- He was sentenced during 'women's month' which may have influenced the sentencing judge's decision.
- The sentencing judge failed to take into account that immediately before the second assault, the appellant was 'assaulted by the victim with a large serrated-edge kitchen knife', and acted in 'self-defence'.
- He should have been sentenced in the Magistrates Court.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Court agreed with the sentencing judge's description of the offending as a 'cowardly attack' and his observation that 'Vulnerable women such as the complainant are entitled to the protection of the law against brutal partners, and the community expectation is that such protection will be provided by the Courts' ([29]). Although he did not use a weapon or kick the victim, the nature and strength used was not insignificant. The Court held that although the appellant should not be re-punished for his prior criminal conduct, he was not entitled to any leniency. The Court noted that the appellant had a history of violence towards women. The prevalence of this type of conduct impacts on the community at large. Women in domestic circumstances are particularly vulnerable to the abuse of power and breach of trust by violent male partners (Director of Public Prosecutions v Karklins [2018] TASCCA 6 [54]– [60]). Women who become victims in these circumstances, and other potential victims in the community, are entitled to such protection as the law can provide by the imposition of sentences that will act as both a personal and general deterrent ([37]). Whilst the sentence of two years' imprisonment was towards the upper end of the appropriate range of the sentencing discretion, it was not manifestly excessive, harsh or unjust. Having regard to the appellant's record of prior offending and disregard for court orders, the sentencing judge was found to be lenient in fixing a non-parole period, and the non-parole period of 18 months was within the range of sentencing discretion.

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Coercive control' – 'Damaging property' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Listening to Victims' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnant people' – 'Sentencing' – 'Systems abuse' – 'Vulnerable groups'

Charges: Assault x 1; Assault on a pregnant woman x 3; Attempt to interfere with a witness x 5; Destroying property x 1.

Appeal type: Prosecution appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent and complainant had been living together for 5 months with the complainant's son ([6]). The complainant was 4 weeks pregnant at the time of the offences ([7]). The respondent threatened to leave the complainant, but the complainant asked him to stay ([9]-[10]). The respondent threatened to kill her and the baby. He headbutted the complainant and strangled her three times, causing her to lose consciousness twice ([13]-[16]).

The respondent was arrested and on remand. The respondent told a friend to tell the complainant that if she retracted her statement, he would 'consider getting back with her' ([22]). The complainant did so ([23]). The respondent was sentenced to 1 year and 10 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 11 months.

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: Geason J emphasised aggravating features of the case, such as the fact that the respondent had the opportunity to reflect on his conduct between each attack ([55]), that he did not seek help for the complainant ([51]), that the crimes were committed in the context of a domestic relationship ([54]), and that the complainant was unable to defend herself ([50]). Mitigating considerations included the fact that the respondent pleaded guilty early ([61]).

In relation to the charges of interfering with a witness, Geason J at [56] remarked on the importance of such charges in aiding the administration of justice in relation to domestic violence:

> The respondent's attempts to frustrate his prosecution should also be seen as particularly serious matters. They were a cynical exercise in emotional blackmail … Domestic violence typically occurs behind closed doors, making detection inherently difficult. Relationship dynamics frequently militate against a prosecution. Conduct directed at interfering with the prosecutorial process undermines the system intended to afford protection to victims of violence, making an inherently difficult process more so … It should be accepted in cases of family violence that attempts to interfere with the due administration of justice by the means of emotional manipulation of a vulnerable victim is a serious matter the consequences of which will always be severe.

Geason J referred to R v Kilic [2016] HCA 48, where the High Court stated at [21] that sentencing practices for offences involving domestic violence may 'depart from past sentencing practices for this category of offence because of changes in societal attitudes to domestic relations'. His Honour at [92] subsequently justified interfering with the sentence on the basis that:

> Domestic violence is properly regarded as a most serious form of offending, frequently hidden from view, and thus difficult to detect. The court has a symbolic function. Censure for domestic violence should be communicated through the sentences which are imposed.

His Honour cautioned against giving weight to the complaint's forgiveness of the respondent ([77]). His Honour questioned the sentencing judge's generous characterisation of the respondent's conduct during the assault ([83]-[86]).

'Assault' – 'Extraordinary case' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Public protection' – 'Unlawful assault causing bodily harm'

Charge/s: Assault x 3; unlawful act intended to cause bodily harm x 1.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male appellant and the female complainant were in a relationship. The three assault counts occurred in August 2014 and April 2015 after the appellant had been drinking. The appellant punched the complainant in the face, choked her, and fractured her wrist. The final count occurred in June 2015 when, after an argument, the intoxicated appellant threw petrol on the complainant and ignited her. The complainant's daughter heard the screams and rescued her mother. The appellant was sentenced to ten years imprisonment with a non-parole period of six years.

'Aggravating factor' – 'Children' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relevance of impact on children'

Charge/s: Murder x 2.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The 60 year old appellant murdered his former partner, 31 year old Meagan Wilton, and her new partner, 34 year old Benjamin Eyles, by shooting them with a shotgun. The appellant and Ms Wilton had a 21 month old son together, and Ms Wilton had two other girls, aged 12 and 9. Ms Wilton's youngest daughter and the appellant's son were in the house at the time of the murders. After leaving the premises, the appellant tried to commit suicide by shooting himself in the head. He suffered brain damage, lost the ability to walk, and required visual and hearing aids. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 45 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 25 years.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Estcourt J provided the lead judgment, with Blow CJ and Brett J agreeing but providing additional comments. Relevantly, Blow CJ stated that while the punishment here was significant and that there were a number of mitigating factors in the circumstances, these carried little weight in light of the aggravating factors of this case. As per His Honour: '[t]hese were deliberate killings. They were premeditated. They were motivated by vindictiveness towards a former partner' (see [4]). Moreover, '[t]his was a case in which the impact of the killings on survivors [was] particularly significant'. The children who were present in the house could suffer long-term psychological or psychiatric consequences (see [5]). Further, the impact of the crime would be felt by family members raising the children, and police officers who worked on this case.

Devine v Tasmania* [2015] TASCCA 19 (26 August 2015) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'History of abuse' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Non-parole period' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Sentencing' – 'Vulnerable - new partner'

Charges: Aggravated burglary, Unlawful act intended to cause bodily harm, Breach of family violence order, Motor vehicle stealing, Destroying property

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant and the protected person had been in a domestic relationship that ended towards the end of 2012. As a result of the appellant threatening to cut her throat and burn her house down, the protected person moved away from Hobart. Early in 2015, her house was burnt down, although no one was charged. The protected person then moved back to Hobart and entered into a new relationship. The appellant threatened her new partner, resulting in a family violence order restraining him from approaching the protected person.

On the day of offending, the appellant went to the protected person's home, kicked the front door, smashed a window, drew a knife and threatened to kill her. The appellant then lunged towards the protected person who cut her hand as a result of trying to stop him. When the protected person's partner came to assist, the appellant was holding the knife to the protected person's throat and threatened 'Why shouldn't I kill him'. When her partner attempted to separate them, the appellant stabbed him in the stomach. In relation to this conduct the appellant was charged and pleaded guilty to one count of aggravated burglary, two counts of committing an unlawful act intended to cause bodily harm, three breaches of a family violence order, one count of motor vehicle stealing, and one count of destroying property. He was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment with no non-parole period.

The appellant had a long history of dishonest and violent offending commencing from childhood. When given the benefit of suspended sentences, bonds and parole in relation to these offences, the appellant breached them. A psychologist's report noted the appellant had extremely low to borderline intellectual functioning and could be considered to have a mild intellectual disability. This was substantially the result of substance abuse in the view of the psychologist. The sentencing magistrate did not consider this as a mitigating factor, concluding there was a significant risk he would re-offend and therefore there was a need for specific deterrence.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive due to the magistrate failing to order a non-parole period.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

Tennent J, with whom Porter and Pearce JJ agreed, held that the issue of whether or not to order a parole period is a matter for the discretion of the sentencing judge. His Honour took into account the relevant factors including the appellant's offending history and disregard for orders in refusing to grant a non-parole order. The psychologist report did not suggest rehabilitation was likely. The sentencing judge therefore did not err in failing to order a non-parole period and the sentence was not manifestly excessive.

Connelly v Tasmania* [2015] TASCCA 15 (29 June 2015) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Aggravating factor' – 'Arson' – 'Attempted murder' – 'Denunciation' – 'Double jeopardy in sentencing' – 'Exposing children' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Non-parole period' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Attempted murder (two counts)

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant's relationship with his wife deteriorated after she told him that she had a sexual relationship with another man. She moved out of the family home. The appellant attempted to kill his two sons by blowing up the family car when they were sitting in it with him. He was unsuccessful but he caused an explosion and a very fierce fire. His two sons suffered life-threatening burns. Their injuries are ongoing and they will have 'functional and cosmetic problems for life'. They are at risk of ongoing psychological harm. The impact on their mother was devastating. The trial judge was satisfied that the appellant intended to kill the boys to 'deprive his wife of them' or to 'spite his wife' ([29]). He was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 15 years.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of the non-parole period. Estcourt J (with whom Tennent J agreed) held that the head sentence of 20 years was not excessive. The offending was serious and both victims were young children. However, Estcourt J noted that there was one act that impacted both victims. While the sentence encompassed the entirety of the appellant's criminal behaviour, he should not be sentenced for his conduct twice.

Counsel for the appellant submitted that even if the head sentence was not excessive, the non-parole period was excessive because of factors such as his lack of prior relevant offending, the unlikelihood of any re-offending 'given the crime was directly related to his family circumstances' and the fact that 'it could not be said that the appellant's "incorrigibility" justified the setting of the non-parole period at 75% of the head sentence' ([38]). Estcourt J (Tennent J agreeing) accepted these submissions notwithstanding the appellant's almost complete lack of remorse and reduced the non-parole period to 12 years.

Wood J agreed with Estcourt J's reasoning with respect to the head sentence but dissented in regards to the non-parole period. At [7]-[21], her Honour engaged in general discussion about the applicable principles in determining the most appropriate non-parole period. Wood J then noted at [23] a number of considerations relevant to the nature of the crime. These included that it involved deliberate acts to kill two young children, the appellant's 'vindictive motive to inflict maximum anguish and emotional trauma upon his wife', his son's extensive injuries and degree of emotional suffering and physical pain, risks to their psychological well-being and the torment and harm suffered by his wife. It was appropriate for the sentencing judge to give effect to the aims of denunciation and retribution and, 'the goal of assuaging informed moral outrage of the community, reasserting society's values and giving proper weight to the harm done to the victims' ([24]).

Charges: Arson, Assault

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant suffered from depression and became abusive and intimidating towards his wife. After she ended the relationship, the appellant became angry and upset. He cornered his wife in a shed, pushed her to the chest, grabbed her around the throat and squeezed for four seconds, causing her to become very fearful. The appellant asked to see his four children. His wife then walked with him to the car, got in and locked the doors before attempting to drive off and call the police. However, the appellant grabbed the vehicle and punched the window, which caused it to shatter. His wife then attended her children's school. Meanwhile, the appellant poured methylated spirits onto the main bedroom of their house, set fire to the bed and left knowing the bed was on fire. The house was damaged beyond repair. An insurance claim was denied. The impact of the offending on the appellant's wife and children was very significant. He was sentenced to four years and six months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two years and nine months.

Issues:

1. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. Whether the trial judge erred by placing too much weight on general deterrence given the appellant's mental health condition.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of issue 1.

1. The appellant submitted that various mitigating factors existed ([39]) and that the sentence was outside the range of permissible sentences for arson. Further, the appellant submitted that the assault was brief and no physical harm was caused. The respondent conceded that the assault would not add to a sentence imposed for arson, but submitted that it was relevant as a course of conduct and to demonstrate the appellant's attitude towards his wife ([44]). Porter J (with whom Wood J and Tennent J agreed) held that while the head sentence was very high, it was not outside the permissible range: 'The appellant intentionally set fire to the house and intentionally caused its entire destruction. His motive for doing so was to exact some sort of vengeance on his estranged wife intending to destroy his wife's interest in the building and its availability as a home'…'This was obsessive and possessive conduct, involving some violence, committed in the aftermath of a broken relationship. It is the type of conduct which simply cannot be tolerated' ([52]-[53]).

   Nevertheless, the non-parole period was found to be excessive. Porter J noted that in considering the length of a non-parole period, the issue is whether the period makes the sentence manifestly excessive, '"sentence" in this context, being used in a broader sense' ([56]). The non-parole period amounted to a little over 60% of the head sentence. Given factors such as the appellant's prior good character, his mental health condition and apparent remorse ([60]), the non-parole period made the overall sentence manifestly excessive and was therefore reduced to one half of the head sentence.

2. The appellant submitted that his psychiatric condition affected his ability to properly consider the consequences of his actions, such that it was inappropriate for general deterrence to remain a large consideration in sentencing. Porter J (with whom Tennent J and Wood J agreed) held that notwithstanding the psychiatric condition, mood disorders are reasonably common in the community. As such, the sentencing judge was correct to conclude that the appellant was, 'an appropriate vehicle by which to convey a message to the general community about the seriousness and likely consequences of this type of offending'.

Enniss v Tasmania [2012] TASCCA 10 (2 October 2010) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Assault' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - strangulation' – 'Risk factor - weapon' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality'

Charge: Assault (five counts)

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant lived intermittently with his partner (the complainant). The first count occurred when, during an argument, the appellant grabbed the complainant by the throat, forced her to the floor, punched her to the head multiple times and kicked her to the hip as she tried to stand up. The second assault occurred when the complainant was in her three-year-old child's bed. The appellant pointed a knife at the complainant and threatened to stab her if she did not give him her phone (i.e. an assault by means of a threatening gesture). The child remained asleep throughout the incident. The next count occurred when the appellant kicked the complainant between the legs twice, which caused her to fall to the floor. The final count was again an assault by means of a threatening gesture and involved the appellant sharpening knives and threatening to kill or violently assault the complainant. The appellant was arrested but escaped on arrival at the police station and was not found until 10 days later. While the complainant did not suffer serious physical injuries, there were lasting psychological consequences for her and her daughter. The appellant had a significant criminal history. He was sentenced to three years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of two years. Before being sentenced for these offences, he was sentenced to another 3 years' imprisonment (with a two-year non-parole period) in respect of 50 unrelated offences. This resulted in an aggregate sentence of six years' imprisonment with a four-year non-parole period.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. 'The ordeal that the appellant inflicted on his partner was horrific. He had many opportunities to desist from assaulting her, but did so over and over again, with their young daughter in the house. It was an unusually bad case of family violence. The only appropriate penalty was a significant cumulative sentence of imprisonment.' ([20]).

Counsel for the appellant submitted that the fact the appellant was unlikely to be granted parole (even if eligible) should have been taken into account in his favour. The Court rejected this argument, holding that this is not an appropriate consideration in determining the sentence. However, the magistrate imposed the two-year non-parole period for the assault offences so as to not impose a crushing sentence. If the head sentence of three years was 'crushing', a non-parole period should not be regarded as changing that situation because parole may not be granted. Given the length of the sentence in combination with the fact that the complainant suffered no physical injuries, the head sentence was disproportionate to the gravity of the offending and the aggregate term was also disproportionate. The appellant was re-sentenced for the assault offences to 18 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 12 months.

Braslin v Tasmania* [2011] TASCCA 14 (13 October 2011) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Admission of guilt' – 'Arson' – 'Circumstantial evidence' – 'Directions and warnings for/to jury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - separation'

Charge: Arson

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction

Facts: The appellant was tried by jury and found guilty of arson purely on the basis of circumstantial evidence. It was alleged that he unlawfully set fire to the house of his former female partner. She gave evidence that the night before the fire the appellant slept over at her place. She and the appellant argued the next morning as she was leaving the property. He called her a 'leg-opening slut' and said that if she left he was going to burn the house down. She left and not long after received a phone call from the appellant who asked whether she was 'warm enough'. She returned home to find the house on fire. Evidence was also given by a neighbour that he heard the appellant and his former partner arguing that morning for 10 minutes. He ignored the argument and did not claim to have seen the appellant on the morning of the fire.

Before trial, the appellant pleaded guilty to breaching a family violence order on the day of the fire by approaching his former partner and calling her a ‘leg-opening cunt’. The Crown alleged that this amounted to an admission of guilt. At trial, the appellant asserted that he did not realise the significance of this date and that he had used those words but not on the day of the fire. The appellant’s younger sister provided the appellant with an alibi. She said he was asleep at their mother’s place on the morning of the fire.

Issues: Some of the grounds of appeal were:

1. Whether the trial judge failed to correct the prosecution’s lack of adherence to the ‘rule’ in Browne v Dunn.
2. Whether the trial judge failed to give an adequate warning in relation to the neighbour’s voice identification evidence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld and the conviction set aside.

1. ‘In the context of a criminal trial, the "rule" in Browne v Dunn (1893) 6 R 67 requires defence counsel to put to a Crown witness in cross-examination the case upon which the accused proposes to rely, to the extent that it is proposed to contradict the evidence of the Crown witness. Similarly, if it is proposed, as part of the defence case, to lead evidence of a fact which, if true, would be within the knowledge of a Crown witness, it is usually expected, at least in this State, that defence counsel will put that part of the defence case to the Crown witness in cross-examination’ ([21]). Here, the Crown did not do this and sought to rely on such evidence in summing up. The trial judge did not correct this mistake in her directions to the jury and further she incorrectly directed the jury that they should be careful about the appellant’s sister’s evidence.
2. The direction that the jury had ‘to clearly be careful’ about the identification evidence from the neighbour fell short of informing the jury that there was a ‘special need for caution.’ The trial judge said nothing about the reasons for that caution namely, the conviction of innocent persons as a result of mistaken identification by an apparently honest witness ([34]-[35]).

Legal Profession Board of Tasmania v W* [2023] TASFC 1 (17 March 2023) – Tasmanian Supreme Court (Full Court)

'Legal practitioner' – 'Offer to settle dispute by withdrawal of complaints to police' – 'Professional misconduct' – 'Protection order' – 'Unprofessional conduct'

Proceeding: Legal Profession Board appeal from finding of mere unprofessional conduct by a legal practitioner.

Grounds:

1. The primary judge erred in holding that for a finding of professional misconduct both s 421(1)(a) and (c) of the Legal Profession Act 2007 (Tas) had to be satisfied;
2. The primary judge erred in failing to make a declaration of professional misconduct having found that the respondent's conduct constituted a serious failure to reach a standard of competence and diligence.

Facts: A client of the respondent was charged with two counts of common assault against his former wife who had been granted a protection order against the client.

The lawyer wrote to the complainant on behalf of his client, offering to settle their matrimonial property dispute on terms which included that "all legal pursuits and accusations cease including Tas. Police. All matters are then resolved, finalised". The client was charged with perversion of justice. Despite this, the respondent wrote to the ex-wife's lawyer offering again to settle the matrimonial dispute upon the withdrawal of the complaints. Senior counsel for the respondent conceded ground 1.

Reasoning and decision:

1. Appeal allowed.
2. Declaration of unprofessional conduct set aside.
3. Declaration of guilt of professional misconduct made.

Estcourt J observed:

[1] I do not have the slightest doubt that it is professional misconduct for a lawyer to offer to settle a client's dispute with another person on the condition that the other person withdraw a criminal complaint that person has made against the client and which is pending before a court.

Estcourt J found that the gravity of the respondent's attempt to have pending charges withdrawn or undermined constituted a "substantial failure to reach or maintain a reasonable standard of competence" within the meaning of s421(a) of the Legal Profession Act 2007 (Tas). This was regardless of the client's instructions or whether the offers amounted to a crime.

The court rejected the primary judge's reasoning that the two paragraphs in s421 were to be read conjunctively. However, it was found that even if that were correct, the conduct would still amount to professional misconduct (per Porter AJ at [33].

PQR v Sundram* [2020] TASFC 10 (4 December 2020) – Tasmanian Supreme Court (Full Court)

'Appeal against conviction' – 'Family law' – 'Federal circuit court order' – 'Inconsistency' – 'Meaning of "parental responsibility"' – 'Protection orders'

Charges: Breaches of police family violence order, breach condition of bail.

Proceedings: Appeal against breaches of police family violence order.

Facts: The appellant and his former wife had separated, and had two children. In 2014, the Federal Circuit Court made parenting orders which included provision for "equal shared parental responsibility", and designated contact days. In 2018, police issued and served the appellant with a family violence order. This prohibited the appellant being within 50 m of the children (para 3), except in accordance with a court order (para 3(c)). It also prohibited the appellant being within 50 m of the children's school where the children "may be present from time to time" (para 11). The appellant was charged with a number of breaches.

The Chief Justice dismissed charges relating to circumstances where the appellant was within 50 m of the children during contact periods allowed by the parenting orders and when the children were not present at the school. The Chief Justice found a charge proven, imposing a fine without recording a conviction, for an instance where the appellant attended the school on a non-contact day to speak to the principal while the child was there. The visit did not fall within the exception in para 3(c) of the family violence order, and breached para 11.

Grounds of appeal: The appellant's conduct in attending at the school on 24 July 2018 was permitted by the "Parenting Orders" made by the Federal Circuit Court which effectively restored the appellant his full rights as their father, including by having equal shared parental responsibility and a substantial and significant role in their lives, such that it cannot have been in breach of the police family violence order. There was inconsistency between the family violence orders and the parenting orders in the Federal Circuit Court and the orders of the Federal Circuit Court prevailed to the exclusion of the family violence order which underpinned the finding of guilt.

Held: The appeal was dismissed (Martin AJ, Pearce J agreeing). Martin AJ rejected the broad proposition that any constraint on the appellant's ability to visit the school, at any time, necessarily created a relevant inconsistency between the parenting orders and the family violence order. Para 11 only applied when a child "may be present" and was not relevantly inconsistent with the appellant's obligations (and rights) pursuant to the parenting order (at [47]-[49]).

In separate reasons and also agreeing with Martin AJ, Estcourt J also dismissed the appeal. While the family violence orders might "detract" from the appellant's unqualified "parental responsibility" by limiting the means by which the appellant might communicate with teachers while the children were at school, those orders did not abrogate or nullify the appellant's parental responsibilities. It could not be said that there was any relevant inconsistency between them and the parenting orders, or that the police family violence orders were incapable of operating "subject to" the Federal Circuit Court orders (at [15]-[17]).

Director of Public Prosecutions (Acting) v J C N* [2015] TASFC 13 (27 November 2015) – Tasmanian Supreme Court (Full Court)

'Aggravated assault' – 'Assault' – 'Bail' – 'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Exposing children' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'History of abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - separation'

Charges: Attempted aggravated assault, Breach of family violence order, Common assault, Damaging property

Appeal type: Appeal against order for bail

Facts: The respondent and the complainant had previously been in a relationship for more than two years. The complainant had two children. A family violence order was made against the respondent, restraining him from threatening, harassing or assaulting the complainant. On one occasion when the complainant went to the respondent's house with her daughter and mother, the respondent seriously assaulted her and her mother. He was charged with two counts of assault and breaching the family violence order and was granted bail. Subsequently, the respondent breached the conditions of bail and the order when the complainant and her children stayed with him. After fighting the next morning, the respondent followed the complainant into shopping centre toilets, kicked in the door and punched her in the face twice. An interim family violence order was then made with a condition that he would not contact the complainant. In breach of that order, the respondent phoned the complainant seven times from prison. The respondent was sentenced for these offences to four months' imprisonment and a new family violence order was made to protect the complainant and her children.

Just after a month after his release, the respondent seriously assaulted another female, his former partner, and was held in custody. While in custody, he phoned the complainant 19 times. He was then granted bail. After interviewing the complainant, the police discovered that the respondent had assaulted the complainant's daughter by grabbing her bottom. He also threw a bar stool at the complainant and her son, striking him on the leg. The respondent then forced the complainant's pants down and attempted to insert a plastic vibrator into her anus, witnessed by the two children. He then punched her five times in the face, bit her ear and pushed a hot cigarette butt into her forehead. The next morning the respondent emptied the complainant's daughter's school bag onto the floor and stomped on it, threatening 'This is going to be your face'. He then grabbed her hair and pushed her against the wall. The respondent then threatened the complainant's son that he would kill him, his sister and the complainant if the police were notified of the assaults.

In relation to this conduct, the respondent was charged with 35 counts of breaching the family violence order, one count of assault with indecent intent, five counts of common assault, three counts of damaging property, and one count of attempted aggravated assault. The respondent was granted bail, having satisfied the court that bail would not adversely affect the safety, wellbeing and interests of an affected person or child under s 12 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas).

Issue: Whether the order for bail should be set aside.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was allowed and the order for bail was revoked.

In favour of granting bail was that the respondent's mother and father were both ill. His mother was prepared to offer a surety of $4,000 to secure his attendance at court and compliance with bail conditions. The respondent agreed to comply with a curfew and reporting conditions. However, there was a significant risk he would continue to offend if bail was granted when considering his history of breaching court orders and violent offending. There was also a considerable amount of evidence to prove guilt once at trial.

Supreme Court

Smith v Boarder [2022] TASSC 30 (16 May 2022) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Costs of unsuccessful application to extend protection order' – 'Discretion to order costs s34 family violence act 2004 (tas)' – 'Protection order' – 'Relevance of objects of family violence act 2004 (tas) to costs order' – 'Separation'

Proceedings: Motion for costs for unsuccessful application to extend protection order pursuant to Family Violence Act 2004 (the Act), s 34.

Facts: On 19 February 2020 an interim protection order was granted to Ms Boarder. At the hearing of Ms Boarder's application to extend the protection order for a further 3 years leave was refused, the interim order revoked and, following a further hearing on the issues, Mr Smith's application for costs refused. The Magistrate held that the was no change in circumstances and the only contact between the parties during the term of the interim order was a letter delivered to Ms Boarder by Mr Smith, "which contained nothing which could reasonably be construed as abusive, threatening, intimidating or coercive"[8]. Both parties had been represented by counsel at the extension hearings.

Grounds of motion to review: The magistrate erred in dismissing the costs application in that:

(a) she took into account irrelevant matters, namely:

1. Ms Boarder 's subjective fear and psychological state; and
2. the objects of the Act as stated in s 3; and

(b) she acted on a wrong principle by misdirecting herself that "a holistic approach, rather than a compensatory approach, should be taken to the issue of whether costs should be ordered." [11]

Decision and Reasoning: Motion allowed; order of magistrate set aside; Ms Boarder is to pay Mr Smith's costs of the application for extension of a family violence order in the agreed sum.

The objects of the Act in s3 were relevant considerations but Ms Boarder's demeanour while giving evidence, was, without more an irrelevant consideration. There was no finding that the fear Ms Boarder expressed related to any conduct of Mr Smith while the protection order was in force.

State of Tasmania v Matthew John Davey (Sentence) [2021] TASSC unreported (10 December 2021) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Comments on passing sentence Brett J

'Allegations of infidelity' – 'Arson threats' – 'Assault' – 'Attempted murder' – 'Burning' – 'Coercive and controlling behaviour' – 'Coercive control' – 'Extensive criminal history' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Immolation' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Persistent family violence' – 'Sentencing' – 'Severe physical injuries' – 'Threats to kill'

Charges: Attempted murder x 1; persistent family violence x 1.

Proceedings: Comments on passing sentence.

Facts: The male defendant was found guilty of persistent family violence and attempted murder. Throughout the defendant's two-year relationship with the female victim, he used physical violence, verbal abuse, and threats as part of a 'continuous… pattern of coercive control'. This included threatening to kill the victim by setting her car or house on fire, and slapping, striking or hitting the victim with objects. The defendant monitored and controlled the victim's movements, communications and relationships with others, threatening to kill her if she left the relationship and detaining her at his house on at least two occasions. One assault occurred in relation to the defendant making allegations of infidelity, another after the defendant had consumed illicit drugs. The defendant attempted to murder the victim by using petrol to set her on fire during a physical altercation triggered by her attempting to leave the relationship. The victim was left with severe and lifelong physical injuries and post-traumatic stress disorder.

Issues: Sentencing.

Decision and Reasoning: The defendant was sentenced to 22 years and three months imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 14 years and 3 months, and the court made a family violence order for an indefinite period from date of sentencing.

In sentencing, Brett J considered denunciation, general and specific deterrence and community protection as key considerations due to the defendant's 'concerning history of violent offending' and the court's duty to 'respond strongly' to family violence. His Honour considered the defendant's extensive criminal record and history of drug-abuse and noted that he was 'entitled to some mitigation for the utilitarian value of pleading guilty to the persistent family violence charge', which avoided a lengthy trial. In addressing the principle of totality, His Honour viewed it as appropriate for the defendant to serve each indictment cumulatively as each offence was 'separate and distinguishable'. His Honour considered time spent in custody and reduced the defendant's sentence accordingly. Finally, His Honour explained that the non-parole period was greater than the statutory minimum because of 'the objective seriousness of the crimes', the defendant's 'moral culpability' and other key sentencing considerations.

State of Tasmania v Levi Joseph David Hall (Sentence) [2021] TASSC unreported (27 September 2021) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Comments on passing sentence Pearce J

'Breach of protection order' – 'Coercive control' – 'Controlling behaviour' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Persistent family violence' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation' – 'Technology facilitated abuse' – 'Threats to kill'

Charges: Persistent family violence x 1; breaching a police family violence order x 5.

Proceedings: Comments on passing sentence.

Facts: The male defendant lived with the female victim and her children for 12-months. The defendant entered pleas of guilty. Throughout their relationship, the defendant used 'violence, intimidation, threats and abuse' towards the victim in the context of his 'generally violent, abusive and controlling behaviour. The defendant monitored and controlled the victim's phone use, controlled when she left the house, and subjected her to physical violence in the presence of her children. On one occasion, the defendant strangled and threatened to kill the victim. A family violence order made in May 2019, was immediately breached by finding the victim, taking her to his friend's house, and holding her there while subjecting her to physical abuse.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: The defendant was sentenced to imprisonment for 5 ½ years, with a non-parole period of 3 ½ years.

Pearce J viewed the defendant's behaviour as a serious example of the crime of persistent family violence. His Honour highlighted that the offending included strangulation, which caused the victim to fear for her life and has had a 'profound' and lasting 'psychological impact'. His Honour viewed the defendant's repeated offending as discounting 'any claim to… genuine remorse…', and the fact that the offending was 'committed in breach of a police family violence order' as evidence of his 'repeated refusal to comply with the law and… contempt of authority'. In sentencing, Pearce J considered the need for punishment and condemnation, and viewed the defendant's 'long and concerning record for violence… against women in particular' as an 'important factor in sentencing'. His Honour also considered the need to vindicate the victim and protect the community by imposing a sentence that achieved specific and general deterrence.

State of Tasmania v ARJ (Sentence) [2021] TASSC unreported (11 March 2021) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Comments on passing sentence Pearce J

'Allegations of infidelity' – 'Assault' – 'Coercive and controlling behaviour' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Extensive criminal history' – 'History of family violence' – 'Jealous behaviour' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Persistent family violence' – 'Pregnancy' – 'Rape' – 'Sentencing' – 'Stepchildren' – 'Threat to cause abortion'

Charges: Persistent family violence x 1, constituting 16 unlawful family violence offences: one rape, one assault of a pregnant woman and 14 assaults.

Proceedings: Comments on passing sentence.

Facts: The male defendant was found guilty following jury trial. The 16 offences constituting the charge were committed over 9 occasions during the defendant's two-and-a-half-month relationship with his pregnant younger female partner. The defendant's conduct began soon after the relationship started, and 'was characterised by ongoing domineering conduct, torment and the exercise of power, control and intimidation'. The assaults included striking with a hammer, baseball bat and power cord, burning with a cigarette, and threats to cut with glass in addition to assaults without weapons. The rape was constituted by the forcible penetration of the victim's genitalia by striking with a baseball bat and the assault of a pregnant woman was the attempt to stomp on the victim's stomach with the stated intent to cause an abortion. Some of the offending occurred in the presence of the victim's children. The defendant had a history of family violence and drug abuse. The defendant was sentenced to 6 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of four years, and the court imposed a family violence order to remain in force for 7 years from the date of sentencing.

Issues: Sentencing.

Decision and reasoning: The defendant was sentenced to 6 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of four years, and the court made a family violence order for 7 years from the date of sentencing.

Pearce J considered the offending in the context of the defendant's criminal record, which included family violence offences, assaults, and breaches of family violence orders. His Honour considered the ongoing psychological impact of the offending on the victim, and the need for punishment, general and personal deterrence, vindication of the victim, and protection of the community'. 'All of the offences were committed when you were subject to a family violence order… and while you were subject to electronic monitoring, thus displaying your contempt for the law and to court orders.'

Hopkinson v Wilkie* [2020] TASSC 32 (3 July 2020) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault in a domestic setting' – 'Consent' – 'Motion to review conviction'

Charges: Common assault.

Proceedings: Motion to review conviction by Magistrate.

Facts: The male applicant was found guilty of assaulting his female partner. The Magistrate found that the applicant hit the complainant in the head, pulled her hair and dragged her. The complainant kicked the defendant. The complainant gave evidence that she had a 'mutual argument' with the applicant and was not punched. Shelton (a witness to the incident) gave evidence that the applicant punched the complainant during a 'verbal argument between them'. The magistrate accepted Shelton's evidence and did not accept the complainant's evidence or the applicant's argument that there was consent, stating that a defence of consent 'doesn't apply to victims of domestic violence'.

Ground: The Magistrate erred in law in stating the defence of consent does not apply in the context of domestic violence.

Decision and reasoning: Motion to review dismissed.

As a matter of statutory construction, provisions relating to consensual violence as a defence do not include a 'carve-out … for any category or class of cases such as domestic violence cases' [34]. As a general statement of law, the defence of consent does not avail the applicant if 'there either was no consent or if there was, the complainant did not consent to the degree of force involved in the assault' [28]. Based on the magistrate's findings of fact, the defence of consent was excluded.

Baker v Barratt [2019] TASSC 28 (4 July 2019) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Administrative law' – 'Appeal against conviction' – 'Appeal and review' – 'Apprehended bias' – 'Coercive control' – 'Isolation' – 'Judicial review' – 'Motion to review' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Procedural error of magistrate in not playing record of interview in open court' – 'Procedure and evidence' – 'Visa threats'

Case type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The applicant man appealed against his conviction on a charge of common assault on the ground that the court erred in convicting him against "the preponderance of the evidence". The complainant, a Philippino woman who was applying for a visa, told the court that she had an argument with the applicant with whom she was in a relationship. During the course of the argument, she alleged that he slapped her in the face, twisted her arm and pushed her to the floor. He then allegedly tried to kick her. She also gave evidence that she rang a friend after the incident. The friend confirmed that this call was made and that the complainant had told him that she had been assaulted. He took photos of her for the purposes of recording the consequences of the assault. These were tendered along with the applicant's record of interview. The applicant admitted in his video interview that he regularly threatened to withdraw support for the complainant's Visa and controlled her access to a mobile telephone and the Magistrate identified this as evidence of the applicant's controlling behaviour. The applicant denied the assault.

Issue: The issue for the Court was whether the Magistrate reasonably came to his conclusion on the evidence at trial.

Held: Geason J found that the applicant failed to establish that the Magistrate's conclusion was not reasonably open to him. It was noted that the evidence was "of narrow compass" in that the applicant and complainant had engaged in a physical argument, evidenced by the bruising shown in the photographic evidence. Moreover, the Magistrate's conclusions and reasons were found to be unimpeachable, and he was entitled to prefer the complainant's evidence. This was because the complainant's evidence was unshaken in cross-examination and corroborated in material respects by a third party ([13]-[15]).

A further issue on appeal was that of apprehended bias. Whilst the Magistrate had a familial relationship with the complainant's employer, Geason J concluded that there was nothing in the conduct of the case or the reasons for the decision which gave the appearance of any pre-judgment based on that relationship ([21]).

Geason J also noted that the applicant's record of interview was not played in court in its entirety, such that not all evidence was heard in open court prior to the court reaching its decision ([24]). The Magistrate elected to read the transcript of the interview rather than listen to it in full. His Honour was highly critical of this practice, emphasising that all evidence relied upon to prove a case should be heard in open court, and that the transcript itself was not evidence. The Magistrate ran the risk that something material to the case was not "seen" ([27]). Whilst this was considered to be an error, it did not give rise to any miscarriage of justice.

Irons v Moore* [2019] TASSC 22 (22 May 2019) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Application of Weissensteiner' – 'Consent and disclosure' – 'Evidence issues' – 'Hostile witness'

Charges: Assault x 1; Breach of protection order x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The facts of both charges were the same: the appellant grabbed and punched the complainant in front of her children ([3]).

While giving evidence, the complainant claimed that she could not remember what happened on the day. The prosecution successfully applied to treat her as a hostile witness ([3]). The evidence was limited to circumstantial evidence and hearsay evidence of witnesses who saw the complainant's injuries immediately after the assault ([4]). The magistrate found the appellant guilty of both charges and imposed a fine.

Issues: The sole ground of review is that on no reasonable view of the evidence could the magistrate have been satisfied of the appeallant's guilt.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

The principle in Weissensteiner v The Queen [1993] HCA 65 was considered, namely that a 'hypotheses consistent with innocence may cease to be rational or reasonable in the absence of evidence to support them when that evidence, if it exists at all, must be within the knowledge of the accused' ([20]). In this case, while the complainant had given evidence, she could not remember what happened. Therefore, the only person who could have known how the injuries were inflicted was the defendant ([21]).

> 'In the light of the evidence that force had been applied by the applicant to the complainant and in the absence of any contradictory or explanatory evidence from the applicant, I am satisfied that the application of force in lawful self-defence was not available to the magistrate as a reasonable possibility or hypothesis consistent with innocence.' [24]

Cannell v G; G v Cannell [2018] TASSC 55 (1 November 2018) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Breach of protection order' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Meaning of harass' – 'Mens rea' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Safety and protection of victims and witnesses' – 'Systems abuse'

Charges: Trespass x 1; Making a false report to police x 1; Contravening an interim family violence order x 3.

Case type: Prosecution seeking review of dismissal of charges; defendant seeking review of charge proved.

Facts: The defendant and complainant were separated. The evidence in this case was contested by both parties.

The trespass charge occurred when the defendant entered the complainant's house and did not leave when asked. The false report charge occurred when the defendant alleged that the complainant had struck him in the chest while she was telling him to leave. The first contravention charge occurred when the defendant approached the complainant in the Federal Circuit Court building. The complainant alleged that the defendant said 'you're all going down'. The magistrate was not satisfied that those words were spoken, but even if they were, they did not constitute a threat. The second contravention charge occurred when the defendant parked his car next to the complainant's car during a handover of one of the children. The magistrate found that the defendant breached the order and that was no exception in the contact arrangement that would have allowed this ([39]). The third contravention charge occurred when the defendant approached the complainant on numerous occasions to serve her with an application for a restraining order ([43]).

Issues: Whether the Magistrate's decisions were reasonably open on the evidence and whether the Magistrate gave adequate reasons.

Decision and reasoning: Brett J affirmed all the magistrate's decisions.

Note: in relation to the third contravention of the restraining order, the defendant argued that the prosecution had not proved the 'mental element' of the charge because he did not intend to harass the complainant but rather serve her with legal processes. Brett J discussed the statutory definition of the word harass, which includes following the person or keeping the person under surveillance ([48]). His Honour considered that "there is no requirement that the defendant intend or otherwise foresee the causation of [an effect on the person harassed, eg worry, fear or mental anguish]" ([60]).

> 'The evidence overwhelmingly supported the magistrate's conclusion that the defendant had harassed the complainant by following her, and that following her was deliberate and intentional…. Whilst the service of documents on the complainant was a legitimate purpose, it did not justify conduct on the part of the defendant that was in breach of the order. It goes without saying that there were other ways of achieving that legitimate purpose which did not involve contravention of the family violence order.' [63]

His Honour considered that this construction is consistent with the relevant legislation, that is, to protect likely victims of family violence from likely perpetrators of that violence ([61]).

Harrison v Moore* [2018] TASSC 53 (19 October 2018) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Breach of protection order' – 'Evidence' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'oath on oath case' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Technology-facilitated domestic and family violence' – 'trivial breach'

Charges: Common assault x 2; Contravention of an interim family violence order x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The complainant and applicant had two young children. The assault charges occurred on one day where the complainant alleged that the applicant punched the complainant in the face and kicked her in the head ([5]-[6]). The breach of the interim family violence order occurred when the applicant sent the complainant 4 text messages asking about her and the children ([26]).

The applicant gave evidence at the Magistrates Court trial alleging that he was acting in self-defence. The magistrate accepted the complainant's evidence over the applicant's ([10]).

Issues: Whether the finding of guilt was not reasonably open to the magistrate as a matter of law; whether the magistrate should have applied the principle of 'de minimis non curat lex' (the law should not concern itself with trifles).

Decision and reasoning: All grounds of appeal was dismissed.

There were 3 grounds of appeal in relation to the assault charge. Ground 1 of the appeal was that the finding of guilt was not reasonably open to the magistrate as a matter of law because the magistrate said she substantially accepted the complainant's version of events but accepted aspects of the applicant's version as well. This ground was rejected because the magistrate was entitled to do so ([14]-[15]).

In relation to the breach of the interim family violence order, the ground of appeal was that the magistrate should have applied the principle of 'de minimis non curat lex'. This was because the magistrate found that sending the messages constituted breaches that were 'trivial at best'. However, Brett J stated that the principle of 'de minimis' is likely not applicable in criminal proceedings ([33]). In any event, it was not applicable in this case because the Magistrate's reference to 'trivial' should be seen as an indication of the relative seriousness of the breaches compared to other examples of that offence, not that the direct contact with the complainant was a trivial matter ([34]).

Bonde v Maney* [2018] TASSC 23 (17 May 2018) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault' – 'Dismissal of charges' – 'Evidence of respondent'

Charges: Common assault x 1.

Case type: Application for review of Magistrate's decision to dismiss charge.

Facts: The complainant alleged that the respondent tried to grab the complainant's car keys from her, injuring her fingers in the process ([3]). The respondent denied assaulting the complainant and alleged that the complainant injured her fingers when she was trying to retrieve her keys ([4]). After the prosecution case closed, the Magistrate immediately moved to judgement without giving the respondent the opportunity to give evidence ([5]). The Magistrate dismissed the charge of assault on the basis that she was not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the respondent deliberately or recklessly caused the injury ([5]).

Issues: The complainant argued that the magistrate erred in law by:

- first, stating that the respondent must have intended the injuries for the charge of assault to be made out;
- second, failing to give sufficient reasons as to why she was not satisfied that the charge was proven; and
- third, dismissing the complaint when on no reasonable view of the evidence could the learned magistrate have failed to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the guilt of the respondent.

Decision and Reasoning: The first ground was upheld because the causation of injury is not an element of assault ([7]-[8]). The second ground was also upheld because it was not possible to discern from the Magistrate's reasons the factual basis for the determination ([15]). Therefore, it was not necessary to consider the third ground ([16]).

The case was remitted to be determined by another Magistrate ([20]).

Moore v Rittman* [2018] TASSC 5 (13 February 2018) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Conviction not recorded' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Perpetrator interventions' – 'Self-represented litigant' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Assault x 2; Breaching a police family violence order x 1.

Appeal type: Prosecution appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent and the aggrieved, his partner, were in a relationship and had 2 children. The assaults occurred on two occasions when the respondent choked his partner, causing her to lose breath and bruising ([4]). A police family violence order was made, requiring him to not return to the home where his partner and children were living ([5]). The police later found the respondent in the home [(6]). The respondent pleaded guilty to all charges ([7]). The respondent had no criminal history and had independently sought out participation in a men's behavioural change program.

At the sentencing hearing, the magistrate did not ask the respondent to make submissions or to provide her with information as to his personal circumstances ([9]). The magistrate, pursuant to s 7(f) of the Sentencing Act 1997 (Tas), did not record a conviction and adjourned the proceedings on the condition that the respondent be of good behaviour and complete the Men's Behaviour Change Program ([1]). The charges were recorded as family violence offences under s 13A of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) ([10]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: Justice Brett first addressed the fact that the magistrate did not allow the respondent to make submissions. His Honour at [11] noted that:

> In the case of an unrepresented defendant, it is incumbent on the magistrate to ensure that, not only is such an opportunity provided, but that the defendant is aware of his or her right to address the court, and given some assistance with respect to the nature of the matters and information which should be the subject of the plea.

Nonetheless, this error was not directly in issue so was not determinative ([12]).

His Honour next addressed the sentence. The prosecution argued that the failure to record a conviction renders the sentence manifestly inadequate ([12]). His Honour emphasised the importance of therapeutic interventions for first-time family violence offenders at [24]:

> While a punitive and protective response is essential in cases of serious and repeated family violence, it must also be consistent with the stated purpose of the legislation that consideration is given to therapeutic intervention with a view to achieving rehabilitation and behavioural change, when an offender presents before the court for the first time in respect of acts of spontaneous family violence. Prevention of future violence by use of effective strategies to modify behaviour in respect of offenders who have appropriate insight and desire for change is likely to promote the safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence.

His Honour emphasised that the good behaviour bond and conditions attached were tailored to the respondent's personal circumstances and was designed to rehabilitate the respondent and ensure that he did not reoffend ([20]). In all the circumstances, the sentence was not manifestly inadequate ([21]).

'Arrest' – 'Reasonable suspicion' – 'Responses in criminal proceedings'

Charges: Resisting a police officer in the execution of their duty x 1.

Case type: Review of Magistrate's decision to dismiss charge.

Facts: The police attended the respondent's house in response to a call from the respondent's son, who told the police that his father was 'going off' and had hit his mother. When they arrived, there were clothes strewn around the front yard. The police arrested the respondent. They gave the reason to 'investigate family violence' ([3]). The respondent struggled against the police, which gave rise to the resisting police officer charge. The Magistrate dismissed the charge on the basis that the arrest was unlawful in the first place ([4]).

Issues: Whether the Magistrate erred in dismissing the charge.

Decision and Reasoning: The Magistrate did err in dismissing the charge.

The power to arrest is derived from the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas), which requires 'a reasonable suspicion that the person concerned has committed family violence' ([27]). This is distinct from a suspicion that the person committed a family violence offence ([33]). Brett J held that there was ample evidence to support the suspicion that there had been family violence, and he had adequately communicated that fact to the respondent ([46]).

Brett J remitted the matter to be decided by the same Magistrate ([53]).

Kirkwood v Thomas* [2017] TASSC 56 (15 September 2017) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Not manifestly excessive' – 'Text messages' – 'Threats' – 'Totality' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charges: Breach of family violence order x 2.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The defendant and the complainant were separated. The order prohibited him from threatening, abusing or assaulting the complainant, but not from going to her house. The first charge related to the defendant attending her house, ringing and knocking on the doors, and calling the complainant. The second charge related to the defendant sending the complainant 8 text messages also insulting the complainant and demanding money ([2]). The magistrate sentenced the appellant to two months' imprisonment, cumulatively with a 5½ year sentence he was currently serving ([5]). That sentence related to a subsequent attack on the complainant, where the defendant broke into the complainant's house and beat her with a baseball bat, leaving her with permanent disfiguring injuries and pain ([6]-[9]).

Issues: Whether the magistrate gave insufficient weight to the principle of totality, and whether the sentence was manifestly excessive ([11]).

Decision and Reasoning: The judge had to decide first if the sentence of two months was manifestly excessive in order to conclude whether the principle of totality had been breached ([12]). It was relevant that the defendant could have been sentenced for longer than 5½ years for the attack with the baseball bat ([12]). There is usually a discount for subsequent sentences, especially because denunciation and personal deterrence may have been achieved by the first sentence ([13]). There was evidence that the appellant had undertaken some family violence and anger management programs in custody ([19]). However, in this case, a heavy sentence was warranted because there had been repeated breaches of the family violence order in the past, and family violence cases warrant tough sentences ([18]). Therefore, it was open to the magistrate to impose the cumulative sentence of two months ([22]).

Mayne v Tasmania* [2017] TASSC 38 (29 June 2017) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'General deterrence' – 'Sentence' – 'Smothering' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Common assault x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The defendant and complainant had a child together but were not living together. The complainant and defendant were arguing while the complainant was lying in bed. The defendant pushed a pillow onto her face, causing her to struggle for breath for two to five seconds ([3]). The complainant did not suffer any physical injuries. The defendant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 7 months' imprisonment ([13]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The sentence was not manifestly excessive. Wood J held that the Magistrate was right to highlight the aggravating factors of the offence, including that smothering is a dangerous act, the defendant did not stop of his own accord, and it would have been a terrifying experience for the complainant ([41]). While the sentence was high, it was appropriate to give prominence for general deterrence ([43]).

Wood J said at [43]:

> … it is important that deterrent sentences be imposed not merely for crimes that cause grave physical or psychological harm to victims. There is a need to counter the perception that somehow violence of this kind in the home is less serious than the same kind of violence inflicted on a stranger in a public place. Also, acts of violence committed in a family or domestic context causing fear and distress to victims can have debilitating effects upon their well-being or the well-being of a family member witnessing such violence. It is not only violence resulting in visible injury that must be seen as unacceptable, and these victims, as vulnerable members of our society who have experienced fear and trauma, are entitled to the court's protection.

Parker v Hall [2015] TASSC 60 (10 December 2015) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Recording a conviction' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality'

Charge: Breach of family violence order

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The respondent and complainant had been in an on-again off-again relationship for two years. A police family violence order was made against the respondent, restraining him from contacting or approaching the complainant within 50 metres. The respondent contravened this order on four separate occasions by phoning the complainant, writing her a letter expressing his affection and remorse, going camping with her, and giving her a letter conveying his desire for reconciliation. An interim family violence order was then made. The conditions of the order were substantially the same as the police family violence order. The respondent then breached this order by meeting the complainant to talk on two separate occasions. The respondent was charged and found guilty of four breaches of a police family violence order and two breaches of an interim family violence order. The magistrate adjourned the charges without conviction for 12 months on the condition that the respondent enter into a good behaviour undertaking and not commit similar offences during the period.

The respondent had previously been found guilty of breaching a police family violence order and an interim family violence order, which were also sentenced without conviction. This offending occurred during the same time period as the six charges in question. The prosecution submitted a more severe sentence would have been imposed if all the charges had been sentenced together. The respondent had no other relevant prior convictions. His conduct did not involve any threats or violence and occurred with the complainant's consent to varying degrees. Further, the respondent's counsel submitted that as a legal practitioner, he suffered more than the average citizen as a consequence of the charges.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

Despite the complainant's compliance, the respondent knew that his conduct was in breach of the orders. Further, his repeated offending of eight separate breaches increased his culpability and pointed towards the need for specific deterrence. However, the respondent's breaches, while not trivial, were not at the serious end of offending. The public interest did not favour a conviction being recorded. As a result of the media attention attracted by the matter, the respondent had already felt the consequences of his offending behaviour to a degree. If the charges were heard together with the previous two offences, the offending would not have necessarily demanded a heavier or more punitive response. Considering these factors together, Wood J concluded that there was sufficient justification for leniency extended to the respondent and the sentence was not manifestly inadequate.

Lacroix v Lacroix* [2015] TASSC 42 (3 September 2015) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Extension of family violence order' – 'Family violence order' – 'Procedural fairness'

Proceeding: Review of family violence order

Facts: A family violence order was made against the applicant on 5 March 2015, in anticipation of the expiration of another 12-month family violence order made on 7 March 2014 (the first order). The applicant made no admissions in relation to the conduct resulting in the making of the first order. On 23 February 2015 the respondent, the applicant's partner, made an application for an extension of the first order. The magistrate denied this extension but suggested the respondent lodge an application for a fresh order and said, '[The applicant] heard me say that, so he's effectively on notice that that may well occur in the course of the morning and taking care of the service requirements [sic]'. Counsel for the respondent then lodged the application for a fresh order.

Issue: Whether the applicant was denied procedural fairness because he was not served with a sealed copy of the new application filed by the respondent.

Decision and reasoning: The motion to review the order was dismissed.

The magistrate was obliged to give the applicant a reasonable opportunity to be present at the hearing of the application, to obtain legal representation, and to make submissions and dispute allegations of fact at common law. The applicant was not denied these opportunities. He was present when the magistrate directed the respondent to lodge the fresh application that would be dealt with later that day. As a result, he had an opportunity to remain at court and instruct his counsel, who was also present at the time, to prepare submissions to defend the application on his behalf. The evidence relied on by the respondent for the fresh application was the same as for the extension of time. The common law rule of procedural fairness did not require the magistrate to proceed only if the applicant was served with a sealed copy of the fresh application.

The magistrate did not err in applying the statutory requirements. Section 106E Justice Act 1959 (Tas) does not apply to family violence orders, as submitted by the applicant's counsel. Further, rule 54N(1)(a) Justices Rules 2003 (Tas) was complied with. The fresh application was served on the applicant on 11 March 2015. The rule does not require service before the family violence order is made, but as soon as practical after it is filed with the clerk.

However, the magistrate erred in making a final family violence order. He did not have authority to make such an order under s 31(7) Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas), as a sealed copy of the application had not been served on the applicant and no attempt had been made to carry out service. Despite this error, no substantial miscarriage of justice resulted. The applicant had notice of the application, when and where it would be made and the evidence to be relied upon. Further, the applicant was in court the morning of the application with a lawyer and merely needed to stay until the afternoon to defend the fresh application. Therefore, there was no procedural unfairness and no substantial miscarriage of justice.

Young v Wilson* [2015] TASSC 16 (28 April 2015) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault' – 'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Deterrence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Non-parole period' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Using carriage service'

Charges: Using a carriage service to harass, Breach of police family violence order (6 counts), Common assault

Appeal Type: Application for review of sentence

Facts: A police family violence order prohibited the applicant from approaching within 50 metres or contacting the complainant in any way. The breaches of this order involved the applicant phoning the complainant, sending her two text messages, threatening to kill her and punching her to the head and face. The punch also gave rise to the common assault charge. The carriage service offence involved the applicant phoning and sending eight menacing text messages to the complainant. The applicant had a substantial and relevant criminal history. A sentence of eight months' imprisonment was imposed. This offending also activated previously imposed suspended sentences of imprisonment. This resulted in a total effective sentence of 26 months' imprisonment with no parole eligibility.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The application was allowed.

The eight-month sentence was not excessive. The applicant had previously shown a disregard for orders made in favour of the complainant. The assault offences were serious and the applicant did not appreciate this. A deterrent sentence was needed. It was not unjust to activate two of the previous suspended sentences resulting in six months' imprisonment. However, a previous suspended term of imprisonment of 18 months for trespass, breaches of a family violence order and various traffic offences was substituted with a period of 12 months' imprisonment. This was considered too harsh, given the other sentences of imprisonment to be served by the applicant and the fact the applicant has not reoffended with respect to the driving offences. Furthermore, there was no justification for not imposing a non-parole period. The applicant's alcohol problem contributed to his ongoing offending behaviour: 'The granting of parole may encourage reformation and increase the chances of rehabilitation under supervision through conditional freedom' ([69]). He was resentenced to a total term of 18 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of nine months.

(Note also at [17]-[27] where Wood J made some general comments on the correct procedure to be followed for breaches of suspended sentences in Magistrates' Courts and at [37]-[53] which contains general consideration of totality, suspended sentences and non-parole periods).

Higgins v McCulloch* [2013] TASSC 49 (11 September 2013) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault' – 'Fines' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Perpetrator intervention program' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Recording a conviction' – 'Sentencing'

Charge: Assault

Appeal Type: Motion to review conviction and penalty

Facts: The applicant was found guilty of one count of assaulting his wife by punching her in the face. The complainant had died by the time the matter came to trial. The parties were living together in unusual circumstances and the assault occurred in a bedroom of the family home in the presence of an adult daughter. The applicant had no prior convictions. A good behaviour bond was imposed and a conviction was recorded.

Issues:

1. Whether the finding of guilt was reasonably open on the evidence.
2. Whether the magistrate erred in recording a conviction.

Decision and Reasoning: The notice to review was dismissed.

1. This argument was dismissed based on the evidence before the magistrate: see paragraphs [5]-[27].
2. At [33], Tennent J outlined the relevant issues to be considered when deciding whether to record a conviction. A court must consider the public interest, the need for an official record to be made of the commission of the offence and whether the victim might reasonably not feel vindicated by the failure to record a conviction. These factors are to be weighed against the benefits to the offender of a conviction not being recorded. This was a family violence offence. The applicant was not entitled to any discount for a guilty plea and did not display remorse. The applicant was suffering from mental health issues, which partly explained his 'bizarre' ([44]) behaviour that occurred in the background to the assault. There was nothing put before the magistrate indicating that recording a conviction would have an adverse impact on the applicant.

Tasmania v Finnegan (No 2)* [2012] TASSC 1 (19 January 2012) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Admissibility' – 'Evidence - relationship' – 'Evidence - tendency' – 'Motive' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Probative value' – 'Unlawful wounding'

Charge: Unlawful wounding

Proceeding: Ruling as to the admissibility of evidence

Facts: The accused was charged with unlawfully wounding the complainant (his partner) by striking her to the face with a glass. He pleaded not guilty. The Crown sought to lead evidence from the complainant given on a voir dire about the accused's conduct towards her on other occasions, both before and after the alleged wounding. The accused objected to the admission of some of the evidence ([6]).

Issues: Whether some of the evidence given by the complainant should be ruled inadmissible on at least one of the following bases:

1. Irrelevance;
2. Failure to satisfy the common law rule established in Pfennig v R whereby propensity or similar fact evidence is not admissible if, viewed in the context of the prosecution case, there is a reasonable view of that evidence that is consistent with innocence;
3. The danger of unfair prejudice to the accused outweighing the probative value of the evidence: s 137 Evidence Act 2001 (Tas); or
4. The probative value of the tendency evidence not substantially outweighing any prejudicial effect that it may have on the accused: s 101(2) Evidence Act 2001 (Tas)

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The evidence led from the complainant as to the conduct of the accused was admissible. It was relevant on a number of bases: as 'relationship evidence', enabling the jury to assess the evidence as to what occurred at the time of the alleged wounding; as evidence of motive (jealousy); as evidence explaining why the complainant asserted she was injured because of a fall and why there was delay in her reporting what occurred; and as tendency evidence, showing that the accused had a tendency to be jealous of anyone who had a friendship/relationship with the complainant and to be generally violent towards her ([11]-[15]).

Further, the probative value of all the evidence under consideration substantially outweighed the prejudicial effect and danger of unfair prejudice to the accused. In this regard, Blow J noted at [30]-[31]:

'In my view the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused is not great… [A] properly instructed jury, having heard all the evidence of jealousy and violence, is unlikely to be distracted from its duty of impartiality and its duty to give a true verdict in accordance with the evidence.

'In my view the evidence of jealousy has substantial probative value. Without that evidence the jury might well take the view that the accused had not given any indication of jealousy on any other occasion. If the only evidence available for the jury as to violence on other occasions was the evidence of the three charged assaults, two of which shortly preceded the first report to the police of the accused wounding the complainant with the glass, that could result in the jury overestimating the likelihood of the complainant having fabricated the critical allegations. Having regard to that factor, and to the various bases on which the evidence of violence is relevant, I consider that all the evidence of violence also has substantial probative value'.

Here, there was nothing about the facts that made it one where s101(2) or s137 [Evidence Act 2001 (Tas)] required the Pfennig test to be applied (at [32]).

Note: this decision has been overtaken by legislative changes effective 12 December 2017. See section 13B Family Violence Act 2004.

James v Tasmania* [2010] TASSC 50 (11 November 2010) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Common assault' – 'Consent' – 'Exposing children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - strangulation' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charges: Breach of a family violence order, Common assault, Driving offences, Perverting the course of justice

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The magistrate imposed three terms of imprisonment. First, the applicant was sentenced to 6 months' imprisonment, suspended after 4 four months, for charges relating to driving a motor vehicle while disqualified and driving with alcohol in his body. Second, the applicant was sentenced to 3 months' imprisonment, cumulative on the first period of imprisonment, for perverting justice by providing a false name to a police officer. Third, the applicant was sentenced to 6 months' imprisonment, suspended after 3 months, for 3 charges. These were: breaching a family violence order by sending an abusive and threatening text message to a woman protected by the order; breaching the order by telling the woman he would punch her in the head if she did not pack his property; and committing common assault by placing both hands around her neck and squeezing, threatening to bash her head in if she did not give him a telephone, grabbing her by the back of the neck, and placing his arm around her neck. The magistrate merely expressed this sentence as being 'cumulative.' If the third period of imprisonment was cumulative on both sentences, the effective sentence was 10 months' imprisonment. However, if it was cumulative only on the first sentence, the effective sentence was 7 months' imprisonment.

Issues: Whether the magistrate erred in failing to make the sentence clear and whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The lack of clarity as to the cumulative nature of the third sentence amounted to a sentencing error and the applicant was re-sentenced. The first and second periods of imprisonment imposed were not manifestly excessive. However, the sentence for the assault and the breach of the family violence order was found to be manifestly excessive. A sentence of three months' imprisonment wholly suspended was substituted. His Honour stated, '[t]he nature of the assault was not severe enough to warrant a greater punishment. His culpability for breaching the order was ameliorated by his belief, the claim to which was unchallenged, that the order no longer operated, and by the complainant reconciling and living with him since the order had been made' ([22]).

Beechey v McDonald* [2010] TASSC 47 (25 October 2010) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Conditions of orders' – 'Guilty plea - unequivocal' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charges: Breach of a family violence protection order (2 counts), Assault

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction

Facts: The male applicant pleaded guilty to two breaches of a family violence protection order and was sentenced to a wholly suspended sentence of 2 months' imprisonment. The family violence order included an order that he not enter the premises of the complainant, his wife and mother of his 4 children. On one occasion, when returning the children to the premises, the applicant entered the residence and placed some of the children's belongings inside (the first complaint – breach of a family violence protection order). The family violence order was later replaced with an order including a term that the applicant not directly or indirectly threaten, harass, abuse or assault the complainant. The applicant and the complainant agreed to spend Christmas day together. On the day, a box the applicant was carrying came into contact with the complainant. She fell over and dislocated a shoulder (the second complaint – breach of a family violence protection order by assault).

Issue: Whether the magistrate erred in accepting the applicant's plea to one of the charges as he had made assertions that were inconsistent with his plea of guilty.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. Sentencing submissions from counsel for the applicant evidenced that he denied applying force to the complainant intentionally. This was inconsistent with his plea of guilty on the second complaint. A plea of guilty must be unequivocal. The magistrate should have informed counsel for the applicant of this inconsistency ([9]-[12]).

Maingay v Seabourne* [2009] TASSC 67 (19 August 2009) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault' – 'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Conditions of orders' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - weapon' – 'Sentencing' – 'Vulnerable - new partner'

Charges: Breach of police family violence order (6 counts), Assault (2 counts), Breach of interim family violence order, Damaging property, Abuse of police

Appeal type: State appeal against sentence

Facts: The male respondent was sentenced by a magistrate in respect of numerous offences. The magistrate dealt with the offences in batches and the State sought review of a suspended sentence imposed in respect of two of these batches. The first batch of offences pertained largely to charges of stealing. More relevantly, the second batch of offences related to a number of breaches of police family violence orders. On 12 December 2005, a police family violence order was made for the protection of Cassandra Deering. The respondent breached this order by head-butting and punching Ms Deering. On 5 January 2007, a second police family violence order was made. The respondent breached this by approaching Ms Deering, damaging the car belonging to her new partner, and sending a threatening text message. A number of these breaches occurred while the respondent was on bail for earlier breaches.

On 2 October 2008, a police family violence order was made for the protection of Dana Smith. The respondent breached this order by kicking Ms Smith in the head. He also said she was lucky he did not slit her throat and that he should have snapped her neck. On 27 October 2008, an interim family violence order was made which required the respondent to immediately surrender firearms. The respondent also breached this order.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The sentence imposed in respect of the batch of offences incorporating the family violence offences was manifestly inadequate. The respondent was a repeat offender. He showed a complete disregard for the orders made to restrict his behaviour and should have felt the full effect of a deterrent sentence, notwithstanding his age and lack of a prior history. If his offending had extended only to breach by approach (potentially instigated by the protected person) the outcome would have been different. However, the respondent's offending went far beyond that; it extended to physical assaults against two separate female partners ([24]).

Her Honour noted that, 'While it is accepted that, at the time the respondent was dealt with for all of this offending, he was still a young man with no relevant prior history, the legislation pursuant to which he had been charged was enacted to protect members of the community, and in particular to protect persons in close relationships with offenders. Deterrent sentences were required to give effect to that legislation … However, in practical terms, it is impossible in my view to argue that the deterrent effect of an actual term of imprisonment is the same as that of a suspended term of imprisonment' ([23]).

The respondent was ordered to serve a period of four months' imprisonment. Although it might have been unfair in all the circumstances to impose a custodial sentence several months after his release, if the error in the sentence was not corrected, the perception would remain that the sentence imposed lacked the requisite deterrent effect ([26]-[30]).

Bradshaw v Tasmania* [2009] TASSC 22 (9 April 2009) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Deterrence' – 'Exposing children' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Unlawful assault causing bodily harm'

Charges: Unlawful act intended to cause bodily harm (2 counts), Aggravated burglary

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The male appellant had lived with the female complainant and her 7 year old daughter for over a year before the offending occurred. The relationship was violent and the complainant accordingly obtained a family violence order requiring the appellant not to threaten, harass or abuse the complainant, to keep the peace towards her, and not to damage any property at her home. The order was in place at the time of the offending. The appellant committed a series of offences against the complainant and they ceased cohabiting together. Following this, the appellant broke into the complainant's house and stabbed her twice to her right side. He took a few steps away before turning back and stabbing her again twice to her left side. The complainant was holding her daughter at the time of the attacks. The appellant was sentenced to six years' imprisonment with eligibility for parole after four years.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was rejected by all judges but with separate reasoning provided. Tennent J (with whom Porter J agreed) found that while there were mitigating factors (remorse, giving himself up, and pleading guilty), the applicant committed very deliberate acts of violence in the complainant's own home when he had no right to be there and there was a need for both personal and general deterrence ([35]-[36]). The appellant was sentenced for two particularly serious crimes. The stabbings occurred very close together but constituted two crimes because the appellant walked away and made a conscious decision to return and stab the complainant again ([33]). Further, the appellant committed a number of other offences and showed a complete disregard for orders of the court. He caused significant, long-term physical and psychological damage to both the complainant and her daughter ([34]).

In a separate judgment, Evans J also held that the sentence was not manifestly excessive in light of the totality of the appellant's criminal conduct. The appellant's criminal conduct was particularly serious. It was not impulsive. He went to the complainant's home intending to inflict harm and acted in contravention of both a bail condition and a family violence order. One of the wounds he inflicted could have been fatal. The appellant also had prior convictions for violence and carrying weapons. His attack had a profound adverse impact on the complainant ([13]-[14]).

Tasmania v R D P* [2009] TASSC 72 (25 February 2009) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Exposing children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Police family violence order' – 'Rape' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge: Rape

Proceeding: Application to adduce relationship evidence

Facts: The defendant was in a relationship with the complainant for about 14 months. The alleged offence occurred after the relationship ended. A police family violence order was in place against the defendant. The complainant arranged to attend the defendant's house to collect her belongings with her 10-year-old son and her brother. She collected her belongings and then went to the bathroom with her son where she found the defendant. There was a knife on the hand basin. The complainant informed the defendant that she did not want to have sex, but he performed oral sex on her. She exposed her breasts on his demands because she thought he might hurt her if she did not. The complainant screamed for help and tried to defend herself by kicking the defendant. The defendant then threatened to rape her anally unless she uncrossed her legs. She then uncrossed her legs and the defendant vaginally raped her. This was done in front of their child.

Issue: Whether the relationship evidence should be admitted.

Decision and Reasoning: The evidence as to the nature of the relationship was admitted, with the exception of evidence of general physical and verbal abuse unconnected with sexual activity. The evidence included general physical abuse and physical violence used to coerce the complainant into sexual intercourse, one prior occasion of non-consensual vaginal intercourse and an act of anal intercourse. Porter J held that the evidence would allow the jury to more readily assess the actions of the complainant and defendant and ascribe meaning to things said by the defendant. In particular, evidence of prior sexual intercourse without consent might serve to explain why the complainant may have displayed some acquiescence to the oral sex and the vaginal penetration. Also, evidence of prior anal penetration was relevant to the jury's assessment of why the complainant uncrossed her legs prior to vaginal penetration, given the high level of pain and discomfort the complainant suffered as a result of the earlier anal penetration. The probative value of the evidence outweighed its potential prejudice.

'Aggravating factor' – 'Assault' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Provocation' – 'Sentencing'

Charge: Common assault

Appeal Type: Motion to review sentence

Facts: The applicant was in a relationship with the victim for three years and they had one child together. The victim also had a child from another relationship. Both of these children were present during the incident. The applicant was intoxicated and swore at the victim. An argument ensued and the victim spat in his face, which the applicant claimed led to his subsequent actions. The applicant took the victim's house keys and told her to go inside before telling her to get in the car. He then smashed the car window, leaned inside and punched the victim twice to the face and four or five times to the back of the head and bit her multiple times. The police applied for a family violence order to operate for 12 months, which the applicant consented to. The applicant had a significant criminal history (though no convictions for assault) and was subject to a probation order and two suspended sentences. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

Issue: One of the issues concerned whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The motion to review was dismissed.

Porter J found that the assault was not premeditated and arose from the applicant's state of intoxication. The act of the victim spitting in the applicant's face was a provocative act and an assault in itself. No weapon was used and the complainant suffered no lasting injury. On the other hand, the assault was serious particularly given the biting. Furthermore, the presence of the two children at the time of the attack was an aggravating factor, as recognised by s 13 of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas): 'Violence witnessed by children in the domestic environment not only is distressing (usually the victim is a parent or someone in the place of a parent), but it also serves to desensitise impressionable minds to violence, and to encourage the notion that resort to violence is acceptable' ([13]).

The community has a general intolerance towards offences of violence. However, although immediate custodial sentences are appropriate for serious cases of assault, there is no prima facie position that assault offences should be punished by an immediate gaol term. The fact that the applicant was subject to the probation order and suspended prison sentences indicates that these measures did not deter the applicant from offending. 'General deterrence in relation to offences of violence is a weighty factor' ([27]). While the penalty was a relatively severe one, it did not demonstrate error having regard to the applicant's circumstances.

'Following harassing, monitoring' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnant women' – 'Rape' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge: Rape

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The respondent's relationship with the complainant ended. The complainant attempted to maintain a friendship with the respondent but he could not accept that the relationship was over. He kept coming to her home and tried to kiss and cuddle her. She would sometimes relent to avoid an argument. She was pregnant with his child at the time. On the night of the offence, he arrived at the complainant's home intoxicated. She asked him to leave but he refused. He stopped her from calling a friend. He then refused to allow her to go to the toilet, forcibly pinned her to their bed and raped her. She eventually stopped resisting and he stopped after about 5 minutes. The rape resulted in lasting psychological impacts on the complainant. The respondent had a long record of offending, including offences of violence and threatened violence. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. Crawford J (with whom Slicer and Evans JJ agreed) held that a sentence of two years is low for the crime of rape, which is 'a crime of violence, domination and degradation and it usually causes great psychological trauma to the victim. It requires a substantial sentence of imprisonment in most cases. Leniency may be extended in exceptional circumstances, but there were none in this case' ([16]). His Honour was of the view that it is conceivable that a crime committed 'during the currency of a sexual relationship' might allow some leniency, but the fact of a prior sexual relationship is not a mitigating factor and the appellant's disappointment about the relationship breakdown is not relevant to sentencing: 'In no sense was his crime an act of unrequited love.' ([16]). Evans J also noted that, 'it is significant that the respondent's criminal conduct cannot be categorised as an impetuous response to the break-up of his relationship with the complainant and a manifestation of his love for her. His conduct over the period of in excess of an hour after she first asked him to leave bears all the hallmarks of an assertion of physical and sexual dominion over the complainant' ([23]). The respondent was re-sentenced to three years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months.

'Assault' – 'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Just punishment' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge: Assault (two counts)

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant was in an 'up and down' relationship with the complainant that was marked with arguments and assaults. On the day of the offence, the appellant attended the complainant's home. An argument occurred and the complainant said she wanted to sort out the issues in the relationship. She stood in the doorway, preventing the appellant from leaving. The argument continued and the appellant grabbed the complainant and threw her backwards out of the way. The appellant then followed the complainant into their bedroom and shoved his motorcycle helmet into her chest, knelt on her chest and shouted in her face. The appellant later returned to the house and took her a glass of water. The assaults aggravated an existing unknown spinal condition and the complainant had to undergo surgery and suffered temporary and permanent disabilities. There were also lasting psychological impacts. The appellant had no relevant criminal history. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 6 months.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld on the basis of another ground of appeal (that the sentencing judge had taken extraneous or irrelevant material into account). In relation to the issue of manifest excess, Underwood CJ (with whom Blow J and Tennent J agreed) stated that the key consideration was 'the extent of the appellant's criminal culpability for the consequences of his direct and intentional applications of force' because the sentencing judge sentenced on the basis the appellant was 'culpably liable' for all the consequences of his criminality ([19]). However, there were no submissions on this issue from counsel so the Court was reluctant to make a determination. In any case, it was not necessary to do so because the consequences of the appellant's criminal conduct were not reasonably foreseeable by him and the exceptional circumstances were such that the consequences should carry little weight in sentencing.

In re-sentencing the appellant, the Court held that the conduct was serious and that, 'the nature of the criminal conduct was such that a sentence of imprisonment is called for to mark condemnation of this kind of domestic violence and to punish the appellant' ([31]). However, the lack of relevant prior convictions made a 12-month sentence manifestly excessive. The appellant was re sentenced to six months' imprisonment, fully suspended on the condition that the appellant be of good behaviour for two years after his release.

Remess v Rabe* [2006] TASSC 105 (4 December 2006) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Evidence' – 'Ex parte proceedings' – 'Exposing children' – 'Hearsay' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Leave'

Appeal Type: Application for review of the making of interim family violence order

Facts: An interim family violence order (FVO) was applied for on behalf of the complainant by the manager of Victim Support Services within the Department of Justice. An interim order was made in the applicant's absence and the order was to last for 60 days.

Issues:

1a. Whether the magistrate erred in making the order when leave to make an application under the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) (the Act) had neither been sought nor granted.

1b. Alternatively, whether the magistrate erred in granting leave to make the application when the material was insufficient for that purpose.

2. Whether the magistrate erred in making an interim order because the evidence contained in the application was entirely hearsay.

Decision and Reasoning: The application was dismissed.

1a. The applicant submitted that the victim support officer was a person who was required to seek leave under s 15(2)(d) of the Act such that magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear the application without leave being granted. Tennent J held that a grant of leave was not a pre-condition to jurisdiction, and that s 15 merely provides for the procedure of the classes of persons who may make an application for an FVO.

1b. Counsel for the applicant conceded that the application for the order was an interlocutory proceeding. Under s 75 of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas), the hearsay rule does not apply as long as the party adducing the evidence also adduces evidence of its source. Counsel submitted that because the application did not disclose the sources of the information, the evidence was inadmissible. Therefore, there was nothing in the application upon which the magistrate could properly have considered the issue of leave.

Tennent J held that in relation to leave the Court should consider 'the position of the person seeking leave, their relationship to the affected person and whether they may have acquired knowledge of the matters the subject of the application' ([15]). In this case, the magistrate recognised the person seeking leave and that the protected person was a client of hers. Her position and relationship with her client, of itself, would have identified her as being able to provide assistance to the protected person. It was appropriate in those circumstances for the magistrate to grant leave. While leave should have been expressly addressed, a grant of leave was implicit from the conduct of the proceedings.

2. The applicant submitted that while some of the material in the application came from police reports, it was not clear whether the officers referred to were reporting from personal contact with the protected person or relying on others. Tennent J held that the protected person clearly identified her sources as two police officers. Her Honour stated that s 75 of the Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) is not limited to 'first hand hearsay'. As such, the evidence was admissible. Her Honour then commented on the making of interim orders generally at [28].

Counsel for the applicant also raised the issue of the basis on which the magistrate made an order that extended to the children of the parties. The magistrate imposed the order so as to 'err on the side of caution' but was careful to not make an order preventing the applicant form approaching his children. Tennent J held this was appropriate: 'It is well recognised that children in families where domestic violence is a factor can be affected by such violence whether or not they are directly subjected to it'. Even though there was limited material available to the magistrate, the interim nature of the order was reflected in its duration and an acknowledgment that the issue could be revisited.

Oliver v Tasmania [2006] TASSC 95 (17 November 2006) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Arson' – 'Damaging property' – 'Hardship' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Aggravated burglary (two counts), Unlawfully injuring property (two counts), Arson

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The offending related to the appellant's former partner and father of her two children. The relationship had ended acrimoniously as the appellant found out that her former partner had an affair about the time their relationship ended that resulted in the birth of a child. She broke into his home on two separate occasions and damaged it. On the first occasion she broke nine windows, destroyed a collection of vinyl records and smashed a photo frame. On the second occasion she set fire to the home and damaged the complainant's vehicle parked outside. The damage exceeded $50,000 and the contents lost had a value between $15,000 and $20,000. At the time of sentencing the appellant had three young children. She had relevant prior convictions. She was sentenced to three years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

Counsel for the appellant submitted that insufficient weight was given to the fact that the appellant was the mother of three children. However, nothing was put to the sentencing judge that suggested any particular hardship to the children arising from their mother's imprisonment. Counsel also submitted that the penalty imposed for arson was the harshest in the preceding five years. Counsel for the respondent submitted that this was a deliberate action and resulted in substantial damage. Other dwellings could have been at risk. The offending was motivated by 'significant ill will'. The appellant showed no remorse and attempted to place the blame elsewhere. The fire was lit late at night at a time when it would be expected that it would not be immediately detected. Tennent J (with whom Evans J agreed) held that the appellant's conduct could only be described as 'vindictive attacks in no way justified by what she presumably perceived as the wrongs done to her by him. The gravity of her behaviour escalated in that she went from simply smashing things to using fire, a much more dangerous tool' ([44]).

Underwood CJ (with whom Evans J agreed) held that there was nothing to indicate that the trial judge did not give appropriate weight to the fact that the appellant was a mother of three children. His Honour held that family hardship is only relevant in the 'most unusual case' ([11]). In regards to the appellant's 'tariff submission' that the sentence was the longest imposed for arson in the preceding five years, Underwood CJ noted that the appellant was sentenced for arson as well as other crimes. Further, the fact that the arson was intentional made it more serious. The appellant was neither youthful nor remorseful and this was 'calculated' conduct borne out of anger designed to cause maximum distress, such that the totality of the conduct called for a substantial sentence of imprisonment.

Re S* [2005] TASSC 89 (19 September 2005) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault' – 'Bail' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of innocence' – 'Risk assessment tool' – 'Risk factor - strangulation'

Proceeding: Application for bail

Facts: The applicant was arrested following a complaint that he assaulted his partner. She alleged that he had taken her car keys. When she asked for them back, he verbally abused her, grabbed her throat and pushed her backwards. The complainant stated that the applicant kept a gun on the property (though this was not untoward because it was a farming property with livestock) and that she lived in fear of her partner's threats. The applicant denied the allegations and stated that he did not see the complainant on the day in question. He alleged that the complainant made threats against his safety and that she made the assault complaint maliciously in an attempt to force him to pay her money. Following his arrest, an application for a family violence order (FVO) was made. The applicant had no history of violence or prior convictions. The police officer completed a 'Tasmania Police Family Violence Risk Assessment Screening Tool'. This involved a subjective assessment provided by the complainant and was part of a whole of government response to domestic and family violence instituted in Tasmania in 2004 ([18]). While the applicant was in the remand centre, the complainant called and asked to speak to the complainant. She indicated that she was willing to drop the assault charge if she was paid money that she was owed.

Issue: Whether bail should be granted.

Decision and Reasoning: Bail was granted. The Court held that various problems with duplication within the risk assessment, the mixture of protective legislation within the criminal law and the mandatory nature of the legislation meant that a court is inhibited in its assessment of future risk, especially in the case of an unrepresented defendant. There was evidence that the phone message from the complainant while the applicant was on remand could be construed, 'as a form of pressure designed to enhance a financial outcome favourable to the maker', which would be contrary to the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas). Section 12 of the Act creates a presumption against bail for a person charged with a family violence offence unless the court is satisfied that release, "would not be likely to adversely affect the safety … of an affected person". At [23], Slicer J made some general comments on the effectiveness of the statutory scheme, noting concerns that the public must have confidence in the administration of the scheme and that public confidence is diminished when an arbitrary approach is taken. By tasking the courts to assess the future risk of a person, reliable primary material must be put before the court to deal with issues such as deprivation of liberty and consequences to the family unit. Slicer J also noted the risk that, 'deprivation of liberty is seen as a sanction imposed for unproven conduct.'

The Court held that it is not possible to determine the merits of the domestic violence complaint at first instance and that it remained an issue for trial. His Honour also noted tensions between the presumption of innocence and the need to protect victims. In applying this to the facts, his Honour granted bail on the provision of a surety and the imposition of residential, geographical and contact provisions.

Olsen v State of Tasmania* [2005] TASSC 40 (13 May 2005) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault' – 'Bail' – 'Legal representation' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Unrepresented litigant'

Charge: Aggravated assault

Proceedings: Bail application

Facts: The applicant was charged with aggravated assault against his former female partner. The Crown case was that the assault consisted of a threatening gesture or gestures with a replica pistol. The applicant vehemently denied these allegations. The Crown informed the court that they would not oppose bail if the applicant was able to produce a suitable surety. The applicant suffered from schizophrenia and would benefit from the supervision of a surety to ensure he did not breach any bail conditions. However, through no fault of his own, the applicant was unable to produce a surety.

Issue: Whether the application for bail should be granted.

Decision and Reasoning: The application for bail was refused. His Honour noted that, 'Were I free of the restraints imposed by the Family Violence Act, s12, I would grant bail. I would do so because on the face of it, the assault is not a serious one, because the applicant has been in custody since 10 or 11 April, and because it will be some time before this applicant has his case heard.' His Honour further noted that the applicant had no relevant prior convictions ([3]).

However, s 12 of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) provided that the applicant not be granted bail unless his release on bail would not be likely to adversely affect the safety, well being and interests of the complainant. The onus was on the unrepresented applicant to show this but he had no idea of where the complainant was living (so as to ascertain information about her safety). In light of this and in the absence of a surety to monitor the applicant's behaviour, the application for bail was refused. His Honour concluded by stating that, 'I want to say very strongly that this man needs legal assistance and he needs it urgently, otherwise he is likely to stay where he is for a considerable period of time' ([10]).

'Assault' – 'Bail' – 'Damaging property' – 'Exposing children' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factors'

Charges: Assault (3 counts), Destroying property, Application for a restraint order

Appeal type: Appeal against refusal to grant bail

Facts: It was alleged that the appellant assaulted his former partner and two of her children, and that he destroyed the windscreen of her car. A police officer also applied for a restraint order as a result of this incident. The magistrate refused to grant the applicant bail.

Issue: Whether the release of the appellant on bail would not be likely to adversely affect the safety, wellbeing and interests of an affected person (the former partner).

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed and bail was granted with condition as to surety recognisance and a residential condition. There were a number of factors weighing against the appellant: the prosecution had a strong case; this was a case involving not only physical assault but a threat to kill; the appellant used weapons in the commission of the offence; the Family Violence Risk Assessment prepared by the complainant immediately following the incident noted alcohol problems, potential mental health issues, jealousy and possessiveness, threats to kill, violence in the relationship escalating and the relationship had only recently broken down; the proposed surety (the appellant's mother) was not in good health and would be unable to stop the appellant harming his former partner ([14]-[18]).

However, in spite of this, Blow J was satisfied that the release of the appellant on bail would not be likely to adversely affect the safety, wellbeing and interests of his former partner and her children. The appellant had not assaulted his former partner or children prior to this incident. Despite allegations of mental illness, the appellant had not been diagnosed with such a disorder. The appellant's demeanour in court was 'ideal and exemplary,' precautions had been taken to ensure the appellant did not know where his former partner was, and he had a previous good employment history ([19]-[23]).

Her Majesty's Attorney-General v O* [2004] TASSC 53 (9 June 2004) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Assault' – 'Delay' – 'Exposing children' – 'Indecent assault' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charges: Assault, indecent assault

Appeal type: Attorney-General appeal against sentence

Facts: The responded pleaded guilty to assault and indecent assault against a woman with whom he cohabited for seven years. They had four children together. In March 2001, the respondent assaulted the complainant by raising his fist at her, waving a knife in her face and threatening to kill her. The relationship ceased some weeks prior to 30th May 2002. On 30th May 2002, the respondent trespassed into the complainant's home and ejaculated over her legs while she was asleep. The complainant reported the incident to police soon after it occurred and, at the same time, reported the assault of March 2001. Considerable time was taken to obtain a DNA analysis of the semen on the complainant's legs. As a result, police did not interview the respondent until a little more than a year after the indecent assault. The respondent was ordered to perform 80 hours of community service.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed by Underwood and Slicer JJ but upheld by Blow J in dissent. The judges provided different reasoning.

Underwood J, in the majority, agreed with Blow J (in dissent) that the sentence imposed was manifestly inadequate. However, he dismissed the appeal. The time in custody the respondent would have to serve would unlikely exceed 6 months and absent some point of principle, 'it was unjust to take away the respondent's liberty and put him in prison because an undefined error, not caused or contributed to by him in any way, infected the sentencing discretion exercised with respect to crimes that occurred two and three years ago' ([7]).

Slicer J, also in the majority, held that the sentence was not manifestly inadequate. His Honour quoted Parker v R [1994] TASSC 94 which in turn quoted from a Canadian case R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242, 249 articulating principles for the sentencing of crimes of domestic violence: 'When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape'.

However, His Honour nonetheless held that the circumstances of this case did not show manifest disparity or inconsistency with the sentencing standard (which was not to say that a more severe penalty would not have been appropriate). Here, the original assault (followed by the resumption of cohabitation) and the act of indecency were not charged for a further period of 12 months. There was no material advanced that suggested continuation of harassment or manifestation of aggression. The respondent had successfully completed the order of community service ([19]-[20]).

Slicer J also stated: 'Resolution of the problem of violence within a domestic situation is complex and resumption of cohabitation, as in this case where the complainant had decided to give her partner another chance, makes any assessment of sanction difficult' ([19]).

Blow J, in dissent, held that the nature of the indecent assault (ejaculating over a former partner's legs) and the circumstances of aggravation in which it occurred made it a particularly serious example of that sort of crime such that a community service order was so inadequate a penalty that the appeal ought to be allowed ([30], [36]). The circumstances of aggravation were that the respondent entered the complainant's house as a trespasser at night, the complainant was asleep, and it was committed in the immediate presence of the couple's four young children which created a strong risk of them witnessing the incident ([26]). A sentence of 11 months' imprisonment, suspended after 8 months, was appropriate.

His Honour disagreed with the comments of Slicer J as to delay insofar as they related to the indecent assault. He noted that, 'Certainly fairness to an offender can require a judge imposing a sentence for a stale crime, long after it was committed, to extend what otherwise might be an undue degree of leniency: R v Todd [1982] 2 NSWLR 517 at 519 - 520. There is also authority that a delay need not be inordinate before it deserves to be taken into account: Miceli v R [1997] VSC 22; (1997) 94 A Crim R 327 at 330. However the respondent was sentenced for the indecent assault some 20 months after committing it, and a delay of that order is now, regrettably, quite normal in this State. I therefore think that the delay in relation to that charge is of little significance'.

Waddington v R* [2003] TASSC 21 (30 April 2003) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Manifestly excessive' – 'Murder' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Remorse' – 'Sentencing'

Charge: Murder

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The male appellant and the female deceased lived together for 10 or 12 years. The appellant drank 10 cans of beer on the afternoon of the murder. While the appellant prepared dinner, the deceased telephoned a friend. According to counsel for the appellant, these telephone calls occurred on a regular basis meaning that the deceased would often eat dinner cold or not eat dinner at all. The appellant had become frustrated with these calls over the years. The appellant finished making dinner and told the deceased it was ready. She told him that she would eat it later. The friend on the other end of the phone then heard the appellant become enraged. He yelled, 'Get off that fucking phone … I've been putting up with it for the last ten years … I'm sick to death of the fucking phone.' The telephone connection was broken. In a rage, the appellant killed his partner. He held a pillow over her face for about three to four minutes, smothering her until she died. An hour later he went to the police and confessed.

Issues:

1. Whether the sentence of 17 years' imprisonment was manifestly excessive.
2. Whether the order fixing a non-parole period of 12 years was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed on ground 2.

1. A sentence of 17 years' imprisonment was not manifestly excessive in all the circumstances. Although the appellant expressed remorse, confessed to the crime quickly, and pleaded guilty, the appellant maintained his suffocation of the deceased for a prolonged period of time, the deceased did not provoke the appellant's violence in any way, and the appellant had prior convictions ([25]-[27]).
2. However, a non-parole period of 12 years was harsh, particularly when considered in light of orders for parole eligibility in other murder cases. Taking into account the appellant's genuine and deep remorse and his full acceptance of responsibility, a non-parole period of 10 years was substituted ([30]).

Burton v R* [2002] TASSC 64 (11 September 2002) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Assault' – 'Damaging property' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children' – 'Impact of offence on victim' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - separation' – 'Sentencing' – 'Unlawful assault causing bodily harm'

Charges: Assault (2 counts), Aggravated burglary with intent to commit murder or assault

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The male appellant and the female complainant resided in a de facto relationship between May 2001 and 20 July 2001. The complainant had a six month old child. However, in July, the complainant informed the appellant she wanted to end the relationship. She went to live with her mother. On the morning of 29 July, the appellant smashed a window to enter the complainant's mother's flat, holding a large knife (count 1). He yelled, 'where is the fucking slut' and 'where is she'. He entered the complainant's bedroom, where she was sleeping with her child, shouting that he was going to kill her. The appellant dragged the complainant by her hair to the kitchen and started to cut her neck. She grabbed the blade of the knife and it snapped (count 2 and 3). The appellant dragged her outside the house (count 4) before calming down. The complainant sustained a superficial laceration to her neck and ongoing psychological injury.

The appellant was found guilty of assault at a first trial (count 4). At a second trial, he was found guilty of aggravated burglary (count 1) and assault (count 3). The assault subject of count 3 was framed as an alternative to counts alleging the commission of the crimes of attempted murder and committing an act intended to cause bodily harm (wounding). He was sentenced to three years and six months' imprisonment for the offences subject of the second trial. In respect of the assault, he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment cumulative on the first sentence.

Issue: One of the grounds of appeal was whether the sentence of three years and six months' imprisonment was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed by all judges but with separate reasoning provided. Crawford J (with whom Underwood J agreed) held that the sentence of three years and six months was manifestly excessive. The sentence was well outside the range of sentences typically imposed for these types of offences ([20]-[23]). In light of the need for consistency, the sentence was set aside and a sentence of two years and three months' imprisonment was imposed.

Slicer J also found the sentence of three years and six months' imprisonment was manifestly excessive. The circumstances of the offences warranted the sentence namely, this was a case of 'home invasion' and 'domestic violence,' the appellant had prior convictions, he was not entitled to the benefit of a guilty plea, there was no evidence of remorse, and the impact on the complainant was likely to be long standing ([46]-[50]). However, the problem was not with the sentence but with the verdict. It was strange that the jury found that the evidence supported that there had been a 'cutting of the neck' but returned a verdict of not guilty of wounding. Nevertheless, the sentence was constrained by the jury's finding of assault, not wounding. On that basis alone, the sentence was manifestly excessive ([50]-[52]). His Honour agreed with Crawford J that a sentence of two years and six months' imprisonment was appropriate.

'Compulsion' – 'Emotional abuse' – 'Expert evidence' – 'Exposing children' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Stealing' – 'Systems abuse' – 'Where the offender is also a victim'

Charges: Stealing, Making a false report to police

Appeal Type: Notice to review conviction

Facts: The applicant and her partner were in a domestic relationship riddled with violence. For a summary of the history of the violence against her, see paragraphs [4]-[10]. The applicant was charged with stealing a television. She entered into an agreement to rent the television under instructions from her partner, who then arranged for the television to be sold to a friend. He instructed the applicant to tell the purchaser that the television came from her sister. After the applicant did not report that the television was stolen to the police, her partner became very angry. As a result of fearing what her partner would do if she defied him, the applicant then reported the television was stolen to the police and the rental company. After the police located the television in the possession of the purchaser, the applicant fully admitted to the crime and protected her partner by providing a false name.

At trial, the applicant gave evidence that she had acted out of fear that she would suffer grievous bodily harm if she did not follow her partner's demands to commit the offences. She alleged that her partner threatened to kill her if she did not accept full responsibility for the crime and provide a false name to police. That is, she established an evidentiary basis for the court to consider compulsion under s 20 of the Criminal Code 1924 (Tas) (the Code) and duress at common law. The magistrate found that neither of those defences applied.

Issues:

1. Whether the magistrate erred by applying the provisions of the Code governing criminal responsibility to the charge of making a false report.
2. Whether the magistrate made legal errors in applying the defences of duress and compulsion.
3. Whether the magistrate erred in failing to sufficiently consider the evidence of a psychologist with extensive experience in domestic violence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of issues 2 and 3.

1. The respondent conceded that this ground was made out. One difference between the common law defence of compulsion and the statutory defence is that it is not necessary for the person making the threat to be present at the time the offence is committed. The applicant was entitled to the benefit of the common law defence. However, this was not sufficient to overturn the conviction because the magistrate was satisfied that the prosecution proved that the applicant was not acting under duress.

2. The magistrate concluded that the applicant's contention that her partner would 'bash the hell out of me' contained a qualification and because of a slight hesitation in her response, she had not given credible evidence that she was threatened with serious violence. The Court disagreed, holding that given the history of violence, the words 'bash the hell out of me' amounted to a clear threat of serious harm.

   In referring to the requirement of immediacy under s 20 of the Code, the magistrate concluded that her partner's threat would not be carried out immediately because of the presence of the purchaser of the television. The Court disagreed, holding that immediacy does not mean that the threat will be carried out at the time of compliance or refusal, but that it is 'proximate' to the making of the threat. It requires that the person coerced 'believes that such threats will be executed' at the time when the person making the threats is able to carry them out. The magistrate also erred in concluding that the applicant could not have believed the threats could be carried out immediately. Given the history of violence, she was entitled to believe that the threats would be carried out immediately. In relation to seeking the protection of the purchaser, the Court held that this proposition 'defies logic and experience' ([25]). The magistrate did not sufficiently take into account the history of the relationship in determining the conduct said to give rise to compulsion. Her partner had complete domination over her and had assaulted her in a refuge. The false report was made at the direction of her partner in the face of explicit and implicit threats. While she theoretically could have made a complaint to the officer about her partner when she filed the report, the option of applying for a restraining order was not consistent with complying with the threats.

3. The magistrate concluded that the psychologist's evidence did not assist the defence in establishing duress and compulsion. This amounted to an error and the magistrate was required at least to consider the psychologist's evidence and the history of violence in determining whether the applicant acted under duress or compulsion.

Police v H [2021] TASMC 13 (22 December 2021) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Breach of protection order' – 'Interpretation of order' – 'Separation' – 'Technology facilitated abuse'

Charges: Breach of police family violence order x 3.

Proceedings: Reasons for decision.

Issues: Whether text messages sent by the defendant fell within an exception to the non-contact condition of the police family violence order; the accused's guilt.

Facts: The male defendant and female victim were married for 14 years and had two children. After the couple separated, the defendant was subject to a protection order that prohibited contact with the victim 'except… for the purpose of discussing matters arising out of their relationship including related to their children by… electronic message' [1]. The defendant was charged with breaching the order by sending three text messages to the victim. The messages invited the victim to the defendant's house and made a statement about the parties' relationship and children [28], [32], [36].

Decision and Reasoning: Two of the three messages constituted a breach of the order.

Magistrate Stanton outlined his approach to construing the order: 'the construction of the clause should be what a reasonable person in the circumstances of the person bound by the order would understand the words to mean', while 'considering the context of the exception within the entire order' [8]-[9]. His Honour found that the 'intention of the order [was] to keep the parties physically separate and to prevent communication generally while allowing limited communication' that was for the purpose of discussing matters arising out of their relationship [11], [18]. His Honour found that the text messages that invited the victim to the defendant's house were invitations 'to engage in an activity which would otherwise be prohibited by the order', and 'not solely a discussion about matters arising out of the relationship' [31]. Therefore, these messages breached the order. His Honour found that the statement about the parties' relationship and children, which read: 'You may hate me but I know my kids love me', was sent during a discussion between the parties about matters related to the children and arising out of the relationship [33]-[35]. Therefore, the message fell within the exception and did not breach the order.

Purton v Purton* [2016] TASMC 9 (19 October 2016) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Management of application proceedings' – 'Procedure' – 'Protection orders'

Case type: Directions in relation to application to revoke a Police Family Violence Order ('PFVO').

Facts: The applicant was served with a PFVO. It stated that the Sergeant was satisfied that the applicant had committed a family violence offence but did not explain why the order was made ([9]). The applicant applied to revoke the order ([10]).

Issues: The parties sought directions in relation to the nature of the application to revoke, the manner in which such an order should be made, and which party bears the onus of proof ([29]).

Decision and Reasoning: Magistrate McKee explained the procedure for challenging a PFVO. The application is not an appeal, nor an administrative review ([40]). It is an application for the court to exercise a discretion to revoke a PFVO ([41]).

The onus of proof is on the applicant to satisfy the Court on the balance of probabilities that it is appropriate to revoke the PFVO ([24]). Since the applicant is unaware of the basis upon which the order was made, the respondents (the police) would have to lead evidence to establish that the applicant committed the offence ([50]).

However, if the police applied to revoke or extend the PFVO, the onus of proof would lie on them ([56]).

McKenna v Smith* [2014] TASMC 11 (27 March 2014) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Assault' – 'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Conditions of orders' – 'Damaging property' – 'Insanity' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Vulnerable - new partner' – 'Wilfully and unlawful destroying or damaging property'

Charges: Damaging property (3 counts), Breach of police family violence order (2 counts), Assault

Facts: At 2.30pm on 14 July 2013, the defendant smashed the windscreen of her former de facto partner's car. Her former partner saw the incident occur and reported it to the police. A short time later, the defendant went to the police station and said she had smashed the windscreen of a car. At 5.45pm, a police officer who had attended the premises of the defendant's former partner, made and served upon the defendant a police family violence order.

In breach of the police family violence order, at 8.00pm, the defendant again went to her former partner's house. She began to abuse her former partner and his current partner. She threatened them both and at one point pushed the current partner of her ex-partner. Before leaving, she smashed the panels of her former partner's car. The incident was reported immediately to police and the defendant was placed under arrest. She resisted arrest, kicking and screaming. This conduct continued at the police station.

The magistrate was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the acts.

Issues:

1. Whether the police family violence order was not validly made because:
    - it was not made by a police officer of the rank of sergeant or above; and/or
    - the officer who made the order was not satisfied, or the evidence available to him was not sufficient to satisfy him, that the defendant had committed or was likely to commit a family violence offence.
2. Whether the defendant was not criminally responsible for any of the acts charged having regard to her mental illness and the provisions of s 16 of the Criminal Code 1924 (Tas).

Decision and Reasoning: The magistrate rejected defence counsel's submissions in relation to the first issue (the validity of the family violence protection order) but upheld submissions in relation to the second issue (insanity).

1. The police family violence order was validly made because the police officer was acting in the rank of sergeant at the time the order was made. The magistrate also rejected counsel submissions in relation to the second limb of the argument. These submissions amounted to a collateral challenge to the validity of the police family violence order. A collateral challenge is a challenge to the validity of an order in proceedings where the existence of the order is an element of the offence (not in proceedings to review or set aside the order). The legislation did not permit collateral challenge at least on the basis alleged here i.e. whether the factual basis of the order was sufficient ([26]-[30]). However, even if collateral challenge were available, the ground would not succeed because there was sufficient evidence to support the making of a police family violence order ([19]-[21], [31]).
2. The defendant was not criminally responsible for any of the acts contained in each charge. On the balance of probabilities the defendant was deprived of the capacity of knowing whether the acts that she performed in respect of each charge were ones that she ought not to do because of her mental illness, i.e. the Bipolar Disorder that resulted in her entering into a hypomanic or manic state. The defendant clearly knew what she was doing but was not able to rationally think about her actions with a moderate degree of sense and composure. This was because of the impact of her mental illness.

Howe v S* [2013] TASMC 33 (29 July 2013) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Charge particulars' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Guilty plea - withdrawal' – 'Protection order'

Charge: Breach of a police family violence order (3 counts)

Proceeding: Application for leave to withdraw a plea of guilty in respect of each charge and substitute a plea of not guilty

Facts: On 4 May 2012, a police family violence order was made against the male defendant that included the following order: 'you must not directly or indirectly threaten, harass, abuse or assault J'. It was alleged that the defendant contravened this order by harassing the female protected person ('J'). The defendant demanded that the protected person spend the night with him. The defendant threatened to take her child away if she refused to do so. In relation to pending family law court proceedings, the defendant also stated, 'if you take this to court, things will get vicious and you know what happens when things get vicious. So it's up to you. Either come and meet me tonight at the house or we will be enemies' (count 1). This conduct also amounted to a breach of s 9 (emotional abuse or intimidation) of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) (count 3). The police family violence order included an order that, 'you must not approach (J) directly or indirectly threaten, harass, abuse or assault; by telephone, email, facsimile or letter' [sic]. It was alleged that the defendant contravened this order by approaching the protected person on numerous times by text messages (count 2).

The defendant pleaded guilty because of advice from his lawyer. He obtained new legal representation and they advised him to lodge an application for leave to withdraw the guilty pleas. His counsel submitted that leave ought to be granted because the particulars alleged of the complaint were insufficient, as a matter of law, to support the allegation contained in each charge. It would be a miscarriage of justice to allow the guilty pleas to stand.

Issue: Whether leave should be granted to withdraw the pleas of guilty.

Decision and Reasoning: The application for leave to withdraw the guilty plea was allowed in respect of counts 2 and 3 but refused in respect of count 1. In relation to count 2, a miscarriage of justice would result if the guilty plea was allowed to stand. The particulars of the charge alleged the defendant approached the complainant on numerous undefined occasions by use of text messages. This breached the requirements of the Justices Act because the prosecution failed to set out each matter of complaint in separate numbered paragraphs and because the prosecution failed to provide particulars by which to identify the text messages said to constitute breach. The 'rolling up' of charges meant that the defendant had no real understanding as to what approach and which text message/s constituted the offence. It was impossible to determine what exactly he admitted to in the plea of guilty ([17]-[18]).

Leave was also granted in respect of count 3. The magistrate held that 'the mental element required to amount to a breach of s 9 is that the defendant knew or ought to know that the course of conduct in which he was engaging is "likely to have the effect of unreasonably controlling or intimidating, or causing mental harm, apprehension or fear in his spouse or partner". This is not what has been alleged. That he knew or should have known that his conduct was "likely to have the effect of abusing or intimidating" his partner, is a different mental element from that referred to in the section' ([23]).

However, the guilty plea was held to stand in relation to count 1. Counsel for the defence submitted that a person could not be 'harassed', as a matter of law, by one act alone. The magistrate concluded that, 'Whilst I accept that the term "harass" as used in the general community could well include an element of persistence or repetition, I see no reason why a person cannot be harassed within the context of a Family Violence Order, by one act alone. This view is in fact consistent with the definition in s.4 of the Family Violence Act of the word "harassing" … The reference in the definition to "any one or more of the following actions" suggests that a single act might be sufficient. Furthermore, it is appropriate, in my view, to interpret the term having regard to the context in which it is used in the order. The reference to "threaten, harass, abuse or assault" suggests that the order is to be understood as providing protection to a person from contact with the respondent which is unwelcome, and might be in various forms or have variable effect' ([12]-[16]).

Kerr v Brown* [2013] TASMC 30 (8 July 2013) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Breach of domestic violence order' – 'Interpretation of order'

Charge: Breach of family violence order (FVO)

Facts: A family violence order (FVO) was made in favour of the protected person that prohibited the defendant from approaching the protected person directly or indirectly. After the order was made, she phoned the defendant and caught a bus to Hobart where he was residing and commenced residing at his property.

The defendant submitted that he never approached the protected person, notwithstanding the fact that when she approached him, he allowed her to remain living at his home. The prosecutor submitted that the order should be interpreted to mean that the defendant was not permitted to allow the protected person to come into his presence, and that if she did, he must immediately leave her presence.

Issue: Whether the defendant was guilty of the offence charged.

Decision and Reasoning: The charge was dismissed. 'Clearly the intention of the order is to prevent the respondent from coming near or initiating communication with the person to be protected. However, my impression is that police, and perhaps courts, view the condition as a primary mechanism for keeping persons apart in cases where family violence has been alleged or perpetrated, and may well consider the order to have the more extensive effect contended for by the prosecution in this case.' ([5]). The ordinary meaning of 'approach' in the context of the FVO is that a person should not intentionally contact or bring themselves into the presence of the protected person. The order should be interpreted in a way that it would be understood by persons in the position of the defendant without legal training and of limited education: 'The defendant cannot, in my view, be said to have approached (the protected person) by simply allowing her into the house, even for an extended stay, once she was there. To hold otherwise would be to give the word an extended meaning which is beyond its ordinary common meaning.'

Lusted v MRB* [2013] TASMC 9 (19 February 2013) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Assault' – 'Coercive control' – 'Emotional abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Exposing children' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Risk factor - strangulation' – 'Tendency evidence' – 'Uncooperative witness'

Charge: Assault (6 counts)

Facts: The alleged assaults involved the defendant grabbing, pushing, striking, punching and pinching the complainant. One count involved the defendant grabbing her throat and pinning her against a table. Another involved pushing hot chicken into her face, grabbing hold of her by the chest and pouring cold water over her head ([17]-[28]). The complainant's relationship with the defendant started when she was 15 and lasted for about 6 years. The prosecution's evidence indicated that the defendant was controlling and violent towards the complainant throughout their relationship. The complainant was socially isolated and the defendant prevented her from contacting friends. He demanded that she wait on him and would strangle and abuse her if she did not comply with his demands. On one occasion, he threw a bottle at her. For further detail of the 'uncharged acts', see paragraphs [8]-[16]. There was one child of the relationship. The infant daughter witnessed two of the assaults.

Decision and Reasoning: The charges were dismissed.

The prosecution adduced various circumstantial evidence from other witnesses ([29]-[42]). This included evidence of witnesses who noticed that the complainant had various physical injuries. The prosecution also sought to adduce evidence of the defendant's tendency to engage in violent conduct against the complainant. Magistrate Pearse admitted this evidence on the basis that it had substantial probative value because it could be inferred that the relationship involved violent and controlling behaviour. The danger of unfair prejudice posed by the evidence was low, particularly in circumstances where no jury was involved. The prosecution also sought to adduce relationship evidence relating to uncharged conduct. This evidence was also admitted on the basis that it removed the implausibility of the assault being isolated. It also supported the assertion that the defendant exercised dominance and control and that the complainant feared the defendant.

This case involved serious and prolonged domestic violence. However, the complainant had not been entirely truthful about the relationship and her evidence was inconsistent with her parents'. She had discussed the possibility of ending the relationship with her parents and decided to leave him at the urgings of her mother once her father returned to town. However, on the day she decided to leave the defendant, she decided to return to him because he seemed remorseful and he offered to buy her dinner. As such, given the gravity of the conduct that was the subject of the complaint, the magistrate found it difficult to believe that the fear of what might happen in her father's absence was a plausible explanation for her not leaving him. While the magistrate acknowledged that other explanations such as the fact that she may have become conditioned to such behaviour could be relevant, her account was doubted. There were no photographs, medical reports, phone records or other corroborating evidence. As such, the complaints were not proven beyond reasonable doubt.

The magistrate nonetheless emphasised the widespread scale and seriousness of family violence. 'It is a significant social problem, of concern to the community and the justice system. The parliament saw fit to enact legislation, the Family Violence Act 2004, expressly to "provide for an integrated criminal justice response to family violence which promotes the safety of people affected by family violence". The nature of family violence is that it is difficult to detect and prosecute. It is frequently the case that offences are committed in private and with little or no independent corroborative evidence. Moreover, family violence offences are often characterised by reluctance on the part of the victim to assist in the prosecution of offences. That is so for a range of factors including fear and a wish to preserve relationships, even dysfunctional ones, for the sake of loyalty, affection, companionship, economic and domestic support and in the perceived interest of children. Sometimes those motivations are misguided but persist nevertheless. As a consequence of such factors victims sometimes act in a way that seems to an outside observer to be incongruous and difficult to understand, including by failing to complain about, or hiding or lying about violence directed at them. Even if victims are willing to give evidence then the success of prosecutions depends principally on credibility of the uncorroborated account of the victim, a factor often taken advantage of by perpetrators and further adding to the reluctance of victims to complain.' ([68]).

K v K* [2012] TASMC 3 (25 January 2012) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Interim intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - suicide threat'

Proceeding: Application for revocation of an interim family violence order (IFVO)

Facts: A police family violence order was made against the applicant, which prohibited him from threatening, assaulting or approaching his wife. The order was made on the basis that the police officer was satisfied that family violence was likely to be committed. The applicant and his wife had separated. An argument occurred about the contents of their house but the applicant claimed he was not aggressive and did not threaten or abuse the complainant or threaten to harm himself. He claimed that when he was wheeling a motorbike out of the house, she stepped in front of it to prevent him from taking it and the bike struck her legs which caused her to fall. The complainant claimed that when the applicant attended her home to collect belongings, he was volatile and aggressive and threatened to shoot himself with guns kept on their property. She did not specify what words amounted to these threats or abuse. She claimed he pushed the motorbike against her.

Issue: Whether the order should be revoked.

Decisions and Reasoning: The order was revoked.

A police family violence order cannot be issued only on the basis that the officer believes family violence has been committed. Rather, the officer must be satisfied that a family violence offence has been or is likely to be committed. This is because the definition of family violence includes acts that may not amount to a family violence offence within the meaning of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas).

The protected person's evidence was not corroborated. Family breakdowns can be traumatic so each party tends to perceive events influenced by their own interests. The only way an order could be made would be by proving that the applicant engaged in threats, intimidation, verbal abuse or a course of conduct that amounted to emotional abuse and intimidation. Alternatively, an order could have been made if an assault by pushing the motorbike was proven. Such conduct was not proven: 'It is difficult to characterise or define what words may amount to threats, intimidation or abuse. The same words may in some circumstances amount to a threat or abuse when in other circumstances they may not. Much depends on the background and the context. In some circumstances even the most seemingly innocent words may be highly intimidatory. The court should consider whether one of the parties is in a position of disadvantage, either physically, emotionally, intellectually, socially or economically' ([29]). The applicant was more credible as a witness than the complainant and the complainant would not be in a position of disadvantage in an exchange with her husband. She demonstrated throughout the course of the hearing that she was capable of protecting her own interests and it was unlikely that she would have felt threatened, coerced or intimidated. She also likely prevailed in the arguments about property and she likely overstated her evidence to paint the applicant in the worst light.

Buxton v Brinckman* [2011] TASMC (21 July 2011) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

'Bail' – 'Bail – interim family violence order' – 'Breach of temporary protection order' – 'Inconsistency' – 'Statutory interpretation'

Charge: Breach of interim family violence order

Proceeding: Reasons for decision

Facts: An interim family violence order (IFVO) was made against the defendant that prohibited him from entering the premises of the protected persons. The defendant was living with his parents. The agreed facts established that one of the protected persons started living at his parents' address as well. In breach of the order, the defendant continued to live in his parents' house. However, at the relevant time the defendant was on bail. One of the conditions of the bail order was that he was to reside at his parents' house.

The magistrate found that the elements of the offence were proven. The defendant submitted that given that he was obliged to reside at his parents' house by the bail conditions, this relieved him of criminal responsibility for the breach of the IFVO. That is, because the failure to live at his parents' premises would amount to a breach of bail, this should excuse the breach of the IFVO.

Issue: Whether the defendant was guilty of the offence charged.

Decision and Reasoning: While there may be some circumstances where a person might claim a defence of breaching a statutory obligation on the basis that some other law compels the breach, this was not the situation in this case. Section 6 of the Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) (the Act) provides that the Act prevails to the extent of any inconsistency with another act. The Court acknowledged that the defendant's parents made it impossible for him to comply with the bail condition without breaching the IFVO. However, the defendant could have applied for a variation of bail. In the interim period before bringing that matter before the court, the breach of bail may have been excused on the grounds of 'reasonable cause'. As such, he was not relieved of criminal responsibility for breaching the IFVO.

Morey (a pseudonym) v The King* [2023] VSCA 153 (23 June 2023) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Application for leave to appeal against conviction' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Evidence' – 'Manifest excess' – 'Open to jury to convict' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Rape' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual assault' – 'Significant probative value' – 'Strangulation' – 'Tendency evidence' – 'Theft' – 'Whether convictions were unreasonable and unsupported by evidence' – 'Whether probative value of tendency evidence substantially outweighed prejudicial effect'

Charges: Rape x 3; Common assault x 1; Theft of motor vehicle x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against both conviction and sentence.

Facts: Following conviction at trial the male applicant was sentenced to 12 years and 4 months, with a non-parole period of 8 years. The trial judge allowed the prosecution's pre-trial application to adduce tendency evidence to demonstrate the applicant to engaged in a pattern of threats of violence to compel the complainant's compliance. The prosecution's pre-trial tendency notice (s97(1)(a) Evidence Act 2008 (Vic)) noted their intention to rely on the tendency of the applicant to:

- Act in a particular way, namely:
  - (a) To threaten to assault, or cause harm to [the complainant], if she did not comply with his demands.
  - (b) To threaten to kill [the complainant], or members of her family, if she did not comply with his demands.
  - (c) To assault [the complainant] in order to compel her to comply with his demands. [26]
- Have a particular state of mind, namely:
  - (a) A belief that [the complainant] would do as he demanded if he threatened to assault, or cause harm, to her.

(b) A belief that [the complainant] would do as he demanded if he threatened to kill her or members of her family.

(c) A belief that [the complainant] would do as he demanded if he assaulted, or caused harm to her. [27]

It was asserted that the 'demands' referred to included that the complainant not report his behaviour to police. [28]

Grounds:

Conviction

(1) The convictions are unreasonable or cannot be supported by the evidence; and (3) the judge erred in ruling the tendency evidence admissible, particularised as follows:

(a) The judge erred in finding that the tendency evidence showed the applicant acted in a particular way that was significantly probative of the sexual offences on indictment.

(b) The judge erred in finding that the tendency evidence showed the applicant had a particular state of mind that was significantly probative of the sexual offences on indictment.

(c) The judge erred in finding that the 2017 threats of dumping the complainant in a shit dam was significantly probative of the offences of rape.

(d) The judge erred in finding that the 2018 SMS messages of threats made by the applicant in the context of frustration regarding a friend's marriage breakup were significantly probative of the offences of rape.

(e) The judge erred in finding the 2017 and 2018 threats as not unfairly prejudicial.

(f) The judge erred in finding the 2017 and 2018 threats was not a generalised assertion of general bad character.

(g) The judge erred in finding the 2017 and 2018 threats was probative of committing the rapes with the requisite intent.

Sentence

1. The judge erred in characterising of the objective gravity of his offending as 'serious';

2. the judge erred in applying the standard sentencing regime;
3. the judge erred in finding that offending in 2018 was a relevant sentencing consideration in respect of the rape charges; and
4. the sentence is manifestly excessive.

Reasoning and decision: Leave to appeal granted, appeal was allowed on conviction ground 2 and the applicant's conviction and sentences on charges 5 to 8 will be set aside, retrial ordered.

Beach JA, Forrest JA and Kaye JA refused leave to appeal on conviction ground 1.

Conviction ground 1: Nothing in the evidence relied upon by the applicant required the jury to have a reasonable doubt about the guilt of the applicant on charges 5, 6, 7 and 8 [24].

Conviction ground 3: The court held the prosecution tendency evidence 'barely established the asserted tendency' [47]. The court also identified that charges 5 to 8 did not involve any threat by the applicant [48]. It was held the tendency evidence had no probative value and had a prejudicial effect. It was therefore deemed inadmissible [50].

Sentencing: Due to the court's decision on conviction ground 2, it was not necessary for the court to consider sentencing grounds 1-3. However, the court held that 18 months was for the theft of the complainant's vehicle was manifestly excessive [54]. The sentence was reduced to 1 month of imprisonment [55].

Charges: Damaging property x 2; Intentionally causing serious injury x 1; Contravention of family violence intervention order x 2.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male offender entered his female former partner's bedroom and repeatedly punched her in the face, stomach and head before strangling her until she could not breathe [3]-[5]. The offender then went to the victim's parent's home and damaged the complainant's car. The offender pleaded guilty to charges of damaging property, intentionally causing serious injury and contravention of protection orders [10].

The offender had an extensive criminal history, commencing in 2011, including offences of violence against other women he had shared relationships with. The seriousness of offending had escalated, and the offender had persistently breached previous community correction orders.

The offender had suffered significant trauma throughout his life and had a diagnosis of borderline personality disorder, post-traumatic stress disorder and major depressive disorder [21].

In the County Court, Dean J held that the offender's borderline personality disorder did not moderate his moral culpability, as he had not taken any steps to address his mental health despite numerous acts of serious violence since 2011 [18]. The offender was sentenced to 8 years, with a non-parole period of 5 years 6 months [10].

Grounds: The sentencing judge failed to give appropriate weight to the adverse effect of an excessive term of imprisonment on the applicant's mental health, particularly given the offender's history of self-harming in prison.

Decision and reasoning: Ferguson CJ, Emerton P and Osborn JA refused the application for leave to appeal.

A psychological report stated the offender required ongoing treatment, which he was receiving in prison. The report confirmed that the offender's mental health was not being exacerbated in prison. The offender was free from stressors, such as alcohol, and was not self-harming [34]-[35].

It was held that Dean J appropriately balanced the requirement to protect the community from the offender per s 6D of the Sentencing Act 1991 and the adverse effects of imprisonment on the applicant's mental health during sentencing [37].

Note: a Crown special leave application to appeal to the High Court of Australia was granted on 16 June 2023 and the matter has been listed for hearing in October 2023. The Crown argues that the Court of Appeal "committed an error in principle by extending the law of duress as it applies to both common law and by operation of statute, to cover what is known as duress of circumstances".

Charges: Incest x 11; indecent act with a child under 16 x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The applicant was convicted following trial of 11 counts of incest (s 44(1) and one count of indecent act with a child under 16 (s 47(1)) contrary to the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic). Her partner, JR, was the father of the two complainant daughters and had previously been convicted of sexual offences against them. At the applicant's trial it was argued that JR had directed the applicant to commit the offences, and she had complied due to an ever-present threat of physical and sexual violence by JR if she did not do what he demanded of her. It was submitted that this constituted duress. The judge, however, ruled that this did not constitute duress, as duress required there to have been a specific or overt threat, not just an ever-present threat. Consequently, duress was not left to the jury and the applicant was convicted of the offences on the basis that she was present and encouraged the daughters to comply with his abuse.

The applicant and JR's relationship commenced when the appellant was 18 years old. They lived on a rural property owned by JR's father and had 4 children. The applicant had a mild intellectual disability and was financially and socially dependent on JR. There was evidence that JR was physically, emotionally and sexually violent to the applicant, he isolated her on the farm, was highly controlling of her movements and had a bad temper. The prosecution accepted that JR's violence towards the applicant was 'severe' [57]. It was reported that the applicant had tried to leave in the past but had returned because she 'would struggle with the kids' and that she had not reported the violence to the police because 'noone would believe her because she was nothing.' [107] A psychologist gave evidence that the applicant suffered from learned helplessness and low self-esteem characteristic of 'battered women's syndrome', a subset of post-traumatic stress disorder. The applicant's counsel submitted that 'JR's conduct created and maintained a serious, standing threat of significant, ongoing harm, namely, angry subjection to the domineering, violent, rape-embracing regime of life imposed by a brute upon a traumatised, vulnerable person. Under that regime, refusal was said to always have its consequences and this had the effect of overbearing the applicant's will so that she always submitted to the will of JR.' [132]

Grounds: The trial judge erred in ruling that the defence of duress was not open on the evidence and thereby caused a substantial miscarriage of justice.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave to appeal granted; appeal against conviction upheld; new trial ordered; unnecessary to consider appeal against sentence.

Kyrou & McLeish JJA:

Their Honours found there was 'considerable overlap' in the elements of each form of the defence [188].

They made the following remarks regarding element (i) of common law duress in the context of the case:

[155] We accept that no previous case has expressly accepted the proposition that a continuing or ever present threat — whether overt or tacit — as distinct from a specific, overt threat, is sufficient. However, no case has expressly considered that proposition and rejected it. …. Further, the analysis of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia in Runjanjic [(1992) 56 SASR 114] is consistent with the proposition that a continuing or ever present threat may be sufficient.

[156] In our opinion, a continuing or ever present threat which is subsisting at the time an accused committed the charged offence can suffice if, in all other respects, the defence of duress can be made out. We cannot think of any reason in principle or policy that requires exclusion of a continuing or ever present threat where, due to the threat, the accused has lost his or her freedom to choose to refrain from committing the charged offence. In this context, it is relevant to note the additional limiting factors identified in element (iii) [common law duress above] which requires that the threat be present and continuing, imminent and impending at the time each offence is committed.

[169] Having regard to the above features of the relationship between JR and the applicant … it would have been open to the jury to conclude that it was reasonably possible that the applicant understood that there was a continuing or ever present threat of physical and sexual violence (including rape) by JR if she did not do what he demanded of her. If the jury reached this conclusion, it would have been open to them to find that it was reasonably possible that, when JR requested the applicant to be involved in each of the sexual offences against the complainants, she understood that, if she did not comply, he would physically and sexually harm her, including by raping her.

[174] We are also of the opinion that it is not fatal in this case that there is no direct evidence that JR told the applicant shortly prior to each offence that, unless she performed the acts that constitute each of the charged offences, he would physically and sexually abuse her. That is because it would be open to the jury to infer that this was a reasonable possibility based upon the history of the relationship between JR and the applicant as set out in the …[evidence].

Their Honours made the following remarks regarding element (ii) of common law duress in the context of the case:

[180] A person of 'ordinary firmness of mind' in the present case would be a female domestic partner of JR who was of the applicant's age and who has lived with JR in the same circumstances as the applicant and has endured the physical and sexual abuse that she has experienced. That person would also have the same isolated lifestyle as the applicant and possess her knowledge of JR's personality and behaviour. However, that person would not have the applicant's history of sexual abuse as an adolescent or her mild intellectual disability.

There was evidence that the AR suffered 'battered woman syndrome':

[181] In our opinion, upon the basis of the [evidence], it would have been open to the jury to conclude that there was a reasonable possibility that a person of ordinary firmness of mind having the characteristics described… above would have been likely to:

(a) develop a battered woman syndrome with the consequence of learned helplessness, and yield to JR's continuing or ever present threat in the way the applicant did; and

(b) not seek to escape the situation.

Their Honours then briefly considered elements (iv), (v), (vii) and (viii) of Common Law duress in turn but did not consider element (vi) because the accused was not charged with murder, or any other crime excepted from common law duress:

[184] In relation to element (iv), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant reasonably apprehended that the threat would be carried out based upon JR's history of punishing her if she sought to disobey him.

[185] In relation to element (v), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant was induced by the continuing or ever present threat to commit the charged offences based upon our previous analysis regarding her will being overborne by that threat.

[186] In relation to element (vii), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant did not, by fault on her part when free from the duress, expose herself to its application. That is because the threat was a continuing or ever present threat and the jury could conclude that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant was not free of the threat at any time during the period of the offending.

[187] In relation to element (viii), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant did not have the means, with safety to herself, of preventing the execution of the threat. That is because the jury could conclude that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant's battered woman syndrome rendered her incapable of escaping from her abusive relationship with JR.

McLeish JA agreed with the reasons given by Kyrou and Niall JJA in respect of elements of the defence of duress' both under common law and under 32O.' [228] McLeish JA also observed:

[208] It is not necessary that the threat which underpins a defence of duress be the subject of direct evidence of the accused. There is no reason in principle why the requisite threat might not be found by a process of inference from other evidence. That inference may, in principle, be drawn from evidence about an ongoing course of conduct. The threat may also be conveyed to the accused by implication rather than express words. Naturally, the defence may very well be weaker in the absence of direct evidence from the accused; but that is not the only way it may be raised.

Shiryar v The Queen* [2022] VSCA 96 (25 May 2022) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Attempt to pervert course of justice' – 'Extensive criminal history' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Manifest excess' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Persistent contravention of protection order' – 'Separation' – 'Stalking' – 'Threat to kill' – 'Use of third party'

Charges: 1 x attempting to pervert the course of justice; 1 x persistently contravening a family violence intervention order.

Case type: Application for leave to appeal.

Facts: The applicant pleaded guilty to one charge of attempting to pervert the course of justice and one charge of persistently contravening a family violence intervention order. These offences were committed whilst the applicant was on remand for separate charges (to which he also pleaded guilty): two charges of criminal damage, one charge of stalking, one charge of making a threat to kill, and two charges of committing an indictable offence while on bail. The charge of stalking related to the applicant's former partner, ES. The charge of making a threat to kill related to her father.

The applicant's relationship with ES ended shortly before the offending. An interim family violence intervention order was made against the applicant. Whilst on remand for the initial offending, the applicant instructed someone to phone ES to ask that she and her father drop the charges against him, and to tell her that if the charges were dropped, he would give her a car that had been the subject of a dispute between him and her family. The sentencing judge imposed a head sentence of 2 years and 6 months imprisonment for attempting to pervert the course of justice.

Issue: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive?

Held: The Court refused leave to appeal. The applicant had an extensive criminal history, which predominately involved contravening family violence intervention orders and breaching bail. The sentencing judge viewed the applicant's convictions on the initial offending as relevant to the present offending, because the present offending occurred shortly after the applicant was remanded in custody and informed the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation ([19]). The sentencing judge took into account, inter alia, the applicant's early guilty plea, mental health difficulties, apparent insight into the offending and support from his family. The offending was described as "premeditated, repeated and persistent, involved enlisting others, and employed veiled threats and inducements" ([25]).

The Court of Appeal found that any attempt to pervert the course of justice is to be denounced, and that, within a family violence context, it is a very serious matter ([38]).

Frecker v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 331 (2 December 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Common assault' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'No prior convictions' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Sentencing appeal'

Charges: Common law assault x 2, intentionally damage property x 1, intentionally cause serious injury x 1, persistent contravention of family violence intervention order x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The 23-year-old appellant received a sentence of 6 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 3 years and 8 months, and a 2-year alcohol exclusion order after pleading guilty to offences perpetrated against two of his former female partners. The appellant repeatedly punched and pushed each victim on several occasions, often after consuming alcohol [7]-[11]. On one occasion, the appellant repeatedly punched the second victim's face and neck, which fractured her jaw and seriously injured her left eye [12]-[26]. The appellant persistently contravened a protection order by repeatedly contacting the second victim while she was in hospital, and parking near her house ([28-35]). The appellant had been diagnosed with depression, anxiety and alcohol use disorder, had no prior criminal history, was employed and supported by his family [42]-[45].

Grounds:

The sentencing judge erred in failing to consider:

1. As a form of additional punishment, the alcohol exclusion order imposed upon the appellant.
2. The appellant's youth at the time of the offending.

Decision and Reasoning: Appeal dismissed.

Kyrou and T Forrest JJA dismissed both grounds of appeal. '[T]he judge did not err by failing to explain in his sentencing remarks how any punitive elements of the AEO informed the exercise of his sentencing discretion… because defence counsel did not submit that the AEO had an additional punitive impact upon the appellant which warranted discrete moderation in his sentence' [76]. Furthermore, the j sentencing judge remarked on the applicant's youthfulness as a relevant sentencing consideration, especially in relation to his 'very positive' prospects of rehabilitation [92]while noting the appellant was at the 'upper end of youthfulness', and his offending was of a 'particularly egregious nature' such that the judge appropriately gave more weight to the sentencing considerations of community protection, denunciation, specific deterrence and just punishment [94]).

Charges: intentionally cause injury x 1; false imprisonment x 2; make threat to kill x 1.

Proceedings: appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant pleaded guilty to the charges and received a total effective sentence of 4 years and 9 months ([1]). The sentencing judge reduced the applicant's sentence by 9 months due to his guilty plea because it showed remorse and saved the Court's time ([19]-[20]).

The female victim and male applicant did not reside together. In January 2020, the applicant assaulted the victim in the presence of her nine-year old daughter The applicant punched, kicked and strangled the victim, threatening to kill her or her daughter whenever they attempted to leave, for approximately 2.5 hours ([3]-[6]). While in custody, the applicant told family members to persuade the victim not to cooperate with police and to accuse her of 'just keeping him away from the kids' ([12]). The applicant suffered from a mental health condition and had a history of alcohol abuse ([16]-[17]) and family violence offending([15]).

Grounds: The individual sentences, orders for cumulation, total effective sentence and non-parole period were each manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: Beach JA dismissed the appeal ([45]). His Honour affirmed her Honour's description of the applicant's behaviour as 'a protracted ordeal of violence… threats and control… that did not cease upon the applicant being remanded into custody' ([25]). His Honour accepted that the applicant's plea of guilty during the COVID-19 pandemic entitled him to a 'more pronounced amelioration of sentence' as in Worboyes v The Queen [2021] VSCA 169 (18 June 2021) ([43]). Honour found that the individual sentences could only be described as 'modest' ([38]), and the non-parole period as 'very moderate' ([39]), due to the objective seriousness of each offence. In his Honour's view, '[t]he imprisoning of the victim and her daughter, resulting in the victim's daughter witnessing the acts of violence perpetrated by the applicant against her mother, was undoubtedly very serious offending. Any submission to the contrary is not reasonably arguable.' ([38]).

Charges: Persistent contravention of a family violence safety notice, aggravated burglary, intentionally causing injury x 2, making threat to kill, damage property, making threat to inflict serious injury.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Grounds:

1. The orders for cumulation breached the principle of totality and produced a total effective sentence that was manifestly excessive.
2. The learned sentencing judge was wrong not to find that:
   (a) The Appellant's anti-social personality disorder and clinical depression meant his sentence of imprisonment would weigh more heavily on him compared to a person in normal health; and
   (b) Imprisonment would have a significant adverse effect on the Appellant's mental health [5].

Facts: The 35-year-old male appellant received a sentence of 9 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 6 years and 4 months, after pleading guilty to offences perpetrated against his 28-year-old former female partner. The couple had been in a 'volatile' relationship for three years, and shared a 2-year-old son [6]. The appellant made threats to kill or injure the victim via text for several days before forcing entry into her home. Armed with a kitchen knife, the appellant made several 'chilling' threats to kill the victim, before punching, strangling, and eventually pushing her head through a plaster wall. The appellant's conduct constituted persistent breaches of a family violence safety notice and occurred in the presence of a child [6]. The applicant had a 'significant criminal record', and had been diagnosed with a substance abuse disorder, depression, anxiety, and mild psychosis [9],[12]. The appellant identified as Aboriginal [11].

Decision and Reasoning: Appeal allowed, appellant resentenced to 6 years and 6 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 4 years and 6 months' imprisonment. The appellant's psychological assessment stated that R v Verdins [2007] VSCA 102 'may' apply [43] and on this basis, the appellant's legal counsel had not raised Verdins at the plea hearing. Niall JJA (Priest JA concurring) found that this reasoning, which was incorrect, had led the sentencing Judge into a specific error that vitiated the sentence [46]. His Honour stated that 'whether any of the Verdins principles' apply 'to mitigate sentence' is 'a matter for the judge to determine on the basis of the evidence' [44].

In resentencing, Their Honours found that psychological evidence of the appellant's 'impaired mental functioning and his deprived and violent upbringing' reduced his moral culpability and required consideration of whether incarceration would be more onerous [31]. The appellant's substance abuse severely compromised his judgment and capacity to control his behaviour [27] and was caused by 'childhood trauma', which had also impacted on his 'development of empathy and distinction between right and wrong' [28], and had arisen 'through no fault of his own' [61]. Their Honour's noted that the appellant's conduct had 'escalated over a number of days, giving him an opportunity to desist which he failed to take'. However, it was accepted that the appellant's ability to regulate his behaviour was significantly impaired [60].

Baker (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 158 (9 June 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Attempt to pervert the court of justice' – 'Coercive control' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Guilty plea' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Intellectual impairment' – 'Manifest excess' – 'People affected by drugs or alcohol' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'People with illness or impairment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Threat of image abuse' – 'Threat of suicide'

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant pleaded guilty to 14 charges arising out of abuse of his female domestic partner over a period of 18 months. He sought leave to appeal in relation to charges 5, causing injury recklessly, and 8, attempting to pervert the course of justice.

Charge 5 related to causing injury by pushing the victim's face into a pot of boiling water, following which he did not call an ambulance and instructed the victim to conceal his role in her injuries and return home the same day, not remaining in hospital for treatment. There was dispute as to whether permanent injury was caused. The offending was in breach of a protection order, occurred after earlier offending against the same victim and when the applicant had only just been released from prison. Charge 8 related to sending a large number of text messages to the victim demanding the withdrawal of charges against him, threatening variously to keep their stillborn child's ashes and urn from her, distribute intimate images of her and commit suicide stating it would be her fault if he did so.

The applicant had a history of prior violent offending (having only just been released from jail) including against the victim, had intellectual impairment, a traumatic upbringing and was abusing methylamphetamine at the time of the offending. It took place in the context of a history of violence, manipulation and coercion against the victim and sought to exploit her emotional and psychological vulnerability by threatening her ability to access the ashes of her stillborn child and also threatening her dignity and right to privacy with the exposure of intimate images.

Grounds:

Ground 1: The sentence imposed on indictment charge 5 is manifestly excessive in all the circumstances.

Ground 2: The sentence imposed on indictment charge 8 is manifestly excessive in all the circumstances.

Ground 3: The cumulation order fixed in respect of charge 8 is manifestly excessive in all the circumstances.

Held: leave to appeal refused.

Ground 1: The court held that notwithstanding the mitigating factors raised by the applicant which ought to be taken into account, this was horrific violence inflicted on a woman by her domestic partner in her own home. The offending was at the upper end of the range with a maximum penalty of 5 years imprisonment, and 3 years was within the appropriate range:

> In all the circumstances, the infliction of such horrific violence against a woman at the hands of her domestic partner in their own home called for denunciation, just punishment and general deterrence, especially in the context of persistent defiance of a family violence intervention order and bearing in mind the applicant's criminal history. In that context, specific deterrence also remained a relevant consideration. We accept that the mitigating features to which the applicant referred were matters of weight that fell to be taken into account, as we have discussed. However, even when that is done, we are unable to conclude that the sentence was outside the range available to the sentencing judge. To the contrary, bearing in mind that this was an offence at the upper end of the range, punishable by a maximum term of 5 years' imprisonment, a sentence of 3 years on a guilty plea was well open. [32]

Ground 2: While at the lower end of the scale for attempting to pervert the course of justice, any attempt to pervert the course of justice is serious and should be denounced. The offending occurred in the context of violence, manipulation and coercion of the victim, with "especially unpleasant features of seeking to exploit Ms Anderson's emotional and psychological vulnerability by threatening her ability to access the ashes of her stillborn child and also threatening her dignity and right to privacy with the exposure of intimate images." [36]

Ground 3: The applicant's submission that accumulation of 12 months of the charge 8 sentence on the balance of the sentences failed to accord with the principles of totality and was therefore manifestly excessive was dismissed:

> An attempt by a perpetrator of family violence to prevent a victim from seeking the full protection of the law and their physical and emotional safety is a very serious matter which calls for general deterrence and denunciation…[37]
> Charge 8 involved repeated attempts by the applicant to conceal his wrongdoing over the previous 18 months, by means of emotional and physical threats directed at Ms Anderson. It was distinct offending that called for significant additional punishment. [40]

Mercer (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 132 (14 May 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Application for extension of time within which to file application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence' – 'Attempting to pervert the course of justice' – 'Coercive control' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'False imprisonment'

Charges: False imprisonment x 1; Attempt to pervert the course of justice x 1; Persistent contravention of a family violence intervention order (FVIO) x 1.

Proceedings: Application for extension of time within which to file application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The male applicant was charged with 5 offences against his de facto female partner (the complainant). The applicant instructed her to drop the charges over telephone calls while remanded in custody. At trial, she gave evidence unfavourable to the prosecution case, recanting statements previously made to police, and giving evidence that the applicant had neither imprisoned nor assaulted her. The judge gave the prosecution leave to cross-examine the complainant about prior inconsistent statements she had made and in relation to her evidence on charges 1-4. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 5 years and 3 months imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 3 years and 9 months.

Grounds of appeal:

1. The trial judge should not have given any direction on incriminating conduct as: (a) The prosecutor did not rely on the relevant phone calls as incriminating conduct in his final address; and (b) Using phone calls as evidence of incriminating conduct involved the jury engaging in impermissible 'bootstraps' reasoning.

2. The sentence imposed on the charge of attempting to pervert the course of justice, the total effective sentence and the non-parole period was manifestly excessive.

Held: Application for extension of time within which to file application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence dismissed.

Re conviction:

Re Ground 1(a), it was difficult to see how there was any miscarriage of justice in the judge giving a direction under s 21. If defence counsel had raised the prosecutor's failure to address the incriminating conduct, the judge would have granted the prosecutor leave to address the jury further and given the same direction.

Re Ground 1(b), it was well open to the jury to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant was attempting to persuade the complainant to lie in the relevant phone conversations. There was no issue that the applicant told the complainant:

- she should tell the police that she was not in her right state of mind when she made the allegations and that she wished to drop the charges;
- he would pay for a lawyer to make a statutory declaration for her, in which she would state that she was not in her right mind when she made her statement and could not remember making the allegations against him; and
- she should not talk on the phone about him assaulting her, as the calls between them were being recorded.

These words were not neutral as to the applicant's guilt or otherwise of the offending. Nothing he said suggested that the complainant's allegations were false or that the alleged events had not taken place. On the contrary, it was open to the jury to view the statements as demonstrating his belief that he was guilty.

Re sentence:

The court made the following observations relevant to coercive control at [65]:

> In our view, the applicant's persistent and cynical assertion of control over the complainant, and his exploitation of her known vulnerabilities, made this case just as serious as if there had been explicit threats or actual violence. The transcripts of the calls make plain his exertion of coercive psychological > pressure on her, encouraging her to think that they can 'work things out' between them and asking questions like 'Do you want me to get out or not?' The fact that the conduct about which he was asking her to lie involved his own criminal violence against her was a further aggravating feature. In our view, the applicant's moral culpability for this offence was high.

The sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive including in light of: the applicant's high moral culpability, not guilty plea, seriousness of the offending, significant prior criminal history, and the importance of general and specific deterrence.

Re delay:

The lack of an adequate explanation for months of delay was unsatisfactory. It provided further basis upon which to refuse the extension of time applications.

Hardwick (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 67 (19 March 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Appeal against sentence' – 'Common assault' – 'False imprisonment' – 'Manifest excess' – 'Protection order' – 'Separation' – 'Threat to kill'

Charges: False imprisonment x 1; Common assault x 1; Aggravated burglary x 1; Making a threat to kill x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant man pleaded guilty to offences committed against his wife following their separation. The appellant waited until she returned home, restrained her (including using cable ties), prevented her from escaping, and threatened to kill her. The wife managed to escape. The appellant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 4 years and 6 months' imprisonment, with a 3 year non-parole period. He had also breached an order protecting his wife on numerous previous occasions.

Grounds of appeal: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Held: Appeal was dismissed but noting that the sentence was "very stern" and "at the uppermost extremity of the appropriate range."

The sentence for the aggravated burglary charge was not manifestly excessive. Previous decisions reinforced "the seriousness with which the courts view aggravated burglaries" and identify typical matters that might aggravate a particular instance of the offence. While the offending was not "an act of extreme domestic violence," as characterised by the sentencing judge, overall the offending was serious. The sentencing judge was entitled to have significant reservations regarding the appellant's remorse and insight which underpinned the importance of specific deterrence. General deterrence was also important in the context of family violence.

The sentences for false imprisonment and threat to kill were also not manifestly excessive. In particular, "[t]he false imprisonment extended over a period of time and involved physical restraint. The imprisonment in her own home, in the context of family violence would have been extremely distressing to the victim. It deserves powerful denunciation. Equally, the threat to kill was serious. The threat was made in circumstances where the appellant told his victim that he was concealing things 'that you don't want to see'. The whole incident did not have an obvious end point and the appellant's behaviour would have instilled a substantial sense of dread and fear." The degree of cumulation was also not manifestly excessive.

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Forgiveness of victim' – 'Intentionally cause serious injury' – 'Lack of history of domestic violence' – 'Listening to Victims' – 'Mercy' – 'Separation' – 'Weapons and threats to kill'

Charges: Intentionally causing serious injury x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant pleaded guilty to stabbing his wife 5 times. There was no prior history of domestic and family violence. He was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 7 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 4 years and 6 months.

Grounds of appeal:

1. The sentencing judge erred in failing to take into account the victim's full recovery.
2. The sentencing judge erred in treating the victim's forgiveness with extreme caution, and having regard to it only insofar as it boded well for the applicant's rehabilitation, rather than also taking it into account in assessing the impact upon the victim and in considering the application of the principle of mercy. In particular:
   (a) Her Honour took into account irrelevant considerations namely forgiveness of a victim is often attributable to a pattern of behaviour on the part of perpetrators of family violence and her family had “persuaded” her to forgive the applicant.

(b) Her Honour failed to take into account relevant considerations which indicated that the victim’s forgiveness was genuine/informed.

(c) Her Honour’s conclusion was not reasonable open.

(d) The applicant was denied procedural fairness.

3. The sentence was manifestly excessive in light of all the relevant matters, including that the applicant called emergency services, his confessions, his very early guilty plea, his lack of relevant prior convictions, his lack of history of violence, and the fact that he was of no risk of reoffending.

Held: Application for leave to appeal dismissed.

Ground 1: It was fortunate that the victim had made a good physical and emotional recovery but this did not negate that this was a serious example of the offence causing serious injury. The applicant’s moral culpability was also high.

Ground 2: Counsel for the applicant was plainly on notice that the judge was minded to apply the principles regarding victims’ forgiveness stated by Neave JA in R v Hester at [27]. It was not open to argue he was denied procedural fairness.

It could not be reasonably maintained that the judge erred in failing to extend “mercy” to the applicant. This was a serious instance of intentionally causing serious injury, noting “[i]t would be most difficult to comprehend how mercy can be properly extended in a case in which a man has overpowered his wife in her home, and proceeded to violently stab her five times with a knife, thereby penetrating her vital organs and putting her life at risk” at [45].

While it seemed the sentencing judge incorrectly inferred that the victim had been persuaded by male family members to express forgiveness (with reference to Hester), that observation “could not materially have affected the question whether her Honour should have extended mercy to the applicant.” Further, the judge correctly took into account the relevance of the victim’s forgiveness to motivating the applicant’s rehabilitation.

Ground 3: Without the compelling mitigating circumstances present in this case, the sentence would have been properly characterised as lenient. Accordingly, the sentence appropriately reflected the mitigating factors referred to by the applicant. In light of the gravity of the offending, and the importance of general deterrence and denunciation, the sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive: [53]-[57].

Edwards v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 339 (23 December 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Appeal against sentence' – 'Dysfunctional upbringing' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Guilty plea' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Manslaughter' – 'Moral culpability' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Victim as (alleged) perpetrator'

Charges: Manslaughter x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant woman stabbed the male victim, her partner for just over 12 months, in the neck and he died of the injuries inflicted. The applicant pleaded guilty to one charge of manslaughter and was sentenced to 9 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 6 years and 9 months: R v Edwards [2019] VSC 234 (12 April 2019).

Grounds of appeal:

1. The sentencing judge erred in finding that her moral culpability was not lessened in any way by the violence perpetrated upon her.
2. The sentencing judge erred in finding that her moral culpability was high notwithstanding her severely disadvantaged background.
3. The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Held: The appeal was refused.

Ground 1: The sentencing judge's finding of moral culpability was open on the evidence for the reasons she gave. This included evidence that the applicant and victim had been violent towards each other, but with the applicant as most often the aggressor; the offending took place in the context of heavy methamphetamine use; and the applicant had a traumatic childhood, and a history of controlling and abusive relationships. Had there been evidence of a causal link between the applicant's stabbing of the victim and his acts of violence towards her, the sentencing considerations may have been quite different (at [15]-[23]).

Ground 2: It was well open to the sentencing judge to find that notwithstanding the applicant's severely disadvantaged background her moral culpability remained high. The applicant's offending was heavily influenced by her drug use at the relevant time (at [24]-[27]). It was also not open for the applicant to contend that her moral culpability was lessened as her offending was causally linked to her drug use. She had expressly disavowed such a causal link on the plea and the submission was not supported by the authorities (which instead related to instances where a person commits an offence to satisfy a drug addiction, relevant to moral culpability and rehabilitation) ([28]-[32]).

Ground 3: The sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive. The sentencing judge gave proper consideration to all relevant features of the offending and the offender. After finding that high moral culpability was established, it was not reasonably arguable that the sentence was outside the range open to the sentencing judge given the objective seriousness of the offending ("planned and deliberate"), the maximum penalty for manslaughter, and the weight to be given to the sentencing purposes identified by the sentencing judge (particularly "just punishment, denunciation…and general deterrence") ([33]-[39]).

Shau v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 252 (25 September 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'No history of domestic violence' – 'People who are pregnant'

Charges: Recklessly causing injury x 1; Reckless conduct endangering life x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant man punched, kicked and stomped on his pregnant wife. The attack started in a car, which his wife was driving, and ended up at a service station.

> [18] Footage captured on CCTV at the service station depicts the appellant grabbing and dragging Lee by the hair on at least two occasions; punching and striking her with his hands and fists, mostly in the region of her head, on at least seven occasions; and kicking and stomping her to the head, neck, shoulder and torso region on at least 19 occasions. Lee curled up into a ball to protect her unborn child and raised her hands to protect her face.

The wife suffered extensive injuries. The appellant then drove his car at speed into the service station where his wife had sought shelter, smashing through the wall and wedging the vehicle inside the store. That conduct endangered the life of the service station attendant who had locked the doors of the shop to prevent the appellant from coming in after his wife. The victim gave evidence that there had been 'no earlier instances of domestic violence' and that the appellant was 'drunk at the time of the offending'.

Issues: (1) Whether the sentence is manifestly excessive.

Decision and reasoning: Appeal dismissed.

Aggravating factors considered by the sentencing judge included that:

> [32] … the offending occurred in the context of domestic violence …
> [the victim] was five months' pregnant at the time …
> It was a lengthy, repetitive and violent bashing of a woman who was considerably smaller and of much lesser strength than you …
> You must have been aware of the likelihood of injury to her …
> You must have been aware that she would be terrified as a consequence of your attack upon her and terrified of the serious risk of injury to her and to her unborn child.

Priest JA referred to his own comments in granting the application for leave to appeal observing that the seriousness of the offence in this case 'is not only to be gauged by the injuries caused, but also the manner of their infliction (in this case a protracted and very violent assault on a vulnerable victim)'.

Niall JA observed:

> [46] Compounding, to a significant degree, the seriousness of the offence is the fact that it occurred within the context of a family relationship. That fact had two relevant consequences. First, it meant that the offending arose in a relationship of trust. Lee was five months' pregnant and ought to have enjoyed protection and care from her husband. The breach of trust necessarily made the offending more serious.
> [47] Next, the courts must respond to the blight of family violence by imposing punishment that denounces the conduct and adequately addresses general deterrence. Unlike in many cases, there was no basis in the evidence to suggest that there had been earlier incidents of violence. In her evidence, Lee said that the appellant had never assaulted her before. For that reason, the conduct was, on the evidence, an aberration. Lee expressed support for her husband on the plea. However, there remains a very high public interest in punishing family violence, both for its denunciatory and deterrent effect, even where the victim seeks leniency and incarceration would place great pressure on the domestic relationship.

[50] Accommodating all of the relevant factors, both aggravating and moderating the sentence, may result in a sentence that represents a high proportion of the maximum, even on a plea of guilty.

Hardwick (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 227 (7 September 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'False imprisonment' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Separation' – 'Strangulation' – 'Technology-facilitated abuse' – 'Threats to kill'

Charges: False imprisonment x 1; Common assault x 1; Aggravated burglary x 1; Making threats to kill x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant man, who was subject to a protection order, entered the marital home and repositioned the CCTV cameras away from the house. When his female former partner (the victim) came home, he grabbed and restrained her, putting her in a headlock, then pinning her to the ground. The applicant tried to tape the victim's mouth with duct tape and bound her hands with cable ties before forcing her inside the house. The applicant locked the door and bound the victim's feet with cable ties. The applicant threatened to kill her. When one of the children arrived at the house, the victim was able to escape from the house. A neighbour called the police.

Grounds: (3) Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and reasoning: Leave to appeal granted for Ground 3.

[55] Coincidentally, on the very day that this application was argued before me, this Court delivered judgment in Hill v The Queen. That case concerned a home invasion by a woman who had been left by her former partner. She armed herself with a knife, forced her way into the house, and stabbed both her former partner and his new girlfriend. She faced charges not only of aggravated burglary, but also two counts of intentionally causing injury. The offending seemed to have been premeditated, and was described by the judge as 'grievance driven' and 'purposeful'. The total effective sentence is 6 years and

> 3 months, with a non-parole period of 3 years and 6 months. In effect, the motive for the applicant's conduct in was anger at abandonment, and animosity towards her husband's new partner.
> [57] It is noteworthy that the offender in Hill received a non-parole period which was only 6 months greater than that fixed for the applicant. That minimal disparity, of itself, raises a question in my mind as to whether he was treated in accordance with current sentencing practice. It is of some interest to note that the sentencing judge in Hill was the same judge who sentenced the applicant in the present matter. I recognise, of course, that this Court described the sentences imposed in Hill as 'moderate', as indeed they were. Be that as it may, I regard the offending in Hill as far more serious than that in the present case.

Hill v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 220 (3 September 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Appeal against sentence' – 'Causing injury intentionally' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Home invasion' – 'Separation' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Threat to kill x 1; Aggravated burglary x 1; Causing injury intentionally x 2.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant and her husband separated seven months earlier, when the husband formed a relationship with his new partner. The applicant regularly accused her former partner of infidelity and made disparaging comments about his new partner. The applicant occasionally made threats about killing her former partner and his new partner to the applicant's daughter, but the daughter did not take these seriously. On 19 October 2017, the applicant assaulted her daughter. The applicant was charged with assault and a protection order was taken out against her to protect her daughter. On the same day, the applicant threatened to kill her former husband, his new partner and his next-door neighbour. Later that day, the applicant carried out the violent home invasion.

The female applicant armed herself with weapons (a length of pipe and a knife) and smashed a window to enter the home of her ex-husband and his new partner. The applicant attacked her ex-husband and his new partner, stabbing them both.

Grounds: The sentencing judge erred in (a) failing to find, on the balance of probabilities, that the applicant had experienced protracted family violence; and (b) finding that the offending was 'purposeful and grievance-driven'.

Decision and reasoning: Leave to appeal refused.

> [4] In seeking leave to appeal, the applicant disputed the judge's characterisation of the offending as 'purposeful and grievance-driven'. According to the submission, the true explanation for the applicant's conduct lay in the history of violence inflicted on her by [former partner] during the marriage. Instead of aligning the case with those involving male-to-female violence following a relationship breakdown, it was said, the judge should have viewed the applicant's conduct as reflecting the 'very different psychological pathway' which results from protracted domestic violence.

That submission was rejected as there was no objective evidence to establish a link between the offending and violence experienced by the applicant during the marriage. All of the evidence before the sentencing judge supported the conclusion that "what drove this very serious offending was the applicant's distress at having been 'abandoned' by her former partner and anger towards [his new partner] for 'taking' her husband".

> Senior counsel for the applicant rightly conceded that general deterrence is a significant sentencing factor in this case, not only in relation to aggravated burglary generally, but most particularly in relation to violent offending against a former domestic partner. … Offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to the breakdown of a relationship is one of possessive, violent rage. It goes without saying that such a response, to what is a common human situation, is utterly unacceptable. This Court has made it clear that such offending will attract serious consequences …
> [38] In the present case, the offending was perpetrated by a female against her former male partner (and his new partner). But, in our respectful view, the judge was quite correct to view it as falling into the same category of post-separation, anger-driven violence.
> [39] In our view, no other conclusion was reasonably open on the material before the Court but that it was that anger — directed both at [her former partner and his new partner] — which was the driving force behind this offending. This was well illustrated by the applicant's having said to [the victim] that she would 'never stop' stabbing her. It may be accepted that the applicant was not making 'an assertion of possession and control'. But that seems to us to be immaterial. What matters is that, seemingly unable to accept the fact of the separation, the applicant gave vent to her anger and distress by this appallingly violent invasion of [her former husband's] home.

[40] The position would have been entirely different had there been any evidence before the sentencing judge that prior violence (or threats of violence) by [her former partner] towards the applicant had so affected her as to provide an explanation for the offending. The profound and long-lasting psychological effects of domestic violence are well-established and, where a proper evidentiary basis is established, can have a very significant impact on the court's view of the culpability of an offender and may even preclude criminal responsibility.

[41] But that was not this case. As defence counsel properly conceded on the plea, there was no such evidence. There was no suggestion, for example, that the applicant had been driven to act in this way by things done to her during the marriage. On the contrary, all the evidence showed that what prompted this attack was the ending of the marriage and [her former partner's] commencement of a relationship with another woman.

Freeburn v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 155 (17 June 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Application for leave to appeal against conviction' – 'Controlling, jealous, possessive behaviour' – 'Intention' – 'Past domestic and family violence' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charges: Murder

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against conviction

Facts: The applicant man was convicted of the murder of his female intimate partner and sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 20 years. The victim was mildly intellectually disabled and had been the victim of domestic violence in a prior relationship. The applicant acted in a jealous and possessive manner towards her, which sometimes included acts of violence. After the assault which resulted in the victim's death the applicant left the victim alive, but in a debilitated state and failed to seek assistance. He admitted to having "lost control" and seriously injuring the victim. An autopsy showed the victim suffered around 43 injuries, mostly soft tissue injuries caused by moderate blunt force trauma. Toxicology testing revealed the presence of GHB in her body. Expert witnesses disagreed as to whether the assault caused the victim's death: one forensic pathologist believed the victim died as a consequence of soft tissue injuries sustained in an assault in the context of her using GHB; another said that the cause of death could not be determined.

Grounds:

1. The jury's verdict of guilt was unreasonable and cannot be supported having regard to the evidence.
   Particulars:
   (a) The evidence failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant had caused the death of the deceased.
   (b) The evidence failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant had intended to cause grievous bodily harm to the deceased.

2. The trial miscarried due to the admission of prejudicial evidence that a closed circuit television system had been deactivated prior to the death of the deceased.

Held: Ground 1 was allowed, the murder conviction was set aside, and the Court substituted a verdict of manslaughter. Ground 2 was dismissed.

The Court found that whilst it was open for the jury to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant's actions, in assaulting the victim, were the substantial and operative cause of her death, it was not reasonably open to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant intended to cause her really serious injury ([106]). Taken at its highest, the admission the applicant made to Witness A was that as a result of causing her death, he had enjoyed or experienced a significant rush of adrenalin ([93]). Further, the Court accepted that a jury could not reasonably conclude that Witness A's evidence was either truthful or reliable ([94]). Whilst the assessment and credibility of a particular witness is essentially a matter for the jury, that proposition does not preclude the assessment by an appellate court of the evidence given by that witness (Pell v The Queen [2020] HCA 12 (7 April 2020)) ([95]).

The verdict of manslaughter was substituted because the applicant caused the victim's death by an unlawful and dangerous act and it was inevitable that the jury would conclude that a reasonable person in the applicant's position would have realised they were exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury [104]. Leaving the victim in a severely debilitated state and refraining from obtaining medical or other assistance constituted criminal negligence for the purpose of the offence of manslaughter. The evidence was that the applicant was well-aware that the victim required assistance and treatment. It was inevitable that the jury would have been satisfied the applicant's actions fell so far short of the standard of care which a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances, and involved such a high risk of death or really serious bodily injury, as to merit criminal punishment ([105]).

Ground 2 failed because the prosecution did not put to the jury that the evidence could or should be used as evidence of incriminating conduct by the applicant ([120]) and the judge gave a clear and specific direction to the jury that it should not rely on the evidence, and explained why it was of no probative value ([121]).

Note: The applicant was subsequently resentenced to 12 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 9 years: Freeburn v The Queen (No 2) [2020] VSCA 176 (1 July 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal.

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Children' – 'Covid-19 pandemic' – 'Double punishment' – 'Non-fatal strangulation' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Recklessly cause injury x 1; intentionally damage property x 1; possess a firearm while a prohibited person x 1; attempt to pervert the course of justice x 1; persistently contravene a family violence intervention order x 1

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Facts: The applicant pleaded guilty to recklessly causing injury (grabbing her by the throat causing bruising and breathing difficulty), intentionally damaging property, possessing a firearm while a prohibited person, attempting to pervert the course of justice (a number of phone calls demanding the victim retract her statement), and persistently contravening a family violence intervention order. He also pleaded guilty to a series of related summary charges, including failing to store a firearm in a secure manner, possessing cartridge ammunition while unlicensed, and committing an indictable offence while on bail. The offending occurred in the context of family violence within a domestic relationship. The applicant was sentenced to 3 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 2 years.

At the time of the offending, the applicant lived with his former partner (the victim). They had been in a 'turbulent "on again, off again"' relationship for around 16 years. The applicant had been subject to 3 intervention orders and a family violence safety notice prior to the present offending. The relationship came to an end, however, the victim and their daughters had continued to visit the applicant in custody until the recent COVID-19 pandemic.

In relation to the most serious charge of attempting to pervert the course of justice, the sentencing judge noted the fear that the victim must have experienced as a result of the applicant's threats over the phone ([20]). The offences involving the possession of the firearm were linked to, and committed "because of [the applicant's] mental state with the intention of self-harm" ([22]). With regard to the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation, his Honour accepted that the offending occurred "in the context of a daily methamphetamine habit". The applicant had a long history of addiction to drugs, and his prospects of rehabilitation were considered guarded ([25]). The applicant's guilty pleas, however, entitled him to a reduction in sentence ([26]). His criminal history related mainly to driving or drink-driving offences ([27]). With regard to the applicant's Indigenous background, the judge took into account the fact that he came from a disadvantaged background, experienced deprivation and poverty, suffered from learning difficulties, and had been exposed to substance abuse and mental health issues ([28]).

- The sentence was manifestly excessive.
- The applicant had suffered double punishment in that the base sentence of 2 years imposed on charge 4 (attempt to pervert the course of justice), and the sentence of 6 months imposed on charge 5 (persistent breach of intervention order), had resulted in 3 months cumulation.
- The totality principle was offended in cumulation of sentencing.
- Insufficient weight was given to prospects for rehabilitation based on the applicant's limited history of prior offending, his not having served a previous term of imprisonment, Aboriginal background, difficulties faced while in prison and efforts made to participate in programs while on remand.

Held: The Court of Appeal held that the sentence imposed on the charge of attempting to pervert the course of justice was not manifestly excessive. The applicant's conduct was persistent and involved repeated threats of violence to the victim ([69]). "An attempt to pervert the course of justice is a substantive, and not an inchoate offence", and "any conduct that meets [its] description must be viewed seriously and denounced appropriately" ([70]). The submission in relation to double punishment was rejected as the elements of charges 4 and 5 were separate and distinct: "The criminality involved in attempting to persuade [the victim] to withdraw her complaint against the applicant, through the use of threats, harassment, and a form of emotional blackmail, was conceptually, and practically, separate from the deliberate and persistent contraventions of the family violence intervention order". The judge was therefore entitled to order some degree of cumulation between them ([72]). Ground 4 also failed as the judge considered all relevant matters, and it was open, on the evidence, to conclude that the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation were guarded ([73]). As there was no error by the sentencing judge, the Court refused leave to appeal.

Stapleton v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 147 (4 June 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Gambling' – 'Guilty plea' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Separation' – 'Theft'

Charge(s): Aggravated burglary x 1; intentionally causing injury x 1; intentionally damaging property x 1; theft x 1; unlawful assault x 1

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Grounds: The sentence was manifestly excessive, in particular:

1. the sentences imposed on the charges of aggravated burglary, intentionally causing injury and unlawful assault were manifestly excessive;
2. the learned sentencing judge placed excessive weight on a finding of a lack of remorse, and insufficient weight on compelling mitigating factors (such as his guilty plea, prior good character and the absence of prior convictions); and
3. the orders for cumulation infringed the totality principle and produced a manifestly excessive total effective sentence and non-parole period.

Facts: In 2018, the applicant man pleaded guilty to a series of offences committed against his wife of 20 years (the victim). The offending occurred in the context of the breakdown of their domestic relationship, in the early hours of the morning at the victim's home. He broke into the house, pushed the victim against the wall, and assaulted her boyfriend. When the victim sought to intervene, the applicant verbally abused her and threw her against the bedroom wall, causing her head to go through the plaster. The applicant continued to punch the victim's boyfriend, and after another attempted intervention by the victim, he threw her across the room. He also damaged her boyfriend's car. The applicant left the premises but returned about half an hour later. Once again, he barged through the front door, entered the bedroom, grabbed the victim's hair and threw her against the wall, and continued to physically abuse her boyfriend. He also punched the victim in the face. While she was attempting to contact her friend, the applicant snatched her phone and left the house with it. The applicant was arrested later the same morning.

At sentence, the judge noted that the applicant had been drinking heavily and told police that there had been a slow build-up of emotion. His account to police was also seen as an attempt to minimise his conduct ([23]-[25]). Further, the sentencing judge stated that "offending of this nature is all too often perpetrated by men who respond to difficulties in a relationship, with possessive, violent rage" ([27]). Mention was also made to the victim impact statements which detailed the applicant's history of domestic violence towards the victim, specifically in the form of mental abuse ([28]-[29]). The applicant had a lengthy history of heavy drinking and extensive difficulties with gambling, which resulted in the sale of the family home in order to pay his debts ([32]). The judge characterised the motive for the applicant's offending as a desire to exact revenge for the victim's having interfered in his relationship with another woman, and observed that his return to the house on the second occasion demonstrated a degree of premeditation. The applicant had no prior convictions ([33]). His guilty plea was not made at the earliest opportunity, and in his record of interview, he sought to downplay the gravity of the offending, blamed the victim for his behaviour, and falsely denied having punched her boyfriend ([34]). In these circumstances, her Honour was not persuaded that the applicant "deeply regretted his wrongdoing and desired to atone for it". While there was some level of remorse, this was not given much weight ([36]). Her Honour also explained that a combination sentence was inappropriate as the offending was too serious ([38]). He was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 3 years' and 7 months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 2 years.

Held: The Court of Appeal granted leave to appeal and dismissed the appeal. It stated that "aggravated burglary, where the offender's intent is to assault and injure a former domestic partner, must always be regarded as an offence of a serious nature" ([60]). The appeal ground of manifest excessiveness was difficult to maintain in light of the aggravated burglary and serious assaults committed on that second occasion ([62]). The Court held that the sentencing judge took into account and gave weight to all relevant mitigating factors. The applicant did not succeed in his submission that the judge erred in her finding that little weight should be given to his remorse, as she "took great pains to explain why, putting to one side the remorse associated with the plea of guilty, she could give little weight to what the applicant had told various third parties about how he felt" ([64]-[65]).

'Application for leave to appeal against conviction' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Mental element' – 'Obsessive behaviours' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Unsafe and unsatisfactory verdict'

Offences: Recklessly cause serious injury in circumstances of gross violence; Intentionally destroy property

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against conviction; Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Grounds (conviction):

1. The jury verdict was unsafe and unsatisfactory, where there was a marked disparity between the size and weight of the appellant's car and the victim's truck and trailer such that it was not open to the jury to find that by consciously voluntarily and deliberately colliding with the truck and trailer she:
   (a) Foresaw the likelihood that the collision would cause serious injury, or
   (b) When planning her conduct, either intended, was reckless that or foresaw it was more likely than not that her conduct would cause serious injury to the victim.

2. The judge incorrectly directed the jury that the Intentionally destroy property charge could be established by an intent to damage or destroy the truck, when the indictment alleged that the appellant intended to destroy the truck, resulting in a miscarriage of justice.

Grounds (sentence):

1. The judge erred by applying the wrong test under s 10A(2)(e) Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) when considering whether "special reasons" existed to justify imposing a non-parole period of less than four years.
2. The judge should have imposed a large, if not complete, degree of concurrency in relation to the sentences for the two charges.
3. The head sentence imposed was outside the permissible range, the non-parole period was excessive, and the judge failed to give sufficient weight to the appellant's previous good character and prospects of rehabilitation.

Facts: The female applicant was driving a Toyota Camry car when it collided with a truck and tanker trailer which was driven by the male victim. The vehicles were travelling in opposite directions on an open stretch of highway; the applicant's car crossing the centre line and colliding with the front right-hand side of the truck. The truck rolled, causing the victim serious injury (a severe laceration to his scalp and two fractured vertebrae in his neck) and extensive damage ($900,000 worth) to the truck and trailer (which were later written-off). The applicant sustained minor injuries.

The applicant and victim had been in a sexual relationship for some time and had a daughter together, although they disagreed as to the nature of the relationship (the victim believed it to be only sexual/physical while the applicant was "besotted" with the victim). When the victim was driving his truck, the appellant would often follow him in her car and turn up at his home. On the day of the offending, the victim had stopped for a break at a parking bay and was approached by the applicant who threw the remote control to the victim's garage at him, told him she was pregnant and yelled "I'll kill you" before driving off. The applicant had stated on numerous occasions that "if she couldn't have [the victim], nobody would" and that she should "take him out" by "driving straight into him".

The applicant was convicted of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence and intentionally destroying property, and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of five years.

Judgment: The court dismissed the application for leave to appeal against conviction. The court rejected Ground 1, finding that it was open to the jury to conclude that the appellant knew the collision would probably cause serious injury to the victim because of the nature of the collision (high speed, head-on, on an open road) and the threats made by the applicant [40]. The court noted that "The issue for the jury was not which of the two drivers bore the greatest risk of injury but whether the applicant knew the truck driver would probably be seriously injured" [39]. The court also rejected Ground 2, finding that the applicant did not seek to make a distinction between damage and destruction at trial [48] and in any event, any disconformity between the indictment and the way the case was run at trial could have been resolved by amending the indictment [49].

The court also dismissed the appeal against sentence. The court rejected Ground 1, finding that while the judge incorrectly approached s 10(1) as if it called for an assessment of a non-parole period for the s 15B offence alone, the answer the judge gave to that assessment demonstrated that "there was never any possibility of a non-parole period for the whole of the offending of less than four years" and that there was no basis to consider that the judge could have found substantial and compelling circumstances justifying a non-parole period of less than four years [94]. The court further held that, "When regard is had to the additional criminality of the conduct underpinning [the Intentionally destroy property charge], we are satisfied that any error in applying the 'special reasons' provisions could not have played any role in the sentence imposed on the individual charges or in setting the non-parole period" [94].

The court also rejected Ground 2, holding that the two charges were very serious, and separate, offences and the extent to which the sentences were to be made concurrent was the discretion of the sentencing judge [99]. The court further rejected Ground 3, holding that neither the sentence nor its constituent parts were wholly outside the permissible range [100]. The court noted that the offending was grave and "exceptionally dangerous conduct" that had "very serious consequences" for which the conduct needed to be denounced and punished [103]. The appellant did not have the utilitarian benefit of a plea and there was no evidence of remorse [103].

Laa v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 136 (28 May 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Children' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Misuse of alcohol' – 'Non-fatal strangulation' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Separation' – 'Threats to kill'

Offences: Using a carriage service to menace, harass or cause offence; Aggravated burglary; Common assault; Making a threat to kill.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Grounds:

1. The sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. The findings by the judge concerning the applicant's level of remorse, and his prospects for rehabilitation, were not supported by the evidence.

Facts: The male applicant commenced a relationship with the female victim in 2006 and the couple had two children together. Their relationship involved periods of separation and reconciliation. During the periods of separation, the applicant would stay at the victim's house overnight on the days he would see the children.

However, the overnight stays and the regular visits to see the children ceased after several arguments between the applicant and the victim. One night, the applicant sent the victim 14 text messages, threatening to come after her and kill her. The next morning, the applicant went to the victim's house and banged on the front door repeatedly. The victim told the applicant to leave and that she had called police. The applicant tried to break open a sliding door with an outdoor chair but failed, so smashed two front windows and entered the house through the unlocked front door. The victim secured herself and the children in her bedroom by placing a wedge under the door but the applicant forced the door open. The victim was on the phone to 000, so the applicant took the phone, terminated the call and hit the victim repeatedly on the head, face and neck with the phone. The children were crying as this occurred.

The victim fled outside but the applicant followed her and dragged her indoors where he forced her to the ground, choked her and told her he would kill her and her family. The applicant took the children and placed them in the car, then returned and punched the victim in the face, knocking her to the ground. He drove off (during which time the victim called 000) but returned and started banging on the front door again. The victim let him in because she did not want to antagonise him. The applicant locked the front door and punched her in the face a number of times, telling her that he would kill her whole family. Police arrived and arrested the applicant who denied the assaults and the threats to kill. He was convicted on all charges and sentenced to four years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of two years and two months.

At trial, the court accepted that the applicant was a refugee from South Sudan [20] and that he began drinking excessive quantities of alcohol due to his financial struggles and it was in this context that the offending occurred [23].

Judgment: The court dismissed the appeal. In rejecting Ground 1, the court held that the offending was particularly serious and the applicant's moral culpability was high [53], despite the mitigating factors being "quite substantial" [55]. The court noted that "confrontational aggravated burglaries, in the setting of an underlying domestic dispute, are all too prevalent in our society. They are calculated to cause lasting and serious physical and emotional harm to the victim. By their nature, such offences have the potential to escalate into incidents that result in serious harm and, on occasion, human tragedy" [50]. As a result, general deterrence is of significance in such cases [50], as is condemnation by the courts of such conduct [51]. The court further noted that "The courts have made it clear that acts of violence in a domestic setting, and in particular by men towards women, are utterly abhorrent and unacceptable" and the fact that the assaults occurred in the presence of the couple's children was a serious aggravating factor, a "serious breach of [the applicant's] duty as a parent towards his own children" and an "appalling example" of behaviour for the children, particularly the son [52].

The court also rejected Ground 2, finding that the delay between the date of offending and the date the applicant entered a guilty plea (22 months) was a sufficient basis for the judge to entertain genuine reservations about the applicant's level of remorse, and his prospects of rehabilitation [42], despite a plea of guilty often being an indicator of genuine remorse [45].

Ballantyne v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 115 (11 May 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Early plea' – 'Loaded firearm' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Remorse' – 'Substance abuse' – 'Suicide threat' – 'Threat to kill'

Offences: Carrying a loaded firearm in a place with reckless disregard for the safety of another x 1; Making a threat to kill x 1; Possessing drug of dependence x 1; Contravention of family violence intervention order x 2; Failing to store a category A/B long arm correctly x 1; Failing to store category A/B long arm ammunition correctly x 1; Possessing a prohibited weapon x 1

Issue: Whether sentence was manifestly excessive.

Facts: The appellant man and female victim had been in a relationship for 14 years and were married at the time of the offending. The appellant threatened to kill himself in front of the victim, leaving the house and returning with a shotgun. He swung the shotgun in front of the victim like a baseball bat, then touched the barrel to her forehead before pushing it into her eye socket and threatening to kill her "slowly" [25]. The appellant fired a shot into the TV then pointed the gun back at the victim's head and threatened to shoot her again [25]. The victim was held like this for around three hours. The appellant plead guilty and was sentenced to four years and three months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of three years and six months. At the sentencing hearing, the appellant alleged that he did not remember the incident. Medical evidence was also tendered showing that the appellant had a history of depression and alcohol abuse, but that he had committed to make improvements and had ceased alcohol and prescription medication [17].

The appellant appealed against this sentence on the following grounds:

1. The individual sentences on charges 1 and 2 and the total effective sentence are manifestly excessive.

2. The non-parole period is manifestly excessive and in particular:
   i) The ratio of 17.65% of the head sentence is manifestly low having regard to the fact that the applicant had no relevant prior convictions and his prospects for rehabilitation were relatively good;
   ii) The purported reason for this ratio that '… there is potently no remorse …' … was not a good reason for denying the applicant a greater period of parole; and
   iii) The learned sentencing judge erred in finding that in the circumstances there was '… potently no remorse …' … .
3. The learned sentencing judge erred in finding that there was a complete absence of remorse, and as a result the individual sentences, the total effective sentence and the non-parole period are manifestly excessive.

Held: The court refused to uphold ground 1 as the sentences were not manifestly excessive. The conduct founding the Making a threat to kill charge "constituted a very serious example of the offence" [25] and that, balancing the seriousness of the offending with the mitigating factors (see [24]), the sentence was proportionate [26] and punished the appellant to an extent just in all the circumstances [28]. Even though the sentence imposed was more lengthy than the general trend for the offence of threat to kill in recent cases, "[s]entences in comparable cases … are not precedents which must be applied", but each case must turn on its own facts [28].

However, the court upheld ground 2, providing that the finding by the sentencing judge that the appellant was not remorseful did not justify the imposition of a relatively high non-parole period [32]. The purpose of fixing a non-parole period is to "provide for mitigation of the punishment of the prisoner in favour of his rehabilitation through conditional freedom, when appropriate" (Power v The Queen (1974) 131 CLR 623 at 629). The court substituted a non-parole period of two years and six months [33].

Furthermore, the court partially upheld ground 3, finding that the trial judge erred in finding that there was a complete absence of remorse. The court provided that it considered "that there was some evidence of remorse to be drawn from the early pleas of guilty and from the applicant's insight and incipient commitment to reform" [19]. The court referred to its reasons for finding against the remainder of ground 3 (namely, whether the sentences and non-parole period were manifestly excessive).

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order possession of weapon' – 'Separation'

Charges: Criminal damage x 1; attempt to pervert the course of justice x 1; possess prohibited weapon x 1; contravene family violence intervention order x 1

Case Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence for possess prohibited weapon

Facts: In 2019, the applicant went to his former partner's property and caused damage. He was arrested the next day, and police searched his vehicle and found a home-made laser pointer. While in custody, he made telephone calls whereby he attempted to have people call his former partner and ask her to withdraw her police statement. The applicant pleaded guilty to criminal damage, and attempting to pervert the course of justice. He also pleaded guilty to 2 summary offences, carrying a prohibited weapon and contravening a family violence intervention order. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 2 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 15 months. The individual sentence imposed on the weapon offence was 2 months' imprisonment to be served cumulatively on the sentences for the other offending.

Ground: The sentence and the order for cumulation on this charge was manifestly excessive because, inter alia, the offending was not aggravated in any material way and the accused pleaded guilty to the offence at the earliest available opportunity.

Held: The Court allowed the appeal, set aside the sentence on the weapon offence, and ordered that the applicant be convicted and discharged on that charge. The applicant's counsel submitted that the laser pointer had not been used as a weapon, and that it was not used in connection with any of the other offending. Despite the fact that the applicant had prior convictions for possessing controlled and prohibited weapons, it was clear that the sentence for the weapon offence was "egregiously excessive", given the intrinsic nature of the weapon, the lack of material as to whether the applicant had or would have used it, and the complete absence of evidence supporting the sentencing judge's findings that it was potentially dangerous and could cause injury ([18]). As a consequence, the total effective sentence was amended to 22 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 13 months.

Tedford v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 71 (26 March 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Attempted murder' – 'Guilty plea' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Motor vehicle' – 'Older people' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Separation' – 'Suicide attempt'

Charges: Attempted murder x1; Reckless conduct endangering persons of serious injury x1.

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Ground: The individual sentence on Charge 2, order for cumulation, total effective sentence and non-parole period are manifestly excessive, having regard to the five-year maximum penalty for the offence, the fact that it was committed in the context of a suicide attempt, and the significant factors in mitigation, including the applicant's early pleas of guilty, advanced age and ill health, and prior good character.

Facts: The applicant was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment on the charge of attempted murder of his wife and two years and six months' imprisonment on the charge of reckless conduct endangering persons of serious injury for driving his vehicle into a train. On year of the sentence or chare 2 was cumulative on the sentence for charge 1, resulting in a total effective sentence of nine years' imprisonment.

The applicant 77 year old man and female victim were married but had separated at the time of offending, the wife moving out of the family home into a bungalow at the back of the property. On the day of offending, the applicant and victim had consumed a large amount of alcohol together and the applicant became argumentative [5]. The victim suggested the applicant see a psychologist. That evening, the applicant told a friend that he felt depressed, he needed his wife to look after him to survive and that "if anything were to happen to him, [the friend] should make sure he claimed a Holden Kingswood motor car presently garaged at the applicant's home" [5]. Two hours later, the applicant entered the wife's bungalow and deadlocked the door behind him before saying "I've got something for you" and producing a large knife [6]. He proceeded to stab the victim 13 times, including defensive injuries, mostly to the chest and arms. The applicant stated that he was going to kill both himself and the victim during the attack. The victim also suffered blunt force trauma and other lacerations before managing to escape the offender when he fell over and struck his head.

The applicant then drove away from the property. "A dash camera recorded him in a confused, angry and emotional state of mind. He expressed disbelief that he had not killed his wife [and] then discussed with himself how he could kill himself" [8]. The applicant then proceeded the drive his car into a train. "The train struck the driver's side of the applicant's car, pushing it for a considerable distance. No one on the train was injured" [8] and the applicant did not sustain substantial injuries.

Judgment: Leave to appeal against sentence was refused [41]. To demonstrate manifest excess "an applicant must demonstrate that the impugned sentence is 'wholly outside the range' of sentences available for that particular offence in the relevant circumstances" [29]. Likewise "arguments for excessive cumulation must fail unless an applicant can demonstrate that the order for cumulation is manifestly excessive" [30]. The sentence for the reckless conduct charge was not manifestly excessive: "[w]hilst a sentence of 50 per cent of the maximum available upon a plea of guilty to a man in the applicant's circumstances can reasonably be viewed as 'stern', we are not persuaded that it is beyond the range of sentences reasonably available to his Honour." [36] The cumulation of one year upon the base sentence for attempted murder was also not manifestly excessive. The sentence for attempted murder "represents less than a third of the maximum penalty available for what was an appalling example of domestic violence, committed with homicidal intent. Whilst old age, ill health and an almost pristine criminal history all counted in the applicant's favour, in the face of his conduct towards his wife, it could not count for a great deal" [38]. The sentence was moderate in all the circumstances. In considering the appropriate degree of cumulation the sentencing judge appropriately considered "the temporal and circumstantial relationship between the offences" and specifically considered the sentencing factors such as overall criminality, general deterrence and the principle of totality.

The court also rejected Ground 2, finding that the delay between the date of offending and the date the applicant entered a guilty plea (22 months) was a sufficient basis for the judge to entertain genuine reservations about the applicant's level of remorse, and his prospects of rehabilitation [42], despite a plea of guilty often being an indicator of genuine remorse [45].

Guirguis v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 48 (13 March 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Children' – 'Community correction order' – 'Family violence' – 'Guilty pleas' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Uncharged act'

Charges: Sexual assault x 1; Make threat to kill x 1

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Facts: The applicant man and the female victim were in a relationship for 11 years and had 2 children. The relationship terminated in 2016. Before the relationship ended the applicant allegedly forced the victim to engage in oral sex (Charge 1) and, months later, told the victim that he would 'slit her throat' if she ever left with the children (Charge 2). The applicant also said he would 'take [the children] out too' which constituted an uncharged act. In 2016, an interim protection order was granted in favour of the victim and the children, and in 2017 a final intervention order was made for an indefinite period. Relevantly, the applicant had been sentenced at the Magistrate's Court in early-2017 to 91 days' imprisonment, combined with an 18 month Community Correction Order for other offending against the victim that occurred on the same date on which the offending giving rise to Charge 2 in the present matter occurred ([3]-[14]).

In sentencing the applicant, the judge recognised that the victim suffered profound trauma as a result of the applicant's degrading, cruel and humiliating treatment of her. These adverse effects continuously and significantly affected her. Given the seriousness of the offending, there was a need for stern punishment to achieve general and specific deterrence and denunciation ([22]). The applicant, on pleas of guilty, was sentenced to 23 months' imprisonment in combination with a 3-year Community Correction Order (CCO). The sentence imposed in early-2017 and time that the applicant had spent in a residential drug rehabilitation clinic were relevant to totality.

Issue: The applicant completed the term of 23 months' imprisonment in February 2019 and sought leave to appeal on the grounds that the sentence of imprisonment followed by a 3-year CCO is manifestly excessive.

Held: The Court refused leave to appeal ([38]). The two offences constituted serious acts of family violence and the offending was not isolated ([33]). Further, a CCO was necessarily and properly punitive, and was structured towards advancing the applicant's rehabilitation and community protection ([34]). It could not be said that the decision to attach a CCO to the term of 23 months' imprisonment was clearly or wholly outside the range open to the sentencing judge, and there was no error of principle ([36]). The offending was 'grave' as the applicant's conduct towards the victim was 'cruel and degrading', 'designed to be humiliating and hurtful', and resulted in substantial trauma ([37]). The sexual assault was described as a 'humiliating and degrading act'. Further, the threat to kill was 'chilling and menacing, and had a traumatic and ongoing effect' on the victim ([33]). The conduct resulted in profound trauma.

Vu v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 59 (23 March 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Remorse' – 'Totality principle'

Offences: manslaughter x1; attempted murder x1and recklessly causing serious injury x1.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The applicant man and the female victim lived together in a domestic relationship for many years and had two children together. In 2013 the applicant was charged with drug-related offences and imprisoned for three years. During this time, the female and male victims commenced a relationship and were married. Shortly before the applicant was released, the male victim moved out of the female's house and into a nearby residence. They continued their relationship in secret after the applicant was released and resumed living with the female victim.

The applicant was later informed of the victims' relationship and confronted them about it. The victims' stated they were just friends, but the applicant refused to accept their denials. The applicant then grabbed a hunting knife he had previously hidden and stabbed both victims in the chest. The male victim died at the scene and the female was seriously injured, though there was no evidence of any permanent or ongoing impairment as a result of the injury.

Applicant was charged with murder of the male victim and attempted murder of the female victim and in the alternative either intentionally or recklessly causing serious injury. Prior to trial the applicant offered in writing to plead guilty to manslaughter. No offer was made in respect to the charges relating to the female victim's injuries. Following trial he was convicted of the manslaughter of the male victim and recklessly causing serious injury to the female victim. He was given a total effective sentence of 15 year's imprisonment with a non-parole period of 11 years.

Grounds of appeal:

- The order for cumulation was excessive and thereby infringed the totality principle.
- The learned sentencing judge erred by granting the applicant only a modest benefit for the utilitarian value of his plea offer.
- The learned sentencing judge erred by granting the applicant no benefit for his plea offer other than for its utilitarian value.
- The learned sentencing judge erred by not treating the applicant's post-offence conduct as mitigatory.
- The individual sentences imposed for both offences, the order for cumulation and the total effective sentence were manifestly excessive, particularly in light of:

  The totality principle (see ground 1 above);

  The finding that the recklessly causing serious injury was mid-range example of the offence;

The applicant's offer to plead guilty (see grounds 2 and 3 above);

The mitigatory effect of the applicant's conduct immediately after the offending (see ground 4 above);

There being, it is argued, some evidence of remorse, acceptance of responsibility and a willingness to facilitate the course of justice;

The finding that the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation are 'quite good';

The finding that specific deterrence 'does not loom large' in this case.

Held: The Court allowed the appeal on against sentence on grounds 1 and 5 (in part), limited to the order for cumulation only. The order for cumulation was quashed and ordered a total effective sentence of 13 years and six months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 10 years.

In regard to Grounds 2 and 3, the Court held the sentencing judge was entitled to consider the utilitarian value of the applicant's offer to plead guilty as 'relatively modest' given the overall circumstances of the case and rejected the second ground. While the offender offered to plead guilty, this is not necessarily a sign of remorse and agreed with the sentencing judge's conclusion that the offer was most likely motivated by pragmatic considerations [40], thus also rejecting the third ground. In light of the Court's rejection of an inference of remorse, they noted that the sentencing judge's reasoning "embraced a consideration of the entirety of [the] post-offence conduct, favourable and unfavourable to the applicant" and rejected the fourth ground [44].

Turning to Grounds 1 and 5, the Court noted that while the individual sentences were each particularly stern but not wholly outside the range of sentencing discretion [48], this was not the case for the order for cumulation. "Given the very significant overlap in time, context and conduct, and particularly, the high sentences imposed on both charges, [the Court] consider[s] that the principles of totality and proportionality ought to have operated to moderate the order for cumulation to a considerably greater extent" [54]

Brown v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 26 (20 February 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Credibility' – 'Fair trial' – 'Fresh evidence' – 'Lack of disclosure' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Retrial'

Charges: Charges 1 and 2 (intentionally causing injury and alternatively recklessly causing injury – acquitted following trial); Charges 3 and 4 (intentionally causing injury – acquitted - and alternatively recklessly causing injury - convicted); Charge 5 (common law assault - acquitted)

Case Type: Application for leave to appeal against conviction on charge 4

Facts: The charges related to two occasions on which the applicant man was alleged to have assaulted the complainant woman, with whom he was then in a de facto relationship. Charges 1 and 2 (intentionally causing injury and alternatively recklessly causing injury) concerned an allegation that the applicant threw the complainant, causing her to hit her head. Charges 3 and 4 (intentionally causing injury and alternatively recklessly causing injury) related to an allegation that the applicant, on a different day, grabbed the complainant's arms and held her down, causing bruising to her arms and back. It was alleged that immediately after that incident, the applicant also pushed her, constituting the basis of Charge 5 (common law assault). The applicant was found guilty of Charge 4, acquitted on the other charges and, following a plea, was convicted and fined $4,000 ([1]-[4]).

After verdict, the prosecution served a victim impact statement from the complainant, to which a document called 'Initial report - Recommendation for more than five hours of counselling' was attached. The report noted that the complainant consulted a psychologist and recounted events the subject of Charges 3 and 4. The appellant submitted that this was the first occasion, known to him, that the complainant had given a different account in which it was suggested that he had thrown her across the room against the wall ([9]-[10]). Applying the principles in R v Nguyen and Tran to the relevant evidence, the appellant submitted that although the report existed at the time of trial, he exercised reasonable diligence in obtaining relevant records and this had failed to result in the production of the report. It was argued that his legal representatives sought disclosure of various documents which would have included the report; that he sought production of the victim impact statement during committal proceedings and the complainant refused to provide it at that time; and that he obtained a subpoena to compel the complainant to produce the victim impact statement. The appellant contended that as he was acquitted on Charges 1, 2 and 5 and given the case largely turned on the complainant's evidence, the existence of a different version of events as evidenced in the report potentially further undermined the complainant's credibility ([12]-[13]).

Grounds of appeal:

1. The prosecution failed to disclose relevant information in its possession; and
2. fresh evidence that is now available since the time of conviction would have led the jury to hold a reasonable doubt as to the applicant's guilt or would have given rise to a significant possibility that the jury would have held such doubt.

The respondent conceded Ground 2, and in light of this, the applicant did not press Ground 1 ([5]-[6])

Held: Having decided Ground 2 was established, the Court was required to determine whether to order a new trial or enter a judgment of acquittal. The report met the threshold for fresh evidence and, had the evidence been before the jury, there was a significant possibility that the appellant would have been acquitted on Charge 4 ([18]).

In determining whether to order a new trial, the Court considered that the appellant would be compromised in his ability to test the complainant's evidence on Charge 4 by reference to the inconsistencies in the complainant's account of events which underpinned Charges 1, 2 and 5. Any disadvantage to the appellant would be particularly acute in relation to Charge 5 which was so closely tied in time and context to Charge 4 ([35]). The Court drew an analogy with R v Bartlett ([37]), and held that a retrial of Charge 4 alone would be 'unfair'. Consequently, the Court allowed the appeal, set aside the conviction on Charge 4 and entered judgment of acquittal on that charge ([39]).

The Court emphasised the public interest in seeing allegations of domestic violence, where there is sufficient evidence to sustain a conviction, being prosecuted in accordance with the law ([25]). The gravity of domestic violence is not solely measured by the extent of the physical injury. Women and children 'who suffer the brunt of domestic violence' are entitled to feel safe and secure in their own homes. Other 'very important factors' the Court will consider in assessing the severity of a particular offence include the breach of trust reposed in a domestic partner and the compromising of the security of the home ([26]).

Director of Public Prosecutions v Ristevski* [2019] VSCA 287 (06 December 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Remorse'

Offence: Manslaughter

Proceedings: Crown appeal against sentence

Issues: Whether sentence was manifestly inadequate;

Whether sentence was manifestly inadequate;

(a) failed to fix a sentence commensurate with the circumstances of the offending, giving too much weight to the lack of information about the unlawful and dangerous act;

(b) failed to have sufficient regard to significant aggravating features when determining the nature and the objective gravity of the offending (cf the circumstances of the killing), particularly in the context of family violence and the breach of trust;

(c) failed to have sufficient regard to the impact of the Respondent's offending on the victims;

(d) failed to give sufficient weight to the principles of general deterrence, specific deterrence, denunciation and just punishment;

(e) failed to have sufficient regard to the maximum penalty for the offence; and

(f) placed too much weight on the matters in mitigation, particularly in light of the lack of remorse, including the Respondent's plea of guilty and prospects of rehabilitation.

Facts: The exact events surrounding the offence are unclear. What is known is that the respondent husband "killed [the victim (his wife) by unlawful and dangerous act(s); put her body into the body of her car; and disposed of [and concealed] her body in a remote location" [4]. When later questioned about his wife, the offender lied to relatives and police by claiming that she "had left the family home after they had an argument saying that she was going to clear her head" but never returned [5].

There was no evidence of earlier domestic violence in the relationship. He was convicted on his plea of guilty to manslaugter following a contested committal where the charge was murder.

Held: The offender was resentenced by majority to 13 years' imprisonment with non-parole period of 10 years.

The sentence was held to be manifestly inadequate, with Priest JA stating the "sentence imposed on the respondent was far too low to reflect the needs of general deterrence, denunciation and just punishment". The disposal of the wife's body was treated as a significant aggravating factor and "emblematic of [the offender's] complete lack of remorse" [73]. The domestic setting of the offence was also an aggravating circumstance, with Ferguson CJ and Whelan JA providing that while "there was a time when the seriousness of such domestic violence offences was not properly recognised. That is no longer the case…[The wife] should have been able to live without any fear in her own home. It should have been a safe place for her" [10]. General deterrence and denunciation were particularly significant. These factors were not sufficiently outweighed by the offender's previous good character, prospects of rehabilitation or the utilitarian value of his guilty plea.

DPP v Smith* [2019] VSCA 266 (21 November 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Intervention order' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charges: 3 x causing injury intentionally; 1 x false imprisonment; 1 x rape; 1 x make a threat to kill; 2 x contravention of Final Family Violence Intervention Order (FVIO)

Case type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The offending involved intentionally causing physical injury, threatening to kill, false imprisonment, rape and breaching FVIOs. The respondent and complainant were in an intermittent de facto relationship for a few years prior to the offending. The respondent was sentenced to 7 years and 6 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 5 years.

Issue: The appellant appealed against the sentence on the grounds that it was manifestly inadequate, and that the learned sentencing judge failed to:

- Properly consider the objective gravity of the offending;
- Give sufficient weight to the sentencing principles of just punishment, denunciation, general deterrence, specific deterrence and community protection;
- Give sufficient weight to the maximum penalties for the offences; and
- Give sufficient weight to the impact of the offending on the victim.

Held: Manifest inadequacy is difficult to establish ([28]). Nevertheless, the respondent was re-sentenced to 10 years and 6 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 8 years. Notwithstanding the factors relied upon in mitigation ([21]), several of the individual sentences imposed and the orders for cumulation were found to be inadequate, and therefore produced a total effective sentence that was below the range of sentences available to the sentencing judge so as to reveal an error of principle ([28]). Personal factors included: history of drug and alcohol abuse; criminal history which included a number of dishonesty and drug matters, assault and robbery, intentionally and recklessly causing injury, and failure to comply with court orders; a disadvantaged and dysfunctional upbringing; and low cognitive functioning. However, in the Court's view, there was a need for both specific and general deterrence, given the respondent's long history of violence, especially towards the complainant ([34]-[35]). The offending in question was ‘brutish, cowardly… and calculated to humiliate and degrade a powerless, diminutive woman’ ([32]). The Court also noted that ‘people considering similar brutal, degrading abuse of a domestic partner must understand that the courts have a duty to protect vulnerable members of [the] community and will not hesitate to impose stern punishment upon wrongdoers’ ([35]).

Charges: Causing serious injury intentionally x 1

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The respondent pleaded guilty following a self-serving confession 4 years after the assault having previously denied all involvement several times. The DPP appealed the sentence and non-parole period. The complainant, who had been involved in a domestic relationship with the respondent’s estranged wife, sustained life-altering and life-threatening injuries as a result of being struck with a metal bar. The original sentence was 5 years and 6 months with a non-parole period of 2 years and 9 months.

Issues: Whether the individual sentence and non-parole period are each manifestly inadequate.

Decision and reasoning: Appeal allowed and resentenced to 7 years and 6 months with non-parole period of 4 years 6 months. The discount given for the respondent’s confession was too great, as the respondent’s admissions did not go so far as to warrant a full discount.

The court also considered that the seriousness of offending called for a stern response and strong denunciation, as this was a case of extraordinary violence which had a devastating impact on the victim ([83]).

"[84] There is a further important consideration, that of general deterrence. This was a violent act of reprisal following the breakup of the respondent’s marriage, expressing his animosity and anger towards the person who had been his wife’s partner. Although there are differences between a case like this and a direct attack against a former partner, they are closely related. Violence of this kind is alarmingly widespread, and extremely harmful. It is never justified. The sentences imposed must convey that message strongly.

[85] For similar reasons, nothing should be said in sentencing reasons to suggest that statements by such an offender to the effect of ‘I just snapped’ or ‘I’d had enough’ in any way mitigate the seriousness of the offending or reduce the offender’s moral culpability. Such self-justifying statements are, regrettably, all too common in cases of family violence. Marital breakdown is stressful and upsetting for all concerned. But a resort to violence can never be condoned.

Tan v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 226 (14 October 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

‘Manifestly inadequate’ – ‘Physical harm and violence -separation’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Strangulation’

Charges: Recklessly causing serious injury x 1

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Facts: The applicant was sentenced to 5 years 6 months imprisonment with a non-parole period of 3 years 6 months. The applicant sought leave to appeal against sentence on the ground that the sentence imposed was manifestly excessive given that the offending was not at the median of offending for the type of offence.

The victim of the incident was the applicant’s de facto partner. Around the time of offending, the applicant sent the victim a series of text messages asking for money, which the victim refused. The applicant was angered by the refusal and when he returned to the couple’s home, he started verbally abusing her. He pushed her off the bed, injuring the victim’s knee, before pulling back on to the bed with his hand around her throat. Threatening to kill the victim, the applicant obtained a knife from the kitchen and pushed it against the victim’s throat while she was still on the bed. This caused a superficial laceration. The owner of the apartment became aware of the altercation and called the police. While the owner was on the phone the victim tried to push the applicant off her, causing him to slash her on the left arm with the knife.

The applicant pleaded guilty prior to the committal hearing despite previously denying he was the aggressor. The judge "accepted this plea as being ‘indicative of some remorse’" [19].

Issue: Whether sentence was manifestly excessive

Decision and reasoning: The sentence was manifestly excessive. A sentence of 4 years 3 months was substituted.

There was no finding that the wound to the victim's arm was deliberately inflicted, unlike the laceration to her neck. When compared to more serious cases (Marrah, Nolan [63]) of the same offence this was significantly less serious. Ashley and Weinberg JJA state that 'it is the fact that, despite the limited utility of raw sentencing statistics, the sentence imposed in this case was not far short of twice the median length of imprisonment for the offence over the 2016/2017 year, and that over the five-year period ending 2017 only a very small number of those imprisoned for this particular offence were subject to a sentence exceeding five years. Underlining the severity of the sentence imposed here, by no means did all persons sentenced for this offence in the five year period receive a custodial disposition.'[65]

Nevertheless, the court also pointed out that despite the sentence being manifestly excessive, this conclusion "does not gainsay the need for sentences for this offence, committed in a domestic setting, to reflect the need for general deterrence, specific deterrence … and protection of the community as pertinent sentencing considerations" and noted that "sentences for this offence, committed in a domestic setting, have increased in recent years." ([63]).

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Perpetrator self-reported to police' – 'Rape' – 'Remorse' – 'Separation' – 'Victim testified in favour of perpetrator'

Offences: Rape x 2

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Issues: Whether the individual sentences, the total effective sentence and non-parole period were manifestly excessive

Facts: The male appellant and female victim had been partners for 22 years and had three children together. The appellant found out that the victim had been having an affair for the last five years. He lost self-control and raped the victim, verbally abusing her during the assault while she just lay there. Afterwards, the appellant felt terrible and apologised. Two days later, the appellant discovered more details of the affair and lost control and raped the victim again. The couple cried together afterwards and the appellant apologised many times. The day after this, the appellant became concerned that the victim would try to harm herself and the appellant felt guilty about what he had done, so he reported his actions to a mental health clinician. The clinician alerted police and arrested the appellant who plead guilty immediately. The victim never intended to report the offending and saw police involvement in their marriage as ridiculous.

At the sentencing hearing, the victim gave evidence in support of the appellant and told the court that this was a private matter for the appellant and the victim to work out together. She testified that she wanted the appellant to be released as soon as possible so that the couple could start repairing what had happened, but that this had not been allowed to occur because of the imposition of an Intervention Order. Despite this, the judge sentenced the appellant to nine and a half years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of seven years.

Grounds:

1. The sentencing judge failed to synthesise properly the sworn and mostly unchallenged evidence of the victim. Specifically, the sentencing judge made findings on the impact of the offending that:
   (a) were not open to the judge or not properly founded on the victim's evidence, and
   (b) failed, in the circumstances, to accord the appellant procedural fairness.

2. The sentencing judge's discretion miscarried as a result of the judge's findings regarding remorse and the circumstances of the appellant's own reporting of his crime. Specifically, the judge erred by:

3. The individual sentences, the total effective sentence and non-parole period were manifestly excessive.
   (a) departing from the agreed statement of facts, and
   (b) denying the appellant, in the circumstances, procedural fairness.

Judgment: The court allowed all grounds of appeal, holding that the sentences were manifestly excessive and resentencing the appellant to four years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two years. The court held that while the appellant's behaviour was reprehensible [2] and involved a "grave breach of trust and violation of … bodily integrity" [153], "the prison sentences in this case must be much shorter than would ordinarily be required" [10]. This was because of two exceptional factors: 1) the appellant's self-reporting and confession (without which he never would have been prosecuted), and 2) the victim's "remarkable and powerful evidence" [10]. The court stressed that this was "an exceptional case" [1] and "these are wholly extraordinary circumstances calling for an equally extraordinary response" [10]. However, the court noted that denunciation and just punishment were relevant sentences factors in this case [153].

The court noted that a twelve-month Intervention Order was previously taken out against the appellant on behalf of the victim for smashing food into the victim's face. However, the couple remained living together and their sexual relationship continued [17]. The court noted that the couple got divorced (because the appellant was frustrated that the victim worked so much), but continued to live together as if nothing had changed [20]. They did not tell the children of the divorce. The victim testified that she was the "Alpha female" and "glory parent" and would only see the children two or three times a week, and that the appellant was the sole carer of the children, the one who did all the hard work [21].

Regarding Ground 1, the court accepted that the sentencing judge erroneously found that the impact on the victim (who would now have to arrange for care of the children and explain the appellant's absence to them) was an aggravating factor, as opposed to a mitigating factor [84]. The court also accepted that it was not open to the judge to have qualified the mitigation resulting from the reduced psychological and emotional impact of the offending on the victim in the way the judge did [95] and that the judge erred in qualifying the mitigatory effect of the victim's evidence by being "mindful of the complex nature of the potential damage resulting from sexual offences committed in the context of family violence, which may not be readily apparent" [102]. While the court accepted the sentencing judge's comments regarding the nature of sexual violence in a family setting and held that it was "therefore appropriate for sentencing judges to be cautious when confronted with evidence of forgiveness by victims of violence, whether sexual or otherwise" [103], the court held that each case turns on its own facts. In this case, there was no evidence that the relationship was afflicted by family violence or that the victim was persuaded to reconcile by the appellant [106]. The court noted that "There is not the slightest suggestion that [the victim] gave this evidence as woman ground down by years of ill-treatment and ensnared in a relationship from which she found it impossible to escape" [5].

The court also upheld Ground 2, finding that the fact that the appellant could not remember certain things was "not inconsistent with a high level of remorse" in part because the appellant consistently make extensive admissions about his conduct to police but also consistently told police that there were parts he could not remember [123]. The court accepted that there was overwhelming positive evidence of remorse [124]. The court considered that it was not open to qualify the level of the appellant's remorse on the basis that his reporting of the offending was about the victim, not the appellant's crimes [125].

The court further upheld Ground 3, holding that the individual sentences, the total effective sentence and the non-parole period were manifestly excessive because they failed to reflect all relevant considerations (including the appellant's early pleas, remorse, previous good character, hardship involved in his imprisonment, and strong prospects of rehabilitation) and the sentencing judge failed to give sufficient weight to the two exceptional factors outlined above [139].

The court noted that the resentenced non-parole period was shorter than what otherwise might be imposed, but that this would still adequately reflect all of the sentencing purposes mentioned [166].

Degney v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 183 (19 August 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal' – 'Family violence' – 'Guilty plea' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The applicant sought leave to appeal against the sentence imposed for the offence of attempted aggravated burglary (3 years' and 6 months' imprisonment) on the ground that it was manifestly excessive. The applicant and victim lived together at the time of the offending, and were in a relationship 'on and off' for around 6 years.

Issue: The issue for the Court was whether the sentence was manifestly excessive, having regard to the objective gravity of the offending, the applicant's limited criminal history and youth, the early plea of guilty and current sentencing practices.

Held: The applicant submitted that his criminal history was 'limited and relatively minor' ([32]). He had previously been sentenced, without conviction, to a community correction order ('CCO') for offences, including a charge of unlawful assault, charges of possession and use of cannabis and descending onto a railway track ([26]). He did not complete the CCO and was subsequently fined ([27]). The applicant contended that the offending was not towards the 'serious end of the spectrum' as it was brief, was not committed in company, and there was limited evidence of planning. He argued that there was only an intention to assault, not an intention to inflict actual physical harm ([31]).

The Court held that the seriousness of the offending was increased by factors, such as the fact that it involved 'an attempted forced intrusion into a residence' during the night, while possessing a 'menacing weapon … with an intention to assault a terrified and vulnerable domestic partner' by creating fear ([45]). His efforts to enter the premises were persistent and threatening ([46]), and his conduct could not be described as brief or short-lived as had been submitted by the applicant ([48]). His conduct was viewed within the context of his earlier abusive behaviour towards the victim ([47]). The absence of an intention to physically harm the victim and of a history of family violence was found not to diminish the inherent gravity of the offending ([49], [53]). Significantly, the offending was committed in circumstances of family violence, which aggravated the offending ([50]). His conduct was motivated by a sense of entitlement, which reflected on his moral culpability and exemplified 'the very worst of male attitudes towards women' ([51]). As a result, general deterrence was an important sentencing purpose ([52]).

Mitigating factors included the applicant's early guilty plea, relative youth, limited prior history and remorse ([62]); however, when balanced against the objective gravity of the offending, these factors did not persuade the Court that the sentence was wholly outside the range of sentences reasonably available to the sentencing judge ([62]). The Court also noted the dearth of sentencing decisions involving attempted aggravated burglary ([58-[59]). Nevertheless, the Court dismissed the appeal against the sentence.

Lim v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 182 (16 August 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Assault' – 'Contravening a family violence order' – 'Exposing children' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Mitigating circumstances' – 'Obsessive behaviour' – 'Past domestic and family violence' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Step-child in the family' – 'Threat to kill'

Offences: Aggravated burglary; intentionally causing injury x2; threat to kill x2; persistently breaching a family violence intervention order; summary assault x1; summary offence of using a drug of dependence; and unlawful assault.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Grounds:

- Whether sentence on summary assault exceeded maximum penalty;
- Whether the individual sentences and orders for cumulation, the total effective sentence and the non-parole period were manifestly excessive;
- Whether the sentencing judge paid insufficient regard to the principle of totality; and
- Whether the sentencing judge erred in treating the applicant's prior convictions as relevant to the assessment of the gravity of the applicant's offending.

While drunk and drug-affected, the applicant forced his way into the home of his female ex-partner, the protected person in a FVIO to which he was the respondent. Upon entering, he grabbed KC's father, threatened to kill him and chocked him in a sleeper hold to the point of unconsciousness. He followed KC as she fled the home and similarly choked and threatened her in the presence of her young daughter, continuing the choke hold until a police officer struck him with a torch and placed him in a headlock, having failed to subdue him with pepper spray. An elderly neighbour tried to comfort those at the scene but was also threatened by the applicant. When police arrived, they were only able to subdue the applicant with force.

The applicant persistently breached a family violence intervention order during the month leading up to the offence and had previously committed violent offences against KC and her father. He entered pleas of guilty and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of nine years and seven months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of seven years. The sentencing judge described the offending as "very grave", "sustained and dangerous", "gratuitous" and "cruel and chilling". Sentencing considerations were general deterrence, specific deterrence, denunciation and protection of the community. Weight was placed on the applicant's significant criminal history and "selfish and cowardly" approach to relationships. Significant mitigating factors were raised on his behalf including his early pleas of guilty, remorse, medical conditions causing particular hardship in custody, and reasonable prospects of rehabilitation.

Held: The first ground was conceded by the Crown. In respect to the second and third grounds, it was held that the sentence for aggravated burglary, cumulation, base sentence and resulting total effective sentence were all manifestly excessive and in breach of totality, providing that it is "likely that the judge placed too much weight on Mr Lim's prior criminal history, was overwhelmed by the gravity of the offending or gave insufficient weight to the mitigating factors, or that some combination of these factors was operative" [122]. The sentence for unlawful assault was also held to be manifestly excessive.

The Court rejected the fourth ground of appeal as they considered using the offender's prior convictions to inform an 'assessment of the gravity of his crimes [was] not the same "as speaking of an assessment of the objective gravity of a crime" [53].

'Appeal' – 'Damaging property' – 'Intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Social abuse'

Charges: 1 x stalking; 1 x damage property; 1 x intentionally causing injury; 1 x sexual assault; 1 x commit indictable offence on bail; 3 x contravention of Family Violence Intervention Order (FVIO)

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant and victim were in a relationship for about 3 years, and had married. They separated in 2016 due to infidelity and domestic violence issues. The charges to which the appellant pleaded guilty were contained in 2 separate indictments. 2 summary charges were brought against him. The appellant was subject to a Final FVIO in 2016 which he breached by attending the victim's address, damaging her car, and coming within 5 metres of her on two occasions. He also stalked the victim by contacting her in breach of the Intervention Order ([9]-[17]), damaged her car ([21]), pinned her to the ground, and choked and sexually assaulted her by kissing her on the lips ([25]-[26]). The appellant also wrote the victim letters and emails over a period of several months that were threatening in nature. At the time of committing the offences, the appellant was on bail for other matters ([29]). The victim was injured as a result of the attack ([30]).

The sentencing judge concluded that the offending was serious, 'protracted, violent and terrifying', and sentenced the appellant to 6 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 4 years.

Issue: The issue for the Court was whether the sentence and orders for cumulation were manifestly excessive, given the mitigating factors of the applicant's health issues and the characterisation of offences.

Held: The Court dismissed the appeal as the total effective sentence imposed by the sentencing judge was not manifestly excessive and did not fail to adequately reflect the principle of totality ([75]-[81]). The offences were committed over a period of many months within the context of family violence. The damage caused to the victim's property was found to be significant, planned and executed to cause harm ([56]). At [62], the Court noted that the sentencing judge correctly emphasised the seriousness of the offence of intentionally causing injury. The victim was frightened and threatened with words, such as 'You are going to get it' and 'Just die' ([61]). Further, the context of the sexual assault was considered to be 'significant and inextricable', as it occurred during a 'frightening physical attack', and was motivated by hatred and contempt ([66]). As for the 2 charges of contravention of the FVIO on the separate indictment, the Court did not consider the individual sentences to be manifestly excessive and that despite the applicant having no ability to carry out the threat as he was in custody, the fact that they contained death threats and were sent by someone who had previously employed threats of death made it very serious offending ([69]-[74]). As each offence was committed over an extended period of time, directed at the one person within the context of family violence, and escalated and continued even in custody, the overall criminality meant that the orders for cumulation was not manifestly excessive ([79]-[80]).

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Delay' – 'Elder abuse' – 'Manifestly excessive'

Offences: Reckless conduct endangering life

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive, in particular that the Learned Sentencing Judge gave insufficient weight to the delay in these proceedings being finalised.

Facts: The male appellant and his wife severely neglected the 83-year-old victim, the appellant's mother, who relied entirely upon them for care. The victim previously lived in a supported residential service where she was very healthy and active, and would routinely visit the doctor. However, her visits to the doctor (which included filling her prescriptions) declined and ceased altogether when she returned to live with the appellant. The victim was found dead in her bed in squalid conditions. She died as a result of bronchopneumonia in a setting of cerebral infarction, weighing only 34kg and covered in bruises and abrasions. The appellant plead guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 12 months. The appellant appealed this sentence on the ground that it was manifestly excessive because the sentencing judge failed to give sufficient weight to the delay in the proceedings being finalised.

Judgment: The court refused to allow the appeal, holding that the sentence was not manifestly excessive but could even be regarded as "lenient" [49], [54]. The court noted that "the proper approach for this Court to adopt is to consider the circumstances of the offence and those of the applicant, instinctively synthesising the aggravating features and those going in mitigation – including the considerable delay – to determine whether the sentence imposed by the judge is wholly outside the range open in the sound exercise of discretion" [41]. While the delay had been considerable (five years from the offending to sentencing) and the court held that "ordinarily, a delay of that order would constitute a very powerful mitigating factor" [43], in this case, the appellant did not have a lengthy period of rehabilitation (the court accepting that he had developed no insight into his offending and did not have good prospects of rehabilitation) nor did he suffer stress or anxiety as a result of the delay [43]-[45]. Beyond the delay, the court emphasised, there was little that mitigated the offence [46].

The court noted the seriousness of the offending, holding that the victim was in such poor condition "because of the applicant's callous disregard for her welfare" [48]. It further accepted that the appellant's treatment of his mother was "cruel, heartless and inhumane" [48]. Forrest JA held that the appellant "admitted he foresaw that his conduct placed [the victim] at an appreciable risk of death, and yet he continued to neglect her … I consider that conduct to be truly reprehensible" [53].

Milosev v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 121 (3 June 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Breaches of community correction order' – 'Domestic violence' – 'Drug dependency' – 'History of abuse of accused'

Charges: Aggravated burglary x 1; theft x 1; recklessly causing serious injury x 1; conspiracy to commit theft x 1; breach of community correction order (CCO) x 1.

Case type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant pleaded guilty to charges of aggravated burglary, theft, recklessly causing serious injury and conspiracy to commit theft. She was ordered to serve a community correction order (CCO), but was later charged with breaching that order and the mandatory terms contained in it. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective term of 15 months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 9 months.

Issue: The applicant sought leave to appeal against the sentence on two grounds. The first ground was that the sentences imposed were manifestly excessive. It was also contended that the sentencing judge failed to give sufficient weight to 1) the impact of family violence suffered by the applicant, which compromised her ability to comply with the CCO; and 2) the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation. The second ground was that the sentencing judge erred by not deferring sentencing before making a finding that the applicant was 'unwilling and unable' to comply with a further CCO.

Held: The application for leave to appeal against the sentence was refused. The applicant's counsel contended that the applicant's capacity to fully comply with the terms of the CCO was affected by the domestic violence perpetrated on her by her partner ([20]). It was argued that the applicant was the 'captive of her partner throughout the term of the [CCO]', and found it difficult to leave him and the drug infected environment in which she was then living ([25]). Although the Court recognised that the applicant was clearly subjected to domestic violence by her ex-partner, their Honours noted that the materials placed before the sentencing judge did not sufficiently explain her substantial and repeated failures to comply with the conditions of her CCO ([48]). While it was understandable that the applicant, under the pressure of the domestic circumstances in which she was living, relapsed into drug use, it appeared that she sometimes managed to remove herself from the abuse. Taking those matters into account, and giving full weight to the impact of her partner's conduct towards her, their Honours did not accept that the sentencing judge erred in concluding that the applicant was either unwilling or unable to comply with a further CCO ([49], [56]). No sufficient circumstances were put to the sentencing judge which would require him to defer sentencing ([56]).

Neil v R* [2019] VSCA 64 (25 March 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Children' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: For about four months leading up to the victim's death, the applicant and the victim were in an intimate relationship. In the period leading up to the incident, the applicant, Marmo (the applicant's co-accused) and the victim were heavy ice users. On the day of the incident, the applicant was angry with the victim because she made a family violence complaint against him to police. The victim was savagely beaten by the applicant for 'snitching and dobbing' ([9]). Marmo and two other people were present. The applicant's attack on the victim escalated, and involved kicking her to the head and body with extreme force. The victim later died and the applicant and Marmo agreed that Marmo should 'dispose of her', by dumping her body down a mineshaft and then burning it using petrol ([12]). The trial judge sentenced the applicant to a term of 26 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 22 years. Marmo was sentenced to a term of 24 years' imprisonment ([3]).

Issues: The applicant seeks leave to appeal against his sentence on the following grounds:

- The judge erred in applying the parity principle, for example, in that she imposed a greater sentence on the applicant than Marmo, even though the applicant pleaded guilty and Marmo pleaded not guilty, and where the applicant offered to give evidence against Marmo.
- The non-parole period is manifestly excessive.

Decision and reasoning: The Court refused the applicant's application for leave to appeal against the sentence. In determining the first ground of the appeal, the Court found nothing wrong with the trial judge's conclusions about the respective roles of the applicant and Marmo. It was the conduct of the applicant that was ‘at the heart’ of the horrific offending and but for his anger with, and treatment of, the victim, her death would not have occurred ([42]). The Court was also unpersuaded that the applicant’s late plea of guilty required the trial judge to impose a lesser sentence than the sentence she imposed on Marmo ([43]). Overall, her Honour correctly differentiated the cases of the applicant and Marmo, and the Court therefore rejected the first ground of appeal ([44]).

The Court found that there was no substance in the applicant’s second ground of appeal, that the non-parole period was manifestly excessive. The fact that the non-parole period was almost 85% of the head sentence did not indicate any error. The higher the head sentence, the higher the percentage of the head sentence the non-parole period will likely be, and often it will exceed 80% ([46]). The non-parole period was not manifestly excessive in light of the circumstances of the applicant’s offending. The Court also held that the trial judge’s conclusions that a lower non-parole period need not be fixed on the basis that the applicant’s prospects for rehabilitation ‘appear reasonable’.

DPP v Elfata* [2019] VSCA 63 (21 March 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

‘Factors affecting risk’ – ‘Following, harassing and monitoring’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Sexual and reproductive abuse’ – ‘Stalking’

Charges: Rape x 1; reckless conduct endangering serious injury x 1 (acquitted); common law assault x 1 (acquitted); stalking (intent to cause physical harm) x 1.

Case type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent was convicted of rape and stalking with intent to cause physical harm. He was acquitted of reckless conduct endangering serious injury and common law assault. The respondent and the complainant had been in a relationship for two years before the offending conduct. In relation to the charge of rape, it was alleged that the respondent placed his fingers inside the complainant’s vagina, so as to constitute digital, rather than penile, penetration ([5]).

The respondent was sentenced to two years and three months’ imprisonment with a non-parole period of one year. The Crown appealed on the ground that the individual sentence imposed for the rape charge (two years), the total effective sentence and the non-parole period were manifestly inadequate, and that the sentences imposed failed to:

- Have sufficient regard to the maximum penalty for the prescribed offences;
- Properly reflect the objective gravity of the offending;
- Have sufficient regard to the impact of the offending on the victim;
- Give sufficient weight to principles of community protection, general deterrence, specific deterrence, denunciation and the need for just punishment; and
- Give weight to mitigating factors that was not excessive ([28]).

Issues: Whether the sentence and non-parole period were manifestly inadequate.

Decision and reasoning: The Court (Priest AP, Beach and Forrest JA) noted the difficulty in establishing a ground of manifest inadequacy as it requires the Crown to show that it was not reasonably open to the sentencing judge to come to the sentencing conclusion reached, and that the sentence imposed was 'wholly outside the range of the sentencing options available' ([35]). The appeal was dismissed because the objective gravity of the offending was lower than is often seen for rape offences. The Court distinguished Shrestha v The Queen [2017] VSCA 364 as the respondent did not display the same degree of criminality as the offender in that case ([36]). The Court agreed with the sentencing judge's findings that the incident was a single, impulsive act, which did not appear to be premeditated. Excessive violence was not involved and the duration of the incident was relatively brief. Further, as the rape involved digital, rather than penile, penetration, 'the offence could properly be described as a breach of an agreement as to the limits of intimacy, in the context of a longstanding relationship in which intimacy occurred throughout.' ([37])

Moreover, the Court, agreeing with the sentencing judge, held that the fact the respondent exhibited little remorse and ran a trial was an important mitigating factor ([38]). Their Honours also did not disagree with the sentencing judge's finding that the respondent had 'relatively good' prospects for rehabilitation ([27]). Although the sentence imposed was lenient, the Court held that is was within the range of available sentencing options.

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Evidence issues' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pretext call' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Suicide threats'

Charges: Rape x 2; common assault x 1.

Case type: Application for leave to appeal.

Facts: At the time of the offending, the respondent and the complainant were in a relationship. Their relationship was characterised by physical and emotional abuse. On two separate instances, the respondent raped the complainant ([2]-[3]). He also assaulted her by punching her in the face ([4]). In the past, the respondent had generally acted in a possessive and aggressive manner towards the complainant ([8]). He had previously made threats to commit suicide if she left him and had insisted on having sex with her on many occasions ([6]-[7]). An important piece of evidence in this application was a pretext call between the respondent and complainant. In the pretext call, the respondent made an admission to one or more of the allegations made by the complainant. Before the empanelment of the jury, the trial judge made a ruling excluding the admission into evidence of the contents of the pretext call.

Issues: Whether leave to appeal should be granted. Whether the exclusion of the evidence would eliminate or substantially weaken the prosecution's case.

Decision and reasoning: The Court held that the trial judge did not err in considering that the jury could not reasonably conclude that the complainant specifically referred to either of the incidents subject to the two rape charges in the pretext call ([45]). Further, it was held that the trial judge correctly accepted that the jury could conclude that the respondent did make an admission of sexual misconduct in the pretext call. However, this admission was of limited probative value in the context of the case. The trial judge did not err in concluding that the probative value of the evidence would be outweighed by its prejudicial effect ([54]). Consequently, the Court concluded that the applicant should not be granted leave to appeal the decision of the trial judge to exclude the contents of the pretext call from evidence ([55]).

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The offender pleaded guilty to the murder of his father (the victim). The offence took place at the offender's house that he occupied with the victim and his then girlfriend. The offender had an argument with the victim which erupted into a violent altercation, leading him to physically assault the victim until he was dead. Following the murder, the offender and his then girlfriend approached two men to help remove the body from the house and take it to a disused mineshaft for disposal. The offender's relationship with his father at the time of the offending was 'intensely troubled'; however despite the difficulties, they had a close and co-dependant bond. Further, he suffered from a range of emotional and psychological problems and was prone to drug abuse ([9], [57]).

Issue: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offence in the circumstances.

Held: Dixon J sentenced the offender to 21 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 17 years. The offender had a limited criminal history which included contravening a family violence safety notice and offences against police ([74]). Further, he pleaded guilty late and therefore was not entitled to the same degree of mitigation as if he had pleaded guilty at the earliest possible stage. There was also delay in the finalisation of proceedings which was due to factors beyond the offender's control. For example, his then girlfriend changed legal representation more than once, and he was also diagnosed and treated for testicular cancer. As a result of these matters, the offender had been on remand since March 2016 ([75]-[78]). Her Honour noted that he had used this time productively, having enrolled in several programs open to remand prisoners, and received training in drug education ([79]). The offender's prospects of rehabilitation were found to be reasonable, particularly if he remained on stabilising medication and avoided illicit drugs upon release ([82]-[83]).

The objective gravity of the crime was aggravated by the way the offender continued to assault the victim when he was already severely incapacitated. It was further increased by the nature of the physical violence, together with his efforts to dispose of the body and involve other people in that conduct. The concealment of the offence meant that the victim's relatives did not learn of his death for some time after it occurred. Regardless of the pressures that the offender may have endured, her Honour found him to be solely responsible for the victim's death 'in an episode of appalling brutality' ([84]-[85]).

The offending was not premeditated but arose in circumstances of sudden rage in the context of a highly dysfunctional household. Her Honour accepted that the offender was contrite but noted that expression of sincere remorse gave way to self-interest in the aftermath of the murder. She gave weight to denunciation, just punishment, general and specific deterrence, and the need for rehabilitation. However, specific deterrence was somewhat diminished as a factor given his limited criminal history and conduct on remand ([86]-[90]).

The parties only referred to a small number of cases involving the murder of a parent, none of which were comparable to the present case. A notable feature of this case was that despite the history of conflict between the offender and the victim, he 'accepted responsibility for murdering the person [he] had come to depend on most' ([91]-[93]).

Forbes (a Pseudonym) v The Queen* [2018] VSCA 341 (18 December 2018) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Factors affecting risk' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charges: Multiple counts of assault and rape.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant was charged with 12 counts of assault and rape. The first five charges involved intentionally causing injury and rape against his former domestic partner. The remaining seven charges concerned offences of assault, rape, making a threat to kill and intentionally causing injury against the same domestic partner, however, the parties had separated at the time these particular offences were alleged to have been committed. The applicant pleaded not guilty to the offences. The sentencing judge imposed a sentence of 10 years 10 months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of seven years and three months.

Issues: The applicant sought leave to appeal because the sentence imposed was manifestly excessive in that:

- The individual sentence imposed for one of the counts of rape (count 11) was excessive; and
- The sentencing judge incorrectly characterised each offence as a serious example of that kind of offence; and
- The sentencing judge gave insufficient weight to the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation.

Decision and reasoning: The Court emphasised that the ground of manifest excess will only succeed if it can be proven that the sentence imposed fell wholly outside the range of sentencing options available to the sentencing judge. Their Honours considered the applicant's limited criminal history to be relevant, but given his lack of remorse, denial of the offending and the circumstances of the offending, the sentencing judge was open to conclude that his prospects of rehabilitation were 'guarded' ([39]). The offending was found to be very serious, and the context of domestic violence significant ([42]). The applicant's personal circumstances were also considered, including his previous experiences as a victim of sexual abuse, and his medical and psychological history (including brain damage and bipolar disorder). Ultimately, the Court refused the appeal as the total effective sentence imposed by the sentencing judge was not outside the range of sentencing options available to him.

The Court observed that the context of domestic violence is also very important. The Court quoted from Pasinis [2014] VSCA 97:

> Historically perpetrators of family violence were rarely prosecuted. Even when offenders were convicted of such offences, they often received lenient sentences. Fortunately the criminal law now gives greater recognition to the devastating effects of family violence. It has also been recognised that women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously. This makes both specific and general deterrence very important factors in sentencing men who assault their partner.

The Court noted the importance of general deterrence in this context.

'Cumulative sentence' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Women'

Charges: Rape x 2; make a threat to kill x 1.

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence. Determined 'on the papers'.

Facts: The victim was the applicant's wife of many years. The applicant and the victim married in 1996 and have 2 children. The family emigrated from Egypt in 2009, and practise the Coptic Christian Orthodox faith. The rape offences involved penile-anal penetration, contrary to the Coptic religious faith (charges 3 and 4). The applicant also threatened to kill the victim, telling her that if she saw a counsellor he would kill her and tell everyone that she was mentally unstable and had committed suicide (charge 5). The victim suffered an anal injury as a result of the rape the subject of charge 4. The applicant was sentenced to 10 years and 6 months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 7 years and 9 months. For the charge of making a threat to kill, the individual sentence was 2 years, and for the two rape charges, the individual sentences were 8 years each. The applicant was also sentenced as a serious sexual offender in respect of charge 5.

Issue: The applicant sought to appeal against the sentence. One ground of appeal was that the sentences imposed on each of the individual counts, and the order for cumulation of the sentence imposed on charge 4, were excessive.

Held: Tate JA refused leave to appeal as she was not persuaded that it was reasonably arguable that the sentences imposed against the applicant went beyond a sound exercise of the sentencing discretion ([48]). The sentences imposed against the applicant in relation to the rape charges were 'very stern'. However, the offending was 'extremely serious' and, as the sentencing judge acknowledged, there has been a recent shift towards sterner sentencing for rape and other sexual offences. This has been a conscious decision of the courts to reflect the seriousness of domestic violence and sexual crimes committed against women in Victoria ([39]).

Her Honour noted the extreme seriousness of the offending and the absence of remorse. Therefore, there was a need for specific and general deterrence in the context of protecting the community from a serious sex offender in respect of charge 5 ([43]). Having regard to the facts, circumstances and available data regarding current sentencing practices, the sentence of 2 years' imprisonment in respect of charge 5 was not manifestly excessive nor was the relatively modest cumulation of 6 months ([46]). Further, the order for cumulation with respect to charge 3 was found to be necessary to reflect the fact that the 2 rape offences occurred as 'distinct and separate episodes' ([47]).

McLean v The Queen* [2018] VSCA 209 (24 August 2018) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Damaging property' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Aggravated burglary x 1; Criminal damage x 1; Resisting an emergency worker on duty x 1.

Appeal type: Applicant for leave to appeal.

Facts: The applicant and his ex-partner argued by text message, culminating in the applicant's text: 'Addie won't had no mother from today' and 'I'll have the last laugh I promise you that'. Addie was their six-month old daughter. On the same day, the applicant broke into his ex-partner's home, causing damage and turning on the gas before leaving. The applicant was charged with aggravated burglary, in that he entered as a trespasser, intending to destroy property with reckless disregard as to the presence of another person. He was also charged with causing criminal damage and resisting an emergency worker. He was sentenced to two years and six months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two years.

Issues: The applicant sought leave to appeal on the basis that (1) the sentencing judge erred by imposing a manifestly excessive non-parole period of 80% of the total effective sentence; and (2) his Honour did not explain the necessity for the imposition of the relatively high non-parole period.

Decision and reasoning: The high ratio between the non-parole period and the head sentence was such that leave to appeal was granted, but the appeal was dismissed ([27]). Given the nature of the offending and the applicant's criminal history, the sentences imposed (leaving to one side the non-parole period) were very modest and not excessive. The Court found that the explanation for the moderate sentence was largely the significance placed by the judge on the prospect of deportation. As the sentence exceeded two years' imprisonment, the sentencing judge was required by s 11(1) of the Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic)to fix a non-parole period, unless he considered it inappropriate to do so, having regard to the nature of the offence or the offender's past history. Clearly, his Honour considered it appropriate to fix a non-parole period. s 11(3) required that period to be at least six-months less than the term of the sentence. Here, the non-parole period fixed was, in a sense, the 'maximum' period that could be fixed. In determining the non-parole period, the judge was required to take into account the purpose of parole, namely, to provide for mitigation of punishment in favour of rehabilitation after the offender had served the non-parole period (see Power v The Queen [1974] HCA 26). The seriousness of the offending was such that justice required a non-parole period of at least two years. Therefore, the high ratio between the head sentence and the non-parole period was explicable by the very modest sentences imposed (and cumulation ordered) for the offences. There was no error in his Honour fixing the non-parole period.

Sawyer-Thompson v The Queen* [2018] VSCA 161 (22 June 2018) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Manslaughter' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Defensive homicide x 1

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: The female appellant had been in an abusive and violent relationship with her male partner for 12 months prior to her offending. Her partner threatened to kill her family unless she killed the victim. Acting under the fear of this threat, she killed the victim. The appellant pleaded guilty to defensive homicide.

Issues: Whether the sentence imposed was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: Maxwell ACJ and Tate JA held that the sentence of 10 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of seven years was manifestly excessive. The appellant was re-sentenced to six and a half years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of five years.

The sentencing judge accepted that the killing took place at the direction of the appellant's violent and abusive partner who had threatened to kill her family unless she killed the victim. She had been subjected to 'repeated acts of violence, degradation and humiliation at the hands of her partner, who was… a highly dangerous person'. The fact that she proceeded to kill the victim rather than attempting to flee, and that she used excessive violence, 'could only be understood through the lens of the sustained family violence she had experienced' ([7]).

Maxwell ACJ and Tate JA held that the sentence imposed reflected a mischaracterisation of the gravity of the offending and of the appellant's culpability. Insufficient weight was also given to the mitigating factors of cooperation with authority and youth ([65]).

The appellant's undertaking to assist, and the provision of her statement, reflected remorse and a genuine desire to bring a person to justice ([55]). As a result, discount for cooperation was necessary because 'there [was] some personal risk' to the applicant, as a result of which she had already spent some time in protective custody.

Beach JA held that whilst the sentence was stern, it was not manifestly excessive ([133]).

Lewis (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2018] VSCA 40 (27 February 2018) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Admissibility of evidence' – 'Hearsay rule' – 'Interlocutory appeal' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Tendency evidence'

Charges: Aggravated burglary x 1; Intentionally cause injury x 2; Recklessly cause injury x 2; Intentionally damage property x 1; Extortion with a threat to kill x 1; False imprisonment x 1; Making threat to kill x 1; Contravening family violence intervention order x 1; Attempt to pervert the course of justice x 2.

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against interlocutory decisions.

Facts: The charges related to an incident of violence committed by the applicant against the aggrieved, his partner. The aggrieved was to be the central witness for the prosecution ([5]-[7]). The aggrieved invoked s 18 Evidence Act 2008 (Vic), which provides that a person can avoid giving evidence against their partner if there is a sufficient likelihood that harm would be caused to the person ([9]-[11]). The prosecution then gave notice under s 65 Evidence Act 2008 that they would rely on statements that the aggrieved had made to the police as tendency evidence as an exception to the hearsay rule ([16]).

Issues: The applicant appealed against 3 main interlocutory decisions made by the judge. First, admitting the statements the aggrieved made to the police. Second, refusing to certify the appeal, which is a precondition to appeal against an interlocutory decision under s 295(3) of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic). Third, refusing to sever the proceedings for each of the applicant's charges.

Decision and Reasoning: The Court dismissed all grounds of the appeal. On the first ground, it was reasonably open for the judge to admit the evidence as an exception to the hearsay rule. The applicant argued that admitting the evidence might lead to prejudice because the aggrieved could not be cross-examined (since she had invoked the protection against giving evidence against a de facto partner) ([58]). The Court held that there were sufficient protections available to ensure a fair trial, including directions against giving too much weight to untested statements ([59]). Accordingly, in relation to the second ground, it was reasonably open for the judge to refuse to certify ([64]). On the third ground, the Court held that many charges stemmed from the same factual basis, so there was no basis to sever the charges ([68]).

The Court observed that the applicant did not seek to challenge the judge's ruling that the tendency evidence satisfies the requirements of ss 97 and 101, 'presumably' because 'he regards a submission of that kind as foredoomed to fail, based upon the recent decision of the High Court in Hughes v The Queen' [2017] HCA 20 (14 June 2017). [72] The Court stated at [73] that:

> It is, however, worthy of note that the general evidence of the history of domestic violence, which forms the basis of the tendency notice, may not have quite the probative force in relation to the allegation of the threat to kill and extortion, as it does in relation to the other charges brought against the applicant.

The Court concluded by cautioning trial judges about the use of tendency evidence: '[if the tendency] evidence were led, the judge would have to give a careful direction as to how it could be used and, more importantly, how it could not be used' ([75]).

Saxton v R* [2017] VSCA 357 (5 December 2017) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Assault' – 'Controlling behaviour' – 'Financial abuse' – 'Mental health' – 'Suicide threat' – 'Women'

Charges: Recklessly cause injury x 4; Common law assault x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant and victim were married and had two children. The applicant worked as a solicitor and the wife, the victim, as a librarian. The applicant had an epileptic seizure, which caused him to stop work and his mental health to decline. The applicant became increasingly controlling of the victim, forcing her to relinquish her financial independence and remain at home with him rather than going to work. The 'recklessly cause injury' charges occurred when the applicant punched and hit the victim at home and in their bed. The common assault charge occurred when the applicant twisted her arm so violently that her arm broke. The applicant threatened suicide, and the victim went to the police (see [5], the remarks of the sentencing judge).

The applicant was sentenced to 7 months and 14 days' imprisonment and a 2-year community correction order ([1]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed (see [28]). The applicant argued that the injuries sustained were at the lower end of the scale, and the broken arms was not intended ([21]). The Court did not accept that submission. Justices Santamaria and Coghlan JJA stated that the offending was 'serious' and stemmed from an 'abusive relationship between the applicant and the victim, who was vulnerable and frightened of the applicant' ([29]). The Court quotes Kalala v The Queen [2017] VSCA 223, discussing the scourge of domestic violence:

> The trial courts of this State are imposing sentences for family violence offences with increasing frequency. This Court has repeatedly emphasised the need to condemn family violence, in line with community expectations. In Filiz v The Queen [2014] VSCA 212 [23], the Court acknowledged the 'shameful truth' that family violence is a leading cause of illness, disability and death among Victorian women aged between 15 and 44.

The Court concluded that the principles of general deterrence and denunciation loomed large in the present case, and the sentence was, if anything, merciful ([31]).

DPP v Lade (a pseudonym)* [2017] VSCA 264 (21 September 2017) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Attempting to pervert the course of justice' – 'Breach of family violence intervention order' – 'Family law' – 'Intimate photos' – 'Post-separation violence' – 'Property proceedings' – 'Sexual assault' – 'Stalking' – 'Suicide threats' – 'Technology and abuse'

Charges: Sexual assault x 1; Stalking x 2; Attempting to pervert the course of justice x 1; Contravention of family violence intervention order ('FVIO') x 1; Making threats to kill x 1; threatening to distribute intimate images of another person x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The victim was the defendant's ex-wife. The offences occurred over an 18-month period after they had separated ([7]). The offences included: the defendant forcing the victim onto her bed and ejaculating on her; threatening to distribute intimate photos to the victim's father and employer if she did not agree to his terms for their property settlement; entering her house and leaving videos of himself; and sending mail to her house ([7]-[22]); threatening to kill himself if the victim did not drop the charges (attempting to pervert the course of justice). The defendant was originally sentenced to 16 months' imprisonment (see table at [2]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed.

The Court (Priest, Hansen and Coghlan JJA) re-sentenced the defendant to 2 years and 11 months imprisonment with a non-parole period of 2 years. The primary judge treated the offences as 'situational in the sense that it was based within a relationship, not that that condones it in any way, shape or form' [34]. But the Court of Appeal placed more emphasis on the fact that the domestic context, breach of FVIO and offending while in jail were all aggravating factors [49].

The Court appeared to endorse the DPP's description of the sexual assault as 'particularly serious … being violent, non-consensual and humiliating for C who was treated as though a marital chattel' [40].

Nolan v The Queen* [2017] VSCA 240 (6 September 2017) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravating factor' – 'Causing serious injury' – 'Gratuitous violence' – 'Manifest excess' – 'Not manifestly excessive' – 'Presence of children' – 'Sentence' – 'Youth'

Charges: Recklessly causing serious injury x 1; False imprisonment x 1; Making threat to kill x 1.

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and complainant were in a de facto relationship with two children. Over one afternoon, the appellant inflicted the following actions on the complainant in the presence of the children: throwing a pot of boiling water over her; punching and kicking her; whipping her with a kettle cord; hitting her with a broom; rubbing salt and curry powder into her wounds; and threatening to kill her (see [3]-[11]). The applicant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 5 years and 6 months. The applicant had previously been refused leave to appeal against sentence, but renewed the application to the full Court.

Issues: First, whether the sentencing judge erred in not applying principles relevant to young offenders; and second, whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

The Court (Beach, Ferguson and Coghlan JJA) dismissed the first ground on the basis that the judge took into account the applicant's age, but also took into account the seriousness of the offences, the fact that the offences took place in a domestic relationship and in the presence of the applicant's and victim's children, and the serious injuries inflicted on the victim ([30]-[31]).

The Court dismissed the second ground on the basis that the sentencing judge took into account the applicant's disadvantaged upbringing, lack of relevant antecedents, plea of guilty and remorse, and no comparable case established that the sentence fell outside the reasonable range ([38]). The Court appeared to endorse the sentencing judge's comments that this was an unusual case with many aggravating factors ([24]), and that the use of weapons, boiling water and salt as 'gratuitous and sickening behaviour' ([22]).

Kalala v R* [2017] VSCA 223 (30 August 2017) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Approaching "worst category of case"' – 'Current sentencing practices' – 'Incitement to murder' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Sentencing' – 'Women'

Charges: Incitement to murder x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and victim were in a de facto relationship ([4]). While the victim was visiting relatives in Burundi, the applicant became suspicious that she was seeing another man ([7]). The applicant arranged and paid for the victim to be killed ([8]). While speaking with the victim on the phone, the applicant told her to go outside ([9]). Upon walking outside, the victim was forced into a vehicle, held captive for 2 days and told that she would be killed. However, the kidnappers did not kill her because she was a woman ([10]). The victim returned to Australia. The applicant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 9 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 6 years ([1]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The main argument advanced by the applicant was that the sentence was the highest yet imposed for the offence, and the circumstances of the offending were not more serious than previous offences ([3]).

President Maxwell and Redlich JA ('the joint judgement') made some general conclusions ([3]), including:

- previous sentences do not impose an upper limit on a sentencing judge (see [51]-[54]);
- the circumstances of the offending were more serious than previous sentences (see [44]-[50];
- inciting the murder of a partner is an extreme form of family violence; and
- previous sentences for incitement to murder have not reflected the objective gravity of the crime, and must be increased (see [66]-[70]).

The joint judgement remarked that the case had many aggravating factors, including the fact that the applicant played an active role in initiating the plan and delivering her into the hands of the kidnappers ([24], [46]). Since it was not suggested that the case warranted the maximum penalty, it was inappropriate to classify the case was a 'worst category' case (citing R v Kilic [2016] HCA 48) ([28]). However, the sentence was reasonably open to the sentencing judge ([54]).

The joint judgement stated at [62]:

> The applicant's motivation — to have NR killed as punishment for perceived infidelity — is expressive of the very worst of male attitudes towards women … It follows that this offending must be viewed as involving moral culpability at the highest level.

Justice Osborn agreed with the joint judgement, but was reluctant to express a global view on the adequacy of current sentences for incitement to murder ([92]).

Fitzpatrick v The Queen* [2016] VSCA 63 (6 April 2016) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Common assault' – 'Criminal damage' – 'Exposing children' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Persistent contravention of a family violence intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Repeated breach of protection orders' – 'Risk factors' – 'Strangulation' – 'Theft' – 'Threat to kill' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Persistent contravention of a family violence intervention order, common assault, threat to kill, theft x 2, criminal damage.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The principal victim of the offending was the applicant's former female domestic partner. After the relationship broke down, the victim obtained a family violence intervention order, which the applicant repeatedly breached. One night, the applicant broke into the victim's house and wrapped a telephone cord tightly around her neck. He threatened to kill her and cut off 40cm from her hair, saying he wanted to disfigure her to the point that no-one else would find her attractive. He then took the victim's phone, house and car keys and drove away. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of four years and nine months with a non-parole period of two years and nine months.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The objective gravity of the offending warranted severe punishment, certainly extending to a sentence of the overall length here. In that regard, Beach JA noted that the persistent contravening of a family violence intervention order was itself extremely serious and was 'no mere breach of an intervention order of the kind so frequently seen'. The conduct on the night of 29 October 2014 was also extremely serious because it must have been terrifying for the victim, the applicant knew there were children in the house, and the assault was not spontaneous. This was not an act brought about by a temporary loss of self-control, resulting from something said or done by the victim. His Honour stated that instead, 'it was an act of wanton cruelty intended to humiliate and terrify a defenceless woman in her own home' (See [37]-[41]).

Byrnes v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 341 (10 December 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Contravening a family violence intervention order' – 'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'False imprisonment' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnant women' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: False imprisonment, threat to kill, contravening a family violence intervention order, assault with a weapon, assault police, resist police.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and the female victim were in a relationship and the victim was 17 weeks pregnant with their child. The applicant wanted the victim to terminate the pregnancy and had made numerous threats against the victim and the baby. A family violence intervention order was made. On the day of offence, the applicant locked the victim inside the house, held a knife against her, and threatened to kill her if she screamed or called the police. He then tried to force the victim into the bath, saying that he was going to abort the baby. He continued to threaten the victim and the baby until he became tearful. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of three years and nine months imprisonment with a non-parole period of two years and six months.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. In light of the applicant's mitigating circumstances (his mental condition, his lack of prior convictions and his steps towards rehabilitation), the sentences imposed were high. However, the circumstances of the offence were particularly serious and required the imposition of a sentence that was sufficient to reflect the gravity of offending and to serve the purposes of sentencing including general deterrence and denunciation (See [24]). In particular, at [22]-[23], Kaye JA held:

'The applicant's offending had a number of very serious characteristics. As the respondent has pointed out, it was premeditated, and the applicant had clearly prepared for it. The victim was vulnerable. She was carrying the applicant's baby. The applicant took advantage of his greater strength, and the fact that he had a weapon, to overwhelm her. The threat to abort the baby was, as the judge correctly said, a 'most ugly' aspect of the false imprisonment. The whole experience, to which the applicant subjected her, must have been extraordinarily terrifying. She was justifiably in grave fear for her own life and that of her baby. While the imprisonment did not extend for hours or days, it lasted for over one hour, during the whole of which the applicant terrorised his victim.

In those circumstances, the offending by the applicant, comprising charge 1, called for a stern sentence. In such a case, involving wanton domestic violence, general deterrence, specific deterrence, and denunciation were important considerations: Filiz v The Queen [2014] VSCA 212 at [21] and Mercer v The Queen [2015] VSCA 257 at [54]. While the judge accepted that the applicant's psychological condition moderated the weight to be given to those considerations, nevertheless, they rightly remained important factors in the determination of the applicant's sentence: R v Yaldiz [1998] 2 VR 376, 381'.

DPP v O'Neill* [2015] VSCA 325 (2 December 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against sentence' – 'Arson' – 'Coercive control' – 'Male victim' – 'Murder' – 'People who are gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer' – 'People with mental impairment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Principles in R v Verdins' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation'

Charge/s: Murder, arson.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male respondent and the male deceased were in a relationship. The trial judge accepted that the deceased had a dominant and controlling personality while the victim was submissive and often demeaned and belittled by the deceased in public. On the morning of offence, the respondent rejected the deceased's sexual approach and the deceased called him a 'frigid bitch'. The respondent tried to apologise but the deceased repeated his abuse. The respondent snapped. He hit the deceased over the head with a steel pan and strangled him with a dog lead. The respondent acted if the deceased was alive for several days before setting fire to their home with the deceased's body inside. He acted as if the deceased had died accidently until he was arrested.

At sentence, Dr Barth, a psychologist, provided evidence of the respondent's psychological condition. He diagnosed the respondent as having a maladaptive personality adjustment and as suffering from pervasive feelings of worthlessness, inadequacy and insecurity. The sentencing judge accepted that the respondent's personality disorder played some role in his offending, and therefore operated to reduce his moral culpability and to moderate to some extent the need for general and specific deterrence. A total effective sentence of 18 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 13 years, was imposed.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

In setting out the background to the matter the Court observed:

> The deceased was the dominant partner in the relationship, with the respondent by and large acquiescing to the deceased's directions. Over the term of the relationship there was regular verbal conflict which intensified with time. The respondent told his psychologist how he was abused and humiliated in front of others by the deceased. Sometimes the conflicts involved verbal abuse and sometimes pushing and shoving. He also told the psychologist that the deceased was sexually demanding of him and if he declined the deceased's approaches he would call him a 'frigid bitch'. The respondent said he felt as if the deceased treated him as his own property. Despite all this, the deceased was regarded by the respondent as being loving and affectionate towards him. [7]

The Court also quoted from the earlier sentencing judgment of the Supreme Court, for example:

> 27 The personalities of both the deceased and the respondent were considered by the judge. Her Honour said this:
> Mr Rattle was strong, confident and successful. He also had a dominant, controlling personality; everything had to be done his way, both personally and professionally. No doubt that was part of the key to his professional success. And, because of your own psychological make-up, you felt inadequate; it suited you to be with someone who took control and made all the decisions. But many of your mutual friends have described how Mr Rattle used to demean and belittle you in public. He frequently complained to them that you were not satisfying him sexually. In front of others, he would call you lazy, a parasite; he would threaten to send you back to where you came from. He was critical of your lack of business acumen. There were financial and business pressures on the relationship. In the work context, he treated you like the office boy, not his partner.

The Court provided extensive consideration of the six circumstances identified in R v Verdins in which impaired mental functioning is considered relevant to the appropriate sentence to be passed on an offender (See [66]-[84] in particular). The Court rejected a purely mechanistic approach and they emphasised that careful consideration must be given to whether the evidence establishes that mental capacity has been impaired and which of the circumstances in Verdins are engaged. This requires rigorous evaluation of the evidence (See [68]). Here, the respondent did not establish on the balance of probabilities that he suffered from a mental impairment. As the principles in Verdins do not extend to personality disorders such as those relied upon, the relevant principles (in particular, the moderation of the need for general and specific deterrence, and the reduction of moral culpability) were not engaged (See [85]).

Nevertheless, the respondent's mental condition was still of some relevance to sentence, it just did not attract the level of mitigation of sentence that must be allowed where Verdins principles are applicable. First, the sentencing judge did not err in accepting that the respondent's personality disorder operated to moderate, to some extent, the need for general and specific deterrence. Second, the Court also held that on the evidence it was open to the sentencing judge to conclude that the murder of the deceased was not premeditated, vindictive or gratuitous but rather the result of a very complex and conflicted personality structure. In that way, the sentencing judge was correct in taking the respondent's disorder into account in making an assessment of the moral culpability of the respondent (See [99]-[100]).

The appeal court noted that the sentence was mid-range in light of the trial judge's rejection of the Crown's characterisation of the crime as premeditated; the trial judge had noted that while the controlling and belittling behaviour that had characterised Rattle's relationship with O'Neill did not justify killing him, it did mean that the sentence to be imposed for murder should be towards the lower end of the range for that offence.

DPP v Barnes & Barnes* [2015] VSCA 293 (12 November 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Denunciation' – 'General deterrence' – 'Intentionally cause serious injury' – 'Just punishment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection of the community' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing' – 'Specific deterrence' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary, intentionally cause serious injury x 2.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: Trevor Barnes ('the first respondent') and his younger brother ('the second respondent') entered into the premises of the first respondent's estranged wife, without her consent. Three days prior to the home invasion, the first respondent had been released from prison for offences including assaulting his wife and multiple breaches of an intervention order she had in place against him. The first respondent saw his wife and her new partner in the shower together and smashed the door of the shower. He struck his wife's new partner and his wife with a jemmy bar before pulling out a Stanley knife. He only stopped when his wife said she loved him. The first respondent was sentenced to six years imprisonment with a non-parole period of three years.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentence imposed on the first respondent was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. First, in relation to the charge of aggravated burglary, Redlich JA noted that this was a very serious offence of 'intimate relationship aggravated burglary'. The first respondent entered into the house, uninvited and in company, carrying a jemmy bar, with the intention to assault his estranged wife, whom he knew was frightened of him because of his past instances of violence. He had just been released from prison and committed these offences in breach of an intervention order and a partly suspended sentence. As Redlich JA stated at [48]-[49]:

'General deterrence, denunciation and just punishment are important purposes in sentencing for such an offence … Specific deterrence and protection of the community are also important in this case, given that Trevor had not long since been released from prison for offences that included assaulting Ms Bethune and breaching an intervention order in her favour'.

However, the sentence here failed to adequately reflect these purposes.

Second, in relation to the charges of intentionally causing serious injury, in sentencing the first respondent for these offences, the sentencing judge stated: (See [68])

'I make it plain that I consider that you are the main offender in this criminal enterprise and the whole appalling saga was dictated by your immaturity and inability to control your anger in the context of your possessive and controlling behaviour of Ms Bethune, whom you had subjected to domestic violence on earlier occasions. In sentencing you, the court must denounce your conduct, give emphasis to general deterrence, and impose just punishment. A strong message needs to be sent to males in the community who are inclined to be violent towards their female partners. You do not own them. You have no right … menacingly [to] control them. If you lay a hand on them in anger, the law will not spare you punishment. Men who are bullies towards women usually have some psychological inadequacy. They need to look long and hard at themselves to try to understand why they are inclined to behave with anger and brutality, and seek professional help to overcome such inclinations.

In your case, emphasis must also be placed upon specific deterrence because of your prior history of violence towards Ms Bethune. As I have indicated, your history of offending whilst on a suspended sentence, and breaching an intervention order, do not inspire optimism'.

Redlich JA noted that while the sentencing judge was clearly alive to the need to place considerable weight on the need for general deterrence, denunciation, just punishment, specific deterrence and protection of the community, the sentences imposed did not adequately reflect these purposes (See [69]).

Uzun v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 292 (27 October 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Common assault' – 'Community education' – 'Contravening a family violence intervention order' – 'General deterrence' – 'Making threat to kill' – 'Persistent breach' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Reckless conduct endangering a person' – 'Sentencing' – 'Tendency evidence'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary, making a threat to kill x 3, common assault, contravening a family violence intervention order, reckless conduct endangering a person x 2.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and his wife were married and had three children together but separated in 2007. A family violence intervention order was later made against the applicant. In 2013, the applicant went to his wife's home and committed a number of offences including aggravated burglary, breach of a family violence intervention order, threatening to kill and common assault. At trial, evidence was adduced of three previous incidents where the applicant had been physically and verbally abusive towards his wife and their children. It was adduced as tendency of the applicant to act in a particular way namely, to make threats to kill family members, to assault family members, to falsely imprison family members, and to contravene family violence orders. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of ten years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of eight years.

Issue/s:

1. The trial judge erred in admitting tendency evidence sought to be adduced by the prosecution.

2. The sentence was manifestly excessive or ‘crushing’.

Decision and Reasoning: Priest JA (Maxwell P and Beale AJA agreeing) dismissed the appeal against conviction. The principles governing the admissibility of tendency reasoning were formulated in Velkoski v The Queen where it was said that:

‘The features relied upon must in combination possess significant probative value which requires far more than ‘mere relevance’. In order to determine whether the features of the acts relied upon permit tendency reasoning, it remains apposite and desirable to assess whether those features reveal ‘underlying unity’, a ‘pattern of conduct’, ‘modus operandi’, or such similarity as logically and cogently implies that the particular features of those previous acts renders the occurrence of the act to be proved more likely. It is the degree of similarity of the operative features that gives the tendency evidence its relative strength’.

Here, consistent with the principles in Velkoski, ’the evidence impugned by the applicant met the necessary high threshold of admissibility. Indeed, the conduct revealed by the tendency evidence was, as I have mentioned, conceded to be strikingly similar to the charged conduct. Given that the live issue for the jury was whether the charged conduct occurred, the evidence introduced as tendency evidence had the potential to shed considerable light on that issue, in circumstances where it could hardly be realistically contended that the probative value of the evidence did not substantially outweigh its prejudicial effect’ (See [27]).

Priest JA (Maxwell P and Beale AJA agreeing) also dismissed the appeal against sentence. The total effective sentence and non-parole period could not be said to be excessive in light of the applicant’s extensive and persistent history of criminal offending, the need for general and specific deterrence, his lack of remorse and rehabilitation, and the need for denunciation of his conduct. In particular, Priest JA stated that: ‘general deterrence is important in cases such as this of violence against domestic partners, so as to deter other like-minded individuals from similar offending’ (See [32]-[40]).

Maxwell P (Beale AJA agreeing) made some additional observations at [48]-[50]:

‘Priest JA has referred to the importance of general deterrence and this Court’s repeated statements that sentences imposed for family violence should be set at a level which will send a message to those — predominantly men — who might offend violently against domestic partners or former partners or family members.

Plainly enough, the sentences which the courts impose will not serve that purpose unless the sentences and the reasons for them are properly publicised. As the Court said last year in DPP v Russell (in relation to sentences for random street violence) at [5] and [6]:

'Obviously enough, … a prison sentence can only have that wider deterrent effect if it is publicised across the community, especially amongst those … who are at risk of offending in this way. Courts have neither the expertise nor the resources to engage in the kind of sustained community education which is necessary if general deterrence is to be a reality. That is a task for government.

After all, it is the responsibility of government to ensure public safety. And government must therefore take responsibility for communicating the deterrent message to those who need to hear it. That requires sustained effort and the commitment of substantial resources. Without that, the community simply will not derive the benefit — in greater public safety — which should flow from the painstaking work of sentencing judges and magistrates in this State. Self-evidently, if the message is not getting through no change in sentencing law can make the difference'.

In view of the community concern about domestic violence and the importance of deterring it, those considerations are particularly pertinent in this area. A copy of the Court's decision in this matter will be forwarded to the Royal Commission on Family Violence for its consideration'.

Mercer (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 257 (17 September 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Assault' – 'Deterrence' – 'False imprisonment' – 'Intentionally causing injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Serious consequences' – 'Threatening to inflict serious injury'

Charge/s: Assault x 5, intentionally causing injury, threatening to inflict serious injury, false imprisonment.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female victim was the male applicant's domestic partner. The applicant accused the victim of concealing drugs, becoming increasingly angry and aggressive. He slapped her, punched her to the side of the face, threw her to the floor, and whipped her with a coat hanger. The applicant then accused the victim of having a relationship with another man. He banged her head against a wall, punched her and threatened to physically harm her. The victim managed to escape but only after she had been confined for several hours. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of three years and six months imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 2 years and six months.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. This was a serious example of serious offending. As per Maxwell P and Beach JA at [54]:

'This Court has said on many occasions that domestic violence will not be tolerated, and that general deterrence is a very important sentencing principle in the sentencing disposition which must be, and must be seen to be, condemned by the courts: R v Gojanovic [2002] VSC 467, [31]; R v Robertson [2005] VSCA 190, [13]; DPP v Smeaton [2007] VSCA 256, [21]–[22]; R v Hester [2007] VSCA 298, [19]. To borrow from what this Court said recently in Filiz v The Queen, offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to conflict with a partner is one of violent rage. Such a response is utterly unacceptable. This Court has made it clear, and will continue to make it plain, that offending of this kind will attract serious consequences'.

The sentence imposed could not be regarded as manifestly excessive. Indeed, in light of the objective seriousness of the applicant's conduct and giving full effect to considerations of totality, the sentence imposed by the judge was entirely appropriate (See [55]).

Portelli v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 159 (22 June 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravating features' – 'Assault police officer' – 'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Effects of family violence' – 'Intentionally cause serious injury' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Statistics' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Intentionally cause serious injury, assault police officer x 3.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant was in a de facto relationship with the female victim. A week prior to the offending, the applicant became enraged and, fearful of violence, the victim obtained an interim intervention order. Despite the intervention order, the victim let the applicant stay at her place. On the day of the offence, the applicant cut the complainant's throat with a razor blade. He then tried to suffocate the complainant with a pillow before producing a serrated knife and trying to cut her throat again. After some time, the applicant stopped attacking the complainant and she asked him to cuddle her because she did not want to die alone. Police arrived and the applicant attacked them with knives in both hands. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 11 years and six months imprisonment with a non-parole period of eight years and three months.

Issue/s: The sentencing judge erred in making adverse findings about the seriousness of the applicant's offending namely,

1. that because of the applicant's prior experience with drugs, he was aware when he ingested drugs at the time of offending that he was more likely to behave in an abusive, violent manner;
2. and that there had been an element of planning in the attack on the victim.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Neither finding had been sought by the prosecutor on the plea and the applicant's counsel were not given notice that the sentencing judge was considering making such findings. Further, there was insufficient evidence to establish beyond reasonable doubt that the applicant had the relevant foreknowledge of the effect the drugs would have on him (See [4]). The court also made a number of observations about family violence at [29]-[30]:

'The sentencing judge described the attack on C as 'extremely vicious and intolerably abhorrent'. It was clear, His Honour said, that C was terrified:

You made her believe she was going to die. To ask you, her attacker, to comfort her after your attack because she thought she was going to die reveals how frightening the experience must have been for her. Yet she was in her home in the presence of an intimate partner and entitled to feel safe and secure. She was doing no more than going about her ordinary life. I do not think that she trusted you; rather, she was in fear of your confrontations when denied what you wanted. Undoubtedly, your vicious attack will be an ongoing nightmare for her. It is clear that the community is intolerant of violent behaviour in such circumstances and expects the courts to send a strong message that behaviour of this kind is totally unacceptable. Women in domestic situations are entitled to feel safe from the violently abusive behaviour of their ex-partners. This circumstance is a significant aggravating feature.

We respectfully agree. What his Honour said accords with recent statements of this Court on the subject of violent attacks by men on their current or former domestic partners. In Filiz v The Queen , the Court said:

It is a shameful truth that family violence is a leading cause of illness, disability and death among Victorian women aged between 15 and 44. It is also sadly true that there are a great number of women who live in real and justified fear of the men who are, or were, their intimate partners.

In Pasinis v The Queen, the Court said:

Historically perpetrators of family violence were rarely prosecuted. Even when offenders were convicted of such offences, they often received lenient sentences. Fortunately the criminal law now gives greater recognition to the devastating effects of family violence. It has also been recognised that women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously. This makes both specific and general deterrence very important factors in sentencing men who assault their partner.

General deterrence is of fundamental importance in cases of domestic violence. The victims of such violence are often so enveloped by fear that they are incapable of either escaping the violence or reporting it to the authorities. The key to protection lies in deterring the violent conduct by sending an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence that if they offend, they will be sentenced to a lengthy period of imprisonment so that they are no longer in a position to inflict harm.

Most recently, in Director of Public Prosecutions v Meyers, the Court said:

Violence of this kind is alarmingly widespread, and extremely harmful. The statistics about the incidence of women being killed or seriously injured by vengeful former partners are truly shocking'. See also DPP v Portelli [2013] VSC 588.

Hopkins v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 174 (19 June 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravating circumstances' – 'Mitigating circumstances' – 'Murder' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Worst category of offending'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Application for extension of time for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: Following a plea of guilty, the applicant was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 30 years for the murder of his de facto partner. Both the applicant and the victim were heavy users of illicit drugs and the relationship was characterised by violence committed by the applicant against the victim. On the day of the offence, the applicant poured petrol over the victim at a petrol station and set her alight. The victim was conscious and screaming the entire time while the applicant taunted her. He actively prevented bystanders from helping the victim by threatening them with a knife. In sentencing the applicant, the judge concluded that the applicant's behaviour was an example of 'the worst kind of viciousness and sadistic behaviour that a court is likely to ever see'.

Issue/s: The head sentence and the non-parole period were manifestly excessive. In particular, the sentencing judge erred in placing this murder in the worst category of the offence.

Decision and Reasoning: The application was refused. While the applicant's conduct arose out of a drug-fuelled rage, it was very clear the applicant understood what he was doing. In this context, his drug consumption did not reduce his moral culpability in any way (See [42]). Further, significant aggravating circumstances were present which explained why the objective gravity of the offence was elevated namely, the circumstances of the death, the applicant's conduct at the time of offence, and the fact that others were exposed to this horrific event (See [45]). The applicant's guilty plea and criminal history were given adequate weight.

DPP v Maxfield* [2015] VSCA 95 (12 May 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Community correction order' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female respondent stabbed her male partner four times: twice in the shoulder, once in the lower back and once in the chest. The respondent suffered from a mild intellectual disability and PTSD. She was sentenced to a Community Correction Order (CCO) for 12 months, with conditions including mental health treatment, compliance with a justice plan and the supervision of a community corrections officer.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. In light of the respondent's intellectual disability and mental illness, her moral culpability was reduced, as was the significance of general and specific deterrence. However, even allowing for the respondent's reduced moral culpability, the sentence imposed was insufficient to satisfy the requirements of just punishment and denunciation, given the objective gravity of the offence (See [36]-[38]).

In re-sentencing the respondent, the Court had regard to the Court's guideline judgment in Boulton v The Queen. The Court praised the trial judge for imposing a CCO, which was appropriate in an unusual case such as this. The objective of community protection was more likely to be achieved – through the reduction of the risk of reoffending – by making such an order with appropriate conditions attached, rather than imposing a prison sentence (See [34]-[35]). However, the length of the CCO was increased to three years and greater conditions imposed.

Marocchini v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 29 (25 February 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Alternative sentencing orders' – 'Assault police' – 'Community correction order' – 'Criminal damage' – 'Damaging property' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Reckless conduct endangering serious injury' – 'Recklessly causing serious injury' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: Criminal damage x 2, reckless conduct endangering serious injury, recklessly causing serious injury, threat to kill, assaulting police, various summary offences.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant and one of the victims were married. The applicant suspected his wife was having an affair with their neighbour. Accordingly, he placed a tracking device on his wife's car, located her, drove dangerously, threatened to kill her and damaged her vehicle. The total effective sentence was 3 years and 3 months, with a non-parole period of 2 years.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The Court considered whether the imposition of a 'Community Correction Order' (CCO) would have been more appropriate than imprisonment. Beach JA quoted extensively from Boulton v The Queen, an important guideline judgment about CCO's. In Boulton, it was noted that imprisonment should always be the last resort, and that a CCO is an alternative punitive option, even for 'relatively serious offences which might previously have attracted a term of imprisonment' (See at [23] – [26]).

While Beach JA acknowledged that this was a serious offence, with a number of aggravating features, a CCO should have been ordered here. The offending occurred over a relatively short time, the appellant was married with four children, had no criminal history and he had the support of his wife who was the principal victim. The sentence was set aside and substituted for a sentence of four months' imprisonment and a CCO of three years' duration with conditions including 300 hours of unpaid community work (See at [30]). This case confirms that where such mitigating factors exist (particularly a lack of criminal history), the sentencing objectives can be achieved by combining a short term of imprisonment with a CCO. However, Beach JA noted that this would not have applied if the appellant had a criminal history.

The relevant passage in Boulton that his Honour referred to is – 'The availability of the combination sentence option adds to the flexibility of the CCO regime. It means that, even in cases of objectively grave criminal conduct, the court may conclude that all of the purposes of the sentence can be served by a short term of imprisonment coupled with a CCO of lengthy duration, with conditions tailored to the offender's circumstances and the causes of the offending'.

DPP v Meyers* [2014] VSCA 314 (4 December 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'False imprisonment' – 'Intentionally causing injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk factor - strangulation' – 'Sentencing' – 'Seriousness'

Charge/s: Damaging property, aggravated burglary, false imprisonment, intentionally causing injury, possessing an unregistered firearm.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female victim was the male respondent's ex-partner. On the day of the offence, the respondent drove to the victim's premises with a double-barrelled shotgun, a power nail gun, a crow bar, cable ties and rolls of gorilla tape, various knives and cutting tools, and a plastic drop sheet. He smashed his way into the house and attempted to restrain the victim with cable ties. The victim struggled and the applicant struck her with the shotgun and started strangling her. He eventually managed to restrain the victim. After three and a half hours, police attended the premises and the applicant let the victim go. The respondent was sentenced to three years and six months imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 months.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed and the respondent re-sentenced to five years and six months imprisonment with a non-parole period of three years. For the fourth time in six months, the Court here was concerned with sentencing for an offence of aggravated burglary committed by a male offender against his former domestic partner, 'intimate relationship aggravated burglary' (See [3]-[4]). At [5]-[6] the Court said:

'On this appeal, as in each of the previous appeals, the offender submitted that what was said by the Court in Hogarth — about the need to increase sentences [for confrontational aggravated burglary] — had little or no application to aggravated burglary where the victim was a former domestic partner. That submission failed on each previous occasion, and we likewise reject it.

As these reasons demonstrate, the task of applying Hogarth does not require the classification of offences into categories. Put simply, Hogarth established that current sentencing practices ('CSP') for serious forms of aggravated burglary needed to change, as they did not reflect the objective seriousness of such offending. Aggravated burglaries which involve confrontation and violence, or threats of violence, should be viewed very seriously, whether the target of the attack is a former domestic partner or a person against whom some other grievance is held'.

In reaching this decision, the Court made some observations about domestic violence offending. At [45]-[46] they stated:

'We would wish to endorse the remarks in Filiz at [21]-[23] about the particular seriousness of offending involving former domestic partners. Violence of this kind is alarmingly widespread, and extremely harmful. The statistics about the incidence of women being killed or seriously injured by vengeful former partners are truly shocking. Although the cases under consideration do not fall into that worst category, they are symptomatic of what can fairly be described as an epidemic of domestic violence.

General deterrence is, accordingly, a sentencing principle of great importance in cases such as these. Those who might, in a mood of anger or frustration or bitterness, contemplate this kind of violent entry into the home of a former spouse or partner must realise that, if they do so, they will almost certainly spend a long time in prison'.

Filiz v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 212 (11 September 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Contravention of family violence intervention order' – 'Deterrence' – 'Intentionally cause serious injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Relevance of prior relationship to sentencing' – 'Sentencing' – 'Theft'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary with intention to assault, intentionally causing serious injury x 2, theft, contravening a Family Violence Intervention Order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant had been in a relationship with the female complainant for ten years and they had three children together. A Family Violence Intervention Order was made against the applicant in relation to the complainant and their children. On the night of the offence, the complainant was lying in bed with her new partner. The applicant kicked open her bedroom door and started striking the complainant and her partner with a curtain rod. The complainant telephoned the police and the applicant fled. Another intervention order was obtained which prohibited the applicant from contacting the complainant. He breached this order on two occasions. The applicant was sentenced to three years and six months imprisonment with a non-parole period of one year and ten months.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Redlich JA's comments at [21]-[23] have often been cited in subsequent cases:

'Senior counsel for the applicant rightly conceded that general deterrence is a significant sentencing factor in this case, not only in relation to aggravated burglary generally, but most particularly in relation to violent offending against a former domestic partner: Felicite v The Queen at [20]; DPP v Pasinis at [53]. Of particular significance is the fact that the applicant was already subject to a Family Violence Intervention Order. Offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to the breakdown of a relationship is one of possessive, violent rage. It goes without saying that such a response, to what is a common human situation, is utterly unacceptable. This Court has made it clear that such offending will attract serious consequences and even harsher penalties where it involves the breach of an order which exists for the victim's protection: Cotham v The Queen at [14]; DPP v Johnson at [38]-[49].

At the oral hearing it was said that the complainant's fear would have been greater if her home had been invaded by strangers seeking to steal personal property. It was suggested that the context of the offending affected its seriousness. We do not accept that these matters affect the objective gravity of the offences. The level of fear engendered by the applicant, in kicking in the locked bedroom door and proceeding to beat the victims with an iron rod, did not have to be evaluated according to such niceties. The attack the applicant launched upon his ex-partner was strongly suggestive of a desire to do her and her partner serious harm, and anybody in their position would have feared that such harm would occur. The complainant's victim impact statement makes clear that the physical and emotional effects will be lasting.

It is a shameful truth that family violence is a leading cause of illness, disability and death among Victorian women aged between 15 and 44. It is also sadly true that there are a great number of women who live in real and justified fear of the men who are, or were, their intimate partners. In such circumstances, the submission that the complainant's level of fear when being attacked by her ex-partner was less than it might have been if she had been attacked by a stranger should be rejected'.

Although there were a number of relevant factors in mitigation – that is, the applicant's relatively early plea (but absent any remorse), his previous good character, his rehabilitation, both actual and prospective, work history and solid family support, and the difficulties he would suffer in prison when separated from his children, these had to be balanced against the aggravating factors of the offending and the need for general deterrence discussed above, as well as the need for specific deterrence, just punishment and denunciation. In light of this, it could not be said that the sentence was manifestly excessive (See [29]).

Curypko v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 192 (29 August 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Context evidence' – 'Delay' – 'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Just punishment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victim impact statement'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female complainant was the male applicant's de facto partner. The applicant repeatedly and brutally assaulted the complainant over a four year period. The charged offence occurred in 1989 and concerned a ten hour assault by the applicant which included striking the complainant multiple times and breaking her jaw, hitting her with various objects, heating up a knife and dragging this across her neck, and stabbing her with a syringe. The applicant was sentenced to five years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two and a half years. There was a substantial delay between the offending and the applicant being charged – some 24 years.

Issue/s:

1. The sentence was manifestly excessive in light of the maximum penalty, the long delay and the applicant's rehabilitation during that period, the guilty plea, the applicant's youth when he offended, and sentencing practice at the time of offence.

2. The sentencing judge erred in concluding that the gravity of the offending required the applicant's youth at the time of offending, the delay and his rehabilitation in the interim must 'give way'.
3. The sentencing judge erred in departing from the agreed statement of facts and in relying on the Victim Impact Statement as evidence of uncharged offending providing context for the charged offence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. First, the sentence was not manifestly excessive. Ashley JA acknowledged that the delay was substantial and as such merited substantial consideration as a matter of fairness to the accused. During that period, the applicant had 'reformed' (at [65]), was in a stable relationship, had a child, and was able to demonstrate rehabilitation. Notwithstanding this, the sentence imposed at trial, though harsh, was within the discretion of the primary judge.

Second, the sentencing judge did not fall into error by concluding that mitigating factors including delay, rehabilitation and the applicant's youth, 'had to take a back seat to circumstances which favoured a greater sentence' (at [41]). The seriousness of the offending as an example of severe domestic violence meant that just punishment, denunciation and general deterrence took prime consideration. An argument that the delay in bringing the proceedings reduced the need for general deterrence was dismissed. The delay here was connected to the complainant's fear and trauma and then further delay was caused by change in investigators (See [53]-[56]).

Third, the sentencing judge did not err in referring to statements made by the victim to the police, in supplementing the general description of the assaults relied upon for contextual purposes by recourse to statements made by the complainant, and by referring to the victim impact statement. In particular, the circumstances of earlier assaults were, as the judge repeatedly stated, admitted for contextual purposes only (See [34]-[39]).

Marrah v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 119 (18 June 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravating factor' – 'Animal abuse' – 'Contravening an intervention order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Rape' – 'Recklessly causing serious injury' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: Recklessly causing serious injury, rape, threat to kill.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: There numerous family violence incidents between the male applicant and the female respondent during their relationship. A family violence intervention order was active at the time of offending. On the day of offence, the applicant and the complainant were arguing after the applicant accused her of having sexual relations with other men. The applicant punched the complainant, picked her up by her hair and threw her to the floor, kicked her several times, and banged her head on the floor. He also grabbed her around the neck such that she could not breathe and the applicant repeatedly shoved his fingers in the complainant's vagina. He retrieved two knives and said he would kill her and her dog. The applicant was sentenced to 12 years imprisonment with a non-parole period of ten years.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The gravity of the applicant's conduct was aggravated by the fact the applicant was subject to a family violence intervention order. As Tate JA said at [25]:

'The gravity of the offending was aggravated by the fact that the applicant was at the time the subject of an intervention order, which he flagrantly disregarded. Offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to difficulties in a relationship is one of possessive, violent rage. It goes without saying that such a response, to what is a common human situation, is utterly unacceptable. The sentences must convey the unmistakeable message that male partners have no right to subject their female partners to threats or violence. The sentences must be of such an order as to strongly denounce violence within a domestic relationship'.

However, the orders for cumulation did not produce an aggregate sentence that was commensurate with the gravity of the whole of the offending (See [21]-[22], [27]-[28]).

'Coercive control' – 'Deterrence' – 'Effects of family violence' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Serious consequences for victims'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury (ICSI) x 2.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and the female complainant were in a de facto relationship. On the day of the first offence, the applicant began punching the complainant and went to kick her in the face. The complainant put up her left arm to protect herself and the applicant's kick broke her arm. After some delay, the applicant took her to the hospital. Three months later, the applicant started hitting the complainant and again the complainant put her arm up to defend herself and the applicant broke her right arm. Despite her excruciating pain, the applicant did not take the complainant to the doctor until the following day.

When the incidents were first charged, the applicant and the complainant had resumed their relationship and concocted a false version of events to exonerate the applicant. The relationship subsequently ended and the complainant went to the police. They were both charged with conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. The applicant was also charged with two counts of ICSI and sentenced to eight years imprisonment with a non-parole period of six years.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive and the sentencing judge failed to give appropriate consideration to the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The sentence imposed could not be said to be manifestly excessive. Further, the totality principle was appropriately applied. Kyrou AJA made a number of observations about family violence that have been cited in a number of subsequent judgments. The Court considered the serious consequences of violent domestic assaults and emphasised the importance of general deterrence in cases involving offences committed in the context of family violence. As at [53]-[54]:

> 'Historically perpetrators of family violence were rarely prosecuted. Even when offenders were convicted of such offences, they often received lenient sentences. Fortunately the criminal law now gives greater recognition to the devastating effects of family violence. It has also been recognised that women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously. This makes both specific and general deterrence very important factors in sentencing men who assault their partner.
> The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable… Victims who have been dominated, > controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and longlasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

His Honour reiterated at [57]:

> 'General deterrence is of fundamental importance in cases of domestic violence. The victims of such violence are often so enveloped by fear that they are incapable of either escaping the violence or reporting it to the authorities. The key to protection lies in deterring the violent conduct by sending an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence that if they offend, they will be sentenced to a lengthy period of imprisonment so that they are no longer in a position to inflict harm'.

Benson v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 51 (28 March 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Exposing children' – 'Miscarriage of justice' – 'Rape' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge/s: Rape.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The male appellant and the female complainant had been in a relationship for 13 years. The complainant alleged that in April 2011 the appellant hit her after she refused to have sex with him. She described this as the 'last straw' and told the appellant she was leaving him. They remained living in the same house. One month later, the intoxicated appellant forced her into bed and penetrated her with his penis. Their son saw the incident and called the police.

At trial, the Crown sought to admit evidence of physical assaults by the appellant against the complainant that occurred between 1999 and 2003 (none of these assaults happened after the complainant refused to have intercourse with the appellant). The Crown argued that this evidence explained the context in which the alleged rape occurred, and was relevant to whether the complainant had freely agreed to have intercourse with the appellant and whether the appellant was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting on the night of the alleged offence. The trial judge took account of the highly prejudicial nature of the evidence but considered that it was both relevant to and probative of the facts in issue and should be admitted for the limited purpose described in her ruling (see [19]-[23]).

Issue/s: The trial judge erred in admitting evidence of past conduct by the appellant because the evidence was not relevant.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Neave JA held (Bongiorno and Coghlan JJA agreeing) that the evidence was inadmissible. Bongiorno and Coghlan JJA also held that there was a miscarriage of justice (Neave JA in dissent). Neave JA first considered whether the 'relationship evidence' (evidence of physical assaults) was relevant. Her Honour stated generally at [29]:

'Evidence of the relationship between an accused and the alleged victim of an offence may be relevant and admissible for the purpose of placing the event which is the subject matter of the offence in context, where such evidence may assist the jury to evaluate the conduct of the complainant and the applicant on the occasion which gave rise to the charge. Where the evidence is of criminal or other disreputable acts committed by the accused, so that there is a danger that the jury will treat it as evidence that the accused has a propensity to commit acts of the kind charged, the judge must warn the jury of the limited purpose for which the evidence can be used. In particular the jury must be told that the relationship evidence cannot be regarded as a substitute for the evidence that the accused committed the charged acts, or for the purpose of showing that the accused is 'the kind of person' likely to have committed that offence (R v Grech (1997) 2 VR 609)'.

Neave JA went on to consider the circumstances in which relationship evidence may be relevant. At [31], Her Honour noted that relationship evidence of prior violence by the accused towards the complainant may be admissible in sexual offence cases 'because it assists the jury to evaluate whether the complainant had freely agreed to sexual activity on the occasion to which the charge relates, or whether the accused knew that the complainant had not consented or might not have consented to having sex on that occasion': see, for example, R v Loguancio [2000] VSCA 33; (2000) 1 VR 235, 23 (Callaway JA).

At [33], Her Honour noted that relationship evidence of prior acts of violence by the accused 'may also be admissible where a person is charged with homicide or an offence arising out of the infliction of injury on a victim, because such evidence is relevant in evaluating the accused person's claim that he or she had an amicable relationship with the victim, or that he or she acted in self-defence': see, for example, Wilson v The Queen [1970] HCA 17; (1970) 123 CLR 334 and R v Mala (Unreported, Court of Appeal, Brooking, Ormiston, Batt JJA, 27 November 1997).

In this case, the appellant correctly conceded that evidence of the April 2011 assault when she refused to have sexual intercourse with him only a month before the alleged rape was relevant in assessing the likelihood that she had in fact voluntarily agreed to have intercourse with him or he believed that she had done so (see [35]). However, Neave JA held at [36]-[37] that:

'[D]espite the appalling nature of the earlier assaults, I consider that the evidence of those assaults was not sufficiently relevant to the nature of the relationship which existed at the time of the alleged rape to the admission of that evidence. There was a lengthy time lapse between the earlier assaults and the alleged rape. Of itself, that time lapse might not have made the evidence irrelevant…'

'However in this case there was not only a significant time delay between the alleged rape and the earlier assaults, but the complainant remained with the applicant despite the assaults and bore him children after those assaults had occurred. It may be that she did not leave him earlier because she was afraid of him, but there was no evidence that he had assaulted her because she refused to have sex with him, prior to April 2011'.

Bongiorno and Neave JJA agreed with the reasons set out by Neave JA as to why the evidence was inadmissible. However, they also held that there was a substantial miscarriage of justice as a conviction in this case was not inevitable: see Baini v The Queen [2012] HCA 59; (2012) 246 CLR 469. Neave JA in dissent at [52]-[61].

Freeman v The Queen* [2011] VSCA 349 (9 November 2011) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Children' – 'Desire to inflict emotional harm on another parent' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship killings' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant had recently divorced from Ms Barnes, the mother of his four year old daughter (the victim). Consent orders were made in the Family Court which reduced the applicant's share of custody. The applicant was distressed by this outcome. A few days later, he was driving with his three children and had a telephone conversation with Ms Barnes, telling her that she would never see her children again. He pulled the car over and threw his four year old daughter off a bridge.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. There were a number of aggravating circumstances on the facts including that the applicant killed an innocent child, the circumstances of the killing were horrendous and the child's death would have been painful and protracted, the applicant's conduct was a fundamental breach of trust, the killing was in the presence of his two sons, the applicant killed his daughter in an attempt to hurt his former wife as much as possible, the crime was committed in a public place, the applicant offended the public conscience, and the applicant threatened his ex-wife in the presence of their children (see [15]). The most heinous nature and gravity of the applicant's offending, his lack of remorse and poor prospects for rehabilitation, meant that a non-parole period of 32 years was not manifestly excessive.

DPP v Johnson* [2011] VSCA 288 (23 September 2011) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Assault' – 'Breach involving a child' – 'Contravening/breaching a family intervention order' – 'Exposing children' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary, assault, contravening a family intervention order.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male respondent entered the house of his former female partner, the complainant, with two knives and with the intention of killing himself in front of her. The complainant awoke and started screaming. This woke their daughter and the respondent left the premises (aggravated burglary and assault). The applicant was also charged with breach of a family violence intervention order which included conduct of a home invasion four days prior to the aggravated burglary, telephoning the complainant and threatening her and her family, and by coming within 200 metres of the complainant's house on the night of the offence.

He was sentenced to 15 months imprisonment for aggravated burglary, six months imprisonment for assault, and six months imprisonment for contravening a family intervention order. The sentencing judge took the view that the circumstances surrounding the burglary and assault were 'almost identical' to those surrounding the breach and ordered the sentence for breach to be made wholly concurrent with these sentences. After cumulation, a head sentence of one year and nine months imprisonment was imposed, with a non-parole period of ten months.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed, with Redlich, Neave and Bongiorno JA providing separate reasoning. The judges gave detailed consideration to matters relevant to sentencing for breach of an intervention order.

Neave JA (Bongiorno JA agreeing) agreed with Redlich JA in part but held that the sentence imposed for the breach of the intervention order was manifestly inadequate. Her Honour stated that the frequency with which intervention orders are breached – and the potentially tragic consequences of this – warrants strong judicial condemnation of the contravention of such offences. As per Her Honour at [4]-[5]:

'All Australian states have enacted legislation which is intended to protect potential victims of family violence from physical injury and from being placed in fear by harassment or threats. Family violence is a serious problem in Australia. In 2004, it was reported that family violence is 'the leading contributor of death, disability and illness in women in Victoria aged 15 to 44 years'. Breach of intervention orders is relatively common. In its Report on Breaching Intervention Orders, the Sentencing Advisory Council said that, between July 2004 and June 2007, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the County Court of Victoria imposed on average approximately 14,000 intervention orders per year. Over a quarter of all intervention orders imposed were breached.

Further, offenders who breach orders and continue to threaten and assault their partners may go on to seriously injure or even kill them. As was recognised during parliamentary debates on the Family Violence Protection Bill 2008, intervention orders can only protect victims of threatened violence if they are effectively enforced and if breach of an order attracts an appropriate sentence. The Victorian Law Reform Commission, in its report which 'underpin[ned]' many of the changes in the Bill, observed:

The response to a breach of an intervention order is crucial to ensuring the intervention order system is effective in protecting family violence victims. If police or the courts do not respond adequately to breaches of intervention orders, they will be perceived as ineffectual – 'not worth the paper they are written on' – by victims and perpetrators alike'.

Here, the respondent's conduct that formed the basis of the breach was conceptually distinguishable from the other offences, including the aggravated burglary. The respondent also had a significant history of breaching these orders and displayed contempt for such orders. Accordingly, the sentence imposed for breach an intervention order was manifestly inadequate.

Redlich JA (with whom Neave JA and Bongiorno JA agreed in part) held that the sentence imposed for the aggravated burglary was manifestly inadequate. In dissent, His Honour held that the sentence for the breach of the intervention was not manifestly inadequate. However, upon re-sentencing the respondent, the sentence imposed for breach of an intervention order was lenient and thus a substantially higher sentence was warranted in the circumstances.

Redlich JA concluded that the sentencing judge erred by having regard to the respondent's claims that his previous breaches were 'innocuous or insignificant' (at [49]). In reaching this conclusion, His Honour noted that it was an aggravating feature of the offending that the respondent had repeatedly contravened intervention orders. Accordingly, the principles of general and specific deterrence had to assume particular importance here (See [42]-[43]). As per the Court in R v Cotham at [14]:

'Intervention orders must be strictly adhered to, and it is very much in the interests of the community that those against whom such orders are made be under no misapprehension that the courts will punish severely those who breach such orders. The applicant's actions suggest that he believed he could breach the intervention order with impunity. Only by appropriately severe penalties can the courts make clear to the applicant and the broader community that such conduct will not be tolerated'.

It was also an aggravating feature that the breach involved a child who was protected by the order because such orders are granted pursuant to a legislative regime that places 'particular emphasis on the protection of children from family violence' (See [45]).

Redlich JA also concluded that the sentencing judge erred in ordering the sentence for the breach to be wholly concurrent. The offence of breach was not part of a single episode of offending (See [52]-[53]). As per the comments in R v Maher at [16] relating to cumulation and concurrency:

'I turn to the relationship between, on the one hand, the stalking counts and the burglary and aggravated burglary, and, on the other hand, the breaches of the intervention order. It appears to me that the distinct criminality of the offending means that there should be some cumulation between the sentences imposed. Breaches of the intervention order, were in terms, disobedience of a court order. It would be inappropriate if that was not reflected in the breaches having real impact upon sentence. But, to meet the totality point, some amelioration of the individual sentences for the breaches and on the other counts is, in my view, required'.

Felicite v The Queen* [2011] VSCA 274 (9 September 2011) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Just punishment' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship killings' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The relationship between the male applicant and his wife, the victim, was characterised by the applicant's 'inability to control his anger' (at [2]). The victim met another man and said she was ending her relationship with the applicant. A few days later, during the course of an argument, the applicant stabbed the victim repeatedly in the neck and throat. At least part of the attack was witnessed by their four year old son. He was sentenced to 19 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 16 years.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. As per Redlich JA at [20]:

'The taking of a domestic partner's life undermines the foundations of personal relationships and family trust upon which our society rests. The sentence must reflect both the sanctity of human life and societies' abhorrence of violence towards vulnerable and trusting partners who could legitimately have expected the offender to be the protector, not the perpetrator of violent abuse. An outburst of homicidal rage in such contexts is totally unacceptable. The community expectation is that the punishment assigned to such conduct must be condign so as to denounce in the strongest terms the abhorrent nature of domestic murder and to deter others from taking a similar course. Accordingly the principles of general deterrence, denunciation and just punishment will ordinarily be given primacy in sentencing for the murder of a partner in a domestic setting even where there are present, circumstances of provocation or great emotional stress'.

The sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive. It appropriately reflected the considerable weight given to the principles of general deterrence and just punishment arising from the spousal relationship between the applicant and the victim (See [36]).

'Breach of intervention order' – 'Exposing children' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Mitigating circumstances' – 'Non-parole period' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Sentencing' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury, breach of intervention order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The complainant was the applicant's estranged wife. The complainant obtained an intervention order against the applicant. In the presence of their two children, the applicant stabbed the complainant in the back, slashed her fingers, punched her, kicked her and pulled some of her hair out.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Court held at [23] that 'the sentence was not manifestly excessive and, indeed, properly reflected the gravity of the offence after taking into account all mitigatory factors including the plea of guilty. The Court rightly treated with the utmost seriousness the appellant's knife attack on his defenceless wife in the presence of their children and in circumstances which included the invasion of her home in breach of a court order. Further, the relative brevity of the non-parole period might be thought to properly and adequately take into account the personal circumstances of the appellant'.

Kane v R* [2010] VSCA 213 (23 August 2010) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Assault' – 'Breach of intervention order' – 'Criminal damage' – 'Damaging property' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing' – 'Specific deterrence' Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury, intentionally causing injury, common assault, criminal damage, breach of an intervention order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The offending was spread over two indictments. The male applicant and Rachel Delaney were in a de facto relationship. She was married to, but separated from, Daniel Smyth. During the applicant's relationship with Ms Delaney, there were repeated incidents of tension and conflict between him and Mr Smyth. After Ms

Delaney informed the applicant that their relationship was over, he broke into her house and attacked Mr Smyth (who was also present). He bit of a large part of Mr Smyth's nose and held Ms Delaney by the throat. The applicant was sentenced to eight years imprisonment.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Nettle JA cited with approval the sentencing judge's remarks that, 'it is incumbent on a sentencing judge to impose condign punishment in a case like this in order to send a clear message to likeminded people that a civilised society does not condone people using physical violence to take the law in their own hands to settle disputes and deal with domestic partners in a violent way. Her Honour also observed, correctly, that inasmuch as these attacks were cowardly, unprovoked and unexpected attacks, there was a particular need for specific deterrence'.

However, as the Crown conceded here, the sentence was manifestly excessive (See [24]-[25]). Nettle JA further noted that, although this was not the case in which to do so, there was a need to revisit sentencing practices in relation to offences of intentionally causing injury (See [25], [29]-[30]).

Smith v The Queen* [2010] VSCA 192 (29 July 2010) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Attempting to pervert the course of justice' – 'Deterrence' – 'Need to condemn family violence' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Recklessly causing serious injury' – 'Relevance of victim's wishes' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victim contribution'

Charge/s: Recklessly causing serious injury, attempting to pervert the course of justice.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and female complainant were in a relationship. They were arguing and the applicant started punching and striking the complainant. The applicant was sentenced to three years and three months imprisonment with a non-parole period of two years and three months.

Issue/s:

1. The sentencing judge erred in failing to have any regard or sufficient regard to the attitude of the victim.
2. The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. There was an assertion from counsel for the applicant that the complainant did not want these charges to be pursued (but no evidence from the complainant to substantiate these assertions). Beach AJA held that the sentencing judge was not bound to give any weight to the unsupported assertions made about the complainant's attitude to the prosecution. His Honour referred to Neave JA in R v Hester at [27] and held that*, 'even in cases where there is evidence of forgiveness of the victim of domestic violence, this evidence should be treated with extreme caution'* (See [8]).

Further, notwithstanding the applicant's attempts to deal with his drug and violence problems since being remanded in custody, the sentence imposed was well open and could not be said to be manifestly excessive. The sentencing judge properly took into account the personal circumstances of the appellant, the appellant's bad criminal record, principles of general deterrence, specific deterrence and denunciation. As per Beach AJA, 'this Court has said on many occasions that domestic violence will not be tolerated and that general deterrence is a very important sentencing principle in the sentencing disposition which must be, and must be seen to be, condemned by the courts'. In the circumstances, the sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive (See [11]).

Kanakaris v The Queen* [2010] VSCA 120 (28 May 2010) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Aggravating factor' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Common assault' – 'Deterrence' – 'Exposing children' – 'Intentionally causing injury' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Kidnapping' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: Common assault x 4, intentionally causing injury x 3, threat to kill x 2, aggravated burglary, kidnapping, intentionally causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant pleaded guilty to 13 offences, involving appalling physical violence, humiliation and abuse committed against his female de facto partner, sister, mother and four year old daughter. The total effective sentence was nine years and three months' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of seven years.

Issue/s: Some of the grounds of appeal included –

1. The sentencing judge failed to give sufficient weight to the applicant's plea of guilty.
2. The sentencing judge erred in fixing the non-parole period.

Decision and Reasoning: The first ground of appeal was dismissed but the second ground of appeal allowed. The applicant's contention that the sentencing judge failed to give sufficient weight to his plea of guilty was dismissed. The offending here was extremely serious. The conduct involved constituted breach of an intervention order, it was well planned and involved the use of an accomplice, the applicant was armed and threatened his partner, he took away her children, and she was unable to escape for six hours. His Honour also noted the that maximum penalties for aggravated burglary and intentionally causing serious injury as 25 years and 20 years respectively (See [70]-[72]). It was clear that the trial judge incorporated the discount for the plea of guilty in her orders of accumulation, which were only 12 months on the base sentence.

However, the appeal was allowed on the basis of the non-parole period. It was noted that a seven year non-parole period is 'very substantial'. Coghlan JA concluded that the primary judge must have imposed such a substantial non-parole period because of a 'guarded view taken of the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation' (at [83]). However, the applicant had no criminal history and had pleaded guilty. As such, His Honour concluded that the primary judge erred in imposing such a long non-parole period on the basis of her conclusion on rehabilitation alone. The non-parole period was reduced to six years.

Neave JA agreed with Coghlan AJA but made some brief remarks about the complaint of manifestly excess. She noted at [4]:

'Notwithstanding the mitigating circumstances to which the learned sentencing judge referred, the shocking violence which the offender inflicted on those he professed to love required strong denunciation and considerable emphasis on both general and specific deterrence'.

R v Bastan; DPP v Bastan* [2009] VSCA 157 (4 August 2009) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Arranged marriage' – 'Rape' – 'Relevance of prior relationship' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge/s: Rape.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence; Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The complainant gave evidence that her marriage to the applicant was arranged by her parents. After the applicant was aggressive, she fled to a women's refuge. They were divorced and the complainant obtained a family violence intervention order. The applicant began sending text messages to the complainant, masquerading as another man. The complainant invited this man to her house but told the applicant to leave when he arrived. He then dragged her to the bedroom, forced her onto the bed and penetrated her vagina with his penis. The applicant was found guilty after a trial and sentenced to four years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two years and three months.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The Crown appeal against sentence was allowed. In upholding the appeal, Buchanan JA said at [36]:

'I consider that the sentence would generally be regarded as inadequate if imposed upon an offender who tricked his way into the house of a stranger and raped her. The fact that the applicant and the complainant, in the past, had shared a consensual sexual relationship may have played a part in producing this sentence. In my opinion it should have played no part save insofar as those who have been in a relationship should be deterred from asserting any right or power in a like fashion against their former partners. This rape constituted an act of dominion by the applicant over the complainant's body, which is not to be tolerated. In my opinion, the sentence, and in particular the non-parole period, was manifestly inadequate and represents an error that warrants interference by this Court'.

Earl v The Queen* [2008] VSCA 162 (25 August 2008) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Deterrence' – 'Offences at home' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Recklessly causing injury' – 'Sentencing' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Recklessly causing injury.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: During the course of an argument, the applicant punched his wife, the complainant, six times in the head. The complainant did not seek medical attention for two days. She was admitted to hospital and found to have a large sub-arachnoid haemorrhage. She was also discovered to have carotid aneurysms. As a result of the carotid aneurysms, the complainant suffered permanent changes to her life and could no longer live independently. It was acknowledged by the sentencing judge that, on the basis of medical evidence, it was not possible to know for certain whether there was a causal link between the applicant's attack and the serious medical events that followed. The applicant was sentenced to 14 months imprisonment suspended after 10 months for a period of 12 months.

Issue/s: One of the issues was whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The sentence could not be said to be beyond the range of sound sentencing discretion. Despite the limited nature and extent of the attack, and the injuries which it was shown to have caused, the offence was still serious. The complainant was a person with limited cognitive impairment and, to that extent, she was vulnerable and in need of care and support. The complainant was entitled to the applicant's love and protection as his wife but was instead assaulted by the applicant in their own home. Nettle JA said at [23]:

'As such, the offence involved a gross breach of trust in the place where the victim was most entitled to feel safe. General deterrence is of real importance in cases of domestic violence, especially in cases where victims are particularly vulnerable. And because of the applicant's prior convictions, aged as they were, it was apparent that there was a need for some measure of specific deterrence'.

Charge/s: Intentionally causing injury, intentionally causing serious injury, false imprisonment.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and the female complainant were in an intimate relationship. On two occasions the applicant physically assaulted the complainant while intoxicated. On the second incident of assault, he also detained the complainant for 45 minutes and refused to let her seek medical attention. At sentence, a victim impact statement was tendered in which the complainant said she was partly to blame for the second incident and that she wanted to resume a relationship with the applicant. The applicant was sentenced to four years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of three years.

Issue/s:

1. The sentencing judge erred in ignoring the victim impact statement for sentencing purposes.
2. The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. First, the sentencing judge did not err in not taking into account the part of the victim impact statement in which the complainant assumed blame for the second offending. There was also no substance in the claim that the sentencing judge failed to have regard to have proper regard to the complainant's attitude to her relationship with the applicant (see [13]). Second, the sentences imposed were balanced, if not lenient, in all the circumstances. The offending was very serious – it was a savage, brutal and cowardly act on a victim who was physically much weaker than the attacker. Chernov JA also noted that the Courts have stated on a number of occasions that 'such domestic violence will not be tolerated and that general deterrence is a very important sentencing principle in the sentencing disposition' (see [19]-[20]).

Neave JA agreed with Chernov JA and added at [27]:

'It is a common pattern of behaviour for perpetrators of domestic violence to express penitence and persuade their victims to reconcile. For a number of complex reasons which have been discussed in the social science literature dealing with this issue, many victims are assaulted on several occasions before they summon the courage to leave an abusive relationship. Often they require considerable support in order to do so. In my view, these are matters which should be given considerable weight by a judge who is considering the weight that should be given to a victim impact statement made by a person who has been the victim of domestic violence. I therefore agree with the comments of Simpson JA in R v Glen at 4 that evidence of forgiveness of the victim of domestic violence should be treated with extreme caution'.

'Blaming the victim' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent saw the victim, his ex-girlfriend, at a Shopping Centre and became abusive and aggressive after she refused to help him 'score' heroin. He punched her and kicked her repeatedly in the head when she fell to the ground. The respondent was sentenced to three years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 20 months.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. It was possible to infer that after being refused heroin, the respondent 'snapped' and his moral culpability was therefore less than it otherwise might have been. However, having said that, 'this was a vicious, cruel and unprovoked attack on a small and virtually defenceless woman. To kick anyone in the head is grossly dangerous. To do it more than once, deliberately, is courting the worst kind of disaster. Fortunately, that did not occur. But her injuries were serious, and they are to some extent likely to be permanent'. The offence was aggravated by the fact that it was committed in a busy shopping centre and it represented a gross breach of trust the victim reposed in the respondent. Accordingly, the respondent's moral culpability was high (See [13]). Given the nature and gravity of the offending and the extent of the respondent's criminal history, Nettle JA held the sentence was manifestly inadequate (See [16]).

Dodds-Streeton JA added further comments regarding some particularly troubling features of this offending. At [21], Her Honour stated:

'Violence, and in particular violence by men against women as a means of control in current relationships or in relationships which have ended, is a prevalent and even critical social evil. As in the present case, the perpetrator not uncommonly expresses remorse immediately after a violent assault, but nevertheless seeks to blame the victim for causing the attack. Although the respondent did appear to regret the assault, as the sentencing judge observed, his letter to the court denigrated the victim's character and effectively sought to blame her for his backsliding into drug use and for provoking the attack. In the police interview, he denied the crime, at one point apparently claiming that the victim had assaulted him, and called her a lying dog'.

R v Gojanovic (No 2)* [2007] VSCA 153 (14 August 2007) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Deterrence' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female deceased entered into a de facto relationship with the applicant. The relationship deteriorated, in part due to the deceased's gambling habit. The relationship ended and the deceased moved into separate premises. The applicant started stalking her, largely to monitor her treatment of his son. The applicant followed her home one evening, clubbed her on the head a number of times with a rubber mallet and strangled her with cord. The applicant was found guilty by a jury of murder and was sentenced to 20 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 15 years.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The sentencing judge was justified in concluding that the applicant was not remorseful for killing the victim. The evidence before the judge was of a vicious, determined and brutal attack by a person with a significant advantage in size and weight over his victim. The sentencing judge was further entitled and correct to regard general deterrence as a significant factor in such a case in the exercise of his sentencing discretion. As per the Court at [140]:

'[O]ur courts have stated on more than one occasion that in cases of killings of the type which occurred here in a "domestic" setting, the concept of general deterrence is an important and weighty sentencing consideration. The sentence, in such cases, must be such as to provide a strong message that outbursts of homicidal rage, in contexts such as this case are totally unacceptable and will be dealt with by stern sentences of the type imposed upon the applicant'.

The Court continued at [141]:

'As (the sentencing judge) correctly observed many individuals have to confront circumstances of difficulty in the course of the breakdown of relationships. The Court must send a clear message to estranged parents that custody and other such disputes are to be resolved by proper processes and not by horrendous violence such as that imposed on the deceased in this case. In all the circumstances it cannot be said that the sentence imposed in this case is manifestly excessive'. See also R v Gojanovic [2005] VSC 97 (27 January 2005).

Note: the High Court refused special leave to appeal (see Gojanovic v The Queen [2011] HCATrans 66).

R v Duncan* [2007] VSCA 137 (22 June 2007) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravating factor' – 'Breach of intervention order' – 'Breach of intervention orders' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Double punishment' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Intentionally causing injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Damaging property, intentionally causing injury, breach of an intervention order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant engaged in protracted stalking of the female complainant for a number of years, in an attempt to initiate a relationship. The complainant obtained an intervention order against the applicant. In breach of this order, the applicant attended the complainant's workplace, smashed her car's windscreen and caused injury.

Issue/s: Some of the issues were that –

1. The sentencing judge failed to have sufficient regard to the need to avoid double punishment and thus the sentences imposed were excessive. This was based on the principle of double jeopardy i.e. where two offences of which an offender stands convicted contain common elements, it is wrong to punish the offender twice for the commission of the elements that are common (Pearce v The Queen).
2. The trial judge failed to have sufficient regard to the principle of totality.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Vincent JA remarked at [37] that:

'I would add that the sentencing judge was clearly correct in attributing a high level of seriousness to the appellant's conduct and reflecting that in the sentences imposed. Not only did the appellant's conduct involve a savage and sustained attack upon his unfortunate victim but, it must not be forgotten she had sought the protection of the law against his continued and frightening criminal harassment. He responded to her endeavours, and to the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment upon him, by seeking to punish her and damage her property. Obviously the community cannot accept that those who avail themselves of its protection may be subject to revenge or retribution if its structures and that protection are to possess credibility and operate to deter potential offenders'.

R v Elias* [2007] VSCA 125 (19 June 2007) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Theft' – 'Verdins principles' – 'Where the victim is an offender'

Charge/s: Theft x 19.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The offending took place between 2000 and 2004 when the female applicant was employed as an accountant at a firm. She diverted funds paid by bankrupt estates for creditors to her own accounts. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 20 months imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 12 months. The sentencing judge accepted evidence that the applicant's offending behaviour was symptomatic of 'battered woman syndrome'. There was a history of physical and sexual abuse at the hands of the applicant's husband.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentencing judge erred:

(a) In failing to sufficiently reduce the weight to be accorded to specific deterrence and moral culpability on account of the applicant's psychological condition; and

(b) In failing to sufficiently reduce the weight to be accorded to general deterrence on account of the applicant's psychological condition.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The sentence imposed did not suggest that the sentencing judge failed to give any or sufficient weight to the impact of the applicant's mental state upon the significance of general deterrence, specific deterrence or moral culpability. His Honour's sentence, reflecting moderation in individual sentences, and a small extent of cumulation, was in fact merciful (See [16]-[28]).

In obiter, Ashley JA observed that the Verdins principles had not as of yet been applied in respect of offences of this kind, where the offender asserts battered woman syndrome, as the relevant mental impairment, reduced moral culpability and the weight to be accorded to specific and general deterrence in sentencing. The battered woman/learned helplessness situation had typically been raised in homicide cases in relation to the question – why the offender did not leave their abusive partner? His Honour left open the possibility of the Verdins principles applying in a case where learned helplessness is given as the explanation for the commission of, for example, property offences. But this case was not an appropriate vehicle for making such a determination because there was insufficient evidence of the impairment to the applicant's functioning arising from the history of abuse (See [12]-[14]).

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Burglary' – 'Conduct endangering persons' – 'Deterrence' – 'Negligently causing injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Theft' – 'Where the victim is an offender'

Charge/s: Burglary, theft, conduct endangering persons, negligently causing serious injury x 2.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female applicant and Mr O'Neill, her partner and co-offender, broke into a milk bar and stole goods and cash. The applicant drove off from the store with Mr O'Neill as her passenger. They were chased by police, with Mr O'Neill threatening to kill her if she slowed down. The applicant crashed the car into another vehicle driven by Mr Hahn. The impact caused both vehicles to be engulfed in flames, trapping Mr Hahn inside his vehicle. He suffered extensive burns to his body. Mr O'Neill also suffered injuries as a result of the crash. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of six years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of four years.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentencing judge erred in his assessment of the applicant's moral culpability by giving insufficient weight to the threats made to her by her partner.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. As per Callaway JA at [15]:

'the judge did accept that O'Neill's threats motivated the appellant to drive as she did and that she took those threats seriously because of the history of violence directed towards her. There was an element of "battered woman" syndrome. Nevertheless, His Honour said, the police were present and protection would have been immediately available to her. I appreciate that she would have feared what O'Neill might do subsequently, but it is one thing to engage in shop-lifting or the like under a threat of violence; it is another thing altogether to engage in conduct so dangerous that it results in the kind of injuries sustained by Mr Hahn. General deterrence is not excluded by threats. On the contrary, general deterrence may provide a counter-threat. The judge was not in error in saying that general deterrence must be the paramount sentencing consideration for offences of the kind the subject of counts 3 to 5 and that a substantial period of imprisonment was required to deter others minded to act in a similar way. I do not consider that his Honour undervalued the threats from O'Neill, particularly when the sentences he imposed on counts 3 to 5 are taken into account'.

R v Pham* [2005] VSCA 57 (7 March 2005) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Children' – 'Deterrence' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury x 2.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant was in a relationship with the female victim and lived with her and her son, the other victim, for a few months. The relationship ended but they maintained an association. The applicant married the victim's sister but started to harass both the victim and her sister. The victim obtained an intervention order protecting her and her children. In breach of the intervention order, the applicant entered into the victim's house. He stabbed her with a knife to the face, mouth, chest and neck approximately eight times (count 3). The victim's son tried to intervene but the applicant struck him with the knife twice times, almost severing the child's hand (count 4). The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of ten years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of seven years.

Issue/s: The sentencing discretion miscarried as the judge was required to sentence the applicant on the basis that the verdict on count 4 rested not upon a finding by the jury of the deliberate infliction of serious injury to the victim but upon their application of the instructions of the trial judge concerning the concept of transferred malice.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. There was no error on the part of the sentencing judge. His Honour did not impose a sentence on the basis that the applicant deliberately stabbed the victim (See [14]-[19]). Vincent JA further noted that the proper exercise of the sentencing discretion in this case required an order that effectively cumulated part of the sentence imposed on count 4 upon the sentence imposed on count 3. This was necessary to reflect the seriousness of the two separate offences and the particular aggravating features attaching to each, some of which were common and other not. In this context, it was particularly serious that the applicant act in flagrant violation of an intervention order the female victim had obtained to protect herself and her children. This is because the intervention order is:

'… designed by parliament to provide the protection of the law to vulnerable individuals, usually, as in this case, women and children, who legitimately fear for their safety. Offenders who disregard such orders and occasion injury to persons whose personal security is intended to be guaranteed through this means must anticipate that an extremely stern view will be adopted by the courts of their conduct and, save in the most unusual circumstances, will be subject to condign punishment' (See [21]-[22]).

DPP v Muliaina* [2005] VSCA 13 (2 February 2005) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Causing serious injury recklessly' – 'Common assault' – 'False imprisonment' – 'Indecent assault' – 'Need for denunciation' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Rape' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: Presentment 1 – false imprisonment; Presentment 2 – causing injury recklessly, indecent assault x 2, rape; Presentment 3 – aggravated burglary, common assault, false imprisonment, making a threat to kill, causing injury recklessly.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The primary victim was the male respondent's former de facto partner and mother of their child. The circumstances of the first presentment were that the victim said she wanted to end their relationship. The respondent dragged her to his house and tied her to a chair. The false imprisonment ended when she was able to convince the respondent to call her mother because their daughter needed feeding. The second presentment related to the respondent's offending after he had resumed living with the victim. He slapped the victim and hit her with a leather strap. He then tried to force the victim to perform oral sex on him and engaged in penile-vaginal intercourse with her without her consent. The victim obtained an intervention order against the respondent. The offences that were the subject of the third presentment occurred when they had ceased co-habitation and the respondent forced his way into her parent's home. He assaulted the victim's friend who was there at the time, threatened to kill the victim, and punched and hit her. The respondent was sentenced to a total effective sentence of four years imprisonment.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed, The sentence imposed did not equate with the gravity of the crimes. As per Chernov JA at [21]:

'It seems plain enough that the respondent's offending conduct had the aggravating features for which the Director contended. It was brutal and cowardly and was, in the relevant sense, ongoing. It involved, in the main, ferocious physical attacks by the respondent on a much weaker victim whom the respondent claimed to love. On those occasions he treated her as if she were his slave who had to do his bidding or be severely punished if she refused. Such conduct is clearly unacceptable to this community and must be denounced by the courts. That the respondent experienced the brutal upbringing for which he contended does not make his behaviour, even though it may have been a manifestation of his uncontrolled anger, any more acceptable'.

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Cautious approach to victim forgiveness' – 'Exposing children' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Role of apology' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victim contribution' – 'Victim's wishes'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary, intentionally causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant and the victim, his cousin, were born in Western Samoa. They had a heated argument over the phone, in which the applicant said he would 'chop [the victim's] head off'. The applicant armed himself with a machete and went to the victim's home. The applicant entered through an unlocked door and struck the victim twice with the machete to the back of the head and neck, in front of two small children. After the offence, a cultural ceremony of apology and reconciliation was performed. At sentence, the victim expressed his desire that the applicant not be imprisoned, his forgiveness of the applicant and that they now had a very good relationship. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of four years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two years.

Issue/s: Some of the grounds of appeal included that the sentencing judge erred in that he failed to take into account the attitude of the victim and the remorse of the offender.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. As per Eames JA at [38]-[40]:

'The statement of his Honour that the attitude of the victim could not 'govern' the sentencing approach was consistent with the principles stated in Skura. In the present case, however, there was good reason why the judge would be cautious in evaluating the weight to be given to the evidence of the victim. In the first place, he was not the only victim of the appellant's crime; the two children also witnessed what must have been a horrifying incident, although there was no evidence of any long lasting adverse effects on the children. Crimes of violence frequently create alarm and distress to people other than the immediate victims, and in assessing the need for general deterrence a sentencing judge must have regard to the impact of crime more broadly than merely upon the immediate victim.

An additional reason for being cautious about the weight to be given to the evidence of the victim related to the nature of [the victim's] evidence. One reason why courts do not allow the wishes of the victim to determine the sentence to be imposed is that the victim might not always be able to assess what is in his or her own best interest. For example, when considering what weight to give to factors of general and specific deterrence in a case of a woman assaulted by her partner a sentencing judge would be minded to have regard to the imperatives which might motivate a battered wife to plead for leniency towards her attacker. In such circumstances the sentencing judge might be cautious about giving undue weight to such a plea for leniency.

In the present case, the victim was himself in a difficult position among other members of the Samoan community, and his acceptance of the apology might have been motivated by a range of considerations'.

The sentencing judge accepted that the ceremony was of great cultural significance and that it represented a traditional apology of the most humble and sincere kind. He further accepted that the applicant had expressed genuine contrition and remorse. These statements reflected that the sentencing judge did in fact give weight to the performance of the cultural ceremony and to the factors of remorse and forgiveness (See [43]). Eames JA was not persuaded that the weight given to these factors displayed error in the sentencing judge's approach. On the contrary, having regard to the seriousness of the offences, the sentences imposed were merciful (See [44]).

R v Skura* [2004] VSCA 53 (7 April 2004) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Incitement to murder' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victim impact statements'

Charge/s: Incitement to murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female applicant pleaded guilty to a single charge that she incited Jason Dorrian, an undercover police officer, to murder her husband, the complainant. She was sentenced to seven years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of four years and six months. At trial, her husband submitted a victim impact statement that stated his forgiveness of the applicant, his desire that she return to live with the family and his willingness to offer her support to enable her to re-enter society. The sentencing judge stated that the relevance of the victim's attitude was doubtful.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive in light of the way the sentencing judge dealt with evidence of a number of factors including the victim impact statement of her husband.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed, with the judges providing separate reasoning. Smith AJA stated at [48] that:

'So far as the attitude of the victim to the degree of sentence is concerned, that is generally irrelevant. But evidence that the victim has forgiven the offender may indicate that the effects of the offence had not been long-lasting. It may mean that 'psychological and mental suffering must be very much less in the circumstances. Accordingly, some mitigation must be seen in that one factor': R v Hutchinson (1994) 15 Cr App R (S) 134, 137. Where the offence occurs in a domestic situation, the attitude of the victim may also be relevant to the question of rehabilitation'.

Here, the sentencing judge considered one aspect of the victim impact statement – the attitude of the victim and whether it could affect the sentence. His Honour did not appear to consider the impact of the crime on the victim or the relevance of the victim impact statement, and the attitude shown in it, to the question of rehabilitation. However, 'the evidence revealed by the victim impact statement was in fact significant and, in particular, showed that there was no adverse impact on the victim'. Further, the applicant's prospects of rehabilitation were enhanced because of the willingness of the victim and the daughter to help the applicant deal with her serious personality disorders. Accordingly, the sentencing judge erred in failing to have regard to this relevance of the victim impact statement (See [50]).

Eames JA also held that the sentencing judge did not give sufficient weight to the victim impact statement of the applicant's husband (See [13]). His Honour stated at [12]:

'This Court has often acknowledged that the introduction of victim impact statements has served an important purpose of ensuring that sentencing judges have a full appreciation of the consequences of criminal conduct to the victims of the crimes, thereby ensuring that judges properly weigh the factors relevant to victims which must be considered by virtue of s.5 of the Sentencing Act 1991. The courts have also warned that the victim impact statements should not be misused so as to produce a sentence which is unfair, and that an articulate or emotional victim impact statement could not justify a sentence being imposed which was not just in all the circumstances'.

However, while judges must ensure the contents of victim impact statements do not unbalance the sentencing process so as to cause a miscarriage of the sentencing discretion, Eames JA held that there may be many instances where the victim impact statement may have the effect of producing a more severe sentence. Likewise:

'If a victim impact statement can have that effect in encouraging a view of the case which would justify a more severe sentence, then in my view sentencing judges ought to give equally appropriate weight to a victim impact statement where the victim positively expresses support for the accused and argues for a more lenient sentence' (See [13]).

R v MFP* [2001] VSCA 96 (15 June 2001) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Aggravating factor' – 'Domestic context as an aggravating factor' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Recklessly causing serious injury' – 'Risk factors' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Recklessly causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant was married to the victim and they had three children together. The applicant forcibly dragged his wife out of the house and into the shed, where he had set up a noose. There was a struggle and he placed a noose so tightly around her neck that she passed out. The applicant was sentenced to four years imprisonment with a non-parole period of one year.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentencing judge erred in finding that the offence was aggravated because it occurred in a domestic context.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The sentencing judge in fact stated that the legislature and the community regarded the offence of recklessly causing serious injury as serious, an attitude that was correct particularly in a domestic context. Ormiston JA held that the sentencing judge was entirely justified as seeing this as a factor to be born in mind (See [19]). His Honour further stated that:

' I think [the domestic context] can be seen to be aggravating both as to its potential consequences and also inasmuch as a husband (or a wife) is in a privileged position in relation to a spouse. They each know the everyday movements, the habits, the likes and dislikes, the fears and pleasures of their spouse, which might enable them not only to effect an attack more easily on their victim but also to devise the kinds of attack which could more seriously affect their spouse, not merely physically, but so as to cause mental anguish. Now it was not suggested that there were special advantages which the applicant had in the present case, but he was certainly able to know whether the children would be up or asleep and where they would be, and where to take his wife to gain privacy for this cruelly devised attack. The matter need not be examined any further, for in truth the advantages that he had, including that of surprise, justified the judge in holding that it was proper to view more seriously this attack occurring in the domestic context of this family. The consequences for both his wife and children were manifest, as fairly could have been expected' (See [20]).

R v Mason* [2001] VSCA 62 (2 May 2001) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Common assault' – 'Digital rape' – 'Existence of prior relationship not mitigating' – 'Indecent assault' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge/s: Indecent assault, common assault, digital rape.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The offences were committed by the applicant against his estranged wife, the complainant, with whom he had two children. During the course of an argument, the applicant grabbed the complainant by the crotch and lifted her up, slamming her into the bed on a number of occasions. Three days later, the applicant broke into the complainant's house and started to choke and slap her. She struggled against him and he pushed her to the floor and penetrated her vagina with his finger. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of three years and four months, with a non-parole period of 14 months.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentencing judge erred by failing to give sufficient weight to a number of factors including the pre-existing relationship between the applicant and his wife.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Winneke P addressed the submission that where the rape occurs against the background of a previous settled sexual relationship, it should generally be regarded by a sentencing court as less serious than a rape by a total stranger. Winneke P considered the authorities led in support of this submission and at [7] and [8] expressed the following conclusions:

'I do not regard them as laying down a sentencing principle of inflexible or universal application. A rape committed in the context, and against the background, of a previous settled relationship may in certain circumstances be a factor which a court can take into account in mitigation where it can be seen that the impact upon the victim has, for that reason, been less traumatic than otherwise it might have been. But, equally, it is not difficult to imagine a rape, committed by a man who has been in a previous relationship with his victim, which would be every bit as frightening as a rape committed by a stranger. The one thing which the authorities to which this Court has been referred demonstrate is that the crime of rape, whatever the circumstances, and upon whomsoever committed, is regarded by the courts as a grave insult to its victim and a crime which can rarely give rise to a non-custodial sentence.

It should not be forgotten that the crime of rape is an intensely personal crime which, for sentencing purposes, cannot be divorced from its effects on the victim. But the effects include not only those which flow from the physical invasion of the victim's person and security, but also those which flow from the violation of the more intangible intellectual properties of the victim's rights and freedoms. In a society in which there is an increasing number of couples becoming estranged, the courts have a heightened obligation to deter those who have previously lived in a stable relationship with a wife or partner from regarding such wife or partner as akin to a chattel devoid of rights or freedoms, and as an object readily available for their sexual gratification'.

R v Boaza* [1999] VSCA 126 (5 August 1999) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Attempted murder' – 'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Domestic homicide' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Attempted murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and the female complainant formed a relationship, which the complainant subsequently ended. One evening, the applicant tailgated the complainant, forcing her to stop her vehicle. He dragged her out of the car and threw her down an embankment. Stating that he was going to kill her, the applicant punched the complainant and stabbed her multiple times before he was restrained by passers-by. Despite losing massive amounts of blood, the complainant survived. The applicant was sentenced to 14 years imprisonment with a non-parole period of 11 years.

Issue/s:

1. The sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. The sentencing judge failed to give sufficient weight to the applicant's plea of guilty and other matters put in mitigation on his behalf.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed, with separate reasoning provided by Chernov JA and Winneke P but each concurring with the final orders. Chernov JA found that the sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive in the circumstances. The offence was in the upper range of the scale of seriousness for the crime of attempted murder – it was a brutal, cowardly and unprovoked attack induced because the complainant had left their relationship. The applicant showed no remorse and repeatedly lied to police. A sentence reflecting the principles of denunciation and general and specific deterrence was warranted in the circumstances. Further, without the intervention of others the applicant would have killed the victim. Finally, it was clear the sentencing judge took into account all relevant mitigating factors (See [27]-[31]).

Winneke P similarly held that the sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive. His Honour said at [50]:

'[T]his was truly a case where the court's sentence must mark the community's condemnation of the applicant's conduct and must be such as to deter others like-minded from resorting to such conduct as a means of resolving emotional disputes. The type of conduct engaged in by the applicant, reflecting as it does a lack of self-discipline and self-centred lack of respect for the freedom of choice of his victim, was rightly viewed by his Honour, I think, as a serious example of this crime'.

Charge/s: Rape, recklessly causing serious injury.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent was convicted of raping and recklessly causing serious injury to his estranged wife. During the assault, which lasted one and a half hours, the respondent punched the complainant over 200 times, predominately to the face. He was sentenced to two years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of one year. The sentencing judge relied on four matters in deciding to impose a sentence at the lower end of the scale: (a) the offender was unlikely to reoffend, (b) the confusion in his mind as to where his relationship with the complainant was going, (c) the offender's previous good record (which indicated the actions were out of character), and (d) the fact that, since the complainant was his wife, she would not have suffered the long-term traumatisation endured by other rape victims.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Charles JA (Phillips JA agreeing) held that the sentences imposed were manifestly inadequate. None of the first three factors (a), (b) or (c) identified by counsel justified the low penalty for the rape of the complainant. Charles JA did not accept the Crown's submission that factor (d) disclosed a significant error of principle. The sentencing judge's statement as to traumatisation was no more than a finding of fact in the circumstances of this particular case, and not purely premised on the fact that the complainant was his former wife. Notwithstanding this, a substantially heavier sentence was warranted in the circumstances.

Charles JA further held that the imposition of such a lenient sentence here undervalued two important sentencing considerations. First, general deterrence plays an extremely important role in warning the community that rape, within or outside of marriage, will not be tolerated and will attract condign punishment. Second, the considerations which influenced the sentencing judge to impose a lower sentence suggested that His Honour gave little weight to specific deterrence. In light of the respondent's lack of remorse for his actions, specific deterrence ought to have played a significant role in the construction of an appropriate sentence. Error was also shown in the sentencing judge's decision not to direct any cumulation of sentence for the serious physical violence inflicted upon the complainant (See 27).

Tadgell JA also agreed with Charles JA but provided some additional observations. In particular, at 28-29, His Honour stated:

'In particular, it cannot be said that [the sentencing judge] purported to apply any principle to the effect that rape by a man of his wife or former wife or of a person with whom he is or has been in a close relationship is to be treated more leniently than a rape by a stranger. The authorities do not appear to support any such principle. The most that can be said, in my opinion, is that the penalty to be imposed for the crime of rape cannot be regarded as necessarily conditioned by the relationship of the parties to it. Any relationship or lack of it between them will no doubt usually fall to be considered as one of the circumstances to be taken into account in a determination of the appropriate penalty. In some circumstances a prior relationship may serve as a factor of mitigation, but it need not, and it may indeed serve to aggravate the offence'.

There was no error of that kind here but the sentence was still manifestly inadequate for the reasons articulated by Charles JA.

'Breach of intervention order' – 'Community protection' – 'False imprisonment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Repeated and contemptuous breaches of intervention orders' – 'Sentencing' – 'Theft'

Charge/s: False imprisonment, theft x 3, breach of intervention order x 5, unlicensed driving.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant and female complainant were divorced and the complainant had obtained multiple intervention orders against the applicant over a period of time. The applicant broke into the complainant's home, threatened the complainant with a knife and tapped the complainant's mouth and legs and tied her to the bed. He then took the complainant's credit cards and left the premises in the complainant's car. Some days later, the applicant again broke into the complainant's house. The complainant fled the premises and the applicant took credit cards and various other items. On a final occasion, the applicant telephoned the complainant at work, trying to persuade her to drop the charges against him. All these incidents were in breach of an intervention order. The applicant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of two years and six months imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 15 months.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Charles JA held that the sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive. The applicant committed serious crimes which adversely affected the victim and her children quite significantly. The applicant was contemptuous of the intervention order, disregarding it and its terms as and when he pleased. And he had been in court on two previous occasions for breaching the same order (See [16]). As per Charles JA at [14]:

'Intervention orders must be strictly adhered to, and it is very much in the interests of the community that those against whom such orders are made be under no misapprehension that the courts will punish severely those who breach such orders. The applicant's actions suggest that he believed he could breach the intervention order with impunity. Only by appropriately severe penalties can the courts make clear to the applicant and the broader community that such conduct will not be tolerated'.

'Attempted murder' – 'Background of emotional and physical abuse' – 'Exposing children' – 'Manifestly inadequate' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Attempted murder.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent was convicted of the attempted murder by stabbing his wife. He attacked her in a frenzy in public in front of their children. At the time of the incident, the respondent was suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. He was sentenced to six years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of four years.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Batt JA stated that 'general deterrence is not eliminated but still operates, sensibly moderated, in the case of an offender suffering from a mental disorder or severe intellectual handicap' at 381 (See also R v Verdins; R v Buckley; R v Vo [2007] VSCA 102 (23 May 2007) and R v Tsiaras [1996] 1 VR 398 (28 November 1995)). His Honour held that the sentence failed manifestly to meet the gravity of the respondent's crime. The fact the offence occurred in a domestic situation did not decrease its heinousness. The crime warranted a sentence reflective of the considerations of general and specific deterrence, the community's expectation of proper punishment and the possibility of rehabilitation (See 381).

Winneke P agreed with Batt JA but added his own observations. His Honour agreed at 382 that the sentence was manifestly inadequate and stated:

'[T]his was a very serious example of the crime of attempted murder. It was premeditated and vicious and carried out upon a defenceless woman, in a public place, in the presence of the terrified children of both the respondent and the victim. I agree with the learned sentencing judge that the crime is not to be regarded as any the less heinous because it was committed against the background of an emotional domestic dispute. That is merely an explanation and not an excuse for the crime.

Winneke P also held at 383 that 'whether in the particular case a psychiatric condition should reduce or eliminate general deterrence as an appropriate purpose of punishment will depend upon the nature and severity of its symptoms and its effect upon the mental capacity of the accused'.

R v Towns* [1992] VCCA (unrep, 21 September 1992) – Victorian Court of Criminal Appeal

'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship killings' – 'Sentencing' – 'Seriousness'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The victim was the applicant's wife. Throughout the marriage, there were episodes where the applicant drank to excess and subjected the victim to mental and physical abuse. The victim obtained an intervention order against the applicant. The applicant stabbed the victim in the throat on a train. The applicant was sentenced to 20 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 15 years.

Issue/s: The sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The sentence imposed on the applicant was outside the range of sentences imposed for comparable offences. In re-sentencing the applicant, Phillips CJ stated at 7:

'[T]here appears to be an implication in counsel's submissions on behalf of the applicant that, in some way, cases involving a murder arising out of a relationship, or arising out of a domestic situation are less heinous as a class than other types. There is no doubt in my mind that the court must set its face against such an implication'.

Supreme Court

DPP v McDonough [2023] VSC 352 (23 June 2023) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Expert evidence' – 'Extensive criminal history' – 'High moral culpability' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Homicide' – 'Manslaughter' – 'People affected by drug and alcohol misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Poor prospects of rehabilitation' – 'Post-offence conduct' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Manslaughter x 1.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The male offender pleaded guilty to manslaughter of his female partner. In the course of assaulting the victim, the offender punched the victim in the face, causing her to fall over and hit her head. The fall caused bleeding to the brain, resulting in the victim's eventual death.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Reasoning and decision: Fox J sentenced the offender to 11 years and 6 months' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 8 years and 6 months.

In assessing the offender's personal circumstances, Fox J acknowledged the offender's drug abuse led to an unstable lifestyle and significantly contributed to his offending behaviour [27]. Fox J also recognised the offender had a very lengthy and relevant criminal history, dating back to 2001. The offender breached good behaviour bonds, suspended sentences and community correction orders imposed by the courts [29]. The offender was on bail for other matters when he committed manslaughter, aggravating his offending [29].

Mental illness diagnoses were not consistent, but experts discussed schizophrenia, substance use disorder, depression, personality disorder, and a mild acquired brain injury [30]-[34]. However, Fox J held Verdins has no application as there was no evidence prison would be a burden on the offender's mental health [35].

Fox J provided a sentencing discount for the early-stage guilty plea [36] and accepted prison COVID-19 restrictions as a mitigating factor [38]. The judge also regarded the offender's post-offence conduct as relevant; he called an ambulance, expressed he knew what he did was seriously wrong, and handed himself into police the same day [41].

However, Fox J considered the offender's remorse limited [40]. The judge also held the offender's prospects of rehabilitation were poor, as he had declined to engage in prison-based services and had a long-history of breaching court orders [43]. Fox J held that neither the offender's drug use nor mental health issues mitigate his offending. His moral culpability for the crime was high [45].

Fox J stated when sentencing violence against female partners, 'the courts must send a message to other would-be offenders that if you commit such crimes, you should expect to receive a substantial term of imprisonment' [48].

Re Thompson [2023] VSC 274 (17 May 2023) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Application for bail' – 'Compelling reason' – 'Expert evidence' – 'No prior criminal history' – 'Past defence service' – 'Physical abuse' – 'Psychologist evidence' – 'Rape' – 'Separation' – 'Serious alleged offending' – 'Sexual abuse' – 'Stalking' – 'Suicide threat by perpetrator' – 'Technology facilitated abuse' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Charges: rape x 7; rape by compelling sexual penetration; attempted rape x 2; assault x 6; sexual assault x 3; assault with intention to commit sexual offence x 2; recklessly causing injury; false imprisonment x 6; criminal damage x 4; stalking; installation use and maintenance of optical surveillance devices; threatening to distribute intimate image; theft. (Also unrelated charges of driving under the influence of alcohol x 3).

Proceedings: Bail application.

Facts: The applicant man and complainant woman had been in a relationship since 2015. Following unsuccessful IVF treatment their relationship deteriorated and it is alleged the applicant's violence towards the complainant commenced. The relationship ended in 2021 but despite this, the couple continued a sexual relationship, while agreeing to also see other people, which the complainant commenced to do. They agreed the complainant could keep storing belonging's in the shed of the home and stay in the shed when visiting Bendigo (he had moved to Melbourne). It was during this period that the offending occurred.

The applicant allegedly broke into the complainant's house on multiple occasions, including while she was sleeping with another man, and on one occasion secretly filmed her having sexual intercourse with someone else and threatened to distribute the resulting film. The applicant also came to the complainant's house and tampered with and damaged her car, came into her bedroom while she slept, monitored her phone and sent her images of a cut on his arm, insinuating that he would kill himself.

After the complainant told the applicant she needed space apart from him, he became aggressive, verbally and physically, grabbing the complainant and ripping a door off its hinges. On another occasion, the complainant came home to find the applicant hiding under her bed and there were multiple instances of rape. While the complainant left her house for a period and changed the locks, the applicant later confronted her at her home again and attempted to rape her again, chasing her out onto the street and physically assaulting her.

The applicant admitted to stalking but denied the sexual offences and was initially denied bail. A ten-year protection order was made with a full no-contact condition. The applicant relied heavily on evidence from his psychologist (Cummins) to demonstrate his lack of risk. Cummins opined that the offending was 'situationally motivated,' having arisen in the context of a relationship breakdown in which the agreement to see other partners was 'very provocative' and difficult for the applicant [82], [87]. Cummins undertook a risk assessment using the 'Risk for Sexual Violence Protocol' guidelines (and not the Static-99R), concluding that the applicant displayed none of the markers of re-offending. He was not able to complete a full assessment of the applicant's risk profile for violence, as he felt limited by the need to distinguish allegation from established fact. The prosecution challenged Cummins' characterisation of the offending and finding of low risk, which they saw as being largely based on his focus on the applicant's lack of criminal history and lack of completion of the risk-assessment tests.

Reasoning and decision: Bail refused.

There was no contention that the offender had compelling reasons for bail and Champion J accepted this based on his stable accommodation, possible future employment, substantial surety, ongoing treatment opportunities and lack of criminal history.

Champion J found that the applicant demonstrated an unacceptable level of risk given the degree and protracted, premeditated nature of the offending, his disturbing surveillance of the complainant and his willingness to travel significant distances for the offending, consistent with the prosecution's rejection of the offending as 'situationally motivated.' The complainant had an entitlement to live in peace and privacy which would be undermined by his bail.

While there was no mental health diagnosis, Champion J noted Cummins' lack of access to historical records, refusal to draw connection between the offending and the applicant's military history, and limited ability to commit a full sexual offending risk-assessment. Given the arrangement for the committal hearing in a few weeks, the judge concluded that the prosecution case and thus his bail could more realistically be assessed at that time. The applicant relied heavily on evidence from his psychologist (Cummins) to demonstrate his lack of risk. Cummins opined that the offending was 'situationally motivated,' having arisen in the context of a relationship breakdown in which the agreement to see other partners was 'very provocative' and difficult for the applicant [82], [87]. Cummins undertook a risk assessment using the 'Risk for Sexual Violence Protocol' guidelines (and not the Static-99R), concluding that the applicant displayed none of the markers of re-offending. He was not able to complete a full assessment of the applicant's risk profile for violence, as he felt limited by the need to distinguish allegation from established fact. The prosecution challenged Cummins' characterisation of the offending and finding of low risk, which the court saw as being largely based on Cummin's focus on the applicant's lack of criminal history and lack of completion of the risk-assessment tests.

'Allegations of infidelity' – 'Application to lead hearsay evidence' – 'Evidence' – 'Evidence of accused accessing text messages of victim' – 'Hearsay' – 'Monitoring' – 'Murder' – 'Relevance' – 'Short relationship'

Charges: Murder.

Proceedings: Prosecution pre-trial application to lead hearsay evidence.

Facts: The accused objected to the admissibility of two statements in the Crown's noticer of hearsay evidence filed pursuant to s67 of the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) ('the Act'). The deceased woman was in a relationship with the accused which commenced on 1 January 2021. She was killed on 1 February 2021, after the accused became aware that she was friendly with another man.

The prosecution submit the hearsay representations for part of the evidence detailing the relationship evidence, and relevant and admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule pursuant to s65(2)(b) and/or s65(2)(c) of the Act.

Issue: The admissibility of the disputed evidence, two hearsay statements of the deceased to the deceased's friend Ms Chi, namely:

1. 'That the accused deliberately ejaculated in her vagina without her permission, and that she was angry as a result' (the parties agree 'deliberately' and 'without her permission' should be deleted); and
2. 'The accused had been accessing her mobile phone and reading her messages'.

Objections: The defence objects to the admission of the statements on the following bases:

1. The first statement is not relevant, does not come within a recognised exception to the hearsay rule, and in any event should be excluded pursuant to s 137 of the Act.
2. The second statement does not come within a recognised hearsay exception.

Reasoning and decision:

1. The first statement is not relevant pursuant to s 55 and therefore not admissible pursuant to s 56(2):

   In my view, the evidence that the deceased told Ms Chi that the accused ‘came inside my vagina’, and she was very angry and yelled at him about it, could not rationally affect (directly or indirectly) the assessment of the probability of whether the accused killed the deceased, and if so, whether he killed her with murderous intent. The evidence does not provide a motive or reason for the killing. It does not assist a jury to determine whether the accused in fact killedthe deceased. It does not provide necessary context or background. It is not relevant and therefore not admissible. [53]

2. The second representation is hearsay and admissible pursuant to s 65(2(c):

   Turning to s 65(2)(c). The phrase, ‘made in circumstances that make it highly probable that the representation is reliable’ creates a stringent test. It may be contrasted with the language employed in s 65(d)(ii), which provides that the representation must be ‘made in circumstances that make it likely that the representation is reliable’. Clearly, s 65(d)(ii) sets a lower bar than s 65(2)(c).[59]

   There are a number of relevant circumstances which bear upon the question of whether it is ‘highly probable’ that the representation is reliable. The deceased and Ms Chi were close friends, and the evidence shows the deceased shared intimate and personal information with Ms Chi. The deceased told Ms Chi a number of things about her relationship with the accused, and not only things that portrayed the deceased positively and the accused negatively. For example, the deceased told Ms Chi that she was not in love with the accused, but liked his money and that he cleaned her house. She said she did not really want to have sex with him, but did it so he would keep paying for things. These disclosures suggest Ms Chi and the deceased had an honest and frank relationship. [60]

   The deceased had no reason to lie or embellish, or mislead her friend Ms Chi. She was not drug or alcohol affected. She did not suffer from any physical or mental illness or other issues that would have impacted her reliability. The event about which she spoke had occurred recently, in circumstances where she was still seeing the accused. This was a simple, uncomplicated narrative, made to a close friend who she communicated with multiple times a day. [61]

R v Basham (Sentence) [2023] VSC 79 (27 February 2023) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Coercive control' – 'Controlling, jealous or obsessive behaviours' – 'Monitoring' – 'Murder' – 'Past domestic and family violence' – 'Physical violence' – 'Protection order' – 'Rape' – 'Sentencing' – 'Separation' – 'Sexual abuse' – 'Stalking' – 'Tracking'

Proceedings: Sentencing hearing for a conviction of murder (Category 1 offence).

Issue: Was the murder in the 'worst category' of offending such as to justify the imposition of a life sentence?

Facts: The male defendant and female deceased separated after 10 years of a marriage in which the defendant subjected the deceased to physical and emotional abuse.

The victim lived in 'abject fear' of the defendant, who monitored her movements and communications and made threats to destroy her. The victim obtained a protection order following the separation, installed security in her home and made two allegations of rape against the defendant, who was charged.

One week before the committal hearing for the rape offences, the defendant hid himself outside the victim's house while she took her children to school. When she returned into the garage, he brutally beat her (inflicting 41 separate blunt force injuries) and hanged her, attempting to stage the scene as a suicide.

Reasoning and decision: Taylor JA imposed a life-sentence with a non-parole period of minimum 30 years describing the offence as an instance of the 'worst case' of murder.

Taylor JA considered both the objective seriousness of the crime itself and the personal circumstances of the criminal (R v Kilic). The premeditated and vicious nature of the attack, the defendant's motivations of rage, jealousy and preventing the victim giving evidence at his rape trial, and the background of sustained family violence supported the conclusion that the offence was in the most serious category of murders.

Taylor JA was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the murder was a 'long held, sustained goal,' apparent in the defendant's attempts to conceal his presence in the area, stalking of her house and the immediate nature of the attack. Taylor JA rejected the defence suggestion that the attack was a result of a momentary loss of temper, as the victim's fear of the defendant meant she would not voluntarily have remained in his presence.

Taylor JA was further satisfied that a large part of the defendant's motive was to prevent the victim from giving evidence in the rape proceedings against him, as well as his rage and jealously at no longer being in control of her.

The defence argued that the defendant's good character, lack of prior conviction and good prospects for rehabilitation made specific deterrence and community protection of limited relevance. However, Taylor JA refused to accept that equal weight should be given to the criminal's personal circumstances and the 'objectively heinous' nature of the crime. Importantly, Taylor JA drew attention to the fact that domestic violence is pernicious due to its invisibility and frequent perpetration by men with otherwise good reputations.

The defendant was also found to lack remorse – continuing to deny responsibility and remaining impassive during the victim impact statements – and have no ameliorating personal circumstances.

The defendant's moral culpability was at 'the highest end' and the sentence must reflect 'the abhorrence with which society regards violence towards domestic partners.' The principles of general deterrence, denunciation, community protection and just punishment guided the decision:

"such violence is pernicious largely due to the fact that it is often invisible in public life, committed disproportionately by men who might otherwise enjoy a reputation for being good fathers, hard-working providers, reliable friends or community minded citizens" [94]

'Appeal on a question of law pursuant to s272 criminal procedure act 2009' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Mens rea' – 'Protection order' – 'Separation'

Matter: Appeal on a question of Law pursuant to s272 Criminal Procedure Act 2009.

Facts: The male respondent was subject to an interim protection order in which the protected person was the respondent's female former partner made on 12 May 2021. On 2 September 2021 charged with 1 x persistently contravening a protection order section 125A Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) and 4x contravening a protection order s 123 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) (the factual basis of charge 1 was the contraventions alleged in charges 2-5).

The alleged contraventions involved committing family violence against the protected person in the form of telephone calls and text messages that amounted to emotionally and psychologically abusive behaviour.

The magistrate found that the messages were emotionally and psychologically abusive, making the protected person feel unsafe and threatened. However, the magistrate rejected the prosecution's argument that contraventions were strict liability offences and determined that the prosecution had been unable to prove the respondent's intention to breach.

Issue: An appeal was brought by the DPP on two grounds, the first of which was withdrawn.

1. Contraventions of protection orders are strict liability offences
2. The learned magistrate erred when construing the relationship between the physical element and the fault element under s 123.

At issue was whether the offence created by s 123 was concerned only with prohibited conduct and not whether the result of that conduct was intended.

Reason and decision: Appeal dismissed. The Magistrate properly directed themselves as to whether the order had been breached.

Niall JA premised the construction of the nature of the mens rea under s 123 on the general principle that mens rea is an essential ingredient and considered authorities that distinguished between specific and general intent offences.

In relation to the offence of contravening a protection order (s 123(2)) by engaging in family violence in the form of emotional or psychological abuse (ss5, 7), it was observed that divorcing the physical act from its impact was impossible and excluding consequences from the mental element would 'substantially alter the nature of the offence' [54].

It was concluded that a 'person must intend to commit an act that has the physical or emotional consequences which form part of the offending conduct' [61]. In this case, the prosecution was required to prove the accused sent the messages 'with the intent to torment, intimidate, harass or be offensive to the recipient' [62]. Niall JA observed that this construction would not undermine the statute's protective purpose or be unduly burdensome, as intent 'will be proved inferentially'.[58]

The Queen v Surtees* [2022] VSC 124 (11 March 22) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Burning' – 'Covid-19' – 'Dousing' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Immolation' – 'Immolation threat' – 'Manslaughter' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Post traumatic stress disorder' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victims as (alleged) perpetrators'

Charges: manslaughter by unlawful dangerous act x1.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The female offender pleaded guilty to the manslaughter of her husband. The offender and her husband had been in a relationship for 10 years and had two daughters, aged six and four. The offender's 11-year-old son from a previous relationship also lived with the couple. The couple would often argue, at times have screaming matches and sometimes hit each other.

In 2016 Victorian Child Protection Services received a report of children being exposed to violence, but an investigation was not pursued [7]. In 2017 the victim pleaded guilty to unlawful assault against the offender [8].

On the night of the offence the victim had been drinking and yelling at people at a party they attended. After returning home he continued to yell at the offender. After the victim had calmed down and was sitting on the couch the offender, angry about the victim's behaviour through the day, doused the victim in petrol and threatened him with a lighter by igniting it near him. He 'burst into flames' leading to serious injuries which resulted in his death [15]. The three children all witnessed their father in flames.

Proceeding: Sentencing.

Decision and Reasoning: 12 years imprisonment with a fixed non-parole period of 8 years [132].

Justice Tinney noted that 17 victim impact statements were filed, and all detailed the kind and decent nature of the victim. His Honour specifically noted the ongoing financial and emotional impact on the victim's brother and his wife, who took in the children [111].

The offence was a serious example of manslaughter and the objective gravity of the offence as very high [85], [125]. There was a very high and obvious level of dangerousness inherent in the offender's actions [90], aggravated due to it occurring in such proximity to her young children [92].

His Honour significance of family violence and provocation [71], however it was not a relationship "marked by frequent violence and controlling behaviour" [81]. The offence was not a long-considered crime; however, it involved several deliberate steps and was not unpremeditated [83]. There was no evidence that justified any contention the victim was physically abusive the day or night of the offence [72] and the offender's actions were a "very extreme overreaction" [82].

Justice Tinney considered the offender's PTSD diagnosis as cumulative from childhood sexual abuse, and violence in previous relationships but found no realistic or causal connection between the PTSD and the offence [61]. The victim deliberately attempted to shift a degree of blame onto the victim by giving conflicting accounts [67].

DPP v Kingdon* [2021] VSC 858 (21 December 2021) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Guilty plea' – 'Impact of covid-19 pandemic' – 'Murder' – 'No criminal history' – 'Older people' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Remorse' – 'Sentencing' – 'Separation' – 'Verdins principles'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The 65-year-old male accused pleaded guilty to the murder of his female de-facto partner of three years. The accused stabbed the victim with a kitchen knife 11 times in the chest and neck following an argument about the accused's divorce settlement, during which victim had attempted to end the relationship.

Decision and Reasoning: 23 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 16 years and 3 months).

Lasry J considered victim impact statements of the victim's family, which referred to the 'lifelong' and 'severe' impact of the accused's actions (20). His Honour explained that while the accused intended to cause really serious injury, and was being sentenced on that basis, his moral culpability would be 'determined by the nature of the killing… rather than the… intent' behind the conduct (55). The accused's moral culpability was high (56). The 5th and 6th limb of R v Verdins [2007] VSCA 102 applied due to the accused's diagnosis of major depressive disorder, and likelihood of internalising 'the punitive aspects of sentencing', age, and 'demographic divergence from… other prisoners' (43). His Honour stated that general deterrence is an important sentencing principle in the context of domestic violence (60), noting the accused's explanation for the crime "carries the implication "Look what you made me do"[58]:

> People are entitled to leave relationships and, men in particular, who are told their relationships are finished do not have any form of licence, rationale or excuse to then inflict fatal violence as a reaction in order to quell their feelings of rejection [59].

The accused had no prior criminal convictions, was of an 'advancing age' and had previously been 'of good character' (62) and the utilitarian value of his guilty plea was 'very high' due to the Covid-19 pandemic (34), (62).

Re Strachan* [2021] VSC 538 (31 August 2021) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Children' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'History of family violence' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Separation'

Charges: Persistent contravention of a family violence intervention order ('FVIO') x 1, contravening a FVIO x 7, committing an indictable offence whilst on bail x 1, contravening a conduct condition of bail x 7.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Issues:

1. Whether there were exceptional circumstances to justify the grant of bail.
2. Whether the applicant posed an unacceptable risk.

Facts: The male applicant and female victim were married for 10 years and shared four children. They separated in March 2021. The victim reported to police that throughout the relationship the applicant was frequently verbally abusive, intimidating towards the children, and physically abusive two to three times per year, strangling her on one occasion. The applicant was charged with various offences and bailed on those offences. An interim protection order and then a final protection order was made. The applicant allegedly breached these orders on numerous occasions by contacting the victim via phone and being near his daughter's school. On one occasion the applicant visited his daughter at school and asked her to leave with him. The applicant suffered from severe mental health issues, including depression and anxiety, and a pain condition. He was charged in relation to the breaches of bail and protection orders and sought further bail.

Decision and Reasoning: Bail refused.

Lasry J found that the applicant had not established exceptional circumstances. His Honour found that the applicant could receive treatment for his mental health issues while in custody and that his pain condition, while serious, had not prevented him from engaging in community sports. Therefore, 'special vulnerability' had not been established. Furthermore, it had not been established that without bail the applicant's time in custody would be 'far in excess' of any likely sentence.

'Assault' – 'Bail' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Covid-19' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'Extensive criminal history' – 'History of family violence' – 'Homeless applicant' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charges: Sexual assault x 2; unlawful assault x 2; persistent contravention of a family violence order; contravention of family violence orders x 9.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Issues:

1. Whether there were exceptional circumstances to justify the grant of bail
2. Whether the applicant posed an unacceptable risk

Facts: The applicant was charged with persistently breaching a Family Violence Intervention Order ('FVIO') by refusing to move out of his female former partner's house [1], harassing the victim via phone [25], and perpetrating sexual and unlawful assaults against the victim [3]. The applicant had an extensive criminal record and a history of contravening bail conditions and community corrections orders.

Decision and Reasoning: Bail granted.

Coghlan J found that there were exceptional circumstances, and that by the imposition of appropriate conditions, the risk represented by the applicant was not unacceptable [24]. His Honour acknowledged that conditions of imprisonment had become more difficult due to quarantine requirements [18], and noted that if released the applicant would reside with his aunt, Ms Terri Brown, at a location 'significantly removed from… the complainant' and with very few means of transport [21]. Ms Brown had agreed to report any breaches of the applicant's bail conditions. His Honour highlighted that the applicant had complied with court orders and requirements while previously residing with Ms Brown, and that 'it was in part due' to the applicant being homeless 'that he continued to impose upon the complainant' [7-8]. The conditions of bail included that the applicant reside with Ms Brown and not leave the house unless accompanied by her and produce his phone to police for inspection [29].

'Murder' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation'

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Charge: Murder.

Facts: The male offender killed the female victim, his domestic partner of one week, by applying force to her neck by holding her in a chokehold. A jury convicted him of murder following a trial in which the issues were whether the victim was killed by a conscious, voluntary and deliberate act and, if so, whether the offender had murderous intent. The offender was diagnosed with long-term Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and alternately borderline or severe personality disorder by psychiatric experts. There was evidence he had mental health issues dating from his teens. He argued he killed the victim in the course of a flashback provoked by the behaviour of the victim, in pushing and haranguing him in the course of an argument which extended over a number of hours. Following the murder, the offender sent text messages to the victim's family purporting to be from the victim. The offender had no prior history of violent offending and alleged he had been a victim of abuse as a child.

Held: Sentenced to 23 years imprisonment with a minimum term of 17 years. It was noted that this was less than the standard 25 year head sentence to take into account the offender's prior good character and Verdins principles.

'14 year gap between alleged offence and laying of charge' – 'Alleged murder of partner' – 'Bail' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'No relevant criminal history' – 'No unacceptable risk posed by applicant' – 'Poor mental and physical health of the applicant' – 'Separation'

Matter: Application for bail.

Facts: The applicant is alleged to have killed his female domestic partner in 2007, approximately 6 months after they had commenced residing together in her unit. He was arrested but released the day after his partner's death. A coroner found the applicant likely contributed to the death of the deceased in 2011 but the applicant was not re-arrested until 6 January 2021 and has been in custody since then. There is some evidence of a history of violence by the applicant towards the deceased, including an incident where he drove dangerously with the deceased in a vehicle in the days prior to her death which allegedly was a source of arguments between them. There is evidence the deceased asked the applicant to move out of her apartment the day of her death.

Issues: Unacceptable risk and exceptional circumstances.

Held: Bail granted. The fact the applicant remained in the jurisdiction for the many years before he was charged, including while being dealt with for earlier historic offending, and failed to reoffend went a long way to establish that there was no unacceptable risk posed by a grant of bail. The applicant's counsel's assertion the prosecution case was weak was rejected, but exceptional circumstances were established by the passage of years and the good behaviour of the applicant during the delay, his lack of relevant prior offending or breach of bail, his serious physical and mental health issues and the effect of incarceration thereon, the conditions he would likely spend remand in, the likely future delay in reaching trial, his stable relationship and accommodation, and the availability of substantial surety.

R v Dellamarta [2021] VSC 220 (4 May 2021) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Impact of covid 19 pandemic' – 'Imprisonment' – 'Manslaughter' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Manslaughter.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The female offender, who had an intellectual disability, pleaded guilty to the manslaughter of her male partner. She stabbed her partner once to the upper chest during the course of an argument. She admitted to stabbing the deceased but was unable to say why she had done so. She said that she had never been scared that he would physically hurt her, but that he had called her abusive and hurtful names.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and reasoning: A sentence of 7 years and 6 months imprisonment was imposed, with a non-parole period of 5 years.

The following factors were relevant to objective seriousness: First, the offender deliberately stabbed the deceased with a large kitchen knife. Second, the deceased was her partner, and the offence took place in her home. Third, she grossly overreacted to whatever feelings of hurt and anger she was experiencing in the face of the deceased's aggression. Fourth, she immediately attempted to revive the deceased, called for help and assisted police.

The offender's moral culpability for the offending, and the relevance of general deterrence, were somewhat reduced by her intellectual disability and depressive disorder (notwithstanding the lack of a causal link established by expert evidence). Specific deterrence was also modified by her personal factors (genuine remorse, ability to manage the limitations of her intellectual disability and fair prospects for rehabilitation). The guilty plea was also taken into account.

Finally, the court recognised the burden of prison on her at [45]:

> "I accept that your deficits mean that your will find prison more burdensome than a person without your disability. Mr Newton described you as a vulnerable prisoner at risk of victimisation and other negative attention in the custodial environment. It seems that this risk has, in fact, materialised. Mr Newton further stated that there is some risk that the intensity of your depressive symptoms will increase as a result of your incarceration. I accept these opinions. I also accept that your experience of custody to date has been difficult given the lack of physical visits between March and December 2020 consequent upon the COVID-19 pandemic."

'Animal abuse' – 'Bail application' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Children' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'Impact of covid-19 pandemic' – 'Strangulation' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Unacceptable risk' – 'Weapons'

Charges: Numerous family violence charges and protection order breaches.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Facts: The applicant was charged with numerous family violence offences and intervention order breaches over multiple years, but principally in 2019 and 2020, in respect of his wife (the complainant) and their 2 young children. The alleged offending involved physical violence (including use of weapons and strangulation), exposing the children to family violence, animal abuse, threats to kill (including if the complainant failed to revoke a protection order), and repeated breaches of intervention orders. Due to the delays brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic, there was a real prospect that the applicant's trial would not proceed until 2023.

Issues:

1. Whether exceptional circumstances existed to justify the grant of bail.
2. Whether there was an unacceptable risk.
3. Whether there would be a risk that the applicant would commit family violence if released on bail, and whether such risk might be mitigated.

Decision and reasoning: Application for bail was allowed on strict conditions.

At the outset, counsel for the respondent informed the court that "the children of the applicant are apparently petrified of him, and that Child Protection have indicated an intention of stepping in should the applicant make any attempt to have contact with them. She pointed out that the two children are eye witnesses to some of the offending, and that the risk of interference with them as well as with the complainant herself is a live concern.

Further, counsel for the respondent emphasised that the applicant's conduct while incarcerated "showed his malevolence towards his wife and aggression towards some other individuals which would itself raise concerns about the safety of his family and others." The charges were serious, "notwithstanding that no serious injuries had been caused. This was more by good luck than good management, and there was still the risk of psychological harm and ongoing consequences for the children. The seriousness of the offending was amplified by the constant undertone of family violence, encompassing control and actual violence."

Exceptional circumstances existed. In particular, the possible period of remand due to the COVID-19 delay (2-3 years) would highly likely exceed any term of imprisonment. The obvious risk of the applicant endangering the safety and welfare of any person or committing an offence while on bail could be mitigated by stringent bail conditions so as not to be an unacceptable risk noting: "Any attempt to contact in any way, much less, harm, his wife or children, would have the inevitable consequence that he would be taken again into custody, with little hope of release until the resolution of the charges he faces."

Re Application for Bail by Wilson [2021] VSC 22 (29 January 2021) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Application for bail' – 'Covid-19' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Mild traumatic brain injury' – 'Murder' – 'No unacceptable risk' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Support services'

Charge: Murder.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Facts: The female applicant killed her male domestic partner by stabbing him in the back during the course of a domestic dispute. At trial, the applicant intended to argue that she acted in self-defence and that she did not intend to cause death or really serious injury. The applicant had a history of drug addiction, mental illness, and had been in a car accident a few weeks prior to the offending, potentially resulting in a mild traumatic brain injury.

Decision and reasoning: The applicant was granted bail.

There were sufficient matters to establish exceptional circumstances. The two central issues that would arise at trial (self-defence and intent) were "live" and needed to be finely judged, in combination with the delay in the matter (which in itself would not be sufficient) and the circumstances of detention due to COVID-19 (unable to receive visits with her mother or daughter) ([45]-[48]).

The respondent had not demonstrated that the applicant was an unacceptable risk of endangering the community, offending whilst on bail or failing to answer bail. The applicant had a criminal record but this included relatively minor offences and the more serious conviction had no particular resonance in relation to the present offending. There was evidence that she would receive support with accommodation, and in relation to any ongoing problems of drug addiction and mental health from Women's Housing Ltd. The applicant had further motivation in restoring her relationship with her mother and re-engaging with her young daughter, supported by the Department of Health and Human Services ([50]-[56]).

'Application for bail' – 'Compelling reason' – 'Misuse of alcohol or drugs by perpetrator' – 'Past domestic and family violence' – 'Pregnancy of victim' – 'Protection orders' – 'Strangulation' – 'Stringent bail conditions' – 'Unacceptable risk’

Charges: Reckless conduct endangering life x 2; Aggravated assault of a female x 6; Contravening a family violence intervention order (FVIO) x 1; Recklessly causing injury x 1; Making a threat to kill x 1.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Facts: The applicant man and complainant woman were in a domestic relationship, and she was 3 months pregnant with their child. The applicant was subject to two FVIOs, one involving his ex-wife and child, and one involving the complainant. The charged offending involved the application of pressure to the complainant’s neck until she lost consciousness on the first occasion, and until she sustained a fractured larynx on the second occasion. The applicant owned his own business, had no criminal history (but been the subject of a number of reports of family violence), and had a history of depression/anxiety and substance abuse issues.

Issues:

1. Whether the applicant had demonstrated a “compelling reason” to justify the grant of bail.
2. Whether the respondent had demonstrated that there was an “unacceptable risk”.

Decision and reasoning: The applicant was granted bail.

First, on “compelling reason”, the offending alleged was very serious. It involved a man in the context of an ongoing intimate relationship applying pressure on 2 occasions to the neck of his pregnant partner rendering her unconscious and fracturing her larynx. The case against the applicant was of reasonable strength in view of the objective evidence ([50]-[51]).

Nevertheless, his Honour was satisfied that a compelling reason existed to justify the grant of bail ([53]). The applicant had no prior convictions or adverse bail history, stable employment and accommodation, and the situation of the offending had ended. There was no evidence to suggest he would further attack the complainant, with a traumatic period in custody being a strong disincentive to do so. The applicant was seeking treatment for his drug problem. He also stood to spend significant time in custody in difficult circumstances in the absence of bail ([52]).

Second, the court was not satisfied that the risk posed by the applicant (that he would contact and possibly harm the complainant) was unacceptable. This was in light of the very stringent bail conditions imposed to mitigate the risk including a curfew, requirement to comply with a full FVIO that had been put in place concerning the complainant, prohibition on drug use (including testing), requirement to undergo drug treatment, and a broad geographical exclusion to further protect the complainant ([54]).

'Attempts to dissuade victim' – 'Bail application' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'History of abuse' – 'Misuse of alcohol or drugs by perpetrator' – 'Perpetrator interventions' – 'Perverting the course of justice' – 'Protection orders' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Charges: Four groups of charges, including alternative charges. Group 1: Reckless conduct endangering serious injury x 1; Unlawful assault x 1. Group 2: Intentionally causing injury x 2; Recklessly causing injury x 2; Unlawful assault x 2. Group 3: False imprisonment x 1; Intentionally causing injury x 2; Recklessly causing injury x 2; Theft x 1; Unlawful assault x 2; Unlawful assault with a weapon x 1. Group 4: Common law assault x 1; Common law charge of attempting to pervert the course of justice x 1.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Facts: The applicant man was charged with a number of family violence offences against the female complainant. The charges related to a series of incidents in November 2017 and subsequent text messages aimed at dissuading her from pursuing the complaints. At the time of the bail application, there were three Family Violence Intervention orders (FVIOs) in force (protecting the complainant, another former intimate partner, and the applicant's further former partner/children). The applicant had expressed a desire to change submitting evidence of, inter-alia, the support of his sister and rehabilitative programmes undertaken in custody.

Issues:

1. Whether exceptional circumstances existed to justify the grant of bail.
2. Whether there was an unacceptable risk.
3. Whether, if the applicant were released on bail, he would pose a risk of committing family violence and whether that risk could be mitigated by the imposition of bail conditions or the making of a FVIO.

Decision and reasoning: Bail refused.

While the matter was finely balanced, the applicant met the threshold of exceptional circumstances through a combination of factors namely, the death of his mother whilst in custody and deferral of her funeral until his release, the likely delays in the matter proceeding to trial, the legitimate criticism levelled at aspects of the prosecution case, and the overall delays in the matter being prosecuted which were not attributable to the applicant (at [78]-[80]).

Nevertheless, there was an unacceptable risk that that the applicant would endanger the safety or welfare of a person, commit offences on bail, interfere with a witness (the complainant), or fail to answer bail. The applicant's most recent conduct on bail showed that despite awaiting court for family violence charges (including those alleged by the complainant) he was prepared to engage in very similar conduct towards another partner (at [81]-[84], [88]).

Further, the risks the applicant posed not only of committing further family violence but also of trying to dissuade the complainant from proceeding with her complaint could not be mitigated by FVIOs or additional bail conditions. The court noted: "Preventing family violence in the community can be difficult because victims are often reluctant to come forward and/or may be easily dissuaded from pursuing complaints" (at [86]). Risks could not be ameliorated with bail conditions given the applicant's poor history of compliance with previous bail orders, CCOs, and other court orders, his family violence history committed against different partners and his persistent drug use and offending (at [87]).

OP v XY* [2020] VSC 754 (16 November 2020) – Victorian Supreme Court

'18-year period for protection order' – 'Coercive control' – 'Culturally and linguistically diverse (cald) people' – 'Judicial review' – 'Protection order' – 'Unborn child added to protection order' – 'Whether child in utero at the time of offending is a child who has been 'subjected to family violence''

Proceedings: Application for judicial review.

Facts: In protection order proceedings in the County Court, XY (female partner) claimed that her husband OP (male partner) had committed numerous instances of family violence during their relationship. This ranged from physical violence and unwanted sex to psychological manipulation and humiliation.

> [28] XY alleged that, over the course of the marriage, OP emotionally controlled her, isolated her (from others), and continually abused her — for example, by writing on a whiteboard numerous ways in which she was a bad wife and stepmother. She claimed that OP made her sleep on the floor, limited her food intake and gave her no money. XY said that she felt pressured to have sex and that she could not say no > as OP would say that she was a bad wife. She said she made numerous attempts to leave the relationship, but that OP would contact her and manipulate her to return. XY alleged that OP physically assaulted her on several occasions. He also ejected her from the home numerous times, including without shoes. He abused her for being selfish and using money on herself instead of the children. [Also see paragraphs [47]-[51] and [57]].

While OP denied these claims, and made his own against XY, he ultimately consented (without admissions) to a protection order. OP's claims against XY included 'falsified and exaggerated claims of being assaulted by her' [29], also see [79]-[80]. The magistrate made mutual protection orders against OP and XY for a period of two years. OP filed a notice of appeal against the protection order made against him. XY did not appeal the order made against her. On appeal, her Honour extended the length of the DFV protection order against OP from a two-year term to one of 18 years' duration. Her Honour also added XY's child to the order on the basis that the child had been subjected to family violence in utero. OP now applies to this court for judicial review of the judge's decisions and orders.

Decision and reasoning: Application for judicial review dismissed.

The County Court judge's reasons for extending the DFV protection order to 18 years' duration and including the child in the order are set out at [221]. The applicant (self-represented) made submissions with respect to, but was unable to demonstrate, actual or apprehended bias, a denial of procedural fairness, inadequacy of the judge's reasons, Wednesbury unreasonableness, illogicality or irrationality in the judge's decision, and a failure to apply the Briginshaw test to the serious claims of DFV made against him [373].

> [17] The difficulty for OP, however, is that this application is not an appeal of the kind in which I am entitled or required to substitute my views on the evidence for those of the County Court judge. Instead, this Court's jurisdiction on an application for judicial review is merely supervisory, not appellate, and is strictly confined in consequence. In exercising this jurisdiction, I am not to assess the merits of the decision, but must consider only whether the court below exceeded its jurisdiction and whether it observed the law in reaching the relevant decisions. Perhaps counter-intuitively, as I have already intimated, even if the judge below erred, but did so within jurisdiction, still there would be no relief by way of judicial review.
> [18] In my opinion, while aspects of the judge's decision are very close to being afflicted with Wednesbury unreasonableness, illogicality or irrationality, in the end, those high hurdles for relief are not cleared. Nor am I satisfied that OP's claims of actual or apprehended bias are established, whether examined with or without the fresh evidence. Instead, I am persuaded by [counsel for the complainant] that the asserted errors (except perhaps one) are not established or are otherwise within jurisdiction. While it is, I think, plain that the judge exceeded her jurisdiction by including the child in the order by reliance on a power that was not available on the evidence, that order is supported by another power which turns upon OP's lack of opposition, and the consent XY implicitly gave, at the hearing.

[449] I do not accept that, for the purposes of the first limb of s 77(2) (or its later equivalent), it can be said that the child [in utero] "has been subjected to family violence". While, as I have said, strictly, I need not decide whether there ever could be a case in which a child-to-be in utero may come within the provision, I very much doubt it. Indeed, given that a "child" is "a person who is under the age of 18 years" and that the words "has been subjected to family violence" connote the present tense, I think it is extremely unlikely that the definition of family violence in s 5(1)(b) could extend to behaviour directed at or experienced solely by the mother when the child-to-be is in utero.

'Application for bail' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Child' – 'History of abuse' – 'Misuse of alcohol' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Strangulation' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Charges: Reckless conduct endangering life x 1; Reckless conduct endangering serious injury x 1; Aggravated assault x 1; Common law assault x 1; Unlawful assault x 1.

Proceedings: Bail application.

Facts: The complainant is the male applicant's female partner. It is alleged that the present charges occurred against a background of long-term, largely unreported domestic violence by the applicant against the complainant. In March 2018, the applicant is alleged to have threatened to burn down the family home resulting in the issuing of a protection order (the applicant is alleged to have breached the DFV protection order on numerous occasions, but these breaches were not reported at the time). In June 2020, the applicant is alleged to have been aggressive and verbally abusive. In July 2020, the applicant is alleged to have verbally abused the complainant. Later, he is alleged to have become increasingly aggressive and assaulted the complainant in front of their child, including pulling chunks of her hair out before allegedly strangling her.

After a ‘prolonged period of strangulation’, the complainant managed to free herself and escape. The applicant is alleged to have been intoxicated during the various offences. Bail was previously refused on the basis that the applicant posed an unacceptable risk of committing an offence while on bail.

Issues: Whether risk can be mitigated by imposition of condition.

Decision and reasoning: Bail granted.

[56] There is no question that the applicant does pose a risk of contacting the complainant, and interfering with her as a witness and exposing her to danger. The question is whether there are conditions of bail which could be imposed so as to mitigate that risk so that it is not unacceptable.

[60] Taking into account all of the surrounding circumstances of this case, I am not satisfied that the applicant poses an unacceptable risk of any of the matters prescribed in s 4E of the Act. He does certainly pose a risk but I believe that the risk can be ameliorated to an acceptable level by the imposition of the stringent conditions [including residential requirements, curfew, prohibition against drugs or alcohol, mental health care plan, no-contact order for the protection of the complainant and their daughter and compliance with an interim DFV protection order].

R v Sturt* [2020] VSC 317 (10 June 2020) – Victorian Supreme Court

‘- people affected by substance misuse’ – ‘Cannabis-induced psychosis’ – ‘Controlling behaviour’ – ‘History of sexual violence’ – ‘History of abuse’ – ‘Mitigating and aggravating circumstances’ – ‘Murder’ – ‘Non-fatal strangulation’ – ‘People with mental illness’ – ‘Personality disorders’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Strangulation’ – ‘Suffocation’

Charges: Murder x 1

Case type: Sentence

Facts: The accused murdered his long-term intimate partner by suffocating and strangling her while he was in a cannabis-induced psychosis. He surrendered himself to police the same day as the killing, made a full confession and pleaded guilty to murder at the first available opportunity. The offence was not an isolated instance of domestic violence, as the accused had been physically and sexually violent towards the deceased in the past. He had also been previously admitted to a psychiatric unit, on which occasions the deceased reported that his mental state had deteriorated in the context of substance abuse, and that he had tried to strangle her in her sleep. He also assaulted the deceased in 2010.

Issue: Whether the voluntary drug taking was an aggravating circumstance; whether his Schizotypal Personality Disorder was a mitigating circumstance.

Held: After an assessment, a forensic psychiatrist made several observations about the accused, including that he used various coercive behaviours, such as violence and threats of violence and suicide, to mitigate the persistent likelihood of the deceased abandoning him. It appeared that the fatal attack was motivated by delusional beliefs. The psychiatrist also found that notwithstanding his prior history of domestic violence, the killing would not have occurred in the absence of the psychotic episode ([26]). In the police interview, the accused described his childhood as "troubled". His stepfather physically and emotionally abused his mother, and the accused used cannabis for many years, and has "dabbled" with other drugs ([52]-[58]).

The Court did not accept the prosecution’s submission that the accused’s cannabis use was an aggravating feature, as it could not be established beyond reasonable doubt that he knew that he was likely to become violently psychotic from the cannabis use during the relevant period ([27]-[30]). Further, his moral culpability was not reduced by his psychosis at the time of the offending, because he had voluntarily taken the cannabis in the knowledge that it might make him violently psychotic ([32]). His forensic psychiatrist considered that his Schizotypal Personality Disorder indirectly contributed to his offending because (1) his problems with social anxiety and depression predisposed him to the heavy use of cannabis, and (2) it lowered the threshold for developing psychosis following ingestion of psychotogenic substances ([37]). The defence counsel’s submission that his personality disorder was a mitigating circumstance was also rejected by the Court ([40]). Cannabis was not the only way to deal with his anxiety. The accused should have undertaken a drug rehabilitation program instead, particularly since he was aware that cannabis might cause him to become violently psychotic ([39]).

Aggravating circumstances included the fact that the deceased was the accused’s long-term intimate partner, she was murdered in her own home, and the offence was not a "one-off instance of domestic violence". The fatal conduct, however, was not motivated by the same considerations which led to the earlier domestic violence instances, and was not planned ([45]-[50]). Mitigating circumstances included the accused’s cooperation with authorities, remorse, and his reasonable prospects of rehabilitation, given his excellent insight into his psychological issues and his positive response to medication while in custody ([65]-[71]). Consequently, he was sentenced to 22 years’ imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 16 years.

'Controlling behaviours' – 'Drug misuse' – 'Murder' – 'Non-fatal strangulation' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suicide threats by perpetrator' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Murder x 1

Proceedings: Sentencing

Facts: The male offender and female victim had been in a relationship for three months and lived together. The couple argued in the days leading up to the offending and the victim appeared nervous and scared to those she met. She told several friends that she could not leave, even though the offender had choked her. On the night prior to the offending, the victim visited her friend after a fight with the offender. The victim received text messages from the offender saying that he would kill himself if the victim did not come back. The offender went to the friend's house and spoke to the victim, but the victim said she was not ready to come back home now but would come soon. The offender left the house and travelled to the house of a friend. On the way, he slashed his right forearm repeatedly; the friend wrapped the offender's arm in a tea towel. In the meantime, the victim returned home but did not find the offender there, so she texted her friend, indicating that she thought she would be okay. A text message exchange then occurred between the offender and the victim in which the offender asked the victim if he could come home and told her that he loved her, but the victim said she did not want to talk and that "If you love someone you would not harm them and control them". The victim exchanged text messages with other people but these ceased abruptly around 4:55am.

At this time, the offender returned home and stabbed the victim numerous times to the face, scalp, neck and arms with a kitchen knife while she was on her bed. She died quickly after this attack. The offender tried to clean the scene with bleach and hid the body and bloody sheets under the bed. He then tried to burn down the house by lighting a fire in a cabinet next to the bed, but this only smouldered as the cabinet was closed and the fire was starved of oxygen. The offender went to his friend's place and told him that he had killed the victim, but only because she had attacked him in his sleep. He repeated this account of events to police, claiming that the victim had attacked him when he refused to get her more ice.

Judgment: The judge sentenced the offender to 29 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 23 years. His Honour noted that the offender's "crime of murder is a very serious example of that always serious crime"

[118]. In addressing the offender, his Honour emphasised the aggravating features of the offending: "In the context of an ongoing domestic relationship which left your partner strongly fearing you, at least in the days leading up to her death, for reasons which have not in any honest way been explained by you, you took to her with a dangerous knife while she was in the sanctuary of her own bed in her own home … You ignored her futile and desperate attempts to ward off your blows. Having killed her, you showed your lack of regard for her by hiding her under her bed, conducting a cursory clean-up, then setting the fire in the cabinet intent on burning the crime scene. Then you left her, dead on the floor, covered in blood" [118]. And further, "Yours was a sustained and outrageously violent attack upon a helpless woman," such that his Honour held that the lack of planning or premeditation "said nothing about its seriousness" [121]. His Honour further stated that "You were in a position of trust where she was concerned. She should have been able to look to you for love and protection. You chose, however, to kill her by extravagant, protracted and shocking acts of violence. Each single act of stabbing her entailed serious danger to the welfare of your helpless victim. You carried out many such individual acts" [123] and that "Your breach of trust and lack of normal human decency are simply stunning" [140].

His Honour held that rehabilitation would have little part to play in the sentence, because the offender's prospects of rehabilitation were "exceedingly dim," given he had not honestly acknowledged his crime nor dealt with his drug and other issues [131]. Instead, just punishment, denunciation, general deterrence, specific deterrence and protection of the community were important to the sentence [141]. His Honour noted that "The sentence of this Court must make it perfectly clear that the Court deplores violent crimes of this sort, especially against a domestic partner" and that "the sentence I pass must bring it clearly home to any person who might be minded to inflict extreme violence upon a domestic partner, for whatever reason, that such conduct will be met with strong punishment" [141]. His Honour was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the physical altercation did not commence as the offender claimed and that his account was a complete fabrication; that is, it did not begin with the victim attacking the offender because the victim was evidently very scared of the offender and "would have known that to [attack the offender] would only serve to inflame [the offender] and might trigger a violent reaction from a person of whom she was in fear" [50], [51], [55]. In rejecting the offender's claim, his Honour held that there was no explanation for the shocking crime [56].

His Honour rejected that the plea of guilty was made at a reasonably early stage, having been made 16 months after the offending [59], but noted that there was still a significant utilitarian benefit to the plea, which would constitute a mitigating factor [61]. His Honour also rejected that the offender was remorseful [64], taking into account his conduct after the offending (in attempting to clean the scene and hide the body), his false assertions of the victim attacking the offender first, and his obvious sorrow for his own position, not the death of the victim. His Honour accepted that the offender had a substantial history of methylamphetamine use, and that the offender was using that drug at the time of offending [80]. However, his Honour also noted that the offender had an extensive criminal history for matters of violence, dishonesty, weapons and driving, and that he had been imprisoned numerous times and received numerous community-based dispositions which were frequently breached [83]. His Honour was not convinced that the offender actually suffered from PTSD and noted that even if he did, this would not result in any term of imprisonment weighing more heavily on the offender than a person in normal health [102]. His Honour therefore held that the principle enunciated in the fifth limb of R v Verdins [2007] VSCA 102 did not have any application in this case [103].

'Animal abuse' – 'Bail application' – 'Compelling reasons' – 'Past domestic violence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Relevance of covid-19 pandemic' – 'Sexual assault' – 'Strangulation' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Offences: Common assault x 2; Unlawful assault x 2; Sexual assault x 2; Criminal damage; Threaten to commit a sexual offence; False imprisonment; Contravention of a Family Violence Intervention Order (FVIO) x 4; Persistent contravention of a FVIO; Committing an indictable offence whilst on bail; Contravening condition of bail.

Proceedings: Bail application

Issue: Whether compelling reasons exist justifying the grant of bail.

Facts: The applicant and complainant commenced a 'romantic' relationship in August 2019. The applicant moved into the complainant's home which she shared with her 23-year-old daughter. On the day of the offending, the complainant came home from work and found the applicant intoxicated. They argued before the applicant told the complainant to join him in the shower. The complainant initially refused but eventually agreed to appease the applicant who appeared angry. The applicant suggested they have sexual intercourse but the complainant refused. The applicant became violent towards her, pushing her into the shower door. The complainant tried to leave the shower but the applicant pushed her onto the bed, held her wrists above her head and thrust his knee into her thigh. The complainant kicked the applicant in the genitals. The applicant then punched the complainant in the abdomen about ten times. The applicant left the house but came back shortly later, yelling "Right, time for round two". The complainant attempted to leave in her car but was initially blocked in by the applicant's car. She managed to leave but returned to the house to collect her dogs as she was fearful the applicant would harm them.

The complainant went to the toilet when she arrived but found the applicant in there. The applicant rubbed faeces over the complainant's face and hair, then pushed her up against a wall using his forearm under her chin. She broke free and called 000, while the applicant began hitting things in the house. The applicant grabbed the complainant, threw her onto the bed, pushed his forearm to her throat and punched her in the abdomen, stating he was going to give her anal with his clenched fist. The applicant got off the complainant when she grabbed his genitalia with her fingernails. She cancelled the police request but asked her sister to come and help her. The complainant's sister and daughter arrived, followed by police.

A full and final non-contact FVIO was granted after this incident which the applicant breached by texting and calling the complainant. On one occasion though, the complainant visited the applicant at a motel room for about five minutes.

Judgment: The judge granted bail on the applicant's own undertaking with strict conditions (including he: provide a $3000 surety, reside at his parent's residence, abide by a curfew, comply with the FVIO, not contact any prosecution witness, not enter the suburb the complainant lives in, not consume alcohol or drugs), finding that the applicant had established that a compelling reason exists to justify the granting of bail, despite the offending being "serious and distasteful" [65]. The applicant argued that the following were compelling reasons to justify bail: the applicant's limited criminal history (he has only come before court twice); his first time in custody; weakness of the prosecution case (the complainant's credibility is likely to be successfully challenged); delay (one year on remand); implications of the COVID-19 pandemic (lockdowns and the possibility the virus could enter prisons); availability of stable accommodation with the applicant's parents; his ties to the jurisdiction, including his parents and children; $3000 surety from his mother; other conditions to reduce the magnitude of risk (for example, imposition of a curfew) [32].

His Honour noted that the applicant conceded that the offending was serious, finding that "the offending alleges multiple acts of family violence committed by a more powerful male upon a relatively vulnerable female who would have been entitled to look to him for protection, rather than physical violence and threatening conduct" [49] and that the applicant "flagrantly breached requirements" of the FVIO [50]. While his Honour did accept that the complainant's credit "will be subject to strong and justifiable attack", he found that the prosecution case could not be described as weak due to other things supporting the complainant's account [52]-[53].

His Honour further found that the applicant's criminal history included a finding of guilt for an assault upon a previous domestic partner and that the applicant had "deliberate and flagrant disregard" for previous grants of bail. As such, his Honour held that there was a "real concern as to [the applicant's] willingness to abide by conditions of bail" that might be imposed in the future [57]. Furthermore, his Honour noted the existence of the FVIO and that the complainant was very frightened of the applicant and dreaded his release on bail [60].

His Honour accepted that a full year on remand would be a significant period of time for a case which would remain in the summary stream [61] and that such a period would be particularly significant in light of the onerous conditions as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic [62]. Additionally, his Honour held that the applicant was likely to receive a sentence lower than the period of time he would spend on remand if not bailed [63]. In considering the "unacceptable risk" test, his Honour noted that there was a legitimate concern that the applicant would try to contact the complainant again, but that, since his arrest, the applicant had not attempted to contact the complainant and had not been violent towards her. His Honour considered that the risk posed by the applicant could be ameliorated with imposition of strict bail conditions.

Proceedings: Bail application.

Charges: attempted rape, sexual assault, persistent contravention of FVIO, making a threat to inflict serious injury x 3, false imprisonment, intentionally causing injury, common law assault.

Facts: The male applicant and female complainant had been married and had one daughter together but were separated at the time of the offending. A protection order was in place prohibiting the applicant from contacting the complainant or their daughter, or coming within 100m of them or 200m of their home.

The offences predominantly arose on one day. It was alleged the applicant first telephoned the complainant while she was at home with her son and threatened them, following which they left the house. When the complainant returned home later that day, the applicant was inside her house and grabbed her, punching her head and face, and later attempting to anally penetrate her. The following day he returned to her house and was further verbally abusive. The complainant reported the incident to the police.

The applicant denied all the allegations apart from having attended the complainant's residence on three occasions. At the time of the offending he was subject to a 12-month CCO following convictions for recklessly causing injury, contravening an FVIO, intentionally damaging property and failing to answer in relation to the same complainant.

Reasoning and decision: Lasry J had regard to the serious nature of the attempted rape offence, his view that the strength of the prosecution case was not compromised by his dependence on the complainant's evidence, the accused's criminal history and existence of the CCO at the time of the offending, the lack of evidence of the availability of treatment opportunities and his view that if bail were refused the applicant would not be likely to spend more time in custody than the likely sentence.

Exceptional circumstances were found to exist in the substantial delay of the trial of two and a half to three years, owing to the COVID-19 pandemic. However, Lasry J found that there was an unacceptable risk of reoffending and that this risk would not be sufficiently mitigated by imposing bail conditions. Given that the applicant had been subject to a CCO for similar offences at the time of the incident and a protection order had already been put in place seeking to protect the complainant, it was concluded that bail was not acceptable.

'Bail application' – 'Covid-19 pandemic' – 'Exceptional circumstances' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnancy of victim' – 'Protection order' – 'Separation' – 'Substance abuse' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Unacceptable risk' – 'Weapons'

Offences: Intentionally cause injury x 3; Common assault x 8; Making a threat to inflict serious injury x 2; Attempt to pervert the course of justice x 2; Being a prohibited person in possession of an imitation firearm x 2

Issues: Whether exceptional circumstances exist justifying the granting of bail; Whether there is an unacceptable risk that the applicant would reoffend or endanger the community if released.

Facts: The male applicant and female complainant were in a relationship from November 2017 until September 2018, during which there were a number of separations and reconciliations. From February 2018, there were numerous instances of violence by the applicant towards the complainant. These included: using a chain like a whip to hit the complainant; pushing her out of the car; splashing hot wax on her hair, face and arms; tasering her; hitting her on the back of the head; throwing drinking glasses at her; kicking her hard in the stomach when she was pregnant; burning her on her back with a blow torch; and hitting her with a metal pole. The applicant also made several threats towards the complainant, including: a threat to cut her hands off; threatening to kill her (while holding a gun); threatening to shoot different limbs; threatening her so that she would recant her testimony to police. The applicant's sister told the complainant that she had to tell police that she made up the allegations, and the complainant later made a statutory declaration to this effect. However, she maintained the allegations at the committal hearing and explained why she made the statutory declaration.

Judgment: The judge refused the bail application, holding that the applicant failed to establish exceptional circumstances existed that justified the granting of bail and even if this had been established, the risk posed by the applicant of reoffending or endangering the community if released would be unacceptable. The applicant relied on the following matters as proof of exceptional circumstances: delay (about two years from arrest until trial), onerous nature of remand due to the COVID-19 pandemic, weakness of the prosecution case, absence of any contact with the complainant while on bail, availability of support through CROP (a drug intervention program), family support and stable accommodation, modest criminal history (no convictions for violence), first time in custody, no pending matters other than the trial, and the applicant's medical condition [43]-[44].

His Honour found that the applicant did not challenge the proposition that the offending was serious, noting that "Whilst not anywhere near the higher end of the range of seriousness of offences of family violence, the alleged attacks by the applicant upon his then partner were repeated, nasty, and had some disturbing elements to them, including the use of weapons and the infliction of a kick to the abdomen of a pregnant woman" [58]. His Honour considered that the complainant was scared of the applicant and a FVIO was in place with her as a protected person [71].

His Honour also found that the prosecution case was not weak, the applicant's criminal history "reveal[ed] some signs of a lack of respect by the applicant for the orders of the court", and the applicant had already been imprisoned in the past for failing to answer bail. His Honour noted that the applicant's conduct in respect of bail "paint[ed] a picture of a person who is entirely unwilling to comply with the requirements of bail when they do not suit him" and that this was an important consideration when assessing exceptional circumstances

While his Honour accepted that the applicant had an extensive history of illicit drug use as a form of pain relief for an accident the applicant suffered eight years ago, his Honour held that it was completely unacceptable for the applicant to do this, particularly where the applicant knew this would breach his bail conditions [69]. Furthermore, his Honour held that the provision of family support was "not an important matter in the overall mix of circumstances in this case" where the applicant had family support in the past but still offended [70]. His Honour noted that the applicant was likely to spend 17 months on remand before trial, but that this "is not, on its own, or in combination with other factors, exceptional" [72]. In any event, any sentence imposed was likely to exceed this period anyway [73].

Offences: Rape x 2; Infliction of injury; Threats; Damaging property.

Proceedings: Bail application

Issue: Do exceptional circumstances exist justifying the grant of bail; does the applicant pass the unacceptable risk test.

Facts: The male applicant threatened to kill and physically harm his female ex-partner, MZ, on multiple occasions, including by pointing a firearm at her and threatening to throw acid in her face. Following an argument between the couple, the applicant punched MZ in the face and kicked her in the middle of her back, before pushing her on the bed, covering her face with a pillow and stating that he was going to rape her. He removed the pillow and grabbed MZ around the throat before raping her. The assault lasted several minutes before the applicant left MZ alone at his house. MZ reported the assault (but not the rape). When the applicant learnt of this, he threatened to kill MZ's family. A Family Violence Intervention Order ('FVIO') was issued to protect MZ.

The applicant also threatened to kill and physically harm another female ex-partner, SB, and her children, and frequently damaged her property. On a number of occasions, the applicant slapped, spat on, choked, scratched, pulled SB's hair and threw her to the ground. He also physically assaulted SB's 16-year-old daughter and one of SB's friends, and detained SB in her home on one occasion. SB ended the relationship, but the applicant continued to abuse her until he was remanded for other matters. After his release, the applicant attended SB's house, forced her onto her bed, threatened to kill her if she was ever with another guy, and raped her.

The applicant applied for bail twice in relation to the charges arising out of these events, but both applications were refused as the applicant failed to establish exceptional circumstances and there was an unacceptable risk of further offending.

Held: The judge refused to grant bail as the applicant failed to establish that exceptional circumstances existed justifying bail and if the applicant were released, there was a high risk that he would endanger the safety of the public, commit offences while on bail, interfere with witnesses and/or fail to answer bail. The applicant contended that various matters, when considered together, constituted exceptional circumstances. These included: delay (his trial was unlikely to occur until next year because of the COVID-19 pandemic and he already spent 252 days in custody); the onerous circumstances of his custody (he has been held in protection due to physical attacks upon him and receives no visitors due to COVID-19 restrictions); lack of strength of the prosecution case; his criminal history occurred in the context of drug use; he has used his time in custody well (by completing courses and maturing); the availability of stable residence, employment and family supports; and the availability of a surety of $500,000 [33].

His Honour held that the offending was very serious [47], the cases against the applicant were not weak [48], his criminal history (violence, dishonesty and weapons offences, breaches of FVIOs, failing to answer bail) rose questions as to his character and ability to abide by any court orders [49], he had previously been convicted for failing to answer bail [50], at the time of offending he was already subject to bail and CCOs [51], he was very unlikely to be willing and able to comply with any bail conditions [52], there were already several FVIOs against the applicant [53], the proposed living arrangements if he were to be released were unsatisfactory as the applicant has committed family violence against his mother and sister in the past (with whom it was proposed he should live) [54], there was no evidence he had taken major steps towards dealing with his drug issues [55], both victims were frightened of the applicant [56], and he would receive a much longer term of imprisonment if convicted for even one rape offence than he would on remand [57].

His Honour also noted the implications of the COVID-19 pandemic, but approved Re Tong [2020] VSC 141 in which the court held that the pandemic is "simply part of the surrounding circumstances required to be taken into account in a consideration" of steps in the bail process. His Honour therefore was "far from satisfied that the applicant … discharged the onus resting on him to establish the existence of exceptional circumstances" [59].

Even if the applicant had established exceptional circumstances, His Honour concluded that the risk of the applicant harming the victims and/or their families was so high that His Honour would have refused bail in any event [62].

Re Bertucci [2020] VSC 88 (2 March 2020) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Bail application' – 'Children present' – 'Contravention of protection orders' – 'History of domestic violence' – 'No exceptional circumstances' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Separation' – 'Uncharged acts'

Charges: Various offences, including contraventions of FVIO, recklessly causing injury, unlawful assault, failing to answer bail and committing an indictable offence on bail

Case type: Application for bail

Facts: On 19 April 2019, the applicant man was charged with contravention of a FVIO and persistent contravention of a FVIO ('the informant Sidorovska matter'). He was released on bail, however, after failing to appear in the Sunshine Magistrates' Court, an order was made forfeiting his bail and a further bench warrant was issued for his arrest. On 2 October 2019, the applicant was charged with recklessly causing injury, unlawful assault (x 2), contravention of a FVIO, failing to answer bail and committing an indictable offence on bail ('the informant McKay matter'). The applicant had been refused bail twice in the Sunshine Magistrates' Court in relation to both sets of charges.

The applicant and complainant woman were in a relationship and have 3 children together. At the time of the relevant alleged offending in the informant Sidorovska matter, the applicant and complainant were separated and a final no-contact FVIO was in place against the applicant, listing the complainant and the children as the affected family members. In relation to the informant McKay matter, the applicant allegedly assaulted the complainant woman by striking her to the leg with an implement, as well as to the head. This occurred in contravention of a FVIO and in close proximity to the children.

Issue: The issue for the Court was whether exceptional circumstances existed to justify bail and whether the previous history of family violence towards the complainant not resulting in findings of guilt should be taken into account.

Held: The Court refused bail as the applicant failed to discharge the onus to prove the existence of exceptional circumstances to justify his release on bail ([64]). In considering the submissions for a finding of exceptional circumstances, the Court found that:

- the decision on bail would not interfere long-term with the prospects of the family being reunited ([49]);
- allowing the applicant to live with the complainant and children would do nothing to mitigate the risk of reoffending as such a living environment was 'far-from stable' ([50]);
- the applicant's two-months of part-time employment leading up to the date of the contested hearing was relatively insignificant ([51]);
- the prosecution's case in respect of the two sets of charges was not weak ([52]);
- the multiple breaches of the intervention order indicated a deliberate disregard and lack of respect for the court order imposed to protect his partner and children from him ([53]); and
- striking a female with an implement cannot be described as trivial offending ([54]).

Although the applicant's criminal history was not lengthy, it was deemed highly significant. For example, he had previous convictions for persistent contravention of a FVIO, and had previously acted with violence towards another female partner, both of which resulted in imprisonment ([57]). This indicated that he had not been adequately deterred and showed a lack of regard for court-imposed sanctions and for the importance of bail ([63]). There had also been a number of alleged incidents of family violence towards the complainant, which did not result in findings of guilt. The Court considered these matters as relevant to whether the applicant posed a risk of future endangerment to the complainant and her children ([58]-[59]).

R v Eckersley* [2020] VSC 22 (30 January 2020) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Children exposed' – 'Controlling behaviour' – 'Domestic homicide' – 'Guilty plea' – 'Misuse of drugs and alcohol' – 'Mitigating circumstances' – 'Moral culpability significantly reduced by psychosis' – 'Murder' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Verdins principles'

Offences: Murder

Proceedings: Sentencing

Issue: Appropriate sentence

Facts: The male offender and female victim had been in a domestic relationship from 2001 until the victim was killed in July 2018. They had three children together. There was a history of controlling behaviour by the offender towards the victim. The offender's mental health had deteriorated in the lead up to the offence, with his GP recording that the offender was "struggling with depression due to a loss of income and employment, and that [he] had been self-medicating with alcohol and cannabis but had stopped consuming these substances" [9]. The GP did not observe any homicidal ideations or psychosis symptoms at the time.

The morning of the offence, the neighbours heard a large argument ensuing within the offender's home. The offender threw food and cleaning products into the rubbish and damaged items in the kitchen with a hammer before suddenly attacking the victim by punching her in the face. The victim fell to the ground and was kicked by the offender before he grabbed a knife and stabbed her in the head, neck, chest and upper body. The attack was witnessed by two of their children, one of whom unsuccessfully tried to stop the attack. The offender then proceeded to set fire to a near-by fabric couch and applied the lighter flame to the older daughter's shoulder. He then forced the children and family dog into a car and drove away. Police later found the offender and children unharmed.

The offender suffered from 'severe, acute and transient' drug-induced psychosis at the time of offending [62]. The offender's psychosis meant that his degree of moral culpability was of significant dispute.

Held: Eckersley was sentenced to 22 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 years.

The judge provided that ordinarily, "a drug-induced psychosis does not commonly result in the application of the Verdins principles and a mitigatory outcome" [88]. However, as the offender was prescribed the drug by his GP and was not aware that they could cause psychotic symptoms, the judge was satisfied of the offender's low moral culpability [92]. This lower culpability lessened denunciation and deterrence as sentencing factors, however the judge noted that this did not "take away from the fact that the killing of an intimate partner is an inherently terrible act" [108]. The judge also noted that while the murder did not occur in the context of a history of family violence, "the killing of an intimate partner is a most serious form of offending which must again be tragically emphasised by the Court" [112].

In sentencing Eckersley, Justice Champion considered the children witnessing the offence, the offender's destruction of the victim's body and fleeing the scene as aggravating factors. The unreasonable delay in sentencing was also accounted for.

Re Rodgers [No 2] [2019] VSC 760 (20 November 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'Delay' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: 33 offences, including strangulation

Case type: Bail application

Facts: The applicant was charged with 33 offences, 32 of which arose out of incidents alleged to have occurred over 3 days. The other charge involved the contravention of an undertaking given to the Magistrates' Court. The primary complainant was the applicant's wife, however, the alleged offending also involved the complainant's children. It was alleged, among other things, that the applicant grabbed the complainant's throat and pushed her head through a wall, while threatening her that he would 'drain' their bank account and take their daughters to the United States ([6]).

The applicant was refused bail in August 2019, and applied for bail again ([3]-[4]). The applicant contended that a compelling reason to justify a grant of bail could be established based on his personal and financial circumstances, the strength of the charges against him, the likely delay until determination of the charges, and the lawful sentencing range open to the sentencing court. He also submitted that, without being granted bail, he was likely to spend a significantly longer period of time on remand ([11]-[12]). On the issue of unacceptable risk, the respondent pointed to the applicant's 'history of contravention of court orders' and his addiction to illicit substances which appeared 'to be linked to his offending and violence against the complainant and [her] children' ([17]-[21]).

Issue: The issue for the Court was to determine whether a 'compelling reason' existed in favour of bail.

Held: The applicant was admitted to bail on strict conditions. In the Court's view, bail conditions, such as daily reporting to police, prohibition from approaching the vicinity of the complainant's residence and curfews, would sufficiently mitigate any risk posed by the applicant ([33]). The applicant was 33 years of age, and had a limited prior criminal history and no prior criminal history involving violence. He had no prior convictions for breaching court orders, however, he previously admitted to breaching a family violence order ([26]-[27]). The applicant ran a trucking business, which would likely suffer financially if he was not granted bail. Factors militating against the applicant included the seriousness of the allegations of strangulation and the fact that the complainant was afraid of him. Nevertheless, the Court found that the applicant had established a compelling reason to justify the grant of bail, given his lack of a negative bail history, the modesty of his criminal history, his personal and financial circumstances, the time already spent in custody, the period of any likely sentence and the material and recommendations in the CISP Remand Outreach Program (CROP) report ([30]).

The Queen v Karatzas* [2019] VSC 658 (26 September 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Depression' – 'Evidence' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Murder' – 'Past domestic violence' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Remorse' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Murder

Proceedings: Sentencing

Facts: The accused and victim were married. After an argument with the victim, the accused strangled her with an electrical extension cord until she collapsed and fled the scene. Expert evidence that the accused was suffering from a major depressive episode at the time of the offence 'which may have clouded [his] thought processes and [his] appreciation of the consequences of [his] actions' [24] was accepted at trial along with evidence that the accused loved his wife and had been violent to her before.

Issues: Appropriate sentence

Decision and reasoning: The accused was sentenced to 16 years' imprisonment with a fixed non-parole period of 11 years.

The court accepted that the fact the accused was suffering from a major depressive episode significantly reduced the accused's moral culpability [24]. Beale J said '[d]omestic violence murders are often upper range examples of the offence of murder, particularly where there has been a history of domestic violence. This is not your case. The fact that you killed your wife of nearly 50 years was a gross breach of trust which elevates the seriousness of your offending but, having regard to all circumstances, and particularly your mental illness, I find that yours is a mid-range example of the offence of murder' [25]. The other mitigating factors considered by his Honour include the accused's: remorse; previous good character; excellent prospects of rehabilitation; age; and 'the punishment [the accused will] continue to experience knowing you killed your beloved wife' as other mitigating circumstances [54].

The Queen v Bufton* [2019] VSC 621 (13 September 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Controlling, possessive, jealous behaviour' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Lack of remorse' – 'Murder' – 'Protection order' – 'Separation'

Charge: Murder

Proceedings: Sentencing

Facts: The female offender was found guilty following trial of the murder of her male domestic partner, her various offers of a guilty plea to negligent manslaughter, then dangerous driving causing death (following the death of the sole living witness to the offence), and then again negligent manslaughter having been rejected. The pleas offered appeared to relate to the Crown's perceived prospects of proving their case with the evidential difficulties occasioned by the death of the witness.

The offender and victim had a turbulent relationship involving many arguments and periods of separation from January 2016 until his death in October 2017. The victim was attempting to remove his caravan from the offender's property when the offender became verbally abusive and refused to let the victim move it. The victim walked away to call police for assistance but was followed by the victim in her car and struck by the vehicle. The call to 000 remain connected during the accident and picked up the ensuing conversation between the offender and a witness in which the offender claimed that the victim jumped in front of her car and she was unable to avoid him. This false story was later repeated to police.

The offender was 68 years of age and had no prior criminal convictions. She had been diagnosed with cancer. She was subject to an intervention order prohibiting the commission of family violence against the victim at the time of offending.

Held: Bufton was sentenced to 24 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 years.

The Court treated this protection order as an aggravating feature along with the use of a dangerous weapon and noted that the 'crime occurred in the context of [Bufton] having been in a domestic relationship with [the victim], and of [Bufton] having acted out of anger and frustration at the state of the relationship [36]. Her persistence in the false account of events and the fluctuating pleas were considered to be indicative of a lack of contrition or remorse[46-52]. Assistance rendered by the offender to the accused was conduct which could be explained by the crime being carried out in full view of the witness[53]. The judge said at [52]:

> "For completeness, I make it clear that you are not to be punished for your refusal to admit what you had actually done, or for pleading not guilty to murder. Rather, these facts point to the absence of a possible mitigating feature of your crime which would have existed were you to have been willing to accept the true criminality of your conduct."

Just punishment, denunciation and general deterrence were treated as the most important sentencing purposes, with the significance of specific deterrence being reduced in light of Bufton's age and cancer diagnosis.

'Bail' – 'Children' – 'Intervention order' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Charges: Multiple charges of causing injury intentionally and recklessly, a charge of recklessly causing serious injury, charges of reckless conduct endangering life and endangering person, a charge of making a threat to kill, drugs charges, a charge of criminal damage, and numerous breaches of Family Violence Intervention Orders (FVIO)

Case type: Bail application

Facts: The applicant applied for bail on a number of charges, which arose out of family violence related incidents. The complainants include his former wife and children.

Issue: The issue for the Court was to determine whether a 'compelling reason' existed in favour of bail.

Held: The Court refused the bail application as there would be an unacceptable risk that the applicant would endanger the safety and welfare of the complainant and her children, or commit further offences while on bail ([65]). The nature and seriousness of the offending was considered to be the most important matter for the Court. Tinney J described the offending as 'quite disturbing, with a significant and worrying risk of causing serious injury or death' ([51]). Some of the alleged violence occurred in the presence of one or more of the children, and occurred in the family home ([54]). Although the applicant's criminal history was limited, he had been found guilty of assaulting the complainant in the past. Further, he was on an adjourned bond for that assault ([56]), and was also subject to a FVIO at the time of the alleged offending ([57]).

There were many personal circumstances favourable to the applicant. For example, he had a supportive family and was the operator of a company which, in his absence, struggled financially ([58]). According to Tinney J, the applicant's prolonged drug use had a significant impact on the alleged offending, and would increase the risk of failure to comply with his bail conditions ([59]). The complainant's attitude to bail was also a relevant consideration. She was afraid of the applicant and did not want him to be released on bail ([60]). His Honour concluded that there were sufficiently compelling reasons to deny the applicant a grant of bail ([63]).

Additional matters of concern included ([64]):

- The applicant allegedly repeatedly and violently assaulted his wife;
- The offending allegedly occurred in the context of ongoing drug use by both the applicant and the complainant;
- The offending occurred despite there being an intervention order in place and the fact that he was subject to an adjourned bond for a previous assault on the complainant; and
- If bail was granted, the conditions imposed on the applicant would not have sufficiently reduced the risks to a level where they would be acceptable.

Note: An appeal against this decision to refuse bail was rejected by the Victorian Court of Appeal - Rodgers v The Queen [2019] VSCA 214 (26 September 2019)

The Queen v Solmaz* [2019] VSC 530 (12 August 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Arranged marriage' – 'Denunciation' – 'Domestic violence' – 'Expert evidence' – 'Lack of remorse' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charges: 1 x murder

Case type: Sentence

Facts: The offender pleaded guilty (shortly before the trial was due to commence) to the murder of his former wife, with whom he entered into an arranged marriage when he was 18 years of age. They had 2 children. The murder occurred in the context of an unhappy relationship which had subsisted for many years leading up to her death. The offender claimed that the deceased attacked him with a broken leg of a table and that he took the piece of wood from her and hit her repeatedly. He then used an extension lead to strangle her ([10]).

In the aftermath, the offender left the deceased dead on the floor and went to his step-sister's home where he confessed to the killing. He then fled Melbourne, and was intercepted by Queensland police two days after the killing.

Issue: The issue for the Court was to determine the appropriate sentence for the offence.

Held: The Court sentenced the offender to 25 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 20 years. The offender was 60 years of age and was born in Bulgaria. He had one prior conviction of unlawful assault, but this had limited significance to his case ([33]). Medical evidence indicated that he was diagnosed with Adjustment Disorder, and was likely depressed at the time of the deceased's death. One expert considered that his Adjustment Disorder contributed to his offending by diminishing his ability to reason and make sound judgment ([45]). The Court, however, noted several deficiencies in this expert's evidence, such as the fact that he heavily relied on the truthfulness of the offender's account to him about his relationship with the deceased and that it conflicted with other expert evidence ([86]-[94]). Consequently, the Court did not accept this expert evidence and rejected the defence's submissions in respect of the Verdins principles to reduce the sentence, other than for the purpose of the hardship of imprisonment ([95], [99]). According to the Court, the offender's conduct could not be connected to any defect in his reasoning abilities or be characterised as an impulsive crime. He inflicted multiple, forceful blows to the deceased. The 'shocking and protracted nature of the crime' indicated that any impairment to mental functioning was not causally connected to the offending, and that he intended to kill her ([96]-[97]). The crime was described as one of 'extravagant and drawn-out violence committed against a physically weaker person whom [the offender] apparently detested and who had offered some provocation to [him] by striking [him] with the leg of the table' ([97]).

While the offending was not premeditated, the Court considered it to be at the high end of the range of seriousness. The crime was an extreme overreaction to modest provocation by the deceased and the challenges of their 'sad and troubled relationship' ([102]). The Court also found that the offender had not exhibited true remorse ([111]). His prospects of rehabilitation, however, were found to be good ([117]).

Relevant sentencing principles included just punishment, denunciation and general deterrence. The Court found it necessary to make 'perfectly clear' that it deplores violent crimes of this nature, particularly those committed against domestic partners. The deceased's life was 'precious', and was brutally and deliberately taken away by the offender as a result of his anger, resentment and frustration. He had full knowledge of the severity and criminality of his actions ([121]-[122]).

R v Stone* [2019] VSC 452 (12 July 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Exposing children' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'History of abuse' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentence' – 'Separation'

Offences: Murder

Proceedings: Sentencing

Issue: Appropriate sentence

Facts: The male victim and female offender (Stone) had been married for 22-years and had five children together. Evidence tendered during trial was that the male victim had reported an incident of the offender chasing him from the house with a knife. Neighbours also reported sounds of arguing and physical violence coming from the home prior to the incident that lead to the victim's death. There was evidence that the victim told members of his extended family that he intended to leave the relationship the day of the incident that lead to his death.

The Crown case was that Stone doused the victim with highly flammable enamel thinner and set him on fire. While none of the children saw the victim committing the offence, one of the daughters saw their father engulfed in flames and heard him say that he was going to die. Another daughter saw the trail of debris left by the victim as he ran to the bathroom after being set alight.

The victim was found conscious by paramedics despite sustaining burns to 95% of his body, including his airways. He was placed on life-support and interviewed but did not recover. Both the victim and Stone gave false versions of the events, claiming that the victim had been attacked by three men. Stone provided the names of the alleged offenders but failed to identify them during police interviews and was subsequently arrested herself.

Held: The accused was sentenced to 34 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 28 years. The Court provided that murder is "the ultimate act of family violence", with the offender's 'vicious and barbarous' conduct constituting a "a violation of the security of the sanctity of the home and a massive breach of trust" [32]. With the offender's conduct being 'a most serious example of murder', the Court found the objective gravity of the offence and offender's moral culpability to be 'extremely high'. As such, denunciation and deterrence were the primary sentencing considerations along with protection of the community [42].

Note: Subsequent applications for leave to appeal against conviction (on grounds that the trial judge erred in finding the applicant's alleged lies were reasonably capable of amounting to 'incriminating conduct'; (2) the verdict was unsafe and unsatisfactory or cannot be supported having regard to the evidence; and (3) a substantial miscarriage of justice occurred because of the failure of the prosecution to disclose telephone records); and sentence on the ground that the sentence was manifestly excessive were dismissed: Stone v The Queen [2021] VSCA 186 (24 June 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal.

'History of family violence' – 'Murder of parent' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Sentencing' – 'Verdins'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The offender pleaded guilty to the murder of his mother. The case raises important community issues and the connection between drugs, mental health and family violence. The evidence showed that the offender and his mother had significant mental health issues, which strained their relationship and ultimately led him to stab her to death ([2]). The offender admitted to killing his mother to police, and made further admissions to his father and former partner. Lasry J described the murder as 'grave and tragic'. The victim was vulnerable and defenceless in the face of the attack, and her death was the culmination of a lengthy history of hostility and family violence between them ([17]).

Issue: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offence in the circumstances.

Held: Lasry J noted the offender's personal circumstances at [21]-[25], and the issue of mental health and substance abuse at [26]-[33]. He started using drugs as a teenager, however remained drug free for several years. His deteriorating mental health and increasing drug use led to the breakdown of his relationship with his former partner and the loss of his job. The offender had also been diagnosed with Delusional Disorder and subject to various treatment orders. A forensic psychiatrist gave evidence of the offender's long history of major mental disorder and substance misuse, but noted that he had no history of being violent or anti-social other than when he was psychotic or affected by drugs. The offender also suffered from paranoid schizophrenia which was likely precipitated by his cannabis use and aggravated by his methamphetamine use.

The offender pleaded guilty at a relatively early stage of the proceedings. An element of remorse was identified in his post-offence conduct; however his Honour noted that the offender's hostility towards his mother had not completely abated ([41]-[43]).

Further, the offender had no criminal history and made efforts to improve himself while in custody through education and work opportunities. Lasry J was satisfied that there was some evidence that he was capable of leading a law-abiding and productive life, and that his prospects of rehabilitation depended on his compliance with treatment for his mental health and substance misuse ([44]-[45]).

Lasry J was satisfied that the principles arising from Verdins meant that the offender's moral culpability was significantly reduced. Community protection was not a significant sentencing consideration provided that his serious mental health issues were properly managed ([53]). The offender was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 14 years.

R v Considine & Anor* [2019] VSC 386 (31 May 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'History of abuse of accused' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The offender pleaded guilty to murdering the victim. The offender's partner of around 9 years, Hogan, pleaded guilty to assisting him. The relationship between the offenders involved homelessness, drug use and domestic violence. In 2015, while the offender, Considine, was serving a term of imprisonment, Hogan and the victim met on Facebook and commenced an intimate relationship. When the offender was released from prison, Hogan and the victim ended their relationship, but resumed social media communication in 2017. The offender, Considine, became aware of this relationship. Considine and Hogan arranged a threesome with the victim. The offender became jealous of the sexual activity between Ms Hogan and the victim, and strangled the victim to death. Ms Hogan assisted the offender to dispose of the body.

Issue: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offence in the circumstances.

Held: The offender, Considine, began consuming alcohol and taking drugs as a teenager. A forensic psychiatrist diagnosed the offender with Borderline Personality Disorder and believed that he likely had an acquired brain injury (ABI). He therefore concluded that it was likely the offender was experiencing severely impaired impulse control at the time of the offending due to his intoxication with multiple substances and Borderline Personality Disorder and probable ABI ([49]). Champion J accepted this opinion at [71]. The offender also had an extensive criminal history, however very few of his convictions involved violence ([52]). The offender's moral culpability was reduced by various factors, including his intellectual impairment and personality disorder ([71]). The offender's guilty plea showed a willingness to accept responsibility for the victim's death and spared the victim's family and friends from the traumatic effects of a contested trial ([73]). His Honour also accepted that the offender was remorseful for having killed the victim, even though this took some time to develop ([76]). The offender was sentenced to 21 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 16 years ([115]).

Ms Hogan also commenced using drugs at an early age and had a minor criminal history ([56]-[57]). It was submitted that her role in the offending could not be separated from the nature of her relationship with the offender which was 'marred by domestic violence, control and drug use'. It was also submitted that these circumstances reduced her culpability ([86]). Champion J considered that her experience of domestic violence was a factor relevant to the establishment of her state of mind, and mitigated the circumstances of her offending to some extent ([90]). She also decided to cooperate with the police and offered to plead guilty at an early stage ([94]). His Honour accepted that she was genuinely remorseful for the victim's death ([96]). Ms Hogan was sentenced to one year and 10 months' imprisonment ([118]).

'Children' – 'Imprisonment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suicide pact'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Sentencing.

Facts: The accused '[inflicted] his will on a woman [the deceased] by the use of fatal violence in her home'. They had maintained a relationship over several years, which ended as a result of her family's disapproval. The deceased later remarried and had a child. The accused and the deceased later re-established their relationship, but it was 'marked by periods of instability' [8]. In 2017, the deceased became engaged to another man. On 13 July 2017, the accused visited the deceased's residence, where they 'apparently had a sexual encounter' while her child was asleep [10]. The accused killed the deceased by holding her underwater in a bath. The accused then removed her body from the bath, partially dressed her in clothes, and placed the body in his car. He drove the deceased's body from Melbourne to South Australia, as he intended to deposit it in the ocean. He also purchased 2 knives and inflicted superficial incisions to his wrist. The accused decided to return to Melbourne where he deposited the body in the garage of an unoccupied property that he had previously leased. He confessed to killing the deceased to his friends and family, but said that she had told him to kill her and that he had tried to kill himself. At the police station, the accused gave conflicting evidence on his feelings about the deceased's relationships with other men.

Issue: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offence in the circumstances.

Held: Lasry J inferred that the appellant's self-inflicted injuries were not a genuine attempt to suicide, but a means of explaining his involvement in the killing by reference to a 'suicide pact' ([14]). By reference to Ron Felicite v The Queen [2011] VSCA 274, his Honour noted that the seriousness of the offending required the imposition of significant punishment ([27]). It represented the accused's endeavour, through the use of fatal violence, to control the deceased, and to overpower her rejection of their relationship ([23]). Relevant sentencing principles included general deterrence, denunciation and just punishment. His Honour also noted aggravating circumstances, including the fact that the killing occurred in the deceased's home while her child was asleep in the nearby room, and that he abandoned the child when he drove off with the deceased's body ([26]).

Lasry J also considered the peculiarity of the accused's guilty plea. It was given in circumstances which made it difficult for his Honour to determine whether it was a sign of genuine remorse over the deceased's death. The accused would have derived a greater benefit had he pleaded guilty at an earlier time ([31]-[34]). Personal circumstances of the accused were also considered. He was born in Turkey, raised in an environment of domestic violence, lived in foster homes, did not receive any formal education in Australia, maintained employment since the age of 18, and had no prior convictions for violence ([35]-[37]). The accused's steady employment throughout his adulthood and lack of prior criminal convictions indicated positive rehabilitation prospects ([38]). The sentence was also determined in light of victim impact statements ([28]-[30]).

His Honour sentenced the accused to 23 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 years ([42]). He allowed some discount for the accused's guilty plea. As his Honour was not satisfied that the accused's guilty plea reflected significant remorse or acceptance of responsibility for his conduct, only a small discount was made ([44]).

DPP v Jensen* [2019] VSC 327 (17 May 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Attempted murder' – 'Binge drinking' – 'Intentionally causing serious injury' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Attempted murder x 2; intentionally causing serious injury x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The offender had maintained an incestuous relationship with his sister since he was 17 years old, and they have a child together. While they were still living together, but after their relationship ended, his sister began an intimate relationship with the first victim. The offender, while intoxicated, entered the first victim's house which he shared with his mother. The offender found the first victim and his sister asleep in bed together, and stabbed them both repeatedly and also stabbed the first victim's mother who intervened. The offender pleaded guilty to 3 offences: the attempted murder of the first victim (charge 1) and his own sister (charge 2), and intentionally causing serious injury to the first victim's mother (charge 3).

Issue: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offences in the circumstances.

Held: Beale J sentenced the offender to 19 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 14 years. The offender was sentenced as a Serious Violent Offender on charges 2 and 3 pursuant to the Sentencing Act 1991.

Notwithstanding the offender's relative youth, good work history, limited prior convictions and guilty plea, his Honour could not accept the submission that the offender had good prospects of rehabilitation. The violence was extreme and sustained, and the offender had a history of binge drinking. Even though his intimate relationship with his sister had ended, his ability to cope with any future relationship difficulties and to control his drinking was uncertain ([48]).

The offender's personal history is discussed at [29]-[41]. He was born in the Cook Islands and raised by his grandparents after his parents abandoned him as an infant. He moved to Australia in 2009 with his parents and his sister. Beale J noted the possibility that he would be deported from Australia at the end of his sentence. This was a relevant factor in determining the sentence ([52]).

The mitigating factors of the case were summarised at [56]-[64]. The offender had a difficult childhood which partly caused him to develop an incestuous relationship with his sister. A lack of parental supervision when they were teenagers was also found to be a contributing factor. The offender pleaded guilty at a relatively early stage, showed remorse, is relatively young, and has a limited criminal history and no violent antecedents.

Aggravating circumstances, noted at [65]-[70], were that the offending involved a 'terrifying' home invasion; the attack with knives was not momentary, but sustained; the offending against his sister was an instance of domestic violence given their long-term incestuous relationship; the injuries inflicted on his sister and the first victim were life-threatening; and the offender had a prior conviction for incest, which clearly did not lead him to end his intimate relationship with his sister.

A useful table of summaries of various sentencing cases in respect of attempted murder is also annexed to the judgment. In addition to these cases, his Honour also had regard to the Judicial College of Victoria Sentencing Manual's attempted murder case collection and the Court of Appeal overview regarding intentionally causing serious injury ([54]).

DPP v Gibson* [2019] VSC 328 (16 May 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Dementia' – 'Guilty plea' – 'Life expectancy' – 'Murder' – 'No prior convictions' – 'People with mental illness'

Charges: 1 x murder

Case type: Sentencing

Facts: The accused pleaded guilty to the murder of his wife to whom he had been married for 44 years. The accused was 65 years old and had retired. He had four children with the victim, as well as grandchildren. The accused regarded his relationship with the victim as having 'broken down'. He shot her twice in the head and then attempted to kill himself. The accused's sister and their grandson were present at the time of the offending.

Issue: The issue for the Court was to determine the appropriate sentence for the offence.

Held: To determine the appropriate sentence, Coghlan JA took into account the accused's personal circumstances. He suffered from depression and anxiety since he was a teenager ([27]). He had stopped working a few years prior to the offending, and experienced financial difficulties ([28]). He was resentful of the amount of time his wife was spending with her parents ([6]), and over time, he started to scrutinise her spending habits, including the cost of caring for their grandchildren and her parents ([29]). Further, the accused and victim had made significant contributions to their local community ([30]-[31]).

The accused's mental health was a major consideration for the Court. There was medical evidence indicating that he suffered recurrent depressive disorder of moderate severity ([38]), and that aspects of his processing speed, working memory, complex new learning skills, executive and language skills, and impulse control had deteriorated ([40]). There were suggestions by medical professionals that he might have suffered from either frontotemporal dementia or Alzheimer's related dementia. Another expert suggested that his frontal lobe might have been damaged as a result of his attempted suicide ([43]). It was important to determine the precise cause of the brain damage as his life expectancy differed depending on his diagnosis ([45]). His Honour sentenced the accused on the basis that he had been diagnosed with frontotemporal dementia, which had a life expectancy of 8 years ([51]). This diagnosis affected the weight to be attributed to sentencing principles, such as just punishment, denunciation and deterrence ([52]). As a result of the accused's 'complex medical condition', there was a significant delay in sentencing ([2]), which was also taken into account ([3]).

Coghlan JA was satisfied that the accused's mental condition would render his prison sentence more onerous than it would for a prisoner without his condition ([54]), and that his moral culpability and the need for denunciation, general and specific deterrence were reduced ([53]). The accused pleaded guilty, had no prior convictions and was found to have led a 'worthwhile and…blameless life' ([56]). Taking into account all relevant matters, the accused was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 10 years.

R v Eustace* [2019] VSC 189 (26 March 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Factors affecting risk' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The offender and victim met while visiting Australia from India, and eventually married. Three months later, the offender killed the victim in a knife attack in their shared home ([3]). On the night of the murder, the offender and victim argued, which ultimately resulted in the offender obtaining a knife and stabbing the victim ([9]-[14]). She suffered 12 wounds to her chest, abdomen, arm and leg. The offender's actions were described as 'sustained, purposeful and ruthlessly determined'. Even after the offender was restrained in a head lock and dragged from the bedroom by a man with whom they lived, he returned to the room to resume the attack ([15]).

Issues: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offence of murder in the circumstances.

Decision and reasoning: Taylor J took into account the offender's personal circumstances at [26]-[31]. He was 43 at the time of the offending and his work history showed him to be 'a man of industry' ([29]). However, his father was an aggressive alcoholic ([28]). Prior to meeting the victim, he had been in two significant relationships, one of which was an arranged marriage ([31]).

The offending was found to be 'self-evidently extremely serious', as the killing of a domestic partner violates a fundamental principle underpinning society, namely, that all persons have the right to safety, respect and trust in intimate relationships. Whether or not the marriage was one of convenience, his Honour noted that the offender had voluntarily entered into a relationship in which he owed the victim kindness and safety. Rather, the offender betrayed her trust and the expectation that, even where issues in family relationships arise, violence is not tolerated. Even if the offender was fearful, angry, intoxicated or frustrated, he should have just walked away ([33]). Women should not fear or suffer physical harm because their partner loses their temper. The offender's actions were found to be at the extreme end of the scale of 'abominable acts' ([34]). Aggravating circumstances included the fact that the victim was his wife, that she was murdered in their home, that a knife was used, and that despite the number of wounds already inflicted, the offender continued his attack, even after being physically restrained by another person ([35]-[36]). The public has an interest in matters involving family violence. Principles of general deterrence, denunciation and just punishment are relevant to sentencing ([35]). The objective gravity of the offending and the moral culpability of the offender was also found to be very high ([38]).

The offender pleaded guilty after the committal hearing, demonstrating a willingness to facilitate the course of justice ([39]). He also surrendered himself to the police station and admitted the killing. His remorse was further expressed in a letter of apology to the victim's family ([40]).

Taylor J sentenced the offender to 25 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 20 years ([46]). After the expiry of his sentence, it was noted that the offender would be deported to India. Knowledge of this deportation was said to make imprisonment more burdensome ([41]). Taylor J also noted that the offender would be isolated in custody ([42]). The offender's prospects for rehabilitation were found to be good, as a result of some positive references indicating his good character and hardworking nature ([43]).

DPP v Ristevski (Ruling No 1)* [2019] VSC 165 (15 March 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Children' – 'Evidence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Post-offence conduct'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Ruling as to evidence.

Facts: The prosecution alleged that the accused killed the deceased at their home on the morning of 29 June 2016, put her body in the boot of her car and drove it to Macedon Regional Park where he concealed it between 2 logs in a forest. It was discovered approximately 8 months later. The accused and deceased had been married for over 20 years and had a daughter. There was no prior history of physical violence on the part of the accused. However, he admitted to pushing the deceased on occasions if she 'got in his face' during arguments ([34]). The prosecution conceded that the evidence at most supported an inference that their financial difficulty was significant and may have fuelled an argument between them ([24]).

Issue: Whether the prosecution was entitled to rely on evidence of post-offence conduct to prove not only an unlawful killing but also murderous intent.

Held: Beale J noted some similarities with R v Baden-Clay [2016] HCA 35. However his Honour found that the differences between the two cases were 'more striking'. At [37], his Honour stated -

> 'First, there was compelling evidence of a motive for Baden-Clay to kill his wife – a desire to be rid of her so he could be with his lover. Second, the post-offence conduct in that case included lies and other conduct directed at concealing his ongoing extra-marital affair. In other words, the post-offence conduct was intertwined with his motive to kill and thus it is easy to see how the High Court, viewing the post-offence conduct on the basis of the evidence as a whole, reached the conclusion that it did.'

In the present case, the prosecution submitted that the accused's post-offence conduct was inconsistent with his having unintentionally killed the deceased, as one would expect him to report the incident, and not bundle her body into the boot of a car, drive to a remote location, conceal the body and lie about the circumstances of her disappearance to family, friends and investigators ([35]). Counsel for the accused submitted that he could well have feared that the unlawful killing of the deceased would attract a substantial prison term and cause permanent damage to his relationship with his daughter ([36]). Beale J found that those submissions made it difficult to see how a jury could properly find that the only reasonable explanation for the post-offence conduct was that the accused was conscious of having killed his wife with murderous intent ([36]).

Beale J held that while the evidence of post-offence conduct referred to in the prosecution's amended Notice of Incriminating Conduct could be relied on as evidence that the accused killed his wife, it could not be relied on to prove that the accused did so with murderous intent ([31]–[39]).

R v Robertson* [2019] VSC 145 (6 March 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Factors affecting risk' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Social abuse' – 'Technology facilitated abuse'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The defendant pleaded guilty to murder of his partner (the deceased) with whom he fathered a daughter. After their daughter's birth, their relationship became strained. The defendant resented the deceased's change of employment and her being around other men. He became jealous and constantly concerned about possible infidelity. The deceased's behaviour became more obsessive and paranoid. He even set up a fake Facebook and Instagram account to contact the deceased's work colleagues under the fake name to establish if anything was happening between the deceased and her male colleagues ([3]-[11]). After a heated argument in which the deceased expressed her desire to end the relationship, the defendant picked up a dumbbell bar and hit her multiple times to her face and head. The blows, forceful and vicious, killed her immediately. After committing the offence, the deceased rang his mother and admitted to his actions. His mother rang the police ([12]-[19]).

Issues: The Court determined the appropriate sentence for the offence of murder in the circumstances.

Decision and reasoning: Champion J sentenced the defendant to 24 years' imprisonment, taking into account general and specific deterrence, denunciation, rehabilitation and protection of the community. His Honour considered the defendant's personal circumstances at [39]-43]. The defendant grew up in a close, supportive and loving family. Through his job he was able to buy a home for himself, thus demonstrating his independence and self-sufficiency. Friends and family observed that he became agitated and alienated after his daughter was born.

Champion J did not accept a complete lack of premeditation even though the defendant committed the offence in a highly emotional state. The 'savagery' of the assault affected the sentencing. The act in question was terrible and grossly violent. It was not fleeting and involved multiple deliberate blows to the face and head. His Honour noted the defendant's intention to kill. An aggravating feature was the fact that she was his intimate partner ([65]-[66]). Champion J therefore concluded that his offending was a grave example of murder and above the middle range of seriousness ([67]). However, it was noted that the extreme violence was out of character as there was no evidence of previous domestic violence incidents ([90]).

Champion J discussed his culpability and degree of responsibility at [68]-[73]. The offending occurred in the context of the defendant being extremely jealous, possessive and controlling. At [73] Champion J stated: 'I note that these features of jealousy, the need to possess, and uncontrollable rage associated with extreme violence emerge too frequently in cases of the murder of an intimate female partner.' The attack was described as grievously inappropriate and a wildly disproportionate response to the situation. Therefore, his culpability and degree of responsibility was within the higher range. A mitigating factor was the fact that the defendant admitted to killing the deceased very soon after the act, and thus his Honour found that it he should receive the full benefit of that early plea as it facilitated the course of justice and relieved the deceased's family and friends from having to give evidence and endure the trauma of a trial ([76]). With these factors in mind, his Honour accepted that the defendant has positive prospects of rehabilitation.

'Firearm' – 'Guilty plea' – 'Misuse of alcohol' – 'Physical harm and violence' – 'Sentencing' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Manslaughter

Proceedings: Sentencing

Facts: Before moving to Australia from America, the victim sent four packages containing firearms to the accused's parents' address in Australia. Three of these packages were intercepted by the Australian Border Force. 'The [female] victim and [male] accused were charged with the importation and possession of firearms and were bailed' [10]. They decided to 'go on the run', packing their belongings and purchasing a caravan to escape in. Arrest warrants were issued after the pair failed to appear in court, but they managed to evade the police [11].

The couple lived in the caravan for a couple of weeks prior to the incident. On the night of the shooting, both the accused and the victim were intoxicated and were arguing. The accused physically assaulted the victim during the argument while the victim was in possession of the loaded firearm. The two struggled for the weapon, with the accused eventually gaining possession and deliberately pulling the trigger. The accused did not aim the weapon or deliberately shoot the victim, although 'there is no suggestion the firearm was defective in anyway' [17].

The accused later pleaded guilty to manslaughter.

Issue: The issue for the Court was to determine the appropriate sentence for the offence.

Decision and reasoning: The accused was sentenced to 11 years' imprisonment with a fixed non-parole period of 8 years. Relevantly, the sentencing judge observed at [48]:

The sentence I pass must make it perfectly clear that the Court deplores the use of firearms, all the more so against women in a setting of domestic violence…… The sentence of this Court should bring it clearly home to any person in our community who might be minded to inflict violence of any sort against a domestic partner, particularly with the use of a weapon, that such conduct will be met with strong punishment.

DPP v Freeburn* [2018] VSC 616 (14 December 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Imprisonment' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Women'

Charges: Murder x 1

Facts: The offender met the deceased, a 29 year old woman with a mild intellectual disability, on an internet dating site. The deceased was particularly vulnerable as she was guarded about her relationships and sometimes did not inform her family as to her whereabouts. Her parents obtained a guardianship order at VCAT because of their concern that she was unable to protect her own interests. The deceased had told her family and friends of the offender's violent behaviour towards her. The offender often exhibited jealousy, anger and verbal aggression when the deceased interacted with other men. The deceased's body was found in the offender's room three days after she was reported missing, with restraint marks on her wrists, bruising to her face and upper body, and a 'tram track' mark on her back. She also sustained brain injuries, indicating multiple blows to the head. Her wrists were bound and her neck and face were wrapped in tape. An autopsy revealed that she consumed the drug GHB prior to her death. It was entirely plausible that the deceased was alive, albeit unconscious, when the offender left the premises.

Issues: Sentencing

Decision and Reasoning: The offender was found guilty of murder and sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 20 years. The jury rejected the offender's defence that the deceased's death was caused solely by her consumption of GHB. At the time of the incident, the offender regularly abused drugs, and suffered from personalty disorder and long-term anger management problems which may have affected his judgment and ability to make calm and rational decisions ([24]). The deceased was also in a particularly vulnerable position due to her intellectual disability. His Honour considered the offender's personal circumstances which included his parent's separation, his upbringing which was characterised by substance abuse and family violence, his experience in several foster placements in which he exhibited violent behaviour, and his diagnoses of ADHD, oppositional defiant disorder and conduct disorder. His involvement in the criminal justice system began when he was a minor, and his violent offending included numerous convictions of assault. Given his history of mental health problems and violent prison incidents, his Honour accepted that he should remain in conditions more restrictive than those of other prisoners.

Re Mongan* [2018] VSC 638 (24 October 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'Breach' – 'Children' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'People with children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Unacceptable risk and best interests'

Charges: Charges including false imprisonment, recklessly causing injury, unlawful assault, aggravated burglary, theft and threat to kill.

Proceeding type: Bail application.

Facts: The applicant and complainant were married for 13 years and have three children. The complainant claimed that the marriage ended because of the applicant's controlling and intimidating behaviour. From the time of the separation, a series of interim and final Family Violence Intervention Orders (FVIOs) were in place restraining the applicant from contacting the complainant. The applicant breached many of the FVIOs. It was alleged that the applicant, armed with items intended to incapacitate the complainant, unlawfully entered her premises, interfered with a CCTV camera which might have recorded his subsequent conduct, and then waited for her. He grabbed her from behind, forced her to the ground, sought to bind her wrists and gag her, pushed her into her own home, and again forced her to the ground, binding her ankles. He threatened her in a graphically and frightening manner whilst she was bound and helpless. The children returned home from school and heard the complainant screaming. The complainant eventually escaped ([46]). The applicant submitted that a combination of a number of matters demonstrated a compelling reason that justified a grant of bail (see [34]).

Issues: Whether bail should be granted; Whether there was a compelling reason why the applicant's detention in custody was not justified; Whether the applicant presented an unacceptable risk of committing further offences, endangering the safety or welfare of the complainant and interfering with witnesses.

Decision and reasoning: Section 4AA of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic) sets out circumstances in which a two-step test applies to the consideration of a grant of bail. Step 1 requires the existence of exceptional circumstances and compelling reasons. Step 2 mandates that the Court must apply the unacceptance risk test. In considering whether or not the applicant established compelling reasons that justified the grant of bail, the Court must take into account the surrounding circumstances (see s 4C and s 3AAA of the Act). The Court was required to assess 'the nature and seriousness of the alleged offending, including whether it is a serious example of the offence' (see s 3AAA(1)(a)).

There was no question that the offending alleged was serious. It was pre-meditated and involved the use of equipment to incapacitate the complainant. Only the escape of the complainant prevented a continuation of the offending. The Court found that the applicant's lawyer's reliance of an 'arguable defence' was 'somewhat optimistic' ([48]). The Court also considered the applicant's criminal history and the extent of compliance with conditions of earlier grants of bail. Although his criminal history was limited and there was nothing to indicate previous breaches of bail, the Court noted two factors, namely, that the applicant failed to accept the breakdown of his marriage, and that he refused to respect the orders of the Magistrate Court in relation to the complainant. A significant matter was the fact that, at the time of the alleged offending, the applicant was approximately six weeks into a six month adjourned bond which he received for his multiple breaches of the FVIOs. Matters pursuant to s 3AAA(1)(g), (j), (k), (l) were also considered.

At [57], his Honour noted that the risk of further violence or intimidation by the applicant towards the complainant was significant and entirely unacceptable (see s 4E of the Act). The application for bail was therefore refused as the applicant failed to establish a compelling reason that would justify the grant of bail. The circumstances suggested that the applicant should be held in custody pending trial.

R v Stone (Ruling No 2) [2018] VSC 626 (19 October 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Evidence' – 'Fair hearing and safety' – 'Incriminating conduct' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Post-offence conduct'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Proceeding type: Ruling as to the admissibility of evidence.

Facts: The accused allegedly murdered the victim by dousing him with fuel thinner and setting fire to him. Their relationship spanned approximately 25 years. The accused claimed that a Mr Baxter murdered the victim. The question before the Court was whether the accused was the murderer. The Prosecution filed a Notice, pursuant to s 19 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Vic), of its intention to adduce evidence of incriminating conduct, namely, the lies told by the accused in describing the circumstances of the deceased's death, and the accused's authorship of a letter purporting to be under the hand of Amanda Thatcher and which implicated Mr Baxter in the death of the deceased.

Issues: Whether the evidence of the conduct is reasonably capable of being viewed by the jury as evidence of incriminating conduct.

Decision and reasoning: The Court held that there was sufficient evidence on which the jury could be satisfied that the accused's multi-faceted statement as to how the incident took place was deliberately false. The conduct relied on by the prosecution was much more than a bare denial of guilt, and amounted to a detailed account of the deceased's death. Therefore, the jury could conclude that the only reasonable inference that could be drawn from the evidence was that the accused believed that she committed the offence. Accordingly, the prosecution was allowed to rely on the conduct specified in its notice, namely the lies told by the accused describing the circumstances of the deceased's death, as evidence of incriminating conduct ([24]-[27]).

Note: The accused was convicted and sentenced to 34 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 28 years: R v Stone [2019] VSC 452 (12 July 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court.

R v Stone (Ruling No 1) [2018] VSC 625 (19 October 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Evidence' – 'Fair hearing and safety' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship, context, tendency and coincidence evidence'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Proceeding type: Ruling as to the admissibility of evidence.

Facts: The accused allegedly murdered the victim (her defacto partner) by dousing him with fuel thinner and setting fire to him. Their relationship spanned approximately 25 years. The accused claimed that a Mr Baxter murdered the victim. The question before the Court was whether the accused was the murderer. The prosecution sought to lead evidence from the deceased's mother as to the nature of the relationship between the accused and the deceased. That evidence included 1) that the mother observed instances of verbal and physical abuse between the deceased and accused over a number of years; 2) that in 2010, the mother observed a particular argument between the deceased and the accused in which the accused physically assaulted the deceased before the deceased's brother intervened; and 3) that in November 2016, the mother received a phone call from the deceased, claiming that he was fearful for his own life. The prosecution filed a Hearsay Notice with respect to the 'November 2016 incident'. Sections 65(2)(b) and 66A of the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) were relied upon as the path to admissibility.

Issues: Whether the deceased's mother's observations of instances of verbal and physical abuse between the accused and the deceased were admissible; Whether the probative value of the evidence is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused; Whether the representations made by the deceased to his mother concerning an earlier incident with the accused are admissible.

Decision and reasoning: The prosecution argued that the deceased's mother's evidence was admissible as relationship and context evidence in that evidence of the poor relationship between the accused and the deceased could rationally affect the assessment of the probability of the existence of the question in issue, namely whether the accused killed the deceased. The accused argued that the relationship evidence was not relevant and that the evidence of the November 2016 incident failed to satisfy the tests specified in s 65(2)(b) and s 66A of the Act ([7]).

On an analysis of the particular evidence, Taylor J made the following observations:

- Evidence of the general poor relationship between the accused and the deceased was relevant to the probability of the existence of the question in issue. However, owing to the vagueness of the general relationship evidence, its probative value was low and was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused. Therefore, such evidence was excluded under s 137 of the Act.

- The evidence of the 2010 incident was irrelevant and was therefore excluded by the operation of s 56(2) of the Act. The lack of relevance was a result of the fact that the accused was claimed to have threatened the deceased's brother with a knife, rather than the deceased herself.
- The evidence regarding the November 2016 incident, although hearsay, was admissible pursuant to s 65(2)(b). It was sufficiently proximate to the alleged incident and revealed the state of the relationship between the accused and the deceased, as well as the deceased's fear of the accused in the months preceding her death. It was 'extremely unlikely that the representation was a fabrication' ([31]). The evidence was also admissible pursuant to s 66A of the Act.

Note: The accused was convicted and sentenced to 34 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 28 years: R v Stone [2019] VSC 452 (12 July 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court.

Re application for bail by Roberts* [2018] VSC 554 (21 September 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'Children' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Unacceptable risk and best interests'

Charges: Charges include rape, unlawful assault, contravention a Family Violence Intervention Order, persistent contravention of a Family Violence Intervention Order, attempt to commit an indictable offence, property damage and use a carriage service for child pornography material

Proceeding type: Application for bail

Facts: The complainant was the former partner of the applicant. They have three children. The applicant was charged with 64 offences including rape, unlawful assault, contravention a Family Violence Intervention Order, persistent contravention of a Family Violence Intervention Order, attempt to commit an indictable offence, property damage and use a carriage service for child pornography material.

Issues: Whether bail should be ordered; Whether the applicant discharged his onus of showing compelling reasons why his continued detention is not justified.

Decision and reasoning: The applicant's application for bail was refused as he failed to show compelling reasons why his continued detention was not justified. Taylor J noted that if he had been satisfied that a compelling reason existed justifying the grant of bail, he must apply the unacceptable risk test. In considering s 5AAAA(2)(a) of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic), Taylor J considered that there was a risk that, if released on bail, the applicant would commit family violence. His blatant disregard of the court orders and the effect of his behaviour on the complainant, was exemplified by the 1200 text messages he had sent to the complainant between September 2017 and March 2018. His preparedness on two occasions to continue a sexual offence notwithstanding his knowledge that his actions were being audio-recorded further indicated a complete indifference to the complainant, as well as a sense of entitlement ([57]). His prior convictions for matters of family violence demonstrated continuous disregard for the authority of the court and the complainant's safety and wellbeing. If released on bail, the risk of family violence would not be able to be sufficiently mitigated by the imposition of a bail condition requiring compliance with existing FVIOs ([59]).

Smith v State of Victoria* [2018] VSC 475 (27 August 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Children' – 'Duty of care owed by police' – 'Family violence' – 'Negligence' – 'Women'

Charges: Negligence claims.

Case type: Application for summary dismissal.

Facts: The plaintiffs, a woman and her three children (who identify as Aboriginal), were the victims of family violence by the children's father. They alleged that police officers and senior officers owed duties of care to them as victims of family violence, and that they suffered psychological harm as a result of breaches of those duties. The plaintiffs also asserted that the officers acted in breach of the plaintiffs' human rights and obligations as public authorities under the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic) ([40]). The defendant submitted that the alleged duties cannot arise at law and that the proceedings should be summarily dismissed ([41]). Alternatively, the defendant sought a strike out of the allegations of a common law duty of care pleaded in certain paragraphs of the plaintiffs' amended statement of claim on the basis that no cause of action had been disclosed ([3]). The plaintiffs contended that the current law in Australia regarding the application of duties of care to police officers is 'in a state of development' and that, as a result, the court ought not summarily dismiss the proceedings ([87]).

Issue: The State of Victoria sought either a summary dismissal of the case or that the Court strike out the claims alleging that a common law duty of care was owed.

Held: Dixon J dismissed the application, stating that the defendant's contention that the proposed duties of care have no real prospect of succeeding had not been established ([174]). Dixon J held that a summary dismissal is an 'extreme measure' and would 'forever shut out' the plaintiffs from seeking to prove their claim at trial ([169]). Although the case was 'fact rich and fact intensive', the defendant did not persuade his Honour that no duty of care could arise ([171]).

Duty of care

Dixon J stated at [170]:

> 'Australian common law has not affirmatively recognised that a police officer can never owe a duty of care… In no case has a court determined that no duty of care was owed in circumstances that demonstrate the degree of proximity between the plaintiffs and the police that is likely to be demonstrated on the evidence in this case at trial and in the legislative and policy framework that prevail in respect of domestic violence at the relevant time.'

As outlined in Kuhl v Zurich Finance Services Australia Ltd [2010] HCA 11, the existence of a duty of care is determined by considering reasonable foreseeability and the salient features of the relationship between the plaintiffs and the defendant ([168]). The plaintiffs argued that the police officers owed them a duty of care to prevent breaches of several Intervention Orders (IVOs) by the father due to the existence of a relationship of proximity between the police officers and the plaintiffs, arising from various salient features, including that:

- It was reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiffs required protection from breaches of the extant IVOs by the father;
- The police officers had actual or constructive knowledge of the terms of the extant IVOs;
- The police officers exercised control with respect to the compliance by the father with the terms of the extant IVOs;
- The Victorian police represented, through the terms of its family violence policies, that police officers would protect women and children from family violence. As a result of these representations, the plaintiffs relied on the police officers to enforce compliance by the father with the extant IVOs; and
- There were no countervailing policy reasons that negated the imposition of a duty of care on the police officers to prevent breaches of IVOs ([49]).

The defendant argued that some of the pleadings in the plaintiffs' amended statement of claim were too broad. The submission was that these duties were that, 'every' police officer owed a duty to 'every' affected family member named in any and ‘every’ extant IVO ([53]). In response, the plaintiffs argued that the duties were ‘owed by police officers at stations local to the plaintiffs’ homes, by reason of their status as family violence victims’ or, alternatively, as ‘victims of a recidivist family violence offender known to police’ ([58]). Dixon J accepted the plaintiffs’ submission that the duty was not pleaded in unnecessarily broad terms ([59]).

Salient Features

Dixon J noted that as the existence of a novel duty of care was alleged, the court must apply the salient features approach in Crimmins v Stevedoring Industry Finance Committee[1999] HCA 59 ([90]). A determination of the existence of a duty of care requires ‘[a] close analysis of the facts bearing on the relationship between the plaintiff and the putative tortfeasor by reference to the salient features or facts affecting the appropriateness of imputing a legal duty to take reasonable care to avoid harm or injury’ ([91]).

The plaintiffs submitted that the salient features of foreseeability, knowledge, control and responsibility applied ([129]). They challenged the defendant’s reliance on Hill’s Case [1989]AC 53, emphasising that the salient features of proximity, knowledge and control were absent in Hill’s Case. Dixon J held that Hill’s Case was distinguishable, even if it was good law in Australia ([94]-[95]). The plaintiffs also emphasised the dissenting judgment in Michael v Chief Constable of South Wales Police [2015] UKSC 2, which viewed proximity as the determinative factor ([102]). The plaintiffs submitted that NSW v Spearpoint [2009] NSWCA 233 was analogous, and that it was persuasive authority for their submission that the proceedings could not be summarily dismissed ([114]-[115]).

In relation to the factor of control, Dixon J accepted that the relevant focus was on control of the risk not the offender, and that the issue of control is ‘fact sensitive and a matter for evidence’ ([135]). The plaintiffs suggested that the police officers exercised control by having the father in a police vehicle and dropping him within the zone identified in one of the IVOs ([137]).

R v Jones* [2018] VSC 415 (31 July 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

‘Battered woman syndrome’ – ‘Manslaughter’ – ‘Pregnant people’ – ‘Sentencing’

Charges: Manslaughter based on an unlawful and dangerous act x 1

Proceeding type: Sentence to be imposed

Facts: The female offender was in a relationship with the male victim, with a history of illicit drug use and domestic violence. In April 2015, the victim grabbed the offender around the throat and threatened to harm and kill her. In October 2015, the victim pushed the offender. She armed herself with a knife and returned to the bedroom to confront him. He grabbed her by the throat, and verbally and physically assaulted her. She was pregnant at the time with his child. In December 2016, there had been a heated verbal argument between the parties. She stabbed him in the chest with a kitchen knife. The offender pleaded guilty.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: Taylor J took into account victim impact statements ([20]-[21]), and the offender's prior criminal history ([22]-[26]) and personal history ([27]-[41]). The offender had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for a charge of recklessly causing injury by punching and stabbing a former partner. She had experienced trauma at an early age as she was raped by two of her brother's friends. She was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder and excoriation disorder. Her psychological condition did not warrant the application of the principles in R v Verdins [2007] VSCA 102. Her Honour accepted that there had been a history of domestic violence at the hands of the victim and that, on the balance of probabilities, physical violence had occurred the morning of the victim's death. The gravity of her offending was to be assessed in the context of her history of family violence and her perception of a physical threat. At [48], her Honour stated –

> 'Family violence is insidious. It need not find expression in physical violence to be described as grave or create a mindset in its victims of fear and helplessness. That mindset arises from all forms of violence experienced by victims and is not triggered only at the time of a physical assault…'

Her Honour accepted that her plea of guilty was an expression of genuine remorse, and that her time in custody would be more burdensome due to the separation from her children, as well as her diagnosed psychiatric illnesses. Specific deterrence was considered a significant sentencing factor, as well as general deterrence and denunciation. At [58], her Honour acknowledged that 'This Court must pass a sentence that denounces your behaviour and deters others from resorting to the use of knives or other sharp objects during conflicts.' The offender was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of seven years.

The Queen v Donker* [2018] VSC 210 (11 May 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Coercive control' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Manslaughter' – 'Non-fatal strangulation' – 'People affected by drug misuse' – 'Sentence' – 'Victim as (alleged) perpetrator'

Charges: Manslaughter.

Matter: Sentence.

Facts: Ms Donker and Mr Powell were in a violent, volatile and toxic relationship [5]. Mr Powell's violence was fuelled by ice use, he would become violent in the course of arguments, was controlling and suspicious of Ms Donker, and, even during Ms Donker's first pregnancy, would grab her around the throat and push her around.

Ms Donker lied to protect Mr Powell whenever the police were called. Ms Donker was also violent towards Mr Powell in retaliation, which would make Mr Powell more angry and more violent. Mr Powell's violence had caused their children to be removed from Ms Donker's care and them both to be evicted.

In January 2017 Mr Powell woke Ms Donker when she was asleep in her car in a kindergarten carpark by him dragging her from the car by her hair. She had parked there for the night as it was close to where her children were living with Mr Powell's extended family. In response to Mr Powell's assault she repeatedly manoeuvred her car so as to threaten and taunt Mr Powell. She did not intend to physically hurt him. However, on the fourth instance of reversing away from and driving towards Mr Powell, she struck a pole which bent and fell so as to strike Mr Powell's head, killing him instantly.

Decision and reasoning: Five years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of two years.

Croucher J accepted that:

> [23] ….after years of Mr Powell's violence; after numerous unsuccessful attempts at defending herself; after losing her recently hard-won gains – including her home, her job and, most importantly, the care of her children; after being forced to live in a car; after being choked and having her eyebrow split by him again the night before; after being viciously dragged out of her car by the hair as she tried to sleep…

Ms Donker 'could take no more and finally snapped'.

Having outlined a history of controlling and violent behaviour by the deceased towards the accused at [5]-[9] and the physical violence to which the accused was subjected immediately prior to the instant offending Croucher J noted:

> [72] While the law in this State does not excuse anyone – whether of uncommonly sturdy or brittle > disposition – from criminal liability for otherwise unlawful actions based on provocation alone, the same law does not demand that victims of abuse of the kind and extent to which Ms Donker was subjected be super-resilient before provocation can operate in mitigation of sentence. Rather, the law attempts to strike a balance that recognizes human frailty in the face of extremely difficult circumstances, and allows that moral culpability may be reduced in such cases. This is such a case. As I say, I think it is very likely that any ordinary person, facing the circumstances which confronted Ms Donker and fixed with her history of exposure to family violence by Mr Powell, would lose self-control and act in a violent manner towards him.

'Application for bail' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Perpetrator interventions' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Show cause'

Charges: Contravention of family violence intervention order x 1; Intending to cause harm or fear x 1; Unlawful assault x 2; Home invasion x 1; Aggravated burglary x 1; Theft x 2.

Case type: Application for bail.

Facts: The applicant was arrested for a family violence incident and an unrelated home invasion ([1]). The family violence incident occurred between the applicant and the victim, who were in a relationship for 4 years and had a 22-month-old son ([7]). The applicant accused the victim of changing his Centrelink account details and cheating on him. He grabbed the victim by her arms, pushed her to the ground, and hit her face, head and hands. The victim left the house and called for help with a payphone ([8]-[9]). The applicant pleaded guilty to one charge of assault and one charge of breaching a family violence intervention order.

Issues: Whether bail should be granted. Because the home invasion charge involved the use of an offensive weapon, the applicant was required to show cause why his detention in custody is not justified, pursuant to s 4(4)(c) of the Bail Act 1977 ([23]).

Decision and Reasoning: Bail was granted.

Champion J considered the following factors in favour of the applicant:

- the applicant's youth, being 21 years old ([44]);
- the applicant's relative lack of criminal history ([45]);
- limited instances of domestic violence ([46]);
- the defence submitted that the likely penalty for the family violence incident would be higher than the time the applicant has already spent in custody ([48]);
- the likely of up to 12 months delay in having the matter heard in the County Court ([50]);
- the victim had moved to a secret location ([54]); and
- if the applicant was remanded in custody, he would not be able to access a men's behaviour change program ([54]).

Champion J considered the following factors against the applicant:

- the prosecution submitted that the penalty for the breach of domestic violence order would include imprisonment, because it was a serious breach and occurred in front of their child ([56]); and
- the applicant did not have accommodation ([61]).

Champion J considered that the applicant has shown cause why his detention in custody is not justified ([62]). His Honour remarked that while the level of violence towards the victim was unacceptable, it did not involve the use of a weapon, threats to kill or the infliction of significant physical injury ([64]).

DPP v Lo (Ruling No 3)* [2018] VSC 149 (29 March 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Evidence' – 'Evidence issues' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship, context, tendency and coincidence evidence'

Charges: Murder.

Case type: Ruling on relevancy of evidence.

Facts: The female accused Lo was charged with murder and perjury. It is alleged that AB shot the deceased and that the accused Lo assisted, encouraged and directed AB in those actions. The accused was a Chinese national living with the deceased prior to the murder.

The central issue of this trial was whether the evidence provided by a marriage celebrant was relevant. The marriage celebrant provided evidence that he visited the deceased's home in relation to proposed plans for him and the accused to marry. The Defence submitted that this confused the jury, and that it was counter-intuitive to the Crown's case. It was also submitted that if the evidence was put before the jury, there would be a risk that the jury would be misled into thinking that the deceased wanted to marry the accused because he loved and cared for her. This would require the Defence to adduce evidence to show an alternative scenario that the deceased had been actively seeking to marry a young Asian woman and had told others of his willingness to facilitate such a person getting an Australian visa through such an arrangement ([3]-[6]). The Defence submitted that consideration of this issue would be time-consuming and distracting for the jury, and the evidence of the marriage celebrant was not sufficiently relevant to allegations of the accused's complicity in the murder ([7]).

Issues: The Court was required to determine whether the evidence of the marriage celebrant was relevant.

Decision and reasoning: Under the Evidence Act 2008 (Vic), evidence is prima facie admissible if it is relevant. In order to exclude the evidence, the defendant bears the onus of showing that the danger of unfair prejudice outweighs the probative value. Dixon J held that the marriage celebrant's evidence was relevant and admissible as context and relationship evidence ([22]), and that the Defence should be entitled to adduce evidence supporting a counter-narrative that the deceased had been interested in marriages with other women prior to the murder ([27]). Her Honour was of the view that evidence as to the events in the house the night before the murder, and evidence of the complex nature of the accused's and deceased's relationship was relevant. Any unfair prejudice arising from the jury learning about a planned marriage of convenience between the accused and deceased did not outweigh the probative value of the evidence ([25]). The marriage celebrant's evidence was found to have significant relevance to the issues in the trial ([27]), and to be admissible relationship evidence.

'Imprisonment' – 'Manslaughter' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Perpetrator a battered woman' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Manslaughter x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The defendant and deceased were in a relationship for 2 years. There was a history of arguments, physical violence and cannabis and methylamphetamine use ([2]-[7]). On the day of the offence, the defendant and deceased argued for 3 hours, during which the defendant tried to leave the house, and the deceased dragged her back inside ([9]). The defendant stated in later interviews that the deceased would not let the defendant leave and goaded her into stabbing him ([25]). By the time the police attended, the defendant had stabbed the deceased ([11]-[12]).

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: Hollingworth J imposed a head sentence of 7 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 4 years ([50]).

Her Honour had regard to the fact that the defendant had a limited criminal history and displayed some evidence of post-traumatic stress disorder and major depressive disorder ([40]). Her Honour also reduced the sentence for the defendant's early guilty plea: the defendant was charged with murder but pleaded guilty to manslaughter a month before her trial was due to begin ([43], [50]). The defendant displayed remorse for her actions ([45]) and had begun counselling in custody ([46]).

Charges: Intentionally causing injury x 3; Recklessly causing injury x 5; Unlawful assault x 3; Contravening family violence intervention order x 3.

Case type: Bail application.

Facts: The applicant and the complainant had been in a relationship for 10 years and had 2 children ([2]). The complainant alleged three events forming the basis of the charges. First, the applicant kicked and punched her, drove her to the hospital, dragged her from the car and left her at the entrance. Second, the applicant chased her in his car, dragged her out of her car, and punched her. Third, the applicant forced his way into her house, urinated on her, and punched her ([14]-[22]).

Issues: The applicant was required to 'show cause why his detention was not justified', under s 4(4)(ba)(i) of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic).

Decision and Reasoning: Bail was refused.

The applicant argued that he was entitled to bail because he had stable accommodation, was willing to comply with strict bail conditions, and that the prosecution case was not strong because it relied mostly upon the complainant's evidence. The applicant intended to challenge the credibility of the complainant ([24]). The prosecution argued that the applicant had a lengthy criminal history including violence, has shown disregard for previous family violence intervention orders, and has committed offences while on bail ([47]-[48]).

Justice Champion at [57]-[59] discussed the applicant's contention that the prosecution case is weak because it relies on the complainant's evidence:

> … the prosecution points out that cases involving family violence frequently involve 'word on word' evidence and that this is often the very nature of these types of cases. The prosecution submits that this circumstance does not of itself warrant the prosecution case as being regarded as weak, or without merit.
> It is clear enough that the case will be strongly defended, and that there are arguable issues to be decided. That said, it was not submitted to me that the case should be regarded as inherently weak.
> From what I have been able to glean in this application I cannot conclude that the prosecution case is weak.

'Coercive control' – 'Current sentencing practices' – 'Post-separation violence' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing' – 'Stalking' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Victorian systemic review into family violence deaths unit' – 'Women'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Appeal type: Sentence.

Facts: The defendant and victim were estranged. The defendant made open threats to kill the deceased, sought to commit a character assassination of her by alleging that she was promiscuous and by making spurious allegations about her involvement in pornography, nuisance-calling her at work, and following her and her new boyfriend. The deceased took out a protection order against the defendant. Shortly before a Family Court hearing, she was stabbed by the defendant, and was found dead by her sons ([7]). At a pre-trial hearing, relationship evidence was admitted (see DPP (Victoria) v Paulino (Ruling No 1) [2017] VSC 343 (17 June 2017)). After a jury trial, the defendant was found guilty.

Justice Bell referred the case to the Victorian Systemic Review into Family Violence Deaths unit at the Coroners Court. The function of the unit includes identifying risks associated with deaths resulting from family violence. His Honour highlighted features of this case, including that:

- the murder was preceded by threats to kill, assassination and blaming directed towards the deceased that were open and persistent;
- there was an intervention order on foot, which was not a sufficient deterrent;
- Family Court proceedings, initiated by the deceased, had reached a critical stage;
- the parties had separated; and
- the deceased had expressed a fear that her husband would kill her.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: The defendant was sentenced to a period of 30 years with a non-parole period of 25 years.

Justice Bell placed importance on the fact that current sentencing practices being more condemnatory of men murdering women ([25]), the circumstances of stalking and breaches of intervention orders leading up to the murder ([27]), and the murder was premeditated ([29]).

The accused's acts in relation to the victim — namely the character assassination and other harassment — were found not to be 'random measures'. Instead, Bell J found that they represented a 'pattern of coercive control'. Her right to 'personal dignity and autonomy' was violated by the accused, whose conduct led to a situation in which she no longer had a life to live. This, Bell J explains, 'was the culmination of a pattern of behaviour aimed at preventing her from living the life she chose'. [27]

'Bail' – 'Bail conditions not sufficient' – 'Bail refused' – 'Immigration detention' – 'Past breaches of protection orders' – 'Protection orders' – 'Show cause'

Charges: Contravention of a family violence safety notice intending to cause harm or fear for safety x 1; Destroying or damaging property x 1; Aggravated burglary x 1; Attempted murder x 1; Intentionally causing serious injury x 1; and Recklessly causing serious injury x 1.

Case type: Bail application.

Facts: The applicant attended the house of his former partner and her new partner (the victim), and forced his way in by breaking the window ([7]-[8]). The applicant stabbed the victim's head and hands with a piece of broken glass, leaving him with permanent injuries ([9]).

Issues: The applicant was required to 'show cause why his detention was not justified', under various sub-sections of s 4(4) of the Bail Act 1977 (Vic). For example, the appellant was charged with contravening a family safety notice in which he was alleged to have used violence and, in the previous 10 years, had been found guilty of the same charge (s 4(4)(ba)(i)) ([12]).

Decision and Reasoning: Bail was refused.

The applicant had argued that because he has been given notice that he is an unlawful non-citizen, he would be put straight into immigration detention and therefore would not pose a risk of committing another offence ([14]).

Priest JA held that there was an unacceptable risk that the applicant would commit further offences against his former partners. Most importantly, the applicant had a history of breaching family violence orders ([20]). Therefore, the risk of the applicant committing further violence could not be mitigated by strict bail conditions ([21]). Furthermore, there was no guarantee that the applicant would be put straight into immigration detention ([17], [20]).

'Bail' – 'Firearms' – 'Kidnapping' – 'Show cause' – 'Strangulation' – 'Strict conditions' – 'Threats'

Charges: Intentionally causing injury x 1; Recklessly causing injury x 1; Unlawful imprisonment x 1; Unlawful assault x 3; Unlawful assault using an instrument x 2; Unlawful assault by kicking x 1; Threatening to inflict serious injury x 1; Unlawful assault with a weapon (a steak knife) x 1; Making a threat to kill x 2; Kidnapping x 1; Common law assault x 2; Reckless conduct placing a person in danger of death x 1.

Case type: Bail application.

Facts: All charges related to one 12-hour period, where the applicant allegedly assaulted his wife by: banging her head on the floor and striking her with an iron; punching, kicking and strangling her with a lamp cord; and threatening to take her somewhere to be raped, and threatening to kill her while holding a steak knife ([6]).

Issues: Since the applicant was charged with an indictable offence involving the use of a weapon, the issue was whether he could 'show cause' why his detention was not justified (s 4(4)(c) Bail Act 1977 (Vic)) ([3]).

Decision and Reasoning: Bail was granted, with strict conditions. Significant factors against granting the applicant bail included: the charges are serious; and it could not be said granting bail would pose no risk to the complainant ([14]). On the other hand, significant factors in favour of granting bail to the applicant were: he had no criminal history; and the risk to the complainant could be ameliorated by strict conditions such as requiring him to reside with his mother, engage in drug treatment, and removing his access to firearms ([14], set out in full at [17]). Justice Beach stated: 'There is considerable merit (and potential benefit for both the applicant and the wider community) in addressing the applicant's drug, and any mental health, issues now rather than later' ([15]).

Director of Public Prosecutions (Victoria) v Turner* [2017] VSC 358 (23 June 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Respect of women' – 'Role of sentencing'

Charges: Manslaughter x 1; Breach of domestic violence order x 1.

Case type: Sentence.

Facts: The defendant and deceased had been in a relationship. After consuming alcohol and methamphetamines, the defendant beat the deceased in their home with punches, kicks, and hit the soles of her feet with a hammer ([5]). The deceased was discharged from hospital, but died of internal bleeding the next day ([8]-[9]). The defendant pleaded guilty to manslaughter.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: Bell J imposed a sentence of 12 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 9 years. His Honour considered that the contravention of a domestic violence order made it a serious example of manslaughter ([32]).

Bell J at [33]:

"Denunciation and specific and general deterrence are sentencing principles through which the law gives effect to the fundamental purpose of protecting individuals and the community from crime. Ms Cay and all other women have an inviolable human right to life, to equality – not just the appearance of equality but to real equality, to physical and emotional integrity, to respect for their dignity and personal autonomy, to loving relationships with children and others, and to freedom from fear of physical or mental harm. They look to the law for protection from men who would perpetrate crimes of assault or homicide upon them in a domestic setting by reason of failing to control their anger, aggression and rage. While the police cannot be present in every home on every occasion of risk, the values and standards of human behaviour that the criminal law demands are omnipresent. The courts must respond appropriately through the sentencing process when those standards are severely or seriously breached, as they have been in this case, for this vindicates the individual interests of victims in seeing that perpetrators are brought to justice, as well as the general interests of the community in seeing that justice is so done, and also performs the important educative function of positively influencing how the community, and especially men, value, respect and treat women."

His Honour thought that the defendant had good prospects of rehabilitation, but the defendant's efforts to stop drinking was not a mitigating factor ([27-[28]).

DPP (Victoria) v Paulino (Ruling No 1) [2017] VSC 343 (17 June 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Admissibility' – 'Relationship evidence'

Charges: Murder.

Case type: Pre-trial hearing.

Facts: The defendant and deceased had been in a relationship, and had two children ([3]). They separated acrimoniously in 2010 ([3]). The defendant was accused of murdering the deceased. The prosecution wished to lead evidence relating to the relationship between the accused and deceased ([4]) in order to establish that the accused's enmity and hatred towards the deceased was the motive for the murder ([5]). The evidence included: threats made by the defendant; relationship evidence; the fact that the accused had an intervention order taken out against him by the deceased; and the accused's actions in relation to a pornographic video allegedly depicting the deceased.

Issues: Whether the 'relationship evidence' should be admitted.

Decision and Reasoning: Justice Bell set out the relevant principles in relation to the Court's mandatory duty to exclude evidence where the probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused (see [33]-[36]). In this context, evidence of a poor relationship between the accused and deceased has been admitted where that evidence may be relevant to whether the accused killed the deceased and whether the accused had a motive to do so ([37]).

Threats

The deceased's statements about her fear of the accused (for example, that if something happened to her, it would be because of the accused) were not admissible. In deciding the admissibility of a victim's fear of the accused perpetrator, the issue is 'whether the evidence of the deceased's fear of the accused was relevant to the probability of the existence of a fact in issue, usually whether the accused had a motive for killing, and actually did kill, the deceased' ([57]). However, the statements were merely evidence of her subjective state of mind, not the accused's ([70]). Further, the content and volume of evidence would be highly prejudicial to the accused ([71]).

By contrast, evidence of threats made by the accused to kill the deceased and her family were admissible, because it was relevant to the accused's state of mind towards the deceased ([76]).

Relationship evidence

Evidence of the defendant's feelings of hatred and enmity towards the deceased was admissible ([42]-[43]). However, most the evidence of the state of their marriage before 2010 was not relevant ([41], [51]). Bell J held that the jury should be told generally that the marriage was unhappy ([85]-[87]), but not the precise details of the aggressive behaviour of the accused ([88]).

Intervention order

Evidence of the intervention order was admissible as a feature of the relationship leading up to the death of the deceased ([91]). There was a danger of unfair prejudice to the accused, but that could be mitigated by proper instruction ([92]).

Pornographic video

The accused had alleged that the deceased had participated in a pornographic video, and had shown his colleagues and the deceased's family ([94]). Evidence of the video and the accused's actions were admissible to demonstrate the extremely negative attitude of the accused towards the deceased ([96]).

'Anti-tendency warning' – 'Murder' – 'Prejudicial evidence' – 'Propensity evidence jury discharge'

Charges: Murder.

Case type: Application to discharge jury.

Facts: The defendant was on trial for stabbing his former partner. His son gave evidence that the defendant usually carried a knife. Defence counsel applied to discharge the jury on the ground that the 'propensity evidence' was highly inflammatory and could not be cured by a direction ([2]). The next day, a newspaper article was published about the son's evidence ([35]-[36]).

Issues: Whether the jury should be discharged.

Decision and Reasoning: Jane Dixon J declined to discharge the jury ([31], [45]). Her Honour considered that any prejudice to the accused could be cured by a direction to the jury ([31]). Her Honour gave two anti-tendency warnings ([35], [43]), and intended to give another curative direction in her Honour's final address ([44]).

The Queen v Cook* [2015] VSC 406 (19 August 2015) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Murder.

Hearing: Sentence.

Facts: The victim was the male offender's de facto wife. After drinking 15 beers at their house party, the offender started punching and pushing the victim. A friend tried to intervene but was pushed away. He then picked up a steel-framed chair and hit the victim with such force that that one of the legs went through her skin and bone and penetrated her brain.

Decision and Reasoning: Elliot J sentenced the offender to 21 years and six months imprisonment with a non-parole period of 17 years and six months. In passing this sentence, His Honour made some general observations on domestic violence at [28]-[30]:

'The courts clearly recognise that they must forcefully condemn domestic violence (See, e.g., R v Earl [2008] VSCA 162, [23]). When domestic violence manifests in murderous conduct, that conduct must be denounced in the strongest terms (Felicite v The Queen (2011) 37 VR 329, [20]; Portelli v The Queen [2015] VSCA 159, [30]).

Moreover, general and specific deterrence have special significance in cases involving domestic violence. In such circumstances, general deterrence is more important as "[t]he victims of such violence are often so enveloped by fear that they are incapable of either escaping the violence or reporting it to the authorities" (Pasinis v The Queen [2014] VSCA 97, [57]).

Also, specific deterrence is often more important, as it is in this case, because "women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously"' (Pasinis v The Queen [2014] VSCA 97, [53]).

DPP v Williams* [2014] VSC 304 (27 June 2014) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Aggravating factor' – 'Defensive homicide' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Expert evidence - academic' – 'History of violence' – 'Lack of disclosure of family violence' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Defensive Homicide.

Hearing: Sentence.

Facts: The defendant was charged with murdering her de facto partner but was found guilty of defensive homicide. She struck the deceased to the head 16 times with an axe. She buried the deceased's body in the backyard and lied about his whereabouts to family and friends for more than four years, claiming that he had gone interstate. The defendant gave an account of a violent fight which led to the deceased's death which included the deceased taunting and goading the defendant. She attested to a long history of family violence by the deceased.

Issue/s: The appropriate sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: The defendant was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 5 years. In finding the defendant guilty of defensive homicide, the jury had to be satisfied that the killing took place in the context of a serious history of family violence. Hollingworth J noted at [20] that, while there was no evidence that the defendant or her children had ever complained about family violence, this is not uncommon.

The deceased was the dominant person in the relationship. He had a long history of violence and drank heavily. His behaviour towards the defendant 'over many years, was abusive, belittling and controlling, and involved both physical and psychological abuse' ([26]). Her Honour noted, 'The final act or acts of the deceased may well be relatively minor, if looked at in isolation; but what happens in such cases is that the victim of family violence finally reaches a point of explosive violence, in response to yet another episode of being attacked. In such a case, it is not uncommon for the accused to inflict violence that is completely disproportionate to the immediate harm or threatened harm from the deceased' ([32]).

The Court heard (largely unchallenged) expert evidence from Professor Patricia Easteal regarding the complex dynamics of family violence, the reasons why women often do not leave violent partners and the use of weapons by female victims of family violence against male partners ([33]-[34]). Given this evidence, Her Honour noted that while ordinarily, striking 16 blows with an axe in response to a minor physical and verbal attack by an unarmed attacker would seem disproportionate, this may not be the correct conclusion in family violence cases involving a female offender ([36]). However, aggravating factors included the defendant's deceit and a lack of remorse. Her offending had a large impact on the deceased's family.

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Expert evidence' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Self-defence' – 'Social framework evidence'

Charges: Murder.

Proceeding: Pre-trial hearing.

Facts: The defendant was on trial for the murder of his de facto partner. He argued that he shot his de facto partner in self-defence. He alleged that his partner perpetrated psychological and physical violence against him over the course of the relationship. He successfully argued that the killing was in self-defence and was thus acquitted.

Issue/s: One of the issues concerned whether evidence of family violence or 'social framework' evidence within the meaning of the then s 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) was admissible.

Decision and reasoning: The evidence was admitted. Maxwell P held that family violence was alleged as required by the section. As such, evidence such as 'the cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of (family) violence' was relevant in determining whether self-defence was made out. Significantly, his Honour held that, 'There will be no basis for an objection on grounds of relevance…', though there could be other available grounds of objection (see at [16]).

DPP v Neve* [2013] VSC 488 (13 September 2013) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Criminal damage' – 'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Intentionally causing injury' – 'Make threat to kill' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Reckless conduct endangering life' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Criminal damage, make threat to kill x 2, reckless conduct endangering life, intentionally causing injury.

Hearing: Sentence hearing.

Facts: The offender and the complainant were married. After an argument, the offender fatally shot the complainant's dog. He then reloaded the rifle and began chasing the complainant as she ran towards the road yelling, 'I'm going to fucking kill you…You're fucked'. The complainant stopped running and tried to negotiate with the offender. She managed to grab hold of the gun and forced the applicant to fire both of the shots from the rifle. The offender then pushed her over and started punching her repeatedly in the head and chest, trying to reach other cartridges he had in his pocket. The complainant managed to get up and flag the attention of a passerby.

Decision and Reasoning: The offender was sentenced to a total effective sentence of four years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of two and a half years. In passing sentence, Bell J noted at [67]:

'Denunciation of your crimes and general deterrence are powerful sentencing considerations in your case, leading to an immediate sentence of imprisonment. Ms Fuller was your wife. You are guilty of committing appalling domestic violence towards her. Many of your actions were not only violent but calculated to belittle and demean her and place her in abject fear. The double barrel shotgun was a common feature of all five charges and it was loaded when the first four offences were committed. This criminal conduct deserves the strongest condemnation of the court. Others must be made to appreciate the consequences of committing crimes of this nature'.

'Denunciation' – 'Deterrence' – 'Forcible confinement' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Violation of trust between husband and wife'

Charge/s: Intentionally causing serious injury.

Hearing: Sentence hearing.

Facts: The offender and the victim, his wife, came to Australia from Vietnam on tourist visas. After the offender became suspicious the victim was seeing another man, he stabbed the victim multiple times in the chest and abdomen.

Decision and Reasoning: In sentencing the offender, Curtain J took into account the offender's plea of guilty, his lack of prior criminal history, the fact that the offender would be separated from his children for a number of years, and that the offender was remorseful and distressed by his conduct. Her Honour also accepted that the offender's prospects for rehabilitation were favourable. However, in opposition to these factors, Curtain J held at [42]-[43]:

'Against these matters stand the nature and gravity of the offence here committed. This is a serious example of a serious offence. It involves the infliction of serious violence upon your wife which is a gross breach of the trust which reposes between husband and wife. I take into account also the need to pass a sentence which will act in denunciation of your conduct and serve to punish you and also give due weight to special and general deterrence.

Although such considerations are to be sensibly moderated, nonetheless, the sentence imposed must signal to the community that acts of violence, including domestic violence, are not tolerated and warrant condign punishment'.

In the circumstances, a sentence of seven years imprisonment with a non-parole period of five years was appropriate.

R v Gojanovic* [2005] VSC 97 (27 January 2005) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship killings' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Hearing: Sentence hearing.

Facts: After being in an 'on and off relationship' for some years, the male offender and the female victim separated. One evening, the offender entered the victim's home and battered her repeatedly on the head with a rubber headed mallet. He then took a dressing gown cord and strangled her to death.

Decision and Reasoning: Osborn J noted that while the killing was not premeditated and it occurred in a state of high emotion arising out of the disintegration of the offender's relationship with the victim, there were nevertheless five seriously aggravating circumstances associated with this crime. First, the killing was brutal, protracted and vicious. Second, the killing was selfishly callous. The offender knew he was not only taking the life of another individual but also taking away the mother of four innocent children. Third, the killing took place in what should have been the safety of the deceased's own home. Four, a substantial penalty was warranted in light of the need for general deterrence. As per His Honour at [31]:

'The Court and the community which it represents cannot tolerate resort to violence, let alone homicidal violence, in circumstances of this kind. The Court must send a clear message to estranged parents that they cannot act as you did and expect to receive other than a penalty which affirms the sanctity of individual human life and condemns in the strongest terms the deliberate taking of another life even in circumstances of strong emotion'.

Finally, the offender displayed a total lack of remorse for his conduct. The offender was sentenced to 20 years imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 15 years.

R v Kibble* [2002] VSC 52 (1 March 2002) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Intentionally cause serious injury' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relevance of prior relationship' – 'Right to leave a relationship' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Intentionally cause serious injury.

Hearing: Sentence hearing.

Facts: The female victim ended her relationship with the male offender and gave him money to fly back to London, where he was from. Upon returning to England, the offender felt humiliated and angry and decided to return to Australia to punish the victim. He purchased a rubber mallet to break into the victim's house and a roll of duct tape. When the victim arrived home, the offender started stabbing her with a knife. She managed to fight him off and called the police.

Decision and Reasoning: This offence was serious. As per Gillard J at [57]:

'A person in a relationship with another has every right to terminate the relationship and walk away without fear of reprisal. Too often, upon the termination of a relationship, the physically stronger person pursues a course of conduct of harassment and violence towards the other person. That is what has happened here. Your conduct was serious and has had a long-lasting, emotional effect upon the victim. The Legislature views any offence under s16 as serious. The circumstances surrounding the commission of this offence supports that conclusion and you are guilty of a high level of criminality'.

There were a number of factors that aggravated the offending namely that the conduct was premeditated, the offender waited for the victim in her home, his conduct caused the victim terror and fear, and the conduct had a long-lasting emotional effect on the victim. His Honour was satisfied that specific deterrence was not warranted on the facts but that general deterrence was important i.e. the sentence had to send a message to those who are like-minded to use their superior physical strength to punish a partner in a relationship after it has terminated.

His Honour also took into account a number of mitigating factors namely, the offender frankly admitted his involved, he pleaded guilty at the first opportunity, there was no criminal history, the physical injuries were at the lower end of the scale, the sentence would be onerous because the offender was English, the offence was out of character, it was unlikely he would reoffend, and his prospects for rehabilitation were good. The offender was sentenced to six years imprisonment with a non-parole period of four years.

DPP v Williamson* [2000] VSC 115 (31 March 2000) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Murder' – 'Parents who kill children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship killings' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Hearing: Sentence hearing.

Facts: The offender and a young woman, Ms Park, had been in a relationship and had a child together, the victim. This relationship was characterised by the offender's jealousy and possessiveness towards Ms Park and the victim. Eight months after the victim was born, Ms Park left the relationship. The offender resented his obligation to financially support the child and began to deeply resent Ms Park. Four months before the victim's death, the offender began telling people he was going to kill himself and his son, to take him away from Ms Park. One night, the offender took the child to a hotel and smothered him. He then wrote a letter to Ms Park telling her he had killed the victim.

Decision and Reasoning: In sentencing, Cummins J took into account, as mitigating factors, the offender's poor family situation, the burdensome quality of imprisonment to the offender, his age, his lack of prior convictions and the rehabilitative courses he undertook while in custody. However, His Honour stated at [25]:

'Of all the rights of the child, the most fundamental right of all is the right to life. It is necessary that parents and others in charge of children unmistakably understand that child abuse will be met by the full force of the law. The intentional killing of a child by a person without psychiatric illness or other significantly mitigating factor will ordinarily be met with life imprisonment of the offender'.

Cummins J also noted the significant importance of condemnation, punishment, general deterrence and specific deterrence. The offender was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 24 years.

County Court

DPP v Buck [2021] VCC 759 (11 June 2021) – Victorian County Court

'Damaging property' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing' – 'Strangulation' – 'Weapons and threats to kill'

Charges: Criminal damage; Common assault; Conduct endangering serious injury; Intentionally cause injury; Threat to kill; Trespass; Indictment offence on bail; Persistent Breach of Family Violence Intervention Order.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The male offender and female victim had been in a relationship for approximately four months. The offender ripped her clothes off and hit the back of her head with a hair dryer multiple times. He punched her five or six times to the face, and stomped on her head and chest several times. He strangledher, threatening to kill her, and she felt unable to breathe. At one point, the offender chased the victim into the street and threatened to kill her while brandishing a knife. He also caused property damage and assaulted the victim's housemate (who tried to intervene). The victim's children were present at the time of the offending. The victim sustained many injuries, including exposing her bone and skull. A Family Violence Intervention Order was imposed and, despite the order, the offender telephoned the victim from custody on 12 occasions, but desisted once the victim told him to stop.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and reasoning: A sentence of 3 years 5 months imprisonment with a non-parole period 2 years was imposed.

Assessed in the context of an intimate relationship, this was a reasonably serious example of causing intentional injury for the following reasons:

- It was an assault on the offender's partner who was entitled to his care.
- The offending occurred in the victim's home, where she should have felt safe.
- The offender used a household item as a weapon, hitting the victim to her head repeatedly to a point where she was feeling dizzy. The victim said she felt unable to stand up, had blood in her eyes and her head was throbbing. The physical injury to her head was a result of those repeated strikes. The offender continued to assault her, despite her state and her pleading with him to stop.

- The assault was protracted, moving between various rooms in the house, out onto the street and back into the house.
- The acts of violence against the offender's partner "were not only physically violent, resulting in her injuries, but they were degrading, including stripping her naked. One neighbour refers to her running naked in the street, bloodied and bruised."
- As part of the episode, the offender choked her. The victim described feeling unable to breathe and wondering whether she would be able to do so again. There were marks around her neck from that part of this event. During that event, he made the threat to kill her which must have been terrifying given the context of that threat. He later made a threat when brandishing a knife.
- The offender continued to attack the victim, despite the intervention of the victim's housemate.
- The acts occurred in the presence and hearing of the victim's children, which was most disturbing. As his Honour noted: "The fact that a 12 year old had to call police because you were violently assaulting her mother is reprehensible. [The victim's] daughter was extremely courageous and showed wisdom beyond her years in doing what she could to try and get police to the scene."
- The offender's assault on the victim's housemate demonstrated the offender's level of aggression.
- "Despite the fact I have not received a victim impact statement, I can well anticipate that Ms Brewer suffered distress, humiliation and fear during this offending, and that she is likely to have experienced some ongoing trauma as a result. Those matters would only be exacerbated in my view, by the presence of her two daughters and her feelings of concern for them."

The principles from Bugmy v The Queen were applicable in this case (disadvantage and events during his formative years) and somewhat reduced the offender's moral culpability. He pleaded guilty. There was an intervention order protecting the victim and the offender had shown no desire to try and contact her now.

'Coercive control' – 'Detention for a sexual purpose' – 'Low cognitive functioning' – 'Moral culpability' – 'Objective seriousness' – 'Offender in relationship with victim from under the age of 16' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'Rape' – 'Separation' – 'Suicide threat' – 'Young people'

Charges: Rape (rolled up charge, 3 separate incidents) x 1; Detention for a sexual purpose x 1.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The male offender was 23 years old at the time of the offending and the female victim, his partner, was 32 years old. The offender had been groomed by the victim since he was a child, with sexual and then de facto marital relationship commencing when he was a child.

Issues: Sentence to be imposed.

Decision and reasoning: A total effective sentence of 6 years and 9 months was imposed, with a non-parole period of 3 years and 10 months.

The court noted the seriousness of rape as an offence. The objective gravity of the offender's offending (as rolled-up charges) was high.

The court noted at [41] that: "This case is an example of controlling and violent conduct borne out of an inability to accept and negotiate the end of the relationship – culminating in the heinous and devastating offence of rape. It is reprehensible conduct of the highest order and must be deterred and denounced." And at [42]: "The impact upon the victim also needs to be given proper weight in the exercise of my sentencing discretion. Your victim states that she has had suicidal thoughts, has been diagnosed with anxiety, depression and PTSD, and is having counselling. The offending has also impacted the children, who are anxious and withdrawn."

Age disparity between the offender and victim alone would have had limited impact in assessing the circumstances of the offending and offender's moral culpability. But, in combination with the following factors, the circumstances of the relationship were more significant:

- The offender was diagnosed with ADHD in Grade 3;
- He had difficulties at school and is dyslexic;
- He suffers hearing impairment, requiring hearing aids;
- He has low intellectual functioning;
- He became a father when he was a child and by 20 was working to support a house of three children;
- To some degree, the offender was subject to some manipulation/control in the form of managing his medication and access to hearing aids, particularly leading up to the offending;
- The relationship was his first sexual relationship. It was his "only experience of a relationship and your attitudes and strategies for dealing with conflict have been shaped within a relationship that commenced when you were a child."

The offender required specific deterrence, treatment and programs to ensure he did not repeat this offending. Denunciation and general deterrence were also important sentencing considerations: “All potential perpetrators who may feel aggrieved within a domestic relationship and who lack the skills, intelligence, maturity and emotional control to relate to a partner or ex-partner in anything other than a violent and controlling way – must be deterred” at [55].

DPP v Senior (a pseudonym) [2020] VCC 1380 (2 September 2020) – Victorian County Court

‘Arson’ – ‘Domestic violence’ – ‘Protection order’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Separation’ – ‘Threats to kill’

Charges: Contravention of a DFV protection order x 1; Arson x 1.

Proceedings: Sentencing.

Facts: The male perpetrator plead guilty to breach of a protection order by threatening to kill his female former partner and arson. After an argument the offender called his former partner and threatened to ‘come to her house and blow her and her family up’. He entered her home, and despite his father’s atempts to calm him, threw thinner over the couch and lounge room floor, stating he would burn the house down with his former partner in it. Some of the thinner (accidentally) caught fire on the gas heater causing an explosion. The offender and his father escaped the fire; however, the house was destroyed.

Issues: Sentencing.

Decision and reasoning: Sentenced to time served, followed by a community corrections order for 12 months with conditions designed to continue rehabilitation by way of supervision, mental health and programs to reduce reoffending.

[16] You are fortunate that your vile threats of harm did not cause further injury or damage to your son and his mother. Arson is a very serious offence. In the circumstances of this case, you allowed your rage and anger to get the better of you in a situation in which you recklessly used an accelerant which you well knew and believed would probably result in damage or destruction to property. It is important in your case, as the learned prosecutor made clear very fairly during the course of the plea, that two factors need to be recognised.

[17] The first is that this was not a case in which you burnt down a property either to damage it intentionally or to prevent or deny another its enjoyment or ownership, and that having properly classified and understood the modus in which the fire started in a seemingly accidental way which nevertheless carries the inference of intention, and secondly, that your intention at the time was to hurt yourself by fire, even endangering your own father; intent which should be also noted you put into effect, not by arming yourself with an accelerant fuel but because your work made it available to you through a thinner which you already had available to you.

[18] The circumstances significantly reduce in my view the gravity of the offending and your moral culpability. You have, by your plea, accepted responsibility legally and I accept you are remorseful for your actions.

DPP v Jenkins* [2020] VCC 749 (4 June 2020) – Victorian County Court

'Covid-19 pandemic' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Guilty plea at commencement of trial' – 'History of domestic violence' – 'Lengthy procedural history' – 'Obsessive and controlling behaviour' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Persistent offending' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Rape' – 'Self-represented litigants' – 'Separation' – 'Sex offender registration' – 'Significant criminal history' – 'Stalking'

Charges: 11 charges, including rape x 2; destroying or damaging property x 1; causing injury intentionally or recklessly x 1; threats to kill x 3; assault x 3; stalking x 1

Case type: Sentence

Facts: The majority of offending was committed against Ms Burgess (the victim), with whom the male accused was in an intimate relationship ([12]). Their relationship was marred by excessive drug and alcohol consumption, physical and sexual violence and stalking. The accused regularly argued with the victim about his paranoid suspicions concerning her infidelity ([13]). The controlling and obsessive behaviour became more severe over time. On one occasion, the victim threatened to stab him before self-harming, demonstrating the level of stress she was suffering at the time ([17]). The accused's controlling behaviour continued. He checked her emails and social media accounts, accessed her phone without permission and tracked her location. He also broke her phone after she refused to give it to him ([18]-[20]).

On 5 October 2017, he raped ([23]-[24]) and physically abused the victim ([25], [27]) and threatened to cut her throat ([26]). A week later, he pushed the victim to the ground after she had told him that their relationship was over and demanded him to leave the premises ([29]). After this incident, the accused was arrested, and released on bail with conditions prohibiting contact with the victim ([30]). Despite this order, he continued to text and ring the victim, track her location and loiter near her home. One evening, the victim allowed the accused to enter her house, where he accused her of sleeping with other people, physically assaulted her and grabbed her phone ([34]-[40]). The accused continued to contact the victim, causing further distress and fear, and later threatened to cut the victim's and a police officer's throat ([41]-[43]).

There was a significant delay in resolving the matter, and the accused was unrepresented for most of the proceeding, including the plea hearing. His guilty pleas were entered at the commencement of trial ([51]-[52]). The Court held that "the fairest and most appropriate course" was to ensure that he was not punished for adopting a "somewhat uncooperative approach" ([56]), and that his guilty pleas still entitled him to a sizeable reduction in sentence ([57]).

Held: The accused's personal circumstances and criminal history are discussed at paragraphs [58] to [75]. He abused alcohol and drugs from an early age, and had previously seen doctors for drug dependency, depression, drug psychosis and attempted suicides. Although he had suffered numerous head injuries, a neuropsychologist concluded that he did not have an acquired brain injury ([64]-[65]). He also has a significant criminal history, including past convictions for recklessly causing injury, indecent assault, contravening a family violence intervention order, and making threats to kill ([69]-[70]). He has also been convicted of a number of offences against former intimate partners and has breached a family violence safety notice on several occasions ([71]-[73]).

The Court found that the accused's conduct was "absolutely appalling". He had "gained [the victim's] trust and formed an intimate relationship with her only to go on to degrade and demean her at the whim of [his] paranoid obsessions". The rape, assaults and threats to kill demonstrated the kind of behaviour to which she was subject for the duration of their relationship ([85]). The rape was particularly serious, because it was committed in the context of an initially trusting and intimate relationship, and involved the use of force and violence ([86]). The charge of stalking was also serious as the accused went to great lengths to control and abuse the victim in a "pathologically unfeeling" manner. He also knowingly disregarded court orders intended to protect the victim from his conduct ([87]). The Court assessed his moral culpability for the offending as "very high", and accepted the prosecutor's submission that the physical and sexual violence he inflicted on his partner requires just punishment and strong denunciation ([88]). Further, the accused had prior convictions, indicating a tendency to treat intimate partners violently ([89]). The accused appeared to have some "incipient insight" into his conduct and the necessary steps to address his drug problem and attitude towards women ([92]). Whilst he apologised for his behaviour, the Court did not place a great deal of weight on that assertion as there was no evidence that indicated that he was genuinely remorseful for the harm caused to the victim.

The Court was also not confident of his prospects for rehabilitation, but took into account that any sentence imposed must not be crushing ([93]).

Consequently, the Court granted the Crown's application to have the accused report under the Sex Offenders Registration Act 2004 for the "rest of [his] life" as he poses a real risk to the sexual safety of women ([95]-[101]). He was convicted of all charges (except one count of rape), and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 9 years' imprisonment with a non-parole period of 7 years ([115]).

Director of Public Prosecutions v Linton [2020] VCC 515 (28 April 2020) – Victorian County Court

'Female perpetrator' – 'History as victim of family and domestic violence as child' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Substance misuse' – 'Verdins principles' – 'Weapon'

Offences: Recklessly causing serious injury x 1; Possessing drug of dependence x 1

Proceedings: Sentencing

Facts: The female offender and male victim had been in a relationship that ended six months prior to the offending, but had started spending time together one to two months before the offending. One night, the offender picked up the victim from a pub and they visited the victim's cousin's house where they played pool and used drugs. The offender and the victim left around 2am and returned to the offender's bungalow where an argument broke out. The offender stabbed the victim on the left side of his chest with a pair of scissors. The victim left the bungalow and called emergency services. The offender sent text messages to the victim asking him if he was alright, but the focus of the messages was very much on the offender's own needs. The victim suffered a left haemopneumothorax, haemopericardium, a punctured lung and fluid overload, and was admitted to the ICU. The victim initially attempted to protect the offender by not telling police she was the one who caused the injuries, and the offender feigned ignorance when questioned by police, but later the victim told police what had really happened.

Judgment: The sentencing judge ordered that the offender be placed on a community corrections order for three years during which the offender was to complete 300 hours of community work and participate in rehabilitation programs for drug use and mental health issues. The judge also ordered that the offender be subject to judicial monitoring. Her Honour held that "a community corrections order can be punitive, achieve deterrence, and may be suitable even in cases of relatively serious offences such as this, which might have previously attracted a medium term of imprisonment" [72].

Her Honour held that the offender "committed a serious criminal offence with serious consequences" for the victim by inflicting an injury when the victim "had little, if any, chance to know what was happening", using a hidden weapon [19]. However, her Honour accepted that the act was impulsive, without premeditation, and that the actual consequences of the attack were "probably unintended" [20].

Her Honour emphasised the need to give significant weight to general deterrence, as the offence was committed in a domestic violence setting [21]. However, she noted several factors that impacted on the weight to be given to general deterrence in this case. Specifically, the offender's young age, the offender suffered physical and emotional abuse from her former stepfather (and witnessed her mother being subjected to this too) and older brother, the offender abused drugs, the offender had an unstable and volatile upbringing, and the offender had a long history of mental health issues. Her Honour accepted that the offender had committed to positive change and had engaged in a variety of alcohol and drug treatment programs. She also accepted that the offender had personality difficulties which, when combined with her use of ice and other drugs, resulted in difficulty thinking clearly and rationally and impaired her judgment at the time of the offence [43]. Her Honour accepted that there was therefore a basis for limited reduction to moral culpability for the offences [44].

Her Honour somewhat applied limbs 5 and 6 of the decision in R v Verdins & Ors [2007] QSCA 102. Limb 5 refers to the existence of a condition at the date of sentencing which may mean that a given sentence would weigh more heavily on an offender than a person in normal health. Limb 6 refers to a serious risk of the imprisonment having a significant adverse effect on mental health. The judge noted the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic on the offender if she were to be imprisoned, particularly in light of her mental health issues and her strong family support base (which she would be unable to access if imprisoned).

Her Honour held that less weight needed to be given to specific deterrence and protecting the community from the offender because of her lack of criminal history. A discount was given to recognise the utilitarian benefit of the offender's early guilty plea.

Magistrates' Court

DPP v Cope (a pseudonym) [2021] VMC 014 (17 September 2021) – Magistrates' Court of Victoria

'Honest and reasonable mistake of fact' – 'Mens rea' – 'Protection order' – 'Statutory interpretation'

Charges: Contravention of family violence intervention order x 1.

Proceedings: Judgement.

Issues: Whether section 123(2) of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 ('the Act') was a strict liability offence.

Facts: The accused was charged with beaching a family violence intervention order, an offence pursuant to s 123(2) ('the offence') of the Act, by being within 200m of the victim's workplace. Magistrate Foster accepted that the address was unknown to the accused and not specified by the order. However, the prosecution argued that proof of mens rea was not required, because s 123(2) was an offence of strict liability. The prosecution also argued that the accused had not made out the defence of honest and reasonable mistake of fact.

Decision and Reasoning: The charges were dismissed.

Applying He Kaw Teh v The Queen [1985] HCA 43; (1985) 157 CLR 523, Magistrate Foster found that the presumption of mens rea had not been displaced. The aggravated versions of the offence explicitly required proof of a mens rea element ([45]). Therefore, it would be inconsistent with the structure and operation of the act for the offence to be one of strict liability. All three offences carried considerable terms of imprisonment. His Honour highlighted that 'a strong presumption exists that proof of mens rea is necessary where an offence carries serious sanctions' [57]. 'The serious nature of… family violence and… serious consequences for all three… offences strongly suggests that the presumption of mens rea has not been displaced' [48]. Furthermore, the absence of a mens rea element would not assist with the enforcement of the offence (see [59]). It would be counter intuitive and 'contrary… to the spirit of the act' [71] to require the accused to take steps to remain aware of the details of victim's workplace, which was not specified by the order. His Honour found that it was not necessary to address whether the accused had proven the defence of mistaken fact, but explained that the defence would have been established due to evidence that the accused had no reason to believe that the victim worked within 200ms of the café (see [82]-[84] and [97]).

Civil and Administrative Tribunal

ZHC v Victims of Crime Assistance Tribunal (Review and Regulation) (Corrected) [2022] VCAT 333 (30 March 2022) – Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal

'Administrative review' – 'Application for assistance' – 'Children' – 'Coercive control' – 'Decision not to pursue charges' – 'Financial abuse' – 'People affected by trauma' – 'Physical violence' – 'Pregnant victim' – 'Reasonable assistance' – 'Reasonable time' – 'Special circumstances' – 'Threats to kill' – 'Victims of crime assistance act 1996'

Proceedings: Review of decision to strike out the victim's application for assistance pursuant to section 52 of the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 1996 ('the VOCA Act').

Issue: Was the act of violence reported within a reasonable time?

Facts: Under Section 52 of the VOCA Act, an award of assistance must be refused if the Tribunal is satisfied that an act of violence was not reported to police within a reasonable time, or that the applicant failed to provide reasonable assistance to investigators. The section does not apply if the Tribunal considers a delay in reporting, or lack of assistance, to be the result of the applicant's 'special circumstances' [3]. In May 2021, the victim's application was refused on the basis that she had failed to report acts of violence by her former partner within a reasonable time. While the victim had reported a protection order breach in December 2020, materials provided to the Tribunal alleged a history of family violence commencing in 2016 [4].

Decision and reasoning: The Tribunal was not satisfied that the victim's application ought to be refused under section 52 of the VOCA Act. The Tribunal found that the acts of violence were reported to police within a reasonable time. The Tribunal highlighted paragraphs (c), (d) and (e) of section 53 of the VOCA Act, which provide that in considering whether an act of violence was reported within a reasonable time, the Tribunal may consider:

(c) 'whether the person who… is alleged to have committed, the act of violence was in a position of power, influence or trust in relation to the victim'
(d) whether the victim was threatened or intimidated by the person who… is alleged to have committed, the act of violence'
(e) 'the nature of the injury alleged to have been suffered by the victim' [12]-[14].

Considering paragraph (c), the Tribunal noted that the victim's former partner exerted power and influence her through acts of physical violence, which escalated during her pregnancy, and by controlling her finances. Considering paragraph (d), the victim felt intimidated and threatened by her former partner. This was evidenced by a protection order application, and evidence that the victim's former partner had made threats to harm or kill the victim or their child if she left the relationship. Considering paragraph (e), the victim sustained serious physical injuries due to her former partner's assaults, including cuts, broken teeth, and post-traumatic stress disorder [15]-[19].

The Tribunal was not required to consider whether the victim had provided 'reasonable assistance', or whether 'special circumstances' existed. However, the Tribunal explained that a decision not to pursue charges or provide a statement to assist police to arrest, investigate or prosecute does not amount to a failure to provide reasonable assistance [30]-[31].

Furthermore, the Tribunal noted that the facts exemplified 'special circumstances' [43]. Due to the nature of the violence perpetrated against the victim, the fact that the couple lived together, and the applicant's repeated contravention of protection orders, the victim was unlikely to make immediate reports to police [44]. Rather, the victim prioritised 'more effective mechanisms that would keep her safe', such as a protection order [45]-[48].

Western Australia

Court of Appeal

State of WA v Williams* [2022] WASCA 105 (11 August 2022) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Appeal' – 'Appeal against refusal to make declaration offender is a serial domestic family violence offender' – 'Criminal law' – 'Family violence legislation reform act 2020 (wa)' – 'Whether declaration can be made following conviction for family violence offence committed prior to commencement of legislation' – 'Whether legislation operates retrospectively'

Proceedings: Appeal against refusal to make a declaration that offender is a serial domestic family violence offender.

Facts: The Family Violence Legislative Reform Act 2020 (WA) by s 29 inserted s 124E into the Sentencing Act 1995 (WA). The amendment commenced on 1 January 2021. It provides that where an offender has been convicted of at least three prescribed offences, with at least three of them having been committed on different days, a judge may declare the offender to be a serial family violence offender, consequences of which include a presumption against the grant of bail, and specific sentencing options.

In September 2021 the offender was convicted of three offences, including one prescribed offence, committed on 14 November 2020. He had a prior record of 11 prescribed offences committed against Ms C. The trial judge did not declare him to be a serial family violence offender on the basis that to do so would infringe the presumption against the retrospective operation of statutes. The State appealed the decision not to declare Williams a serial family violence offender.

Grounds: The primary judge erroneously concluded that s 124E(l) of the Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) did not apply to the 'family violence offences' for which the respondent had been convicted because those offences occurred prior to the commencement of that statutory provision, and that to hold otherwise would infringe the presumption against the retrospective operation of statutes. The discretionary power in s 124E should have been exercised to declare the respondent to be a serial family violence offender.

Decision and Reasoning: Appeal granted; appeal allowed; matter remitted to consider whether to make declaration.

The Court held that s124E could apply to offences committed before its commencement. First, the section conferred a discretion on a court to make such a declaration [45]. The 'trigger' for the discretion is the 'convicting' of an offender by the court, which 'speaks prospectively, that is, it only applies to a 'conviction' occurring after the commencement of the section' [46]. Secondly, while the statutory preconditions required to enliven the discretion might include events that occurred before the section commenced, 'that does not give the section a retrospective operation' [47]. Thirdly, where a court makes a declaration, the consequences only affect an offender's rights in the future [48]. Finally, even the disqualification from being authorized to use firearms or explosives is 'prospective only; it does not make any such licence, permit, approval or authorisation invalid at any time in the past' [52].

CEG v Wright* [2022] WASCA 42 (1 April 2022) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Appeal' – 'Assault' – 'Audio recording evidence' – 'Child protection' – 'Evidence' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Pregnancy' – 'Strangulation' – 'Use of extended family' – 'Victim credibility'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against conviction.

Issues: Whether it was open to the jury to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was guilty.

Facts: The female complainant and male appellant were married for 10 years and had 4 children.

The couple's fourth child died in May 2019, approximately 6 weeks after being born prematurely. In July 2019, the couple's remaining children were removed from their care. During an argument about child custody proceedings, the appellant slapped and attempted to suffocate the complainant. An audio recording of the incident was captured by a listening device. The appellant was found guilty following jury trial and appealed on the ground that the verdict was unsupported by the evidence. The appellant argued that the complainant lacked credibility by making submissions about inconsistencies in her evidence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Court rejected the appellant's submissions and affirmed the findings of the primary judge. The Court stated that 'the recordings provided irrefutable, independent evidence that strongly supported the prosecution case' and the complainant's oral evidence. The Court stated that the audio recording contained 'sounds… consistent with the impact of a hand to the face or head', and a record of the complainant crying, complaining of being hit, and 'pleading with the appellant not to hit her again' [21]. Furthermore, the recording contained 'muffled sounds consistent with the complainant being forced down into pillows or bedding', a record of the appellant threatening to kill the complainant several times, and the complainant saying 'get off me' [23]. The Court found that any inconsistencies or omissions in the complainant's evidence were minor and did not 'justify a conclusion that the complainant was a generally untruthful or unreliable witness'. Moreover, the Court stated that complainant's poor memory of the incident did not detract from her evidence, which 'was strongly supported by the audio recording' of the argument, and an audio recording in which the appellant made references to having hit the complainant [76]. Furthermore, the Court considered the fact that English was the complainant's second language and found that a statutory declaration signed by the complainant, which stated that the appellant had not physically harmed her, had been signed 'at the behest of her father-in-law without' the complainant having understood them.

Turner v State of Western Australia [2021] WASCA 158 (3 September 2021) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Appeal against conviction' – 'Children' – 'Defense of insanity' – 'Evidence' – 'Intention' – 'Jury directions' – 'Misdirection or non-direction' – 'Murder' – 'Reasonable doubt' – 'Separation' – 'Unsound mind'

Charges: Murder.

Proceedings: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The male appellant killed the female victim, his former partner with a kitchen knife at the conclusion of a pre-trial conference held at the Joondalup Courthouse in relation to legal proceedings the appellant had brought in the Magistrates Court claiming a debt from the victim. The parties had been in a relationship for 6 years and had two primary school aged children and were engaged in child custody and property settlement disputes. The circumstances and cause of the victim's death were uncontested [1]-[15]. At trial, the appellant unsuccessfully raised the defence of unsound mind on the basis that he had suffered from a dissociative seizure when he stabbed the victim [23]. The appellant was found guilty of murder.

Grounds: The appellant appealed on the ground 'that there was a miscarriage of justice when the learned trial Judge failed to direct or adequately direct the jury that evidence going to insanity, but not establishing it, was relevant and admissible on the issue of specific intent' [20], [53]. This evidence 'should have caused the jury to doubt that the appellant was capable of forming' an 'intent to cause death' or 'intent to cause bodily injury of such a nature as to endanger, or to be likely to endanger, the life of the person killed' [51]. The evidence related to the nature of the stab wounds, the knife used, the location of the incident, and aspects of appellant's account that were consistent with expert evidence on dissociative seizures [52].

Decision and Reasoning: Appeal dismissed.

Justices Buss, Mitchell and Morrison stated that:

> …the directions were adequate. Taken as a whole, the trial Judge's direction conveyed to the jury that they were to have regard to the whole of the evidence, including the evidence referred to [in the appellant's submissions] in deciding whether the State had proven the requisite intention beyond reasonable doubt. Even if the trial Judge's direction had not done so, it would not have given rise to any miscarriage of justice… because the evidence… considered in light of other evidence led at trial, was not capable of giving rise to any reasonable doubt as to the appellant's capacity to form the requisite intent, or as to whether he did form the requisite intent [52]-[55].

> …[i]n our view, the only reasonable inference open on the whole of the evidence, considered in light of the presumption of sanity, was that the appellant was acting purposefully, with a requisite intention for murder, and he could not have killed Ms Thomas while in a dissociative seizure. No miscarriage of justice could arise from any failure of the trial Judge to give a more specific direction about the jury having regard to evidence when considering the issue of intent, when the relevant evidence was not capable of giving rise to a reasonable doubt as to whether the appellant intended to kill Ms Thomas, or inflict an objectively life-threatening injury upon her [108].

Noi v The State of Western Australia* [2021] WASCA 84 (18 May 2021) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aggravated home burglary' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Control' – 'Damaging property' – 'Intimidation' – 'Protection orders' – 'Unlawful damage'

Charges: Aggravated home burglary x 1; Unlawful damage x 2.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male appellant and female victim were former de facto partners, and have 2 children. They had been separated for approximately 8 years. Shortly after a three-day order protecting the victim expired, the appellant attended the victim's residence to show the victim and their son "who was the boss". He kicked in the front door, and wilfully destroyed the television. He said: "you can get a restraining order that lasts for two years, it's not going to make any difference", and smashed the victim's phone as she tried to call 000. The appellant was arrested and pleaded guilty. He was sentenced to 2 years immediate imprisonment, with eligibility for parole.

Grounds of appeal:

1. A miscarriage of justice occurred when the sentencing judge "adopted the matters set out in the pre-sentence report" and found the offences indicated that the appellant "harboured feelings of entitlement consistent with being a domestic violence perpetrator".
2. Sentences of immediate imprisonment were manifestly excessive as to type and the sentencing judge should have imposed conditionally suspended sentences.
3. 2 years' immediate imprisonment for the aggravated home burglary offence was manifestly excessive as to length.

Held: Application for leave to appeal on ground 1 was dismissed. Leave to appeal on grounds 2 and 3 was also refused and the appeal dismissed.

Ground 1: No reasonable prospect of success.

The finding the offending was "a form of domestic violence" was based on the sentencing judge's own assessment of the circumstances, rather than the impugned pre-sentence report/feelings of entitlement.

"[45]… the sentencing judge was plainly correct to characterise the offending as a form of domestic violence. The victim was the appellant's former de facto partner and the mother of his two children (the children being co-parented by the appellant and the victim). The appellant violently forced entry into the victim's home, when he knew she was present, by kicking in the front door. This occurred shortly after the expiry of a police order protecting the victim. The appellant wilfully damaged her property, including a mobile phone which was a means of seeking help, while threatening that the victim obtaining a 2 year restraining order would make no difference. He was clearly using violence to intimidate his former partner with whom he shared the care of their two children. The pre-sentence report was not required to conclude that the offending was a form of domestic violence. Additionally, the report was not actually relied upon by the sentencing judge for the purposes of reaching that conclusion. Even if the pre-sentence report had been relied upon for that purpose, there would be no miscarriage of justice as, in our view, it could not reasonably be contended that the offending in this case did not constitute a form of domestic violence."

Finding that the appellant intended to intimidate the victim was inevitable, given the admitted conduct constituting the offence.

Grounds 2 and 3: The sentences were not arguably unreasonable or plainly unjust. The offending was serious, as the sentencing judge observed:

> "As I've explained, the offending here is serious and included forced entry and the offending being carried out with an intent to intimidate and to assert control over your ex-partner. The offending also instilled fear in her, which it was intended to do."

JLD v The State of WA* [2020] WASCA 156 (18 September 2020) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aggravated assault' – 'Aggravated rape' – 'Application for leave to appeal against refusal to grant bail' – 'Coercive control' – 'Domestic violence' – 'Immolation' – 'Risk assessment' – 'Technology-facilitated abuse'

Charges: Aggravated sexual penetration without consent x 1; Common assault in circumstances of aggravation x 1; Threats to injure, endanger or harm any person x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against refusal to grant bail.

Facts: The male appellant and female complainant were married in 2015. The complainant first reported domestic violence to relevant services in October 2019. The complainant reported that the appellant was emotionally abusive, jealous and controlling, including requiring the complainant to disclose her Facebook password to him, 'monitor[ing] and question[ing] her on every expenditure on their bank statement' and telling the complainant there was a 'hidden camera in the house' [22]-[23].

In February 2020, during an argument, the appellant made threats against the complainant including: '[y]ou and your daughter deserved to be burned alive like the Queensland family' and accused the complainant of infidelity.

In March 2020, the complainant was recovering from surgery at home. The appellant demanded that the complainant have sex with him. When she refused, he forced her legs open and slapped her in the face saying ‘I’m still your husband and you’re bound to do it’ before raping her. A DFV protection order was made against the appellant to protect the complainant and her daughter.

Grounds: The primary judge erred in finding that the appellant posed a significant risk of interfering with the complainant such that there were no conditions that could be imposed on bail that could sufficiently protect the complainant.

Decision and reasoning: Leave to appeal refused. Appeal dismissed.

The primary judge was entitled to receive and take into account the information in the bail risk assessment report (prepared by a family violence worker).

[69] The risk assessment report, and the information on which the report was based, raised issues of serious concern in relation to the appellant’s psychological or psychiatric state and the safety and welfare of the complainant and her daughter if the appellant were to be granted bail. There were reasonable grounds, based on that information, for apprehending that the appellant may have engaged in an escalating process of serious family violence of a sexual character, including threats of greater violence, and may attempt to interfere with the complainant as a witness.

The primary judge was correct to reject the appellant’s submission that the nature of the complainant’s employment indicated that she had support in the community and was not vulnerable:

[26(c)] Her Honour rejected the appellant’s submission that the nature of the complainant’s employment indicated that she had support in the community and was not vulnerable. Her Honour said that offences of domestic violence are not confined to offences against unemployed women at home and that serious domestic violence against women occurs at all levels of society and affects all occupations (ts 4 - 5).

[80] Her Honour was obliged to have regard to matters favourable to the appellant’s application, including the presumption of innocence, the absence of a prior criminal record, the fact that the appellant had not actually interfered with the complainant (or any other person) as a witness, his stable and well-paid employment, his need to work to obtain revenue to meet his expenses including the cost of legal representation for his trial, the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic and the time that would elapse before his trial could be listed for hearing.

We are satisfied that her Honour had regard to all matters which militated in favour of a grant of bail.

However, the nature and extent of the relevant risk justified her Honour's decision to refuse bail.

The State of Western Australia v Clark [2020] WASCA 103 (25 June 2020) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Attempted murder' – 'Children' – 'Controlling, jealous, obsessive behaviour' – 'Home burglary' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Self-harm' – 'State appeal against sentence' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Unlawful assault whilst in the place of another person without that person's consent x 1; attempted murder committed in the course of an aggravated home burglary x 1

Case type: State appeal against sentence

Facts: The respondent was convicted after trial and was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment on the count of attempted murder in the course of an aggravated home burglary and to 3 years' 6 months' imprisonment for unlawful assault, to be served concurrently such that the total effective sentence was 15 years.

The respondent man and his female ex-partner had been in a relationship for approximately 10 years and had 4 children. They separated in 2017. The respondent had difficulty accepting the end of the relationship, particularly the prospect of his ex-partner dating other men. On the night before the offending the respondent fabricated an incident by texting himself purporting to be from a man who recently had sex with her. The next morning, the respondent broke in to her house and asked her to reconcile. She declined and told him that another man was in her bed (the victim). The respondent took a knife from the kitchen and threw it across the room then left.

Later than morning he returned armed with a knife, assaulted the victim and slashed him across the face causing life-threatening injuries. He also attacked the victim with a screwdriver. The respondent left the house with the knives and began to cut his own wrist with one of them.

The trial judge made the following findings of fact: (1) the respondent did not act in self-defence, but attacked the victim with dangerous weapons; (2) the respondent entered the bedroom with the intention of killing the victim, and this intention was not only momentary; (3) the attack on the victim was premeditated - after leaving the house on the first occasion, he returned with a weapon and entered the house without consent and with an intention to attack the victim; (4) the attack was persistent and violent; (5) the attack resulted in a very serious injury to the victim's face and was likely to have endangered his life without medical treatment. The victim now has permanent facial disfigurement; (6) the respondent fled the scene and rendered no assistance to the victim; (7) the offending likely traumatised his ex-partner; (8) the respondent did not accept responsibility for his offending and sought to blame the victim; and (9) the respondent displayed limited remorse and victim empathy ([34]).

The respondent had a prior criminal record, including a conviction for domestic violence in relation to his ex-partner so was not a person of previous good character ([36]). He had used drugs since he was 18 years old, experienced marked issues with emotional arousal and regulation, and was diagnosed with ADD as a child. Further, longstanding issues with trust, impulsivity, a sense of betrayal, being made a fool of, perceived injustices and poorly developed decision making and coping skills were relevant factors in his offending. The trial judge did not accept that the respondent's health issues, including ADD and epilepsy, reduced his moral culpability for the offending or reduced the necessity for general deterrence.

Issue: The appellant sought leave to adduce further evidence and appealed his conviction on the basis that the verdict was unreasonable or could not be supported having regard to the entirety of the evidence. He also submitted that the evidence against him was unreliable, inconsistent and not capable of supporting a verdict of guilty on Count 3, and that there was no corroborative evidence in relation to the complainant's allegations as to how the strangulation occurred. The Crown argued that whilst there were weaknesses in the complainant's evidence in terms of her reliability, those factors were fairly outlined by the trial judge in the summing up, and that the complainant's evidence was able to be supported by other evidence.

Ground: The sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Held: The Court allowed the appeal, and imposed a total effective sentence was 17 years' imprisonment ([86]). The Court considered the maximum penalty, the statutory minimum penalty, the facts, circumstances and seriousness of the offending (including the victim's vulnerability and circumstances), the importance of appropriate punishment and personal and general deterrence as sentencing considerations, and all aggravating and mitigating factors. It held that the sentence of 15 years' imprisonment was not commensurate with the seriousness of the respondent's offending, and was substantially less than the sentencing outcome that was properly open to the trial judge ([77]).

S 283(2) Criminal Code was introduced "to ensure that burglars who commit numerous home invasions, which can involve serious violent offences, are incarcerated for longer periods; to deter such offenders; to ensure that such offenders are kept out of circulation longer; and to reflect community abhorrence of such offending" ([56]). Section 6(1) Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) provides that a sentence must be commensurate with the seriousness of the offence ([59]). The respondent's offending was a serious example of offending of this type. The attack was premeditated, persistent, and was carried out with weapons. The respondent's intention to kill the victim was not held only momentarily, but was present while he was inflicting the injuries. After attacking the victim, he fled the scene and rendered no assistance to him ([70]). Although his prior criminal record did not aggravate the seriousness of the offending, it indicated that he was not entitled to leniency on the ground that he was of previous good character ([72]). He did not take responsibility for his actions and denied criminal responsibility ([74]). Mitigating circumstances were limited: he had a difficult and problematic childhood, made appropriate concessions at trial which facilitated the administration of justice, showed some remorse and victim empathy, and completed a number of courses and had positively responded to his incarceration ([76]).

The State of Western Australia v Radovic 2020 WASCA 46 (8 April 2020) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Attempted murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection order' – 'Separation' – 'Threats to kill'

Charges: Possessing an offensive weapon in circumstances likely to cause fear to other persons x1; Attempted murder x1;

Appeal type: State appeal against sentence

Grounds: The sentence for the charge of attempted murder was manifestly inadequate having regard to:

- The maximum penalty for the offence;
  - The person the respondent intended to kill was a police officer;
  - The respondent knew the victim was a police officer before he struck;
  - The respondent came to the premises armed with a sword which he knew was sharp and which he was adept at using;
  - The respondent used the sword to strike to victim in an vulnerable area which was likely to result in fatal injury;

- The offence was committed in front of witnesses; and
- The offence was committed in breach of the respondent's VRO and community based order;

- The serious nature of the offence and the circumstances in which it was committed, including:
- The serious impact of the offence on the victim and his family;
- The personal circumstances of the respondent;
- The importance of personal deterrence considering the respondent's criminal history; and
- The importance of general deterrence and punishment for offences of this nature.

Facts: The respondent man pleaded guilty to the charge of possessing an offensive weapon and was convicted following trial of the charge of attempted murder. He was sentenced to 4 years' imprisonment for possession of an offensive weapon and 9 year's imprisonment for attempted murder. The sentences were backdated to the day of offending and ordered to be served concurrently, resulting in a total effective sentence of 9 years' imprisonment. The ground of appeal relates to the sentence imposed on the charge of attempted murder.

At the time of offending the respondent was the subject of a violence restraining order ('VRO') which prevented the respondent from contact or communicating with his former wife (Radovic) or any of their three children. The day before the offending, the respondent made an application seeking to vary the terms of the VRO. The former wife was opposed to the changes and the matter was adjourned. The next day, the respondent attended the workplace of Radovic's brother armed with a samurai sword. Radovic's brother was not there at the time. Later that day, the respondent went to the unit Radovic's brother and sister shared, banged on the door and shouted threats to kill them. The Respondent did not know that Radovic and her children lived in the unit adjacent to her siblings'. Some of the children witnessed the display and police were called to the scene. The officers arrived in a marked vehicle and attended Radovic's unit to take the children's statements. Radovic arrived shortly after.

The Respondent returned to the unit while police were still there with the samurai sword and began to brandish his sword in a manner that caused fear to those present, constituting the first charge, while threatening to kill them. A witnesses alerted the police and the officers left the unit and approached the respondent. The respondent rushed towards one of the officers with the sword raised, prompting the officer to discharge his taser at the respondent, to no effect. The respondent then swung the sword and forcefully struck the officer's head. This action formed the basis of the attempted murder charge and caused two lacerations. The respondent was eventually subdued and arrested.

Judgment: The sentence for attempted murder was manifestly inadequate and the respondent was re-sentenced to 13 years' imprisonment.

None of the previous cases concerned truly comparable offending [60]. There is no tariff or usual sentencing range for a charge of attempted murder, sentences are variable and while all offences are very serious each case will turn on its own facts [61]. This was a very serious example of offending [62]. The Court found the fact that the fact that the victim was a police officer executing his duties was a "profoundly aggravating feature" [64]. They noted that "[p]olice officers are often required to place their safety at risk in carrying out their duty to protect the public. It is vital that the courts impose significant custodial sentences upon offenders who intentionally cause serious injury to police officers acting in the course of their duties" [63]. Personal and general deterrence were thought to have particular importance especially in light of the respondent's criminal history [66]. In light of the limited mitigation available to the respondent, it was found that the sentence was "substantially less than the sentence open on a proper exercise of the sentencing discretion" [72] because of the seriousness of the offence and aggravating features.

Larsen v The State of Western Australia* [2019] WASCA 181 (15 November 2019) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Application for leave to adduce additional evidence' – 'Application for leave to appeal against conviction following guilty pleas' – 'Burglary' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Mandatory minimum sentence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Stalking' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Being armed in a way that may cause fear x 1; aggravated home burglary x 1; act intended to cause grievous bodily harm or prevent arrest committed in the course of an aggravated home burglary x 1.

Case type: Applications for leave to adduce additional evidence, application for leave to appeal against conviction following guilty pleas

Grounds:

1. The appellant suffered a miscarriage of justice in relation to Count 3 because he pleaded guilty to the charge without understanding its nature.
2. There was an abuse of process by reason of the amendment of the indictment on the morning of the appellant's sentencing.

3. The appellant suffered a miscarriage of justice by failing to apply for an adjournment of the proceedings in respect of Counts 2 and 3 following the amendment of the indictment.

Facts: The appellant was convicted on his guilty pleas of being armed with a dangerous instrument, namely a knife, in circumstances likely to cause fear to any person (Count 1), aggravated home burglary (Count 2), and unlawful wounding with intent to maim, disfigure, disable or do some grievous bodily harm in the course of the aggravated home burglary, contrary to s 294(1) and (2) Criminal Code (Count 3). On Count 3, the appellant was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment, and received concurrent terms of imprisonment with respect to the other offences. Count 3 on the indictment was amended on the day of the appellant's sentencing. The appellant claimed that he had not been advised of the nature of the amended charge or that the amended charge carried a mandatory 15 year sentence of imprisonment.

The circumstances of the offending are as follows. In 2016, the appellant and victim met through an online website, and commenced an intimate relationship. Their relationship eventually broke down, and a violence restraining order protecting the victim was served on the appellant in late-2016. In 2017, the appellant breached the restraining order by attempting to communicate with the victim via mobile. He called the victim 243 times in an attempt to contact her. The appellant continued to breach the order by following the victim to her sister’s unit. Once inside the unit, he slashed and stabbed the victim with a knife in a frenzied and concerted attempt to seriously injure her. The victim feared that she was going to die. Family, neighbours and other members of the public intervened in the appellant’s assault, and he was eventually restrained.

Held: Applications for leave to adduce additional evidence granted; application for leave to appeal on ground 1 granted, appeal dismissed; applications for leave to appeal on grounds 2 and 3 dismissed. It is difficult to set aside a conviction based on a guilty plea, because there is a strong public interest in the finality of proceedings. There are 3 well-recognised circumstances in which courts may set aside guilty pleas: (1) the appellant did not understand the nature of the charge or intend to admit guilt; (2) upon the admitted facts, the appellant could not, in law, have been guilty of the offence; or (3) the guilty plea was obtained by improper inducement, fraud or intimidation ([44]-[46]). The appellant alleged that he suffered a miscarriage of justice because had he been informed that he would be liable to be sentenced to a mandatory minimum sentence of 15 years' imprisonment, he would have pleaded not guilty ([50]).

Mazza and Beech JJA rejected the submissions that the appellant did not understand the element of intent in Count 3 ([88]) and the fact that if he pleaded guilty to Count 3, he would be liable to a mandatory minimum sentence of 15 years' imprisonment ([89]-[106]). The appellant understood the advice which he was given ([97]). Their Honours also dismissed the alleged abuse of process for two reasons: first, there was no abuse in the making of an application to amend the indictment, and second, the amendment was unnecessary and did not prejudice the appellant because he was liable to the minimum term stipulated in s 294(2) regardless of whether the indictment stated that the offence was committed in the course of a home burglary ([111]). After analysing the authorities, their Honours determined that the State was not required to plead that fact in order to make the offender liable to the mandatory minimum penalty in s 294(2) ([123]). Ground 3 was found to have no reasonable prospects of success, as the appellant did not suffer a miscarriage of justice as a result of his counsel failing to seek an adjournment of the sentencing principles ([128]-[129]).

Allanson J agreed with the orders and reasons of Mazza and Beech JJA, but believed that it was not necessary to decide whether the State was required to plead that the offence in Count 3 was committed in the course of conduct that constituted an aggravated home burglary in order to make the appellant liable to the mandatory minimum penalty in s 294(2) of the Code. That the appellant failed to show that he did not understand the indictment, as amended, or the advice given to him, was sufficient reason to refuse leave to appeal on Ground 2 ([133]).

The State of Western Australia v TLP* [2019] WASCA 66 (24 April 2019) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Manifestly inadequate' – 'Older people' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Totality principle'

Charges: Aggravated grievous bodily harm x 1; Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm x 1; Aggravated sexual penetration without consent x 6; Attempted aggravated sexual penetration without consent x 1.

Appeal type: Prosecution appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent attended his grandparents' house. He attacked his grandmother and his half-sister. He punched his grandmother and threw her to the ground. He then attempted and committed acts of sexual penetration on his half-sister including inserting his finger and penis into her vagina and anus performing cunnilingus on her ([34]-[56]).

A circumstance of aggravation was that his relationship with both victims was a family and domestic relationship. In relation to his half-sister, another aggravating circumstance was that he threatened to kill her. In relation to his grandmother, another aggravating circumstance was that she was over the age of 60 ([27]).

The respondent pleaded guilty and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 6 years 6 months' imprisonment ([1]-[2]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate; whether the total effective sentence infringed the first limb of the totality principle by not reflecting the overall criminality.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was allowed. All three Justices agreed that the respondent should be resentenced to 12 years' imprisonment but differed on the appropriate individual sentences.

Mazza and Beech JJA identified the mitigating factors identified by the trial judge (including his pleas of guilty, remorse, prior good record, relatively young age, negative familial experiences and previous bullying) entitled the respondent to some mitigation of his sentence ([93]). However, the individual sentences for each offence were judged to be manifestly inadequate having regard to the maximum sentences and the seriousness of the conduct. Their Honours would have imposed a total sentence of 15 years, but after having a 'last look' to ensure that the total sentence measures the respondent's overall criminality, determined that a sentence of 12 years was appropriate ([115]-[116]).

Buss P would have imposed a total effective sentence of 12 years' imprisonment without requiring a 'last look'. His Honour imposed slightly different sentences for each individual count compared to Mazza and Beech JJA ([20]-[21]).

The State of Western Australia v Yamalulu* [2019] WASCA 6 (14 January 2019) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Breaches of protection orders' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'People with children' – 'Protection order' – 'Sentencing considerations'

Charges: Grievous bodily harm x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: In 2017, the respondent, a Walmajarri man, pleaded guilty to, and was convicted of, one count of unlawfully doing grievous bodily harm in circumstances of aggravation. The respondent was in a family and domestic relationship with the victim and the offending occurred when he was in breach of a violence restraining order which prohibited him from contacting or being within 50 metres of the victim. The respondent and the victim had been in a relationship for approximately three or four years, and had one child aged three at the time of the offence. The relationship had ended due to various incidents of domestic violence. On the night of the offence, the respondent was heavily intoxicated. He found the victim engaging in sex with his brother and subsequently violently assaulted her by throwing her to the ground and jumping on her chest, legs and head. He made attempts to hide from the police and initially gave the police a false name. The victim sustained numerous serious injuries resulting in quadriplegia. The primary judge imposed a sentence of three years and 8 months' immediate imprisonment.

Issues: It was submitted that the sentencing judge fell into error because the sentence was manifestly inadequate on the following grounds:

- The maximum penalty for the offence;
- The exceptionally serious nature of the injuries;
- The serious nature of the offence and the circumstances in which it was committed;
- The need for the sentence to reflect specific and general deterrence;
- The respondent's personal circumstances; and
- The requirement that sentencing be consistent with the standards of sentencing set for offending of this nature.

Decision and reasoning: The Court allowed the appeal, set aside the sentence imposed by the sentencing judge and re-sentenced the respondent. The Court found that the respondent committed 'a frenzied, savage and relentless attack upon a vulnerable, unarmed and defenceless woman' ([68]). He inflicted serious injuries despite the victim's repeated pleas for him to stop attacking her. Their Honours also highlighted that the victim was left permanently disabled with limited prospects of improvement. The respondent had a significant prior criminal history including previous convictions for violent offending against the victim. This history of violence indicated that he should not be afforded any leniency on the ground that he was of good character. Mitigating factors included the respondent's plea of guilty, his remorse and acceptance of responsibility and the adverse effects of his troubled upbringing ([72]). Although the ongoing effects of his childhood deprivation may have diminished his moral culpability, the consequences of his behaviour rendered him a serious threat to women with whom he is or has been in a relationship. Their Honours therefore held that the initial sentence was not merely 'lenient' or 'at the lower end of the available range', but was unreasonable and plainly unjust. A sentence of seven years six months' imprisonment was imposed.

NPA v The State of Western Australia* [2018] WASCA 131 (2 August 2018) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Physical violence and harm' – 'Post-separation violence' – 'Sentencing' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Social and psychological abuse' – 'Strangulation' – 'Totality principle'

Charges: Aggravated sexual penetration without consent x 5; Attempted aggravated sexual penetration without consent x 1; Threat to harm x 1.

Appeal type: Defendant appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and complainant were in an 'on again, off again' relationship. The appellant was controlling, manipulative, and required the complainant to change her mobile phone number so that her family and friends could not contact her. There were two main occasions of sexual offending. On the first occasion, at a time where they had broken up, the appellant was invited to the complainant's house. He held the complainant down and inserted his penis into her vagina ([11]). On the second occasion, the appellant entered the house uninvited. Over the next 8 to 9 hours, the appellant repeatedly raped the complainant, choked her, and smashed a TV remote over her head ([17]-[26]).

The appellant was convicted of the charges and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 12 years' 6 months imprisonment ([1]).

Issues: Whether the total effective sentence infringed the first limb of the totality principle by not reflecting the overall criminality.

Decision and reasoning: The Court held that the sentence did reflect the overall criminality. The Court referred to serious and aggravating factors including the maximum sentences, the repeated nature of the offences, the prolonged nature of the second occasion, the appellant using degrading and insulting threats towards the complainant and the appellant's refusal to accept the complainant's ending of the relationship ([52]).

Salkilld v State of Western Australia* [2017] WASCA 168 (15 September 2017) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

‘Breach of protection order’ – ‘Breach of violence restraining order’ – ‘Emotional and psychological abuse’ – ‘Following, harassing and monitoring’ – ‘Remorse’

Charges: Making a threat unlawfully to kill x 1; Stealing x 1; Breach of protective bail conditions x 7; Breach of bail x 1; Breach of violence restraining order (VRO) x 8; Possession of property reasonably suspected to be stolen x 1; Fraud x 1; Breach of police order x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and respondent were in a relationship for about 3 weeks ([4]). The appellant had come home to find the complainant having sex with another man, which sparked a confrontation. The police issued the appellant with a police order preventing the appellant from approaching the property and complainant ([5]). The appellant returned to the property the same day and tried to force his way in ([6]). The complainant obtained a violence restraining order (VRO) against the appellant ([7]). Over a period of two days, the appellant called the complainant many times and sent text messages of a frightening nature, including threats to kill her ([15]-[19]). This conduct constituted a breach of the VRO subject of the appeal. The following day, the complainant repeatedly rode his motorcycle past the house while the complainant was inside ([21]). This conduct constituted a breach of the protective bail conditions subject of the appeal.

The sentencing judge imposed a head sentence of 2 years’ imprisonment ([45]).

Issues: There were 4 grounds of appeal:

1. the sentence of 9 months’ imprisonment for the breach of VRO was manifestly excessive;
2. the sentence of 6 months’ imprisonment for the breach of protective bail conditions was manifestly excessive;
3. the head sentence infringed the principle of totality; and
4. the judge erred in finding that the appellant was not remorseful

Decision and Reasoning: All four grounds were dismissed for the following reasons.

For ground 4, the appellant bore the burden of proof in establishing remorse on the balance of probabilities ([58]). While the appellant had expressed some level of responsibility for his actions, he displayed minimal victim empathy ([59]). It was open to the sentencing judge to find that the appellant demonstrated no remorse for the impact of his offending on the victim ([57]).

For ground 1, the breach was a sustained course of conduct and the messages were intended to terrify the complainant ([63]).

For ground 2, the breach was not an isolated breach and was intended to intimidate the complainant ([72]).

For ground 3, the sentence was well within the acceptable range ([87]).

Liyanage v Western Australia [2017] WASCA 112 (22 June 2017) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Expert evidence' – 'Risk' – 'Social context evidence' – 'Social worker'

Charges: Manslaughter x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant and the deceased were married. The appellant killed the deceased by striking him with a mallet [1]. The appellant gave evidence that the deceased was violent and controlling, and regularly sexually assaulted her [2]. She had no memory of the night on which she killed the deceased [47]. At trial, she was found not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter [4]. She was sentenced to 4 years' imprisonment [5].

Issues: The appellant appealed on several grounds including that the trial judge should not have excluded evidence from a social worker about domestic violence [7].

Decision and Reasoning:

All grounds of appeal were dismissed.

Social worker's risk assessment evidence

The social worker's risk assessment evidence was in relation to the psychological impact of prolonged exposure to domestic violence (popularly known as 'battered women's syndrome'). The evidence was based on a risk assessment which used actuarial risk assessment tools and clinical guides, including the 'Power and Control Wheel' (see Chapter 4 Context Statement) ([108]). The Court held that: the evidence did not explain the appellant's state of mind ([123]-[129]); that the evidence did not quantify the extent of the risk, and did not specifically address the question of the risk of homicide ([130]-[148]); and the actuarial tools had not 'been accepted by the relevant scientific community' as defining the risk of homicide ([149]-[154]).

Social context evidence

The Court remarked that there is a body of academic literature that is supportive of 'social context evidence' in family violence cases ([160]). This may include evidence about the history of the parties' relationship, the defendant's culture, the non-psychological impediments to leaving a violent relationship ([160]-[165]). However, the Court emphasised that in order for contextual evidence to be admitted, counsel must 'explain precisely and specifically how it is relevant to the issues which the jury are required to decide' ([166]).

The social worker gave evidence in relation to the dangers of leaving a domestic violence relationship ([169]-[177]) and the exercise of power and control which characterises domestic and family violence ([178]-[183]). The Court held that the evidence was too general, and would not assist the jury beyond the knowledge and inferences able to be drawn by a reasonable person ([177],[183]).

McCoombe v The State of Western Australia* [2016] WASCA 227 (20 December 2016) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Blaming the victim' – 'Deterrence' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Public protection' – 'Vulnerable groups'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm x 4.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male appellant, an Indigenous man, and the female partner ('D') had been in a domestic relationship. Counts 1-3 involved the appellant, who was jealous of the victim, punching her, strangling her, striking her with a chair in the back of the head, and striking her several times with a crate. Count 4 occurred when the appellant again became jealous of the victim. He verbally abused her and poured a kettle full of boiling water down her back, causing second and third degree burns. He then punched and kicked her. The appellant prevented the victim seeking medical treatment for several days. The appellant was sentenced to 5 years imprisonment on count 4, 1 year and 2 months imprisonment on counts 1 and 3, and 1 year imprisonment on count 2. The sentences on counts 1 and 4 were to be served cumulatively.

Issue/s: The sentence imposed on count 4 was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Newnes and Mazza JJA noted the circumstances in which count 4 was committed at [33]:

'The pouring of a kettle of boiling water on D was a particularly cruel and senseless act which was plainly capable of causing very serious injuries. In the spectrum of physical injuries constituting bodily harm sustained by D, they were severe. The offence entailed an abuse of the relationship of trust which existed between the appellant and D. D was in a vulnerable position by reason of the greater physical strength of the appellant and the degree to which he had intimidated her by his past acts of violence: as to which we respectfully adopt Mitchell J's statement in Bropho v Hall [2015] WASC 50 [16], which was approved by this court in Gillespie v The State of Western Australia [2016] WASCA 216 [48]'.

Their Honours referred to the fact that this was 'part of a pattern of serious and ongoing domestic violence against D'. The appellant had no insight into his offending and sought to justify what he did by blaming the victim. His criminal history was poor and showed that he posed a high risk of further serious violent offending against domestic partners. Retribution, deterrence and public protection were important factors on sentence here (see [34]-[35]).

While acknowledging the severity of the sentence imposed on count 4, Newnes and Mazza JJA concluded that, in light of all the relevant circumstances noted above (including the appellant's plea of guilty and his criminal history), count 4 was an offence of the 'utmost gravity of its kind'. The sentence could not be said to be manifestly excessive (see [36]).

'Aggravated grievous bodily harm' – 'Aggravating factor' – 'Cruelty to animal' – 'Defensive injury' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charge/s: Aggravated grievous bodily harm, aggravated unlawful wounding, assaulting a public officer, cruelty to animal.

Appeal Type: Crown appeal against sentence.

Facts: The State appealed against a total effective sentence of 2 years and 2 months imprisonment imposed on the respondent in respect of a number of offences. The most significant offences occurred on 5 August 2015 while the respondent was subject to a suspended imprisonment order. The respondent attacked his former female de facto partner and a police officer using a claw hammer. He pleaded guilty to unlawful wounding and causing grievous bodily harm. He also pleaded guilty to assaulting a public officer and cruelty to the officer's police dog.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentence imposed for grievous bodily harm and unlawful wounding was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Buss J (Mazza JA agreeing) held that the sentence of six months imprisonment imposed for the unlawful wounding offence was manifestly inadequate. This was in light of a number of factors including: the maximum penalty (7 years imprisonment); the seriousness of the offending (including the vulnerability of the victim – his former de facto partner); the general pattern of sentencing for offences of this kind; the importance of appropriate punishment and personal and general deterrence; the respondent's unfavourable personal circumstances and antecedents (including a prior history of family violence offences); and all mitigating factors (see [27]-[32]).

Buss J also held that 18 months imprisonment for grievous bodily harm was also manifestly inadequate in light of the seriousness of the offending (especially the injuries the victim sustained in trying to defend herself and the fact that the respondent was significantly larger and more powerful than the victim) and all other relevant factors (see [39]-[40]).

In a minority judgment, Mitchell JA also upheld the appeal. This was in light of a number of factors including that His Honour found that the respondent's offending was a serious example of grievous bodily harm. It was particularly significant that the injury sustained by the victim was a defensive wound, the level of violence was high, the victim did not provoke the attack and she was no threat to the respondent. Mitchell JA also noted that it was a significant aggravating factor that the offence occurred in a family and domestic relationship (see [95]-[96]).

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Evidence issues' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Unrepresented litigant'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order.

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal from Supreme Court's decision to refuse leave to appeal.

Facts: The appellant was convicted of breaching a violence restraining order by sending three text messages to the complainant. He was arrested and participated in a video-recorded interview. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court against conviction and sentence was refused.

Issue/s: Whether the primary judge erred in refusing to grant leave to appeal against conviction. The appellant was self-represented. The grounds were interpreted as raising issues including that:

1. The DVDs of the recorded police interview should not have been admitted in circumstances where the discs served to the appellant were labelled differently and were blank.
2. The magistrate erred by basing his decision on the evidence of the recorded interview which was 'not worthy of any significant weight'.
3. The evidence was not capable of establishing, beyond reasonable doubt, that the interim violence restraining order was still in force, and had not been amended, at the time of breach.
4. The primary judge's reasons were inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. In relation to ground 1 above, there was no substance to the appellant's allegations. The labelling of the DVDs was immaterial and even if the discs were blank, the appellant made it clear at trial that he was aware of their contents. There was no issue about the authenticity of the recording, and no challenge as to its fairness (See [8]). Second, the magistrate based his decision on all the evidence before him and indicated that, even without reference to the recorded interview, there was a compelling case the appellant breached the order (See [9]). Third, it was open to the magistrate to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the interim order was still in force at the time of breach. It was implicit in the complainant's evidence that the interim order was still in force. The appellant made no suggestion to any witness in cross-examination that the interim order was not still in force. Statements in the recorded interview reflected the appellant's understanding that the order was still in force. Nothing in the evidence suggested the order had been cancelled or amended (See [12]). Finally, the primary judge's reasons clearly explained why he concluded that none of the grounds had any reasonable prospects of success (See [13]).

Conomy v Maden* [2016] WASCA 30 (18 February 2016) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Following harassing, monitoring' – 'Interim violence restraining order' – 'Questioning witnesses' – 'Stalking' –

‘Systems abuse’ – ‘Unrepresented litigant’

Charge/s: Stalking.

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal from Supreme Court’s decision to refuse leave to appeal.

Facts: The appellant and the complainant went on six dates. The complainant made it clear she did not want to see the appellant again. The appellant repeatedly sent her emails, letters and text messages. She took steps to discourage further communication including obtaining an interim violence restraining order which prohibited contact. But the appellant persisted. The appellant was charged with a stalking offence and fined $3000. Leave to appeal against sentence and conviction was refused in the Supreme Court.

Issue/s: Whether the primary judge erred in finding that none of the grounds of appeal against conviction had any reasonable prospect of success.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. None of the many and detailed grounds of appeal that the appellant advanced had any reasonable prospect of success. Some of the reasons for this finding included that the magistrate was correct in treating the existence and breach of the interim violence restraining order as relevant to the complainant’s subjective fear and apprehension and assessing whether the communication could reasonably be expected to cause fear or apprehension in the complainant (See ‘Primary Ground 5B/Appeal Ground 6’ [96]).

Additionally, the appellant argued that the objective element of the stalking offence was not satisfied because he could not reasonably have expected his actions to have intimidated a normal person. However, the question was not what the appellant could reasonably have expected but rather whether the manner of his communication with complainant could reasonably be expected to cause her fear or apprehension. Further, the magistrate did not give inordinate weight to the evidence of the complainant because the complainant’s evidence was central to questions of whether the communications occurred, and whether the manner of these communications subjectively caused her fear and apprehension (See ‘Primary Grounds 9A and 9B/Appeal Grounds 9 and 10’ [109] - [110]).

Finally, the magistrate did not err in assessing the complainant to be a reliable witness and did not err in refusing to permit the appellant to ask certain questions. The appellant, an unrepresented litigant, had a ‘tendency to become distracted by, and fixated on, issues not significant to the question of his guilt of the charged offence’. The appellant was entitled to ask questions of the complainant relevant to matters in issue at trial. However, the magistrate had a responsibility to ensure the appellant did not abuse this right by the manner and length of his cross-examination of the complainant (See 'Primary Ground 16/Appeal Ground 12' [115]-[118]).

'The paramount responsibility which a judicial officer presiding over a criminal trial owes to the community is ensuring that the accused person receives a fair trial. However, the judicial officer also owes other concurrent responsibilities to the community. In a case such as the present they include a responsibility to see that the accused does not utilise the proceedings as a vehicle for harassment of the alleged victim. The exercise of that responsibility will require vigilance in confining an accused person to asking questions which are relevant to the issues raised for the court's determination' (See 'Primary Ground 16/Appeal Ground 12' [117]).

The State of Western Australia v Stoeski* [2016] WASCA 16 (19 January 2016) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Deterrence' – 'Murder' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Rehabilitation' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder (two counts).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The first victim was the respondent's long term partner. He had an unfounded and delusional belief in her infidelity. He killed her by asphyxiation in their bedroom. After killing her he bound her head and neck with multiple layers of duct tape and wrote derogatory remarks across her forehead. The second victim was the respondent's long-term male friend and associate. He had an unfounded and delusional belief that his friend was spreading rumours about him. He stabbed him three times and struck him repeatedly to the head with a chrome vehicle component. The respondent had a history of mental illness and had ingested a substantial amount of illicit drugs in the period leading up to the offences. He was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 21 years for each count. The sentences were to be served concurrently.

Issue/s: Whether the non-parole periods were manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

The Court held that these murders were at the upper end of the scale of seriousness. The killings were unprovoked and the first victim was extremely vulnerable as she was smaller in stature than the respondent and isolated in her bedroom. The respondent treated the first victim in a degrading manner and he made no attempt to seek medical assistance. The killing has deprived their children of their parents (see further at [153]). Mitigating factors included his plea of guilty, genuine remorse and good prospects of rehabilitation. However, these mitigating factors were outweighed by the brutal and sustained nature of the attack and the respondent's entrenched drug abuse. The appellant's rehabilitation prospects had to be understood in the context of the drug abuse and the difficulty of predicting rehabilitation progress for offenders of that kind. As such, the main sentencing considerations were just punishment and personal and general deterrence. The non-parole period on each count was increased to 27 years.

The State of Western Australia v Churchill* [2015] WASCA 257 (23 December 2015) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Alcohol' – 'Community protection' – 'Deterrence' – 'Male victims' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal type: State appeal against sentence.

Facts: The deceased was in a domestic relationship with the respondent. The day prior to the murder, the respondent approached the deceased with a broken bottle and threatened to kill him. The deceased told the respondent he wanted to leave her. The next day the respondent threw bottles at the deceased, threatened to kill him, and chased him wielding a bottle. Later, the respondent and the deceased drank alcohol together. An argument broke out in which the both the respondent and the deceased threatened to kill each other. At some time between that night and the next morning, both the respondent (who was intoxicated) and the deceased returned home. The respondent stabbed the deceased with two knives and assaulted him with an electric frypan, causing his death. In total, there were 14 stab injuries and 26 incised injuries. The respondent cleaned up the premises, changed out of her clothes, and went to a neighbour's place saying she had found the deceased injured. '[The deceased] had been the victim of sustained physical abuse at the hands of the respondent, who the sentencing judge described as bigger and stronger than the 'weak and vulnerable' [deceased]. This case confirms the experience of those who work in the criminal justice system in this State that, particularly in alcohol and/or other drug fuelled dysfunctional relationships and communities, it is not uncommon for a male to be a victim of domestic violence' (See [15]). The respondent was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 17 years.

Issue/s: The non-parole period was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed and the respondent resentenced to a non-parole period of 21 years. The nature and extent of the respondent's very significant prior record of violent offending underscored the need to give significant weight to the sentencing objectives of punishment, protection of the public and personal deterrence (See [35]). The circumstances of the respondent's offence placed it at the high end of the scale of seriousness of the offence of murder – she intended to kill the deceased, engaged in a 'sustained, prolonged, frenzied attack', used multiple weapons, and went to considerable lengths to cover up the murder. Her long standing alcoholism contributed to the crime. However, of greater significance, was 'her inability to control her volcanic eruptions of anger, and the regularity and normalisation of her use of violence' (See [37]). The only mitigating factor was the respondent's disadvantaged and dysfunctional upbringing.

Rimington v The State of Western Australia [2015] WASCA 102 (29 May 2015) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Arson' – 'Criminal damage by fire' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'mental illness' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Criminal damage by fire (4 counts).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant had recently separated from his wife and had commenced discussion relating to the distribution of assets. The appellant lit three fires. Count 1 related to the destruction by fire of the contents of business premises effectively owned and controlled by the appellant and his former wife. Count 2 related to damage caused by the same fire to a neighbouring unit and common property. Count 3 concerned a separate fire causing extensive damage to an investment property owned by the appellant's former wife. Count 4 related to a third fire causing extensive damage to the former family home and a car.' The total damage was worth approximately $1.5 million. The appellant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 6 years' imprisonment, taking into account various orders of concurrency and cumulation.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the sentencing judge sufficiently took into account the appellant's depression as a mitigating factor.
2. Whether the sentencing judge placed excessive weight on general deterrence.
3. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive, as it infringed the first limb of the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. A psychiatrist's report expressed the view that the appellant's acute depression and adjustment problems relating to his separation mitigated against the seriousness of his actions and affected his capacity for sound judgment and self-control. The appellant's intoxication was also relevant (see at [30]). While the sentencing judge made a factual error by concluding that the appellant was taking anti-depressants, this error was not material. The sentencing judge expressly referred to the psychiatric report, and more specifically, the error did not affect the judge's assessment of the appellant's good prospects of rehabilitation.
2. The sentencing judge observed that general deterrence was the dominant sentencing factor in arson cases. The appellant submitted that this statement was in error because 'no one purpose of sentencing can be said to have the dominant role' as sentencing requires a 'sensitive approach' which involves weighing the purposes of punishment and all the relevant circumstances of each case (see at [41]). Beech J (with whom Buss JA and Mazza JA agreed) rejected this argument and confirmed that there is a consistent line of authority that general deterrence is the dominant sentencing consideration in cases of arson.
3. The Court found that this was a serious example of arson because the appellant lit three fires over 1 hour, the offending involved a degree of preparation and the offending was founded on the appellant's anger towards his former wife. The offences were founded on the appellant's anger towards his ex-wife and his intention was to destroy the properties so as to defeat her claim to them. That context aggravated the offending. The sentencing judge did take into account various mitigating factors including the appellant's remorse, good character, good rehabilitation prospects, low risk of re-offending and the fact he was suffering from depression when he committed the offences. Furthermore, the sentencing judge did consider issues of totality by ordering the sentences on counts 1 and 2 to be concurrent because they related to the same fire and ordered that the sentences on counts 3 and 4 be partially concurrent. As such, the Court found that the sentence imposed did bear a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offending.

X v Y* [2015] WASCA 70 (13 April 2015) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Expert witness' – 'Self-represented litigants' – 'Social worker'

Appeal type: Appeal against parenting orders.

Facts: The appellant father and respondent mother were in a de facto relationship. They separated when the appellant attacked the respondent's father. The Family Court of Western Australia made parenting orders granting the appellant no time with the children. The appeal centred upon the report of a 'single expert witness', a social worker. The expert's report stated that the children did not wish to spend time with the father due to his violence towards their grandfather and his verbal abuse towards the children themselves ([25]).

Issues: Whether the magistrate erred in law by failing to take into account relevant matters and finding that the single expert witness was qualified as a witness.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Court summarised the principles applicable to Family Court appeals at [61]-[64]. In relation to the evidence of the social worker, the Court held that it was open to the magistrate to admit the evidence: "[although] he was not a clinical psychologist, the nature of his expertise was known to the parties when the court ordered, by consent, that he be the single expert witness in the proceedings" [126].

'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Aggravating factor' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Grievous bodily harm with intent' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Separation'

Charge/s: Grievous bodily harm (GBH) with intent, aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm (aggravating factor – the appellant was in a family and domestic relationship with the victim).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in a de facto relationship for 8 years. After they separated, his former partner commenced a new relationship with a work colleague and the appellant reacted poorly. The appellant attended his former partner's home and pleaded to recommence the relationship. The appellant went with his former partner to their children's bedroom. In the presence of their children, he demanded to see her phone. He read through her text massages, threatened to kill her and repeatedly kicked her in the shins. He then used his former partner's phone to lure her new partner to the house. When her new partner arrived, the appellant attacked him by punching him in the face and continued to kick and punch him while he lay on the ground, again in the presence of their child. He dragged her new partner outside. He taunted his former partner and children to look at the injuries that he was inflicting. The appellant forced his former partner to kiss her new partner while he was unresponsive on the ground and used substantial force to do this. He photographed her new partner's injuries and sent it to her friend. The injuries sustained by his former partner were relatively superficial, but her new partner sustained extremely serious injuries. The appellant had favourable antecedents with no relevant criminal history and was regarded generally as a person of good character. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 7 years and 6 months' imprisonment for both offences (six years' imprisonment for the GBH offence committed against the new partner and 18 months' imprisonment for the assault offence committed against his former partner).

Issue/s:

1. Whether the offence imposed for GBH was manifestly excessive.
2. Whether the total effective sentence infringed the first limb of the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The attack against his former partner's new partner was extremely serious and left permanent injuries. There were elements of premeditation and deception. The attack was not provoked and committed in the presence of children. The offending was at the upper end of the scale of criminality for offences of a similar character. See in particular at [34] where Martin CJ (Buss JA and Mazza JA agreeing) noted at [34], 'The breakdown of personal relationships is an inevitable aspect of contemporary society, and often causes anger, frustration and jealousy. (The appellant) responded to those emotions with particular brutality…The community rightly expects the courts to denounce conduct of this kind in the clearest of terms, and to impose a sentence which reflects the community's abhorrence of serious offences of domestic violence of this character.'
2. The appellant submitted that the total effective sentence of 7 years and 6 months' imprisonment did not bear a proper relationship to the criminality involved in the two offences. Martin CJ (Buss JA and Mazza JA agreeing) held that while both offences were related and stemmed from the same motive, they were separate and required distinct punishments. In those circumstances, and also considering the various mitigating and aggravating circumstances, the Court held that the sentence was not disproportionate to the overall criminality involved.

Hill v The State of Western Australia* [2015] WASCA 17 (22 January 2015) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Accident' – 'Directions and warnings for/to jury' – 'Evidence' – 'Manslaughter' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship evidence'

Charge/s: Manslaughter.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant and the deceased knew each other for 25 years prior to her death. At one stage, the relationship broke down (at which point the deceased obtained a restraining order against the appellant) but it later improved to the extent that the appellant began to live in a bus on land nearby the deceased's property. Following a series of escalating arguments (involving the appellant doing things such as throwing objects at the deceased and threatening to kill her), a neighbour found the deceased's body.

Issue/s: Whether the trial judge's directions to the jury with respect to the defence of accident (under section 23B of the Criminal Code (WA)) were adequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Hall J (with whom McLure P and Mazza JA agreed) held that the trial judge made sufficient reference to the evidence of a medical expert. He adequately explained that the jury must have regard to that evidence in considering the severity of the injuries to determine whether the death was foreseeable for the purposes of the defence of accident. In considering that defence, the jury was also obliged to consider the whole of the evidence including that the appellant knew the deceased was vulnerable and the previous history of violence and threats of violence (see at [62]).

Hansen v The State of Western Australia* [2014] WASCA 229 (11 December 2014) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Assault causing bodily harm' – 'Exposing children' – 'Grievous bodily harm' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Assault causing bodily harm, grievous bodily harm.

Appeal type: Application for an extension of time to appeal and appeal against sentence.

Facts: One of the victims, Ms Lee, was in a family and domestic relationship with the appellant, an Indigenous man. She had previously been in a relationship with the other victim, Mr Hill, and they had 2 children together. Count 1 related to an occasion where Ms Lee, Mr Hill and their children were out walking. The appellant, who had followed them, struck Mr Hill with a stick out of anger and jealousy. Mr Hill suffered bruising to his elbow, a fracture to the ulna bone, bruising to the back and loin, and a laceration and bleeding in and around the kidney. Count 3 occurred when the appellant and Ms Lee were in Ms Lee's bedroom and he asked her for sex. She refused and the appellant punched her seven to ten times to her face with a closed fist. Ms Lee underwent surgery to repair a fractured eye socket and sustained ongoing psychological trauma. In sentencing, to accommodate the totality principle, His Honour reduced the individual sentence he would have imposed on each offence by six months. The total effective sentence was 6 years' imprisonment.

Issue/s: The total effective sentence infringed the first limb of the totality principle namely, 'the total effective sentence must bear a proper relationship to the overall criminality involved in all the offences, viewed in their entirety and having regard to the circumstances of the case, including those referable to the offender personally' (See [22]).

Decision and Reasoning: The application for an extension of time within which to appeal was granted but the appeal was dismissed. The total effective sentence of 6 years' imprisonment properly reflected the appellant's overall criminality having regard to all the circumstances of the case (See [27]). These offences were serious examples of their type. The offences were 'brutal, sustained and completely without justification'. The victims were defenceless and the injuries they sustained were significant. In count 1, the appellant used a weapon capable of causing serious harm. In count 3, the appellant beat his domestic partner who was in bed and therefore vulnerable. The sentencing judge was correct to emphasise the need for general deterrence. There was very little that could be said by way of mitigation (See [24]).

McCardle v McCardle [2014] WASCA 129 (15 July 2014) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Appellant a legal practitioner' – 'Application for violence restraining order' – 'Delay' – 'Family law matters' – 'Following harassing, monitoring'

Appeal type: Extension of time within which to commence the appeal, appeal against decision dismissing application for violence restraining order.

Facts: The appellant originally obtained a restraining order against the respondent in Adelaide in March 2010 which expired in March 2012. The appellant then obtained an ex parte interim violence restraining order (VRO) in Western Australia on 11 July 2012. This was obtained on the basis that the appellant had received telephone calls from the respondent on at least 33 occasions in mid-2012. Prior to final orders being given in relation to the ex parte VRO, the respondent made an application to strike out proceedings on the basis that they were an abuse of process in light of the determination of family law matters in the Federal Magistrates Court. The Magistrate made orders cancelling the July 2012 order in March 2013.

In June 2013, the appellant appealed to the District Court. The respondent brought an interlocutory application seeking orders to have the appeal struck out. The respondent's application was allowed. His Honour noted, amongst other things, that the appellant (herself a legal practitioner) had chosen not to seek a fresh restraining order on the basis of any actions since July 2012. There was no suggestion that the respondent had telephoned the appellant since July 2012. It was accepted that the original grounds of the 2012 interim VRO were 'stale' and 'sufficiently minor' so as to not justify the costs of the appeal.

Issue/s: Whether the appellant should be given an extension of time within which to commence the appeal against the decision of the District Court?

Decision and Reasoning: The application for an extension of time within which to appeal was dismissed. In terms of prospects of success, it was arguable that the judge erred by 'understating the degree of domestic and family violence' evidenced by the 'blocked number' telephone calls, the alleged verbal abuse of the appellant from the respondent in the call she answered, and the failure to take into account incidents which allegedly occurred after July 2012' (See [34]). However, it was nevertheless not in the interests of justice to grant the extension of time. The Court of Appeal was unable to make orders for the application for a VRO to be heard by a magistrate. Instead the matter would have to be returned to the District Court for a rehearing of that appeal (See [39]-[40]). The length of delay that would result was not minimal. The appellant's stated reasons for not filing an appeal notice on time were unsatisfactory for a legal practitioner (See [37]). Further, there was no impediment to the appellant seeking a fresh violence restraining order, particularly in relation to any events since July 2012 (See [41]).

Baron v Walsh* [2014] WASCA 124 (18 June 2014) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Act of abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Evidence not previously adduced' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Fresh evidence' – 'Legally available procedures' – 'Systems abuse' – 'Violence restraining order'

Appeal Type: Appeal from the District Court which upheld the respondent's appeal against the imposition of a violence restraining order.

Facts: The appellant and respondent were in a relationship for six months. The respondent sent offensive text messages which led the appellant to apply for an interim violence restraining order (VRO). This was made a final order. The respondent successfully appealed to the District Court against the imposition of the order. The District Court judge held that the text messages from the respondent to the appellant did not contain any threats, and, more specifically, 'threats to take, and/or the pursuit of, "legally available procedures" were incapable of constituting acts of abuse' (under s 11A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997) (see at [46]). The only messages capable of constituting acts of abuse were four offensive text messages, which were not repeated and the appellant apologised for them.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the respondent's use of 'legally available procedures' is capable of amounting to an act of abuse within the meaning of s 11A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997.
2. Whether the District Court judge erred by admitting affidavit evidence that was not adduced or admitted at the final restraining order hearing in the Magistrates' Court.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

1. The respondent's use of 'legally available procedures' included making complaints to the appellant's employer's regulator (she was employed as a nurse) regarding her professionalism, commencing minor claim proceedings, making multiple interlocutory applications in the VRO application and making a perjury complaint to police. McLure P, (with whom Mazza JA and Chaney J agreed), noted that the use of legally available procedures, of itself, will not normally amount to an 'act of abuse'. However, if legally available procedures are used or threatened with an improper intent or purpose, this could amount to a tort (such as malicious prosecution or abuse of process) or a criminal offence. Her Honour gave the following examples at [63] –

   'a threat made with intent to cause or compel a person to settle an action is a criminal offence under s

338A of the Code: Tracey v The Queen [1999] WASCA 77 [11] - [16]. See also The Queen v Jessen [1996] QCA 449; (1996) 89 A Crim R 335. Further, the commencement or maintenance of legal proceedings for an improper collateral purpose is a tort: Williams v Spautz [1992] HCA 34;(1992) 174 CLR 509; Flower & Hart (a firm) v White Industries (Qld) Pty Ltd [1999] FCA 773; (1999) 163 ALR 744. A knowingly frivolous and vexatious claim is also an abuse of process.' Her Honour went on at [65] – 'To threaten and/or take detrimental action against a person to achieve a collateral outcome is improper (at least) and is to behave in a manner that is intimidating, even if the action involves a person availing himself of legally available procedures. I do not intend to suggest that this is an exhaustive statement of behaviour that is intimidating.'

The Court held that the Magistrate was correct in finding that the respondent's behaviour of using legally available procedures was intimidating and noted that the excuses given by the District Court judge for the respondent's behaviour 'underscore the failure to recognise the impropriety of the respondent's conduct' (See at [68]). The respondent's conduct therefore amounted to an 'act of abuse'.

2. This ground was also upheld. The relevant evidence concerned the relationship of the parties and what the appellant could have reasonably expected from the break up. Its use led the District Court judge to conclude that the purpose of the Act is not to 'protect a person from the fallout of a failed relationship'. This was incorrect, the purpose of the Act is, 'to protect people from acts of abuse in appropriate circumstances whether or not they occur in the fallout of a failed relationship' (see at [78]). This evidence was used notwithstanding that it was not adduced at the final hearing in the Magistrates' Court and it was not substantially litigated by the parties at the hearing. The judge was in error in using this evidence.

Cramphorn v Bailey* [2014] WASCA 60 (21 March 2014) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault' – 'Breach of police order' – 'Cross-examination' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Unrepresented litigant' – 'Violence restraining order'

Charge/s: Assault, breach of police order.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The prosecution case was that the appellant and her de facto partner, the complainant, were travelling in a vehicle when the appellant punched the complainant in the mouth. The appellant stopped the vehicle in the middle of the road and a further altercation occurred between them in which the appellant clawed at the complainant's face. Police issued the appellant with a 24-hour police order which the appellant breached by sending the complainant two abusive text messages. The appellant was convicted after trial in the Magistrates Court of unlawful assault, and breaching a police order. At trial, the appellant was entitled to the protection of a previously imposed violence restraining order issued against the complainant. The appellant appealed to the Supreme Court but the appeal was dismissed. At every stage of proceedings, the appellant represented herself.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the trial in the Magistrates Court was unfair to the appellant.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal against conviction was dismissed. Although the proceedings before the magistrate were not in respect of the violence restraining order issued against the complainant, the existence of the order was relevant to the proceedings because there was likely to be considerable antipathy between the appellant and the complainant, and there was a risk that the presence might intimidate the unrepresented appellant (See [88]). The trial posed difficulties for the unrepresented appellant, particularly with respect to her having to directly cross-examine the complainant (See [90]). However, having regard to the whole of the trial record, the trial was conducted fairly. The magistrate explained the trial process to the appellant. He controlled the complainant and the appellant, intervening when required during cross-examination and when the complainant interrupted the appellant's evidence (See [91]). Despite arguing to the contrary, the appellant was permitted by the magistrate to cross-examine the complainant about the history of the domestic violence relationship. She declined to do so (See [92]). Further, the appellant was not entitled to use an intermediary for cross-examination. These provisions are only for the benefit of the person being cross-examined (See [104]-[106]).

Beins v The State of Western Australia [No 2]* [2014] WASCA 54 (12 March 2014) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Drug and alcohol programs' – 'Parity' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female appellant had been in an off and on relationship with the male complainant. Prior to this, the appellant had been in a relationship with her co-offender. The appellant and the complainant had been arguing and the argument became violent. The appellant contacted her co-offender and they formed a plan to assault the complainant. They went to the complainant's premises and the appellant's co-offender struck the complainant with a pole approximately 15 times. Amongst other findings, the sentencing judge found that the appellant was not the victim of entrenched domestic violence and could not claim any degree of diminished responsibility. Her co-offender had a history of severe domestic violence against him, his brother and their mother. The appellant was sentenced to 2 years and 8 months' immediate imprisonment. Her co-offender was sentenced to 2 years and 8 months' imprisonment, suspended for 2 years.

Issue/s: One of the issues was whether the sentence breached the parity principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. McLure P held that the totality of sentencing considerations could not justify the imposition of different types of sentence. The offenders were broadly comparable in terms of their personal circumstances, involvement with the police, and remorse and rehabilitation. McLure P noted that the sentencing judge cast the appellant as a 'siren' who manipulated and knowingly misused her 'childlike' co-offender and found that this was not justified by the evidence. The sentencing judge incorrectly concluded that the co-offender's rehabilitation required the incarceration of the appellant (See [48]). Pullin JA also upheld the appeal but for different reasons. His Honour found that the existence of extraordinary disparity in sentences breached the parity principle (See [82]). Mazza JA also provided his own reasons. Mazza JA noted that the disparity in sentences could not be rationally explained by differences in the circumstances of offending or of the offenders. The offences were not markedly different, their personal circumstances were similar, and both were amenable to programmatic intervention for their therapeutic needs (See [113]-[116]).

Rosewood v The State of Western Australia [2014] WASCA 21 (29 January 2014) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Deterrence' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Intoxication' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in a domestic relationship with the deceased for 12 months prior to the offence and had a 3-month old child. On the day of the offence, the appellant and deceased were drinking alcohol and an argument occurred. The appellant then stabbed the deceased in the chest. The deceased turned away and the appellant stabbed her twice in the back. The appellant witnessed 'chronic and acute' (see at [7]) domestic violence in his childhood. He had several prior domestic violence convictions against the deceased and other partners. The appellant was convicted on a plea of guilty. The sentencing judge accepted that the appellant was a high risk of violence in respect of intimate partners and a moderate risk in respect of other people. He was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 18 years.

Issue/s: Whether the non-parole period was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. McLure P (with whom Newnes JA and Mazza JA agreed) held that this was a serious example of offending of this kind. The deceased was unarmed. While the attack was impulsive and not premediated, this meant that the deceased and other people in the house had limited ability to defend her. The offence was committed in front of the deceased's family including young children. In relation to intoxication, her Honour noted at [15] – 'The fact that the appellant was heavily intoxicated at the time is not mitigatory. The sentencing objectives of personal and general deterrence weigh heavily in relation to acts of domestic violence that are committed when drunk or sober.'

Tunney v The State of Western Australia* [2013] WASCA 286 (17 December 2013) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Aggravated burglary' – 'Breach of bail' – 'Breach of police order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Trespass' – 'Wilfully and unlawful destroying or damaging property'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm, wilfully and unlawfully destroying or damaging property, aggravated burglary, breach of a police order, trespass, breach of bail.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in an 'on and off' domestic relationship with the victim for about three years. The aggravated assault charge involved the appellant standing over the victim who was on the floor of their living room. The appellant kicked her in the groin, which caused her to cry out and curl up into the foetal position in agony. The damaging property offence occurred the next day. While driving, the victim noticed the appellant was following her in his truck. He called her and sent her text messages as she drove to a shopping centre. She entered the shopping centre. When she returned to her car she found that two tyres had been deflated.

Some months later, the victim arrived home to find the appellant inside. He began shouting at her. She fled and the appellant took a bag containing her passport and other belongings. He was issued with a 72-hour police order. He then breached that order the next day by making numerous phone calls to the victim at her work. The trespass charge involved the appellant entering the victim's home using a set of keys that he had cut without the victim's knowledge. The aggravated burglary charge occurred when the victim arrived home, again finding the appellant in the house. He attempted to kiss her and refused to leave. At one point, the appellant threw her onto a bed, ripped a necklace from her neck, struck her to the face and hit her on the head with his knees. Later the appellant entered into a bail undertaking in relation to these matters, which he breached by contacting the victim and asked her to look after him because he was sick. He insisted that she take him back to her home, where he remained until he was taken into custody. The total effective sentence imposed was 3 years 8 months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: One of the issues concerned whether the sentence infringed the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The Court found that notwithstanding the appellant's 'favourable' antecedents, he was not truly remorseful, and considerations of personal and general deterrence remain important. The offending was sustained and designed to intimidate the victim physically and psychologically. He was not deterred from further offending notwithstanding the imposition of police orders and bail conditions. As such, the Court held that the total effective sentence did bear a proper relationship to the overall criminality involved, having regard to all the relevant circumstances. A substantial period of imprisonment was required.

Silva v The State of Western Australia* [2013] WASCA 278 (4 December 2013) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Deterrence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant's marriage to the deceased was marred by ongoing arguments. There had been prior minor assaults. The appellant then discovered the deceased was having an affair. The appellant became obsessed about the deceased's fidelity, was jealous of her friendships with work colleagues and he demanded that she resign from her employment, which she refused. The appellant became aware that the deceased remained friends with the man with whom she had an affair. Before her death, the deceased took leave from work and the appellant monitored her phone calls and prohibited her from returning to work. His unhappiness with the deceased was increased because of her failure to participate in the family's morning prayer ritual. The appellant then killed the deceased in the living room by hitting her on the right side of a head on at least three occasions with a hammer that he had bought that morning. Mitigating factors included the appellant's early plea of guilty and good character. He was sentenced to life imprisonment with a 17-year non-parole period.

Issue/s: Whether the non-parole period was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Buss JA (with whom Mazza JA agreed) found that the seriousness of the offence was demonstrated by (among other things), the brutality and repetitive nature of the attack, the appellant's intent to kill the deceased, the fact the appellant confronted the deceased when she was alone and vulnerable and the history of domestic violence inflicted by the appellant on the deceased (see further at [40]). The Court upheld the following statement by the sentencing judge in relation to general deterrence –

'The law is clear that disputes between partners, no matter how emotionally hurtful, must be resolved peacefully. People must understand that marriage is not a licence to treat a spouse as a chattel and violence in the course of a marriage breakdown will be met with deterrent sentences. It is obvious that the minimum term must recognise the high value that the Western Australian community places on a person's life and a person's right to live without violence from their partner. Domestic violence continues to be a significant cause of violent death and serious injury in our community. The courts must impose sentences which continue to reflect the community's abhorrence and intolerance of such offending, particularly where it results in the death of the victim' (see at [42]).

'Aggravating factor' – 'Deterrence' – 'Grievous bodily harm with intent' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Grievous bodily harm with intent.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The respondent and the victim were married and had a young daughter. Their relationship ended. When the respondent returned to the victim's unit to retrieve his property, the victim called police due to his behaviour. He left before police arrived. He then returned to the unit. The victim again called police who issued the respondent with a 24-hour move-on notice. The following evening, the respondent entered the unit using his own key, confronted the victim, struck her on the top of her head, placed his hands around her neck then stabbed her multiple times. The victim managed to exit the unit while the respondent chased after her and continued to stab her in the back. The victim almost died and suffered extremely serious injuries and is disfigured for life. She lost the use of one hand and use of her thumb on the other hand and could no longer look after her daughter on her own. The mental effects were also severe – she became depressed, highly dependent on others, unemployed and 'cannot stand the sight of herself' (see at [11]). The appellant had a previous conviction for violence and the sentencing judge noted that he was intoxicated at the time of the offence and had a propensity for violence whilst intoxicated. He was sentenced to 5 years' imprisonment and was made eligible for parole.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. McLure P (with whom Buss JA and Mazza JA agreed) noted that the offending was premediated, with the respondent having waited more than an hour for the victim to return home. He acted 'out of hate related to his wife's attempt to take control of her own life' (see at [21]). See in particular at [25]-[41] where McLure P provided summaries of all comparable cases. Her Honour described this offending as 'high on the scale of seriousness just short of the worst category', noting its premeditated nature, ferocity, the nature and extent of the harm and the tragic effect on the victim. A further aggravating factor was that the respondent intended not only to do her grievous bodily harm but to disfigure her body. This made the sentence manifestly inadequate notwithstanding the mitigating factors and the respondent was resentenced to 7 years' imprisonment with no change of parole eligibility.

Her Honour discussed the prevalence of domestic violence and the fact that is often connected with conduct in a relationship that, 'understandably generates high emotion, volatility and associated loss of control.' Notwithstanding, the fact that violence occurs in a domestic relationship is not a mitigating factor (see at [43]). As to whether it would be an aggravating factor, her Honour stated at [41]– 'I am not persuaded that the sentencing subtleties are appropriately conveyed by characterising the domestic relationship (whether past, existing or anticipated) setting as itself aggravating the offending' and at [43], 'Deterrence is called for in relation to all offences involving serious violence, domestic and otherwise.'

'Deterrence' – 'Failing to report car accident' – 'Failing to stop after car accident' – 'Grievous bodily harm with intent' – 'Orders affecting children' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suspended sentence'

Charge/s: Grievous bodily harm with intent, failing to stop after a car accident, failing to report a car accident to police.

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant had been in a relationship with the victim for 16 years. They had two children. Both parties claimed to have been the subject of threats and violence by the other. The appellant was served with an interim violence restraining order. He received a call from his children who said that their mother was not home and requested food. While claiming to be driving to a supermarket to purchase food for his children, he saw the victim at a bus stop. Once the victim had alighted from the bus, the appellant drove onto the footpath and struck her with the middle of the bonnet. She was thrown into the air and landed on the pavement, causing serious injuries. He continued without stopping – he claimed he saw her attempt to get up and assumed she was okay. A psychologist's report indicated that the appellant showed no empathy or remorse, and that rehabilitation would be difficult. Another psychologist's report indicated that the victim had significant mental health issues and serious difficulties in providing adequate care for her children. A total effective sentence of 5 years' imprisonment was imposed.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the trial judge erred in failing to suspend the term of imprisonment.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The appellant submitted that in not suspending the term of imprisonment, the trial judge erroneously concluded that the inability of the victim to care for her children was due to the appellant's conduct. This argument was rejected. The trial judge's conclusions were that the victim was unable to care for her children due to her mental illness and that the appellant also contributed to her incapacity because of his having caused her grievous bodily harm.
2. In noting the 'egregious' nature of the offending, Buss JA (with whom McLure P and Mazza JA agreed) held that the sentence was appropriate. Punishment and deterrence (both personal and general) were the relevant considerations, in the absence of any significant mitigating factors and the appellant's lack of remorse and prospects of rehabilitation. While the sentence will cause the children to suffer 'hardship and distress' (see at [80]), his Honour was not persuaded that this amounted to an 'extreme or exceptional case' or that the hardship would be severe enough to warrant a lesser sentence.

McLaughlin v The State of Western Australia [2012] WASCA 204 (12 October 2012) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Arson' – 'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Damaging property' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Possess weapon' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threat to kill' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm, making a threat to kill (two counts), arson, possessing a weapon.

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: After consuming alcohol, an argument between the appellant and his current partner ensued. He threw an ashtray which hit her in the back. He used a knife to cut the cord to a vacuum cleaner that she was using. Later, he spat on, grabbed and shook her. He then used the knife to smash a coffee table and stab walls while threatening to kill her, her son and others. He prevented her from leaving the lounge room. She was fearful of him and remained awake all night. After being arrested and released on bail for these offences (assault and threat to kill), the appellant broke into the home of his estranged wife, ignited a lounge chair and again made threats to kill by leaving voice messages on her mobile phone. The appellant had a history of violent offending against his partner and his estranged wife. A psychologist described him as having 'deep seated rejection fears' attributable to his traumatic childhood. The total effective sentence imposed was four years eight months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Whether the total effective sentence infringed the first limb of the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave to appeal was refused. The Court noted the extremely serious nature of arson and the fact that the maximum penalty is life imprisonment. Buss JA (Mazza JA agreeing) provided a summary of sentencing patterns for arson at [48]-[58]. The fire had a potential to destroy the house. His Honour also noted the threats to kill against his partner, 'occurred in the context of a persistent course of conduct designed to denigrate and humiliate (her) and cause her intense fear and anxiety' (See at [68]). As such, the sentence was not disproportionate.

Wongawol v The State of Western Australia [2011] WASCA 222 (17 October 2011) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Community protection' – 'Deterrence' – 'Intention' – 'Murder' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Traditional Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander punishment'

Charge/s: Murder

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: On the day of the offence, the appellant (an Aboriginal man) was intoxicated and had been smoking cannabis. He returned home and an argument ensued relating to his partner's confession that she had been 'sexually misbehaving' (see at [4]). The appellant became angry and attacked her with a knife. The blows were struck mainly in the region of her legs. The sentencing judge held that the fact he mainly stabbed her in the legs, as opposed to, (for example) in the chest was not particularly relevant to establishing the requisite intention – the appellant struck a considerable number of blows randomly with the intention of causing serious harm. The appellant was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 14 years.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the sentencing judge failed to recognise the significance of the stabbing being in the legs when making conclusions with respect to the intention with which the blows were inflicted.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The appellant submitted that he was a traditional full-blood tribal Aboriginal man and was familiar with the concept of spearing or stabbing in the legs as punishment. The sentencing judge found that the appellant intended to hurt the deceased severely by punishing her for sexual misbehaviour. In the past, the appellant had self-harmed by stabbing himself and the deceased in the thigh. The appellant submitted that this was relevant to the sentencing judge's conclusion with respect to intention. This argument was rejected – McLure P (with whom Buss JA and Mazza J agreed) held that the number and distribution of the wounds 'reflect the frenzied nature of the appellant's attack on the deceased and more than adequately support the sentencing judge's finding' (see at [30]).

2. The appellant had a long history of violent offending. He was described as being 'aimless' and as having a problem of habitual intoxication and use of cannabis. The appellant submitted that the sentencing judge placed too much weight on these 'lifestyle issues' and grossly dysfunctional background. This argument was rejected – a psychologist's report confirms that the appellant uses violence in order to solve conflict. Further, his substance abuse contributed to his offending and he had limited insight into his problems. His prospects of rehabilitation were poor. As McLure P noted at [39] –

'This is a case where the protection of the community in which the appellant lives and both personal and general deterrence are very weighty sentencing considerations. The incidence of alcohol and drug fuelled violence within Aboriginal communities is distressingly high. A new generation of children are scarred. The cycle continues. Having regard to all relevant sentencing factors, there is no merit in the claim that the minimum period of 14 years is manifestly excessive.'

'Alcohol' – 'Insanity' – 'Murder' – 'mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Provocation'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: During an altercation, the male appellant slashed his fiancee's arm with a knife (the first injury). Realising the seriousness of the injury, the appellant dropped the knife and applied a tourniquet to her arm. The deceased further goaded the appellant to kill her. The appellant slashed her twice in the neck, causing her death (the second and third injuries). The deceased was a person who frequently consumed excessive amounts of alcohol. During the months prior to the death, the relationship between the appellant and the deceased was characterised by frequent incidents of domestic violence, with the appellant usually being the victim. A few hours after the killing, the appellant was taken into custody and admitted to killing the deceased in a recorded interview. In the 8 years prior to the killing and thereafter, the appellant was admitted to psychiatric hospitals. It was accepted that he suffered psychotic episodes from time to time.

Issue/s:

1. The trial judge made material errors of law in his direction to the jury on the provocation defence resulting in a substantial miscarriage of justice.
2. The verdict of the jury was unsafe or unsatisfactory on the ground that the jury should have found the appellant insane at the time of the killing.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld on ground 1 and a retrial was ordered. The State conceded that the trial judge made an error of law in his direction to the jury on provocation but argued that the error did not result in a substantial miscarriage of justice because the evidence was incapable of supporting the defence of provocation. McLure P (with whom Mazza J agreed) found that the evidence was capable of giving rise to a reasonable doubt as to whether the appellant was provoked to cause all three injuries. There was a resulting miscarriage of justice (See [142]-[143]). Pullin JA in dissent found that while the trial judge erred in directing the jury as to provocation (See [231]), there was no miscarriage of justice as provocation should not have been left as an issue to be decided by the jury. The appellant was no longer deprived of self-control when he caused the third injury (See [238]-[239]).

Ground 2 was dismissed. McLure P (with whom Mazza J agreed) held that it was reasonably open to the jury to fail to be persuaded on the balance of probabilities that the appellant was deprived of the capacity to know he ought not to kill the deceased. There was evidence in the police interview that the appellant was thinking rationally before and after the deceased's death (See [125]-[126]). Pullin JA, in a separate judgment, also held that while there was unanimous evidence from psychiatrists that the appellant suffered from a mental illness and that suffered from psychotic episodes, whether he was psychotic on the night of the killing and whether he lacked the capacity to know the act of slashing in the neck was wrong was a matter of controversy. Pullin JA was unable to conclude, on the balance of probabilities, that the appellant lacked the relevant capacity (See [219]-[220]). See also Evans v The State of Western Australia [2010] WASCA 34 (26 February 2010) and The State of Western Australia v Evans [No 2] [2012] WASC 366 (9 October 2012).

O'Driscoll v The State of Western Australia* [2011] WASCA 175 (10 August 2011) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Evidence' – 'Hearsay' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Remoteness of evidence'

Charge/s: Murder

Appeal Type: Application for extension of time for leave to appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant was convicted of the murder of his de facto partner.

Issue/s: One of the issues concerned whether the trial judge erred by admitting evidence of the relationship between the appellant and the deceased, particularly statements made by the deceased as to the nature of the relationship and previous violence she suffered at the hands of the appellant.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The prosecution relied on common law principles in relation to admissibility of the evidence. Martin CJ (with whom Pullin JA and Hall J agreed) at [25] – [41] considered various High Court decisions on the correct test to apply including Wilson v The Queen (1970) 123 CLR 334 and Walton v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 283. The Court held firstly that the evidence was not hearsay, because it was only used to establish the deceased's state of mind. The jury could then draw an inference as to the nature of the relationship. The crucial issue was the way the evidence was used. If the jury had regarded the evidence as facts asserted by the deceased and then went onto conclude that the appellant was prone to violence, it would have been prejudicial to the accused. However, the prosecution did not use the evidence in this way and the trial judge directed accordingly. An argument that statements made by the deceased earlier than one or two weeks prior to her death was 'too remote in point of time' to be admissible was also rejected. The Court held that while it may be possible for evidence to be so distant as to be inadmissible, this was not the case here. The relationship was relatively short and the statements that were made completely spanned this period. This increased rather than reduced its probative value.

MJS v The State of Western Australia* [2011] WASCA 112 (9 May 2011) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Directions and warnings for/to jury' – 'Evidence' – 'Evidence of character' – 'Indecent assault in family or domestic relationship' – 'Indecent dealing with lineal relative under 16 years' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Sexual penetration of a lineal relative under 16 years' – 'Violence restraining order'

Charge/s: 18 charges of a sexual nature relating to the appellant's two biological daughters.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant was charged with various sexual acts relating to his two daughters (see at [22]). He was convicted by a jury of 11 offences of indecent dealing, 4 offences of indecent assault and acquitted of three charges. There was previously an interim violence restraining order (VRO) in place against the appellant. The appellant later breached this order. Evidence of this breach and his subsequent imprisonment for a weekend was inadvertently admitted at trial after one of the complainants mentioned it during cross-examination.

Issue/s: Some of the issues in the appeal against conviction concerned –

1. Whether the trial judge should have discharged the jury after one of the complainants gave evidence during cross-examination of a prior breach of a VRO in place against the appellant.
2. Whether the directions of the trial judge in respect of this evidence were sufficient.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal against sentence was upheld but the appeal against conviction was dismissed.

1. The appellant submitted that the admission of the interim VRO evidence was inadmissible and so prejudicial it required the trial judge to discharge the jury. The appellant also submitted that this failure to discharge the jury led to further inadmissible evidence concerning other VROs and alleged breaches which compounded the initial prejudice. Mazza J (with whom Buss JA and McLure P agreed) held that the only basis upon which this evidence could be admissible was with respect to the appellant's character. Generally, evidence of bad character is inadmissible but can be admissible where an accused puts their character in issue, in which case the prosecution is able to call evidence of bad character in rebuttal (see at [144]). In this case, the accused asserted that he was of good character. As such, the prosecution was entitled to adduce rebuttal evidence. The evidence of the VROs could only be admissible for that purpose.

   The Court held that in isolation, the making of an interim VRO was not of relevance to an accused's character. However, the evidence also included the alleged breach of the VRO. Mazza J held that a breach of a VRO 'amounts to deliberate disobedience of a court order' and 'is conduct which is prima facie inconsistent with the usual behaviour of a person of good character. It is evidence capable of rebutting an assertion of good character' (see at [153]). As such, it was admissible. However, the evidence that he had spent a weekend in jail was not relevant to character and thus inadmissible, but capable of being dealt with by judicial direction. Furthermore, even if the VRO evidence was inadmissible, it was general in nature – 'There was no detail as to when the VRO was made, who was the protected person, what was the basis for the order and what the appellant did to breach it' (see at [157]). As such, any potential prejudice could be dealt with by judicial direction.

2. The Court held that while the trial judge's directions in relation to this evidence could have been 'fuller', they were sufficient. It would have been desirable for him to 'use the authority of his office to confirm that a court had not determined on its merits whether a final VRO should be made'. However, the judge explained to the jury the ex parte nature of an interim order. While the judge did not explicitly tell the jury that it could only take the breaches into account for the purposes of character, he did tell the jury that the State's case was that these breaches were relevant to character and that the ex parte VROs and the time spent in jail were irrelevant. This was sufficient for a reasonable jury to understand that the evidence was only relevant in relation to the appellant's character.

The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aggravating factor' – 'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Deprivation of liberty' – 'Deterrence' – 'Fines' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'People living in regional, rural and remote communities' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Reconciliation' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: Deprivation of liberty (two counts), assault occasioning bodily harm, threatening unlawfully to kill.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The first victim (K) was the respondent's former partner, with whom he had a 2-year old child. The second female victim (C) commenced an intimate relationship with K. The respondent believed that the relationship between K and C had begun before he had separated with K. After the separation, the respondent asked K and C to meet at his home to discuss their relationship with each other. The respondent then left with K, at which point an argument developed. The respondent refused to permit K to leave his car and detained her while he drove her back home. He prevented her from escaping the house. He then armed himself with a spear gun and loaded it with a barbed spear. C then returned to the respondent's home, whereupon the respondent pointed the spear gun at her, forced her to enter the house and prevented her from leaving. C refused to give the respondent her car keys. In response, the respondent punched C hard in the left cheek which knocked her down. He then picked her up by the throat and lifted her from the ground. He made a number of threats to kill C. C was left with severe injuries and the mental effect has been 'profound'. She was in fear of her life (see at [47]-[53]). He later reconciled with K. There was no evidence of domestic violence by the respondent towards K before he became suspicious about her relationship with C. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment (conditionally suspended for 18 months) for both counts of deprivation of liberty, fined $1000 for assault occasioning bodily harm and sentenced to 24 months' imprisonment (conditionally suspended for 18 months) for threatening to kill. These terms (as well as a fine for unrelated offending) were imposed concurrently which resulted in a total effective sentence of 2 years' imprisonment, conditionally suspended for 18 months and a $2000 fine.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the fine imposed for assault occasioning bodily harm was manifestly inadequate.
2. Whether the sentencing judge erred in suspending the terms of imprisonment by not having sufficient regard to the seriousness of the conduct and the impact on the victims
3. Whether ordering the sentences be suspended resulted in a sentence that was manifestly inadequate.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of issues 1 and 3.

1. Buss JA (Mazza J agreeing) noted that the assault against C was serious, unprovoked, committed against an unarmed victim who offered no resistance and part of a prolonged episode of intimidation. The fact that the respondent was armed with a spear gun was likely to have increased the victim's fear. The context of the assault (the breakdown of the domestic relationship between the respondent and K and the new relationship between K and C) made personal and general deterrence relevant. This made a $1000 fine manifestly inadequate notwithstanding the respondent's personal circumstances, including that he was suffering from a mental illness. McLure P agreed and noted that a fine cannot be justified on totality grounds and 'falls well short of appropriately recognising the degree, effect and context of the physical violence inflicted by the respondent on C' (see at [1]).
2. Buss JA (Mazza JA agreeing) held that the remarks of the sentencing judge did sufficiently refer to the seriousness of the conduct and the impact on the victims, as he noted that the issue of suspension required him to consider all aggravating and mitigating factors as well as the objective features of the offence (see at [89]).

3. Buss JA (Mazza JA agreeing) noted that the deprivation of liberty and threat to kill offences were objectively very serious. His Honour disagreed with the sentencing judge and noted that a matrimonial breakdown, reconciliation and the presence of a child in the relationship cannot be regarded as mitigating factors. However, the fact that the respondent's mental state has improved following therapy could indicate progress towards rehabilitation. Nevertheless, the seriousness of the offending and the associated need for deterrence outweighed other factors such as rehabilitation and mercy. McLure P noted that C suffered greater actual and threatened violence than K, such that it was difficult to understand the sentencing judge's explanation for suspending the deprivation of liberty and threat to kill sentences.

   See also her Honour's remarks at [3] – 'The circumstances to which the sentencing judge referred are neither unique nor mitigatory. The hallmark of domestic or relationship related violence is the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator of the violence. The otherwise appropriate penalty should not be reduced because there is a return to the status quo that existed prior to the breakdown of the relationship which precipitated the violence. It is also circular to rely on the return to the relationship status quo as the route to rehabilitation. Moreover, the emphasis on the domestic context marginalises the actual and threatened violence inflicted by the respondent on C.'

   As such, these offences warranted immediate imprisonment. A total effective sentence of 18 months' immediate imprisonment was imposed.

'Aggravated burglary' – 'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Breach of protective bail conditions' – 'Criminal damage' – 'Damaging property' – 'Deterrence' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Obstructing a public officer' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Separation'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary (two counts), assault occasioning bodily harm, criminal damage, obstructing a public officer, breaching protective bail.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The complainant was the father of the appellant's former partner. The appellant attended the complainant's house and obtained entry. He was confronted by the complainant who demanded he leave. A verbal altercation occurred, at which point the appellant's former partner came to the aid of the complainant. The appellant then grabbed her by the hand and bent her middle finger which caused it to fracture. One another day, the appellant again obtained entry to the house, this time by throwing a pot plant through a door. His former partner was inside and she barricaded herself and her 2-year-old son in a bedroom with a chest of drawers. The appellant rammed the door with a table which enabled him to unlock the door. She managed to flee the bedroom and the appellant was detained by a neighbour until police arrived. The appellant suffered from depression and anxiety and was intoxicated on both occasions. He had no relevant criminal history. A total effective sentence of 12 months' imprisonment was imposed.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the trial judge erred in failing to find that the appellant's depression and anxiety reduced his moral culpability and the need for general deterrence.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. McLure P (with whom Mazza J agreed) held that the appellant's mental impairment did not impair his functioning to the extent that his culpability or the need for general deterrence should be reduced. Instead, the offending can be attributed to his level of intoxication.
2. The Court held that the seriousness of this offending was heightened by the extent of the actual and threatened violence committed by the appellant, and as McLure P (Mazza J agreeing) noted – 'The seriousness of the offending is not reduced because it occurred in the context of a failed or failing domestic relationship. It is necessary to protect actual and potential victims of domestic violence' (see at [16]). The mitigating factors, such as the appellant's remorse and good character were given sufficient weight by the sentencing judge.

‘Circumstantial evidence’ – ‘Directions and warnings for/to jury’ – ‘Evidence’ – ‘Murder’ – ‘Offender character references’ – ‘People with mental illness’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Sentencing’

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant was convicted for the murder of the deceased; with whom he had been in a casual sexual relationship for 12 months. The deceased was 22 weeks pregnant with the appellant’s child at the time of her death. The appellant was intoxicated, attended the deceased’s home and stabbed her 21 times in her bedroom. He then walked back to his home, threw away the knife and left the deceased. He destroyed evidence that could implicate him in the murder. The prosecution’s case relied purely on circumstantial evidence. He was sentenced to life imprisonment with a non-parole period of 25 years.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the trial judge erred by not directing the jury that they had to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of certain facts because these facts were indispensable links in the chain of reasoning towards a finding of guilt.
2. Whether the non-parole period was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The Court held that there was a very strong circumstantial case against the appellant and the trial judge’s directions were sufficient for the jury to understand that they had to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the appellant had the opportunity to and in fact did kill the deceased.
2. The appellant submitted that the 25-year non-parole period was excessive given various comparable cases, the objective seriousness of the crime and the appellant’s personal circumstances. He also submitted that the fact that the crime did not involve multiple victims or multiple offences and the lack of any lengthy premeditation was significant. The appellant had no relevant criminal history. He was previously in a de facto relationship which did not involve violence, had two daughters and had numerous references attesting to his good character. The appellant’s increasing alcohol consumption had been a factor in the breakdown of the relationship. He had been suffering from depression for which he was receiving psychological treatment. However, the Court found the non-parole period was not manifestly excessive. A significant aggravating factor was the deliberate killing of the unborn child.

While a psychologist's report indicated that the appellant was a low risk of re-offending, he refused to admit guilt or show remorse. Further, the crime was committed 'in a calculated and savage manner and for a shallow and appalling motive' (see at [186]) such that little weight could be afforded to the appellant's antecedents.

'Intention' – 'Motive' – 'Murder' – 'People who are gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Self-defence'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The male appellant and the male deceased had been in an intimate personal relationship for nearly 25 years. The prosecution case was that this relationship deteriorated particularly because of the development of a relationship between the appellant and a younger man (Mr X). The prosecution argued that the appellant strangled the deceased. The defence case was that the evidence did not exclude that the deceased died of a heart attack not strangulation. The defence further asserted that the State failed to prove the appellant had a motive to kill or intention to kill the deceased. The defence also relied on self-defence against an unprovoked assault. The appellant asserted that the deceased struck his face with the back of his right hand before the strangulation occurred.

Issue/s:

1. Whether there was material on which the jury acting reasonably could fail to be satisfied that the prosecution had excluded the application of self-defence against unprovoked assault.
2. There was insufficient evidence to enable the jury to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the appellant intended to cause some form of injury, of whatever kind, falling within the definition of grievous bodily harm.
3. The trial judge erred in directing the jury as to causation.
4. The trial judge gave inadequate directions with respect to the intent necessary to sustain a charge of murder.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. First, there was no basis in the evidence for the jury to have entertained the possibility that the appellant reasonably apprehended that he faced death or grievous bodily harm. Assaults committed by the deceased on the appellant in the past were not of a kind to cause apprehension of death or grievous bodily harm, and the deceased striking the appellant with the back of his hand would similarly not be of a kind to cause such fear (See [44]-[49]). Further, the jury could not have entertained the possibility that the only practical means of averting the threat was through application of force to the deceased's throat. Other options open to the appellant included brushing the deceased off or punching him in the head (See [50]).

Second, there was ample evidence sustaining the inference that the appellant intended to cause some form of injury within the definition of grievous bodily harm. This included the pathological evidence given in relation to the extent of the deceased's injuries, the evidence of animosity in the relationship, the appellant's description of the struggle preceding the killing, the appellant's evidence that when he realised the deceased was dead he thought he must have strangled him, the appellant's conduct before and after the killing, the appellant's admissions to Mr X and another man, and a witness's evidence of lies told by the appellant (See [71]).

Third, the trial judge did not err in his approach to the issue of causation in his direction to the jury. He reminded the jury of the most pertinent evidence on the subject and clearly identified the issue they had to resolve and the manner in which they should resolve it (See [81]-[85]).

Finally, the trial judge specifically referred the jury to all the evidence that was relevant to the intent of the appellant at the time of the death. The evidence was relevant to both the question of intent required to sustain the charge of wilful murder, and the intent required to sustain the charge of murder. The difference between those two intentions was made abundantly clear to the jury (See [106]-[107]).

Note: the High Court refused special leave to appeal (see Hellings v The Queen [2005] HCATrans 255 (27 April 2005)).

Evans v The State of Western Australia* [2010] WASCA 34 (26 February 2010) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Accident' – 'Alcohol' – 'Hearsay evidence' – 'Insanity' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The male appellant and the deceased woman had been in a seven-month relationship. The police had been involved on at least five occasions including an incident in which the appellant broke the deceased's hand. The deceased, an alcoholic, was not inclined to cooperate with police and declined to provide a statement on these occasions. The appellant convinced police that he was the victim of the deceased's aggression. On 13 November 2007, the appellant caused the deceased knife wounds to her right arm, her neck, and her chest near her armpit. After cutting her neck, the appellant pressed on the deceased's chest, accelerating her blood loss and her death. During an interview with police, the appellant admitted that he killed the deceased. The appellant had a history of mental health problems from August 1999. At trial, evidence was adduced from Ms Maton about conversations she had with the deceased regarding acts of violence perpetrated upon her by the appellant. The two broad issues at trial were whether the State negated the defence of accident and whether the appellant had established the defence of insanity.

Issue/s: Some of the issues included that –

1. The trial judge erred in her directions on accident.
2. The trial judge erred in her directions on insanity.
3. The trial judge erred in directing the jury as to the use that could be made of out-of-court statements made by the deceased.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Wheeler JA (with whom Owen JA agreed) found it unnecessary to deal with ground 1. The respondent accepted that the trial judge erred in her classification of the infliction of the fatal wound as an 'event' for the purposes of applying the defence of accident. The appeal would have to be allowed unless there was no substantial miscarriage of justice. Wheeler JA found it unnecessary to undertake such analysis because the appeal was allowed on other grounds (See [46]). On ground 1, McLure P found there had been a substantial miscarriage of justice (See [15]-[17]).

Wheeler JA (with whom Owen JA agreed) allowed the appeal on ground 2. The trial judge failed to adequately direct the jury that the appellant could be found not guilty by reason of insanity, even if the appellant knew what he was doing was contrary to law (See [57]-[58]). Further, the trial judge failed to direct the jury that, when considering whether the appellant was deprived of the capacity to know he ought not to do the act, the issue was whether the appellant was incapable of reasoning with some moderate degree of calmness as to the wrongness of the act or of comprehending the nature or significance of the act of killing (See [61]-[62]). McLure P held that the trial judge failed to direct the jury that a person can lack the relevant capacity even if they know the act is unlawful (See [24]-[27]).

The appeal was also allowed on ground 4. Wheeler JA (with whom McLure P and Owen JA agreed) noted that the evidence of Ms Maton was provided in graphic and striking detail, and had the potential to be significantly prejudicial to the appellant. Not only was the evidence admitted but the trial judge invited the jury to treat the account given by Ms Maton as evidence of the truth of the matters recounted to her. This direction was plainly erroneous (See [72]-[74]). A retrial was ordered. See Evans v The State of Western Australia [2011] WASCA 182 and The State of Western Australia v Evans [No 2] [2012] WASC 366 (9 October 2012).

'Aggravating factor' – 'Effect of guilty plea' – 'Intention' – 'Murder' – 'Non-parole period' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Violence restraining order' – 'Vulnerable - women'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant had been in a relationship with the deceased for some three and a half years before the relationship ended. The deceased obtained a violence restraining order against the appellant which prohibited him from coming within 100m of her home or work and within 20m of her person. The appellant went to the deceased's house for the purpose of discussing the restraining order – he wanted to ask the deceased to remove the restraining order because it would be difficult to renew his licence as a car dealer with the restraining order in place. When she yelled at him to get off the property, he hit her with a rubber mallet multiple times until she lost consciousness. He then hit her with a brick. She sustained severe head injuries and she later died. The appellant did not seek medical attention for the deceased. He was sentenced to life imprisonment with a minimum non-parole period of 16 years. The appellant had some history of domestic violence – an ex-partner had obtained a violence restraining order against him after he stalked her and punched her several times.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the original sentence was within range of comparable sentences and whether the trial judge gave sufficient weight to the prosecution's concession that the appellant only intended to cause grievous bodily harm, not death.
2. Whether the trial judge failed to give sufficient weight to the early plea of guilty in combination with the long non-parole period.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of ground 2.

1. This argument was dismissed. Wheeler JA (with whom Owen JA and McLure P agreed) firstly accepted that given the value which the community places on human life, it is likely that (generally) killing with intention to cause death will be more seriously regarded than killing with the intention to cause grievous bodily harm. However, this will not always be the case, and intention is only one of a range of relevant factors in determining an appropriate sentence (see at [30]-[31]). Indeed, there were other aggravating factors which were relevant in this case. These included – 'the brutality of the attack on a defenceless woman, the fact that two weapons were used, the stalking behaviour which occurred in the months leading up to the attack, the presence of the violence restraining order, and the appellant's callous disregard for the victim's obvious need for medical attention' (see at [48]).
2. The trial judge did not state that the guilty plea was a mitigating factor for which some reduction in sentence should be made. Furthermore, both parties accepted that that a non-parole period of 16 years was severe for an offence involving no premeditation and a relatively brief (albeit violent) attack. Wheeler JA stated that where an early plea can be regarded as a mitigating factor, sentencing judges should expressly state in open court that a reduction in sentence has been made for that reason (see at [45]). The non-parole period was reduced to 14 years.

The State of Western Australia v Bennett* [2009] WASCA 93 (26 May 2009) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Damaging property' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Stealing motor vehicle' – 'Threat to kill' – 'Totality' – 'Wilful damage by fire'

Charge/s: Stealing a motor vehicle, wilful damage by fire, threat to kill.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: On a number of occasions, the male respondent threatened the female complainant who he was in a relationship with. The respondent put his face against her, and said aggressively, 'I'll do 25 over you. If I can't have you, no one will have you'. A few days later, the complainant told the respondent she was leaving him, and he said to her, 'If you think you're going to walk away I will kill you'. A few days after that, the intoxicated respondent grabbed the complainant's throat and said, 'I am going to kill you. If I can't have you, no one can'. Afraid, the complainant left for a few days. The drunk respondent then stole a motor vehicle and crashed it into a wall at the front of the house. He spread petrol through the house and lit it on fire. The sentencing judge sentenced the respondent to 15 months' imprisonment on the arson offence, 6 months' imprisonment for stealing a motor vehicle, and 9 months' imprisonment for the threat to kill. Her Honour recognised that the offence of threatening to kill took place on a different occasion but thought all sentences should be served concurrently.

Issue/s: Some of the grounds included –

1. The sentences imposed on the offences of arson and threat to kill was manifestly inadequate.
2. The sentencing judge erred in her application of the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The respondent was resentenced to an aggregate sentence of 4 years and 9 months' imprisonment. The sentence of imprisonment was manifestly inadequate. The arson offence required the imposition of a deterrent sentence. The respondent's personal circumstances carried less weight because this was a case of arson but regardless these did not provide much by way of mitigation. The appellant was a mature age, had an extensive criminal record, and his substance abuse problem could only be offered as an explanation rather than an excuse for his behaviour. This was a very serious case of arson 'because the respondent's offending was apparently motivated by revenge, it caused the destruction of a residential building, and it was against the background of a violent domestic relationship' (See [48]-[51]). Further, the threat to kill was a very serious one. It was made against a history of domestic violence, and the complainant was afraid of the respondent (See [54]-[56]).

Miller JA additionally held that the sentencing judge erred in her application of the totality principle. There was nothing crushing about imposing a cumulative sentence on the threat to kill offence. The sentence on the offence of threat to kill should instead have been lowered to reflect the totality principle (See [58]-[62]).

'Aggravated stalking' – 'Attempt to pervert the course of justice' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Systems abuse' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charge/s: Aggravated stalking, attempting to pervert the course of justice.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: After the marriage between the male appellant and female complainant ended, the complainant noticed the appellant following her around. Several items went missing from her home. The appellant then damaged the property of a complainant's male friend resulting in the imposition of a violence restraining order (VRO). The appellant subsequently breached this VRO. An altercation between the appellant and complainant led to the appellant being charged with assault and damage to property. He was acquitted on the assault charge. The appellant continued to follow the complainant around, telephoned her and would not speak, and made noises around her property at night. The complainant obtained a VRO. Notwithstanding this, the appellant changed a white light bulb at the complainant's home to a red bulb. Cameras she installed at her property also detected the appellant wearing a gorilla mask and holding a knife in his hand. The appellant also attempted to pervert the course of justice in relation to this incident by requesting his neighbours provide him with an alibi. He received a term of 4 years' imprisonment in respect of the aggravated stalking and 10 months in respect of the attempt to pervert the course of justice, to be served cumulatively. That produced a total effective sentence of 4 years 10 months' imprisonment.

Issue/s:

1. The sentence in respect of the aggravated stalking offence was manifestly excessive, particularly in view of the appellant's antecedents.
2. The sentencing judge erred in imposing cumulative sentences.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The sentence was not manifestly excessive. The personal circumstances favourable to the appellant (being only the absence of a prior record) could have limited weight in the circumstances, having the regard to the absence of remorse and a clear need for personal and general deterrence. This was determined and persistent pursuit of the complainant, in circumstances where she had obtained a restraining order and where he had been charged with offences arising out of his conduct towards her (See [12]-[13], [16]). Wheeler JA further held that the sentencing judge did not err in making the sentence of attempting to pervert the course of justice cumulative. This was more serious offending than the giving of a false name to police or entering a false recognisance. It was an attempt to pervert the course of justice in relation to an offence of a relatively serious nature and involved the use of innocent and unconnected third parties to engage in criminal conduct (See [17]-[19]). See Gilmour v State of Western Australia [2005] WASC 243 (8 November 2005).

Lydon v Lydon* [2008] WASCA 8 (8 February 2008) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Elder abuse' – 'Emotional abuse' – 'Expert evidence' – 'Meaning of emotional abuse' – 'Protection order' – 'Provocation' – 'Sibling abuse' – 'Threat to kill'

Proceedings: Protection order appeal.

Facts: The appellant man was the respondent to a protection order protecting his mother and sister. The appellant resided in a shed adjacent to the mother's home, which his sister frequently visits. All parties are in dispute in relation to the deceased father/husband's estate, discussions in relation to which resulted in the allegations of emotional abuse upon which the protection order was granted. The brother stood in his sister's way, blocking her from leaving, got in her face, poked her in the chest and shouted at her and her mother. There was an allegation that on at least one occasion he made a threat to kill his sister. The order included terms that the appellant not contact the other parties or enter the house.

Issue: Whether provocation defence applies to application for restraining order; Whether finding of emotional abuse requires supportive expert testimony.

Decision and Reasoning: Appeal dismissed.

The argument that provocation was required to be considered was misconceived as the Magistrate's decision was founded on emotional abuse.

Le Miere AJA held that:

> [49] Emotional abuse is not defined in the Act. Emotional abuse involves improper or inappropriate behaviour, verbal or non-verbal, that adversely impacts upon another person's emotional wellbeing. Emotional abuse improperly excites strong unwelcome feelings in another. Emotional abuse may involve > coercion by intimidation, inducing fear, stalking, or harassment, that is words, conduct or action, usually repeated or persistent that, being directed at a specific person, annoys, alarms or causes substantial emotional distress to that person.

> [50] There are two aspects to emotional abuse. The first is the adverse impact upon another person's emotional wellbeing. The second is the behaviour that causes the negative impact upon the emotional wellbeing of another.

And:

> [57] It is open to the court to be satisfied that a person has behaved in an ongoing manner that is emotionally abusive towards another person without the benefit of any psychiatric or psychological evidence. Behaviour that is emotionally abusive is behaviour that is reasonably capable of adversely impacting upon another person's emotional wellbeing. This does not require psychological or other expert evidence.

Iveson v The State of Western Australia [2005] WASCA 25 (23 February 2005) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Breach of restraining order' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Throttle' – 'Unlawful detention'

Charge/s: Unlawful detention, assaults occasioning bodily harm (x 2), breach of restraining order.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male applicant struck the female complainant, his de facto partner, across her back with a pole (the first assault). The applicant retrieved a knife from the kitchen but did not use it. The complainant tried to escape out the front door but the applicant prevented this. He began to throttle her (the second assault). The complainant tried to attract attention through the open front door but the applicant shut the door (unlawful detention). The complainant passed out. When she came to, she was again choked by the applicant and lost consciousness. The complainant obtained an interim violence restraining order which the applicant subsequently breached by telephoning her. The sentencing judge imposed an aggregate sentence of 4 years and 10 months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Some of the grounds of appeal included –

1. The total criminality of the applicant's conduct did not justify the imposition of a cumulative sentence for the second, more serious assault. The conduct of the unlawful detention merged with the throttling of the complainant.
2. The proper application of the totality principle would lead to the conclusion that the aggregate term of 4 years and 10 months was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. First, the individual sentences were well within the discretion of the sentencing judge. The two assaults were of a different character to each other and were further distinguishable from the unlawful detention offence because this did not cause her bodily harm. The decision to order the sentence on the second assault (throttling) to be cumulative was also appropriate in recognition of its particular seriousness and additional criminality (See [25]-[26]). Second, the aggregate term was not manifestly excessive. Although the applicant was a young man, his criminal history was not as bad as it might have been, he was remorseful, and appreciated that his conduct was largely driven by the effects of his drug abuse, the offences were very serious. The second assault was 'about as serious an example of this offence as it would be possible to find'. The applicant endeavoured to throttle the victim, she lost consciousness twice, he renewed his attack, he persisted in the attack even after she tried to escape, and he obtained a knife (which he did not use, to his credit). Further, he ignored the terms of the violence restraining order (See [31]).

Brown v Roe* [2004] WASCA 210 (16 September 2004) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Conditions of orders' – 'Consent' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order.

Appeal type: State appeal against dismissal of charges of violence restraining order.

Facts: The protected person (the former de facto wife of the respondent) obtained a violence restraining order (VRO). The respondent was charged with three offences of breaching the VRO by communicating or attempting to communicate with the protected person. There was no dispute that the protected person had contact with the respondent during the period the VRO was in place. However, there was a dispute between the parties as to how many times there was contact and whether it was made with the consent of the protected person. The magistrate dismissed the charges because he considered all the evidence showed the protected person, by her actions prior to the contact alleged, had consented to the contact.

Issue/s:

1. The magistrate erred in law in finding that the protected person's earlier course of conduct could create a continuing general consent entitling the respondent to thereafter breach the restraining order.
2. The magistrate erred in fact in finding that the protected person consented to the respondent's breaches of the restraining order.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed on ground 2. Counsel for the appellant argued that there could not be 'continuing general consent' given by a protected person to a person bound by a VRO. Barker J noted that this proposition was probably right 'but whether or not consent has been given to any particular contact must be decided on the facts of each case' (See [14]). In relation to ground 2, Barker J held that the magistrate erred in finding that the protected person consented to the respondent's breaches. The evidence did not support such a conclusion (See [57]-[59]). Barker J further stated that, 'it is not appropriate for a Court, while a VRO is in place, effectively to suspend the operation of a VRO by taking the view that a person protected is inclined to use the VRO as a "walking stick", as the Magistrate in this case suggested'(See [46]). As the protected person explained, it was sometimes easier to tolerate the applicant's presence and other times it was necessary to call police and enforce the terms of the order (See [42]).

'It may be recognised that, in many circumstances, the continuing relationship between persons who were once in a close personal relationship will be strained, especially after a VRO has been granted by a Court. Nonetheless, a person who is bound by a VRO must take all appropriate steps to ensure that the terms of the order are complied with. It may well be that, on some occasions, by virtue of a course of conduct, a person bound by the order may feel entitled to approach physically or telephone a protected person. It may be that a prior course of conduct in some cases implies a consent to approach the protected person in that way, at least initially. But if the protected person makes it plain that she or he does not consent to that contact or that initial contact continuing, then it behoves the person bound by the order to back off and strictly comply with the order' (See [44]).

The State of Western Australia v Anderson* [2004] WASCA 157 (29 July 2004) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Aggravating factor' – 'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Parole eligibility order' – 'People living in regional, rural and remote communities' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Remorse' – 'Threat to kill'

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm, threat to kill.

Appeal Type: State appeal against sentence.

Facts: While intoxicated, the respondent, an Aboriginal man, found the complainant (his de facto partner) in bed asleep with another man. The respondent slapped and punched the complainant which woke her. The respondent then pulled her from her bed and dragged her 200m down a street, at which point he hit her repeatedly with a steel stake and ripped her bra off. He then grabbed her throat, threatened to kill her repeatedly and pinned her to the ground. She was in genuine fear for her life. The respondent's criminal history included serious incidents of domestic violence committed against his former partner and other offences of violence. He was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment for each offence, to be served concurrently. A parole eligibility order was not made.

Issue/s: Whether the sentencing judge erred in reducing the length of the sentence to allow for the fact that he did not make a parole eligibility order.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The Court held that the sentencing judge erred by reducing the sentence on account of not making a parole eligibility order. Jenkins J (with whom Murray and McLure JJ agreed) noted that the sentence imposed at trial was significant, given the respondent's plea of guilty and the maximum penalties. However, the Court noted the seriousness of the offence and described it at [26] as 'close to the worst category of cases of this kind'. The offending was aggravated by the repeated use of a weapon and the complainant being humiliated by the removal of her bra which rendered her half naked during the beating. The context in which the respondent found the complainant amounted to 'some mitigation' but this was 'not significant', given the respondent's history of domestic violence and having previously undergone counselling in anger management and substance abuse (see at [28]). Indeed, an exchange with the sentencing judge showed that it was unlikely his plea was indicative of true remorse (see at [14]). The sentence was increased to two years' imprisonment.

Hellings v The Queen* [2003] WASCA 208 (3 September 2003) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Aggravated stalking' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Parole' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Propensity evidence' – 'Temporary protection order' – 'Threat with intent' – 'Totality' – 'Violence restraining order'

Charge/s: Aggravated stalking (x 2), threat with intent to prevent the complainant doing an act she was lawfully entitled to do.

Appeal type: Appeals against conviction and sentence.

Facts: While in a relationship with the male applicant, the female complainant were in a relationship obtained two restraining orders. The relationship ended and she obtained another violence restraining order. The applicant was charged with two counts of aggravated stalking. Further, he was charged with making a threat with intent to prevent the complainant doing an act she was lawfully entitled to do because of a 10-page letter he sent to the complainant. This was ‘abusive in the extreme’ and threatened violence against the complainant if she participated in the court action. The applicant was acquitted of the indictable offence for the first aggravated stalking charge and convicted of the alternative simple offence. He was found guilty in two other trials for the second indictable aggravated stalking offence and for the threatening letter. The complainant gave evidence of the relationship between her and the applicant. On occasions, her answers were unresponsive to questions and rambling but neither counsel made any effort to prevent the complainant answering questions in that way. The applicant was sentenced respectively to 6 and a half years’ imprisonment and 5 years’ imprisonment, cumulative. The applicant sought leave to appeal against these latter two convictions and sentences.

Issue/s: Some of the issues included –

1. A miscarriage of justice arose because evidence of the relationship should have been deemed inadmissible or should have been excluded on discretionary grounds in both the stalking and threatening letter trials.
2. In the stalking trial, the trial judge erred by failing to give adequate directions to the jury as the relevance of the ‘context’ or ‘relationship’ evidence and to the extent they could use it in their deliberations.
3. The trial judge erred in not making a parole eligibility order.
4. The sentences were manifestly excessive in all circumstances concerning their commission and, when accumulated, the total term of 11 and a half years’ imprisonment is disproportionate to the total offending behaviour.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeals against conviction and sentence were dismissed. First, while some of the complainant’s evidence in both the stalking and threatening letter trials was inadmissible or might have been objected to on discretionary grounds, there was no resulting miscarriage of justice (See [34]-[36] and [60]-[63]). The evidence that was inadmissible or might have been excluded was insignificant having regard to the evidence that was admissible relating to relevant aspects of violence and harassment in the relationship (See [34]-[36]).

Second, a direction to the jury regarding the use of the complainant's relationship evidence as 'propensity evidence' was not necessary here. 'Such a direction will be very necessary in cases where there is a danger that the jury might reason that because an accused person has conducted himself in a particular way in the past towards his victim he might be found to have done so again at the time alleged by the indictment' (See [39]). This was not the case here as there was no real dispute that the applicant breached the violence restraining order or that his actions fell within the meaning of pursuit (See [37]-[39]).

Third, the discretion not to order parole eligibility did not miscarry in this case. The applicant remained beset by a deep-seated psychological disorder. His aggression was unchecked and his past behaviour showed that if parole eligibility was ordered he would be likely to reoffend (See [85]-[87]).

Finally, the sentences were not manifestly excessive. The stalking offence was of a very serious kind. The offending occurred when the applicant was already charged with an offence of aggravated stalking, he failed to appear on the date for trial, and was eluding authorities. The nature of the stalking itself was serious and persistent with 160 calls over a 22-day period and overt threats being made (See [92]-[97]). Further, in relation to the threatening letter offending, the threats were credible, and 'serious and graphic'. The purpose of the threat, to prevent a person engaging in lawful activities, significantly aggravated the offending (See [98]-[99]). In terms of totality, the total sentence was not disproportionate to the offending given the persistent nature of the applicant's conduct, the period of time over which it took place and the serious nature of the offending (See [101]).

Note: the High Court refused special leave to appeal (see Hellings v The Queen [2005] HCATrans 255 (27 April 2005)).

Owen v Jilba* [2002] WASCA 283 (17 October 2002) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Breach of misconduct restraining order' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Intimidation' – 'Lawful conduct'

Charge/s: Breach of misconduct restraining order.

Appeal Type: State appeal against dismissal of charge.

Facts: A misconduct restraining order was in place against the respondent which prevented him from behaving in an 'intimidatory or offensive manner' towards the complainant. He was charged with breaching that order by intimidating the complainant. The alleged intimidatory conduct included the respondent driving past the complainant's house and staring at her such that she felt intimidated. At trial, the Magistrate accepted a no case submission made by the respondent's counsel. The Magistrate concluded that an order which restrained the respondent from behaving in an 'intimidatory or offensive' way was not authorised by the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (the Act). The Magistrate concluded that the respondent's alleged conduct would constitute an offence under the Police Act 1892. As such, because the Act only provides for the restraint of 'lawful' activities, an order which purported to restrain 'unlawful' conduct would fall outside the scope of the section. The Magistrate was also concerned with the subjective nature of the alleged intimidation. The order appears to prevent conduct which is objectively intimidatory, but the evidence referred to the subjective experience of the protected person.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the Magistrate was correct in concluding that the purported intimidatory behaviour was not 'objectively intimidating' within the meaning of the order.
2. Whether it is open for restraining orders to restrain unlawful conduct.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. Wheeler J agreed with the Magistrate's concerns and held that while conduct that is subjectively intimidating will often coincide with conduct that is objectively intimidating, 'it is self-evident that not all conduct which is experienced by a person as intimidating will be regarded as intimidatory from the point of view of an objective observer. The person who feels intimidated may be hypersensitive or may simply misunderstand the nature of the conduct' (see at [6]). In this case, the Court found that given there was little context or background before the Magistrate (such as acts of prior violence, property damage or threats), merely driving near someone's house and staring at them for a 'relatively short period' is difficult to perceive as intimidatory. While the respondent's conduct may have upset and intimidated the protected person subjectively, it could not objectively be regarded as intimidatory.
2. Wheeler J concluded that it was unlikely that the purpose of the Act was to substitute the sanctions of the criminal law or provide another means for deterring and punishing the commission of offences.

However, her Honour then held that the Magistrate erred in finding, 'that the mere fact that conduct which was alleged to be in breach of a restraining order was at the same time conduct which might be punishable under some other legislation took it outside the scope of the order, or alternatively meant that the order was not a "proper" order as applicable to such conduct' (see at [17]). Rather, the power to impose restraints of 'lawful activities and behaviour' under the Act should be read as granting a power to impose restraints on broadly lawful behaviour. Her Honour gave the example of an order purporting to restrain 'threatening' behaviour which could be lawful or unlawful behaviour, depending on the context. On the other hand, an order which restrains a person from murdering another would fall outside the scope of the Act. As such, depending on the circumstances and context, conduct in breach of a restraining order could be conduct which contravenes other legislation, and should not for that reason be determined to be outside the scope of the Act.

Ugle v The Queen* [2001] WASCA 268 (31 August 2001) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Exposing a child' – 'High risk' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'Perpetrator intervention program' – 'Sentencing' – 'Unlawful wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm'

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm, unlawful wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant was in a de facto relationship with the complainant and had 1 child. The assault offence occurred after the couple split up. The applicant repeatedly called the complainant. He approached the complainant as she walked to a shopping centre. He then grabbed her by the hair and punched her to the back and head. The applicant made numerous threats to kill the complainant during the assault and she attempted to run away but he dragged her back. The unlawful wounding offence involved the applicant forcing his way into the complainant's house. He stabbed her numerous times in the chest, back and neck and also attempted to stab her in the face. She pretended to be dead so as to stop the attack. While he was in remand, police officers made a number of telephone calls on the applicant's behalf indicating that he wished her to visit him. She did not do so and moved into a refuge after her release from hospital. However, her whereabouts was discovered by members of the applicant's family so she was forced to move. The complainant suffered lasting psychological injuries and her daughter was severely traumatised as the events occurred in her presence. The applicant was sentenced to three years' imprisonment for the assault offence and 9 years' imprisonment for the wounding offence, to be served cumulatively such that the total effective sentence was 12 years, with parole eligibility.

Issue/s: One of the issues concerned whether the sentences were manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave was granted and the appeal was upheld.

The appellant submitted that the 9-year sentence imposed for the unlawful wounding offence was excessive. Malcom CJ (with whom Steytler J and Burchett AUJ agreed) held that this was a vicious, pre-meditated attack which put the complainant's life in danger. Nevertheless, the sentencing judge's starting point for the wounding offence (before the applicant's guilty plea) was 12 years, which the Court held was excessive and that a starting point of 9 years would have been appropriate. It was noted at trial that the appellant remained a high risk of reoffending and prison based alternatives to violence programs to develop more appropriate strategies for resolving conflicts in relationships were recommended. This recommendation was not disapproved by the Court of Appeal. The appellant was re-sentenced to 6 years' imprisonment for the wounding charge, which resulted in a total effective sentence of 7 years and 4 months.

Sandle v Crofts* [2001] WASCA 106 (30 March 2001) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Provocation' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant arrived home late at night and asked his wife if she had had anyone in the house while he was overseas. She said no, at which point he punched her in the face. She then told him she did have a man in the house. He then started hitting her in the face and head with closed fists. He pulled her by the hair to a chair. He then hit her again and kicked her in the side while on the floor which caused her to black out. She was awoken by her son calling for her. Fearing for her life, she jumped off the balcony which was about three metres off the ground. The appellant tried to drag her up the stairs by the ankles which she resisted. She sustained severe injuries. The defence case was that the complainant's injuries were as a result of self-harm and she jumped off the balcony by choice. The appellant had no criminal history. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment with parole.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the conviction was unreasonable and cannot be supported having regard to the evidence.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive and whether the Magistrate gave insufficient weight to the 'mitigating circumstances of great provocation' leading up to the incident.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. This argument was dismissed – see at [28]-[50].
2. McKechnie J found that this offence was 'a vicious assault by a husband upon his wife without reason or provocation' (see at [52]) and that in cases of domestic violence a sentence encompassing general and personal deterrence is called for. The Court then held that a 12-month term of imprisonment was called for given the circumstances of the offence. However, the Court did acknowledge that given this was the appellant's first offence (he had no history of violence), it may have been appropriate for the sentence to be suspended for two years so as to provide for rehabilitation. However, ultimately the 12-month sentence was within the discretion of the Magistrate.

Mead v Couper* [2000] WASCA 345 (10 November 2000) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Deterrence' – 'People living in regional, rural and remote communities' – 'Perpetrator intervention program' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Victim'

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant had been told (untruthfully) that his de facto wife of six years had been sleeping with another man. The appellant accused her of doing so and then punched her in the face with a clenched fist multiple times. The complainant fell to the ground and the appellant kicked her in the back. He then grabbed her and carried her to a nearby yard. After the complainant yelled at the appellant to let her go, he released her and raised a wooden fence post above his head in a threatening way. The complainant suffered a broken jaw, facial swelling, various cuts and a sore back. The appellant was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment with parole edibility.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive or should have been suspended.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred in rejecting a supervision order coupled with an anger management course as a suitable penalty.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The appellant submitted that: he had no prior convictions involving violence; he had favourable prospects of rehabilitation; he demonstrated remorse and entered an early plea of guilty; his wife did not want him to be sent to prison and a prison sentence would have a harsh effect upon his wife and children. The Court rejected these arguments. Steytler J held that the assault was 'vicious' and caused serious injuries. His Honour also upheld previous authorities which indicate there is a general public concern with domestic violence (see at [13]).
2. The sentencing Magistrate commented that some in the community would view a supervision order coupled with an anger management course as a 'soft option'. Steytler J held that the Magistrate was simply concluding that the offence was so serious as to justify only a period of imprisonment and that general deterrence was of paramount concern. His Honour held that general deterrence is an important consideration in cases of domestic violence and that it was open for the Magistrate to conclude that general deterrence would not sufficiently be met by anything other than a sentence of imprisonment.

Bartlett v Scantlebury* [2000] WASCA 234 (29 August 2000) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault' – 'Deterrence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charge/s: Assault.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in a de facto relationship with the complainant. On Christmas Day 1999, the appellant was heavily intoxicated. An argument occurred. The appellant then assaulted the complainant by squeezing her arms and pulling her hair while she attempted to leave the house. The Magistrate also accepted that the appellant had engaged in intimidatory and threatening conduct over the previous two days. The appellant's evidence differed substantially. The Magistrate found that the appellant's evidence was contrived and manipulative and sought to paint his actions without fault. The Magistrate noted the protracted and serious nature of the offending. The complainant was left with no substantial physical injuries but there was a significant mental impact. The Magistrate also noted the fact that domestic violence cases are insidious, difficult to detect and have significant implications for the parties and the general community (see at [8]). The appellant was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment with parole eligibility.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

Miller J disagreed with the Magistrate's conclusions that deterrence outweighed all other sentencing considerations and that the seriousness of the offence meant that the only justifiable sentence was imprisonment. His Honour noted that this case concerned only one assault, which was the combination of seizing the complainant by the arm and pulling her hair. The Court also held that the Magistrate had placed undue weight on the events leading up to the assault and noted that the appellant had only been charged with one offence. While it was appropriate to take into account the traumatic effect of the assault on the complainant and correct that assaults involving domestic violence call for deterrent sentences, 'this assault could not be categorised as being of the most serious kind' and the description of it as such was an 'over-reaction to the facts of the case' (see at [17]). Miller J therefore set aside the sentence of imprisonment and fined the appellant $6000.

McCormack v The Queen* [2000] WASCA 139 (25 May 2000) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Deterrence' – 'Evidence' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Grievous bodily harm with intent' – 'Intent' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Grievous bodily harm with intent, attempted murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and his wife began conversing together with a man online. After some time, the appellant's wife's conversations with this man became 'more flirty and intimate' and eventually his wife agreed to stop using the internet. She said goodbye to this man and she refused to tell her husband what they discussed in this conversation. The next day, after attempting to discuss the issue with his wife, he stabbed her in the upper back while she was in bed either asleep or attempting to sleep. He then stabbed her again as she attempted to flee. He then unsuccessfully attempted to commit suicide. The appellant was found not guilty of attempted murder but guilty of grievous bodily harm with intent and was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment with parole eligibility.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the trial judge erred in instructing the jury that they could use evidence of the relationship between the appellant and his wife in the months leading up to the attack for the purposes of determining intention.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

1. The appellant submitted that the judge had misdirected the jury in allowing them to use evidence of disagreements between the appellant and his wife about her use of the internet and the breakdown of their relationship to infer the presence of intent. Kennedy J (with whom Pidgeon and Ipp JJ agreed) rejected this argument and held that the relationship was clearly admissible evidence which the jury could take into account in considering the appellant's intention when he attacked his wife (see at [19]).
2. The sentencing judge took into account various mitigating factors including the appellant's high degree of emotional distress arising from his childhood which left him with a 'dependent personality disorder, chronic depression and anxiety'. The sentencing judge also took into account the victim impact statement, which described the devastating effect of the attack on the appellant's wife and children. The sentencing judge also correctly noted the need for personal and general deterrence in domestic violence cases and that no form of domestic violence is acceptable, especially when it includes the use of a weapon. Kennedy J (Pidgeon J and Ipp J agreeing) held that although the sentence imposed was high, it was within the range of the sentencing discretion and correctly weighed the mitigating factors (see at [27]) and the need for general deterrence.

Vickers v Bailey* [2000] WASCA 136 (19 May 2000) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Assault' – 'Deterrence' – 'Exposing a child' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Perpetrator intervention program' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suspended sentence' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charge/s: Assault (eight counts).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The complainant was the appellant's de facto partner. After returning home intoxicated, the appellant 'lost the plot' after discovering that the cat had defecated on the bed. He assaulted the complainant. The following day, there was a further altercation and the appellant assaulted the complainant several times, including by squeezing her throat, throwing coffee and the contents of an ashtray over her and '(pushing) up her chin and started spitting into her face' in the presence of their children. The complainant then obtained a restraining order against the appellant but was unable to particularise many of the assaults due to the length and nature of the incident. The appellant conceded that the assaults were a build-up of frustrations over the last 12 months of the relationship and submitted that he suffered from depression, was remorseful and had never previously been violent towards the complainant. The appellant was sentenced to 9 months' imprisonment for each count, to be served concurrently.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The appellant submitted that notwithstanding the seriousness of the offending, a sentence of imprisonment was not the only option. Counsel for the respondent submitted that while each assault in isolation may have warranted a lesser penalty, the combination of all the counts and the time period over which they were committed aggravated the circumstances of the offence. The respondent also submitted that cases of domestic violence call for a sentence of personal and general deterrence.

Miller J agreed but emphasised that regard must be had to the individual circumstances of the case – 'I entirely agree with the submissions of counsel for the respondent that in general terms, a deterrent sentence for domestic violence offences will be called for. Much, however, depends upon the extent of the violence. Whilst here there were multiple offences and offences committed over a period of time, the complainant fortunately appears to have escaped injury. Further, seven of the offences appear to have occurred as one group of offences. Additionally, the appellant does not appear to have ever assaulted his de facto in the past, there being no allegation to that effect in the pre-sentence report, statement of facts or elsewhere and there being no victim impact statement from the complainant' (see at [12]). Miller J noted the pre-sentence and psychological report which suggested the appellant needed counselling in relation to anger. The appellant himself initiated contact with a domestic violence program and was proposing to participate in that program. As such, the Court found that the appellant should have been given the opportunity of a suspended sentence as an inducement for him to reform.

Pillage v Coyne* [2000] WASCA 135 (19 May 2000) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Importance of appropriate penalties' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Technical or trivial breach' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The female appellant and the male respondent had been in a relationship for six years. The appellant obtained an interim violence restraining order against the respondent. The respondent was charged with one offence of unlawful assault and four offences of breaching a violence restraining order. The magistrate dismissed the charge of assault and two charges of alleged breach of a violence restraining order. He convicted the respondent of two charges of breach for going into the bedroom of the complainant in the early hours of the morning and communicating with her by telephone on the same morning. The magistrate gave no real reasons for either the acquittals or the convictions he recorded (See [6]). The magistrate also decided to impose no penalty, without giving any reasons for doing so (See [7]).

Issue/s: The magistrate erred in law and in fact in imposing no penalty or sentence.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The magistrate made no reference to the provisions of the section of the Act allowing for the imposition of no penalty if certain preconditions are met. This constituted sufficient grounds for allowing the appeal. Further, this section also had no relevance in this case. The circumstances of the offence were neither trivial or technical (See [9]-[12]), and it was not unjust to impose a sentence in light of the fact that respondent was 42 years of age, employed with a regular income, and had a prior record of convictions (See [13]). Miller J also noted the clear social importance of the Restraining Orders Act 1997. His Honour provided, 'protected persons in the community generally must have confidence that restraining orders will be obeyed and complied with … [When] they are not, there must be significant consequences to support the fact that restraining orders mean something … [The] courts [must] ensure that their orders are not ignored' (See [13]-[15]). Fines of $750 and $250 were substituted. See also Dawes v Coyne [2000] WASCA 134.

Dawes v Coyne* [2000] WASCA 134 (19 May 2000) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Physical violence and harm' – 'Temporary protection order' – 'Violence restraining order'

Proceeding: Violence restraining order.

Appeal type: Appeal from decision of magistrate to place appellant on violence restraining order.

Facts: The female appellant and the male respondent had been in a relationship for six years. The appellant obtained an interim violence restraining order against the respondent. The respondent was subsequently charged with one offence of unlawful assault and four offences of breaching a violence restraining order. The magistrate dismissed the charge of assault and two charges of breach of the violence restraining order but convicted the respondent of two charges of breach. No penalty was imposed in respect of these breaches. Without warning, the magistrate also placed the appellant on a violence restraining order.

Issue/s: The magistrate erred in placing the appellant on a violence restraining order.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed and the violence restraining order set aside. The magistrate's actions were in every way a complete breach of the Act. The magistrate 'gave no indication of what it was that he intended to do, failed to alert the appellant to the possibility that an order might be made against her, and made no invitation to her to respond in any way' (See [10]).

Miller J also noted that the magistrate 'started by stating that it was a tragedy that 'domestic matters of this sort get into the criminal court' and made the observation that 'both parties had been causing trouble for the police who do not want to be involved in these sort of things''. These observations were 'entirely inappropriate' (See [6]). Gallegos v R* [1999] WASCA 191 (6 October 1999) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

'Complainant and applicant ex-lovers' – 'Complainant pregnant at time of assault' – 'Domestic violence' – 'Sentence not excessive'

Charge/s: Aggravated burglary and assault occasioning bodily harm

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: the applicant and complainant shared a brief sexual relationship, but did not live together. The applicant saw the complainant in a night club in Fremantle. He spat on her and wiped faecal material on her face. She went home. He followed her, without permission. At the house, he punched her repeatedly and kicked her. He also threatened her with a knife. The assault caused significant injuries to the complainant. The applicant pleaded guilty and, at first instance, was sentenced to three and a half years' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: Application refused. The applicant was self-represented. Chief Justice Malcolm considered that the way in which the earlier assault at the night club had preceded the aggravated burglary showed some persistence in the offending. It also exhibited an element of premeditation. The seriousness of the offending was elevated by the fact that the applicant knew that the complainant was pregnant at the time and the nature of the attack was such that no regard was paid to the safety of the foetus. His Honour said at [28]:

"It is now clear that in cases of domestic violence a sentence which gives effect to both personal and general deterrence will normally be called for. The circumstances may be such as to justify a substantial sentence of imprisonment".

Supreme Court

Kritskikh v Director of Public Prosecutions [2022] WASC 130 (21 April 2022) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Admissibility of evidence' – 'Appeal against conviction' – 'Body-worn camera footage' – 'Credibility' – 'Evidence act 1906 (wa) ss 37 and 39g' – 'Failure to consider family violence provisions' – 'Failure to have regard to the dynamics of family violence' – 'Female perpetrator' – 'Intoxication' – 'Previous incident of family violence' – 'Self defence' – 'Self-defence' – 'Significance of being first reporter of incident' – 'Victim as (alleged) perpetrator'

Charges: Aggravated assault causing bodily harm x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against conviction.

Issues:

1. Whether the court's reasoning was consistent with how a jury would be directed in respect of the family violence provisions
2. Whether evidence relevant to the appellant's degree of intoxication was wrongly excluded

Facts: The female appellant and Mr Williams were in a de facto relationship [19]. On the night of 1 December 2020, after the appellant and Mr Williams had attended a work function, Mr Williams formed the view that he ought to drive the appellant home because she was intoxicated, and carried her to his car. While Mr Williams was driving, the appellant allegedly attempted to take hold of the steering wheel, before punching and kicking Mr Williams. In response, Mr Williams repeatedly pushed the appellant away forcefully, making contact with her face. Mr Williams then called the police, who took photos of his injuries [4]-[8]. The appellant was found guilty by a Magistrate, and appealed on the following grounds:

1. Firstly, that the learned magistrate erred by excluding relevant evidence.
2. Secondly, that the magistrate erred by reasoning in a manner that was inconsistent with the family violence provisions of the Evidence Act 1906.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed, with orders setting aside the convictions and ordering a retrial.

Justice Hall found that grounds 3, 4 and 5 were made out because the Magistrate 'failed to address the issue of self-defence and reasoned in a way that was inconsistent with the family violence provisions' [126]. 'The circumstances of this case required that express consideration be given to self-defence and that, in dealing with that issue, the reasons be consistent with s 39E and s 39F.'

His Honour stated that self-defence was an issue due to 'evidence of the appellant being forced against her will into the car, the evidence of the significant injuries sustained by the appellant during the incident and the evidence of the prior incident of family violence' [112].

In considering the credibility and reliability of the evidence given by the appellant and Mr Williams, the Magistrate made the following findings:

1. Because Mr Williams had called the police in relation to both the current and previous altercations between the couple, his credibility was enhanced, and it was less likely that he had been the aggressor on those occasions.
2. '[T]he claim by the appellant that she had previously been the victim of domestic violence lacked credibility because she had not made a complaint about that earlier incident until after she was charged with the present charges' [122].

The Court found that in making these findings the magistrate failed to have regard to the dynamics of family violence (s 39F). In particular, the fact that victims of family violence often do not make reports to police. Instead, 'the magistrate relied on the delay in the appellant reporting the earlier incident of family violence to impugn' her credit [115]. Therefore, the magistrates' findings were inconsistent with s 39F [124].

In respect of the second ground of appeal, Justice Hall stated:

'The body worn camera footage was potentially cogent evidence of the appearance and condition of the appellant close in time to the alleged incident. The relevance of that evidence was that it went to the question of how intoxicated the appellant was. This was, as the magistrate noted, a matter of significance both to the likelihood that the appellant had behaved in the way alleged and in regard to the reliability of her memory of the events' [134]. Therefore, 'the magistrate was in error in excluding it' [136].

Sellenger v Turner [2021] WASC 308 (7 September 2021) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Economic and financial abuse' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Separation' – 'Stalking' – 'Totality principle'

Charges: Breach of protection order x 2, stalking x 1.

Proceedings: Applications for extension of time and leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The 29-year-old male appellant and female victim had been in a relationship for 6 months. When the relationship ended, police protection orders were served on the appellant with a condition that the appellant not go within 100m of where the protected person lives or works. In contravention of the orders, the appellant followed the victim while driving and made repeated attempts to contact her via phone. The appellant also attended the victim's workplace. The appellant also deposited small amounts of money in the victim's bank account. He was charged with breaches of the orders and with stalking. The appellant pleaded guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 14 months' imprisonment. The appellant appealed on the ground that the sentence imposed infringed the first limb of the totality principle [4].

Decision and Reasoning: Applications for extension of time and leave to appeal against sentence allowed, appeal dismissed.

Justice Strk found that the breach of the protection order was serious, occurring within 24 hours of the order having been served, by deliberate and repeated conduct. Her Honour noted that the victim felt intimidated by the appellant's behaviour including his deposits of money in the victim's bank account after their separation [100]. Her Honour explained that because the offences had not overlapped, it was not inconsistent with the totality principle that the sentences be served cumulatively [97], [105], [107]. Her Honour noted the appellant's 'troubling history of similar offending… which made personal deterrence a significant factor in sentencing' [108], and the fact that the appellant's guilty plea was the only mitigating factor [109]. Her Honour repeated the sentencing Magistrate's remarks on the victim impact statement, which detailed the significant and lasting psychological impact of the offending on the victim and her 10-year-old daughter [40].

'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Manifest excess' – 'Strangulation'

Charges: Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male appellant strangled his female partner until it was hard for her to breathe, and punched her in the face, causing significant bleeding from her left eye. He told her: “You did this. I didn’t do this.” The appellant was convicted, following trial, and sentenced to 2 years and 6 months imprisonment with eligibility for parole.

Grounds of appeal:

1. The sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. The magistrate erred in her calculation of the date on which the appellant's sentence was to be backdated (out by 4 days).

Held: Application for leave to appeal granted on both grounds but appeal only allowed in part to correct a mathematical error in sentencing (vary date of commencement from 21 to 17 August 2019).

Ground 1 alleging manifest excess was rejected. While the sentence was at the top of the range of appropriate sentences, it was not unreasonable or plainly unjust. The offence was extremely serious: “unprovoked, sustained and vicious.” Little could be said by way of mitigation, with the applicant’s complete lack of remorse or acceptance of responsibility. General deterrence is an important sentencing consideration in family violence offences. In particular at [62]-[63]:

> “It is characteristic of offences of this kind that they involve significant power imbalances (as the offence in this case did), that they are committed behind closed doors (as the offence in this case was) and that they are accompanied by lies and gas lighting (as the offence in this case undoubtedly was).
> These features underscore the need for the courts, in imposing sentences commensurate with the seriousness of the offence in each case and applying all relevant sentencing principles, to send a strong signal that violence of this kind is intolerable and will be dealt with accordingly. The “firming up” of sentences for such violence, referred to in Duncan v The Queen [2018] WASCA 154, reflects that need.”

In addition, the court emphasised at [64] that:

> “offences involving strangulation are particularly serious. As [the magistrate] said “a case of non-fatal strangulation … is extremely serious” and that “the courts now recognise how serious that action is.” In my view, her Honour can here be taken to be referring to the growing appreciation of the particular dangers associated with offences involving strangulation and with the role they play in cases of intimate > and family violence. That recognition has, of course, led to legislative action, introducing a specific offence of suffocation or strangulation. That offence was, of course, not in existence at the time of the appellant's offending against Ms Hallam. Nevertheless, as the learned Magistrate recognised, the recognition of the seriousness and danger of non fatal strangulation predated those legislative reforms and was a relevant sentencing consideration."

Ground 2 upheld but only to correct the date from which the sentence commenced from 21 August 2019 to 17 August 2019.

'Act causing bodily harm' – 'Appeal against sentence' – 'Glassing' – 'Imprisonment'

Charges: Act causing bodily harm x 1.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The male appellant and the female victim had been in a domestic relationship but had lived separately for 7 months. The appellant and the victim had a verbal argument through the glass window pane of a side door. The appellant punched the glass window pane, causing the glass to break and strike the victim on her face, resulting in injuries requiring medical attention including stitches. The appellant pleaded guilty on the first morning of trial and was sentenced to 10 months immediate imprisonment, with eligibility for parole.

Grounds of appeal:

1. The magistrate erred in the calculation of the discount afforded for the guilty plea.
2. The magistrate erred in failing to take into account any factor in mitigation other than the guilty plea.
3. The magistrate erred in imposing a sentence of imprisonment when a sentence of last resort was not warranted.
4. The magistrate erred in imposing a sentence of immediate imprisonment when it was not inappropriate to suspend the sentence.

Held: Appeal was upheld on grounds 3 and 4, and the appellant re-sentenced by way of a community based order.

The injuries sustained by the complainant were severe but was not comparable to “glassing” distinguishing: “[a] glassing involves an intentional breaking of a glass into a person’s face with the obvious potential for very severe injury. The appellant’s act involved the appellant breaking a window in a momentary loss of control with no intention of causing harm to the complainant.”

Ground 4: The term of immediate imprisonment was manifestly excessive having regard to sentences imposed in other cases and factors mitigating the seriousness of the offence (absence of weapons and intention to cause injuries suffered, impulsivity and lack of foresight of the consequences, no threats of violence, and isolated nature of the act). The appellant was also remorseful, had no history of violence or violent offending and had positive antecedents. Further, on Ground 3: It was not open to impose a sentence of imprisonment. A term of imprisonment greater than 6 months would not have been appropriate.

‘Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people’ – ‘Bail application’ – ‘Exceptional circumstances’ – ‘Female perpetrator’ – ‘Protection order’ – ‘Rehabilitation’ – ‘Victim as (alleged) perpetrator’

Charges: Aggravated unlawful wounding x 1; Breach of protective bail conditions x 1.

Proceedings: Application for bail.

Facts: The female applicant was awaiting trial for an aggravated unlawful wounding charge against her male ex-partner, the complainant, intending to argue she acted in self-defence. She had pleaded guilty to and was awaiting sentence for a breach of protective bail conditions charge. These conditions had prevented the applicant having any contact with the complainant but she submitted he had forced her to see him. While remanded in custody, the applicant’s ex-partner had tried to contact her, but she had refused. She had obtained a Family Violence Restraining Order protecting her from the complainant. She had taken steps towards rehabilitation, including drug and alcohol rehabilitation following an earlier breach of bail conditions for consuming alcohol.

Issues:

1. Whether there were exceptional reasons why the accused should not be kept in custody.
2. Whether the grant of bail would otherwise be proper, having regard to other factors the court must consider under cl 1 and cl 3 of Sch 1 Pt C of the Bail Act 1982 (WA).

Decision and reasoning: Bail granted.

Issue 1: There were exceptional reasons why the applicant should not be kept in custody. The breach of protective bail conditions charge was towards the lower end of seriousness for offending of its kind, particularly so "if it is accepted, in due course, that the applicant felt under pressure to go with the complainant. It was, in any event, the complainant who initiated the contact on that occasion". There was no suggestion that the applicant was violent or intending to interfere with the complainant as a witness ([90]-[93]).

Further, the applicant had demonstrated a concerted effort to engage in rehabilitation. It was particularly significant that she had engaged in alcohol and drug rehabilitation after she was sentenced for an earlier breach of bail due to consuming alcohol ([94]-[95]).

In addition, it was significant that the applicant had refused to have contact with the complainant while remanded in custody, even though she was permitted to do so. The court noted at [96]:

> "It is an irony in matters of this kind that a person who is remanded in custody for having breached a condition that prevented contact with a complainant is not prohibited from having contact with the complainant once they are in custody".

And continued at [97]:

> "Of course, in circumstances in which the applicant is well aware that she may put her prospects of being released on bail at risk if she were to have contact with the complainant, one might understand that she would exercise caution in that regard. However, the applicant has gone further. She has made an application and been granted the FVRO to prevent the complainant, Mr N, from having contact with her or approaching her. In other words, she has taken positive steps to give effect to the purpose to which cl 2(c) and (d) of sch 1 pt D of the Act are directed. That, it seems to me, is an unusual situation which, in combination with the applicant's steps towards rehabilitation and the hardship that she will be required to endure if she remains in custody in the metropolitan area while her mother and her young child remain in Carnarvon, does amount to exceptional reasons why the applicant should not be kept in custody".

Issue 2: The conditions outlined at [100]-[108] were sufficient to guard against the risk that the applicant would commit a further offence or would either endanger or interfere with the complainant as a witness in these proceeding ([109]).

S v Barnes [2020] WASC 327 (11 September 2020) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Application for leave to appeal against conviction' – 'Defence of provocation' – 'Domestic violence' – 'Social media confession' – 'Strangulation' – 'Victim as (alleged) perpetrator'

Charges: Aggravated common assault x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against conviction.

Facts: The male appellant admitted to assaulting his female partner; the sole issue at trial was whether the assault was unlawful. The complainant and appellant had a 'prolonged and heated argument' regarding the complainant buying plants and because the appellant refused to leave the TV room so that the children could watch TV. The context proceeding the assault included: the complainant slapping the appellant and trying to pull him off the couch where he was sitting; the complainant threatening to smash a hard disk drive unless the appellant left the TV room and when he did not leave throwing the hard disk drive against the wall; the complainant threatening to smash a PlayStation device and, when the appellant refused to leave the room, smashing it on the floor; the complainant kicking the appellant to try and force the appellant off the couch and allegedly saying 'If you don't do as I say, you'll never see your son again'.

The appellant then grabbed the complainant around the neck with his right hand and squeezed her throat. The complainant collapsed and lost consciousness. The appellant's evidence was that after she regained consciousness, she immediately started hitting him again. The complainant's evidence was that she left the room but returned some minutes later and punched the appellant in the face. The appellant recounted these events two months after the incident in an extended Facebook post.

Grounds: (1) In making an assessment of the severity of the provocation, the magistrate failed to assess the totality of the complainant's conduct.

Decision and reasoning: Leave to appeal refused.

It is clear from the magistrate's reasons as a whole, and particularly the following passages, that the magistrate considered the totality of the complainant's conduct:

> [60] "To say to a person in the course of an argument, 'You will never see your child again' if it was said, and I'm assuming that it was, is an unpleasant thing to say, and I would expect that it would have an effect on any father. It would make anybody angry, in my view, or perhaps more angry than they already were. But applying what was said in paragraph 35 of the Hart case which is been brought to my attention, I do not accept that saying that would be sufficient to cause a reasonable person to lose control to such an extent as to choke the person who said it into unconsciousness.

Many things get said in the course of heated domestic arguments; I don't consider that it can be said to justify such an extreme response. Although there is no medical evidence on the subject, I am sure that to choke a person into unconsciousness requires a considerable force and sustained over a period of time. It's a requirement of provocation defences the force used must not be disproportionate to the provocation which is offered, and my view, this force which I have been talking about clearly is disproportionate.

[61] … So at the end of the day, I am satisfied that the conduct of the complainant may well have provoked the accused to some extent, that it may well have provoked him to lose control and act on the sudden. But I do not consider that her conduct was sufficiently provocative in all of the circumstances to justify an assault of this magnitude and of this seriousness. And I am of the view that choking her into unconsciousness was clearly disproportionate to any provocation that she may have offered.

Had I concluded that the magistrate had erred in any of the respects alleged by ground 1, I would have granted leave to appeal but dismissed the appeal on the basis that there had no substantial miscarriage of justice. In my judgment looking at the totality of the evidence and, for the purpose of the objective element of the defence of provocation, attributing to the ordinary reasonable person each of the characteristics identified by the appellant in ground 1, the prosecution discharged the burden on it to negative the defence of provocation. Faced with the provocation offered by the complainant as described by the appellant in the Facebook post, an ordinary reasonable person would not have 'choked out' the complainant."

Stockley v Bailey* [2020] WASC 193 (8 June 2020) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated home burglary' – 'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Breaches of protection order' – 'Controlling, jealous, obsessive behaviour' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Guilty pleas' – 'History of domestic violence' – 'Separation' – 'Stalking' – 'Weapon'

Charges: Breaching a family violence restraining order x 6; possessing a controlled weapon x 1; aggravated home burglary x 1; deprivation of liberty x 1

Case type: Appeal against sentence

Facts: In February 2020, the applicant man was sentenced to 7 months' imprisonment following his conviction after guilty pleas to 6 offences of breaching a family violence restraining order (FVRO) and one offence of possessing a controlled weapon. Three days earlier the applicant was sentenced, following a guilty plea, to 3 years' imprisonment in relation to a charge of aggravated home burglary and deprivation of liberty. These offences occurred at the same time as one of the FVRO offences and the possession of the controlled weapon, and the day before another two of the FVRO offences.

The applicant man and female victim were in a relationship which ended around April 2019. On 26 May 2019, the applicant was served with the FVRO which prohibited him from, among other things, communicating or attempting to communicate with the victim. Approximately 2 hours after being served, the applicant sent a series of 88 text messages to the victim. He was arrested, charged with breaches of the FVRO and released on bail. Several days later the applicant entered the victim's house, pointed a replica pistol at her, forced her into his car and handcuffed her. That night, the pair discussed their relationship and had consensual sex. The applicant continued calling the victim and told her that he had entered her house again and accessed her Facebook account. He also repeatedly approached the victim on her commute home, including getting into her vehicle with her. The applicant was eventually arrested near the victim's home, and police searched his premises and located the replica firearm. The applicant had a modest criminal record, including convictions for breaching restraining orders and assault.

Grounds:

1. 7 months' imprisonment was manifestly excessive; and
2. the total sentence of 3 years, 7 months was disproportionate to the overall criminality involved and the total sentence was crushing.

It was also argued that the learned magistrate failed to give sufficient weight to his early guilty pleas, his lack of a relevant record and reasonably good antecedents, his efforts at rehabilitation, and his mental health at the time of his offending, which had been treated at the time of sentencing.

Held: Leave to appeal granted, appeal dismissed.

Ground 1 was not established. The applicant's breaches of the FVRO were not minor or technical. Rather, he repeatedly refused to obey the order which was imposed for the victim's protection, and flagrantly disregarded both the authority of the court and the rights of the victim ([56]). The offences were serious as they involved the applicant entering the victim's home on two separate occasions (one of which involved a replica pistol and handcuffs), and following her on the train home. These breaches were terrifying for the victim who believed that she was going to be murdered. The offences were further aggravated by the fact they were committed when the applicant was on bail for earlier breaches of the FVRO ([57]). However, Hill J noted that the Magistrate did not comply with s 9AA(5) Sentencing Act by failing to state the extent of the reduction given for his guilty plea ([70], [85]), but this did not result in the applicant's sentences being overturned ([71]). Hill J also found that the Magistrate took the applicant's antecedents and mental health issues into account. It was clear that the Magistrate considered that the applicant's mental health issues were not such that he was an unsuitable vehicle for personal and general deterrence ([74]-[75]).

In relation to Ground 2, Hill J found that the total effective sentence was neither unreasonable nor plainly unjust, and was not crushing ([82]-[84]). Any error made by the Magistrate did not result in a substantial miscarriage of justice ([91]).

Hosking v The State of Western Australia [2020] WASC 167 (20 May 2020) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Bail application' – 'Controlling behaviours' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Risk of reoffending' – 'Separation' – 'Step-child in the family' – 'Weapon'

Offences: Breach of Police Order x 1; Common assault x 1; Assault causing bodily harm x 1; Being armed in a way that may cause fear x 1.

Proceedings: Bail application

Issue: Whether the applicant might reoffend if released from custody; whether there were conditions that could be reasonably imposed if bail were granted to ameliorate the risk of reoffending.

Facts: The male applicant and female victim were married for 11 years and had three children. The victim also had another child (Ryan) from a previous relationship. One night at the family residence, the applicant pushed Ryan in the chest, causing him to stumble backwards, then punched him in the face. A 72-hour police order was served on the applicant following this incident which prohibited him from entering or remaining within 10 metres of the residence, from going within 10 metres of the victim, and from acting in a violent or intimidating manner towards her. The night following the incident, the applicant entered the residence. An altercation ensued in which the applicant pushed the victim to the ground, punched her in the head and kneed her in the head and body, for which she required medical attention. A Mr Ledgerton was at the residence and intervened to protect the victim. The victim left the house. The applicant then armed himself with a knife and went out to the front drive where he threatened Mr Ledgerton and a neighbour with the knife.

The applicant plead guilty to breaching the police order but not guilty to the remaining charges and was remanded in custody. The applicant applied for bail for the charged offences, but this was refused by the Magistrate on grounds of the seriousness and nature of the alleged offending, the fact that the applicant had breached a police order shortly after it was made, and fears by the victim (and concerns by the police) that the applicant posed a risk to the victim and her children. The applicant subsequently applied for bail again after the victim visited him in custody, but the Magistrate again refused on the basis that the prosecution case was strong and no conditions could be imposed that would ameliorate the risk of offending in a violent manner or interfering with witnesses. The applicant then applied for bail a third time.

Judgment: The judge granted bail subject to several conditions which His Honour stated would "sufficiently remove the possibility of the applicant reoffending" [8]. These conditions included: curfew and reporting conditions; conditions to protect the victim, Ryan, Mr Ledgerton and the neighbour from contact by the applicant; and conditions regulating the applicant's conduct with his children [20].

The respondent opposed the bail application because there was a risk the applicant would reoffend if released [8]. However, the victim submitted an affidavit to the court stating that she wanted the applicant to be released on bail [7]. The affidavit provided that: the victim did not resile from any of the allegations made; during the relationship, the applicant engaged in controlling behaviours that caused the victim distress; and the applicant continued to telephone her while in custody causing her more stress [16]. However, the affidavit also provided that the applicant's alleged conduct was out of character and the victim wanted bail to be granted because she was concerned that the applicant's continued detention would adversely affect his relationship with his children and make it more difficult for her to establish a new life [16].

His Honour had reservations about the victim's change in attitude [7] but granted bail due to a number of factors including: accommodation and employment arrangements that had been made for the applicant; the likely length of any sentence that would be imposed if he were convicted; the likely time until trial (next year); the incentive he had to abide by his bail undertakings (ie: access to his children); the time since the alleged offending occurred; the victim's attitude (she expressed a wish that the applicant be granted bail and had visited him in custody with two of her children); and evidence concerning the applicant's behaviour at the time of the offending (the behaviour occurred in a particular context that no longer prevailed – the applicant now accepted that the relationship was over) [7], [12].

Riddoch v Chiera* [2020] WASC 114 (7 April 2020) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravating factor' – 'Children' – 'Coercive control' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Miscarriage of justice' – 'Non-fatal strangulation' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charges: Aggravated assault causing bodily harm x1;

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence

Grounds:

1. The magistrate's conduct during the sentencing hearing did not allow defence counsel to make full submissions as to the appellant's personal circumstances and the nature of the relationship between the appellant and complainant, which hindrance resulted in a miscarriage of the sentencing exercise; and
2. The type of sentence imposed was manifestly excessive as it was reasonably open to His Honour, in all the circumstances, to suspend the term of imprisonment imposed. Particulars:
    1. The plea of guilty and the relevance of the discount for that plea;
    2. The appellant's antecedents;
    3. Sentences imposed in, broadly, comparable cases;
    4. The prosecution's concession as to the type of sentence open to the Court.
3. The learned Magistrate erred when he failed to adequately consider the imposition of a type of sentence less than one of immediate imprisonment.

Facts: The male appellant and female victim had been in a domestic relationship for six years and had a child together. At the time of offending, the victim and appellant were arguing in a car while the child was in the backseat. During the argument, the victim pulled over to the side of the road out of fear of the appellant and ask him to get out of the car. The appellant then punched the victim to the upper-left arm and grabbed her and squeezed her arm. He then "punched the victim to her left breast and the left side of her stomach". The appellant continued to assault the victim until he hit her head against a window and strangled her until she could not breathe.

The appellant entered a plea of guilty and was sentenced to 14 months' imprisonment. The magistrate declined to suspend the term.

Judgment: The first ground was dismissed; as the Magistrate was not discourteous and did not prevent the plea from being made, the contention was without foundation. McGrath J observed that "His Honour directly challenged counsel as to whether a submission was effectively being made that the victim was to blame. Counsel then positively engaged with the judicial officer, clarifying the submission." [26]

The second ground of appeal was also dismissed; it was noted that the sentencing judge "carefully reviewed all relevant sentencing factors" and only after doing so correctly concluded that imprisonment was the only appropriate punishment [37-8].

The third ground was also dismissed. McGrath J found the domestic relationship and presence of young children to be aggravating factors and thought the 15% discount afforded for the guilty plea by the sentencing judge was appropriate. After placing minimal weight on the offender's personal circumstances, such as his age, as mitigating factors, the Court concluded that the sentence was not manifestly excessive.

Clarke v Cantatore* [2019] WASC 385 (28 October 2019) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravating factor' – 'Assault' – 'Manifestly excessive' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Strangulation' – 'Totality'

Charges: Aggravated administration of a noxious thing to another person x 1; Aggravated common assault.

Proceedings: Appeal against sentences

Facts: The appellant and the complainant had, at the time of the allegations, been in a relationship for approximately five years and were engaged to be married. The appellant verbally abused the complainant and threw her onto the bed. The complainant managed to kick the appellant off her and the appellant threw items around the room. The complainant's attempt to use pepper spray to keep the appellant away only angered him further. He picked the complainant up by her neck and jaw before throwing her back a couple of metres into the fridge. The accused hit the complainant against the fridge again, causing her to drop to the ground in pain. When she stood up again the accused sprayed the back of her neck with pepper spray.

The appellant was sentenced to 12 months imprisonment and was made eligible for parole.

Issues: The appellant appealed on grounds the sentences were manifestly excessive and that the magistrate erred in ordering the sentences be served cumulatively and that the total sentences should not be suspended.

Decision and reasoning: Jenkins J held that the magistrate had correctly balanced the appellant's personal circumstances including the domestic relationship with the complainant and repeated significant force against any aggravating factors and that the sentences were therefore not manifestly excessive. The total effective sentence was held to be plainly unjust given the offending was close in time and in one incident, the appellant had good prospects of rehabilitation, and had never been sentenced to imprisonment or convicted of violent offending previously. There was no error in choosing not to suspend the sentences.

'Application for review order' – 'Cyber stalking' – 'Interim fvro'

Case type: application for review of an interim FVRO

Facts: The respondent was granted an interim FVRO based on allegations in an application, affidavit and oral evidence that his sister(the applicant) was communicating in an intimidating and abusive manner by phone calls, text messages and emails in a manner consistent with the meaning of 'cyber-stalking'. The communications related to the way in which he was caring for their father, who was in a nursing home. The applicant submitted that the magistrate applied the wrong meaning of the term 'family violence' and there was no evidence of any act that could arguably constitute 'family violence' within the correct definition under the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA), arguing that the magistrate therefore lacked jurisdiction to grant the FVRO, or alternately that her application be treated as an appeal.

Issue: Did the magistrate apply the wrong meaning of 'family violence'

Held: The magistrate did not make an error in jurisdiction by applying the wrong definition and the application for review was dismissed. The application, supporting affidavit and oral evidence heard all disclosed matters that were within the definition of "cyber stalking". In any event if the matter were to be reviewed the final hearing on the FVRO would need to be vacated and the matter would be more quickly dealt with by way of final hearing.

[Summary prepared by Lily Philp for Western Australian Magistrates Court]

Howell v Davies [2019] WASC 220 (27 June 2019) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Application for leave to appeal against sentence' – 'Breach of protection order' – 'Children' – 'Court safety' – 'Family violence' – 'Intimidation' – 'Repeated breaches'

Charges: 1 x breach of restraining order

Case type: Application for leave to appeal out of time and leave to appeal against sentence

Facts: The appellant man pleaded guilty to a charge of breaching a family violence restraining order. He breached the order by approaching his female former partner outside court immediately following the restraining order final hearing for which he had failed to appear and asking "when am I going to see my kids?" He was sentenced to 7 months' imprisonment. He sought leave to appeal against that sentence. The application for leave to appeal was lodged 12 days after the last date for filing an appeal. An application for expedited hearing had already been granted.

Ground: The learned magistrate erred in finding that it would be necessary to find 'unjust circumstances' in order to suspend the term of imprisonment ([24]).

Held: The breach in question did not involve any actual or expressly threatened violence, however Hall J noted that 'protected persons can feel intimidated or threatened by being contacted or approached by the person they fear'. The orders intended to provide protection from such fear, as well as the risk of physical harm ([31]).

In assessing the gravity of the offence, Hall J listed relevant factors:

- The breach occurred in the surroundings of a court, where the protected person was entitled to feel secure;
- The appellant attended court for a hearing in relation to the order, so its requirements must have been known to him;
- The approach was physical, and it is more likely that fear would be caused to a protected person in such a case;

- This was the third breach of the same order within a 4-month period, demonstrating a persistent disregard for court orders and the appellant's failure to be deterred by previous prison sentences;
- The breach occurred just over 10 days after the appellant was released after serving, concurrently, 2 months for previous breaches (aggravating feature);
- This was the eleventh offence of this nature over a 5-year period. The appellant had clearly shown contempt for authority on previous occasions, which thereby increased the need for specific deterrence.

These factors, as well as the appellant's explanation for and nature of the breach, his early guilty plea and the risk of institutionalisation, led his Honour to find that it would have been inappropriate to suspend the term of imprisonment. Accordingly, there was no substantial miscarriage of justice and the appeal was dismissed ([39]).

Goodacre v Lumbers [2019] WASC 184 (27 May 2019) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Appeal against conviction - guilty plea' – 'Breach of fvro' – 'Meaning of fvro term'

Charge/s: 1 x breach of FVRO

Case Type: Application for extension of time to appeal, appeal against conviction following plea of guilty

Facts: On 29 December 2018 the appellant was convicted in the Magistrates Court on his plea of guilty to one offence of breaching a FVRO contrary to s 61(1) of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA). The appellant applied for an extension of time to appeal and for leave to appeal against conviction. The appellant appeals the conviction on the ground that he could not in law, on the basis of the admitted facts, have been guilty of the offence. The appellant was said to have breached the FVRO by 'harass[ing] the Person Protected by any electronic means, including by using the internet and any social network application (such as 'Facebook') to depict or refer in any manner to the person protected', and appeals on the basis that he was dealt with in the Magistrates Court on the basis that he referred to the person protected and not on the basis he harassed her.

Issue: Is a reference to a protected person in a SMS message not sent to the protected person a breach of the FVRO? Is it a mere reference via electronic means that constitutes a breach, or is it actual harassment?

Held: Application allowed and leave granted. A breach occurs if the person subject to the order 'harasses' the person protected. The reference to ‘including by using the internet and any social network application (such as ‘Facebook’) to depict or refer in any manner to the person protected’ serves only as an example of what could constitute harassment, and was not intended by parliament to mean that any electronic reference to the person protected constitutes a breach.

[Summary prepared by Lily Philp for Western Australian Magistrates Court]

Masoud v Dhaliwal* [2019] WASC 56 (1 March 2019) – Western Australia Supreme Court

‘Fines’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Security officer’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Strangulation’

Charges: Assault in circumstances of aggravation x 1.

Case type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was convicted on his plea of one offence of assault in circumstances of aggravation. The relevant circumstance of aggravation was that the appellant and the victim, the appellant's wife, were in a family relationship. The assault comprised of the appellant hitting the victim, grabbing her by the throat, and holding her around five seconds until other family members intervened ([6]). At the time of the offence, the appellant held a security officer’s licence and worked as a security officer. The licence was suspended and he resigned from his job before the sentencing hearing ([7]). Having regard to the seriousness of the offence and mitigating factors, the magistrate imposed a fine of $1200 and made a spent conviction order ([1]).

Issues: The appellant appealed the sentence. Submissions included that:

- The appellant's counsel did not make submissions about the amount of the fine or the possible impact of a fine on the appellant's ability to continue to hold a security licence, and therefore the magistrate did not consider such implications.
- The sentence would lead to a loss of employment, hardship and a loss of financial security.
- The imposition of a fine under $500 would be within the range of an appropriate exercise of the sentencing discretion given the circumstances of the offence and relevant mitigating factors (appellant's age and evident remorse, absence of any prior offending, the fact that the appellant is the main financial provider for his family).

Decision and reasoning: The Court was not satisfied that there was any substantial miscarriage of justice and dismissed the appeal. At [29]-[32], Tottle J noted numerous issues with the appellant’s case. First, as the respondent submitted, reducing the fine imposed on the appellant under $500 would undermine the operation of the Security and Related Activities (Control) Act 1996 (WA). His Honour accepted that this was a case involving a nexus between the offending and the appellant's occupation as a security officer. Security officers must often exhibit self-restraint in the performance of their duties. The offending was contrary to this. Second, there was force to the respondent's submission that the appellant's argument does not rest on the proposition that the fine should be reduced because of the extra-curial punishment constituted by the financial hardship resulting from the loss of the appellant's security officer's licence, but that the fine should be reduced to avoid that extra-curial punishment with the result that the appellant is doubly advantaged in relation to mitigation. Third, the maximum penalty for the offence of common assault in circumstances of aggravation is a $36,000 fine or 3 years' imprisonment, or both. A fine of less than $500 would not constitute an appropriate sentence. Although the offence was considered to be 'towards the lower end of the scale', there is no single correct sentence for any offence, and his Honour held that a fine of less than $500 would not be adequate given the seriousness of the offending.

Smartt v Sloane* [2019] WASC 35 (5 February 2019) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Coercive and controlling' – 'Cumulation' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Protection orders' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Breaches of a restraining order and a protective bail condition, stalking.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant breached a Family Violence Restraining Order (FVRO) which restrained him from communicating or attempting to communicate with the victim (his former partner) by any electronic means. He was also charged with an offence of stalking, based on repeated calls he made to the victim which had the effect of intimidating her. He also failed to comply with a protective bail condition ([3])-[12]). He pleaded guilty to all the offences and was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. The Magistrate noted that the appellant's conduct was coercive and controlling, causing fear to his former partner. His behaviour was 'persistent and intimidatory', and the breaches showed a repeated disregard of the court orders ([16]).

Issues: The appellant sought to appeal his sentence on the ground that the Magistrate's sentencing discretion miscarried, and that the sentence was manifestly excessive and contrary to the weight of the evidence.

Decision and reasoning: The Court found that the appellant's breaches of the restraining order could not be described as ‘minor or technical’ ([33]). Although the breaches did not involve actual or threatened violence, his repeated acts showed a refusal to accept the authority of the order imposed for the protection of the victim. The Court was satisfied that the term imposed for the offences was manifestly long so as to show an error in principle ([35]). The Court considered the personal circumstances of the appellant – he was 36 years old, a self-employed businessman, and had previous convictions for serious breaches of a VRO against the same victim for which he was sentenced to imprisonment ([37]). Consequently, the Court allowed the appeal and resentenced the appellant. A cumulative sentence was found to be appropriate to reflect the additional element of intimidation. The head sentence was reduced to 8 months, and the appellant was eligible for parole ([40]-[41]).

‘Animal abuse’ – ‘Disclosure’ – ‘Manifestly excessive’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Totality’

Charges: Aggravated unlawful assault x 2; Aggravated unlawful assault causing bodily harm x 4; Cruelty to an animal causing it unnecessary harm x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and complainant were in a de facto relationship. On multiple occasions over 2 years, the appellant punched or struck the complainant, causing a broken arm ([25]) and a split lip ([26]). On the occasions where he struck her with a hairbrush and mobile phone, her head split open and she required stitches ([18]-[21], [24]). The appellant also kicked her small dog, causing it to become paralysed and die ([29]). Her children were present on most of the occasions. The assaults were unprovoked. While the police were sometimes called by witnesses, the complainant did not feel safe enough to tell the police about all the assaults until she had left the relationship ([31]).

The appellant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 22 months’ imprisonment ([48]).

Issues: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive; whether the sentence infringed the first limb of the totality principle; whether a suspended sentence should have been imposed.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed.

Derrick J found that the sentence was not manifestly excessive. His Honour stated that “over an extended period of time the appellant engaged in a serious course of criminal conduct comprised of subjecting the vulnerable complainant to a number of significant acts of domestic violence. The fact that the offences were committed in a domestic setting increases the seriousness of what the appellant did" ([73]). Factors such as the appellant's relative youth and relatively limited prior record provided some mitigatory value.

For largely the same reasons, Derrick J considered that imposing an immediate term of imprisonment, compared to a suspended sentence, was not outside the range of the magistrate's sentencing discretion ([94]).

'Adjournments and timely decision making' – 'Fair hearing and safety' – 'Family violence restraining order' – 'Judicial review' – 'Victim experience of court processes'

Case type: Application for review of Magistrate's decision not to make a final family violence restraining order and application for stay of proceedings.

Facts: The applicant made an application for a family violence restraining order pursuant to s 24A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ('Restraining Orders Act') against her former partner ([9]). The Court made an interim family violence restraining order ([10]). The respondent objected to the interim order ([11]). The next hearing was listed as a 'Restraining Order Final Order Directions Hearing'. The respondent did not attend at that hearing. The Magistrate did not make a final order, and adjourned the hearing ([14]-[17]).

The applicant applied for a review order under s 36 of the Magistrates Court Act 2004 (WA) ([2]), to review the Magistrate's decision not to make a final restraining order. The applicant also applied for a stay of the substantive hearing.

Issues: Whether the applications should be granted.

Decision and Reasoning: Tottle J granted the review order and the stay of proceedings.

Tottle J set out the principles governing judicial review under s 36of the Magistrates Court Act 2004 (WA) at [4]-[8]. His Honour set out the principles governing when a final order must be made under s 42 of the Restraining Orders Act at [20]-[24]. Tottle J held that it was irrelevant that the hearing was described as a 'Restraining Order Final Order Directions Hearing' even though no hearing of that nature is contemplated or provided for by the Restraining Orders Act (discussing Kickett v Starr [2013] WADC 52) ([27]-[32]). Tottle J was satisfied that the Magistrate made a jurisdictional error by not exercising the jurisdiction conferred on him by the Restraining Orders Act ([33]).

Tottle J set out the principles governing when a stay ought to be granted at [40]. Tottle J granted a stay of the proceedings on the grounds that the applicant's medical conditions and stress would be exacerbated by having to face the respondent in a contested hearing ([41]-[42]). Tottle J noted that s 10B of the Restraining Orders Act requires courts to have regard to the possibility of re-traumatisation during the proceedings ([43]).

'Animal abuse' – 'Breach of restraining order' – 'Control' – 'Domestic violence incident report' – 'Factors affecting risk' – 'Financial abuse' – 'Frequency of abuse' – 'Jealousy' – 'Risk assessment' – 'Stalking' – 'Strangulation' – 'Threats to kill'

Charges: Obstructing a police officer x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant was convicted of obstructing two police officers by resisting arrest ([2]). The appellant was arrested on suspicion of committing an offence by breaching a violence restraining order ([2]). The breach occurred when the appellant attended a dog training class when he allegedly knew the victim would be there ([56]). The victim later reported the incident and the incident was recorded with a Domestic Violence Incident Report ('DVIR'):

- 'Prior family domestic violence incidents between the involved parties? Yes
- Is the victim frightened? Yes
- Is the abuse happening more often? Yes
- Is the abuse getting worse? Yes
- Financial issues? Yes (Issues surrounding the ownership of the two dogs)
- Does the perpetrator try to control everything the victim does? Yes
- Is the perpetrator excessively jealous? Yes
- Does the perpetrator constantly text, call contact, follow, stalk or harass the victim? Yes
- Has the perpetrator ever threatened to hurt or kill the victim? Yes

- Has the perpetrator eve attempted to strangle/choke/suffocate/drown the victim? Yes
- Other information: [the appellant] has grabbed [the complainant] by the throat in Dec 2014 and has tried to strangle one of the two dogs in the past' ([57]).

Issues: One issue was whether the police could form a reasonable suspicion that the appellant had breached a violence restraining order by relying on a DVIR (61)

Decision and Reasoning: Justice Tottle concluded that the officer's 'suspicion of a breach of the order by the appellant was reasonable. The narrative section of the incident report read in the context of the DVIR section of the report (that is the allegation of breach assessed against what had allegedly taken place in the past) provide a basis for a suspicion that the appellant had breached the order' ([70]).

'Breach of restraining order' – 'Following, harassing and monitoring' – 'Sentencing-protection of victims' – 'Threats'

Charges: Breach of violence restraining order (VRO) x 20.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and the victim were married for 14 years but were separated at the time of the offences ([13]). A VRO was granted with the victim as the protected person ([13]). The appellant was prohibited from contacting the respondent except to arrange for contact with his son ([15]). The appellant breached the VRO over a period of 7 months by making a significant number of phone calls to the victim and sending text messages and letters beyond the bounds of the VRO ([18]-[53]). In some instances, the messages included threats to kill the victim and himself. The Magistrate imposed an aggregate sentence of 18 months' imprisonment.

Issues: There were 6 grounds of appeal:

1. the total sentence was manifestly excessive;
2. the Magistrate did not properly take into account the appellant's pleas of guilty which were entered at an early opportunity;
3. the Magistrate failed to consider totality when determining the aggregate sentence;
4. the Magistrate overlooked the appellant's personal circumstances including his wife's breaches of the Family Court consent orders and the appellant's mental state at the time of the offences;

5. the Magistrate made an error of fact by taking into account an untrue submission made by the prosecutor that the appellant had threatened his child; and
6. there was an error in recording the appellant's aggregate sentence as 18 months' imprisonment rather than 15 months' imprisonment ([3]).

Decision and Reasoning: Jenkins J dealt with the grounds of appeal in the following manner:

1. Dismissed ([142]-[175]).
2. Error made out. Jenkins J held that the Magistrate failed to correctly apply s 9AA(5) of the Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) by failing to state the extent of reduction given to the pleas of guilty for each head sentence ([122]-[124]).
3. Dismissed ([125]-[127]).
4. Dismissed ([128]-[137]).
5. Not possible to decide because part of the proceedings in the Magistrates Court had not been recorded. Jenkins J did not take this fact into account in deciding the appeal ([138]-[141]).
6. Dismissed. It was clear that the Magistrate meant to impose an aggregate sentence of 18 months' imprisonment ([109]-[110]).

While Jenkins J accepted that ground 2 was made out, the appeal was dismissed because the error did not result in a substantial miscarriage of justice ([184]).

Jenkins J referred to the role of the Restraining Orders Act in deterring domestic violence at [152]:

> The long title of the Restraining Orders Act reflects Parliament's intention for the Act to provide for orders to 'restrain people from committing acts of family or domestic or personal violence by imposing restraints on their behaviour and activity'. In order for the Act to be effective, offenders must appreciate that if they breach a VRO they will receive a significant penalty. The community and the courts have [an] intolerance and abhorrence of violence and threatened violence in domestic and former domestic relationships. The penalties imposed for breaches of VROs must reflect that intolerance and abhorrence, in the hope that the penalties deter offenders and protect victims.

'Miscarriage of justice' – 'Notice of application' – 'Violence restraining order'

Charges: Breach of violence restraining order ('VRO') x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: There was a final VRO in place protecting the applicant's partner. The applicant's partner applied for a variation of that order. The applicant was not served with notice of the application to vary the VRO ([10]). The Magistrate granted the application to vary the VRO even though the appellant was not present ([11]). The appellant pleaded guilty to breaching the VRO ([1]).

Issues: Whether the appellant's conviction upon his own plea was a miscarriage of justice.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed ([30]). The variation to the restraining order was a nullity ([16], [22]). It was an essential condition of the jurisdiction to hear the application to vary the VRO under s 48(2) of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) that the Court be satisfied that the appellant was served with the summons ([23]). Since the Court was not so satisfied, the VRO had no legal force. It was a miscarriage of justice for the appellant to be convicted of breaching the order ([24]).

BV (on behalf of M, N and O) v TP* [2016] WASC 228 (28 July 2016) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Evidence issues' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Victim experience of court processes' – 'Violence restraining order'

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against Magistrate's decision not to grant final violence restraining order (FVO).

Facts: The appellant, BV, and the respondent, TP, were married but separated. BV obtained an interim FVO against TP in the Children's Court. The FVO was to protect BV and TP's three daughters, M, N and O ([1]-[2]). At the final order hearing, after BV had given her evidence in chief, the Magistrate interrogated TP's counsel about the likely content of further evidence proposed to be given by the children. The Magistrate expressed a strong disinclination against exposing the children to cross-examination by the respondent's counsel. The Magistrate summarily dismissed BV's application for a final order VRO on the basis that even if their evidence was accepted, it would not be enough to justify an FVO being granted ([7]-[8], [45]).

Issues: Whether the Magistrate erred in law by summarily dismissing the proceedings.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Kenneth Martin J held that the Magistrate was correct in expressing concern for the children's welfare if they were cross-examined ([118]). His Honour held that the Magistrate had the power to summarily dismiss the final order VRO application ([133]-[143]) and that the Magistrate's discretionary exercise of power to dismiss the proceedings was justifiable ([144]-[147]).

His Honour discussed the Supreme Court's appellate jurisdiction in the circumstances that the interim order was made in the Children's Court at [21], [46]-[90] and [149]-[161]. His Honour discussed the principles applicable to children giving evidence in VRO proceedings at [99]-[119].

Bacchelli v Merchant* [2015] WASC 205 (9 June 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Insanity' – 'Miscarriage of justice' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Plea of guilty'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant pleaded guilty to breaching a violence restraining order in favour of his wife and was fined $500 with costs. The breach arose out of the appellant's attendance at his wife's home to retrieve some of his property. He claimed he had misunderstood the terms of the violence restraining order and that if he had known that the order did not permit him to attend the house, he would have attended the police station and asked officers to accompany him while he retrieved the property. The appellant had previously been diagnosed with bipolar disorder and had tendered medical records to the Magistrate.

Issue/s: Whether there was a miscarriage of justice because when the appellant pleaded guilty he was unaware he had an arguable defence of unsoundness of mind.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld and a retrial was ordered. The appellant's affidavit on appeal stated that he was suffering a relapse of his bipolar disorder when he pleaded guilty to the charge. A psychiatrist's affidavit indicated that it was more likely than not that the appellant was, 'in such a state of mental impairment so as to deprive him of the capacity to know that he ought not to assault someone or return to his house' (see at [36]). However, at the time he pleaded guilty, he was not aware that his mental state was not normal. As such, the evidence indicates that he may have had an arguable insanity defence at the time of the guilty plea. Furthermore, when the appellant consulted with a solicitor, there was no discussion in relation to a possible insanity defence, even though the solicitor knew of the appellant's history of mental illness. There was no available evidence at the time that the lawyer should have considered the availability of a mental impairment defence. Nevertheless, Beech J held that, 'through no fault of his own, Mr Bacchelli had no practical opportunity to raise the possible defence of insanity, or the facts relevant to it, with his lawyer' (see at [54]). The appellant had an arguable defence but had no way of knowing of that defence, such that his plea was fundamentally not an informed one. Beech J noted that this does not mean a plea will always be set aside in these circumstances but in this case, the nature of the appellant's ignorance of the defence resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Bernard v Williams* [2015] WASC 182 (30 April 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Consent' – 'Immediate imprisonment' – 'Repeated breaches of a restraining order' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant pleaded guilty to two breaches of a violence restraining order. He breached the order by living with the protected person and by being within a hundred metres of the protected person (in the same house as her). At the same time, the appellant was also dealt with for an earlier breach alleging that he was within a hundred metres of the protected person (attending and remaining at the protected person's address). This was a 'third strike' case in which the magistrate was required to impose a penalty that is or includes imprisonment. The magistrate imposed a term of imprisonment for six months for each offence. A sentence of six months or less may not be imposed (Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) s86). The day before the hearing of this appeal, the Magistrates Court recalled the sentence and imposed a sentence of 6 months and 1 day.

Issue/s: One of the issues was that the sentence contravened the Sentencing Act.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. If it was not for the error in imposing a sentence of six months, the decision of the magistrate to impose a sentence that included imprisonment would have been within the sound exercise of sentencing discretion. The appellant had breached a VRO repeatedly (See Pillage v Coyne [2000] WASCA 135 at [13]-[15]). The correction of the sentence to 6 months and 1 day was not made in compliance with s 37(2) of the Sentencing Act as the magistrate did not give the appellant the opportunity to be heard. The appellant fell to be resentenced.

A sentence of suspended imprisonment would have been appropriate but for the fact that the appellant had already served 6 weeks in prison. The term of imprisonment was set aside and the appellant fined $1,500. The court took into account a number of factors including that the protected person expressed no fear of the appellant at the time of appeal; it was important to demonstrate to the appellant that he could not disregard the order of the court with impunity; the consent of the protected person was not a mitigating factor but it was relevant in considering the circumstances of the offence; and although there had been repeated breaches of the order, there was nothing to suggest actual violence or threat of violence (See [25]-[28]). His Honour also cited Pillage v Coyne [2000] WASCA 135 where his Honour Miller J described the Restraining Orders Act as social legislation of the utmost importance:

'…protected persons in the community generally must have confidence that restraining orders will be obeyed and complied with … [When] they are not, there must be significant consequences to support the fact that restraining orders mean something … [The] courts [must] ensure that their orders are not ignored [14].'

Wallam v Grosveld* [2015] WASC 145 (24 April 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of restraining order' – 'Imprisonment' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Breach of restraining order.

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant was subject to a violence restraining order (VRO) in favour of his former partner which prevented him from approaching her and from being within a nominated distance of her premises. He attended her premises in breach of the order. He claimed that he and the protected person were 'back in a relationship'. His had a history of breaching restraining orders in place against the same protected person. He was sentenced to 8 months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether it was reasonably open for the Magistrate to conclude that a sentence of immediate imprisonment was the only appropriate sentencing option.

2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. It seemed that the protected person invited the applicant back to her premises to collect his clothes. Notwithstanding, any breach of a VRO is serious. Justice Kenneth Martin commented on the penalties for the offence and then noted at [78]:

'Those significant statutory penalties speak loudly as to the seriousness of a breach of a restraining order and dictate how closely and carefully the underlying circumstances of such an offence must be assessed in every case. In the past there have, of course, been well referenced instances where terrible crimes of violence have been committed in the community against protected persons by individuals otherwise bound by a restraining order, but who chose to ignore it. Plainly, the statutory right to apply for a VRO is meant to assist the more vulnerable to protect themselves from violence, especially (but not solely) women who are the victims of domestic violence. Thus, issues of general and specific deterrence concerning offenders are more than usually important in this arena.'

In this case, there had been no threatening or intimidatory behaviour. While an adverse inference could be drawn from the apparent fact that the applicant was hiding when police arrived, the applicant's actions cannot be seen as a 'calculated and flagrant' contempt of the VRO – 'Ignorance about the strict workings of a VRO, in the face of periods of separation and reconciliation and then heavy alcohol consumption at the end of a long-term relationship, are a more viable explanation for his misconduct, in my view' (see at [80]).

His Honour expressly stated that he was not meaning to convey that for some VRO breaches which include a 'flagrant disregard' for court orders, 'a term of immediate imprisonment will not present as the only appropriate sentencing option' (see at [81]). However, in this case the circumstances (including that the penalties imposed upon him for his prior breaches were only fines and the benign nature of the breach) meant that an escalation in punishment from these pecuniary penalties up to a term of 8 months' imprisonment, was not within the discretion open to the Magistrate. (Note: this position would be altered if s 61A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) applied, which provides for a requirement of imprisonment after 2 discrete offences within a 2-year period).

2. This argument was also upheld.

Rogers v Hitchcock* [2015] WASC 120 (7 April 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of police order' – 'Criminal history' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Programs for perpetrators' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Breach of police order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was at a caravan park with his wife and two-year-old child. The appellant and his wife were drinking heavily when a disagreement occurred and police attended. Police issued a 72-hour order under the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) which prevented the appellant from communicating with his wife or approaching within 100 metres of her. The next day, police attended to check on the appellant's wife and discovered the appellant hiding in the house. The appellant had a minor but relevant criminal history involving two breaches of prior police orders made in favour of his wife. He pleaded guilty, was granted bail and was placed on a 'domestic violence behaviour change programme' under the supervision of a Family Violence Court. He completed the majority of the program but was unable to complete it because he was remanded in custody after attending his wife's home in breach of bail. A progress report about his participation in the program was provided to the Magistrate, which stated that he generally 'reported as directed and engaged well' but that he 'had made no identifiable treatment gains during the programme and was not considered suitable for a further community based disposition' (see at [16]). He was sentenced to seven months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the Magistrate erred in sentencing the appellant to a term of imprisonment.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred in failing to suspend the term.
3. Whether the Magistrate erred in failing to backdate the sentence of imprisonment.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of ground 3 – the Magistrate erred by not backdating the sentence to give credit for time already spent in custody.

1. The issue of imprisonment was decided in the context of s 61A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA), which provides for a presumption of imprisonment for repeat offenders under the Act. Hall J held that while there was no actual or threatened violence involved in the current or prior breaches, the appellant had deliberately refused the authority of the orders. See in particular at [46] – 'Deliberate breaches of court orders or police orders made under the Act undermine the efficacy of such orders.

Deterrence both personal and general must play a significant role when orders are breached. If those who are the subject of such orders believe that they can breach them without suffering any real consequence then there will be little incentive to be compliant.'

2. The Court held that it was within the Magistrate's discretion to refuse to suspend the sentence.

   Given error was demonstrated by the failure to backdate the sentence, it was appropriate to resentence the appellant. In that regard, Justice Hall took into account some further steps that the appellant had taken towards rehabilitation, including drug and alcohol programs. Given these circumstances and the time already spent in custody, the prison sentence was set aside and the appellant was fined $1500.

Weston v Cartmell* [2015] WASC 87 (16 March 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Bail' – 'Breach of bail' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality' – 'Trespass'

Charge/s: Trespass, Breach of bail (numerous counts).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant's marriage with his wife (the complainant) ended. The complainant had purchased a new house and the appellant climbed the fence and walked around the property for some time. He had some property including vehicles at the house. The appellant then forced entry and was restrained by the complainant's male friend who was at the home before police arrived. After being released on bail with conditions that he not contact or attempt to contact the complainant, he breached this bail by attempting to contact her via email 153 times. He also made 126 phone calls or text messages. These communications occurred while the appellant was living in New Zealand. The appellant and the complainant had shared business interests. The appellant also had an interest in the complainant's home because part of the deposit for the home had been paid from a bank account in which the appellant had an interest. The prosecution accepted that many of the communications related to these business matters. A total effective sentence of 16 months' imprisonment was imposed.

Issue/s: Whether the total effective sentence did not bear a proper relationship to the overall criminality.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The appellant submitted that the sentence should have been suspended.

Hall J noted that while the large number of breaches of bail made this offending serious, the personal circumstances of the appellant were exceptional. Given that many of the communications related to business issues, it is difficult to conclude that the communications were intimidatory. As his Honour noted at [39] – 'The number of the communications could not be viewed in isolation from their purpose and subject matter. There was no evidence that any of the communications were harassing or threatening in tone, content or nature. There was no information regarding communications being at inconvenient times or being deliberately repetitive.'

Furthermore, the evidence indicated that the conduct was out of character. The appellant had previous good character, a solid employment history, surrendered himself to police and fully cooperated. This indicated an acceptance of responsibility and remorse. He was at minimal risk of re-offending so specific deterrence was not significant. While general deterrence is important in sentencing breaches of bail and 'Compliance is likely to be undermined if breaches are dealt with by derisory penalties' (see at [43]), this did not mean that the term of imprisonment could not be suspended in this case. As such, the total effective sentence was suspended for 12 months.

Bropho v Hall* [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Aggravated common assault' – 'Breach of protective bail condition' – 'Coercive control' – 'Exposing children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Aggravated common assault, breach of a protective bail condition.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant, a male Aboriginal man, was in a domestic and family relationship with the female victim. The appellant and the victim had been drinking alcohol with three friends. Their two children were also present. The appellant took exception to a comment made by the victim about his behaviour towards one of her female friends. He grabbed the victim by the T-shirt, causing scratches to the side of her neck. They continued shouting at each other. The appellant punched the victim in the face, causing bruising and swelling to her left eye. The victim moved away but was followed by the appellant and he delivered a further blow to the side of her head. The appellant stopped hitting the victim after their two children told him to stop. The appellant was arrested and entered into a bail undertaking with protective conditions. He breached those bail conditions by attending and remaining at the home of him and the victim. The appellant was sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment for the aggravated assault and 2 months' imprisonment for the breach of protective bail condition, served cumulatively.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that the sentences imposed for the aggravated assault and breach of protective bail conditions were manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The case represented a relatively serious example of the offence of common aggravated assault involving domestic violence, falling within the midrange of these types of cases (See [24]). It involved two circumstances of aggravation. First, the appellant was in a family or domestic relationship with the victim. Mitchell J provided:

'The fact that the aggravated assault occurred in a domestic setting is a significant aggravating factor of the offence. An offence of this nature generally involves an abuse of the trust which one partner places in another, often where the victim is in a vulnerable position by reason of greater physical strength of the offender. The vulnerability of the victim is generally increased by the difficulty which she (it is usually a she) may have in extricating herself from the situation. As McLure P has noted, the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator is a hallmark of domestic violence. Recognising that common feature, it remains important for a court sentencing an offender for that kind of offence to take account of the need to protect persons in that vulnerable position, so far as the courts can do so by the imposition of a sentence, bearing a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offence, which has a deterrent effect and, in an appropriate case, removes the offender to a place where there is no opportunity to violently attack their partner' (See [16]).

The second circumstance of aggravation was that children were present when the offence was committed. Mitchell J noted:

'The facts of this case illustrate a tragic cycle of violence with which the courts are depressingly familiar. A person exposed to domestic violence in his early life goes on as an adult to perpetrate the violence to which he was exposed as a child, damaging members of his community in the same way he was damaged as a child. For that reason, the fact that the appellant's offence was committed in the presence of children was a significant aggravating factor' (See [18]).

However, following an examination of cases, Mitchell J held that cases where a sentence of 15 months' imprisonment had been imposed involved a significantly greater level of violence than committed by the appellant here. The sentence was manifestly excessive (See [23], [35]-36]). The appellant was resentenced to an intensive supervision order.

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Economic abuse' – 'Emotional abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Expert testimony' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Murder' – 'Opinion evidence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Self-defence'

Charge/s: Murder.

Proceeding: Application to adduce certain expert evidence.

Facts: The accused and the deceased were both male. They lived together, but it was not a sexual relationship. The accused was the deceased's assistant and helped with the deceased's drug dealing activities. The accused admitted killing the deceased by shooting the deceased to the head while the deceased was sleeping. The main issue at trial was to be whether he acted in self-defence. The accused sought to call evidence of a psychologist regarding his state of mind. The psychologist was to give evidence, 'that the accused was in a compromised mental state at the time as a result of being in an abusive relationship with the deceased. The accused is said to have felt powerless in relation to (the deceased), and to have thought that the only way out of the relationship was to kill (the deceased)' (see at [2]). The State objected to the admission of this evidence on the basis that it was not a recognised psychological condition and that it was not analogous to cases falling within the 'battered woman syndrome' (BWS). The state further submitted that the matters to be the subject of the evidence from the psychologist were not outside the ordinary experience of jurors.

The accused described himself as a 'lackey', the deceased as 'possessive' and that the deceased would threaten violence and control his 'movements, communications and finances'. The psychologist's evidence was that the relationship was consistent with the learned helplessness associated with BWS. The psychologist also stated that the syndrome was not confined to females or sexual relationships, and that this relationship was of a sufficient duration to be consistent with the syndrome.

Issue/s: Whether the evidence of the psychologist should be admitted.

Decision and Reasoning: The application was refused. This did not preclude a claim to self-defence, but was relevant to the issue of whether the accused believed his actions were necessary. Hall J held that the psychologist's evidence was opinion evidence and admissible only if it met the requirements of expert evidence (see at [15]). His Honour noted that BWS is widely accepted as an area of specialised knowledge, but that it is important to pay close attention to what is actually recognised as BWS. He referred to Osland v The Queen (1998) 197 CLR 316 where Kirby J stated that the syndrome should extend beyond females as victims. Hall J held that this relationship differed from a typical 'battering' relationship – it was not a long term marriage relationship and was not characterised by 'recognisable cycles of tension, violence and reconciliation' (see at [25]). While there were similarities in the 'assertion of increasing control, emotional volatility and increasing feelings of helplessness' (see at [25]), his Honour held that the differences between these circumstances and other BWS cases required that, 'the application of the syndrome to a situation like this is accepted by the majority of experts in the field of psychology' (see at [26]). There was no evidence of majority acceptance of experts. As such, the evidence was inadmissible. Evidence of the violent and controlling behaviour of the deceased could still be considered by the jury in order to assess whether the accused's actions were necessary to prevent the deceased from harming him (see at [31]).

Taylor v The State of Western Australia* [2014] WASC 292 (19 August 2014) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Assault causing bodily harm' – 'Bail' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Appeal type: Bail application.

Facts: On 4 October 2013, the applicant was charged with assaulting his former de facto partner. He was released on bail. The bail undertaking included a condition that he was not to contact or attempt to contact the victim by any means. While on bail, the applicant committed a further assault on the victim causing her bodily harm. He was arrested and charged with that assault and with failing to comply with a protective bail condition. Bail could not be granted again unless the applicant showed there were exceptional reasons he should not be kept in custody. The applicant's criminal history showed that he had two prior convictions for breach of protective bail conditions in 2012 and 2013. The applicant was also alleged to have breached protective bail conditions on another occasion but this had not been the subject of prosecution.

Issue/s: Whether there were exceptional reasons why the applicant should not be kept in custody.

Decision and Reasoning: The application for bail was refused. There were not exceptional reasons why the applicant should not have been kept in custody. The applicant had breached protective bail conditions on multiple occasions in the past. While the victim had a conviction for assaulting the applicant, this did not justify the applicant's failure to comply with protective bail conditions (See [29]-[30]). Although the prosecution case against the applicant could not be said to be overwhelming, it could not be said to be particularly weak. 'A less than overwhelming case does not provide exceptional reasons to grant bail. If the prosecution case was particularly weak one or there was a high probability of acquittal the position might be different: Bertolami v The State of Western Australia [2009] WASC 269' (See [32]). Based on the offending conduct, the judge could not accept the applicant's argument that if he was convicted and imprisoned, the minimum term of any such sentence would be likely to be equal to or less than the time already spent in custody (See [33]). There was a risk that the applicant would commit further offences if released on bail, in particular by breaching any protective bail condition in regard to contacting the victim (See [34]).

Sturt v Ball* [2013] WASC 343 (9 September 2013) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of protection order' – 'Definition of 'approach'' – 'Protection order'

Charges: Breach of violence restraining order x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant was subject to a violence restraining order which provided that the appellant must not approach within 20 metres of the protected person ([4]). The evidence was that the protected person walked up to the appellant ([6]-[8]).

The magistrate convicted the appellant on the basis that even though the appellant did not 'approach' the protected person, it was incumbent upon the appellant to immediately walk away ([12]).

Issues: Whether the verdict was unreasonable and could not be supported.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld, and the conviction quashed. Beech J held that the charge should have been dismissed once the Magistrate was satisfied that the appellant did not approach the protected person ([16]). The word "approach" should be construed in its ordinary meaning: "to come nearer or near to (someone or something) in distance or time" ([14]). An obligation to walk away from a protected person cannot be implied into a violence restraining order ([17]).

Mills v Hawley* [2013] WASC 261 (3 July 2013) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Sentencing'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant had previously been in a relationship with the protected person and they had a 2-year-old child. He sent about 49 text messages and made 31 phone calls on a daily basis in breach of a violence restraining order (VRO). He claimed he was attempting to make arrangements to see his child. He had one prior conviction for breaching the same VRO. The prosecution accepted that the text messages were not threatening and the phone calls were not answered. However, the seriousness of the offence was increased because it occurred immediately after he had been dealt with by the Court for the previous breach. The appellant pleaded guilty to a charge of breaching a VRO. He was sentenced to 7 months' imprisonment, suspended for 12 months.

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate erred in imposing a sentence of imprisonment and failing to reduce the sentence to take account of the appellant's early plea of guilty.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

Under s 61A of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA)*, '*if a person has committed and been convicted of at least two offences within the period of two years before the conviction of the offence for which he or she is to be sentenced, the person is to be sentenced for a 'repeated breach'' (see at [12]). This did not apply to the appellant. As such, under s 6(4) of the Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) the Court cannot impose a sentence of imprisonment unless it concludes that it is justified by the seriousness of the offence or the protection of the community. This offence was serious (see at [4]). However, Allanson J concluded that a sentence of imprisonment was not the only appropriate penalty. His Honour noted (at [19]) various mitigating factors including the appellant's youth ([19]) and the fact that no violence nor threats of violence were involved in the offending. Therefore, it could not be said that the protection of the community or the protected person required a sentence of imprisonment. The Magistrate also did not refer to the plea of guilty as a mitigating factor. The sentence was set aside and sent back to the Magistrates' Court for re-sentencing and his Honour stated at [23] that a community based order may be appropriate.

Brown v Bluett* [2013] WASC 189 (14 May 2013) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Aggravated assault' – 'Breach of restraining order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Repeated breaches of a restraining order' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault causing bodily harm, breach of violence restraining order (x 3).

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: A violence restraining order was obtained by the female victim against the male, Aboriginal appellant. This included conditions prohibiting the appellant from communicating or attempting communication with the victim, from remaining on premises where the victim lived or worked and from remaining within 10 metres of the victim. The first breach of the restraining order occurred at a Native Title meeting where the appellant spoke to the victim. He also assaulted her by hitting her on the back of the head with a jaffle iron. The second breach occurred when the appellant went to the victim's home and persuaded her to take him to Meekatharra. Finally, the appellant breached the order by ringing the victim on 52 occasions and also by persuading the victim to drive him to Bondini Reserve. In sentencing, the magistrate noted that the appellant had pleaded guilty immediately and was entitled to a reduction of a maximum of 25% as provided for by s 9AA of the Sentencing Act. Her Honour took the maximum penalties as a starting point and reduced these by 25% in imposing sentences. This resulted in a head sentence of 27 months' imprisonment.

Issue/s: The magistrate erred in the application of the Sentencing Act in particular by construing it as requiring a (potentially) significant increase in the sentence that would otherwise have been imposed and a starting point being the maximum penalty open to the court.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The respondent conceded that the magistrate's interpretation of s 9AA was erroneous and that the appeal ought to be allowed. That concession was properly made. The magistrate's application of the Sentencing Act was erroneous and the error resulted in a sentence beyond the range of sentences customarily imposed for offences of this type. The appellant was resentenced.

In resentencing the appellant, Allanson J noted that a sentence of immediate imprisonment was the only penalty appropriate in light of repeated violations of a restraining order and one act of significant violence. His Honour provided:

'The law is limited in the manner in which it can respond to domestic violence. One important part of that response is by the issue of violence restraining orders. It is essential that those orders are not ignored. When they are repeatedly breached, the need for general and individual deterrence will ordinarily outweigh subjective and other mitigating considerations' (See [16]).

The offence of assault was a serious example of its kind as it involved a blow to the victim's head and was committed with an object capable of causing serious injury (See [17]-[18]). The breaches of the restraining order did not in themselves involve acts of violence but it was particularly serious that in each of the last two offences the appellant was breaching the order soon after appearing in court in relation to the first breach (See [19]). The appellant had made some attempt to turn his life around but the mitigating weight of this factor was limited by the nature of the offending and the need to emphasise the importance of complying with the restraining order (See [21]-[22]). Taking these factors into account and with the full benefit of the 25% reduction, Allanson J imposed a head sentence of 12 months' imprisonment.

Hamlett v Whitney* [2013] WASC 100 (22 March 2013) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault' – 'Bail' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Temporary protection order' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Breach of bail (x 2), breach of protective conditions.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was on bail for a charge of common assault in circumstances of aggravation namely, that the appellant was in a domestic relationship with the female complainant. The appellant's bail was subject to a number of conditions including that he was not to contact or attempt to contact the complainant, he was not to approach within 20 metres of an address at which the complainant was living, and he was not to behave in a provocative or offensive manner to residents at that house. The applicant was subsequently charged with breach of protective bail conditions when he verbally abused and threatened the complainant at Centrelink offices. He was further charged with a number of offences of stealing and aggravated burglary and failed to appear in Court after being released on bail. He was charged with two breach of bail offences.

The appellant pleaded guilty to the breach of protective bail conditions and the two other charges of breach of bail. In sentencing, the magistrate noted: 'Protective bail is placed on people for a purpose and that is to protect the victim, the person who is protected by the protective bail; and people who breach protective bail, like people who breach restraining orders, in a manner that you did, that is, actually threatening the protected persons, in my view ought be sentenced to a term of imprisonment […] These three offences, in my view, show a total disregard for court orders. There really is nothing that can be said by way of mitigation in relation to this offending. Ms Svanberg has pressed upon me that when you breached your protective bail you were intoxicated, but being intoxicated may explain why you breached your protective bail and why you breached your normal bail undertakings but it doesn't excuse your behaviour. The fact of the matter is you were on protective bail for a reason and you breached it' (See [17]). The appellant was sentenced to a total effective sentence of 6 months and 1 day.

Issue/s: The appellant did not suggest that the 4-month sentence for the breach of protective bail conditions was excessive. The sentences of imprisonment for the other two offences were manifestly excessive. Further, the total effective sentence was disproportionate to the total criminality and therefore offends the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was refused. In light of the maximum penalties available, the seriousness of the offences, and the personal circumstances of the appellant the sentence imposed was not manifestly excessive. The total effective sentence was also not disproportionate to the total offending (See [35]).

Rowe v Gaunt* [2013] WASC 90 (20 March 2013) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of restraining order' – 'Expiration of restraining order' – 'Miscarriage of justice'

Charge/s: Breach of restraining order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: An interim violence restraining order was granted which prohibited the appellant from approaching within 5m of any premises where the protected person lived or worked. This order was later made final. The appellant was charged with breaching the order by going to the house of the protected person and placing a letter in the letterbox. She pleaded guilty and was convicted. However, the police later became aware that the order had expired when the offence occurred.

Issue/s: Whether the conviction should be set aside.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld. The Court set aside the conviction because the conviction amounted to a miscarriage of justice. Hall J noted the following at [13] –

'I am compelled to note that this is the second occasion in recent times on which I have been called upon to set aside a conviction for breach of a violence restraining order where the alleged breach has occurred after the order has expired. See Topic v Lynch [2012] WASC 446. It is of course a necessary element of an offence under s 61 of the Act that there be a restraining order in force at the time the breach is alleged to have occurred. It is always possible that a protected person may complain to the police on the basis of a mistaken belief that a restraining order is still in force. Care must be taken to ensure that that is the case.'

'Breach of protection order' – 'Protection orders' – 'Self-represented litigant' – 'Whether police restraining order must be served on the protected person'

Charges: Aggravated assault x 1; Breaching a police order x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against convictions.

Facts: The appellant was in a relationship with a Mr Michalaros. While driving her car, the appellant punched Mr Michalaros in the face. There was evidence that Mr Michalaros was the subject of a restraining order in favour of the appellant.

The police attended and issued the appellant with a police order, with one of the conditions to not contact Mr Michalaros for a 24-hour period. Mr Michalaros alleged that she sent him threatening text messages in breach of the order.

The appellant was convicted following a trial and was fined a total of $1,300 and granted a spent conviction order.

Issues: Multiple grounds, including that the restraining order was invalid because the police did not serve Mr Michalaros with a copy.

Decision and reasoning: The appellant was a self-represented litigant. The judge rejected all grounds of appeal. In relation to the argument that the police order was invalid the judge stated:

> It would be contrary to the purposes of the ROA (Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA)) if the validity of an order depended upon service on the protected person. There could be circumstances where the police have grounds to issue a police order but where the protected person cannot be located or it is impractical to serve a copy upon him or her. Given the shortness of time for which such orders remain current and the urgent circumstances in which they must often be made, it would produce consequences that are contrary to the purposes of the ROA if an order only became effective when a copy was served on the protected person. This is a procedural requirement only and not one upon which the validity of an order depends.

'Aggravated assault' – 'Interests of child' – 'Perpetrator intervention program' – 'Sentencing' – 'Subsequent engagement in family violence programme'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant and complainant were in a relationship for almost three years. They had a daughter. The complainant and daughter were financially and emotionally dependent on the appellant. The appellant returned from work intoxicated. An argument developed. The appellant struck the complainant to the face with a closed fist. No injuries were caused by the blow. The matter was resolved by a plea of guilty, at the earliest reasonable opportunity. When his Honour, Chief Justice Martin, considered the seriousness of the offence he noted at [27]:

"The offence committed by the appellant in this case was serious. Domestic violence is an offence that rightly provokes community condemnation and rightly requires courts to respond to the community abhorrence of such offending by imposing sentences that are commensurate with the seriousness with which the community rightly regards this type of offence."

Despite those observations, his Honour considered that the 8 month term of imprisonment could be suspended for 12 months for a number of reasons. Firstly, it was in the best interests of the complainant and her child, cohabiting with the appellant, that he not be imprisoned: [33]. Secondly, the appellant had attended eight sessions of a family violence programme: [38]. His Honour stated that the offence was not in the upper range of seriousness: [15].

Kjellgren v Cameron* [2012] WASC 80 (1 March 2012) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Deterrence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in a relationship with the complainant for about four months. The appellant was intoxicated and following a dispute, he was arrested and ordered not to approach the caravan park where the complainant was residing. After being released, he knocked on the door of the complainant's caravan and verbally abused her, threatened her and punched her to the face multiple times. He then knocked her to the ground. He stopped her from escaping. She was left with serious injuries. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and was made eligible for parole.

Issue/s: Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

McKechnie J acknowledged the seriousness of the offence especially considering it amounted to a deliberate breach of a police order. This type of violence to women cannot be condoned and as such a sentence of immediate imprisonment was appropriate. However at [11]-[16], his Honour considered various comparable cases and came to the conclusion that the sentence was manifestly excessive. His Honour especially had regard to Messiha v Plaucs [2012] WASC 63 where it was held that an 18-month sentence for aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm (including other charges) was disproportionate to the overall criminality of the offending. Nevertheless, general and specific deterrence and the significant injuries that the complainant suffered remained important considerations. The appellant was re-sentenced to 15 months' imprisonment with parole eligibility.

Messiha v Plaucs* [2012] WASC 63 (24 February 2012) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault' – 'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Character' – 'Criminal history' – 'Exposing a child' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threat to injure' – 'Totality' – 'Victim'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault, threat to injure, three counts of aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm (circumstances of aggravation: that the appellant was in a family or domestic relationship with the victim).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant engaged in a verbal argument with his wife. The appellant punched and grabbed the side of her face. She attempted to escape, at which point he threatened to kill her, grabbed her around the neck and stabbed her with a screwdriver. She feared for her life. The appellant then bit her twice and told his son who was attempting to stop the assault to get away several times. The appellant had a serious drug problem and the offending occurred while he was under the influence of drugs. He had prior convictions for violent offences but they did not involve domestic violence. He was sentenced to an aggregate term of 18 months' imprisonment for all offences.

Issue/s: One of the issues concerned whether the total aggregate sentence infringed the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

The Court firstly noted that the offending was sustained, premediated and ferocious. It occurred in the family home in the presence of two young children.

The appellant submitted inter alia that the sentences should have been made concurrent because they constituted a single course of conduct. The Court rejected this argument and held that the so called 'one transaction rule' is a general rule and the operative question is whether the total effective sentence properly reflects the overall criminality involved. In this case, the course of conduct had distinct features which increased in seriousness over time so it was open to the Magistrate to impose some cumulative penalties.

The appellant also submitted that the Magistrate erred by giving the appellant's criminal record undue weight, given it did not involve domestic violence. This argument was rejected – the Magistrate correctly stated that the record showed a lack of mitigation in that the appellant did not have past good character. Hall J was of the view that there is little merit in distinguishing past violent offending as irrelevant if it is not committed in domestic circumstances. These offences do have relevance, not necessarily as showing a tendency but in showing 'an absence of mitigation as to past good character' (see at [31]).

Another issue concerned whether the Magistrate erred by not having sufficient regard to the appellant's longstanding relationship with his wife, the fact they have dependent children as well as his wife's wishes. His wife filed an affidavit on appeal indicating that the appellant's imprisonment was causing her extreme hardship. Her mortgage was in arrears. If the appellant was released, she claimed that there would be the prospect that the appellant would obtain employment so the arrears could be paid. The appellant and his wife were migrants and she had no wider family in Australia. The Court referred to McLure P's remarks in The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) and held that the wishes of victims of domestic violence for reconciliation has to be seen in context. Offenders cannot expect leniency because their punishment impacts others. While this issue could be relevant in some cases, it should not have been given much weight in this case.

The appellant also submitted that the fact he had successfully completed three community based orders should have been afforded more weight by the Magistrate. This argument was rejected – the Court held that the mitigatory effect of past completion of community orders can be diminished by reoffending. Reoffending can put into doubt whether the order was successful in bringing about attitudinal and behavioural change (see at [37]).

In relation to the presence of the children at the time of the offending, while it was not included as a formal circumstance of aggravation, it was open to take these facts into account (see at [41]).

The Court then noted that there was no history of domestic violence but the offending was serious and justified immediate imprisonment. In applying comparable cases, the Court concluded that the aggregate sentence was particularly high and did not bear a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offending. In noting that the appellant had apologised, expressed remorse, expressed a wish to assist his wife with the mortgage and children and that he had his wife's support, the total aggregate sentence was reduced to 15 months' imprisonment with eligibility for parole.

Musgrove v Millard* [2012] WASC 60 (22 February 2012) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Double jeopardy in sentencing' – 'Double punishment' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Sentencing' – 'Stalking' – 'Unlawful installation of a tracking device'

Charge/s: 113 offences including: Stalking, unlawful installation of a tracking device, breach of violence restraining order (104 counts), breaching a protective bail condition (7 counts).

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant was served with an interim restraining order prohibiting him from communicating with his former partner in any way. In breach of this order, he attended her address and/or workplace, sent her a number of text messages and unlawfully installed a tracking device on her vehicle. This conduct also comprised the stalking offence. Later, the applicant called his for partner 80 times. The Magistrate noted that there were a significant number of offences committed over an extended period which had a considerable impact on the victim. A total effective sentence of 16 months' imprisonment was imposed which comprised of 8 months' imprisonment for stalking, 4 months' imprisonment for unlawfully installing the tracking device (to be served cumulatively on the sentence for stalking) and 4 months' imprisonment for 15 convictions including breaching bail conditions and the restraining order. All the other convictions for breaching the restraining order were to be served concurrently for the stalking offence.

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate erred in making the sentence for unlawfully installing a tracking device cumulative upon the sentence imposed for stalking - the conduct which formed the basis of the stalking charge including the installation of the tracking device, such that a cumulative sentence resulted in the applicant being punished twice for the same conduct.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave was granted and the appeal was upheld.

The Court noted the 'complexities' involved in this issue and found it was not necessary to be resolved directly because of the application of the 'common elements principle' which states 'when two offences of which an offender stands convicted contain common elements… it would be wrong to punish that offender twice for the commission of the elements that are common' (see, for example Pearce v The Queen (1998) 194 CLR 610). This principle applied directly to this case. The facts indicated that the conduct which formed the basis of the tracking device charge was the same conduct, 'which was part of the conduct relied upon to support the stalking charge' (see at [40]). This falls directly within the common elements principle.

The Court found that there was a substantial miscarriage of justice caused by this error. The application of the common elements principle means that there could have been no additional punishment for the unlawful installation of the tracking device. As such, the 4-month sentence for the surveillance device offence was made concurrent, which resulted in the overall sentence being reduced to 12 months.

Stokes v Auckland* [2012] WASC 2 (10 January 2012) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Deterrence' – 'substance abuse'

– ‘People living in regional, rural and remote communities’ – ‘Physical violence and harm’ – ‘Sentencing’ – ‘Victim’

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant, (an Aboriginal man) engaged in an argument with his de facto partner. He punched her in the head multiple times until she fell over. He dragged her by the hair to a nearby tap to wash the blood off her. The appellant was very intoxicated at the time. He had a significant history of alcohol and drug abuse and violence including prior convictions for violent offences against the complainant. In fact, the offending was committed while he was subject to three suspended sentences relating to offences committed against the complainant. The complainant wished to continue her relationship with the appellant and at one stage indicated that she did not want to proceed with the charges. However, the appellant pleaded guilty at an early stage and was sentenced to 16 months’ imprisonment. He was also re-sentenced for the suspended sentences which resulted in a total effective sentence of 22 months’ imprisonment.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Whether the plea of guilty was made under duress and did not reflect his acceptance of the facts alleged by the prosecution.
2. Whether the sentence of 16 months for the latest assault was manifestly excessive and whether the total effective sentence was disproportionate to the overall criminality of the offending.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal against conviction and sentence was dismissed.

1. This argument was dismissed – see at [23]-[32].
2. Hall J accepted the Magistrate’s conclusion with respect to the seriousness of the appellant’s conduct. His Honour then noted that the attack was ‘prolonged’, instigated by the appellant and aggravated by the fact that it was committed notwithstanding previous court orders imposed for similar offending. This showed a disregard for the law and a need for a personal deterrent. Hall J noted that other than the early plea of guilty, there was little by way of mitigation. Furthermore, the fact that the appellant was intoxicated when the offence was committed was not mitigatory, as the appellant was ‘acutely aware that alcohol was a risk factor in respect of his past offending behaviour’ (see at [41]). In relation to the complainant’s wishes for reconciliation, his Honour noted McLure P’s remarks in The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) and held that, ‘An otherwise appropriate penalty should not be reduced on account of an expression of willingness on the part of the complainant, for whatever reason, to forgive the offender and continue a relationship with him' (see at [43]).

As such, the Court held that while the one-month sentence was at the higher end of the range for offences of this kind, it was within the Magistrate's discretion, having regard to the seriousness of the offence and the need for personal and general deterrence. In relation to totality, the Court held that the earlier offences were separate and unrelated to the latest assault. It was appropriate to activate these suspended sentences and orders of cumulation did not make the total effective sentence disproportionate to the overall criminality of the offending.

'Aggravated common assault' – 'Breach of protective bail conditions' – 'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Temporary protection order' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Aggravated commons assault, breaches of violence restraining orders, breaches of protective bail conditions.

Appeal type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The offences related to a female complainant, with whom the appellant had been in a domestic relationship with. The appellant committed 29 breaches of a violence restraining order which prohibited the appellant, amongst other things, from communicating with the complainant. He did so by communicating with her by mobile phone (the 'VRO offences'). He also committed four offences of breach of protective bail conditions by being 50-100 metres of the complainant on three occasions and by sending her a text message on one occasion (the 'bail offences'). Finally, the applicant committed one offence of common assault in circumstances of aggravation at the same time as one of the bail offences. The magistrate sentenced the appellant to a total effective term of 12 months' imprisonment, made up as follows: on aggravated assault 8 months' imprisonment, one of the bail offences 4 months' imprisonment (concurrent), 2 of the bail offences 4 months' imprisonment (cumulative), one of the bail offences 2 months' imprisonment (concurrent), and VRO offences 6 months' imprisonment concurrent.

Issue/s: One of the issues was whether the total sentence was contrary to the first limb of the totality principle.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. The total effective sentence in this case was disproportionate to the overall criminality of the offending behaviour. The aggravating circumstances in respect of the assault offence, i.e. the breaches of the VRO and protective bail conditions, called for concurrency between the sentence on that offence and all other sentences. There should have been partial concurrency or a reduction in the length of sentence to avoid multiple punishment for these acts (See [97]-[99]).

Isenhood v Green* [2011] WASC 70 (10 February 2011) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Deterrence' – 'Exposing a child' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Hearsay' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'Prejudicial material in victim impact statement' – 'Programs for perpetrators' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threats to injure' – 'Victim impact statement'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order, making threats to injure.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The complainant was the ex-partner of the appellant's current partner. There was one daughter of that relationship. The appellant's partner remained principally responsible for the welfare of the daughter. This meant that the appellant and the complainant often had contact with each other. Events at the complainant's home prompted the complainant to seek a violence restraining order (VRO) on behalf of his daughter against the appellant, to prevent the appellant from committing an act of abuse against his daughter and from 'behaving in a way that could reasonably be expected to cause fear that the child will be exposed to an act of family and domestic violence' (see at [4]). The complainant then later obtained another VRO which prevented the appellant from communicating in any way with him. The appellant then made repeated telephone calls to the complainant and threatened to kill him and his daughter, which constituted both the breach and threat to injure charges. He was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment on each of the charges, to be served concurrently.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred by taking into account hearsay and irrelevant material in the victim impact statement.

3. Whether the Magistrate erred by taking into account prior property damage offences in concluding that the appellant has the potential to act violently in the future.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of issues one and two.

1. Firstly, Jenkins J noted that the breach offence was not at the upper range because it did not involve any physical contact or actual violence. However, it was not trivial and included a threat of actual violence. Furthermore, there were no significant mitigating factors – the appellant had six prior convictions for breaching a VRO, was not remorseful and the previous penalties imposed had clearly not been effective as a personal deterrent. Notwithstanding, there were no attempts to carry through with the threats and no indication that the appellant intended to do so. Also, the appellant was no longer in a relationship with his partner and had ceased contact with the complainant's daughter.
2. The victim impact statement detailed the history of the dispute between the appellant and complainant from the complainant's point of view. The appellant described it as 'inflammatory' and Jenkins J agreed with that description. The appellant was not given an opportunity to respond to the matters in the statement. The respondent conceded that the Magistrate should not have taken these matters into account. The Magistrate needed to make clear that these matters were not taken into account.
3. Jenkins J held that it was 'drawing too long a bow' to suggest that the appellant's violent attack on an ATM machine was reason to believe that he may attack people in the future. However, this of itself was not cause to allow the appeal as no substantial miscarriage of justice occurred.

   The appellant was re-sentenced to a 12-month intensive supervision order which included programs to address anger management and alcohol abuse.

Morgan v Kazandzis* [2010] WASC 377 (10 December 2010) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Aggravated assault causing bodily harm' – 'Deterrence' – 'People living in regional, rural and remote communities' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Pregnancy' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suspended sentence' – 'Vulnerable groups' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault causing bodily harm (x 2).

Appeal type: Appeals against conviction and sentence.

Facts: One of the appeals concerned two occasions where the appellant, an aboriginal man, unlawfully assaulted the victim who he was in a family and domestic relationship with. They were living at the Oombulgurri Aboriginal Community, and the victim was pregnant to the appellant. On both occasions, the victim, bleeding, with multiple injuries to her face and head, sought assistance from the police at the police facility. The victim told the police she was afraid of the appellant and wanted to get away from Oombulgurri. The police arranged for an aeroplane to take the victim to another centre for a time. The appellant was sentenced to 8 months' imprisonment and 15 months' imprisonment on each charge respectively. In light of the nature and seriousness of the offences, the Magistrate determined an immediate sentence of imprisonment was required.

Issue/s: Some of the grounds of appeal included –

> The learned magistrate erred by failing to suspend the terms of imprisonment imposed, when:
> 1. the learned magistrate failed to give consideration to whether the terms ought to be suspended; and
> 2. a suspension of the sentence was open in all of the circumstances.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. These were serious offences committed by the appellant, who had two recent convictions of aggravated assault causing bodily harm. The violent conduct towards the victim was repeated less than five weeks later and the victim had a well-founded fear of the appellant. The victim was vulnerable as she was much younger than the appellant, had been in a relationship with him and was pregnant (see at [69], [72]).

'Violent treatment of women in this fashion cannot be tolerated anywhere in the State, but it is of particular importance that in isolated communities such as Oombulgurri that the punishment of an offender who commits such offences in a short space of time should be such as to demonstrate to all members of the community that that conduct is unlawful and that effective punishment will be imposed in order to deter the general community from the use of violence. Specific deterrence of the individual offender was, in this case, also a necessary and essential ingredient of the sentence' [72].

A longer term of imprisonment was warranted on the second offence because it was more serious in that it was a repetition of the same unlawful conduct, and it was an unrelated offence.

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Extenuating circumstances' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Sentencing' – 'Suspended sentence'

Charge/s: Breach of violence restraining order, breach of suspended imprisonment order.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant (aged 24) was the subject of a violence restraining order (VRO) in favour of the protected person (aged 52). They had been living together in an 'off and on' de facto relationship for about 18 months. The protected person had unsuccessfully applied to the Magistrates' Court to have the order withdrawn. The breach occurred when the appellant had been living with the protected person for three days. An argument occurred, the police were called and the appellant was arrested. There was a history of violence in the relationship and the order had been breached four times in the past. According to a psychiatric report, the appellant presented with a 'schizo-affective disorder, an ADHD history, personality disorders and mental retardation' (see at [11]). Despite the orders being in place, it was the protected person who repeatedly invited the appellant back to live with her which constituted the repeated breaches. The breach of the VRO also constituted a breach of a suspended imprisonment order which had been imposed in relation to a prior breach in respect of the same protected person. He was sentenced to 7 months' imprisonment for both offences, to be served concurrently.

Issue/s: Whether the Magistrate erred in imposing immediate sentences of imprisonment.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld.

At trial, the Magistrate concluded that the psychiatric evidence did not support a conclusion that the appellant's mental illness or disturbance led to the commission of the offences. She concluded that the 'non-aggressive resumptions of cohabitation' (by the appellant) were 'part of a course of conduct over which the appellant could and should have exercised restraint and control in obedience to the VRO' (see at [42]). Em Heenan J held that this amounted to an error of fact and that his breaches could 'to a material degree' be explained by his history of mental illness (see at [44]). The appellant's mental health problems, in combination with significant personal stress related to his relationship with the victim 'impaired his ability to exercise appropriate judgment and his ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct, so contributing causally to the commission of the offence' (see at [48]). This reduction in culpability could lead to a reduction in the severity of the sentence and this was not sufficiently taken into account by the Magistrate. The appellant was re-sentenced as follows – no punishment was imposed in relation to the earlier breach. A conditional period of suspended imprisonment for 7 months (wholly suspended for 9 months) was imposed for the later breach.

Lutey v Jacques* [2010] WASC 78 (28 April 2010) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Deterrence' – 'Emotional abuse' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'People living in regional, rural and remote communities' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Sentencing' – 'Threat of self-harm'

Charge/s: Breach of a violence restraining order (VRO).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant pleaded guilty to three counts of breaching a VRO. Only the second count was the subject of the appeal. The appellant's relationship with the complainant had recently ended. He was served with a VRO which prohibited him from contacting her by any means and from entering or being within 200m of any place where she lived or worked. The second breach of the order (the subject of the appeal) occurred when the appellant attended the Karratha Women's Refuge (where the complainant was staying) and wrote in the dust on the rear window of her car – 'I am a dead man walking'. He later returned to rub the message off. The appellant had no relevant criminal history. He was sentenced to 8 months' imprisonment, suspended for 2 years.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the Magistrate erred by failing to adequately consider sentences other than imprisonment.
2. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of issue 2.

1. The Court held that the Magistrate did sufficiently have regard to the possibility of other sentencing options, such as an intensive supervision order or a fine.
2. Simmonds J firstly noted that the maximum penalty for breaching a restraining order had been increased which indicates Parliament's intention is that the courts regard these offences more seriously. At [53]-[61], his Honour provided a summary of relevant authorities. He stated at [61] that these authorities (decided before the increase in penalty) take the following approach in sentencing breaches of VROs –

'The approach is one recognising that the Act is social legislation of the utmost importance as part of the legal response to domestic violence: Pillage v Coyne [2000] WASCA 135 [13] (Miller J); it is essential the courts ensure their orders are not ignored: Kenny v Lewis (Unreported, WASC, Library No 990113, 12 March 1999) (Kennedy J) 10; and violence restraining orders are notoriously difficult to enforce, and the need for general and individual deterrence will ordinarily outweigh subjective or other mitigating considerations: Dominik v Volpi [2004] WASCA 18 [80] (Roberts-Smith J).'

However, this does not mean that a custodial sentence will be appropriate in all cases. Simmonds J found that there are various circumstances which made this offence of a less serious kind. The appellant was surprised that the relationship had ended. There was no indication of any 'offence or serious misconduct' that led to the making of the VRO. Furthermore, the appellant made no attempt to enter the refuge and there was no threatening or intimidatory conduct. However, the complainant had recently been hospitalised for heart treatment. The respondent submitted that this as well as the fact that she was living in a refuge was relevant to assessing the seriousness of the offence. Simmonds J found that while these factors would make the offence more serious, evidence of the subjective impact on the complainant would be needed (see at [70]).

The respondent also submitted that the message left on the car might indicate a potential for the appellant to self-harm. His Honour then referred to the equivalent Victorian legislation which defines 'emotional abuse' (see at [71]) and accepted that a threat of self-harm intending to or producing the effect of causing distress or hurt to someone is a factor capable of aggravating the offence of breaching a VRO. However, in this case there was no evidence pointing to a threat of self-harm made with that intention or effect. Furthermore, the fact that the appellant's counsel referred to the protected person as the 'complainant' at trial did not of itself show that she suffered distress or hurt (see at [72]). In fact, the Court accepted that this potential for self-harm indicated the presence of a mental condition which contributed to the offending, notwithstanding the absence of a report from any mental health professional. This lessened the weight to be assigned to general and specific deterrence (see at [93] – [94]).

The respondent submitted that the offences occurred in the remote Pilbara region which had the second highest rates of violence against women in the state. There was data before the Court indicating that remote areas have about five times the rate of domestic violence compared to capitals. His Honour responded to this submission at [81] –

'I accept without deciding that I can take judicial notice of these matters, and that I should regard them as going to the prevalence of offences of domestic violence to which the Restraining Orders Act is part of the legal response. On the relevance of the prevalence of offending of a particular type, see Yates v The State of Western Australia [2008] WASCA 144 [55] (Steytler P), [94] (McLure JA). I also accept without deciding that sentences for the same offending committed in different parts of the state may be affected by differences in the prevalence of that offence in those parts of those magnitudes.'

This could result in the offence being viewed more seriously than otherwise. However, given that there was no element of physical threat or intimidation, the offence remained less serious (see at [82]). The Court held that the main mitigating factor was the appellant's plea of guilty. Given this and the mental condition as discussed above, the Court concluded that the sentence was manifestly excessive and stated that a community based order was likely to be appropriate.

Sakkers v Thornton* [2009] WASC 175 (22 June 2009) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated stalking' – 'Breach of restraining order' – 'Concurrency' – 'Deterrence' – 'Double jeopardy and other charges' – 'Double punishment' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Possession of firearm' – 'Suspended sentence' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Aggravated stalking (circumstance of aggravation – that the offence was committed in breach of a violence restraining order), breach of violence restraining order (12 counts), possession of firearm with circumstances of aggravation.

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in a relationship with the complainant for three years which ended. The appellant then continually sent emails and text messages to the complainant (including at her workplace) and made threats to kill her. The complainant obtained a violence restraining order (VRO) which prevented the appellant from communicating with her by any means. His conduct then continued in breach of the order. He was arrested and Police found a firearm and ammunition at his home. The appellant was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for the stalking charge, a global sentence of 12 months' imprisonment for the breach offences (cumulative on the sentence for stalking) and 7 months and 2 weeks' imprisonment for the possession of firearm offence.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned -

1. Concurrency: Whether the sentence imposed for the breach offences should have been made concurrent with the sentence for the stalking offence because both offences involved the same acts.
2. Totality: Whether the Magistrate failed to have proper regard to the totality principle.
3. Whether the sentences were manifestly excessive.
4. Whether the sentence should have been suspended.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of issue 1.

1. The prosecution conceded that the appeal on the issue of concurrency must succeed. Section 11(1) of the Sentencing Act 1995 provides that a person is not to be sentenced twice on the same evidence. Simmonds J stated at [22] – 'Here the offence of aggravated stalking was constituted by the course of conduct whose constituents were the 12 breaches of the violence restraining order. The sentences for the 12 breaches of violence restraining order, globally, are the same as the sentence for the aggravated stalking.' As such, the global sentence for the breach offences was set aside.
2. The appellant submitted that a total effective sentence (without the sentence for the breach offences) of 19 months and 2 weeks was a crushing sentence and was not a just measure of the criminality involved. Simmonds J acknowledged that the Magistrate failed to recognise an overlap in the criminality between the stalking and breach offences, in that he did not have regard to the issue of double punishment, as noted above. However, this did not result in the sentence infringing the totality principle.
3. An argument that the sentences for the aggravated stalking and firearms offences were manifestly excessive was dismissed. The appellant had some modest criminal history which did not involve violence. While he pleaded guilty, he showed minimal insight into his actions or empathy towards the victim. Simmonds J also noted the seriousness of the offending. In comparing analogous cases (see [70]-[72] for summaries) his Honour concluded that the sentence was within range.
4. The Magistrate did not suspend the sentence because he was concerned that a suspended sentence would act as a sufficient deterrent to the appellant and would not provide adequate protection for the victim, as well as other matters. This approach was appropriate and this ground was dismissed.

Paskov v Hull* [2008] WASC 163 (28 July 2008) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Deterrence' – 'Double jeopardy in sentencing' – 'People affected by substance abuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Proximity of offences' – 'Sentencing' – 'Totality'

Charge/s: Two counts of aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm (aggravating factor: that the applicant was in a domestic relationship with the victim), escaping from lawful custody, failure to comply with bail conditions.

Appeal Type: Application for leave to appeal against sentence.

Facts: The applicant had an argument with the complainant (his de facto partner). The applicant then pushed the back of her head into a window which caused the window to smash and the complainant to fall on the ground. He then dragged her out of a door and kicked and punched her multiple times which caused her head to hit a railing, at which point she passed out. The applicant then evaded arrested for some days. After being granted bail, he phoned the complainant in breach of protective bail conditions. The second assault occurred 6 months later. The applicant became aggressive and dropped the complainant onto the ground and kicked her repeatedly in the rib area. He also used a ring on his left hand to gouge her left eye, resulting in a bruised and swollen eye and a cut to the eyeball. He had long standing problems with drug and alcohol abuse. His criminal history included a violent offence in a previous de facto relationship. He was sentenced to an effective term of 2 years and 2 months' imprisonment. The sentences for the escaping custody and second aggravated assault offences were made cumulative.

Issue/s:

1. Whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.
2. Whether the Magistrate erred in making the sentences for the second count of aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm and escaping custody cumulative because the offences occurred on the same day.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave to appeal was refused.

1. Hasluck J noted that the offences were particularly serious. The Magistrate gave appropriate consideration to this as well as to personal and general deterrence. This was, 'apt in respect of a severe attack on a defenceless woman who was in a relationship with the applicant, especially when the attacks were sustained and persistent' (see at [52]). As such, the sentences could not be described as manifestly excessive.

2. The Court held that there was a separation in time between the offences and they were of a different kind. Hasluck J referred to the 'common elements principle' and acknowledged that it would be wrong two punish an offender twice where 'there is essentially one transaction or commonality is evident' but that this did not arise on the facts (see at [51]).

Elliot v Blanchard* [2007] WASC 289 (14 November 2007) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Deterrence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Verbal abuse'

Charge/s: Aggravated assault occasioning bodily harm (circumstance of aggravation: that the appellant was in a family and domestic relationship with the victim).

Appeal Type: Appeal against sentence.

Facts: The appellant was in an intimate personal relationship with the complainant after meeting on the internet. The appellant was intoxicated. An argument occurred and the appellant verbally abused the complainant. He then pushed her into a chair, threatened to kill her and grabbed her around the throat almost to the point of making her lose consciousness. He repeatedly slapped her face and choked her for several minutes. He threw her into a bed before dragging her by the arms into another room. The appellant then calmed down and stated that the complainant was free to leave but informed her that he was in possession of two firearms. The complainant made him dinner to pacify him and eventually managed to escape. The appellant later left a message on her phone in which he apologised for hitting her. She sustained various injuries including bruising and swelling. The appellant pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment with parole eligibility.

Issue/s: One of the issues concerned whether the sentence was manifestly excessive.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was upheld in respect of other issues such as the weight given to the plea of guilty and the time already spent in custody and the sentence was reduced by 1.5 months. In relation to the issue of manifest excess, the appellant emphasised the effect of alcohol and prescribed medication which he was taking as well as his prior good character, remorse and progress in rehabilitation. However, McKechnie J held that the Magistrate was not in error. While this was the appellant's first violent offence, he had a number of previous offences of driving while intoxicated and on the day of the offending he had been fined $8000 for other offences which he had committed while intoxicated. The Magistrate did sufficiently take the appellant's remorse into account. His Honour also noted that there is no offence of domestic violence. It is a term which 'euphemistically describes serious criminal conduct' (see at [10]). In this case, the offending was particularly serious. The sentence was appropriate, taking into account the public interest in general deterrence and just punishment.

Gilmour v State of Western Australia [2005] WASC 243 (8 November 2005) – Western Australia Supreme Court

'Aggravated stalking' – 'Attempt to pervert the course of justice' – 'Bail' – 'Breach of violence restraining order' – 'Damaging property' – 'Following, harassing, monitoring' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Systems abuse' – 'Temporary protection order'

Charge/s: Aggravated stalking, breach of violence restraining order, attempt to pervert the course of justice.

Appeal type: Appeal against refusal of bail.

Facts: The decision concerned a bail application arising from three charged offences following the estrangement of the applicant from his second wife. The first alleged offence was the theft of mail from the complainant by the applicant. The second alleged offence was the commencement of a series of events said to amount to stalking. Some of these events included the applicant damaging the property of the complainant's male friend, and the male friend obtaining a violence restraining order which the applicant subsequently breached. The applicant also became involved in an altercation with the complainant and she obtained a violence restraining order against him. The applicant stole items of women's clothing from the complainant's home, stole a security camera the complainant had installed, and was seen in the complainant's backyard disguised with a mask and carrying a knife. The third offence occurred when the applicant asked his neighbours to provide him with a false alibi for the evening he was seen in the complainant's yard wearing a mask and carrying a knife.

Issue/s: Whether there were exceptional reasons why the applicant should not be kept in custody.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The applicant had not made out exceptional reasons for the grant of bail in this case. The character of factors pointing towards the grant of bail, namely, hardship to the applicant, the applicant's antecedents, and the likely time before trial, were not sufficient to establish exceptional reasons. This was particularly so when weighed against the strength of the State's case, the adverse effects on protected persons of a release on bail, the concern for the failure of achievement of the purposes of protection orders in this case, and any difficulties in proving any future breach of a protective order (See [69]). Family Court

Ahmed and Gupta [2020] FCWA 140 (31 August 2020) – Family Court of Western Australia

'Coercive control' – 'Financial abuse' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Imprisonment' – 'Interim orders' – 'Isolation' – 'Monitoring' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Technology facilitated abuse' – 'Threats to extended family' – 'Use of threats by extended family'

Proceedings: Parenting orders.

Issue: What is the appropriate parenting arrangement for the children of Mr Ahmed and Ms Gupta?

Facts: Ahmed and Gupta are the mother and father of Child A and Child B, two girls aged four and three years respectively. Both parents are from Country A where they had an arranged marriage in 2013. After the birth of Child A, the mother and Child A moved to Perth to join the father in 2016. Less than a year later the parties separated. Child B was born after separation. The mother alleges a history of sexual and physical violence and controlling and coercive behaviour by the father. The mother alleged the father locked her in the house and only allowed her to leave once a week in company with him. Both parties alleged that the other's extended families had engaged in threatening behaviours and legal proceedings towards each other's extended families in country A and there was dispute as to whether these proceedings were ongoing. The father strongly denies the mother's allegations. Against the background of these contested allegations and other family and cultural issues, the Court is asked to determine the parenting arrangements for the children. Currently the children live with the mother and spend a few hours each fortnight with the father.

Decision and Reasoning: The Court considered the mother's allegations that she was subjected to controlling and isolating behaviour by the father. The mother alleged there was a hidden camera in the home and that the father or Mr B always listened to her conversations. The mother alleged Mr B was violent towards her and at times she was alone in the house with him.

The Court, while unable to make findings on each finding of family violence, was satisfied that the mother has been the victim of family violence as defined in s 4AB(1) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). It was accepted that the father controlled and coerced the mother, that he controlled her financially and isolated her from others, and that the father's behaviour towards the mother caused her to be fearful of him.

It was ordered on the basis of this coercive relationship that the mother have sole parental responsibility for the long-term care, welfare and development of the children, the children reside with the mother and the father have contact, and there were also orders for a review of the orders in twelve months.

Shelley and Dickens* [2020] FCWA 52 (3 April 2020) – Family Court of Western Australia

'Child abuse' – 'Coercive control' – 'Family law' – 'History of domestic and family violence' – 'Victim as (alleged) perpetrator'

Proceedings: Parenting orders.

Facts: Ms Shelley (mother) and Mr Dickens (father) had a short relationship which ended when G (their child) was 18 days old. Since that point, G has lived with the mother and spent limited time with the father. The mother and father each seek an order that G live with them.

The mother's case is that the father has physically, sexually and emotionally harmed G and he poses an unacceptable risk of harm. She says the father has perpetrated significant and sustained family violence towards her during their relationship. The father's case is that the mother has emotionally and psychologically harmed G, by fabricating and repeatedly raising false allegations against him, by failing to comply with orders to facilitate G's relationship with him and through her failure to adequately provide for G's needs in terms of her education and health. He alleges he was the victim of family violence perpetrated by the mother.

The parties agree that their relationship involved family violence, but largely deny the allegations of the other.

Decision and reasoning: It was accepted that the child, G, is at risk of psychological harm — as well as exposure to physical violence — both with the mother and the father.

Orders were made to the effect that:

- All previous parenting orders in relation to [G] born [in] 2011 be discharged.
- The mother and father are to communicate by way of email in relation to [G], with all emails to be copied onto the ICL.
- [G] live with the mother.
- G spend time with her father as specified in the orders (at [306]).

The Court was satisfied that the father was the perpetrator of physical violence, which included the mother suffering significant injuries including two broken teeth and two broken wrists. During the parties' arguments, particularly on the yacht, there were occasions when the fights escalated and the father physically restrained the mother, to protect himself and prevent her from assaulting him. In doing so, the mother suffered injuries and property belonging to her was damaged. The father's reactions to the mother were physically abusive and aggressive.

The father was also found to have behaved in a controlling and coercive manner, which falls within the definition of family violence. For example, he prevented the mother talking to her family by removing the telephone from her on the yacht; he demanded the mother answer his calls when in hospital after G's birth and suggested the maternal grandmother required his permission to provide assistance with meals after G was born.

The Court was also satisfied that the mother has perpetrated acts of family violence against the father. For instance, she has yelled, sworn and called him names. She has hit him and kicked him. She has instigated arguments and attempted to prevent him from leaving. It was accepted that the father suffered injuries including bruises and a bloodied lip, and had property damaged by the mother.

Orders were made to the effect that:

- All previous parenting orders in relation to [G] born [in] 2011 be discharged.
- The mother and father are to communicate by way of email in relation to [G], with all emails to be copied onto the ICL.
- [G] live with the mother.
- G spend time with her father as specified in the orders (at [306]).

Breckenridge & Kudrna* [2019] FCWA 9 (10 January 2019) – Family Court of Western Australia

'Parenting orders' – 'People with disability and impairment' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Psychological harm' – 'Rebutting the presumption'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: The mother and father had two children and sought parenting orders. The mother maintained that she and the children now suffered significant mental health issues because of the father's alleged physical and psychological abuse. The father denied these allegations and instead claimed that the mother's own serious mental health issues have harmed, and continue to harm, the children. Each parent sought orders according sole responsibility of the children and allowing the other parent to have limited supervised visits.

The mother's mental health issues created evidential gaps and several contradictions in the evidence she provided. Sutherland J was satisfied that the mother and the children's psychologist had effectively coached the children to corroborate her story given their impressionable age.

Issues: What parenting orders are appropriate in the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: Sutherland J's reasoning was guided by Part 5 of the Family Court Act 1997 ('the Act')and the Full Court's decision in Goode & Goode [2006] FamCA 1346 and consequently concerned the underlying presumption that 'it is in the best interest of the child that the child's parents have equal shared parental responsibility, subject to the qualifications set out in the relevant section'. Sutherland J provided in relation to this presumption:

> 'should I make an order for equal shared parental responsibility then I must also consider the obligations placed upon me by s 89AA of the Act which requires me to then consider whether the child should spend equal time or substantial and significant time with each parent.
> In determining the outcome of these parenting matters, I must, pursuant to s 66A of the Act, consider the best interests of the children as the paramount consideration. In determining what is in a child's best interests, I must consider the matters set out in s 66C of the Act.' [197]-[198]

Sutherland J ordered that the father was to have sole parental responsibility for the children, for Child A to receive continued therapeutic support from Child A's psychologist, and for the mother to eventually be allowed supervised visits. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply for the following reasons: (1) Sutherland J was not satisfied that the mother experienced any family violence and/or abuse from the father; and (2) the children suffered significant, ongoing psychological harm while in the mother's sole care and were at risk of further harm if they remain in her sole care.

'Children' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Rebutting the presumption' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: The parties had one child and sought parenting orders. The mother sought sole parental responsibility and that the child live with her. She also proposed that the child should not spend any time with the father. The father sought orders that the parties have equal shared parental responsibility; that the child live with the mother while gradually increasing the time she spent with the father; injunctions as to the parties' alcohol consumption; and non-denigration orders. The father was a self-represented litigant while the mother and ICL were represented by counsel.

The parties had a history of family violence and the father had used explicit photos of the mother to blackmail her throughout their relationship. The child was exposed to some of this violence during the relationship and to the father's denigration of and threats towards the mother after the parties' separation.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting orders given the circumstances?

Reasons: The child had a meaningful relationship with the mother and a close and loving relationship with the father. However, the child was at risk of physical and/or psychological harm while in the father's care. Duncanson J also found that this, along with the child possibly 'absorbing' the father's negative and unhealthy beliefs and confrontational behaviour, formed an unacceptable risk that could not be managed by mere supervision. With the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility being displaced by the family violence between the parties, Duncanson J ordered the mother have sole parental responsibility and that the child live with the mother. It was also ordered that the child spend no time with the father as he posed an unacceptable risk of harm.

'Children' – 'Parental orders' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence' – 'Relocation orders'

Proceeding: Parenting and relocation orders.

Facts: The mother and father had one child and sought parenting orders and the mother sought relocation orders. Each party sought sole parental responsibility for the child while the ICL proposed the parties have equal shared parental responsibility for him. The mother and ICL proposed that the mother be able to relocate the child to Europe.

The father had mental health issues and was violent towards the mother. This violence caused the mother to develop severe trauma and a desire to return to her home country to receive the support of her family. The mother described her future in Australia as ‘bleak’ and was of the view her employment prospects would be better back in Europe.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting and relocation orders given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: While the child was exposed to family violence during the parties’ relationship and when they were separated, the father addressed the issues causing his abusive behaviour. As such, Duncanson J found that the child did not need to be protected from harm in the care of either parent at the time of proceedings. This, coupled with the findings that the child had a meaningful and loving relationship with both of his parents which was in the child’s best interests to maintain, led Duncanson J to order that the child must spend time with the father despite relocating overseas. As the mother had been the child’s primary caregiver up until proceedings, Duncanson J ordered that the mother have sole parental responsibility; the child live with her; and that the mother can relocate the child to Europe. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply because of the history of family violence.

‘Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people’ – ‘Children’ – ‘Damaging property’ – ‘Family violence’ – ‘Parenting orders’ – ‘People affected by substance misuse’ – ‘People living in regional, rural and remote communities’ – ‘Relocation orders’ – ‘Technology-facilitated abuse’ – ‘Undefended proceedings’

Proceeding: Parenting and relocation orders.

Facts: The mother and father have one child. The mother was granted leave to proceed on an undefended basis. The mother sought sole parental responsibility for the child and that he live with her. The mother also sought permission to relocate the child to another town; injunctions relating to non-denigration of herself and her sister; and injunctions restraining the father from consuming alcohol while with the child.

At the time of the proceedings, the child lived with the mother and spent time with the father. The child was exposed to family violence – primarily directed towards the mother – and to problems of excessive alcohol consumption while living in the same town as his father. The father was controlling and abusive. He had slashed the tyres of the mother’s car and threatened to place intimate pictures of her on social media. The mother wished to remove the child from this environment and wanted to relocate due to fear for her own safety.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting and relocation orders given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: Although 'it is to [the child's] benefit to have a meaningful relationship with the father, this must be balanced against the need to protect [the child] from harm' [28]. Given the history of family violence and the family violence of the father towards his new partner, there was a need to protect the child from harm while in the father's care. There is no need to protect the child from harm while in the mother's care.

The history of family violence rebutted the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility being in the best interests of the child. Duncanson J ordered that the mother have sole parental responsibility for the child; that the child live with the mother and that she is permitted to relocate him to another town as the mother had been the primary caregiver up until proceedings; and that the child spend time with the father at such times and on such terms and conditions that the mother thought fit.

'Children' – 'Family violence' – 'People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds' – 'Relocation orders'

Proceeding: Parenting and relocation orders.

Facts: The parties had one child and sought parenting orders and orders regarding the child's living arrangements. The mother wished to leave the town where they had lived as a family lived and return to her home town. The father, having come from another country, wished to remain in the town as that was were his only connections in Australia were. The father sought orders for sole parental responsibility and proposed that the child live with him four nights a week and with the mother the remaining three provided that the mother can meet all the child's needs. The mother sought orders for equal shared parental responsibility and orders permitting her to relocate to her hometown. She also proposed that the child predominately live with her.

There was evidence of domestic violence. The parties were also unable to agree on a form of communication at the time of the proceedings.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting and relocation orders for the circumstances?

Reasons: The presumption in favour of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply due to the issues of family violence. Thackray CJ, however, still ordered equal shared parental responsibility - with the exception that the mother have sole parental responsibility for issues concerning the child's physical health – as the child had a meaningful relationship with both parties and was found not to be at risk of harm in either parties' care. Thackray CJ also ordered that for the next few years the child live with both parents on a '5-2-2-5' roster before eventually transitioning to a week-about arrangement.

In regard to the sought relocation orders, Thackray CJ found that it was in the child's best interests to remain in the parties' current town. Thackray CJ considered the dysfunction within the mother's family in her hometown, the child's current stability, and the possibility of separating the child from the father to be the main factors supporting this decision.

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children to family violence' – 'Parenting orders' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Rebutting the presumption' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: The mother and father have four children and sought parenting orders. The mother proposed that the children continue to live with her and have no communication or contact with the father. The father sought orders that the children spend time with him. The mother's proposal was based on the parties' history of family violence and fear of the children's well-being. The ICL proposed 'that the children live with the mother who should have sole parental responsibility for them, although the mother should keep the father informed of all significant health issues' [36]. The ICL also proposed that the two older children spend time with and communicate with the father as they wished while the younger child spend time with him in accordance with their wishes in consultation with a therapist.

The parties' relationship was characterised by family violence inflicted upon the mother and the children from the time of their marriage. The mother deposed that the violence directed towards her was both physical and emotional, with the father also often forcing her to have sex against her will. The father was physically abusive towards the children, who were eventually terrified of him. This fear caused psychological harm to the children.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting orders given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: The children had a meaningful relationship with the mother and it was to their benefit that it continued. The children did not have a relationship with the father at the time of proceedings and did not wish to. While there was no need to protect the children from harm in the mother's care, there was a need to protect them from physical and psychological harm in the father's care.

The family violence rebutted the presumption that it is in the children's best interests that their parents have equal shared parental responsibility. Duncanson J ordered that the mother have sole parental responsibility and that the children live with her, but that she inform the father of all significant health issues affecting the children. He found that the mother has the capacity to provide for the children's needs including their emotional and intellectual needs. Duncanson J also ordered that the father eventually be able to contact the children provided he undertook psychological assessment and subject to the children's wishes.

'Issues of welfare of children and stability' – 'Living arrangements' – 'Parenting orders' – 'Physical violence'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: Prior to proceedings, the child lived with her paternal grandmother. The child had very limited, if any, contact with the parents. The paternal grandmother sought sole responsibility of the child and for the child to live with her. The orders sought also permit overseas travel, orders for the provision of information and a non-denigration order, and for the child to occasionally spend time with the parents. Prior to the proceedings and the parents' separation, the father physically assaulted the mother on several occasions, exposing the child to family violence when she lived with them.

Issues: What parenting orders are appropriate given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: The proceedings were determined under Part VII of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ("the Act"). The objects in Part VII 'ensure that the best interest of the children are met' [37]. Given the circumstances, Duncanson J paid specific attention to s 60CC(2) which sets out the primary considerations of the 'benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both the child's parents and the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm' [42]. Attention was also given to s 60CC(2A) which 'provides that in applying the above considerations, the Court is to give greater weight to the need to protect the child from harm' [40].

In reaching his decision, Duncanson J considered that: (1) the child had neither communicated nor seen either parent for a considerable period of time; and (2) while 'there was not a need to protect the child from harm in the care of the paternal grandmother', there was 'a need to protect [the child] in the care of the father, by reason of drug and alcohol use, and his violent and aggressive behaviour towards others' [42]. There was also a need to protect the child from the mother's unstable circumstances. Duncanson J consequently affirmed the orders sought by the paternal grandparent as it was in the best interests of the child.

'Children' – 'Economic abuse' – 'Parenting orders' – 'People with disabilities and impairments' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Rebutting the presumption'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: The mother sought sole parental responsibility for the children; an injunction restraining the father from approaching either her or the children within 50 metres; and an injunction restraining the father from communication with the mother and children by any means. The father sought equal shared parental responsibility; an order that the children live with the mother; and that the children spend time with the father.

The parties' relationship was 'characterised by significant family violence perpetrated by the father against the mother' [2], with the father also negatively influencing the mother's financial position post-separation. The father's behaviour was partially attributed to the effects of a traumatic head injury which caused loss of inhibitory control, irritability, frustration and verbal aggression.

Issues: What parenting orders are appropriate given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply given the parties' history of family violence. It was open to the judge to make an order for equal shared parental responsibility if, and only if satisfied that despite the presumption not applying it remained in the best interests of the children that such an order should be made [187]. This led Moncrieff J to turn to the primary and additional considerations set out in s 60CC(3) (Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)). 'The very real difference between the two classes of considerations is that the additional considerations do not all necessarily apply to each and every case whilst the primary considerations do' [189]. From these considerations, Moncrieff J concluded that 'the father is incapable of controlling his behaviour and as such the children remain at risk of psychological harm, if not physical harm, and of being exposed to physical abuse of the mother by the father' [201] and ordered that there should be no contact between the children and their father. It was ordered that the children consequently live with the mother; the mother have sole parental responsibility; and the father be restrained and an injunction be granted restraining the father from approaching the mother or children within 50 metres.

'Family violence' – 'Parenting orders' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Relocation orders'

Proceeding: Parenting and relocation orders.

Facts: The mother and father had one child and sought parenting and, in the mother's case, relocation orders. The mother sought sole parenting responsibility and for the child to live with her, proposing for the father to be allowed limited visits. The mother also sought an order permitting her to relocate the child to another country. The father proposed equal shared parenting responsibility and for visitation while the child lived with the mother. Both parties sought orders regarding the cost and conditions of travel.

> 'During the [parents'] relationship the father was overbearing and aggressive and violent. The mother coped by drinking alcohol and was often intoxicated. The parties' relationship was marred by incidents of violence mostly perpetrated by the father upon the mother. Both parties abused drugs and alcohol. [The child] was exposed to family violence between his parents.' [130]

Issues: What would be the appropriate parenting, spend-time and relocation orders given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: When dealing with the issue of parental responsibility, Duncanson J found that the child had a meaningful relationship with both of his parents. It was to his benefit that it continues. However, the history of family violence between the parties rebutted the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility, with Duncanson J finding that it would be in the child's best interests for the mother to have sole parental responsibility. Duncanson J subsequently ordered that the child live with the mother.

Turning to the issue of relocation, Duncanson J considered that while the child did have a meaningful relationship with his father, he had a much deeper relationship with and dependency on his mother. Although it may be initially distressing for the child to be separated from the father if permitted to relocate to another country, the separation would minimise the risk of exposing the child to harm and be in his best interests. The father will still be able to spend time with the child several times a year and will be able to communicate with him electronically.

'Children' – 'Parenting orders' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Property settlement' – 'Rebutting the presumption' – 'Self-represented litigant'

Proceeding: Parenting and financial orders.

Facts: The parties had two children and sought parenting and financial orders. The father sought orders for equal shared parental responsibility; the children live with both parents on a week about basis; regular telephone communication with the children; and injunctions restraining the parties from denigrating each other. The father also proposed that each party retain their own property and superannuation and for payments from the mother. The mother sought orders 'apportioning' parental liability 80%:20% in her favour. She also proposed that the children predominately live with her and sought orders to alter her property interests such that she received half of the father's superannuation, child support payments and cash payment for the parties' shared car.

The mother was a self-represented litigant. O'Brien J was satisfied she understood his explanation of the trial's processes and his obligations.

There were two separate violent incidents between the parties' post-separation, however there was no evidence to suggest a history of family violence while the parties were married.

Issues: What parenting and financial orders are appropriate for the circumstances?

Reasons: O'Brien J first dealt with the parenting orders sought by the parties and provided that the presumption that equal shared parental responsibility is in the best interests of the child is rebutted if there are reasonable grounds to believe that the child was exposed to family violence.

> 'The phrase "reasonable grounds to believe" is not unimportant. The legislation does not require that abuse or family violence be proven for the statutory presumption to be displaced; it is sufficient for there to be reasonable grounds to believe that a party has engaged in abuse or family violence. [59]

O'Brien J found that the presumption did not apply because the two children were exposed to family violence during the second of the two separate violent incidents that occurred post-separation. Despite this, O'Brien J also found that the children were not at any risk of physical or psychological harm in the care of either party. Upon also finding that both parties have the capacity to provide for all of the children's needs, O'Brien J ordered equal shared parental responsibility and that the children spend equal time with each parent.

In turning to the competing financial orders sought by the parties, O'Brien J stated that > 'the court has a wide discretion conferred by s 79(1) of the Act. That discretion is to be exercised in accordance with legal principle, and without assuming that the parties' interests in assets, or responsibilities for liabilities, are or should be different from those determined by common law and equity. The court must be satisfied that it is just and equitable to make an order adjusting existing property interests, including equitable interests. That requirement is readily satisfied in most cases, including this one…In determining what orders will be just and equitable, the court's power is not confined by any 'steps' or 'stages', let alone a prescribed sequence of such.' [135]

The parties were found to have a total net pool of -$3,932.00, with most of the liabilities being the joint responsibility of the parties. It was also found that 'neither party retain[ed] reliable assets of any real value'. O'Brien J consequently ordered that 'the only just and equitable outcome achievable' was that each party retained their assets and, considering the mother being currently unemployed, that the father retain responsibility for the liabilities.

O'Brien J then considered the child support orders sought be the mother. O'Brien J declined to provide the orders sought as the mother did not provide sufficient evidence to justify them.

'Family violence' – 'Parenting orders' – 'Presumption of equal parental responsibility' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: The father and mother had two children and sought parenting orders. The father sought orders for equal shared parental responsibility and for the children to live with their mother while also spending time with him. The mother sought orders for sole parental responsibility, the children to live with her, for the children to not spend time with the father and for the issuing of passports to the children without the father's consent. The Independent Children's lawyer (ICL) submitted that the orders which best meet the children's interests were as set out by the mother.

The children's parents separated when the children were very young. 'The relationship between the parties has been described as one of significant conflict and domestic upheaval. Their separation was surrounded by allegations of violence, abuse and aggressive and erratic behaviour, levelled against the husband in particular' [6]. 'In the period following separation, the husband's life descended into turmoil and conflict. There is evidence of significant hostility, anger and threatening behaviour directed by the husband towards a wide range of people and institutions' [9].

The children were in the mother's care after the parties separated and had limited opportunity to form a relationship with their father.

Issues: Should the parties have equal shared parental responsibility for the children?

Decision and reasoning:

Walters J provided that

> '[t]he Court's paramount consideration is the welfare or best interests of two very young girls. The history of this case and the legitimate concerns and aspirations of the parents are matters which must be taken into account – but it is the children's future, welfare and best interests upon which the Court must concentrate. The Court is responsible for determining what orders best meet their needs and advance their interests – including the need to be protected from the risk of harm… The Court has no interest in or enthusiasm for rewarding one party or punishing the other. Its preoccupation is with, and concentration is on, the best interests of the children…Generally speaking, what parties do, how they behave and the attitudes that they display towards their roles as parents or carers are far more relevant to the decision process in a parenting case, and of much greater significance, than the vague and often highly complex emotion known as love.' [59]-[105]

Here, the father demonstrated 'an "entrenched pattern of abusive behaviour over a significant period of time"…The husband seems to have been oblivious to or unconcerned about the real or potential harm he caused or could have caused others' [109]. Any spend time orders or orders allowing the children to communicate with the father were determined likely to cause the mother 'significant psychological detriment – and in turn, psychological harm to the children' [120]. This, coupled with the fact that the mother was deemed to have the capacity to sufficiently provide for the physical, emotional and intellectual needs of the children led Walters J to decide that '[i]t [was] not in the children's best interests to spend any time with the husband' despite his belief that 'it is a grave and far-reaching step for a Court to deprive children of a relationship with a parent – or, put another way, to deprive a father of a relationship with his children' [191]-[192]. Stemming from this belief, Walters J noted that

> '[p]arenting orders are not ordinarily regarded as "final" and immutable. If circumstances change significantly, and in a manner that relates to the best interests of the children, then there is a possibility that the orders I propose to make can be revisited – and, if required in the children's best interests, varied' [195].

'Children' – 'Parenting orders' – 'People with disability or impairment' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared responsibility' – 'Rebutting the presumption'

Proceeding: Parenting orders and property settlement orders.

Facts: The mother and the father had two children and sought parenting and property orders. For the parenting orders, the mother sought sole parental responsibility, for the children to live with her, and proposed that the father be allowed to spend time with the children. The father sought equal shared parental responsibility and for the children to live with both parties on a fortnightly cycle.

For the property orders, the mother sought an order that the father transfer his interest in the former matrimonial home to her and she would refinance the mortgage to Bankwest into her sole name. She also sought to have a car transferred to her, proposing a 7:3 division in her favour. The father proposed to transfer the above home to the mother and refinance the mortgage into her sole name contemporaneously with the transfer. The father also sought for the mother to pay him $250,000 from the transfer. Both parties sought to retain all other assets and superannuation. The property pool was estimated to be around $900,000.

Both children have been diagnosed with medical conditions. The parties did not communicate well and the mother did not keep the father informed of important issues regarding the children's health. The mother frequently denied the father's requests to see the children and had a Violence Restraining Order against the father.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting orders given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning:

Parenting Orders

The presumption that it is in the child's best interests for the parents to have equal shared parental responsibility for the child 'does not apply in circumstances where there is abuse or family violence. The presumption may be rebutted by evidence which satisfies the Court that it would not be in the best interests of the child for the child's parents to have equal shared parental responsibility.' Notwithstanding this presumption, [Duncanson J was] of the view that it is in the children's best interests that their parents have shared parental responsibility for most, but not all long-term issues. In all but medical issues, I think both parties should jointly make the decisions.' This decision was based on Duncanson J's findings that the children had a meaningful relationship with both of their parents and it was to their benefit that it continued. The children were not at risk of harm in the care of either parent - although they had previously been exposed to conflict between the parties - and both parties have the capacity to provide for the children's needs.

Duncanson J ordered an increase in the time the children spent with the father, but predominantly live with the mother during school terms. Keeping in mind the children's disabilities and anxiety, this increase was to be implemented incrementally.

Property Orders

The proceedings were governed by s 79 of the Act and the decision in Stanford v Stanford (2012) 247 CLR 108. Having regard to the mother's care of the children, the father's superior earning capacity and the father's property entitlement comprising significant superannuation benefits, Duncanson J divided the property in favour of the mother, ordering a 6:4 division.

'Children' – 'Parenting orders' – 'People with mental illness * psychological harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Property settlement' – 'Rebutting the presumption' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Proceeding: Parenting and financial orders.

Facts: The mother and father had two children and sought parenting and financial orders. The proceedings primarily concerned whether the children should have any contact with their father. The mother sought sole parental responsibility and orders that the children live with her. The father sought equal shared parental responsibility and shared care of the children.

The father often deceived and manipulated the mother, children and people around him during the parties' relationship, feigning several severe and terminal illnesses. Through this deception, he spent large sums of the parties' money for personal use (such as travel and accommodation) under the guise of paying for medical treatment. The father also frequently threatened the mother and occasionally their children, leading the mother to apply for a Violence Order.

Issues: What parenting and financial orders are appropriate given the circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply because of the father's psychological abuse of the children. Walters J found that that the father's psychological abuse of the children displaced the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility. He also found that the father's behaviour amounted to an unacceptable risk to the children's psychological and emotional wellbeing. As such, Walters J ordered that the mother have sole parental responsibility and that the children not have any contact with the father.

The parties had a net property pool of $970,381. Upon considering the father's spending while deceiving the mother along with his limited contributions towards household expenses and the children while the parties were together, Walters J ordered that the mother receive 84% of the net property and superannuation.

'Children' – 'Coercive control' – 'Family violence' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Property damage' – 'Rebutting the presumption'

Proceeding: Parenting orders.

Facts: The mother and father have two children and sought parenting orders. The father proposes that the older child decides where he lives with a week-about arrangement for the younger children (save for the holidays when they would spend up to two weeks with each parent). The mother sought sole parental responsibility; for the children to live with her; and for the children to only spend time with the father subject to her consent. The ICL proposed that the mother have sole parental responsibility.

The father sought to undermine the children's relationship with the mother and after the parties' separation threatened the mother on several occasions. The father's negative attitude towards the mother influenced the oldest child's opinion of and behaviour around her, with the child eventually mimicking some of the father's negative behaviours. While the oldest child did leave the mother's home to live with the father for two years, he eventually returned and had a hostile relationship with the father until the time of proceedings.

Issues: What are the appropriate parenting orders in these circumstances?

Decision and reasoning: Thackray CJ ordered the mother have sole parental responsibility for the three children; the children live with the mother; and that the children only spend such time with the father as the mother deemed appropriate.

Thackray CJ 'did not doubt' that there were great benefits to the children having a meaningful relationship with their mother. 'She [was] focused on their well-being and has been their primary caregiver. She [was] a stable and steadying influence' [109]. On the other hand, the father's conduct towards the mother and children was damaging. '[T]he benefit to the children of having a meaningful relationship with their father [was] outweighed by the importance of protecting them from the harm that often arises when they spend time with him' [110]. Thackray CJ provided that the presence of family violence rebutted the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and that it was inappropriate for the parents to share responsibility given their inability to communicate.

Thackray CJ found (at [15]) that the father was: an 'aggressive, controlling and manipulative man' with a propensity to bend the truth, skilled at turning accusations against him back onto the accuser, that he demonstrated no insight into the way that he made the lives of the mother and her adult sons (and to a slightly lesser extent his own children) a complete misery and that he was quite oblivious to the harm his violent, abusive and controlling behaviour has caused.

Thakray CJ held (at [111]) that the father has engaged in coercive, controlling and abusive behaviour towards the mother and children and that he has damaged every vehicle the mother has ever owned (sometimes when children have been in the vehicle and sometimes when they have been observing). His Honour accepted that "the mother remained in the relationship for as long as she did because of the father's manipulative behaviour and because she considered this was the best way to keep her and the children safe. The father's manipulation has included his efforts to drive a wedge between the mother and her friends and between the mother and the children." [113]

'Interim parenting orders' – 'Parenting orders and impact on children' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Proceedings: Interim parenting orders.

Facts: The mother and father had two children. Both parties had criminal histories, mental health issues and problems with drugs and alcohol. The mother previously obtained an interim violence restraining order and a family violence offence had been reported to the police against the father but both matters were dropped. Before the hearing, the parenting arrangements were that the children live with the mother and spend supervised time with the father once a week. The father sought orders for unsupervised time with the children. At the end of the hearing, the Court made immediate orders for unsupervised time between the father and the children.

Issue/s: What ought to be the extent of ongoing time between the children and the father?

Reasoning/Decision: The strict and comprehensive guidelines for determining an interim parenting application were set out in Goode & Goode (2006) FLC 93-286 (see [27]). Magistrate Kaeser cited the Full Court of the Family Court's decision in Banks & Banks [2015] FamCAFC 36, which provided guidance on the application of these principles. The Court in Banks stated at [48]-[50]:

'It should also be said that in parenting proceedings, as in all civil litigation, it will be the issues that are joined that will dictate which s60CC factors are relevant. By their nature, interim parenting proceedings should be confined to those issues which, in the best interests of the child, require determination prior to a proper determination at a trial [emphasis in original]. The fact such disputes are commonly dealt with in overcrowded Court lists makes it even more desirable to identify with precision those issues which can, or should, be resolved on an interim basis.

When it is obvious that the findings made as to some of the s60CC factors will be determinative of the child's best interests on an interim basis, it is a sterile and unnecessary exercise to address other factors. Moreover, it would be a sterile exercise to determine whether or not particular facts are disputed if they are relevant only to one of the nondeterminative s60CC considerations. Properly understood, we do not interpret what was said in Goode as meaning that in an interim case, each and every fact must be characterised as disputed or not; and that each s60CC factor must be traversed where it is obvious on the facts and issues joined that there are only one or two decisive factors'.

Magistrate Kaeser affirmed the orders that the father ought to have unsupervised contact with the children.

The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply given that there was reasonable grounds to believe there had been family violence in the relationship. In these circumstances, the issue of equal time or substantial and significant time did not need to be determined. It was reasonable for the children to spend one overnight occasion with their father every fortnight (see [33]-[44]).

'Court management' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children' – 'Fair hearing and safety' – 'No contact orders' – 'Parenting orders' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Questioning witnesses' – 'Self-represented litigants' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Unacceptable risk'

Proceedings: Parenting orders.

Facts: The father was verbally, physically and emotionally abusive towards the mother throughout their relationship. He assaulted her, forced her to have sex against her will, posted comments on Facebook referring to kill her and threatened to kill her. After their first child was born, a safety plan was put in place by the Department of Child Protection (DCP) specifying that the father have no unsupervised contact with the child. Their second child was born. The mother left the home with the children. She obtained a violence restraining order and a filed a Notice of Abuse with the DCP.

Issue/s: What parenting orders were appropriate in the circumstances?

Reasoning/Decision: This case raised significant issues relating to case management in circumstances where the father was a self-represented litigant. The father's behaviour at trial soon was unmanageable, despite several requests from the court that he refrain from using foul language and despite warnings regarding his conduct. The mother was cross-examined by the father and kept her composure in extremely difficult circumstances (see [43]-[44]). Likewise, counsel for the mother questioned the father in a calm and measured way, despite his behaviour.

Following threats made in the courtroom by the father, the Court took the unusual step of asking counsel for the mother and the Independent Children's Lawyer to his chambers. He informed them that the trial could not safely proceed with the father present in court. Upon the resumption of the trial the Court made an order that the father attend trial from an alternative venue by way of video link (see [47]-[48]). The father's behaviour did not improve throughout the rest of the hearing. The Court warned the father on several occasions that if he continued to use foul language the Court would switch on the mute button. After several disruptions, the Court activated the mute button (see [51]-[67]).

Duncanson J stated here at [68] that: 'The trial was conducted in the most difficult circumstances by reason of the father's conduct, threats and appalling language. Both the ICL and counsel for the mother conducted themselves properly throughout and are to be commended for their perseverance and tolerance. An order sought by the mother was that the children spend no time with the father. In these circumstances it was important that the relevant evidence be provided to the court and properly tested by cross-examination to ensure that the Court is able to determine all issues and make orders which are in the best interests of the children. It was also important that the Court not allow the father to distract it from those issues'.

In making parenting orders, Duncanson J held that the presumption of shared equal parental responsibility did not apply here because of family violence committed by the father. The mother was given sole parental responsibility for the children. It was also in the best interests of the children that they live solely in the care of their mother as the children would be placed at an unacceptable risk of harm in the care of their father.

Finally, the Court held that the father have no contact with the children. This was appropriate in circumstances where 'the children's relationship with the father is not a meaningful one and as such will not be of benefit to them in the future. The children are at risk of both physical and psychological harm in the care of the father. His unrelenting denigration, criticism and vitriol towards the mother could undermine the children's relationship with her and impact upon her parenting of the children in the future' (see [184]-[197]).

Eddon and Eddon* [2012] FCWA 104 (6 November 2012) – Family Court of Western Australia

'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Parenting orders and impact on children' – 'Relocation orders'

Proceedings: Relocation and parenting orders.

Facts: The mother was born in England and the father was born in Australia. They had one child together. The mother sought orders to have sole parental responsibility for the child and permission to relocate the child to the UK. Her case revolved around the claim that the father's sustained emotional abuse towards her transformed her from a strong, independent woman into a nervous wreck who needed the support of her family in the UK (see evidence [31]-[80]). The father sought equal shared parental responsibility and that the child live with the mother in Australia.

Issue/s: What parenting and relocation orders were appropriate in the circumstances?

Reasoning/Decision: First, in relation to the issue of allocating parental responsibility, Thackray CJ noted that the presumption in favour of shared parental responsibility did not apply because of the father's violence. In the circumstances, it was appropriate for the mother to have sole parental responsibility for the child. His Honour was satisfied that the mother would seek to involve the father in any important decisions about the child and that she would make the right choices for the child (see [157]-[160]).

Second, Thackray CJ turned to the issue of the planned relocation. His Honour noted that this case involved choosing the least bad alternative, as neither of the proposed outcomes was in any way satisfactory. If the mother relocated, the child would effectively be denied a meaningful relationship with his father, at least for some years until the father could afford to see him more regularly. If the mother was not permitted to relocate, there was a serious risk that she would fall into a state of depression, leading to the likelihood of a damaged attachment with her child. This would be extremely damaging to the child in the long term. In His Honour's view, this factor was of far greater importance than the 'significant, but not sever grief', the child would face if not permitted to see his father regularly. The mother was therefore permitted to relocate to the UK to obtain support from her family to recover from the abuse she suffered.

His Honour concluded at [166]-[167]:

Although not a factor I need to take into account, there is potential for the outcome of cases such as the present to have a salutary impact on the behaviour of other parents. Unless the best interests of the child demand otherwise, it cannot reasonably be expected that one party to a relationship can behave in an abominable fashion, cause severe emotional harm to the other party, and then insist that they continue to live nearby so that they can continue to have a close relationship with their child. The strong emphasis given by our law to the importance of protection from violence would be undermined if any different message were conveyed.

Notwithstanding his past conduct, it is impossible not to feel some sympathy for the father who I consider not only has gained some appreciation of the consequences of his behaviour, but wants to do the best he can for his son. His behaviour has been much improved, and he should be commended for that. But, unfortunately, as was put to him in cross-examination, it is a case of "too little, too late". The damage has been done. All the father can do now, which I am satisfied he wants to do, is to make amends. It is not too late for him to be a good father, but he will have to achieve that by allowing the mother time to recover, which I am persuaded she can only do if she is permitted to go home'.

P and J* [2010] FCWA 53 (9 March 2010) – Family Court of Western Australia

'Parenting orders' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility'

Proceedings: Parenting orders.

Facts: The mother and the father had two children together, Jack and Helen. The father breached a violence restraining order on four occasions and had been convicted of assaulting the mother. The father sought orders for shared parental responsibility for major long term issues concerning the children. The mother proposed that she have sole parental responsibility for issues concerning the children's health, education and Jack's speech and language therapy requirements, but otherwise agreed that there ought to be shared parental responsibility.

Issue/s: One of the issues was should the parties have equal shared parental responsibility for the children?

Reasoning/Decision: In relation to the issue of shared parental responsibility, Thackray CJ was satisfied that the father had engaged in family violence and therefore the presumption of equal shared responsibility did not apply. His Honour noted that just because the presumption did not apply, did not mean that it could not be in the best interests of the children for the parents to have equal shared parental responsibility. However, in the circumstances, equal shared parental responsibility was not an option. The parents had shown no capacity to come to any agreements in relation to significant matters concerning the children and any order requiring them to consult would fail.

His Honour concluded that the mother have sole parental responsibility for all major long term issues concerning the children. This was appropriate in circumstances where she was also to have primary care responsibility for the children and further, she was more in tune with the children's needs and was better equipped than the father to make decisions for the children's long term welfare (see [75]-[81]).

W and W* [2006] FCWA 103 (6 October 2006) – Family Court of Western Australia

'Parenting orders' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility' – 'Rebutting the presumption'

Proceedings: Parenting proceedings.

Facts: The mother and the father had two children together and sought parenting orders. The mother proposed that she be given sole responsibility for decisions concerning the children's welfare while the father sought orders for shared parental responsibility.

Issue/s: One of the issues was whether the parties should have equal shared parental responsibility for the children?

Reasoning/Decision: The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility did not apply here because the father assaulted the mother. However, Thackray J went on to state at [23]-[24]:

'The fact the presumption does not apply is by no means the end of the matter. Judges in this Court have long taken the view that it is generally appropriate for both parents to have an equal say in major decisions about their children. This is particularly true of cases where the parents have a shared-care arrangement. The fact there has been family violence is clearly an important factor in determining whether it is appropriate for the parents to share parental responsibility; however, the nature of the violence needs to be assessed to determine whether it should have any impact.

It is my assessment that the nature of the violence here was not such, in itself, as to have any real impact on the allocation of parental responsibility. However, I consider there are other reasons why it would not be in the best interests of the children for their parents to be left with shared parental responsibility'.

His Honour held that the mother ought to be given sole parental responsibility in circumstances where the parties had an extremely poor relationship, they did not communicate with each other than by email (which the father used to abuse, annoy and denigrate the wife) and the father was extremely controlling, argumentative and pedantic (see [25]).

District Court

Re AB [2023] WADC 28 (17 March 2023) – Western Australia District Court

'Child abuse' – 'Compensation' – 'Corroboration' – 'Criminal injuries compensation' – 'Criminal injuries compensation act 2003 (wa)' – 'Finding of child abuse' – 'Sexual abuse'

Proceeding: Appeal pursuant to s55 and s56(1) of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Act 2003 (WA) from a decision of the chief assessor refusing an application for compensation for harm suffered as a result of incidents of sexual abuse allegedly committed against the appellant by her former partner W.

Issue: Whether compensation should be ordered for injuries arising from sexual assaults (x2) and other abuse.

Facts: The appellant made an application for compensation for injuries arising from alleged emotional/verbal and physical/sexual abuse between 1999 and 2015 and two separate alleged sexual assaults in 2015 allegedly committed by her former de facto partner, W. At first instance, the chief assessor refused compensation.

The appellant had been in a de facto spousal relationship with the alleged offender between 1999 and 2015. After leaving him she made a formal complaint to police of two occasions of non-consensual anal penetration, which she later advised police she did not wish to proceed with. The appellant later asked police to reopen their investigation into her earlier complaint alleged that her ex-partner had also been physically and verbally abusive during their relationship and had threatened self-harm and suicide when she tried to leave him. Police decided not to charge the alleged offender with any offence as there was not evidence to corroborate her account, despite corroboration not being required to prove an offence of sexual assault.

The chief assessor found the sexual abuse of the appellant was not non-consensual. There was evidence of contact with medical and mental health practitioners including reports of non-consensual anal sex and a 17 year history of sexual assault by her de facto partner. J, a child who the appellant cared for pursuant to Family Court orders, was successful in a criminal injuries compensation claim as both a secondary victim of W's abuse of the appellant and primary victim of other abuse by W, and reasons subsequently published by the assessor of J's claim reversed the finding that W's abuse of the appellant constituted an offence and found that although the incidents of anal penetration of the appellant by W while she was crying and W had his hands around her neck were not non-consensual the appellant and AB and W committed an offence by exposing J to the incidents.

Reasoning and decision: Appeal allowed, awarding the appellant $120,000 for non-pecuniary loss and $1,846 for reimbursement of expenses.

Staude DCJ was satisfied that the two offences of aggravated sexual penetration without consent had been committed and were not isolated offences. The appellant's statements were consistent with her reports to police and other agencies, and the judge accepted that she had been stuck in an abusive relationship and too embarrassed to report the incidents in more detail. He was not able to be satisfied that the other offences had occurred.

Staude DCJ found that the appellant had suffered injury as a consequence of the offences and assessed the injury in context of the harmful relationship. It was determined that the sexual assaults had materially contributed to the appellant's diagnosed depression, anxiety and functional impairments and had led to her loss of self-esteem and confidence. However, some of the injury was not considered compensable as it was attributed to other abuse in the relationship and would therefore have been suffered regardless of the offences.

The judge was highly critical of the assessor of J's claim's findings that the appellant had committed an offence under s 101 of the Children and Community Services Act 2004 by exposing her son to abuse.

DB v RB* [2020] WADC 93 (29 June 2020) – Western Australia District Court

'Damaging property' – 'Evidence' – 'Exposing children to domestic and family violence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Protection orders' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Proceedings: Appeal from magistrate's decision to make final Family Violence Restraining Order (Final Order) pursuant to Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) ('the RO Act').

Facts: The magistrate was satisfied on the balance of probabilities that DB had committed acts of family violence against his wife (RB): a sexual assault, letting down RB's car tyres (controlling behaviour), and two physical assaults. The magistrate was also satisfied that RB had reasonable grounds to apprehend he would commit acts of family violence against her. In relation to their daughter, TB, the magistrate found that DB had committed acts of family violence against her, exposed her to family violence, and she had reasonable grounds to apprehend further family violence/exposure to family violence. The magistrate made the Final Order protecting RB and her eldest daughter (TB) for a term of two years.

Grounds of appeal:

1. The magistrate did not accord DB procedural fairness in refusing to grant leave to call overseas witnesses.
2. The magistrate erred in relying on his finding that TB was a credible witness to be satisfied on the balance of probabilities that incidents of family violence had occurred.
3. Text messages sent by RB to her sister that she had been raped, shortly after the incident occurred, were inadmissible as they were sent to an unknown number.
4. The magistrate disregarded one instance where DB was not the aggressor.
5. The decision the magistrate made was excessive.

Decision and reasoning: Appeal dismissed.

Ground 1: Evidence of the two proposed overseas witnesses was irrelevant as they had only observed the relationship in the past. Evidence was also inadmissible as it was only intended to bolster the credibility of DB.

Ground 2: The magistrate's finding as to TB's credibility (a child witness) was open to make based on his assessment of the way she gave evidence, and in light of all of the evidence.

Ground 3: While the probative value of/weight given to the text messages may have been an issue for the magistrate to consider, the magistrate did not err admitting them into evidence. They were relevant to the matters to which he was required to have regard. The court also noted that s 44A(i) of the RO Act provides that the court is not bound by the evidence in a final order hearing and the court may inform itself on any matter in such a manner as it considers appropriate.

Ground 4: The magistrate did not rely on this incident as one of the acts of family violence he was satisfied DB committed. In any event, the fact that DB may not have been the instigator of the events described did not detract from the fact that DB acknowledged he acted violently towards his wife in the course of that incident.

Ground 5: The magistrate correctly applied the test set out in s 10D(1) of the RO Act that a final order must be made where the magistrate is satisfied of the matters set out in s 10D(1)(a) or s 10D(1)(b), unless special circumstances exist.

Potschick v Bruce [2018] WADC 107 (31 August 2018) – Western Australia District Court

'Protection orders' – 'Summary of considerations'

Charges: The Magistrate was satisfied that the respondent committed two acts of abuse against the appellant.

Appeal type: Appeal from a decision of the Magistrate refusing to make a final violence restraining order.

Facts: The appellant appealed a decision of the Magistrate to refuse to make a final violence restraining order against the respondent. The appeal was conducted by way of a rehearing of the application.

Issues: Whether the Magistrate erred in fact in finding that the respondent was not likely, in the future, to commit an act of abuse against the appellant.

Decision and reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. Before the Court's power to grant a Final Violence Restraining Order (VRO) is enlivened, it must be satisfied that the respondent committed an act of abuse against the appellant and that he is likely to commit such an act again. The Court noted that the Magistrate was not satisfied to the requisite standard that the respondent was likely to commit an act of abuse against the appellant again, or that the granting of either a Family Violence Restraining Order FVRO of an Misconduct Restraining Order (MRO) was justified. As the Court was not prepared to disturb the Magistrate's finding as to the respondent's likely future conduct, there was no statutory basis on which the Court could order an MRO (there being no family relationship between the appellant and respondent). Having regard to the issue of the respondent's likely future conduct in relation to the appropriateness of granting a Final VRO or a MRO, there was no utility in undertaking a consideration of a hypothetical question of whether the Magistrate erred in exercising his discretion to refuse an order in the event that the finding was overturned and the jurisdiction to make an order enlivened ([36]).

Purpose and limitations

In its review of the legal response to domestic and family violence in Australia, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, published in 2010, the Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission recommended that a National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book ("this bench book") should be developed. Recommendation 31.2 states:

> The Australian, state and territory governments should collaborate with relevant stakeholders to develop and maintain a national bench book on family violence, including sexual assault, having regard to the Commissions' recommendations in this Report in relation to the content that should be included in such a book.

Consequently this bench book has complemented efforts under The National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010 – 2022 by assisting the education and training of judicial officers so as to promote best practice and improve consistency in judicial decision-making and court experiences for victims in cases involving domestic and family violence across Australia and complements efforts under The National Plan to End Violence against Women and Children 2022-2032 [National Plan 2022] to improve justice responses to all forms of gender-based violence.

There is no single 'family violence law' in Australia, and a range of legal responses may be applicable in cases where domestic and family violence is involved. Some of these legal responses are federal (such as Family Law) and some are state or territory-based (such as domestic violence protection orders and criminal law). However, this bench book does not reproduce or interpret the substance of these laws and legal responses, or explain how they vary.

The purpose of this bench book is to provide a central resource for judicial officers considering legal issues relevant to domestic and family violence related cases that will contribute to harmonising the treatment of these cases across jurisdictions along broad principles and may assist them with decision-making and judgment writing. This bench book does not seek to represent the opinions or preferences of judicial officers, or to direct judicial officers as to the manner in which they should respond to domestic and family violence related cases. Rather, it provides background information and knowledge supported by research, links to a range of legal and related resources, and practical guidelines for courtroom management that judicial officers may consult when considering the breadth of issues and appropriate course of action in any individual case. In deciding whether, or how, a particular issue may be dealt with, the judicial officer must necessarily balance the interests of all participants in a case.

As well as serving as a resource in the judicial decision-making process, this bench book is a publicly available resource that is intended to benefit other legal professionals and service providers who are working with victims and perpetrators of domestic and family violence.

The social science and related literature referenced in the ‘key literature’ and ‘other resources’ sections of this bench book are provided to promote a greater understanding of the dynamics and behaviours associated with domestic and family violence identified in a significant body of academic research conducted in Australia and internationally over recent decades. Each case is different and this research is not intended to be definitive or prescriptive [Hayes 2014] in any given case. Furthermore, its admissibility in judicial proceedings is regulated by the rules of evidence applicable in the jurisdiction in which the particular proceedings are being heard.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading the content in this bench book distressing or traumatising.

This bench book is up to date at June 2023.

Purpose and limitations - Key Literature

Hayes, Alan, 'Social Science and Family Law – From fallacies and fads to the facts of the matter' [2014] (94) Family Matters 70.

This paper canvasses broad issues arising from the use of 'social science evidence' in family law proceedings. Hayes firstly discusses the changing nature of knowledge, such that 'some ideas that would have been regarded as "facts" in their day now appear ridiculous to us' (p 70). He cites several examples – see pp 70-72. Moreover, 'Scientific argument becomes the stuff of popular social knowledge that is all too readily detached from the detail and the critical debates within the scientific community. In this process, scientific evidence can be distorted in its meaning and significance' (p 72). Hayes then applies these arguments in relation to academic discourse on child development (see pp 72-74).

In discussing the nature of scientific research in this context, Hayes notes, 'Limits of social science evidence "presented as briefs in family law matters" must be acknowledged' (p 77). 'These limits ought to be framed in terms of the selection criteria for the studies reviewed and synthesised, the theoretical frame and methods, the manner in which effect sizes are assessed, as well as the extent of acceptance by the scientific community. As such, the norms of science should be applied not only to the research, itself, but to the way it is used!' (p 77). At p 77, Hayes provides a list of common errors in the use of social science evidence -

- 'applying evidence from group data to individual instances;
- holding on to outdated, static models of development that ignore the complex dynamics at play over the life course;
- grasping, selectively, a single study or a small number of studies while overlooking the caveats and concerns that apply to them;
- misunderstanding the differences between the concepts of statistical significance, effect sizes and the variance explained by the measures in a study;
- inflating the weight to be put on a single attribute, variable or outcome when multiple and changing influences impinge on individuals, at the biological, behavioural and social levels of explanation;
- overstating the capacity to predict likely developmental outcomes and pathways, given the many influences that impinge on lives, by design and accident; and
- ignoring the complex factors that lead to individual differences, including differential genetic susceptibility.’

Terminology

Cautionary note: some people may find reading the content in chapter 3 distressing or traumatising.

Long-standing debates exist over the most appropriate terminology to use when identifying violence and abuse between spouses, partners, and family members [National Plan 2022]. Terminology is fragmented across the policing, legal and service sectors in Australian and overseas jurisdictions, and is complicated by the range and diversity of cultural, socio-economic, sexual, geographical and familial structures that are intended to be captured by any one label. Moreover, key terms (and definitions) in Australian State, Territory and Commonwealth domestic-violence related legislation lack consistency.

Descriptors such as ‘domestic violence’, ‘domestic abuse’, ‘domestic and family violence’, ‘family violence’, ‘domestic harm’, ‘domestic abuse’, ‘domestic control’, ‘violence against women’, ‘gender-based violence’ and ‘intimate partner violence’ have frequently been and are often interchangeably adopted in reports and by academics and commentators writing in this area [Groves & Thomas 2013]. To varying degrees, each of these terms has limitations.

For example, proponents of the term ‘violence against women’ argue that the descriptors ‘domestic violence’ and ‘family violence’ mask the reality that violence in this context is gendered and, in an overwhelming majority of cases, is perpetrated by men against women [Behrens 1996]. This descriptor has, however, been criticised on the basis that it excludes the reality that some violence, albeit at significantly lower rates, is perpetrated by women against men [MacDonald 1998].It is recognised that the terminology is evolving [National Plan 2022].

While acknowledging there is no widespread consensus regarding its use, the descriptor adopted in this bench book is ‘domestic and family violence’. There are, however, a number of important points to note.

The word ‘domestic’ may suggest that the violence is limited to conduct occurring only in the home [MacDonald 1998] between people living together in a relationship. The risk is that conduct occurring outside the physical confines of the home or between estranged individuals or other parties – including, parent to child or adolescent, sibling to sibling, or adolescent to parent – may be overlooked.

The inclusion of the word ‘family’ in the descriptor endeavours to address this potential limitation and aligns more closely with statutory definitions. Proponents also note that the reference to ‘family’ more accurately reflects the context and dynamic of violent behaviours occurring in certain groups within the community. For example, in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016], it recognises the absence of demarcation between private and public spheres; and encompasses the range of behaviours that may occur within intimate, immediate and extended family and other communal or extended kinship relationships of mutual obligation and support [AHRC 2022]. Further, in culturally and linguistically diverse communities [JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016], where migrant and refugee women are more likely to move in with their husband’s family after marriage, victims may experience violence and abuse perpetrated by not only their partners, but their ‘in-laws’ and other extended family members.

Use of the term ‘violence’ may risk a focus on physical acts causing bodily injury. There may be reluctance by some victims to name their experience as one of ‘violence’ unless it involves severe and physically damaging behaviour. The majority of State, Territory and Commonwealth legislation now recognise that ‘violence’ includes physical, sexual, emotional and psychological abuse or injury, as well as conduct designed to exert power by restricting access to financial, familial and cultural resources and limiting social autonomy, sometimes referred to as coercive control. For consistency, the term adopted in this bench book is ‘violence’.

The National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032 [National Plan 2022] encourages nationally consistent definitions of gender-based violence, and provides distinct definitions of intimate partner or domestic violence (“any behaviour within an intimate relationship (including current or past marriages, domestic partnerships or dates) that causes physical, sexual or psychological harm”) and family violence (a broader term referring “not only to violence between intimate partners but also to violence perpetrated by parents (and guardians) against children, between other family members and in family-like settings”, and notes that it is also the term preferred by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, reflecting the occurrence of violence across extended family networks. It also can include forms of modern slavery including forced marriage and servitude.

Terminology - Key Literature

Australian Literature

Australian Human Rights Commission 2022, Wiyi Yani U Thangani First Nations Women's Safety Policy Forum Outcomes Report November 2022.

This Report acknowledges that First Nations people prefer the term "family violence" to describe the range of violent behaviour impacting their communities, including across extended families, kinship networks and broader relationships. Sexual assault, often perpetrated my non-family members, was more appropriately identified as sexual violence, rather than "family violence"[27].

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence: A National Legal Response, Consultation Paper No 1 (2010); New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence: A National Legal Response, Consultation Paper No 9 (2010).

This Report acknowledges that descriptors such as 'domestic violence', 'family and domestic violence', 'family violence', 'domestic harm', 'domestic abuse', 'domestic control', 'violence against women' and 'intimate partner violence' have frequently been and are often interchangeably adopted in other reports, and by academics and commentators writing in this area. Importantly, the Report acknowledges that although terminology differs, each term 'attempts to refer to the same type of conduct' (p110). The Report is critical of the term 'domestic' and cites almost exclusively the comments made by Fehlberg and Behrens (see reference below) on the disadvantages of this term. However no attempt is made to justify why 'family violence' is the ALRC Report's preferred descriptor other than stating that it is to be used 'to reflect the language used in the Terms of Reference' (p110).

Behrens, Juliet, 'Ending the Silence, But… Family Violence under the Family Law Reform Act 1995' (1996) 10 Australian Journal of Family Law 35.

This article examines the relevance of the term 'family violence' in the context of amendments made under the Family Law Reform Act 1995. Behrens is highly critical of the term, claiming that 'the problem with the term "family violence" is…the picture it paints that violence in the family is something in which all members are complicit' (p39). The author takes issue with the fact that the term is ungendered and further submits that the descriptor 'is even less acceptable than the more commonly used "domestic violence"' (p39).

Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services) 2022, National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032.

The new National Plan proposes nationally consistent definitions of gender-based violence, to inform and support program design, public and private sector policies and legislation across States and Territories to ensure equality of access to support and justice [37]. In particular, "intimate partner violence", "family violence", "coercive control", "sexual violence" and "consent" are defined [37]-[38] and a detailed glossary is annexed defining relevant terminology [124]-[134].

Council of Australian Governments. (2019). Fourth action plan: National plan to reduce violence against women and their children 2010-2022. Canberra, Commonwealth of Australia.

Extract: The Fourth Action Plan sets out eight principles to guide the way all industries, sectors and areas of government work together to address domestic, family and sexual violence. These principles inform 20 practical actions across five priority areas. The priority areas represent the range of responses needed to tackle domestic, family and sexual violence: from primary prevention to improving service and support systems. The Fourth Action Plan commits to leaving no one behind. It recognises the need to respect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and listen to the diverse lived experiences of people affected by violence across all of our responses. Commonwealth, state and territory governments will develop a national implementation plan over 2019 that will outline how governments will deliver actions and measure their impact to address the national priority.

Fehlberg, Belinda et al, Australian Family Law – The Contemporary Context (Oxford University Press, 2015).

See especially [5.3] Fehlberg and Behrens focus on the term 'family violence' in their analysis. The authors note that behind considerations of the appropriate definition or the types of conduct that fall within the purview of domestic or family violence, there have been long-standing debates regarding appropriate descriptors.

They list those terms that are most commonly applied, including ‘family violence’, ‘domestic violence’, ‘family and domestic violence’ and ‘intimate partner violence’. Although stating that ‘all of these terms are seen to have strengths and drawbacks,’ the authors don’t explain the strengths and drawbacks. They do, however, note that ‘[a] central concern in developing and applying terminology [is] to recognise that the behaviour being described occurs in the context of relationships…but not to allow the words acknowledging this to suggest the behaviour is somehow less serious than violence that occurs in other contexts’ (p134).

Fisher, Stephen, ‘From Violence to Coercive Control: Renaming Men’s Abuse of Women’ (2012) 4 Australasian Policing 35.

Fisher begins this article with a statement that ‘social problems are understood and responded to in terms of how they are named’ and that the label assigned to a phenomenon has important implications for those experiencing the issue as well as those seeking to find a solution (p35). The author divides his analysis between five key sections in seeking to demonstrate that the term ‘coercive control’ is a more appropriate descriptor than that of the word ‘violence’. The sections are: ‘gendering violence’, ‘medicalising or individualising violence’, ‘violence as criminal’, ‘avoiding the narrow focus on physical incidents’ and ‘recognising the dynamic and strategic actions of the perpetrator’. The author adopts a feminist analysis of the issues, advocating that gender neutral language masks the reality that domestic violence is overwhelmingly perpetrated by men against women. The author also examines the use of the term ‘violence’, arguing that the risk in using this term is that the focus is primarily on physical acts that cause bodily injury (p36). He offers the term ‘coercive control’ as an alternative descriptor which he contends ‘usefully describes a whole pattern of strategies’ and avoids a narrow focus on physical acts alone (p37).

Harland, Alexandra, Donna Cooper, Zoe Rathus and Renata Alexander, Family Law Principles (Thomson Reuters, 2011).

At [6.70] the authors refer to the ‘bewildering array of terms’ used to describe domestic and family violence in the broader context of examining the nature and scope of such violence (p89). They attribute this to various efforts to encapsulate different types of conduct and relationships in a single term, as well as the ‘socio-political contexts that have informed the development of the particular concepts’ (p89). While the authors do not explore either of these points in any detail, they do, however, examine the descriptors ‘domestic violence’ and ‘family violence’. The authors note that the former tends to refer to interpersonal violence that occurs in domestic settings and within family and intimate relationships, and is a term most often attributed to ‘violence by a man against his female partner, including violence perpetrated after separation’ (p.89). This is then contrasted with ‘family violence’ with the authors noting that term is often preferred to describe forms of violence that occur in Indigenous communities and the wider family.

MacDonald, Helen, What’s in a Name? Definitions and Domestic Violence, (Domestic Violence and Incest Resource Centre, Brunswick, 1998).

Given the terms ‘domestic violence’, ‘family violence’ and ‘violence against women’ are often referenced in research, policy reports and reform papers, the author argues that it is necessary for these terms to be critically analysed and defined. As the author notes, ‘each name has a history that is ongoing and often contentious’ (p2). MacDonald discusses various definitions of domestic violence, ranging from dictionary definitions to those used by government departments, the United Nations, as well as legal definitions. The different definitions used within Australian state and federal laws are also discussed (though many have since been amended or repealed), and a brief history of laws relating to domestic violence is given. Sub-categories of behaviour such as physical, sexual and emotional violence, as well as economic and child abuse are also discussed.

International Literature

Ashcraft, Catherine, ‘Naming Knowledge: A Language for Reconstructing Domestic Violence and System Gender Inequality’ (2000) 23 Women and Language 3.

The author seeks to broaden the options for framing domestic violence to incorporate the concept of domestic control. Ashcraft submits that, ‘[p]roviding terminology that accurately reflects the range, injustice and inequality [of the behaviour] would help prevent [it] from occurring’ (p9). This article is written from a feminist legal theory perspective and the author argues that although attempts have been made to privilege women’s voices and challenge dominant representations of domestic violence, ‘the communicative choices and discursive practices employed in accomplishing these goals have unintentionally…silence[d] certain women's voices and reproduce[d] dominant constructions of domestic violence and gender relations’ (p8).

The importance of this article in the context of appropriate terminology is threefold. Firstly, the author examines the emergence of descriptors and definitions to describe domestic violence during the battered women's movement of the 1970s. This is useful for providing a historical context and deepening understandings of the development of the term 'domestic violence'. Secondly, Ashcraft makes an observation about naming debates, stating that '[t]he key to providing women with the tools necessary to address complex and varied marital inequalities is ensuring that the terminology remains fluid and flexible' (p7). Finally, the author comments on the importance of retaining the integrity of existing descriptors such as 'domestic violence' to avoid undermining those who currently identify with the term, which is to be balanced with a move towards descriptors that will (hopefully) increase understandings of the dynamics and types of relationships in which the violence occurs.

Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women* 20 December 1993, UN GAOR, A/RES/48/104 (entered into force generally on 23 February 1994) art 1.

The United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women offers the following definition: 'the term "violence against women" means any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or psychological harm or suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivation of liberty, whether occurring in public or in private life'.

DeKeseredy, Walter, and Martin Schwartz, 'Theoretical and Definitional Issues in Violence against Women' in Claire Renzetti, Jeffrey Edleson and Raquel Bergen, Sourcebook on Violence Against Women (Sage Publications, 2011) 3.

An important objective of this chapter is to critically analyse narrow, broad, gender-neutral and gender-specific definitions of domestic violence. The authors note that there is no agreed upon definition of violence against women and observe that there is a tension in the act of naming this issue given that 'many people use language that specifically names women as the objects of abuse or names men as the abusers' (p3). Examples include 'woman abuse', 'violence against women' or 'male-to-female violence'. These can be contrasted to the more gender-neutral terms such as 'domestic violence', 'family violence' or 'intimate partner violence'. DeKeseredy and Schwartz clearly favour the use of gender-specific terms and language and do so on the basis that 'women are the overwhelmingly predominant victims of intimate adult violence' (p11). The authors criticise statistical findings in North America using the Conflict Tactics Scale ('CTS') on the basis that 'crude counts of behaviour alone cannot accurately determine gender variations' (p11). These comments, however, are of limited use in the Australian context.

Goodmark, Leigh, A Troubled Marriage: Domestic Violence and the Legal System (New York University Press, 2011).

In this American publication, Goodmark argues that current legal definitions of domestic violence are excessively focused on physical acts, which results in a failure to provide protection from non-physical behaviours, such as psychological and economic abuse and coercive and controlling behaviours. Although the author is not expressly concerned with the topic of labelling, the first two chapters are useful in defining and historicising domestic violence laws over the past 40 years in the United States providing context to the development of the term 'domestic violence', and 'family violence' to a lesser extent (pp29-53).

Kelly, Joan, and Michael Johnson, ' Differentiation Among Types of Intimate Partner Violence: Research Update and Implications for Interventions' (2008) 46 Family Court Review 476.

Kelly and Johnson set out a short section in this article titled 'Types and Terminologies: Searching for Accurate Descriptors'. The authors use four uncommon terms to describe patterns of violence: 'coercive controlling violence', 'violent resistance', 'situational couple violence' and 'separation-instigated violence'. The authors argue that while these descriptors have limited application, differentiating between types of domestic violence can have important policy implications and can enhance public understanding of the issues.

Kelly, Liz, and Jill Radford, '"Nothing Really Happened": the invalidation of women's experiences of sexual violence' (1990) 10 Critical Social Policy 39.

A central theme of Kelly and Radford's argument is that in order to avoid silencing victims and to provide them with a means of speaking about their experiences, we must attempt to name and define the phenomenon. They state that '[n]ames provide social definitions; make visible what is invisible; define as unacceptable what was accepted; make sayable what was unspeakable' (p40). Although the article is primarily focused on definitions of sexual violence, the authors assert the importance of terminology and how this can affect public perceptions of what is regarded as a criminal offence.

Groves, Nicola, and Terry Thomas, Domestic Violence and Criminal Justice (Taylor and Francis, 2013).

This book aims to provide an up-to-date and comprehensive introduction to the subject of domestic violence and its interaction with the criminal justice system. The authors dedicate a chapter to naming and defining domestic violence as well as exploring its nature and extent, including the historical and political contexts of related terms. The descriptors explored include ‘domestic violence’, ‘domestic abuse’, ‘intimate partner violence’, ‘family violence’, ‘gender violence’ and ‘coercive control’.

Terminology - Other Bench Books

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

In the chapter on family domestic and sexual violence, it is acknowledged that "[t]here are a range of ways of defining family, domestic and sexual violence" and considers various relevant terms and definitions adopted in literature and Western Australian legislation. Although the term 'family and domestic violence' is used in throughout, the authors do not attempt to explain why this term is preferred over other more commonly used terms.

The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women'.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;
- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

- Lack of clarity about who is responsible for engaging an interpreter;
- Failure to assess the need for an interpreter, or incorrectly assessing need;
- The skill of interpreters being engaged;
- Lack of awareness amongst judicial officers and lawyers about how to work with interpreters;
- Engaging interpreters who are inappropriate in the circumstances; and
- Unethical and poor professional conduct by interpreters.

Identifies barriers to full participation in attending court:

- The intimidating process of arriving at court;
- Safety while waiting at court;
- Lack of understanding of court processes;
- Difficulty understanding forms, charges, orders or judgments;

- Courtroom dynamics;
- The impact of attitudes and actions of judicial officers;
- The need for judicial officers to receive cultural competency training;
- Lack of availability of men's behaviour change programs; and
- Abuse of court processes by perpetrators.

Understanding domestic and family violence

What it is:

There is no uniform legislative definition of domestic and family violence across Australian jurisdictions. State, territory and federal legislation recognise, in different ways, that domestic and family violence can present in many forms and can occur within a variety of relationships.

The National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032 [DSS 2022] encourages nationally consistent definitions of gender-based violence, and provides distinct definitions of intimate partner or domestic violence ("any behaviour within an intimate relationship (including current or past marriages, domestic partnerships or dates) that causes physical, sexual or psychological harm") and family violence (a broader term referring "not only to violence between intimate partners but also to violence perpetrated by parents (and guardians) against children, between other family members and in family-like settings", and notes that it is also the term preferred by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, reflecting the occurrence of violence across extended family networks. It also can include forms of modern slavery including forced marriage and servitude.

Some judicial officers may focus only on recent physical violence and view it as a single incident or as a series of discrete incidents [Westmarland et al 2016], rather than as part of a complex pattern of violent or abusive behaviours [Fehlberg & Behrens 2015] and domination including tactics to isolate, degrade, exploit and control victims [Stark 2007]. Others may perceive the cause of the violence as relationship conflict or couple fighting and, on that basis [Hunter 2006], may, for example: emphasise shared responsibility for children; encourage parties to reconcile; make mutual protection orders for a limited period allowing the parties time to either reconcile or separate; or recommend an exchange of unenforceable undertakings where the parties promise they will be of good behaviour towards one another and not commit domestic and family violence [Jordan & Phillips 2013]. Some judicial officers demonstrate inconsistent approaches to the protection of children exposed to domestic and family violence by including conditions in protection orders allowing perpetrators to exercise child contact, or by granting cross orders applied for by perpetrators in an attempt to ensure that their rights in Family Court parenting proceedings are not prejudiced [Wakefield & Taylor 2015]. These judicial perceptions of domestic and family violence may have the effect of minimising or denying the experience and impact of violence for victims and children and may overlook the risks of future violence.

Over time, judicial understanding of domestic and family violence is developing, and there is growing acknowledgement of its complexity and diversity, including coercive control [Douglas & Ehler 2022]. This bench book underlines a number of different forms of domestic and family violence. Where a person engages in a pattern of behaviours in order to control another person, this pattern of behaviour may be referred to as coercive control. A range of behaviours may underpin domestic and family violence, any of which may be part of a pattern of behaviour: the list is not exhaustive, and some behaviours may overlap or be understood in more than one way and require a range of judicial responses. Judicial officers have identified numerous “red flags” which might indicate the presence of coercive control in matters before them [Douglas & Ehler 2022].

Reported forms of domestic and family violence, actual or threatened, include:

- Physical violence and harm
- Sexual and reproductive abuse
- Economic and financial abuse
- Emotional and psychological abuse
- Cultural and spiritual abuse
- Following, harassing and monitoring
- Social abuse
- Exposing children to domestic and family violence
- Damaging property
- Animal abuse
- Systems abuse
- Forced marriage
- Dowry abuse

Who it affects:

Domestic and family violence can affect any person irrespective of age, gender, socio-economic status or cultural background. It is widely acknowledged however that women are significantly more likely than men to experience domestic and family violence [ANROWS 2018].

The range of relationships within the legislative scope of domestic and family violence also varies across Australia [DSS 2022]. In all jurisdictions a relationship includes that between current or former intimate partners, and extends to relationships—more prevalent within Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and culturally and linguistically diverse communities—between immediate and extended families and other communal or extended kinship relationships of mutual obligation and support.

The primary role of judicial responses to domestic and family violence is to assess and respond to risk and promote the safety of those at the risk of harm.

Certain groups within the community may be at greater risk of experiencing domestic and family violence, may be more vulnerable to its impacts, and may require different judicial responses according to their specific issues and needs. Some people may belong to multiple groups and, as a consequence, may experience heightened risk or vulnerability. These groups may include but are not limited to:

- Women
- People with children
- Children
- Young people
- Older people
- Pregnant people
- People with disability and impairment
- People with mental illness
- People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people
- People living in regional, rural and remote communities
- People affected by substance misuse
- People who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer +
- People with poor literacy skills
- Victims as (alleged) perpetrators

Understanding domestic and family violence - Key Literature

Altobelli, Federal Magistrate Tom 'Family Violence and Parenting: Future Directions in Practice' (Paper presented at the Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration Family Violence Conference, Brisbane, 2 October 2009).

This paper presents some of the findings and associated research from the 2007 Wingspread Conference, which brought together 37 practitioners and researchers 'to identify and explore conceptual and practical tensions that have hampered effective work with families in which family violence has been identified or alleged' (p1). The paper discusses some of the implications of those findings for the daily practice of family law, including the need to: differentiate families' experiences of family violence, screen and triage family violence effectively, assess the appropriateness of processes and services for different families, and ensure successful outcomes for children.

This paper draws on recognized research in this field to emphasise that there cannot be a 'one size fits all' approach to recognising family violence in family law proceedings, and presses for an understanding of the variety of behaviours and typologies of family violence that may occur in abusive relationships (pp12-13, 15). It stresses that understanding that different families experience violence in different ways assists not only in recognising family violence, but also managing effective responses to it in family law proceedings (p15, 19).

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia: continuing the national story 2019.

This is primarily a data report to help inform government policies and plans and to assist in the planning and delivery of violence prevention and intervention programs. It builds on AIHW's inaugural Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia 2018 report. It presents new information on vulnerable groups, such as children and young women. It examines elder abuse in the context of family, domestic and sexual violence, and includes new data on telephone and web-based support services, community attitudes, sexual harassment and stalking. It also includes the latest data on homicides, child protection, hospitals and specialist homelessness services, while noting notable data gaps on various aspects of family, domestic and sexual violence and work underway to fill the gaps and develop new data sources.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence - A National Legal Response, Report No 114 (Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, 2010).

This comprehensive report considers understandings of and legislative definitions of domestic and family violence across Australian jurisdictions. Part B of this report titled ‘Family Violence: A common Interpretative Framework’ provides a wide-ranging review of literature and views about understanding domestic and family violence. From page 300-301 this report includes a discussion of the common features and dynamics of domestic and family violence. At 235 this report identifies that the improvement of the safety of victims of domestic and family violence and that definitions, and understanding, of family violence are key starting points to ensure safety.

Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety. Violence against women: Accurate use of key statistics (ANROWS, 2018).

This ‘Key Facts’ sheet prevents an overview of statistics sourced primarily from research from the 2016 ABS Personal Safety Survey and Australian Institute of Criminology. It identifies for example that in Australia:

- women are significantly more likely than men to experience domestic and family violence;
- Approximately one quarter of women have experienced at least one incident of violence by an intimate partner;
- On average, one woman a week is killed by her intimate partner;
- Women are most likely to experience physical assault in their home;
- Just over 9 out of 10 women reported that their last incident of physical assault by a male was perpetrated by a man they know (most commonly a former partner);
- Just under 9 out of 10 women reported that their last incident of sexual assault was perpetrated by a man they know (most commonly a former partner); and
- Of women who have experienced violence by a current partner since the age of 15, 82% had never contacted the police.

Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety, Women who kill abusive partners: Understandings of intimate partner violence in the context of self-defence (ANROWS, 2019).

This resource offers an alternative model of intimate partner violence (IPV) for legal contexts, based on a social entrapment framework. It focuses on a criminal case, however, it is relevant to instances in which an understanding of facts involving intimate partner violence (IPV) is essential to the application of the law. In particular, it has a resource on pages 9-10 that steps through the use of a "social entrapment framework" to understand IPV. A social entrapment framework recognises, in line with current research, that the victim's ability to resist abuse is constrained by the abuser's behaviour, her available safety options, and broader structural inequities in her life. A social entrapment framework helps to recognise the risks and complexities of leaving a violent relationship, and moves away from reliance on responses that require initiation by the victim and generate a one-off reaction rather than ongoing assistance. Social entrapment framework recognises ongoing risk, and acknowledges flaws in systemic responses to IPV—including recognising that an ineffective or inadequate response can escalate the danger that a victim/survivor is in.

Ayre, Julie, et al., Examination of the burden of disease of intimate partner violence against women in 2011: Final Report (ANROWS, 2016).

This report notes that, '[e]xposure to intimate partner violence (IPV) has serious health outcomes for Australian women and their children, and its prevention is a recognised national priority. Burden of disease studies measure the combined impact of living with illness and injury (non-fatal burden) and dying prematurely (fatal burden) on a population. This report estimated the amount of burden that could have been avoided if no adult women in Australia in 2011 had been exposed to IPV during their lifetime. This "attributable burden" is reported in terms of total, non-fatal and fatal burden' (p.7).

Key results for national estimates of burden:

- 'Overall, it was estimated that 1.4% of the disease burden experienced by women aged 18 years and over in 2011 was attributable to physical/sexual IPV by a current or previous cohabiting partner. Anxiety disorders made up the greatest proportion of this attributable burden (35%), followed by depressive disorders (32%) and suicide & self-inflicted injuries (19%) (Figure 5.1). More than one-quarter (27%) of this burden was fatal (Figure 5.2)'.
- 'Physical/sexual IPV was responsible for almost half (45%) of the total burden due to homicide & violence among adult women in 2011 (Figure 5.3)'.
- 'When the definition of IPV was broadened to include physical/ sexual IPV by non-cohabiting partners, it was estimated that 2% of the burden experienced by Australian adult women could have been avoided if > no exposure to IPV occurred. When emotional abuse was also considered, it was estimated that 2.2% of all burden experienced by adult women was due to IPV (Table 5.5) and could have been avoided if no exposure to IPV occurred' (p.7).

It notes that there has been little change in the rate of burden between 2003 and 2011.

Boxall H & Lawler S 2021. How does domestic violence escalate over time?. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 626. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: A key assumption in the domestic violence literature is that abuse escalates in severity and frequency over time. However, very little is known about how violence and abuse unfolds within intimate relationships and there is no consensus on how escalation should be defined or how prevalent it is.

A narrative review of the literature identified two primary definitions of escalation: a pattern of increasingly frequent and/or severe violent incidents, or the occurrence of specific violent acts (ie outcomes). Escalation appears to be limited to serious or prolific offenders rather than characterising all abusive relationships. However, disparities in prevalence estimates between those provided by victim–survivors and recorded incident data highlight the difficulty of measuring this aspect of abusive relationships.

Boxall, Hayley and Anthony Morgan Repeat Domestic and Family Violence among Young People, Research Report No 591, February 2020, Australian Institute of Criminology.

This paper adds to what is known about family violence perpetrated by adolescents. It examines short-term reoffending patterns – including timing, prevalence, the peak period for repeat violence, and cumulative rates – as well as predictors of repeat violence, particularly those relating to prior histories of family violence or breaches of orders, given that this information is readily available to frontline responders. The paper draws on incident data from Victoria Police for almost 4,000 young people aged 12-18 involved in domestic or family violence. Approximately one in four of these young people were involved in repeat violence in the six months following an incident, with the risk peaking at around 30 days following an incident in domestic violence cases and at around three to four weeks for family violence cases. Violence was largely perpetrated against intimate partners or parents. The findings show how the violence histories of young people can be helpful for identifying who will be involved in repeat violence in the short term, and who will be involved in multiple violent incidents. Frequency of prior incidents of violence is a better predictor of future short-term reoffending than prevalence of prior violence, but they are both useful indicators of future risk.

Bradley, Judge Sarah 'Family and Sexual Violence and the Development of the Law in Queensland and Australia' (Paper delivered at the launch of the Papua New Guinea Judicial Women's Association, Port Moresby, 22 – 23 November 2012).

In this paper, Bradley J provides an overview of the overlap and conflict between varying jurisdictions' legal frameworks governing domestic, family and sexual violence, particularly in light of The National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010 – 2022. The focus of analysis is on Queensland and Commonwealth legislation. In relation to Queensland, the operation of the *Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012*is explained. Similarly, Commonwealth laws including the Family Law Act 1975, and migration and social security law, are described.

Reference is made to the ways in which abusive behaviours are understood in Queensland (p4) and Commonwealth (p5) legislation, and examples of behaviours especially prevalent in the context of elder abuse are highlighted (p5).

Campbell, Elena, Jessica Richter, Jo Howard and Helen Cockburn, The PIPA Project: Positive Interventions for Perpetrators of Adolescent Violence in the Home (AVITH) Research Report No 4, March 2020, ANROWS.

The 2016 Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence found that adolescent family violence was poorly identified and had no considered systemic response. To help address this gap in knowledge, this report investigates the initial legal responses that adolescents and their families receive when they first come to the attention of the legal system. It compares legal and service sector interventions across three jurisdictions at very different stages of legislative, policy and definitional development – Victoria, Western Australia and Tasmania – focusing on awareness of adolescent family violence amongst practitioners and whether and how a legal response was provided. It also examines the characteristics of this form of violence and the impact of responses on families, using data from Victoria Legal Aid regarding 905 adolescents involved in either civil protection order matters or protection order breach matters. The study found that, across all three jurisdictions, current legal responses may not be addressing the objective of reducing risk to families and indeed may be deterring families from reporting.

Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services) 2022, National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032.

The new National Plan proposes nationally consistent definitions of gender-based violence, to inform and support program design, public and private sector policies and legislation across States and Territories to ensure equality of access to support and justice [37]. In particular, “intimate partner violence”, “family violence”, “coercive control”, “sexual violence” and “consent” are defined [37]-[38] and a detailed glossary is annexed defining relevant terminology [124]-[134].

Douglas, Heather and Ehler, Hannah (2022) Coercive Control and Judicial Education: A Consultation Report. (Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration).

Based on interviews with 28 judicial officers and 5 research experts this report considers how to best present information about coercive control in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book and the information needed by judicial officers to better understand coercive control. Based on the detailed material outlined in the Report the key themes considered are the key aspects of coercive control that judicial officers seek explanation of; how coercive control should be explained to judicial officers; how judicial officers can respond to coercive control in the court room and general observations and red flags for identifying coercive control.

Participants identified a number of ‘red flags’ for coercive control before separation (2.4.1):

- Intimidating the victim/survivor, causing fear
- Isolation
- Jealousy
- Monitoring
- Attacks on self-confidence
- Loss of autonomy
- Economic abuse

- Intense affection followed by removal of intense affection
- Offender justifying abusive behaviour
- Illicit drugs

Participants identified a number of 'red flags' for coercive control post-separation (2.4.2):

- Threats (to kill respondent, children, extended family, pets, suicide or self-harm)
- Strangulation/hands on the throat
- Harassing
- Monitoring
- Disputes about children's matters
- Victim/survivor downplays or normalises abuse
- Attempts to control court hearings

*Note that many of the matters identified as red flags by the participants may be red flags for coercive control both before and after separation, for example strangulation/hands on the throat.

Dowling, Chistopher and Anthony Morgan, Is methamphetamine use associated with domestic violence? (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 563 December 2018).

Report abstract:

There is considerable evidence of the impact of methamphetamine use on violent behaviour. This paper presents findings from a review of existing research on the association between methamphetamine use and domestic violence.

Eleven studies met the criteria for inclusion. Domestic violence is common among methamphetamine users; however, methamphetamine users account for a small proportion of all domestic violence offenders.

There is evidence that methamphetamine users are more likely than non-users to perpetrate domestic violence. Importantly, methamphetamine use is frequently present along with other risk factors. This means methamphetamine use probably exacerbates an existing predisposition to violence, rather than causing violent behaviour.

Fehlberg, Belinda et al, and Juliet Behrens, Australian Family Law – The Contemporary Context (Oxford University Press, 2015).

See especially [5.3] Fehlberg and Behrens focus on the term 'family violence' in their analysis. The authors note that behind considerations of the appropriate definition or the types of conduct that fall within the purview of domestic or family violence, there have been long-standing debates regarding appropriate descriptors. They list those terms that are most commonly applied, including 'family violence', 'domestic violence', 'family and domestic violence' and 'intimate partner violence'. Although stating that 'all of these terms are seen to have strengths and drawbacks,' the authors don't explain the strengths and drawbacks. They do, however, note that '[a] central concern in developing and applying terminology [is] to recognise that the behaviour being described occurs in the context of relationships…but not to allow the words acknowledging this to suggest the behaviour is somehow less serious than violence that occurs in other contexts' (p134).

Hunter, Rosemary, 'Narratives of Domestic Violence' (2006) 28 Sydney Law Review 733.

See especially 'Judicial Knowledge About Domestic Violence' (from p754) drawing on observations of court proceedings the author notes that magistrates varied greatly in being supportive or minimising harm, affirming or not affirming women, with some questioning why the applicant stayed with her abuser (p755). Several themes emerge from this court observation study. Magistrates'…

- emphasis on physical violence, especially recent incidents, as discrete incidents rather than patterns of abusive behaviour;
- understanding relationship conflict as the cause of violence (resulting in obligations to leave, encouraging reconciliation, making mutual orders, and providing potentially insufficient duration of orders);
- inconsistency around child contact by allowing an exception to protection orders to exercise child contact;
- denying and minimising violence through reactions to stories;
- engaging in narratives that frame women as bad mothers or strategically using intervention orders for the purposes of family law proceedings.

Jordan, Lucinda, and Lydia Phillips, 'Women's Experiences of Surviving Family Violence and Accessing the Magistrates' Court in Geelong, Victoria' (Report, Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University, 2013).

Drawing on interviews with 37 women who had survived family violence and 23 workers supporting women survivors this research considers among other things the experience of court processes in relation to domestic violence. Of particular relevance is section 3. The research found:

- many women felt they had a limited opportunity to speak and be heard (from p23)
- women who reported magistrates were fair described magistrates as demonstrating compassion and understanding family violence (from p24)
- some women reported their partners made cross applications which they described as a game to further manipulate and shame them(from p26)
- women had a strong perception that family law was over-emphasised at the expense of their protection (from p27)
- women reported that undertakings were ineffective and inappropriate (from p28)

KPMG for the Commonwealth Department of Social Services (2016) The cost of violence against women and their children in Australia: Final Report.

Extract: KPMG's estimates highlight the risk of experiencing violence faced by women and the extent of the issue for governments and communities in Australia today:

1. This year alone over 1 million women have or will experience violence, emotional abuse and stalking.
2. The cost of violence against women and their children in Australia is $22 billion in 2015-16.
3. Victims and survivors bear $11.3 billion, or 52 per cent, of the total costs.
4. The Australian Government, state and territory governments bear $4.1 billion or 19 per cent of the total costs.
5. The community, children of women experiencing violence, the perpetrators, employers, and friends and family bear$6.5 billion, or 29 per cent, of the total costs.

6. Underrepresentation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, pregnant women, women with disability, and women who are homeless within national prevalence estimates may add a further$4 billion to the cost of violence against women and their children in Australia in 2015-16.

Mitra-Kahn, Trishima, Carolyn Newbigin and Sophie Hardefeldt, Invisible women, invisible violence: Understanding and improving data on the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault for diverse groups of women: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

Although violence is perpetrated against women from all cultures, ages and socio-economic groups, the extent, nature and impact of such violence is not evenly distributed across communities in Australia, and domestic and family violence may present in unique ways in diverse communities. Various aspects of identity may intersect for women in the diverse groups, compounding disadvantage, marginalization, and barriers to help seeking (p 18). There are also tactics of abuse that are specific to particular communities. Women without permanent immigration status in Australia, women from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) communities, women in prison, women with disabilities and/or activity limitations, and people identifying as lesbian, gay, bisexual, transsexual, intersex, or queer (LGBTIQ) are vulnerable to tactics of abuse that exploit their unique lived situation. These tactics might include, for example, not complying with immigration processes, taking advantage of a lack of knowledge of local legal systems or rights, taking advantage of dependency when playing a carer role, or threatening to “out” someone’s sexual orientation (pp 18-31). There is limited data on the prevalence of domestic and family violence in diverse communities, and many of the main reporting mechanisms struggle to capture information on diverse groups (p 61), for example, women in the CALD community, or women with disabilities. The outcome of these factors is the invisibility of women from diverse groups and invisibility of the violence which is perpetrated against them.

Morgan, Anthony, Hayley Boxall and Rick Brown, Targeting repeat domestic violence: Assessing short term risk of reoffending (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 552 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Drawing on repeat victimisation studies, and analysing police data on domestic violence incidents, the current study examined the prevalence and correlates of short-term reoffending.

The results showed that a significant proportion of offenders reoffended in the weeks and months following a domestic violence incident. Individuals who reoffended more quickly were more likely to be involved in multiple incidents in a short period of time. Offenders with a history of domestic violence—particularly more frequent offending—and of breaching violence orders were more likely to reoffend. Most importantly, the risk of reoffending was cumulative, increasing with each subsequent incident.

The findings have important implications for police and other frontline agencies responding to domestic violence, demonstrating the importance of targeted, timely and graduated responses.

National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS) 2017 (ANROWS).

This website includes information, reports, summaries etc from the 2017 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS). This survey collected information through mobile and landline telephone interviews with a representative sample of 17,500 Australians aged 16 years and over. It tells us how people understand violence against women, their attitudes towards it, what influences their attitudes, and if there has been a change over time. It also gauges attitudes to gender equality and people's preparedness to intervene when witnessing abuse or disrespect towards women.

Salter, M., Conroy, E., Dragiewicz, M., Burke, J., Ussher, J., Middleton, W., Vilenica, S., Martin Monzon, B., & Noack-Lundberg, K., "A deep wound under my heart": Constructions of complex trauma and implications for women's wellbeing and safety from violence (Research report, 12/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Complex trauma refers to multiple, repeated forms of interpersonal victimisation and the resulting health problems and psychosocial challenges. Women with experiences of complex trauma are a significant but overlooked group of victims and survivors of gender-based violence in Australia. They often have interlinked health and safety needs, and are frequently in contact with crisis services and police. This research project sought to develop a comprehensive picture of how complex trauma is being constructed in public policy and practice, and how it is viewed by women with experiences of complex trauma. It found that at the policy level, complex trauma overlaps with frameworks on violence against women and mental health. However, the impact of complex trauma is not comprehensively addressed by these frameworks, which contributes to the fragmented response to women in distress. The research demonstrated that there is a strong need for a whole-of-government commitment to the implementation and coordination of trauma-informed practice across sectors.

Stavrou, Efty, Suzanne Poynton and Don Weatherburn, 'Intimate partner violence against women in Australia: related factors and help-seeking behaviours' [2016] 200 Crime and Justice Bulletin 1.

The aim of this study was to 'determine which factors were associated with (1) female experiences of intimate partner violence (IPV), (2) female reporting of physical or sexual assault by an intimate partner to the police and (3) females seeking help and support after experiencing IPV'. It found that, '[t]he risk of IPV varies greatly across the community. Factors associated with a higher risk of IPV included being younger, Australian-born, having a long-term health condition, lacking social support, experiencing financial stress, having previously been a victim of child abuse and having experienced emotional abuse by an intimate partner' (p.1).

It also found that, '[w]here the most recent incident of physical or sexual assault in the last two years was perpetrated by an intimate partner, less than one in three assaults were reported to the police. Intimate partner assaults were less likely to be reported to the police if the perpetrator was still a current partner of the victim at the time of the interview, the assault was sexual (not physical) and if the victim perceived the assault was "not a crime" or "not serious enough". Having a physical injury after the incident was associated with an increased likelihood of reporting the assault to the police. Where the most recent incident of violence (assaults and threats) was perpetrated by an intimate partner, a counsellor or social worker was consulted after 30% of all incidents' (p.1).

Tarrant, Stella, Julia Tolmie and George Giudice, Transforming legal understandings of intimate partner violence: Final report (ANROWS, 2019).

The report examines homicide trials in which self-defence is raised by women who have killed an abusive intimate partner. It explores how legal professionals and experts understand intimate partner violence (IPV). These understandings influence which facts are selected and presented as relevant to understanding a case, the language used to frame those facts, and the conclusions drawn from them. The report outlines and applies a "social entrapment framework" analysis.A social entrapment framework recognises, in line with current research, that the victim's ability to resist abuse is constrained by the abuser's behaviour, her available safety options, and broader structural inequities in her life. Using a social entrapment framework requires analysis at three levels:

- documenting the full suite of coercive and controlling behaviours employed by the abuser, including the strategic and responsive dimensions of this behaviour (and the isolation and fear that this creates for the victim);
- examining the responses of family, community and agencies to the abuse; and
- examining the manner in which any structural inequities experienced by the victim supported the abuser's use of violence (including thwarting her attempts to resist the abuse).

The National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Domestic Violence Laws in Australia (Commonwealth of Australia, 2009).

This document reviews all State and Territory and New Zealand domestic violence- specific laws providing for the making of protection orders as at 2009. Among other matters, it identifies the range of relationships within the legislative scope of domestic and family violence legislation and identifies how it varies across Australia in terms of the kinds of behaviours covered and the types of orders that can be made.

Wakefield, Shellee and Annabel Taylor, Judicial education for domestic and family violence: State of Knowledge Paper, (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper reports on findings from a survey conducted with 66 judicial officers from Victoria and Queensland. The paper also discusses literature previously published about judicial understandings and attitudes to domestic and family violence (see pp16-20).

The survey invited judicial officers' views on domestic and family violence and judicial education for domestic and family violence. Almost half of the participants reported family violence matters was one of their primary work areas. The study found that judicial staff in Australia tend to feel that they have a high level of understanding of domestic and family violence, including for people from diverse backgrounds (p 22). Despite high levels of confidence in their own abilities to understand the dynamics of domestic and family violence, responses were split as to whether respondents thought other judicial officers in their state received sufficient training in domestic and family violence to make informed decisions (pp 25-26).

Webster, Kim, A preventable burden: Measuring and addressing the prevalence and health impacts of intimate partner violence in Australian women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2016).

This resource provides a summary of Examination of the burden of disease of intimate partner violence against women in 2011: Final report. There is an excellent fact sheet on pp.2-4 with an overview of the most recent statistics on the burden on the health of women and their children of intimate partner violence (IPV). An overview of the key findings is available at p.7 of the report. Some of these findings about intimate partner violence (IPV) are that:

- IPV affects one in three women (since the age of 15)
- IPV has serious impacts on women's health including poor mental health, problems during pregnancy and birth, alcohol and illicit drug use, suicide, injuries and homicide.
- IPV contributes an estimated 5.1% to the disease burden in Australian women aged 18-44 years. More than one quarter (27%) of this burden is fatal.
- IPV contributes an estimated 2.2% of the burden in women of all ages.
- Physical/sexual IPV was responsible for almost half (45%) of the total burden due to homicide and violence among adult women in 2011 (see p 21).

Hyman, Judge Eugene M. and Liberty Aldrich, 'Rethinking Access to Justice: The Need for a Holistic Response to Victims of Domestic Violence' (2012) 33 Women's Rights law Reporter 449.

While this paper has been written by a US based judge his overview of the issues suggests strong similarity with some of the issues reported in the Australian context. Justice Hyman highlights the variety of issues in the court system in addressing domestic violence, including lack of information-sharing, and court structures creating silos for specific legal issues where families experience multi-faceted ones. It discusses the specific court structure of California's superior court system, including the Family, Probate, Juvenile (Dependency and Delinquency) and Criminal Courts, and the training the respective judges receive to deal with domestic violence. It encourages judicial education on domestic violence, and better understandings of the roles of each of the various players at court.

In providing an overview of domestic violence, the paper notes that: ‘Domestic violence manifests itself in many forms. The most commonly recognized forms of abuse are physical aggression and sexual abuse. However, the lesser known forms of abuse that may fall under the radar can be just, if not more, devastating, such as emotional abuse, controlling behavior, intimidation, stalking, and economic deprivation’ (p450).

Hyman, Judge Eugene M; Wanda Lucibello and Emilie Meyer, ‘In Love or In Trouble: Examining Ways Court Professionals Can Better Respond to Victims of Adolescent Partner Violence’ (2010) 61(4) Juvenile and Family Court Journal 17.

While this paper has been written by a US based judge his overview of the issues suggests strong similarity with some of the issues reported in the Australian context. In this article Justice Hyman explores adolescent partner violence and the responses to it from the legal system. He observes that research suggests that as many as 45% of high school students have experienced some form of adolescent partner violence. Despite these findings, the legal response to domestic violence has focused on assisting adult victims and has often excluded adolescents. When discussing the nature and characteristics of adolescent partner violence, this article notes that, similar to adult domestic violence, a range of behaviours are used ‘as part of the pattern of controlling behaviour’, including isolation, sexual and physical violence, stalking and emotional manipulation (p20). Furthermore, adolescent partner violence ‘is not limited to, or even typified by, physical assaults’ (p20).

Lo, M., A Domestic Violence Dystopia: Abuse via the Internet of Things and Remedies Under Current Law. California Law Review, [s. l.], v. 109, n. 1, p. 277–315, 2021.

US based note. Abstract: Tactics of domestic violence are nothing new. However, as with various other aspects of modern life, technology threatens disruption. The increasing prevalence of Internet of Things (IoT) devices has given abusers a powerful new tool to expand and magnify the traditional harms of domestic violence, threatening the progress advocates have made in the past thirty years and creating novel dangers for survivors. An IoT device is a “smart,” stand-alone, internet-connected device that can be monitored or controlled from a remote location. They are cheap and increasingly common—the number of IoT-enabled devices in the world is already in the billions and expected to grow quickly. IoT devices allow abusers to overcome geographic and spatial boundaries that would have otherwise prevented them from monitoring, controlling, harassing, and threatening survivors. Various advocates are finding ways to protect survivors, and the broader public, from these new dangers. In the domestic violence sphere, domestic violence service providers are creating resources for survivors that explain IoT-facilitated abuse and how to better secure their smart devices. In the technology sphere, consumers, businesses, digital experts, and the media are broadcasting the security risks of IoT devices. Unfortunately, significantly fewer outlets describe the legal remedies available for IoT-facilitated abuse. This Note aims to bridge that gap. It demonstrates that IoT facilitated abuse is a form of technology-facilitated domestic violence and explores how society can use current laws to address IoT facilitated abuse. However, it also questions whether the existing remedies are sufficient and offers recommendations for legal and nonlegal changes that will better protect survivors of IoT-facilitated abuse and hold perpetrators accountable.

Special Issue on Coercive Control: Criminology & Criminal Justice Volume 18, Issue 1 2018.

Edited by Kate Fitz-Gibbon, Sandra Walklate and Jude McCulloch.

Authors in the special issue cover the following topics:

- What is coercive control and to what extent does it offer a new lens for understanding intimate partner abuse?
- How do you distinguish coercive and controlling behaviour in law? And to what degree is coercive control experienced by women in domestically abusive relationships?
- When legislating in the area of domestic violence, should the criminal law remain gender neutral or be framed to reflect the gendered nature of domestic abuse?
- To what extent can an understanding of coercive control inform practitioner views and practice?
- Is legislating for another criminal offence the answer or part of the answer to improving court responses to domestic abuse?
- What challenges and unintended outcomes may arise, or have emerged, in jurisdictions that have introduced a new offence to capture patterns of non-physical violence?

Stark, Evan, Coercive Control: How Men Entrap Women in Personal Life (Oxford University Press, 2007).

This book is a key text on domestic and family violence. Although Stark is based in the United States his work has been highly influential in Australia. In this book Stark explains that domestic and family violence is a pattern of controlling behaviours more akin to terrorism and hostage-taking. Drawing on court records, interviews, and FBI statistics, Stark details coercive strategies that men use to deny women their very personhood, from food logs to micromanaging dress, speech, sexual activity, and work. Stark urges us to move beyond the injury model and focus on this form of victimization. Stark reframes abuse as a liberty crime rather than a crime of assault. He explains how the perpetrator is able to control the victim through a variety of techniques which essentially lead to deprivation of liberty (pp373-374).

Taylor, Gregory, The Chief Public Health Officer's Report on the State of Public Health in Canada, 2016: A Focus on Family Violence in Canada (Public Health Agency of Canada, 2016).

While focused on Canada, this report gives a good overview of the impacts of domestic and family violence on health. It notes the economic costs of family violence (p.15), how violence, abuse and neglect can increase the risk for early death by homicide and suicide (p.16), and examines the impacts of family violence on physical and mental health (see an overview fact-sheet at p.17). The report shows that family violence has indirect impacts such as chronic stress, increasing risky behaviour (such as alcohol consumption, drug taking), and affecting mental health. Other impacts of family violence including negatively affecting social relationships, increased difficulties at school for children, and challenges at the workplace (p.18).

Todd, C, Bryce, J & Franqueira, VNL 2021, 'Technology, cyberstalking and domestic homicide: informing prevention and response strategies', Policing & Society, vol. 31, no. 1, pp. 82–99.

UK based study. An emerging concern in relation to the importance of technology and social media in everyday life relates to their ability to facilitate online and offline stalking, domestic violence and escalation to homicide. However, there has been little empirical research or policing and policy attention to this domain. This study examined the extent to which there was evidence of the role of technology and cyberstalking in domestic homicide cases based on the analysis of 41 Domestic Homicide Review (DHR) documents, made available by the Home Office (UK). Three interviews were also conducted with victims or family members of domestic homicide in the UK. It aimed to develop a deeper understanding of the role of technology in facilitating these forms of victimisation to inform further development of investigative practice, risk assessment and safeguarding procedures. Key themes identified by the thematic analysis undertaken related to behavioural and psychological indicators of cyberstalking, evidence of the role of technology in escalation to homicide and the digital capabilities of law enforcement. Overall, the results indicated that: (1) there was evidence of technology and social media playing a facilitating role in these behaviours, (2) the digital footprints of victims and perpetrators were often overlooked in police investigations and the DHR process and (3) determining the involvement of technology in such cases is important for risk assessment and earlier intervention to prevent escalation of behaviour to domestic homicide. It also indicates the importance of further developing evidence-based approaches to preventing and responding for victims, the police and other practitioners.

Westmarland, N. and Kelly, L., 'Naming and Defining 'Domestic Violence': lessons from research with violent men', (2016) 112 Feminist Review 113.

In this paper the authors draw on data from in-depth interviews with men who have used violence and abuse within intimate partner relationships to provide a new lens from which to view the conceptual debates on naming, defining, and understanding 'domestic violence', and the consequent policy, legislative and practice implications in England and Wales. They argue that the reduction of domestic violence to discrete 'incidents' supports and maintains how men themselves talk about their use of violence, and that this in turn overlaps with contentions about the appropriate interventions and responses to domestic violence perpetrators. The authors revisit Hearn's 1998 work, The Violences of Men, connecting it to Stark's later concept of coercive control in order to develop and extend understandings of violence through analysis of the words of those that use it.

This (USA authored) overview of the multiplicity of behaviours associated with domestic and family violence was presented at the National Conference on Crafting Individualized Services for Women: Responding to Multiple Challenges of Domestic Violence, Sexual Assault, Mental Health Concerns and Substance Abuse, National Training Center on Domestic and Sexual Violence, Austin, Texas, September 10-12, 2001. It may be useful for judicial officers to quickly familiarise themselves with types of actions that fall within emotional, physical, sexual and social/environmental abuse.

Family Court of Australia, Family Violence Best Practice Principles, 4th edition (2016).

The Best Practice Principles are applicable in all cases involving family violence or child abuse (or the risk of either) in proceedings before courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cmth), and provide useful background information for decision makers, legal practitioners and individuals involved in these cases including an explanation of the definition of 'family violence' and 'abuse' under the Family Law Act and the different types of violence and abuse.

The Best Practice Principles recognise:

- the harmful effects of family violence and abuse on victims
- the prominence given to the issue of family violence in the Family Law Act, and
- the principles guiding the case management system for the disposition of cases involving allegations of abuse of children.

The Best Practice Principles are a voluntary source of assistance to judicial officers and legal practitioners and are not a fetter to a court's discretion (Cameron & Walker (2010) FLC 93-445). These Best Practice Principles are not a substitute for evidence in individual cases.

Non-inquest findings into the death of Rinabel Tiglao Blackmore, Coroners Court of Queensland (Cairns), 4 April 2019.

The following is a summary of the key facts relating to the domestic violence related death of Ms Blackmore and the key findings of Northern Coroner, Nerida Wilson. There are other matters raised in the Coroner's findings relating to police responses that are not covered in this summary.

Key facts:

Ms Blackmore migrated to Australia from the Philippines in 1991; English was not her first language. After separating from her husband (with whom she had three sons) in 2014, she moved from Brisbane to Middlemount in central Queensland to continue a relationship with Mr Dickson that had commenced prior to the separation from her husband. Ms Blackmore was concerned that her family would not approve of her living with a man she was not married to, so she was secretive about her relationship with Mr Dickson, her living arrangements and whereabouts. Ms Blackmore's reluctance to tell her family about the new relationship was a source of consternation for Mr Dickson and was allegedly the trigger for two separate (although causally connected) episodes of domestic violence in the 48 hours prior to her death.

Ms Blackmore spent the 2014 Christmas period in Brisbane whilst Mr Dickson visited friends in Bundaberg. During their time apart, Mr Dickson exhibited controlling and jealous behaviours. He demanded that Ms Blackmore take photos of the people she was with so that he could satisfy himself that she wasn't cheating on him. Mr Dickson sent messages to Ms Blackmore's male friends from her mobile phone, impersonating her, and asking when they were free to have sex again, in an attempt to 'catch her out' for alleged infidelity.

On 28 December 2014, Ms Blackmore travelled from Brisbane to Bundaberg to meet and stay overnight with Mr Dickson at a local motel. An argument ensued in the motel room, with Mr Dickson asking Ms Blackmore why he was her "dirty little secret", and then pushing and grabbing her on the shoulders. They then both went to the motel's front office where the manager witnessed Mr Dickson and Ms Blackmore in a tug of war over a handbag, Ms Blackmore saying she wanted to break up, and Mr Dickson becoming more agitated as he tried to convince Ms Blackmore to get into the car with him. Ms Blackmore whispered to the manager to call the police. When Mr Dickson went outside to sit in his car, Ms Blackmore told the manager that he (Mr Dickson) had earlier put his hands around her neck, that she was frightened for her life, and that if the manager didn't get the police he (Mr Dickson) would kill her.

The police attended the motel, took statements from the parties, and told Mr Dickson that they would be applying for a protection order on Ms Blackmore's behalf. The police supervised the return of personal effects to Ms Blackmore and the exchange of their respective mobile phones. Ms Blackmore told the police she intended to catch a train to Rockhampton. Mr Dickson then left the motel, as did the police. Not long after however, Mr Dickson returned to the motel and Ms Blackmore told the manager that Mr Dickson had taken $400 from her bag. The manager became concerned for Ms Blackmore's safety and assisted her to be collected by a friend.

The Application for a Protection Order prepared by the police included grounds that it was necessary and desirable to protect the aggrieved due to the respondent's violent nature and history and the aggrieved's level of fear towards the respondent.

Ms Blackmore asked a friend to drive her to Middlemount so she could collect her property and passport from Mr Dickson's unit. They arrived in the early hours of 30 December 2014. Before the friend left Ms Blackmore, they agreed on a code in case Ms Blackmore was in trouble and the police should be called.

Mr Dickson told police that when he arrived at his unit around lunchtime on 30 December 2014, Ms Blackmore was waiting for him so she could retrieve her possessions. He said he and Ms Blackmore had sex on two occasions, they fell asleep, and then argued. He admitted to grabbing Ms Blackmore around the collar bone or shoulder, shaking and squeezing her, resulting in red marks on her shoulders and around her neck. He also admitted to making contact with her lip causing it to bleed. Mr Blackmore claimed that Ms Blackmore was screaming at him to stop, while also crying and saying that she loved him and didn't want to leave him.

Mr Dickson told police that late in the evening of 30 December 2014 he and Ms Blackmore decided to drive to Brisbane in his vehicle. He said initially Ms Blackmore sat in the rear while Mr Dickson drove as she appeared to be searching for something in one of her bags. A later examination of the vehicle revealed that Mr Dickson had taken possession of Ms Blackmore's mobile phone and had put it in the driver's door well. Mr Dickson said Ms Blackmore subsequently climbed over to the front passenger seat, complaining of motion sickness; then another argument ensued involving Mr Dickson screaming verbal abuse at Ms Blackmore. Mr Dickson denied using any physical violence against Ms Blackmore while they were in the vehicle. Mr Dickson told police he was driving the vehicle at around 100km per hour when Ms Blackmore suddenly opened the door and exited the vehicle. Mr Dickson told police he then took steps to locate Ms Blackmore, keep her alive, contact emergency services and assist in her transfer to hospital.

Ms Blackmore's head injuries resulted in her death on 2 January 2015. There were no alcohol or drugs detected in her system.

Mr Dickson pleaded guilty to (the alternative charge of) manslaughter of Ms Blackmore, and served time. See para 135 on pages 15-16 for the Judge's sentencing remarks.

Key findings by the Coroner:

- Ms Blackmore's death occurred at separation and during a period of prolonged violence perpetrated by her intimate partner. She died within 40 hours of her first and only report of domestic violence to police. In the 40 hours preceding her exit from the vehicle, Ms Blackmore had been subjected to several causally connected episodes of verbal abuse and significant physical violence by Mr Dickson.
- Ms Blackmore's actions were a desperate act of self-preservation. The Coroner found that it is more probable than not that Ms Blackmore exited the vehicle to escape the terror of the events unfolding inside whilst in fear for her life.
- Ms Blackmore was all the more vulnerable by virtue of the fact she was a Filipino woman, English was not her first language, and she resided in Middlemount (a remote and isolated location). Her physical isolation was compounded by her isolation from family, including her children. Her support network and resources were extremely limited.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence court process videos (updated June 2018).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Stark, Evan, Coercive Control – video 4.31 min.

In this video Stark discusses the central thesis of his book Coercive Control: How Men Entrap Women in Personal Life (Oxford University Press, 2007). He explains how domestic and family violence is a pattern of violence. He explains how the perpetrator is able to control the victim through a variety of techniques which essentially lead to deprivation of liberty.

Understanding domestic and family violence - Cases

R v Teer [2019] ACTSC 334 (29 November 2019) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court [2019] ACTSC 334 (29 November 2019) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

In sentencing Loukas-Karlsson J made a number of general observations in the context of domestic and family violence, taking into account the observations of judges in previous cases:

At [53]: 'I also take into account the following observations of Underwood J in Parker v The Queen [1994] TASSC 94 at [39]:

> [S]entencing for crimes of domestic violence should proceed in accordance with the following principles expressed by the Alberta Court of Criminal Appeal in R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242 at 249:
> 'When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live.'

At [54] '… I take into account the following observations from R v Dunn [2004] NSWCCA 41; 144 A Crim R 180 at [47]:

> Crimes involving domestic violence have two important characteristics which differentiate them from many other crimes of violence: firstly, the offender usually believes that, in a real sense, what they do is justified, even that they are the true victim; and, secondly, the continued estrangement requires continued threat.'

R v Gittany (No 5) [2014] NSWSC 49 (11 February 2014) – New South Wales Supreme Court

McCallum J at [40]: 'In my view, that history informs the degree of moral culpability of the offence. The arrogance and sense of entitlement with which Mr Gittany sought to control Lisa Harnum throughout their relationship deny the characterisation of his state of mind in killing her as one of complete and unexpected spontaneity. By an attritional process, he allowed possessiveness and insecurity to overwhelm the most basic respect for her right to live her life as she chose. Although I accept that the intention to kill was formed suddenly and in a state of rage, it was facilitated by a sense of ownership and a lack of any true respect for the autonomy of the woman he claimed to love'.

R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J: 'An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence", Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pp 6–7' ([77]).

DPP v Barnes & Barnes [2015] VSCA 293 (12 November 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

This was a Crown appeal against sentence. Redlich JA at [68]-[69*]:* 'In sentencing, the judge said this about Trevor's offending: 'I make it plain that I consider that you are the main offender in this criminal enterprise and the whole appalling saga was dictated by your immaturity and inability to control your anger in the context of your possessive and controlling behaviour of Ms Bethune, whom you had subjected to domestic violence on earlier occasions. In sentencing you, the court must denounce your conduct, give emphasis to general deterrence, and impose just punishment. A strong message needs to be sent to males in the community who are inclined to be violent towards their female partners. You do not own them. You have no right … menacingly [to] control them. If you lay a hand on them in anger, the law will not spare you punishment. Men who are bullies towards women usually have some psychological inadequacy. They need to look long and hard at themselves to try to understand why they are inclined to behave with anger and brutality, and seek professional help to overcome such inclinations.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou AJA at [53]-[54]: 'The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and longlasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

R v Ritter* [2016] SASCFC 88 (16 August 2016) – Supreme Court of South Australia

Parker J at [17]-[21]: 'At the time of the offending the appellant and the victim had been in a relationship for approximately two years. His behaviour towards her was violent and controlling. About one month into the relationship the appellant began verbally abusing the victim. This progressed to physical abuse occurring about twice each week. By the last year of the relationship the frequency of assaults had escalated to the point where the appellant was assaulting the victim on a daily basis. The assaults included punching, slapping, kicking, throwing items and spitting. When the victim was threatened or attacked by the appellant she would try to leave their flat, often running into nearby streets and parks and attempting to hide. The appellant would frequently chase her or track her down in order to continue his abuse. The appellant monitored the victim's movements and rarely let her leave the house without him. He also controlled her finances, regularly forcing her to withdraw money from her account for his benefit, including so that he could buy drugs and alcohol. The appellant regularly threatened that if the victim reported any abuse to the police or left the relationship he would harm her and her children. She was too frightened to leave or to report the abuse to police, friends and family'.

Her Majesty's Attorney-General v O* [2004] TASSC 53 (9 June 2004) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Quoting the Canadian decision of R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242, 249 (as cited in Parker v R [1994]

TASSC 94): 'When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape.'

Lusted v MRB [2013] TASMC 9 (19 February 2013) – Magistrates' Court of Tasmania

Magistrate RW Pearce at [68]: 'Family violence is to be abhorred. It is a significant social problem, of concern to the community and the justice system. The parliament saw fit to enact legislation, the Family Violence Act 2004, expressly to "provide for an integrated criminal justice response to family violence which promotes the safety of people affected by family violence". The nature of family violence is that it is difficult to detect and prosecute. It is frequently the case that offences are committed in private and with little or no independent corroborative evidence. Moreover, family violence offences are often characterised by reluctance on the part of the victim to assist in the prosecution of offences. That is so for a range of factors including fear and a wish to preserve relationships, even dysfunctional ones, for the sake of loyalty, affection, companionship, economic and domestic support and in the perceived interest of children. Sometimes those motivations are misguided but persist nevertheless. As a consequence of such factors victims sometimes act in a way that seems to an outside observer to be incongruous and difficult to understand, including by failing to complain about, or hiding or lying about violence directed at them. Even if victims are willing to give evidence then the success of prosecutions depends principally on credibility of the uncorroborated account of the victim, a factor often taken advantage of by perpetrators and further adding to the reluctance of victims to complain'.

Bropho v Hall [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Mitchell J at [16]: 'The fact that the aggravated assault occurred in a domestic setting is a significant aggravating factor of the offence. An offence of this nature generally involves an abuse of the trust which one partner places in another, often where the victim is in a vulnerable position by reason of greater physical strength of the offender. The vulnerability of the victim is generally increased by the difficulty which she (it is usually a she) may have in extricating herself from the situation. As McLure P has noted, the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator is a hallmark of domestic violence.

Recognising that common feature, it remains important for a court sentencing an offender for that kind of offence to take account of the need to protect persons in that vulnerable position, so far as the courts can do so by the imposition of a sentence, bearing a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offence, which has a deterrent effect and, in an appropriate case, removes the offender to a place where there is no opportunity to violently attack their partner' (which was approved by this court in Gillespie v The State of Western Australia [2016] WASCA 216 [48]).

The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [3]: 'The hallmark of domestic or relationship related violence is the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator of the violence. The otherwise appropriate penalty should not be reduced because there is a return to the status quo that existed prior to the breakdown of the relationship which precipitated the violence. It is also circular to rely on the return to the relationship status quo as the route to rehabilitation. Moreover, the emphasis on the domestic context marginalises the actual and threatened violence inflicted by the respondent on C'.

Dawes v Coyne [2000] WASCA 134 (19 May 2000) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

Miller J at [6]: 'The learned Magistrate decided the matter after hearing submissions. He began by stating that it was a tragedy that "domestic matters of this sort get into the criminal court" and made the observation that "both parties had been causing trouble for the police who do not want to be involved in these sort of things". The learned Magistrate's observations that the matters in question were merely "domestic" and should not get into the criminal court were entirely inappropriate. Allegations of unlawful assault and breaches of [the] restraining order were matters properly the subject of a complaint and the proper place for the resolution of those complaints was in the Court of Petty Sessions. Further, the observation that both parties had been causing trouble for the police is difficult to understand from the evidence but whether it be true or not, it was wrong for the learned Magistrate to make the statement that police did not wish to be involved in matters of breach of restraining order and assault in the circumstances of this case'.

WJ v AT* [2016] QDC 211 (19 August 2016) – District Court of Queensland

Smith DCJA quoting the explanatory notes to the 2011 bill for the *Domestic and Famil*y Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) at [166]: 'Lastly, the Bill aims to ensure that the person who is most in need of protection is identified. This is particularly important where cross-applications are made, which is where each party to a relationship alleges domestic violence against the other and which often result in cross-orders.

During consultation, stakeholders reported a disproportionate number of cross-applications and cross-orders and expressed the concern that in many instances domestic violence orders are made against both people involved.

This is inconsistent with the notion that domestic violence is characterised by one person being subjected to an ongoing pattern of abuse by another person who is motivated by the desire to dominate and control them. Both people in a relationship cannot be a victim and perpetrator of this type of violence at the same time.

A cross-application may be used by a respondent to continue victimising the aggrieved person, to exact revenge or to gain a tactical advantage in other court proceedings.

Also, violence used in self-defence and to protect children can be misconstrued as domestic violence if a broader view of the circumstances is not taken' (His Honour's emphasis).

R v Brown* [2015] ACTSC 65 (5 March 2015) – Supreme Court of the Australian Capital Territory

Burns J at [4]-[5]: Burns J accepted the opinions and statements he quoted from clinical psychologist, Dr Michael Barry's report. Dr Barry said: 'At the time of the offence, Miss Brown had been in an emotionally and physically abusive relationship for over two years. She described a gradual deterioration in her mental health, reporting low self-worth and feeling overwhelmed, feeling that she did not "fit in anywhere" and she described a "sense of loss in the world". She reported that despite Mr Ruspandini's treatment of her, she felt that he was the only one who she could rely on.

Domestic violence and emotional abuse are behaviours used by one person in a relationship to control the other. Research into the cycle of domestic violence suggests that it is common for victims of domestic violence to blame themselves for the abuse and to experience major disruption in their self and world view. Domestic abuse can have a serious impact on the way a person thinks and interacts with the world around them. The chronic exposure to violence, or the threat of violence, and the stress and fear resulting from this exposure, can cause not only immediate physical injury, but also mental shifts that occur as the mind attempts to process trauma or protect the body.

Domestic violence affects a person’s thoughts, feeling and behaviours, and can significantly impact on mental stability. While the effects of physical abuse are obvious, the effects of emotional abuse are easier to hide and harder to repair. It is common for victims of emotional abuse to blame themselves and minimise their abuse, particularly when they are repeatedly told that it is their fault that their partner becomes angry or aggressive’.

Physical violence and harm

Actual or threatened physical violence or harm is among the range of behaviours that characterise domestic and family violence. It is most likely to be experienced by women and perpetrated by their current or former intimate male partner [ABS PSS 2016]. The Australian Bureau of Statistics reported that in 2019 domestic and family violence-related homicides and assaults accounted for over a third of the total numbers; and that women accounted for almost two-thirds of homicide victims, and were between twice and five times as likely to be victims of assault as males [FDV-related offences 2022]. The most common form of physical violence is threats of physical harm, however these are often accompanied by actual physical violence. The levels of violence experienced from a former partner are statistically much higher than from a current partner, and are more likely to injure and invoke in the victim a feeling that their life is in danger [Mouzos & Makkai 2004]. It also is the most likely form of violence to be reported by victims.

A perpetrator may intend to intimidate and induce fear in the victim through physical violence or harm yet cause minor or no visible signs of injury on the victim's body. Victims may be kicked, slapped, bitten, or punched with a fist. They may be pushed, grabbed, or have their arm twisted or hair pulled. They may be hit with an object or have an object thrown at them. They may be burned or scalded, or threatened with a gun, knife or other weapon. The perpetrator may strangle [Training Institute of Strangulation Prevention] or suffocate them. (Note that non-fatal strangulation may cause a brain injury [Other Resources] due to lack of oxygen to the brain). The perpetrator may drive dangerously when the victim or children are passengers in the car, or smoke in the home knowing the victim has a respiratory condition, or lock the victim outside the house during the night [Mouzos & Makkai 2004].

A perpetrator may also commit physical violence or harm in ways that are intended to cause obvious or serious physical injury or death. A number of factors may increase a victim's risk where:

- the perpetrator displays generally high levels of aggression, and patterns of controlling and emotionally abusive behaviour (sometimes identified as coercive control) towards the victim
- the perpetrator misuses alcohol or drugs
- there are multiple episodes of physical violence or harm experienced by the victim or family members
- the victim's children are exposed to physical violence or harm

- the perpetrator strangles the victim
- the victim fears their life is endangered
- the victim is aged between 18 and 24 years [Mouzos & Makkai 2004].

Domestic and family violence may affect the victim's physical health and functioning in acute and chronic ways, even after the violence has stopped. Apart from direct physical injuries, including traumatic brain injury [Other Resources], victims may experience a range of chronic health conditions for example, muscular and joint pain, headache, stomach cramping, vaginal bleeding and pain during sexual intercourse, heart failure, asthma, poor hearing and sight, allergies, malnutrition, hair loss and fatigue. These symptoms may also be mediated through a victim's experience of high levels of stress, reduced healthy behaviours, and limited agency in making healthy lifestyle choices. In addition, domestic and family violence may disrupt a victim's cognitive faculties for processing and coping with trauma resulting in a sense of personal failure and loss of control over their life situation, which may, over time, contribute to mental ill health.

Physical violence and harm may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Victims of Domestic and Family Violence-Related Offences

This chapter presents experimental data about victims of selected Family and Domestic Violence (FDV) – related offences. Victims of selected offences have been determined to be FDV–related where the relationship of offender to victim, as stored on police recording systems, falls within a specified family or domestic relationship or where an FDV flag has been recorded, following a police investigation.

Key findings include:

- FDV-related homicide victims accounted for over a quarter of total homicide victims, and females accounted for over half of all FDV-related homicide victims.
- Regarding FDV-related assault, across selected states and territories 64-78 per cent of victims were female.
- Regarding FDV-related sexual assault 89 per cent of victims were female.

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

- 'Women aged 18 years and over were more likely than men to have experienced either physical violence and/or sexual violence, by a partner since the age of 15' (see Table 3);
- Women were nearly three times more likely to have experienced partner violence than men, with approximately one in six women (17% or 1.6 million) and one in sixteen men (6.1% or 547,600) having experienced partner violence since the age of 15 (see Table 3);
- One in six women (16% or 1.5 million) and one in seventeen men (5.9% or 528,800) experienced physical violence by a partner (see Table 3);
- Approximately 54% (149,600) of women who experienced violence by a current partner, and 68% (931,800) of women who experienced violence by a previous partner, experienced more than one incident of violence from that partner (see Tables 17-18);
- Women were more likely to experience fear of anxiety due to violence from a partner than men (see Tables 20-21).

Brain Injury Australia, 'The Prevalence of Acquired Brain Injury among Victims and Perpetrators of Family Violence' (April 2018).

This resource provides detailed analysis of the prevalence of acquired brain injuries among both victims and perpetrators of family violence. For both victims and perpetrators, brain injury impacts capacity to recover, change and safeguard future wellbeing. This study utilises data obtained from Victorian hospitals between 2006 and 2016 (p 25). Family violence is a significant cause of brain injury, with around 40 percent of victims having sustained a brain injury (pp 29). Moreover, brain injury was associated with 14 of the 17 family violence-related deaths in the study period (p 29). There is also evidence to suggest that rates of brain injury among perpetrators of family violence are disproportionately high, indicating that having suffered a brain injury is a risk factor for future perpetration of family violence (p 19). Finally, the study highlights that the available data is likely to represent the 'tip of the iceberg', with many injuries going unreported or undiagnosed, emphasising the need for additional research in this area (pp 34-5).

Bricknell, Samantha, Homicide in Australia 2020-21 Statistical Report no. 42 2023, Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

The National Homicide Monitoring Program is Australia's only national data collection on homicide incidents, victims and offenders. This report describes the 210 homicide incidents recorded by Australian state and territory police between 1 July 2020 and 30 June 2021. During this 12-month period there were 221 victims of homicide and 263 identified offenders. The victim and offender were known to each other in 71% of homicide incidents recorded; 18% of homicide incidents involved intimate partners.

Brown, Thea, Samantha Bricknell, Willow Bryant, Samantha Lyneham, Danielle Tyson and Paula Fernandez Arias, Filicide offenders (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 568 February 2019).

Report abstract:

Filicide is the killing of a child by a parent or parent equivalent. Between 2000–01 and 2011–12, there were 238 incidents of filicide in Australia involving the death of 284 children. This paper examines the characteristics of custodial parents, non-custodial parents and step-parents charged with the murder or manslaughter of their children.

Offender circumstances and characteristics differed according to the offender's gender and custodial relationship with the victim. As filicide is difficult to predict, intervention strategies should focus on families with multiple risk factors and address the needs of parents as well as those of children at risk.

Darshini Ayton, Elizabeth Pritchard and Tess Tsindos, 'Acquired Brain Injury in the Context of Family Violence: A Systematic Scoping Review of Incidence, Prevalence, and Contributing Factors' (2019) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 1-15.

Acquired brain injury (ABI) is regarded as the forerunner to, or result of, family violence. ABI is an umbrella term for conditions such as traumatic brain injury (TBI), stroke, aneurysm, brain tumour or vestibular dysfunction. In particular, TBIs are associated with reduced cognitive and physical functioning, negative psychological responses (such as depression and post-traumatic stress disorder), and even death. Family violence may be perpetrated by someone who has previously suffered a TBI and/or the victim may sustain a TBI from violence. Although studies have considered TBIs and family violence separately, there is limited evidence assessing the nexus between these two phenomena. This article presents a systematic review of current literature regarding incidence, prevalence and contributing factors of brain injury within a family violence context. Results showed that the factors contributing to brain injury within the family violence context had multifactorial causation and varied significantly across the studied populations. A number of biological, behavioural, structural, social and environmental factors were identified as negatively affecting the incidence and prevalence of brain injury and family violence. Biological factors that contributed to being a victim of family violence included age and gender of parent/baby. The social factor of previous child abuse was correlated with ongoing abuse later in life, but is yet to be fully explored. Environmental factors, such as hostile living environments and exposure to natural disasters, also have not been thoroughly investigated in relation to IPV or TBI, but are linked to an increase in parental stress and contributed to greater levels of child maltreatment. One limitation of the review was that the underreporting of family violence may have affected the accuracy and generalisability of incidence and prevalence statistics.

Nemeth, Julianna et al., Provider Perceptions and Domestic Violence (DV) Survivor Experiences of Traumatic and Anoxic-Hypoxic Brain Injury: Implications for DV Advocacy Service Provision, (2019) 28(6) Journal of Aggression, Maltreatment & Trauma 744-63

This study sought to 1) characterise provider knowledge, experience and perception of the impact of brain injury (BI) on the experiences of DV survivors within services, and 2) document DV survivors' experiences with abuse exposures that can lead to traumatic or anoxic-hypoxic brain injury along with their perception of how programs address brain injury (p 747). The authors examined data on BI and strangulation collected from five domestic violence advocacy organisations: 11 focus groups were conducted with service providers and interview administered surveys were completed with survivors. Results show a discrepancy between providers' perception of the potential impact of BI on survivors' ability to access services, and the pervasive exposure to incidents of head trauma and strangulation that could cause brain injury among the population. Over 81% of survivors reported having been hit in the head or been made to have their head hit another object at least once, and over 83% of survivors reported being strangled.

Mooney, Rosemary and Deborah Byrne, Understanding the relationship between family violence and brain injury (The Brain Injury Association of Tasmania, 2016).

This report provides a summary of the key issues surrounding the complex relationship between injury and family violence in Australia. It notes that half of the people who perpetrate family violence have an existing brain injury (but not all people living with a brain injury perpetrate family violence). Research demonstrates that there is an association between brain injury and increased aggressive behaviour. Moreover, the types of abuse victims of family violence often report (being hit in the face, head and neck, being shaken, and being choked) are all risk factors for brain injury. Research has established that at least one third of women who have experienced family violence has sustained a brain injury. However, the needs of women who live with traumatic brain injury are not being met (p.1).

It notes that '[v]ictims of family violence are seldom screened for brain injury which means that the phenomenon of brain injury as a consequence of family violence is under reported; the same is true for perpetrators of family violence. Prevalence rates are therefore difficult to estimate due to under reporting, under diagnosis, and under researching of brain injury, making it an 'invisible' problem' (p.1).

Mouzos, Jenny, and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey, and provided information on their experiences of physical and sexual violence including childhood violence. The report describes the type of violence (including threats of violence) by current and former intimate male partners, and other known and unknown males. The IVAWS measures three distinctive types of violence against women: 1) physical (including threats of physical violence); 2) sexual (including unwanted sexual touching); and 3) psychological (controlling behaviours such as put downs, keeping track of whereabouts).

Noonan, Patrick, Annabel Taylor and Jackie Burke, Links between alcohol consumption and domestic and sexual violence against women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This literature review found that "there is little evidence that alcohol use is a primary cause of violence against women. The paper does, however, identify that there are clear associations, and in some cases, strong correlations between alcohol use and violence against women, including, for instance, in the severity of the violence." The relationship between alcohol and violence against women manifests in three ways:

- Alcohol use is linked with the perpetration of violence against women.
- Alcohol use is linked with women's victimisation by violence.
- Alcohol is used as a coping strategy by women who have experienced violence

Adam Pritchard, Amy Reckdenwald and Chelsea Nordham, 'Nonfatal Strangulation as Part of Domestic Violence: A Review of Research' (2017) 18(4) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 407-424.

Awareness and understanding of non-fatal strangulation in cases of domestic violence has improved significantly in the past 15 years. This article reviews the recent literature on non-fatal strangulation in these circumstances, and highlights the challenges of improving research in this area. The authors 1) analyse the recent history of strangulation as it emerged from criminal justice and medical research within the broader area of domestic violence, and discussed how these changes have led to legal and prosecutorial amendments (page 408); 2) propose a general definition of strangulation and note the inconsistent use of certain terminology in the literature (page 410); 3) consider the research implications within the context of criminology, forensic science, law and medicine (page 412-18); and 4) call for five recommendations to advance practice and research (page 418-20).

April M Zeoli, Rebecca Malinski and Hannah Brenner, 'The Intersection of Firearms and Intimate Partner Homicide in 15 Nations' (2017) Trauma, Violence, & Abuse (online first).

This article explores the use of firearms in the commission of intimate partner homicides in 15 countries (p 1). The sample of countries included 6 in Europe, 3 in Oceania, and 2 each in the Middle East, North America, and Africa (p 3). The results indicate that guns are used in the commission of 11% of intimate partner homicides in Australia (p 4). The report also highlights that Australian law imposes stringent restrictions on gun ownership, particularly in cases of intimate partner violence (p 7), which have been demonstrated to have a substantial impact on reducing numbers of firearm-related homicides (p 9). Comparatively, the US had the highest rate of firearm-related homicides (over 50%), whereas Fiji and the UK had the lowest rates (0% and 3% respectively) (pp 8-9).

Cliffe, Charlotte, Maddalena Miele and Steven Reid, 'Homicide in pregnant and postpartum women worldwide: a review of the literature' (2019) 40(2) Journal of Public Health Policy 80-216

This study reviewed the international literature on maternal homicide, and found that pregnancy-associated homicide is an important contributor to maternal mortality, with rates comparable to suicide. Women murdered during the perinatal period constitute a highly vulnerable group as they are younger, unmarried and more likely to be from minority ethnic groups. Reported worldwide rates of maternal homicide range from 0.97 to 10.6 per 100,000 live births. Rates are highest in the US in comparison to other jurisdictions. Evidence suggests that women who are pregnant may have an increased risk of being a victim of homicide, compared to non-pregnant women. Studies reporting homicide in other jurisdictions do not report as consistently high numbers in the perinatal period, which may be because a lack of data and reliance on national reporting systems which differ significantly by country in method and accuracy.

Fyers, A., & Ensor, B., et. al., The Homicide Report (2019).

The Homicide Report is the first publicly searchable database of homicides in New Zealand. It references 1068 cases involving 591 men, 283 women and 194 young people between 2004 and 2019. It aims to determine the reasons behind homicide in New Zealand, and reveals a connection between the homicide rate in a neighbourhood and the level of social and economic deprivation. The Report highlights the extent to which family violence, alcohol and drug abuse contribute to homicidal death. It also identifies all gun-related homicides in the past 15 years. The Report demonstrates the unacceptably high incidence of male aggression, family violence and child abuse. Results show that half of women who die of homicide in New Zealand are killed by a partner or ex-partner. The victims are more likely to be stabbed or asphyxiated than other homicide victims. These homicides are likely to be premeditated rather than unintentional. Further, more than half of child victims are killed by a parent or caregiver.

Messing, JT, Thomas, KA, Ward-Lasher, AL & Brewer, NQ 2021, 'A Comparison of Intimate Partner Violence Strangulation Between Same-Sex and Different-Sex Couples', Journal of Interpersonal Violence, vol. 36, no. 5/6, pp. 2887–2905.

US based study. Abstract: Strangulation is a common and dangerous form of intimate partner violence (IPV).

Nonfatal strangulation is a risk factor for homicide; can lead to severe, long-term physical and mental health sequelae; and can be an effective strategy of coercion and control. To date, research has not examined strangulation within same-sex couples. The objective of this cross-sectional, observational research is to identify whether and to what extent the detection of strangulation and coercive control differs between same-sex and different-sex couples in police reports of IPV. Data (n = 2,207) were obtained from a single police department in the southwest United States (2011-2013). Bivariate analyses examined differences in victim and offender demographics, victim injury, violence, and coercive controlling behaviours between same-sex (male-male and female-female) and different-sex couples (female victim-male offender). Logistic regression was used to examine associations between strangulation, victim and offender demographics, coercive controlling behaviours, and couple configuration. Strangulation was reported significantly more often in different-sex (9.8%) than in female and male same-sex couple cases (5.2% and 5.3%, respectively; $p < .05$). Injury, however, was reported more frequently in same-sex than in different-sex couples ($p < .05$). Couple configuration ($p < .05$), coercive control ($p < .05$), and injury ($p < .05$) significantly predict strangulation. Findings suggest that nonfatal strangulation occurs within at least a minority of same-sex couples; it is possible that underdetection by law enforcement makes it appear less common than it actually is. Regardless of couple configuration, timely identification of strangulation and subsequent referral to medical and social service providers is essential for preventing repeated strangulation, life-threatening injury, and the long-term health effects of strangulation.

Meyer JE, Jammula V, Arnett PA. Head Trauma in a Community-Based Sample of Victims of Intimate Partner Violence: Prevalence, Mechanisms of Injury and Symptom Presentation. (2021) Journal of Interpersonal Violence doi:10.1177/08862605211016362

Of 47 female participants recruited from the general community with a history of at least one relationship that included physical violence, 89.4% reported at least one impact to the head and 48.9% at least one impact to the head that resulted in mild traumatic brain injury. 47.8% experienced at least one incident of having difficulty breathing due to a violent act from their partner, and 29.8% reported symptoms consistent with mild brain injury due to lack of oxygen. The most common mechanisms of injury were being hit with a closed fist and being strangled. These high levels of head and brain injury highlights the need for appropriate screening by clinical and community providers.

Michelle Patch, Jocelyn Anderson and Jacquelyn Campbell, 'Injuries of Women Surviving Intimate Partner Strangulation and Subsequent Emergency Health Care Seeking: An Integrative Evidence Review' (2018) 44(4) Journal of Emergency Nursing 384.

This article reviewed the literature on women's injuries and their subsequent experiences in seeking health care after encountering non-fatal intimate partner strangulation (NF-IPS). Research shows that NF-IPS is higher in women than in men. Although injuries may be subtle or minimised, they may have severe health consequences. In recent years, there have been calls for nursing and other health care providers to improve practices related to strangulation screening, assessment and treatment. Overall, NF-IPS was associated with multiple negative physical (eg injuries to head/neck or neurological, vascular or respiratory systems) and psychological (eg anxiety, depression, suicidal ideation or post-traumatic stress) outcomes for women. Studies suggested that women are reluctant to seek health care after being strangled. Reasons for their reluctance include wanting a safe place first, not wanting to share personal experiences, an abuser being present in the room during the visit, and feelings of hopelessness.

National Domestic Violence Fatality Review Initiative, ABOUT NDVFRI (2016).

The National Domestic Violence Fatality Review Initiative (NDVFRI) (US resource) is a unique resource centre that is dedicated to domestic violence fatality review by the Office on Violence Against Women, a branch of the US Department of Justice. Currently, 30 States in the US have a form of domestic violence fatality review. Domestic violence fatality review requires a shift from a culture of blame to a culture of safety. The Initiative aims to provide assistance for assessing domestic violence-related deaths, with the underlying objectives of:

- Preventing domestic violence homicides and domestic violence in the future;
- Preserving battered women's safety;
- Identifying gaps in service delivery and assessing potential methods of remedying these organisational issues;
- Holding domestic violence perpetrators, as well as the agencies and organisations that come into contact with the parties, accountable;
- Providing technical assistance to States which either have implemented or have not implemented domestic violence fatality review.

The website includes a range of resources including reports, videos and webinars.

National Judges Association, Domestic Violence and the Courtroom: Knowing the Issues… Understanding the Victim (n.d.).

This resource provides practical guidance for judges in engaging with victims of domestic violence in the courtroom, including particular information about Battered Woman Syndrome (BWS). BWS is 'a collection of psychological symptoms', which is often considered a subcategory of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (p 10). Women suffering from BWS may act in ways that confuse those who wish to assist them, making it difficult to participate in the legal system, even though they want the abuse to stop. Victims may experience the 'fight' response, in which they become hyper-vigilant to cues of violence, which can impair concentration and lead to anxiety and panic disorders (p 10). Victims may also experience the 'flight' response, which prompts women to mentally retreat from the abuse, which can result in denial, minimisation and disassociation (p 11). Finally, women suffering from BWS may experience memory loss, and other psychological consequences, such as flashbacks to past experiences of abuse, incoherent thought patterns, and dissociation (p 11).

The Disabilities Trust, Making the Link: Female Offending and Brain Injury (2018).

This study focuses on brain injury in female offenders – one of the most vulnerable individuals in the criminal justice system. Female prisoners are twice as likely as male prisoners to experience anxiety and depression, incidences of self-harm, and domestic violence and abuse. In addition, a number of female prisoners may suffer undiagnosed brain injuries, which cause cognitive, behavioural and emotional problems, such as loss of memory, concentration, confusion and increased aggression. From 2016-2018, the Disabilities Trust introduced a Brain Injury Linkworker (BIL) service at HMP/YOI Drake Hall (a female prison in the UK) which provided specialist support to women with a history of brain injury. During the delivery of the BIL service, the study also found that there were 196 reports of brain injuries from severe blows to the head. 96% of female offenders reported experiencing domestic abuse, 62% reported to sustaining a traumatic brain injury (TBI) due to domestic violence, and 33% reported to sustaining their first brain injury prior to committing their first offence.

Violence Policy Centre, 'When Men Murder Women: An Analysis of 2016 Homicide Data' (September 2018).

This annual Report of the Violence Policy Centre in the United States highlights the lethal combination of domestic violence and guns. It provides an analysis of 2016 data, the most recent year for which information is available. The study covers homicides committed by males against females in single victim/single offender incidents, and relies on data from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Supplementary Homicide Report (SHR).

National statistics from the study include:

- 93% of women killed by men were murdered by a male they knew, and the weapon most commonly used was a gun;
- Females were 13 times more likely to be murdered by a male they knew than by a male stranger;
- Of the homicide victims who knew their attackers, 63% of female victims were wives or intimate acquaintances of their killers;
- 292 women were shot and killed by either their husband or an intimate acquaintance during the course of an argument;
- More female homicides were committed with firearms than with any other weapon, such as knives, bodily force or murder by blunt objects;
- In 2016, 1,809 females were murdered by males in single victim/single offender incidents: 1,188 were white, 517 were black, 55 were Asian or Pacific Islander, 26 were American Indian or Alaskan Native, and in 23 cases the race of the victim was unidentified;
- Black women were disproportionately impacted by lethal domestic violence. In 2016, black females were murdered by men at a rate of 2.62 per 100,000, more than twice the rate of 1.03 per 100,000 for white women;
- In 82% of all incidents where the circumstances could be determined, homicides were unrelated to any other felony crime, such as rape or robbery.

Supporting Survivors of Abuse and Brain Injury through Research (Website, 2019)

SOAR (Supporting Survivors of Abuse and Brain Injury through Research) is a multi-disciplinary, community-engaged research partnership between the University of British Columbia (UBC) and Kelowna Women's Shelter. It explores the incidence and effects of traumatic brain injury in women survivors of intimate partner violence. Its work is grounded in recognising trauma, and its effects on survivors. Its three main phases include: psychosocial and lab-based assessment; education and training; and community-based support network. The website also provides links to important media reports, articles and information resources.

National Online Resource Center on Violence Against Women, Special Collection: Traumatic Brain Injury and Domestic Violence: Understanding the Intersections (2011).

This American collection includes information about the links between traumatic brain injury and domestic and family violence and screening tools for advocates in the field of domestic violence as well as other relevant information for recognizing when the person they are supporting has a traumatic brain injury.

Training Institute of Strangulation Prevention* website (United States).

Includes information on signs and symptoms and impact of strangulation, and online training resources. This site includes a helpful diagram outlining the signs and symptoms of strangulation.

VAWnet, Understanding the Intersection: TBI and DV (United States) (2019).

VAWnet is an online network, operated by the National Resource Center on Domestic Violence, which focuses on violence against women and other forms of gender-based violence. It is a comprehensive and readily-accessible source of information for anti-violence advocates, human service professionals, educators, and others who wish to eliminate domestic and sexual violence. In particular, various resources (including fact sheets and reports) on the intersection between traumatic brain injury (TBI) and domestic violence are available for download. For example, some resources provide information about brain injury and its possible implications for domestic violence survivors, while others focus on the early detection of TBI among domestic violence survivors. A screening tool for TBI adapted by domestic violence service providers, as well as training materials, are also included. The website also directs readers to resources which highlight the need to consider the possibility of a TBI in safety planning. Fact sheets and handouts aim to provide advice on how to identify existing injuries, where victims of domestic violence who have sustained brain injuries can find appropriate help, and how to prevent future injury.

Dr Cath White, Dr Margaret Stark and Dr Bernadette Butler, Non-fatal strangulation: in physical and sexual assault, Faculty of Forensic & Legal Medicine, Mar 2020.

Fact sheet contains information in relation to methods, incidence and useful definitions of strangulation: the obstruction of blood vessels and/or airway by external pressure to the neck resulting in decreased oxygen (O2) supply to the brain, as opposed to choking, the mechanical obstruction of the windpipe (trachea), such as a stuck piece of food.

It also offers advice as to history details which should be taken from persons reporting strangulation, possible symptoms of strangulation and advice as to appropriate forensic medical assessment.

Physical violence and harm - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Physical violence and harm - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Palmer [2020] ACTSC 13 (3 February 2020) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Elkaim J at [15]"Domestic violence is abhorrent. Choking a person is a serious crime. The offender should not have been anywhere near his victim. He was already on bail for family violence offences against the same victim. When she told him to leave he should have done so. He should not have assaulted her and he certainly should not have choked her."

R v Pikula [2015] ACTSC 380 (12 November 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [1]: 'There can be no doubt that one of the marks of a civilised society is that its members can be protected from violence in their lives. While there can, of course, be no guarantee of such protection, nevertheless, the community expects that appropriate steps will be taken to maximise such protection. This is especially true of the need for safety within the family'.

R v Peadon [2015] ACTSC 132 (14 May 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Burns J at [4]:'these offences [were] family violence offences and as such must be treated very seriously by [the] Court. [The] community views with great abhorrence the infliction of violence by people in family relationships'.

R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J at [77]: 'An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, “Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence”, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pp 6–7’.

R v Edigarov [2001] NSWCCA 436 (5 October 2001) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Wood CJ at [41]: ‘As this Court has confirmed in Glen NSWCCA 19 December 1994, Ross NSWCCA 20 November 1996, Rowe (1996) 89 A Crim R 467, Fahda (1999) NSWCCA 267 and Powell (2000) NSWCCA 108, violent attacks in domestic settings must be treated with real seriousness. Regrettably, that form of conduct involves aggression by men who are physically stronger than their victims and who are often in a position economically, or otherwise, to enforce their silence and their acceptance of such conduct. In truth such conduct is brutal, cowardly and inexcusable’.

R v Dunn [2004] NSWCCA 41 (23 February 2004) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Adams J at [47]: ‘Crimes involving domestic violence have two important characteristics which differentiate them from many other crimes of violence: firstly, the offender usually believes that, in a real sense, what they do is justified, even that they are the true victim; and, secondly, the continued estrangement requires continued threat. These elements also usually mean that the victim never feels truly safe. Unlike the casual robbery, where the victim is often simply in the wrong place at the wrong time, the victim of a domestic violence offence is personally targeted’.

R v June Oh Seo [2019] NSWSC 639 (31 May 2019) – New South Wales Supreme Court

Wilson J noted At [53]-

> She was attacked by him in her own home, a home in which he had no right to be, Ms Choi having asked him to leave. Thus did what should have been a place of peace and safety become a place of great danger for Ms Choi.

At [82] –

> 'Whilst there are men in the community, and it is mostly men, who view women as second class citizens who must bend to their will, when that attitude results in the commission of crime, and particularly violent crime, the courts will impose heavy punishment. Such conduct is never acceptable and it will be strongly repudiated by the courts.'

Emitja v The Queen [2016] NTCCA 4 (21 October 2016) – Northern Territory Court of Criminal Appeal

Grant CJ & Kelly J at [29]:

'The offending is once again a very serious incident of domestic violence committed by the offender. The offender's moral culpability for this offending is very high. The offender engages in domestic violence in order to control the victim and to express his displeasure when she does not behave in a manner that he expects her to behave. … The offender must learn that women are not required to do what men tell them to do. Women are entitled to lead dignified lives free from such violence.'

R v CCU [2022] QCA 92 (27 May 2022) – Queensland Court of Appeal

Per Morrison JA [58]-[59]:

The offending here was very serious. It was protracted, violent, demeaning and controlling. It extended beyond the complainant, who suffered time and again from the applicant's abuse. It extended to K's son, and some of the conduct was in view of K's children. It not only involved injury to ease of mind, but physical abuse of a degrading and humiliating kind. Concerningly, it involved an ultimate degradation, the threat of elimination of life itself…. Moreover, the conduct may have been broken by periods where assaults were not carried out, but that does make things better for the applicant. It makes the conduct worse in some respects, because the threat was always there.

R v MCW [2018] QCA 241 (28 September 2018) – Queensland Court of Appeal

The Court referred to the Explanatory Notes for the Criminal Law (Domestic Violence) Amendment Bill (No 2) 2015 at [39] –

'The new strangulation offence and the significant penalty attached, reflect that this behaviour is not only inherently dangerous, but is a predictive indicator of escalation in domestic violence offending, including homicide…'

Director of Public Prosecution v Johnson [2020] TASCCA 4 (8 April 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

Geason J observed:

"The fact that the respondent's conduct included suffocation has significance to the assessment of the objective seriousness of the offending. Suffocation should be treated with the same level of seriousness as is afforded strangulation or throttling. Such conduct is inherently dangerous, and capable of causing serious consequences within a very short period. It renders victims incapable of acting to protect themselves. As Estcourt J observed in DPP v Foster [2019] TASCCA 15 at [26]- [27], it is a form of dominance and control which has the potential to cause grave psychological harm, serious injury and even death" [33].

Hardwick v Tasmania [2020] TASCCA 2 (20 March 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

At [52]-[53], the Court stated:

"The dangers attached to choking have been well documented over many years, particularly in homicide cases. Judges sitting in criminal law have become familiar with evidence of pathologists that death in choking cases is usually as a result of pressure applied to the carotid arteries, thereby blocking the arterial blood supply to the brain… In recent years, criminal courts across Australia have come to understand that choking of female victims by male offenders is a prevalent and dangerous feature of violence perpetrated in domestic circumstances."

At [64], the Court noted that:

"The prevalence and devastating impacts of violence perpetrated against women and children in domestic circumstances are well recognised across Australia by the criminal courts and the wider community. Victims in these cases are vulnerable. The crimes are often committed within the confines of the family home in breach of the sanctity and safety of the home. Choking is a common and dangerous feature."

Director of Public Prosecutions v Foster [2019] TASCCA 15 (12 September 2019) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

At [29], Estcourt J held:

'Violent behaviour by men towards women in relationships must be condemned and discouraged. Vulnerable women, such as the complainant, are entitled to the protection of the law against brutal partners, and the community expectation is that such protection will be provided by the courts.'

Her Majesty's Attorney-General v O [2004] TASSC 53 (9 June 2004) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Quoting the Canadian decision of R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242, 249 (as cited in Parker v R [1994] TASSC 94):

'When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape.'

DPP v Smith [2019] VSCA 266 (21 November 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

At [35], the Court stated:

'…[T]hose considering similar brutal, degrading abuse of a domestic partner must understand that the courts have a duty to protect vulnerable members of our community and will not hesitate to impose stern punishment upon wrongdoers. In 2014, this Court sent out what it hoped would be an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence – that if they offended, they would be sentenced to lengthy terms of imprisonment. The sentence we are about to impose follows through on that message.'

Degney v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 183 (19 August 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

At [50], the Court stated:

> '…[T]hose considering similar brutal, degrading abuse of a domestic partner must understand that the courts have a duty to protect vulnerable members of our community and will not hesitate to impose stern punishment upon wrongdoers. In 2014, this Court sent out what it hoped would be an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence – that if they offended, they would be sentenced to lengthy terms of imprisonment. The sentence we are about to impose follows through on that message.'

At [52], the Court observed:

> 'There has been an increasing community disquiet over violence of males towards their female partners (or ex-partners) and this is one reason why denunciation of this conduct must be given full expression in the sentence.'

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou AJA at [53]-[54]: 'Historically perpetrators of family violence were rarely prosecuted. Even when offenders were convicted of such offences, they often received lenient sentences. Fortunately the criminal law now gives greater recognition to the devastating effects of family violence. It has also been recognised that women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously. This makes both specific and general deterrence very important factors in sentencing men who assault their partner.'

'The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and longlasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

DPP v Smeaton* [2007] VSCA 256 (15 November 2007) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Dodds-Streeton JA at [21]: 'Violence, and in particular violence by men against women as a means of control in current relationships or in relationships which have ended, is a prevalent and even critical social evil'.

Silva v The State of Western Australia* [2013] WASCA 278 (4 December 2013) – Western Australia Supreme Court (Court of Appeal)

Buss JA with whom Mazza JA agreed (quoting the sentencing judge):

'The law is clear that disputes between partners, no matter how emotionally hurtful, must be resolved peacefully. People must understand that marriage is not a licence to treat a spouse as a chattel and violence in the course of a marriage breakdown will be met with deterrent sentences' ([42]).

Sexual and reproductive abuse

Australian and international studies demonstrate the prevalence of sexual and reproductive abuse as a form of domestic and family violence that may be part of a broader and complex pattern of abusive behaviours experienced by a victim (sometimes referred to as coercive control).

Sexual abuse as a form of domestic and family violence includes rape, sexual assault, or sexual victimisation perpetrated predominantly by men against women. Behaviours may include: forced, attempted forced or unwanted sexual penetration; forced penetration by a third party, object or an animal; forced prostitution; forced or unwanted sexual touching; non-consensual sharing of nude or sexual images [Henry, Flynn & Powell 2019] or forced partial or total removal of the victim's external genitalia, or other mutilation or injury to the victim's genital organs for reasons that are not medically warranted (sometimes referred to as female genital mutilation or FGM). Any of these behaviours may be facilitated or aggravated by alcohol or drugs, and may also be associated with physical and other forms of domestic and family violence [Mouzos & Makkai 2004]. Most at risk are young women who have separated from their intimate partner and have experienced prior abuse as adults or sexual abuse as children. The Australian Bureau of Statistics reported that in 2021 domestic and family violence-related sexual assault accounted for over a third of the total number, that it is most likely to occur in the age range 25-34 years, and there are six times as many female victims as male victims [ABS FDV-related offences 2022].

Proof of the victim's lack of consent in judicial processes is central to establishing sexually abusive behaviours and their criminality. The issue of consent is profoundly complicated by the nature and circumstances of the relationship between victim and perpetrator. Sexual abuse may be part of a broader pattern of domestic and family violence, and a victim may only comply due to coercion by the perpetrator. Coercion may not necessarily involve physical force; rather, psychological means may be used. For example: demeaning the victim's physical appearance, intelligence and dignity; dictating that the victim meet the perpetrator's sexual demands; or threatening to severely or fatally injure or abandon the victim if those demands are not met.

Australian research indicates that sexual abuse in this context is the least likely form of domestic and family violence to be reported by victims. Unique contributing factors may include a victim's lack of awareness of the criminality of sexually abusive behaviours, especially where the perpetrator is a current for former partner; cultural or religious beliefs and traditions; a fear of reprisal by the perpetrator against the victim or other family members; a sense of betrayal of trust and violation of intimate personal and psychological boundaries by the perpetrator; debilitating feelings of shame and self-blame; anxiety associated with health and reproductive risks; and an apprehension of re-victimisation through the reporting and judicial processes [Heenan 2004].

Domestic and family violence may commence or escalate, or its patterns may change, during a victim's pregnancy. In some reported cases, the violence lessened and victims came to view pregnancy as a means of self-protection. More often however, the perpetrator is likely to regard the pregnancy and change in family circumstances as a threat to previously held dominance and may intensify abusive behaviours in an effort to reassert control over the victim.

A pregnant person in an abusive relationship is less likely to want or to have planned her pregnancy and may seek a termination to avoid further risk of harm to themselves or the child; to avoid having to parent with the perpetrator; or to better enable her escape from the abusive relationship. However, if the pregnant person is experiencing heightened levels of monitoring and manipulation by the perpetrator, the pregnant person may be prevented from accessing the funds, transport and other means necessary to terminate the pregnancy. Physical and other forms of violence experienced during pregnancy may result in the pregnant person's death or foetal death, pre-term birth, low birth weight, or extreme stress in the mother manifested, for example, in eating and sleep disorders, poor weight gain, inadequate access to antenatal care, misuse of alcohol or drugs, sexually transmitted diseases, and mental illness [Miller et al 2010].

Reproductive violence or abuse, sometimes called reproductive coercion extends to earlier perpetrator behaviours specifically intended to coerce (or end) pregnancy. For example: rape, insisting on unprotected sex, sabotaging the birth control measures (destroying pills, pulling out vaginal rings or contraceptive implants) or forcing a person to use them, exercising financial control so as to restrict the person's access to contraception or abortion, or threatening to leave her if she fails to conceive or refuses an abortion. Where a victim is also experiencing other forms of violence there is an increased risk of unintended pregnancy as the person is more likely to fear the consequences of resisting the perpetrator's coercion, and may be significantly vulnerable to poor reproductive and general health [Moore et al 2010].

Sexual and reproductive abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

ANROWS, Intimate partner sexual violence: Research synthesis.

This resource provides an overview of ANROWS evidence relating to intimate partner sexual violence (IPSV). It includes key facts on prevalence, as well as an overview of key issues, including evidence that:

- IPSV is a high-risk indicator.
- IPSV has serious and long-lasting effects.
- IPSV usually co-occurs alongside other tactics of DV.
- Community attitudes toward issues of sexual activity and consent show that sexual violence, and in particular IPSV, is not understood well, or taken seriously.
- IPSV is difficult to name and recognise.
- There are many barriers to reporting IPSV.
- Incidents are underreported and hard to prosecute.
- Responses to and services for IPSV need further resourcing and development.
- Education and prevention programs do not sufficiently address IPSV.
- Current research on IPSV faces limitations with small population groups and definitional issues.

Victims of Domestic and Family Violence-Related Offences

This chapter presents experimental data about victims of selected Family and Domestic Violence (FDV) – related offences. Victims of selected offences have been determined to be FDV–related where the relationship of offender to victim, as stored on police recording systems, falls within a specified family or domestic relationship or where an FDV flag has been recorded, following a police investigation.

Key findings include:

- FDV-related homicide victims accounted for over a quarter of total homicide victims, and females accounted for over half of all FDV-related homicide victims.

- Regarding FDV-related assault, across selected states and territories 64-78% of victims were female.
- Regarding FDV-related sexual assault 89% of victims were female.

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women aged 18 years and over about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

Almost one in five women reported experiences of sexual violence (18% or 1.7 million), compared with approximately one in twenty men (4.7% or 428,800). Further, '[w]omen were eight times more likely to experience sexual violence by a partner than men. Approximately 5.1% of women (480,200) experienced sexual violence by a partner, compared with approximately 0.6% of men (53,000)'. See Table 3 for more detail.

Campo, Monica (2015) Domestic and family violence in pregnancy and early parenthood: Overview and emerging interventions (Practitioner Resource) Australian Institute of Family Studies, Commonwealth of Australia.

This resource for family violence practitioners highlights the following:

- Women are at an increased risk of experiencing violence from an intimate partner during pregnancy.
- If domestic and family violence already exists, it is likely to increase in severity during pregnancy.
- Young women, aged 18–24 years, are more likely to experience domestic and family violence during pregnancy.
- Unintended pregnancy is often an outcome of an existing abusive relationship.
- Poor birth outcomes (such as low birth weight, premature birth) and post-natal depression are associated with domestic and family violence during pregnancy.

- The long-term effects of exposure to domestic and family violence in utero are just emerging.
- There are several promising interventions for preventing and reducing violence during pregnancy.
- Pregnancy and early parenthood are opportune times for early intervention as women are more likely to have contact with health and other professionals

Coumarelos, C., Weeks, N., Bernstein, S., Roberts, N., Honey, N., Minter, K., & Carlisle, E. (2023). Attitudes matter: The 2021 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS), Findings for Australia. (Research report 02/2023). ANROWS.

This report details the results from the 2021 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS). The survey sample consisted of 19,100 Australians aged 16 years or over, who were interviewed via mobile telephone. Regarding forms of abuse that are 'always recognized as domestic violence:

- Behaviours threatening physical injury or a forced medical procedure, such as forced contraception or abortion (81–92% of respondents always recognized as domestic violence).
- Non-physical forms of domestic violence involving financial and emotional abuse or control, including tracking via technology (66–75%).
- Violence involving the exploitation of aspects of a partner's identity or experience, such as chronic health conditions, sexual diversity, religion and migrant status, were also less well recognised (66–73%).
- Electronic harassment and abuse, such as via texts, emails, social media and sending unwanted sexual images (68–78%) (p23)

The study provided a number of statements and asked respondents if they agreed with them. For example: women lie about sexual assault as a way of "getting back at men" (34% agree) or because they later regret consensual sexual interactions (24% agree). The study found that 25% of respondents agreed that men might disregard consent because an aroused man "may not realise" the woman does not want to have sex; 18% agreed that sexual assault is primarily committed by strangers, 7% agreed that "genuine" sexual assault victims immediately report their assault to police (7%) and 5% agreed that rape victims would have have evidence of physical injuries.(p25)

Cox, Peta, Sexual assault and domestic violence in the context of co-occurrence and re-victimisation: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This literature review examines the intersection between sexual assault and domestic violence. In relation to consent, the paper highlights that the ability to provide consent for sexual activity may be compromised when it is occurring within the context of the perpetration of intimate partner violence (IPV). This is because the perpetration of IPV creates a climate of ongoing fear or control (p 29). Additionally, for sexual violence perpetrated by intimate partners, demonstrating lack of consent is complicated because sexual violence may have been perpetrated in a context where consensual relations may have taken place before and/or after the assault, and in the context of established patterns of sexual behaviours that do not include verbalised consent (p 29).

Understandings of consent in established relationships affect how intimate partner sexual violence is framed both by victims as well as third parties. See pages 47-48 for a discussion of the way social norms affect what is understood as “real rape” (non-consensual sexual activity). Importantly, research has found that intimate partner sexual violence is viewed by the community as both less serious and more justifiable than sexual assault by a stranger or acquaintance (p 47). Indeed, the greater the familiarity between the victim/survivor and perpetrator, the greater likelihood that reports will be considered a lie or misinterpretation (p 47).

IPSV victims/survivors themselves often face difficulty in recognising sexual violence as violence, assault or rape (p 26). Similarly, research shows that younger women rarely identify sexually coercive behaviours by boyfriends as sexual assault, and tend to excuse sexually violent behaviour by saying that their own behaviour justified the assault or by pointing to extenuating circumstances (p 48). This again points to the strength of commonly held perceptions of what “counts” as consensual or non-consensual sexual activity.

Heather Douglas and Katherine Kerr, ‘Domestic and family violence, reproductive coercion and the role for law’ (2018) 26(2) Journal of Law and Medicine 341-355.

Although sexual abuse has been extensively analysed in the literature, little is known about the extent and nature of reproductive coercion – an issue that has far-reaching consequences which often manifest in poor sexual and reproductive health outcomes, and may also result in pregnancy and parenting in a violent relationship. Reproductive coercion is broadly defined as the interference with a woman’s reproductive and sexual autonomy. The authors draw on interviews conducted with women who had experienced DFV and were involved with the legal system. Results indicated a link between sexually abusive behaviour and reproductive coercion. Not only does reproductive coercion sometimes occur within a context of violent and controlling behaviours, but those behaviours may reinforce or co-occur with the perpetration of reproductive coercion. Some of the women in the study described being pressured into doing various sexual activities they were not comfortable with. Other women perceived sexual abuse as normal and did not usually name the behaviour as sexual assault or rape. In a violent intimate relationship, the underlying dynamic is one where the abuser uses numerous tactics to assert power and control over his partner. For some women, sex and reproduction are part of that dynamic.

Heenan, Melanie, 'Just "Keeping the Peace": A Reluctance to Respond to Male Partner Violence' (Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Issues No 1, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2004).

This review provides a comprehensive overview of a variety of Australian and international research and literature on sexual violence in intimate partner relationships with specific discussion of women's (including Indigenous women) experiences. This review identifies some of the reasons victims might be reluctant to disclose a partner' or ex-partner's sexually abusive behaviour. These include fear of retaliation, fear of rejection by family and friends, fear of the loss of the relationship, feeling ashamed or that they have failed in their perceived duty as a wife, and hope that things will change. A victim may be at a heightened risk of sexual abuse by their ex-partner after the relationship has ended.

Henry, Nicola, Asher Flynn and Anastasia Powell, Image-based sexual abuse: Victims and perpetrators (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 572 March 2019).

Report abstract:

Image-based sexual abuse (IBSA) refers to the non-consensual creation, distribution or threatened distribution of nude or sexual images. This research examines the prevalence, nature and impacts of IBSA victimisation and perpetration in Australia. This form of abuse was found to be relatively common among respondents surveyed and to disproportionately affect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people with a disability, homosexual and bisexual people and young people. The nature of victimisation and perpetration was found to differ by gender, with males more likely to perpetrate IBSA, and females more likely to be victimised by a partner or ex-partner.

Mouzos, Jenny, and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey. The authors report that 5-7% of women who had a current or former intimate partner reported that their partner had forced them to have sexual intercourse at some stage during their lifetime. A further 3-4% of these women reported that their partners had attempted to force them to have sexual intercourse, and a similar proportion experienced unwanted sexual touching (pp44-46). The authors also consider the under-reporting of sexual violence.

Tarrant, Stella, Julia Tolmie and George Giudice, Transforming legal understandings of intimate partner violence: Final report (ANROWS, 2019).

This report analyses a West Australian homicide case. The analysis shows how sexual violence against the defendant who was charged with killing her abusive husband, is rendered invisible in the case. Despite the evidence of sexual violence against the defendant, the sexually abusive behaviours played little or no part in the consideration of previous violence(see in particular pp 83-84). The defendant gave evidence of sexually abusive behaviours including that the deceased had forced her repeatedly to perform sexually in front of Skype cameras and that he had raped her when she resisted watching child sexual abuse on laptops in their bedroom. The report argues that old common law understandings of marital unity and rape immunity, despite law reform, still influence our legal understandings of sexual violence within intimate partnerships.

A summary of implications for policy and practice is also available at this link.

The authors examine the issues from three perspectives: The harmfulness of sexual violence; common misconceptions about sexual violence; and complainants' experiences of the criminal justice system. It provides a thorough literature review of the issues explored. See especially 1.1 which explores sexual violence as controlling behaviour that is embedded in social relations. Section 2 considers commonly held myths and misconceptions about sexual violence.

VicHealth, The Health Costs of Violence: Measuring the Burden of Disease Caused by Intimate Partner Violence: A Summary of Findings (2004).

This report is focused on health outcomes associated with intimate partner violence. The research reports that where sexual violence is involved bruising, tears and lacerations to the vaginal area and anus are common (p20). The report also identifies implications for reproductive health including sexually transmitted diseases, urinary tract infections, and terminations of pregnancy and complications of pregnancy (p21).

Zilkens, Renate et al, 'Sexual assault and general body injuries: A detailed cross-sectional Australian study of 1163 women' (2017) 279 Forensic Science International 112-120.

Of 1163 Australian women seen at a sexual assault centre, 71% received a general body injury (52% mild, 17% moderate, and 2% severe) (p 115). Moderate to severe injury was observed more frequently in women assaulted by intimate partners than by strangers or acquaintances. In particular, the prevalence of non-fatal strangulation, biting, the use of blunt force and weapons was higher for women assaulted by intimate partners compared to any other group (p 117). The presence of mental illness in the victim also affected the severity of the injury (p 119).

Bagwell-Gray, M. et al., Women's Reproductive Coercion and Pregnancy Avoidance: Associations With Homicide Risk, Sexual Violence, and Religious Abuse. (2021) 27 (12-13) Violence Against Women 2294-2312 doi: 10.1177/10778012211005566

This survey study explores patterns of reproductive coercion (RC) and pregnancy avoidance (PA) among women recruited from domestic violence shelters in the southwestern United States (N = 661). Younger, African American, and Hispanic women were more likely to experience RC. Homicide risk, sexual intimate partner violence (IPV), and religious abuse were associated with RC, and RC and homicide risk were associated with PA. We discuss implications of the associations between RC and PA and their links to religious abuse, sexual IPV, and homicide risk.

Twenty-one percent of the sample indicated that their partner used religious teachings or traditions as a reason to control daily activities. 217 women (33%) experienced reproductive coercion. Specifically, 31% (n = 207) of participants reported their partner tried to get them pregnant when they did not want to be pregnant and 17% (n = 114) reported that their partner physically hurt them or threatened to leave if they did not get pregnant.

Bows, Hannah and Nicole Westmarland, 'Rape of Older People in the United Kingdom: Challenging the 'Real-Rape' Stereotype' (2017) 57 British Journal of Criminology 1-17.

While advances have been made in understanding sexual violence broadly, this article addresses the gap in knowledge regarding older victims of rape and sexual violence (p 5). In order to do so, the researchers used freedom of information requests to obtain data from 45 police forces relating to 655 cases (p 6). The findings challenge dominant real-rape stereotypes, which involve a 'white, young victim who is attacked at night by a stranger who is motivated by sexual gratification' (p 3), and can lead to older victims of sexual violence being ignored or disbelieved (pp 3-4). Key findings include:

- The 'overall number of reported offences involving an older victim was low when compared with younger age groups' (p 6);
- Consistent with existing knowledge on younger groups, most victims were female, and most perpetrators were male (pp 7-8);
- Perpetrators of sexual violence against older people were likely to be younger than their victims, with the majority under 60 years of age (p 8);
- Most perpetrators were known to the victim, with around 20% being a partner or husband (p 9); and
- Most of the assaults occurred in the victim's home (p 9).

Center for Disease Control and Prevention, 'Intersection of Intimate Partner Violence and HIV in Women' (February 2014).

This report considers the intersection between women's experiences of intimate partner violence (IPV) and HIV. IPV can be both a risk factor for HIV, and a consequence of HIV (p 2). Exposure to IPV may increase a woman's risk of HIV, through forced sex with an infected partner (p 3), limited or compromised negotiation of safe sex practices, compromised treatment and prevention practices (p 3), and increased risk-taking behaviours (p 1). Women who are HIV-positive experience higher rates of IPV, and are likely to experience more frequent and severe abuse (p 2). Further, some women may be reluctant to be tested and treated for HIV due to fear of violence (p 2).

Miller, Elizabeth, et al, 'Reproductive Coercion: Connecting the Dots Between Partner Violence and Unintended Pregnancy' (2010) 81(6) Contraception 457.

This paper reports that the prevalence of intimate partner violence reported among women utilizing sexual health services and seeking care in gynecologic and adolescent clinics is generally double these population-based estimates. It reports that such victimization is consistently associated with increased pregnancy and sexually transmitted infection (STI), with abused women demonstrating disproportionately higher rates of seeking care at family planning and other health services related to sexual health, such as HIV and STI testing. Moreover, they report on evidence that unintended pregnancy occurs more commonly in abusive relationships. Forced sex, fear of violence if she refuses sex, and difficulties negotiating contraception and condom use in the context of an abusive relationship all contribute to increased risk for unintended pregnancy and STIs.

Moore, Ann, Lori Frohwirth and Elizabeth Miller, 'Male Reproductive Control of Women Who have Experienced Intimate Partner Violence in the United States' (2010) 70 Social Sciences and Medicine 1737.

This article reports on the histories of 71 women aged 18-49 years with a history of intimate partner violence recruited from a family planning clinic, an abortion clinic and a domestic violence shelter in the United States. 53 respondents (74%) identified 'male reproductive control' encompassing pregnancy-promoting behaviours as well as control and abuse during pregnancy in an attempt to influence the pregnancy outcome. The authors explain that pregnancy promotion involves male partner attempts to impregnate a woman including verbal threats about getting her pregnant, unprotected forced sex, and contraceptive sabotage. Once pregnant, male partners resort to behaviours that threaten a woman if she does not do what he desires with the pregnancy. This paper provides a thorough overview of the literature in the US on the relationship between intimate partner violence and pregnancy/reproductive health, and the characteristics of abusive relationships which affect 'poor pregnancy outcomes'.

Walker, Susan and Sam Rowlands, 'Reproductive control by others: means, perpetrators and effects' (2019) 45(1) BMJ Sex Reproductive Health 61-67

People exert control over women's reproductive rights in various ways, including persuasion or pressure, such as emotional blackmail, societal or family expectations, or threats of or actual physical violence. This article reviews the medical and social science literature on reproductive control of women. Reproductive control can be perpetrated by intimate partners, the wider family or as part of criminal behaviour. Contraceptive sabotage, or 'stealthing', invalidates consent by the covert removal of a condom during sex. Reproductive control is distinct from intimate partner violence, but they overlap to a certain extent. Reproductive control is reported by around one quarter of women who attend sexual and reproductive healthcare services. Therefore, people working in women's health must appreciate its extent in the community, and understand how to use screening tools which detect it.

This Bench Book cites a number of statistics relevant to sexual violence, including that in Australian Bureau of Statistics ("ABS") data from 2019:

- "there were 8,985 victims of FDV-related sexual assault, which accounted for 33% of all victims of sexual assault;
- there were six times as many female victims of FDV-related sexual assault (60 female victims per 100,000 females) than male victims (10 male victims per 100,000 males); and
- the majority of FDV-related sexual assault victims were aged under 19 years old (72% of male and 52% of female victims)". [13.1.2]

It also cites ABS data from 2016 which found:

- “women are eight times more likely to experience intimate partner sexual violence (IPSV) than men (with approximately 5.1% of women having experienced IPSV, compared with approximately 0.6% of men); and
- 53% of women, compared to 25% of men, experienced sexual harassment during their lifetime”.

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Neilson notes in Section 4.2 the ‘[h]igh overlap between domestic violence and sexual coercion/assault: Many (some researchers suggest most) relationships characterized by physical domestic violence also involve sexual coercion and assault. Lawyers and service providers will not always be made aware of this form of domestic violence since sexual abuse disclosure rates are known to be very low. Lawyers and service providers can help by becoming aware of the broad range of behaviors that can constitute sexual abuse and by asking appropriate questions’. Sexual abuse as a factor associated with risk is identified in Section 8.8.1. Further references to sexual assault and abuse are made throughout the bench book, frequently in footnotes, but not expanded on substantially (see e.g. discussion of psychological harm caused by sexual abuse in Supplementary Reference 1: Understanding the nature of domestic violence: assessing violence in context).

Sexual and reproductive abuse - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Smith [2021] ACTSC 114 (3 June 2021) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Mossop J observed:

[25] The sexual intercourse without consent is constituted by the digital penetration of the complainant's vagina. This is a case in which the sexual intercourse can properly be described as an act of sexual violence. There is nothing which suggests that the act was performed for the purposes of sexual gratification. Rather, it was an assault designed to degrade the victim and formed part of a pattern of demeaning and controlling behaviour on the part of the offender. That demeaning and controlling behaviour is an important part of the context in which the offence occurred.

[26] In R v Palmer [2017] ACTSC 357 at [22] I made reference to some of the features that might be taken into account in determining the objective seriousness of an offence of sexual intercourse without consent. In this case, relevant considerations are as follows: the offence was not premeditated; the offender acted alone; the sexual intercourse was brief and involved a single incident of digital penetration; the act occurred in the context of violence that would have caused the victim to fear for her life; the offender's behaviour at the time of the digital penetration and immediately following was, and was designed to be, humiliating or degrading; the victim was vulnerable largely because of her ongoing relationship with the offender; the facts do not disclose any particular protests by the victim but, in the circumstances in which the offending occurred, that is not surprising. While the offending was relatively brief, the various factors to which I have referred puts it at the upper end of the mid range of objective seriousness for this offence.

R v NQ [2015] ACTSC 308 (14 October 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Robinson AJ at [15]: 'There is a need…to send a clear message by way of general deterrence to others that participation in sexual behaviour is a matter of choice not subjugation'.

Bussey v R* [2020] NSWCCA 280 (16 November 2020) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

The seriousness of the offending was not mitigated by the prior sexual relationship between the applicant and the victim. Harrison J (Hoeben CJ and Bellew J agreeing) held at [87]-[88]:

> "Mr Bussey maintained that, but for his Honour's failure to have sufficient regard to the fact that he and RM had, until only a relatively short time before the commission of the offence, been in a close and enthusiastic personal relationship, he would have concluded that Mr Bussey's objective criminality was reduced and would have imposed a less severe sentence. In this sense, it is said that his Honour allegedly failed to have regard to a relevant consideration.
> In my opinion, that submission falls foul of the principle that just because it may be possible to contemplate more serious examples of the same offence does not mean that the particular offence being considered is for that reason less serious."

And at [95]-[97], with Hoeben CJ and Bellew J particularly noting their agreement with these remarks:

> "The cases reveal a consistent and commendable emphasis upon the need to consider each offence of sexual assault upon a woman by her partner or former partner with special and particular regard to the circumstances of the case. However, there has in my view been a regrettable tendency in some cases to refer to the fact that the assault occurred within, or following the breakdown of, a relationship as something that might "mitigate" the seriousness of the particular offence. This type of language has the unfortunate potential erroneously to dilute the significance of the offence under consideration. Put simply, the objective seriousness of sexual intercourse without consent cannot be reduced because of factors such as a prior sexual history between an offender and his victim without making unjustified and impermissible assumptions about the effect upon the victim. It depreciates the notion that no means no, whatever other factors may be involved. To accept that a prior relationship can ever operate to mitigate the seriousness of the offending completely abandons that uncontroversial wisdom and reverts to the type of attitude that once saw domestic violence treated as less culpable than other assaults. It also proceeds upon the implicit and unsafe adoption of non-consensual sexual intercourse with a stranger as the default position.
> I cannot accept that a statement such as "the violation of the person and the defilement that are inevitable features where a stranger rapes a woman are not always present to the same degree when the offender and the victim had previously had a longstanding sexual relationship" is now or could ever have been an > acceptable, far less correct, summary of the law or that it should continue to influence this Court in the determination of cases such as the present. Violation and defilement of the victim are quintessential aspects of the offence and the victim's familiarity with an assailant can have no bearing upon that fundamental circumstance. Indeed, such an assault, committed by a person with whom the victim may have had a formerly close and respectful relationship, is potentially more likely to exacerbate the seriousness of the offence than otherwise. I cannot accept the proposition that there can be varying degrees of violation and defilement. Such a concept appears to derive from the offensive notion that a man should in certain circumstances be entitled to raise his prior relationship with the victim as some kind of limited excuse for disregarding the absence of consent to an act of intercourse with him to which activity the victim had historically consented."

> As I have indicated, Mr Bussey's submissions implicitly rely upon the proposition that the offence of which he was found guilty could have been more serious. The fact that one can imagine the commission of more serious offences of this type is not controversial. It does not, however, mean that the sentence imposed by his Honour for the offence committed by Mr Bussey should somehow be assessed by reference to that fact. It certainly does not mean that the objective seriousness of Count 3 is diminished or reduced because Mr Bussey and RM had previously been in a consensual sexual relationship. Once it is accepted that no means no, that should be the end of the matter."

Director of Public Prosecutions v P [2007] TASSC 51 (26 June 2007) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Crawford J at [16]: Rape amounts to 'a crime of violence, domination and degradation and it usually causes great psychological trauma to the victim. It requires a substantial sentence of imprisonment in most cases'.

Evan J at [23] 'For my part it is significant that the respondent's criminal conduct cannot be categorised as an impetuous response to the break-up of his relationship with the complainant and a manifestation of his love for her. His conduct over the period of in excess of an hour after she first asked him to leave bears all the hallmarks of an assertion of physical and sexual dominion over the complainant.'

R v Mason [2001] VSCA 62 (2 May 2001) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Winneke P at [7]-[8]: 'A rape committed in the context, and against the background, of a previous settled relationship may in certain circumstances be a factor which a court can take into account in mitigation where it can be seen that the impact upon the victim has, for that reason, been less traumatic than otherwise it might have been. But, equally, it is not difficult to imagine a rape, committed by a man who has been in a previous relationship with his victim, which would be every bit as frightening as a rape committed by a stranger. The one thing which the authorities to which this Court has been referred demonstrate is that the crime of rape, whatever the circumstances, and upon whomsoever committed, is regarded by the courts as a grave insult to its victim and a crime which can rarely give rise to a non-custodial sentence.

It should not be forgotten that the crime of rape is an intensely personal crime which, for sentencing purposes, cannot be divorced from its effects on the victim. But the effects include not only those which flow from the physical invasion of the victim's person and security, but also those which flow from the violation of the more intangible intellectual properties of the victim's rights and freedoms. In a society in which there is an increasing number of couples becoming estranged, the courts have a heightened obligation to deter those who have previously lived in a stable relationship with a wife or partner from regarding such wife or partner as akin to a chattel devoid of rights or freedoms, and as an object readily available for their sexual gratification'.

R v Bastan; DPP v Bastan* [2009] VSCA 157 (4 August 2009) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The complainant's marriage was arranged by her parents. The applicant became aggressive and she fled to a women's refuge. They were divorced. The applicant masqueraded as another man to the complainant and, once he gained entry to her home, he raped her.

Buchanan JA at [36]: 'I consider that the sentence would generally be regarded as inadequate if imposed upon an offender who tricked his way into the house of a stranger and raped her. The fact that the applicant and the complainant, in the past, had shared a consensual sexual relationship may have played a part in producing this sentence. In my opinion it should have played no part save insofar as those who have been in a relationship should be deterred from asserting any right or power in a like fashion against their former partners. This rape constituted an act of dominion by the applicant over the complainant's body, which is not to be tolerated. In my opinion, the sentence, and in particular the non-parole period, was manifestly inadequate and represents an error that warrants interference by this Court'.

NPA v The State of Western Australia [2018] WASCA 131 (2 August 2018) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

Judgment of the Court [7]: 'We respectfully endorse and adopt the following comments of the sentencing judge:

Now, when it comes to sentencing you in a case like this, it's self evident that sexual offending is extremely serious, invading as it does, the victim's personal, sexual rights. Such offending is a gross violation of a person's sexual rights and that's so whether or not you've been in a relationship with the victim.

[The complainant] had been in this relationship with you. She was not your chattel; she was not your thing that you could do with whatever you pleased. She was not available to provide you with sexual favours at your choosing. She has her rights. Those rights include her right to say no.

Now, this is not just a personal right, it's deeper than that, it's her sexual integrity which you violated. She was entitled to refuse you. When she sought to exercise her rights, you overcame her physically in order to penetrate her.

Then, in terms of your offending in February 2015, [the complainant] and her parents were entitled to feel safe in their home. [The complainant] was entitled to feel that she was in her castle and that she would be safe in that castle. She was entitled to remain there without, in any way, being under threat from you to harm her.'

Economic and financial abuse

Studies of domestic and family violence often identify economic abuse as part of a pattern of behaviours [Cortis & Bullen 2015] used by perpetrators to exert control over the victim [Adams et al 2008], sometimes referred to as coercive control. Economic abuse is also known as financial abuse.

Such abuse may include behaviours that exclude the victim from decisions about finances that affect the victim. It may also include controlling the victim's access to finances and income. For example victims may be refused access to, or information about, bank accounts. Access to finances may be a particular concern in cases where the victim has no access to income, for example where a victim is on a visa requiring the perpetrator to provide financial support [Sanders 2007]. Lack of financial independence is reported as a primary reason victims do not leave abusive relationships [Kim & Gray 2008].

Sometimes perpetrators may exploit the victim's finances or coerce the victim to take on debt. Examples include perpetrators taking out credit cards in the victim's name without the victim's knowledge, coercing the victim to sign a contract for the provision of finance, a loan or credit, coercing the victim to sign assets over to the perpetrator or to enable access to line of credit (for example associated with a mortgage [Littwin 2012]).

Behaviours that sabotage the victim's employment may also constitute economic abuse. Such behaviours may result in victims losing their job or being unable to apply for employment. For example the perpetrator may prevent the victim from leaving the house for work or job interviews, or may harass the victim at the workplace resulting in their employment being terminated or hours reduced [Fawole 2008].

Economic abuse may involve coercive behaviours associated with the giving or receiving of dowry at any time before, during or after the marriage. For example, demands for larger gifts or increased cash payments from a victim and their family. A number of individuals can be involved in perpetrating dowry abuse, including in-laws, former spouses and fiancés, and other family members and friends [United Nations 2009].

Economic abuse may jeopardise a victim's economic self-sufficiency resulting in a diminished ability to parent, access healthcare and education, generally to act independently or to leave the relationship [Fawole 2008]. In some cases where victims of economic abuse do leave the relationship they may continue to be legally responsible for long-term debt and loss of assets incurred as a result of the perpetrator's economically abusive behaviours, which may significantly limit the victim's financial security and future opportunities. For example, some victims report paying off a car loan for many years after leaving the relationship, for a car they have never driven.

Research also demonstrates the systemic continuation of economic abuse post-separation through the courts and government agencies. This may include the ongoing engagement of the victim in legal proceedings so as to prolong the burden and impact of legal costs, for example by undermining the victim's ability to work; or masking income and hiding assets to avoid paying child support [Cameron 2014]. Exemptions enabling victims to opt out of the child support scheme where applying for child support would compromise their safety may have the effect of perpetuating this abuse and further financially disadvantaging low-income victims on welfare [Patrick et al 2008].

Economic abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Economic and financial abuse - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission, 'Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws – Improving Legal Frameworks' (ALRC Report 117, 2012).Australian National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (2022) Economic security and intimate partner violence: Research synthesis. ANROWS.

This synthesis focuses on the nexus of women's safety and women's economic security, and the harms of financial and economic abuse. Primarily, the paper synthesises ANROWS research addressing the relationship between economic security and intimate partner violence. The research considered emphasizes the following points:

- Intimate partner violence has a negative economic impact on victims and survivors
- Women's economic equality and workforce participation are essential components of women's economic security – and their safety
- Women's economic dependence on perpetrators is a significant barrier to leaving
- Economic abuse is often used as a tactic of control and to create fear
- The social security system can affect women's ability to leave violent relationships

Cameron, Prue, 'Relationship Problems and Money: Women Talk about Financial Abuse' (Research Report, Wire Women's Information, 2014).

This research draws on interviews, focus groups and surveys involving more than 200 women. Section four (from p31) focusses on the systemic continuation of financial abuse post-separation and explores abuse perpetrated through the legal system (including tactics of furthering abuse; the emotional cost of legal proceedings; the financial impact of legal costs; vexatious litigation), and Child Support (eg: partner's hiding assets etc to avoid paying child support).

The authors find that a common theme in the women's stories is that on-going engagement with their former partner through the courts, the Child Support Agency and Centrelink, continues, and in some cases facilitates, the pattern of financial abuse for years after the marriage ends (p31). Tactics identified by study participants included: running up legal costs; hiring aggressive, bullying lawyers; using the legal system to 'destroy' their ex-partners; legal proceedings undermining women's ability to work; refusing to comply with parenting orders; contesting parenting orders and masking their income to avoid child support.

Cortis, Natasha, and Jane Bullen, Building Effective Policies and Services to Promote Women's Economic Security Following Domestic Violence: State of Knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This report outlines the state of knowledge about the economic tactics and financial impact of domestic violence, and ways to promote women's economic security during and following violence. Pages 6-8 outline forms of economic abuse experienced in the context of domestic abuse and consider the prevalence and effect of economic abuse. Economic abuse can include, for example, preventing or interfering with women's participation in education, training or employment; with their acquisition or use of economic resources; refusing to contribute to economic resources; or generating economic costs for women (p 1). It is estimated that financial abuse is perpetrated in around 80 percent of abusive relationships (p 7). Violence can also undermine compliance with welfare or employment services, or can act as a barrier to child support (p 2). The report notes that even when tactics of economic abuse are not employed by abusers, domestic and family violence still has economic impacts and results in financial disadvantage: "This disadvantage is experienced in different ways by women in different circumstances. It influences when and how women can avoid or escape violence, and how they can participate in employment and society during and following violence, ultimately undermining women's independence and wellbeing over the life course" (p 1). As a consequence of violence, victim/survivors may have difficulties sustaining education, job searches, or employment.

Cortis, Natasha and Jane Bullen, Domestic violence and women's economic security: Building Australia's capacity for prevention and redress: Final report (ANROWS, 2016).

In Australia, it is estimated that financial abuse has been a tactic reported by among 80-90 percent of women who seek support for domestic and family violence (p 11). This report found in interviews with service providers that financial issues are a major factor in a woman's decision to stay in or leave a violent relationship (p 48).

This research report builds on the literature review contained in Building effective policies and services to promote women's economic security following domestic violence: State of knowledge paper (Cortis and Bullen, 2015). The statistical material reported here reinforces how domestic violence contributes to high levels of financial stress among Australian women. Domestic violence is associated with economic stressors which penalise women for a number of years after violence is experienced (p 6). It found that although women affected by violence had similar average incomes to those not affected by violence, and were no more or less likely to participate in paid work, women affected by violence fared much worse on indicators of financial hardship or stress (for example, having more difficulty paying bills, carrying higher average levels of debt, or being more likely to go without food) (p 7).The paper provides several broad system goals for addressing the economic harm associated with violence, including improving system capacity to redress economic harms; that is, to remedy the injustices women experience where loss of resources results from violence (p 8). Some strategies include improving community understanding of the economic issues arising from violence; improving access to child support settlements, and preventing economic loss while waiting for court settlements (p 8).

Kristin Natalier, 'State Facilitated Economic Abuse: A Structural Analysis of Men Deliberately Withholding Child Support' (2018) 26 Feminist Legal Studies 121-140.

Economic abuse is a widespread and damaging aspect of intimate partner violence (IPV). Although research has mainly addressed cohabiting couples, women's long-term experiences after separation are seldom explored, and researchers have not developed a gendered analysis of child support-related economic abuse. Interviews with 37 single mothers were conducted to determine how men's deliberate withholding of child support can constitute economic abuse, which may be facilitated through gendered State processes and institutions that order child support transfers. The author argues that the State may facilitate gendered abuse through the design and implementation of the Australian Child Support Program (CSP). Child support-related economic abuse is not the result of a failed system. Instead, it reflects the role of the CSP as regulating, rather than preventing, economic abuse. Findings showed that women participants understood that the withholding of child support by their former partners was a means to control their acquisition and use of money, and undermined their economic security and autonomy. On this basis, women experienced their former partner's behaviours as post-separation economic abuse which, in turn, was normalised and intensified through the CSP policy.

Kutin, Jozica, Roslyn Russell and Mike Reid, 'Economic abuse between intimate partners in Australia: prevalence, health status, disability and financial stress' [2017] Australian and New Zealand Journal of Public Health 1.

'This study determined the lifetime prevalence of economic abuse in Australia by age and gender, and the associated risk factors. The lifetime prevalence of economic abuse in the whole sample was 11.5%. Women in all age groups were more likely to experience economic abuse (15.7%) compared to men (7.1%). Disability, health and financial stress status were significant markers of economic abuse. Conclusions: For women, financial stress and disability were important markers of economic abuse. However, prevalence rates were influenced by the measures used and victims' awareness of the abuse, which presents a challenge for screening and monitoring'. The authors state that the implications of these findings for public health were that 'social, health and financial services need to be aware of and screen for the warning signs of this largely hidden form of domestic violence' (p.1).

Patrick, Rebecca, Kay Cook and Hayley McKenzie, 'Domestic Violence and the Exemption from Seeking Child Support: Providing Safety or Legitimizing Ongoing Poverty and Fear' (2008) 42(7) Social Policy and Administration 749.

This article examines the experience of low-income women on welfare in Australia and the process of seeking child support from a violent ex-partner. It analyses how the current system around exemptions for child support in the context of domestic violence 'fails to protect women from ongoing abuse while at the same time rendering them financially disadvantaged' (p759).

Segrave, M 2017, Temporary Migration and Family Violence: An analysis of victimisation, vulnerability and support. Melbourne: School of Social Sciences, Monash University.

This report draws on detailed cases of 300 women who sought the support service of InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence over 2015–16. The report draws attention to cases involving abuse related to dowry issues (see p29, 65). It considers limitations of the legal response to this issue.

In one reported case: 'Cultural influences on nature of marriage meant that once she returned to India as a result of the abuse she could not go back to her parents as a married woman cannot do that. The victimsurvivor's family was required to pay a significant dowry for the victim-survivor when she married the perpetrator, and after she returned to India her father convinced her to come back to Australia to stay in the marriage regardless of the circumstances' (p29). In another case: 'The victim-survivor reported in the [intervention order] application that when she arrived all the money and jewellery she was given was taken by the perpetrator and his family, and they were pressuring her to get a dowry for them. She was physically, emotionally and financially abused, and was made to do all the housework, heavy lifting and cooking even whilst pregnant. The victim-survivor had a miscarriage due to the abuse from the perpetrators. When the victim-survivor's cousin came to check in on her the victim-survivor was locked in a room by the perpetrators and [they] threatened to make her disappear if she spoke to her cousin.' (p65)

Singh, S 2018, 'The daughter-in-law questions remittances: changes in the gender of remittances among Indian migrants to Australia", Global Networks, pp. 1-21.

This article presents a cross-generational analysis of the gendered meanings and politics surrounding monetary remittances. Indian female migrants to Australia, who contribute significantly to household incomes, have recently started to question the sources and directions of remittances. This happens when the woman's earnings are sent, without consultation, to the husband's parents for luxuries, while the family in Australia is struggling. Women in paid work also want to send their earnings to their own parents, particularly if there is financial need. Remittances have become a testing ground for the traditional belief that the husband and his family own the money in the patrilineal marital household. It is possible to interpret male control of remittances without consultation as a form of financial abuse of the wife in the sending household. The article draws on two qualitative studies on five decades of Indian migration to Australia covering 203 people from 112 families.

Adams, A.E., Littwin, A.K., & Javorka, M., 'The Frequency, Nature, and Effects of Coerced Debt Among a National Sample of Women Seeking Help for Intimate Partner Violence' (2019) Violence Against Women 1-19.

The study examined the frequency, nature and effects of non-consensual, credit-related transactions where one partner in an intimate relationship uses coercive control to dominate the other. Coercive control allows abusers to incur debt in their partners' names. An abuser uses coercive control to create an environment which renders refusing a demand or questioning behavior dangerous. The study used a sample of 1,823 female callers to the National Domestic Violence Hotline over an 8-week period. Results showed that coerced debt, from both coercive and fraudulent transactions, is a common problem and is associated with control over financial information, credit damage, and financial dependence on the abuser. This study reaffirms the need for policy reform and victim services that address coerced debt, therefore mitigating a potentially significant economic barrier to safety.

Adams, Adrienne E, et al, 'Development of the Scale of Economic Abuse' (2008) 14(5) Violence Against Women 563.

This study recognizes that economic abuse is part of the pattern of behaviors used by batterers to maintain power and control over their partners; it describes the development of the Scale of Economic Abuse. The article reports on interviews conducted with 103 survivors of domestic abuse who responded to measures of economic, physical, and psychological abuse as well as economic hardship. This article includes an analysis of specific forms of economic abuse, and the effect this has on women.

Fawole, Olufunmilayo, 'Economic Violence to Women and Girls: Is It Receiving the Necessary Attention?' (2008) 9(3) Trauma Violence Abuse 167.

This article presents a very good, basic overview of economic abuse, though from an International perspective. It considers 'e*conomic violence' as including limited access to funds and credit; controlling access to health care, employment, education, including agricultural resources; exclusion from financial decision making; and discriminatory traditional laws on inheritance, property rights, and use of communal land.*

Kim, Jinseok, and Karen A Gray, 'Leave or Stay? Battered Women's Decision after Intimate Partner Violence' (2008) 23(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1465.

This article explains and establishes through empirical research how, amongst other things, a lack of financial independence is a primary reason women do not leave abusive relationships.

Littwin, Angela, 'Coerced Debt: The Role of Consumer Credit in Domestic Violence' (2012) 100 California Law Review 951.

This article explains the concept of 'coerced debt' - it ranges from abusers taking out credit cards in their partners' names without their knowledge, to forcing victims to obtain loans for the abuser, to tricking victims into signing 'quit claim' deeds for the family home. It presents empirical data on the nature and scope of coerced debt in the US, and explains how abusive partners use the complex consumer credit system to leave many victims of domestic violence with hundreds or thousands of dollars of coerced debt.

Pollet, Susan, 'Economic Abuse: The Unseen Side of Domestic Violence' (2011) 83(2) New York State Bar Association Journal 40.

The article focuses on economic abuse as a form of domestic violence perpetrated against women, commonly, by their intimate partners or ex-partners. It defines economic abuse as controlling financial resources and access to money and prohibiting attendance at school or office with the objective of making an individual (the victim) financially dependent. It also provides the results of a study conducted by the National Coalition against Domestic Violence to examine means of addressing economic abuse, including financial literacy programs for victims.

Postmus, Judy L, et al, 'Economic Abuse as an Invisible Form of Domestic Violence: A Multicountry Review' (2018) Trauma, Violence & Abuse (onlinefirst).

Accounts of physical abuse often dominate perceptions of intimate partner violence (IPV); however, economic abuse is a frequently hidden form of abuse (p 1). This article reviews the global literature on economic abuse to determine how it is defined, and what measures may be used to capture its prevalence (p 3).

Definitions of economic abuse often focused on economic control, including behaviours such as 'restricting access to finances, refusing to contribute financially for necessities or other items, restricting access to financial information or involvement with financial decision-making, and controlling the household spending' (p 5). Economic exploitation includes behaviours such as 'misusing family finances; damaging property; stealing property, money, or identities; going into debt through coercion or in secret; kicking the victim out of the living situation; using wealth as a weapon or as a threat; selling necessary household or personal items; restricting access to health care or insurance; and denying or restricting access to transportation' (p 5).

The results indicate that consistency of terminology is increasing, but that further research is needed to deepen this understanding, particularly relating to how language and culture may impact understandings of economic abuse (p 17).

Postmus, Judy L, et al, 'Understanding Economic Abuse in the Lives of Survivors' (2011) 27(3) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 411.

This paper furthers knowledge about economic abuse and its relationship with economic self-sufficiency. It presents results from an interview study with victims of domestic violence and identified high levels of economic abuse and that economic abuse is often linked to a decrease in economic self-sufficiency.

Sanders, Cynthia K, 'Domestic Violence, Economic Abuse and Implications of a Program for Building Economic Resources for Low-Income Women: Findings from Interviews with Participants in a Women's Economic Action Program'(Research Report, Center for Social Development, Washington University in St. Louis, April 2007).

This research considers how economic abuse may trap people in abusive relationships. Additionally, it explores how abused women are commonly isolated from financial resources and lack ready access to cash, checking accounts, or charge accounts. See especially pp30-43 for an analysis of how money and economic issues played a role in women's experiences of abuse.

Shoener, Sara, and Erika Sussman, 'Economic Ripple Effect of IPV: Building Partnerships for Systemic Change' (2013) 18(6) Domestic Violence Report 83.

The article discusses the reciprocal relationship between intimate partner violence (IPV) and the economic instability created by batterers for their partners through economic sabotage and control. It identifies the dimensions of economic harms experienced by survivors of violence and recommends programmatic responses that address the depth of these harms. It explains the potential of consumer law and other economic legal remedies in providing survivors with tools to address economic abuse.

United Nations, 2009, Good practices in legislation on "harmful practices" against women, United Nations Division for the Advancement of Women and United Nations Economic Commission for Africa.

See 3.3.4 Dowry-related violence and harassment. 'Demands for dowry can result in women being harassed, harmed or killed, including women being burned to death, and in deaths of women which are labelled as suicides. It is necessary for dowry to be defined as broadly as possible to capture the full range of exchanges given, or asked for, in the name of dowry.' This paper recommends legislation should 'define dowry-related violence or harassment as any act of violence or harassment associated with the giving or receiving of dowry at any time before, during or after the marriage.' WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

This Bench Book notes the definition of domestic violence used by the Department of Child Protection and Family Support which includes: "…Financial violence includes not giving a woman access to her share of the family's resources, expecting her to manage the household on an impossibly low amount of money and/or criticising and blaming her when she is unable to, monitoring her spending, and incurring debts in her name." (at [13.2.3]). It also notes that women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds may experience dowry abuse, which "may be a coercive demand for larger gifts or more cash from a woman and her family, which may be accompanied by other forms of violence including emotional or economic abuse, stalking or harassment. It may also include mutilation, sexual assault, acid throwing, wife burning, murder, threats to cancel visa sponsorship, threats to annul a marriage, abandonment and demands to terminate a pregnancy (at [13.2.3]).

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Economic and financial abuse is referred to throughout this Bench Book. The interconnection of financial abuse with other behaviours is noted in Section 9.3.1.2, while the act of perpetrators refusing to honour financial and cost obligations is discussed at length in Section 7.4.6. For instance, '[v]iolators avoid compliance with financial obligations as a means to continue to control and harass. Yet financial abuse is as much abuse of any dependent child as it is abuse of the targeted parent … Timely disclosure and payment of support and marital property obligations can help to prevent pressure, as a result of lack of resources, to return to violent homes. Support and property division orders become critically important when custodial parents are in the process of immigrating, since economic self-sufficiency can be an important factor in allowing such persons to remain in Canada'. A number of responses to violators who engage in this form of abuse are also identified in this section. Reference 3.

This policy brief “seeks to further the limited research, policy, and practice on substance use coercion and to increase awareness about this issue among relevant stakeholders.”

Extract:

WHAT IS SUBSTANCE USE COERCION?

Substance use coercion occurs when perpetrators of intimate partner violence undermine and control their partners through substance-use related tactics and actively keep them from meeting treatment and recovery goals.

WHAT ARE EXAMPLES OF SUBSTANCE USE COERCION?

Substance use coercion can take many forms. For example, an abuser may:

- Force, initiate, or pressure their partner to use substances.
- Sabotage their partner's recovery efforts by deliberately keeping substances around their home.
- Refuse to provide their partner with childcare or transportation needed to participate in substance use treatment.

HOW COMMON IS SUBSTANCE USE COERCION?

A survey of National Domestic Violence Hotline callers who had experienced domestic violence revealed that 43 percent of respondents had experienced at least one of three types of substance use coercion:

- Had a partner pressure or force them to use substances;
- Had a partner threaten to report their substance use to the authorities to keep them from getting something they wanted or needed; and/or
- Were afraid to call the police because a partner said they would not be believed or they would be arrested based on substance use.

Economic and financial abuse - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Garrod & Davenort [2018] FamCA 825 (12 October 2018) – Family Court of Australia

Bennet J observed:

[376] On the fourth day of trial, the father owed child support in the amount of $1,865.31. I asked how the father was supporting the mother's day to day care of the child. Whilst not provided in evidence in the witness box, in an exchange in the court room, the father looked at the mother and asserted she could afford to pay for nails, a new watch, clothes and her hair to be done and that "she's doing alright" and it was not terribly significant that he was not paying child support. It was an illuminating comment by the father who had clearly observed the mother's presentation closely. The mother explained, I think through her counsel, that her suit was second hand and her watch had been her mother's watch. It discloses a high degree of jealousy and resentment by the father toward the mother. The particularity of his observations and details, including recognising that the mother was not wearing her usual watch, is curious after a separation of almost six years.

[377] The father has always been keen to spend time and communicate with the child. He has not been able to control his antipathy to the mother to the extent necessary to make decisions jointly with her about the child's long term welfare. Fortunately there has not been any long term decisions to make. The father's discharge of his financial obligations to maintain the child has been poor. My impression is that he considers child support to be a benefit to the mother rather than the child and he does not want to enhance the mother's ability to provide for the child.

Nguyen v R [2021] NSWCCA 118 (18 June 2021) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Among other charges the offender was convicted of dishonestly obtain financial advantage. Using the complainant's laptop, he accessed the complainant's Australian Taxation Office account and lodged an income tax return in the name of the complainant and without her consent. As a result, the ATO transferred money into the offender's account.

In considering sentencing the offender Walton J noted:

[37] His Honour also found that, irrespective of the motive, the effect of the offending was indirectly to inflict further pain upon the complainant “being financial anxiety and distress to her at a time when the offender was aware of her recovering from giving birth and being attuned to the needs of the newly-born child”. The fact that the fraud was relatively unsophisticated and would have inevitably been detected did not significantly reduce the weight which would be given to the offences because the objective seriousness of the offending overall involved multiple victims. The objective seriousness of the offending should be classified below the mid-range of offending for offences of that kind.

RWT v BZX [2016] QDC 246 (30 September 2016) – Queensland District Court

Devereaux SC DCJ at [18] and [26]: ‘The evidence of the respondent’s friend, although about an incident which occurred in 2012, after a separation of the appellant and respondent, confirmed the respondent’s evidence about financial abuse. The friend deposed that the appellant told her, on the telephone, that the respondent must put her redundancy payment into the joint account and must not hold separate accounts, or she would not be able to return to the family.

‘In my view, as I mentioned during submissions, the fact that property settlements in family law matters are still contentious and, indeed, the mother still isn’t even getting face-to-face contact with her own child at the moment, there is every opportunity for the husband to continue his bullying behaviour to try and manipulate the wife into caving in to his demands about the child, about financial affairs, and anything else that he might have a penchant to do in his bullying behaviour. She is absolutely in need of protection. He needs to be kept well away from her’.

R v Ritter [2016] SASCFC 88 (16 August 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court (Full Court)

Parker J (Lovell and Nicholson JJ concurring) described the coercive control which the appellant subjected the victim to:

[20] The appellant monitored the victim’s movements and rarely let her leave the house without him. He also controlled her finances, regularly forcing her to withdraw money from her account for his benefit, including so that he could buy drugs and alcohol.

Ahmed and Gupta* [2020] FCWA 140 (31 August 2020) – Family Court of Western Australia

Duncanson J noted:

[102] I am unable to make a finding about each and every incident of alleged family violence. Upon the evidence however, I am satisfied that the mother has been the victim of family violence as defined in s 4AB(1) of the Act, perpetrated by the father. I accept that the father controlled and coerced the mother. I accept that he controlled her financially and isolated her from others. I accept the mother's evidence that on 5 April 2017 the father and Mr B abused her causing her to leave the home with Child A. I am satisfied that the father's behaviour towards the mother caused her to be fearful of him.

Emotional and psychological abuse

Australian and international studies demonstrate the prevalence of emotional and psychological abuse as a form of domestic and family violence that may be part of a broader and complex pattern of abusive behaviours experienced by a victim which may be understood as coercive control.

Emotional or psychological abuse may include verbal, non-verbal or physical acts [Bagshaw et al 2000] by the perpetrator that are intended to exercise dominance, control or coercion over the victim; degrade the victim's emotional or cognitive abilities or sense of self-worth; or induce feelings of fear and intimidation in the victim.

Verbal attacks by the perpetrator may involve jealous control, ridicule, put-downs, name calling and humiliation, and may be focused on the victim's intelligence, sexuality, appearance, capacity as a parent or intimate partner, and unfavourable comparisons with others. For example in a criminal case the male perpetrator's abuse of his female intimate partner included: 'insisting that she sleep outside the house, and without access to amenities such as a toilet; insisting that the children refer to her by demeaning names such as "slut", "whore", "moll", and not "mother", or "mum"; insisting the children not show affection for her; and generally treating her in a humiliating and abusive manner, including attempting to persuade her to engage in a sexual act with a dog.'

Non-verbal and physical acts of emotional or psychological abuse by the perpetrator may also involve:

- stalking or harassing the victim in or around the workplace
- threatening to divorce or abandon the victim, or to have an affair if the victim fails to comply with the perpetrator's demands
- threatening to commit suicide if the victim ends or leaves the relationship
- restricting the victim's contact with family, friends and pets; access to a car or finances; or choice of clothing
- monitoring the victim's whereabouts
- threatening to harm or kill the victim, the children or other family members or pets
- threatening to or actually damaging or destroying the victim's personal property
- associated menacing or intimidatory behaviours or gestures directed repeatedly and strategically at the victim including angry verbal outbursts, staring, silence, ignoring and withdrawal of affection.

Research indicates that threats of physical violence, restrictions on the victim's freedoms and damage to the victim's personal property are strong predictors of actual violence causing severe injury or death [Mouzos & Makkai 2004].

Past perceptions of emotional or psychological abuse as having fewer, less severe and more transient consequences than physical violence have been superseded by a growing understanding of its impacts on victims including increased rates of serious or chronic illness, disability or impairment, post-traumatic stress disorder, depression, misuse of alcohol and drugs, dysfunctional parenting and long-term low self-esteem [Sackett & Saunders 1999].

In many cases victims describe the cumulative daily emotional or psychological abuse as having a more debilitating effect on their self-esteem and ability to cope with their situation than the physical violence they have also experienced. Victims also report that threats of violence can be as effective as actual violence for the control they exercise and fear they induce, often preventing the victim from leaving the abusive relationship [Follingstad et al 1990].

Emotional and psychological abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women aged 18 years and over about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

- 'Almost one in four women (23% or 2.2 million) experienced emotional abuse by a current and/or previous partner since the age of 15, compared to just over one in six men (16% or 1.4 million)';
- 6.1% of women (575, 400) reported experiencing emotional abuse by a current partner', and 18% of women (1.7 million) reported experiencing emotional abuse by a previous partner;
- 5.2% of men (473,600) reported experiencing emotional abuse by a current partner', and 12% of men (1 million) reported experiencing emotional abuse by a previous partner.

Refer to Table 27 for more detail.

Bagshaw, Dale, et al, 'Reshaping Responses to Domestic Violence' (Final Report, University of South Australia and Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, April 2000).

This Australian research used a variety of methods including an anonymous 'phone-in' and focus groups. 102 women who were victims/survivors of domestic violence participated in the phone-in. Emotional abuse was reported by 84 per cent of callers. Emotional abuse included a partner's constant comparisons with other women and how this impacted on victims' self-esteem and self-worth. Another form of emotional abuse used by both women and men was emotional withdrawal, such as long periods of silence, which could continue for weeks, sporadic 'sulking' and withdrawal of any interest and engagement with the partner (p22). 89% of callers had experienced verbal abuse. This abuse focused on women's intelligence, sexuality, body image and capacity as a parent and a wife. Women were commonly referred to as 'stupid'. Women often said they were labelled as ‘sluts’, ‘whores’ etc. Perpetrators were critical of women’s appearance, generally referring to them as ‘fat’ and ‘ugly’. Women were often compared unfavourably to other women. Mothers were often blamed for their children’s behaviour – it was considered to be the result of poor and inadequate parenting for which perpetrators did not take any responsibility (p22). Many callers reported that emotional abuse was often a daily event and that it had long-lasting and negative impacts.

Heather Douglas, Bridget Harris and Molly Dragiewicz, ‘Technology-Facilitated Domestic and Family Violence: Women’s Experiences’ (2018) British Journal of Criminology.

The development of technology in recent years has significantly affected women’s experiences of, and responses to, domestic violence. Devices and software, such as smartphones, cameras, Internet-connected devices, computers and platforms such as Facebook, may be used not only by perpetrators to facilitate domestic and family violence (DFV), but also by survivors and their allies to attain empowerment, and seek and share information and support. The article analyses qualitative research that outlined survivors’ experiences of technology-facilitated DFV. It draws on interviews with 65 women on up to three occasions between 2014 and 2017. At the first interview, 55 participants identified technology-facilitated abuse as part of the DFV they experienced. This result was echoed in the following two interviews. Many participants provided examples of technology being used by perpetrators to isolate, stalk and emotionally abuse them. The frequency and nature of abusive behaviours described by the women provided important contextual data to inform future research into technology-facilitated violence and abuse.

Karystianis, G., Adily, A., Schofield, P.W., et. al., ‘Automated Analysis of Domestic Violence Police Reports to Explore Abuse Types and Victim Injuries: Text Mining Study’ (2019) 21(3) Journal of Medical Internet Research.

The recording of domestic violence-related events by police is an area that requires further investigation. The study aimed to determine if an automated text mining method could identify abuse types and injuries sustained by domestic violence victims. Using data mining to evaluate 492,393 Australian domestic violence police reports, more than one-third noted victim injuries. The most common abuse type was emotional/verbal at 33.46%, followed by punching at 24.58%, and property damage at 22.27%. Bruising was the most common form of injury (29.03%), followed by cut/abrasion (28.93%), and red marks/signs (23.71%). The findings show that text mining can automatically extract information from police-recorded domestic violence events. These findings can be used to support further public health research the purpose of which is to assess the profiling of persons of interest involved in domestic violence events, and to change existing intervention policies for abuse victims.

Mouzos, Jenny, and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey, and provided information on their experiences of physical and sexual violence. In this paper the authors identify that emotionally abusive and controlling behaviours includes behaviours of a current or former intimate partner jealously guarding the woman's interactions with other males, limiting her access to family and friends, and damaging or destroying her property or possessions (pxv). Based on data gathered in the IVAWS survey around 30% of women reported that their current intimate partner called them names, insulted them or 'put them down' (p49).

Patricia Easteal, Lorana Bartels and Reeva Mittal, 'The Importance of Understanding the Victims' 'Reality' of Domestic Violence' (2018) Alternative Law Journal.

The authors argue that unconscious assumptions may filter out the diverse experiences and 'realities' of domestic violence victims. This is particularly evident in the differences between the court's perceptions of domestic violence, and the victim's experiences of it. Despite legal and policy reform, these assumptions may continue to affect how relevant legislation is applied and interpreted. The authors consider a small sample of recent Queensland domestic violence order breach cases to underscore the systemic failure in recognising the seriousness and harm of psychological or mental abuses (i.e. the victims' 'reality' of domestic violence), and the lack of understanding of the long-term effects of domestic violence on its victims. The authors conclude that sentencing for domestic violence offences and breaches of protection orders should be underpinned by knowledge of the long-term effects of emotional abuse. Further, an analysis of Queensland cases indicates that the Benchbook is not always applied consistently. Consequently, the authors suggest the creation of a report that particularises the specific issues in each individual case in order to enhance the knowledge of judicial officers and other stakeholders, and to adjust their lenses so they can better understand the victim's perspective.

Adams, A.E., Littwin, A.K., & Javorka, M., 'The Frequency, Nature, and Effects of Coerced Debt Among a National Sample of Women Seeking Help for Intimate Partner Violence' (2019) Violence Against Women 1-19.

The study examined the frequency, nature and effects of non-consensual, credit-related transactions where one partner in an intimate relationship uses coercive control to dominate the other. Coercive control allows abusers to incur debt in their partners' names. An abuser uses coercive control to create an environment which renders refusing a demand or questioning behavior dangerous. The study used a sample of 1,823 female callers to the National Domestic Violence Hotline over an 8-week period. Results showed that coerced debt, from both coercive and fraudulent transactions, is a common problem and is associated with control over financial information, credit damage, and financial dependence on the abuser. This study reaffirms the need for policy reform and victim services that address coerced debt, therefore mitigating a potentially significant economic barrier to safety.

Follingstad, Diane, et al, 'The Role of Emotional Abuse in Physically Abusive Relationships' (1990) 5(2) Journal of Family Violence 107.

This article is one of the earliest articles to focus on emotional abuse and provides a good overview of the literature available in 1990. This article also reports on the results of a study involving 234 women being interviewed to assess the relationship of emotional abuse to physical abuse. Six major types of emotional abuse were identified: threats of abuse, ridicule, jealousy, threats to change the marriage, restriction of freedom and damage to property. 99% of interviewees experienced psychological or emotional abuse. Analyses determined that ridicule was the type of emotional abuse that the highest percentage of participants reported as the most negative form of emotional abuse (p117). The authors speculate that this may be because ridicule is a form of emotional abuse that 'attacks women's sense of self-esteem and destroys their ability to feel good about themselves'. 72% of the women in the study reported that emotional abuse had a more severe impact on them than physical abuse (regardless of the level of physical abuse reported) (p114).

Women reporting that emotional abuse had a more severe impact were more likely to believe that threats would be carried out (p115).

National Judges Association, Domestic Violence and the Courtroom: Knowing the Issues… Understanding the Victim (n.d.).

This resource provides practical guidance for judges in engaging with victims of domestic violence in the courtroom, including information on the various forms of emotional abuse. 'Gaslighting' is one such form of emotional abuse, in which the perpetrator undermines the victim's feelings and memories, which distorts the victim's perception of reality, and 'destroys the possibility of honest communication' (p 5). This behaviour also increases feelings of confusion and insecurity in the victim (p 5).

Sackett, Leslie A, and Daniel G Saunders, 'The Impact of Different Forms of Psychological Abuse on Battered Women' (1999) 14(1) Violence and Victims 105.

Battered women receiving either shelter (n = 30) or non-shelter services (n = 30) from a domestic violence agency were interviewed regarding psychological abuse and its aftermath. Four types of abuse were derived: ridiculing of traits, criticising behaviour, ignoring, and jealous control. Sheltered women experienced ridicule and jealous control more often than non-sheltered women. For the entire sample, ridiculing of traits was rated as the most severe form. Ignoring was the strongest predictor of low self-esteem. Both psychological abuse and physical abuse contributed independently to depression and low self-esteem. However, fear of being abused was uniquely predicted by psychological abuse.

Sweet, Paige, 'The Sociology of Gaslighting' (2019) 84(5) American Sociological Review 851-875

Gaslighting is a form of 'psychological abuse aimed at making victims feel crazy, creating a surreal interpersonal environment'. Despite its increasing recognition as an abusive power tactic, it has largely been ignored by sociologists. This article proposes that gaslighting is primarily a sociological, rather than psychological, phenomenon. It should be understood as stemming from social inequalities, including gender, and being performed in 'power-laden intimate relationships'. This article argues that 'gaslighting is consequential when perpetrators mobilise gender-based stereotypes and structural and institutional inequalities against victims to manipulate their realities'. Through an analysis of domestic violence as a strategic case study, the author shows how abusers mobilise gendered stereotypes; structural vulnerabilities related to race, nationality, and sexuality; and institutional inequalities against victims to erode their realities.

Walker, Susan and Sam Rowlands, 'Reproductive control by others: means, perpetrators and effects' (2019) 45(1) BMJ Sex Reproductive Health 61-67 Reproductive control by others: means, perpetrators and effects (2019) 45(1) BMJ Sex Reproductive Health 61-67

People exert control over women's reproductive rights in various ways, including persuasion or pressure, such as emotional blackmail, societal or family expectations, or threats of or actual physical violence. This article reviews the medical and social science literature on reproductive control of women. Reproductive control can be perpetrated by intimate partners, the wider family or as part of criminal behaviour. Contraceptive sabotage, or 'stealthing', invalidates consent by the covert removal of a condom during sex. Reproductive control is distinct from intimate partner violence, but they overlap to a certain extent. Reproductive control is reported by around one quarter of women who attend sexual and reproductive healthcare services. Therefore, people working in women's health must appreciate its extent in the community, and understand how to use screening tools which detect it.

1.1 - Emotional or psychological abuse defines this behaviour, providing a range of examples. Also see: 5.2.1 – Emotional or psychological abuse providing additional examples to demonstrate the various ways in which perpetrators of family violence abuse victims. For instance: ‘blaming the victim for all relationship problems; constantly comparing the victim with others, in order to undermine self-esteem and self-worth; sporadic sulking; withdrawing all interest and engagement (for example, weeks of silence); and emotional blackmail’.

Further examples are provided in 1.1 – Additional Guidance – Common Risk Assessment Framework.

WA

Western Australia Department of Justice, Equal Justice Bench Book, (2nd edition September 2021).

This Bench Book notes the definition of domestic violence used by the Department of Child Protection and Family Support which includes: “Emotional violence is behaviour that does not accord equal importance and respect to another person's feelings, opinions and experiences. Even though emotional abuse can have a profound and long-term impact on victims it is often the most difficult form of violence to identify. Many emotionally abusive behaviours are not crimes, and therefore victims can find it challenging to obtain protection.” [13.2.3]

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Emotional and psychological abuse are recognised, though not substantively expanded upon, as behaviours of domestic violence throughout this bench book (e.g. Sections 4.4.4, 9.3.1.2, Supplementary Reference 1), and as factors associated with risk (Section 8.8.1). It is suggested that 'psychological abuse produces deeper, longer lasting scars than physical violence' (Supplementary Reference 1), and that risk assessment tools may be ill-equipped to engage with this type of abuse (Section 8.9.2). Further, this bench book also recognises the interconnectedness of emotional abuse with other behaviours: '[e]motional abuse (e.g., threatening, intimidating, coercing, degrading, stalking) and financial abuse (e.g., interfering in ability to work by harassing employers or sabotaging transportation to work, controlling bank accounts and financial decisions, denying educational options, refusing to pay for necessaries of life, hiding or destroying property) and physical/sexual violence are interconnected phenomena. A pattern of emotional or financial abuse, associated with intimidation, domination and control, often escalates into physical or sexual violence' (Section 9.3.1.2).

Emotional and psychological abuse - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

AMB v TMP & Anor* [2019] QDC 100 (21 June 2019) – Queensland District Court

At [37], Kent DCJ stated:

> '…insults, like many other aspects of human interaction, fall on a continuum of seriousness, from completely trivial to very serious; and at a certain point on the continuum it becomes clear that emotional abuse is involved. Drawing the line at the point where this is reached may not be a precise science, and in part depends on the impact on the individual recipient, depending on their particular robustness or otherwise.'

Degney v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 183 (19 August 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

At [50], the Court stated:

> '…[T]hose considering similar brutal, degrading abuse of a domestic partner must understand that the courts have a duty to protect vulnerable members of our community and will not hesitate to impose stern punishment upon wrongdoers. In 2014, this Court sent out what it hoped would be an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence – that if they offended, they would be sentenced to lengthy terms of imprisonment. The sentence we are about to impose follows through on that message.'

At [52], the Court observed:

> 'There has been an increasing community disquiet over violence of males towards their female partners (or ex-partners) and this is one reason why denunciation of this conduct must be given full expression in the sentence.'

R v Kulczycki* [2018] ACTSC 9 (30 January 2018) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

(Where the defendant sent the complainant emails and text messages threatening to release a video of the defendant and complainant engaged in sexual activity unless the complainant paid him $20,000) Justice Elkaim remarked on the seriousness of the blackmail in the context of a domestic relationship at [16]: 'blackmail of the type involved in this case must be regarded as serious. This is not so much because of the amount of money demanded but because it involved a threat to breach the privacy of a relationship and to cause severe embarrassment to the complainant'.

R v Mazaydeh* [2014] ACTSC 325 (13 November 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Murrell CJ at [15]-[16]: 'These offences occurred in the context of a previous relationship between the offender and the victim and involved violence within the victim's home, an apparent sense of entitlement on the part of the offender, and humiliation through verbal and text abuse of the victim'.

'The sentencing purposes of punishment, general deterrence and denunciation are very important, as well as the recognition of harm to the victim personally and the community generally through offences of this nature. The victim provided a victim impact statement in which she referred to impacts upon her of the type that frequently result from offences of domestic violence, including feelings of anxiety, difficulty sleeping, difficulty concentrating at work and elsewhere, and an adverse effect on her ability to form relationships. Since the incident, the victim has moved house because she felt unsafe in the apartment where the offence occurred'.

R v In* [2001] ACTSC 102 (2 November 2001) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Crispin J at [24]-[25]: 'In my view the offences which the prisoner committed were too serious to be dealt with in that manner. His wife was confined for an extended period and, whether he now remembers it or not, he behaved in a manner which was clearly calculated to terrify her. He plainly made no attempt to conceal his identity, yet put tape over her eyes. It is difficult to imagine any explanation for that conduct other than that it was calculated to cause fear. Even if he did not intended to carry them out, it is obvious that his threats to kill the children were also made for that purpose. Furthermore, his conduct in turning on the tap in the kitchen, going to his daughter's bedroom and saying in a voice loud enough for his wife to hear "Now take this darling,

I know tastes awful, doesn't it" amounted, in my view, to an exercise in sadistic cruelty. A tape recording of his wife's telephone call to obtain an ambulance was admitted in evidence. It records what one might have expected, a mother almost incoherent with fear that her children may have been poisoned'.

DMK v CAG* [2016] QDC 106 (15 April 2016) – District Court of Queensland

Morzone QC DCJ: 'Proof of emotional or psychological abuse depends not only on the inherent behaviour but also its effect of tormenting, intimidating, harassing or offending the subject aggrieved'([43]).

K v K* [2012] TASMC 3 (25 January 2012) – Magistrates' Court of Tasmania

Magistrate R W Pearce: In discussing 'verbal abuse': 'It is difficult to characterise or define what words may amount to threats, intimidation or abuse. The same words may in some circumstances amount to a threat or abuse when in other circumstances they may not. Much depends on the background and the context. In some circumstances even the most seemingly innocent words may be highly intimidatory. The court should consider whether one of the parties is in a position of disadvantage, either physically, emotionally, intellectually, socially or economically' ([29]).

Mayne v Tasmania* [2017] TASSC 38 (29 June 2017) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Wood J said at [43]:

> … it is important that deterrent sentences be imposed not merely for crimes that cause grave physical or psychological harm to victims. There is a need to counter the perception that somehow violence of this kind in the home is less serious than the same kind of violence inflicted on a stranger in a public place. Also, acts of violence committed in a family or domestic context causing fear and distress to victims can have debilitating effects upon their well-being or the well-being of a family member witnessing such violence. It is not only violence resulting in visible injury that must be seen as unacceptable, and these victims, as vulnerable members of our society who have experienced fear and trauma, are entitled to the court's protection.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou AJA at [53]-[54]: 'Historically perpetrators of family violence were rarely prosecuted. Even when offenders were convicted of such offences, they often received lenient sentences. Fortunately the criminal law now gives greater recognition to the devastating effects of family violence. It has also been recognised that women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously. This makes both specific and general deterrence very important factors in sentencing men who assault their partner.'

'The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and long-lasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

Cultural and spiritual abuse

Australian and international research indicates the need to recognise spiritual and cultural abuse as a form of domestic and family violence that may be part of a broader and complex pattern of behaviours experienced by a victim. While they may be interrelated with broader patterns of physical, psychological, sexual, economic and other forms of violence, spiritual and cultural abuse have unique dimensions where spirituality or cultural identity is central to the victim's way of life, or their personal sense of meaning, purpose and wellbeing [Cares & Cusick 2012].

As with many forms of domestic and family violence, spiritual and cultural abuse are means by which a perpetrator can exercise dominance, control or coercion over a victim (sometimes identified as coercive control) who is especially vulnerable due to their spirituality or cultural identity. Behaviours may include any form of domestic and family violence and may involve the perpetrator:

- belittling the victim's spiritual or cultural worth, beliefs or practices
- violating or preventing the victim's spiritual or cultural practices
- denying the victim access to their spiritual or cultural community
- causing the victim to transgress spiritual or cultural obligations or prohibitions
- forcing on the victim spiritual or cultural beliefs and practices that are in conflict with their own
- manipulating spiritual readings and practices to justify abuse
- misusing the traditions, practices and expectations of the spiritual or cultural community to which the victim belongs as a means of normalising or suppressing the abusive behaviours, silencing the victim, or preventing the victim from seeking support and help [Knickmeyer et al 2010].

Some specific examples [Bent-Goodley & Fowler 2008] of these behaviours include the perpetrator:

- denouncing the victim's prayers as having no purpose or value
- insisting that the victim honour the perpetrator rather than the victim's cultural or spiritual beliefs
- asserting his entitlement to a dowry from the victim's family, or punishing the victim or her family for what he claims to be an insufficient dowry
- forcing the victim to undergo partial or total removal of her external genitalia, or be subjected to any other injury to her genital organs for reasons that are not medically warranted (sometimes referred to as female genital mutilation or FGM)

- publicly humiliating the victim during spiritual or cultural ceremonies
- preventing the victim from wearing clothing prescribed by spiritual or cultural practices
- preventing the victim from attending their chosen place of worship
- causing the victim to transgress spiritual or cultural belief systems by forcing the victim to drink alcohol or to have intercourse during menstruation
- citing biblical readings in claiming the eternal sanctity of marriage and God's disapproval of divorce [Knickmeyer et al 2010]
- compelling the victim to keep the abuse secret by threatening that disclosure will result in the victim being disbelieved, shunned and shamed by their spiritual or cultural community.

Cultural abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Powell, R. & Pepper, M. (2021). National Anglican Family Violence Research Report: Top Line Results. NCLS Research Report. NCLS Research.

Extract: This report provides a top line overview of results from three studies that make up the National Anglican Family Violence Project (NAFVP), undertaken between 2019 and early 2021. The aim of this research project is to investigate the nature and prevalence of intimate partner violence (IPV) among those with a connection to the Anglican Church of Australia.

NAFVP Prevalence Study: How prevalent is intimate partner violence among Australians who identify as Anglican?

Significant observations included:

- The prevalence of intimate partner violence among Anglicans was the same or higher than in the wider Australian community.
- The prevalence of intimate partner violence among church-attending Anglicans was the same or higher than among other Anglicans.
- The prevalence of intimate partner violence was higher among women than men.
- Most Anglican victims of domestic violence did not seek help from Anglican churches.

NAFVP Clergy and Lay Leader Study: What are the attitudes and practices regarding IPV among Anglican clergy and local church leaders?

Significant observations of Clergy and Lay Leader participants included that:

- Clergy and lay leaders were aware of the widespread nature of the problem of domestic violence in Australia, but less aware of its prevalence in church communities.
- Most clergy believed that Scripture is misused by the abuser in Christian families.
- Most clergy had been aware of victims of abuse in their churches and had dealt with specific domestic violence situations as part of their ministry.
- Clergy confidence in their personal capacity to respond to domestic violence was low to moderate.

- A minority of clergy felt very familiar with support services or very confident to refer people to them.

NAFVP Experience Study: What is the nature of experiences of intimate partner violence (IPV) for those with a connection with Anglican churches? How has the Anglican Church featured in these experiences.

Views expressed by participants with a connection with Anglican churches and direct experience of IPV included:

- Faith and church both assist and hinder those who are experiencing domestic violence.
- Although unintended, Christian teachings sometimes contribute to and potentially amplify situations of domestic violence.
- Perpetrators misuse Christian teachings and positional power.

Aune, Kristin, and Rebecca Barnes, 'In Churches Too: Church Responses to Domestic Abuse – A Case Study of Cumbria' (March 2018).

This report provides detailed analysis of experiences of, and church responses to, domestic abuse. Particularly, it provides information regarding spiritual abuse, where the perpetrator forces certain beliefs or practices on the victim, prevents the victim from practising their religion, or uses the victim's faith against them (p 28). Overall, the results of the study indicate that women were far more likely than men to report experiences of all forms of abuse, including spiritual abuse (p 33). While substantially less common than other forms of abuse (p 57), spiritual abuse was still reported by a significant number of participants, with 21.8 percent of female participants, 11.1 percent of male participants, and 18.8 percent of all participants reporting at least one experience of spiritual abuse (p 33).

Bagwell-Gray, M. et al., Women's Reproductive Coercion and Pregnancy Avoidance: Associations With Homicide Risk, Sexual Violence, and Religious Abuse. (2021) 27 (12-13) Violence Against Women 2294-2312 doi: 10.1177/10778012211005566

This survey study explores patterns of reproductive coercion (RC) and pregnancy avoidance (PA) among women recruited from domestic violence shelters in the southwestern United States (N = 661). Younger,

African American, and Hispanic women were more likely to experience RC. Homicide risk, sexual intimate partner violence (IPV), and religious abuse were associated with RC, and RC and homicide risk were associated with PA. We discuss implications of the associations between RC and PA and their links to religious abuse, sexual IPV, and homicide risk.

Twenty-one percent of the sample indicated that their partner used religious teachings or traditions as a reason to control daily activities. 217 women (33%) experienced reproductive coercion. Specifically, 31% (n = 207) of participants reported their partner tried to get them pregnant when they did not want to be pregnant and 17% (n = 114) reported that their partner physically hurt them or threatened to leave if they did not get pregnant.

Bent-Goodley, Tricia B, and Dawnovise N Fowler, 'Spiritual and Religious Abuse: Expanding What Is Known About Domestic Violence' (2008) 21 Journal of Women and Social Work 282.

This article reports the outcomes of three focus groups in three diverse communities of faith in the African American community. The participants identified forms of spiritual abuse including (p288):

- the abuser telling the victim that God has forgotten her because of her sins,
- abusers who denied a woman's ability to attend church,
- abusers who emphasised the need for the woman to forgive, despite abuse.

Cares, Alison, and Gretchen Cusick, 'Risks and Opportunities of Faith and Culture: The Case of Abused Jewish Women' (2012) 27(5) Journal of Family Violence 427.

This article considers how a perpetrator of domestic and family violence may exploit the victim's faith or subculture and, alternatively, how the victim's faith or subculture may be a source of strength and support for the victim. The researchers analysed case files from a Jewish domestic violence services agency. The study found that partners of abused Jewish women often perverted the laws and traditions of Judaism to control their partners. It also found that being part of an integrated cultural and religious community offered support for some victims.

Dehan, Nicole, and Zipi Levi, 'Spiritual Abuse: An Additional Dimension of Abuse Experienced by Abused Haredi (Ultraorthodox) Jewish Wives' (2009) 15(11) Violence Against Women 1294.

This article aims to conceptualize spiritual abuse as an additional dimension to physical, psychological, sexual, and economic abuse. Based on a small research study involving a group of eight abused women, spiritual abuse is defined by the researchers as any attempt to impair the woman's spiritual life, spiritual self, or spiritual well-being, with three levels of intensity:

- belittling her spiritual worth, beliefs, or deeds;
- preventing her from performing spiritual acts; and
- causing her to transgress spiritual obligations or prohibitions.

The concept and its typology are illustrated by means of examples from the women's abusive experiences.

Ellis, H et al, (2022) 'Religious/Spiritual Abuse and Trauma: A Systematic Review of the Empirical Literature', Spirituality in Clinical Practice, 9(4): 213-231.

The authors sought to review empirical research on religious/spiritual (R/S) abuse and trauma. Their systematic review identified 25 studies that met the inclusion criteria. The empirical findings of the studies are organized into eight sections: (a) definitions of R/S abuse and trauma,(b) prevalence of R/S abuse and trauma, (c) entering/exiting abusive religious communities, (d) the intersection of R/S abuse and trauma and domestic violence, (e) the role of the R/S community in the abuse, (f) negative outcomes associated with R/S abuse and trauma, (g) identity changes associated with R/S abuse and trauma, and (h) prevention and clinical treatment of R/S abuse and trauma. Based on their review the authors define R/S abuse and trauma as a misuse of power in an R/S setting resulting in psychological and spiritual harm. The authors observe that R/S abuse may be inflicted in a secondary way by religious institutions.

Knickmeyer, Nicole, Heidi Levitt and Sharon Horne, 'Putting on Sunday Best: The Silencing of Battered Women within Christian Faith Communities' (2010) 20(1) Feminism Psychology 94.

This research reports on a small qualitative interview study involving 10 Christian-identified women from diverse denominations and racial/ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds who had experienced intimate partner violence. The participants reported forms of spiritual abuse including abusive partners:

- using religious teachings, especially about male leadership and female submission within marriage, manipulatively as a means of exerting total control in the relationship;
- using religious teachings about the sanctity of marriage and God’s disapproval of divorce as a means of maintaining control over the relationship;
- enforcing conformity through the invocation of religious standards along with threats of violence (pp102-104).

Cultural and spiritual abuse - Other Bench Books

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.2.1 – Emotional or psychological abuse provides examples of behaviour including spiritual abuse. It notes spiritual abuse may be perpetrated by: 'denying and/or misusing religious beliefs or practices to force victims into subordinate roles; or misusing religious or spiritual traditions to justify physical violence or other forms of abuse'. Also see 1.1 – Additional Guidance – Common Risk Assessment Framework which provides more examples of what can constitute spiritual abuse. Note that the 'Emotional' section of the table also identifies 'criticising beliefs' as an example of that behaviour of family violence.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

This Bench Book notes the definition of domestic violence used by the Department of Child Protection and Family Support (at [13.2.3]) which includes: "…Spiritual violence is any behaviour that denigrates a woman's religious or spiritual beliefs, or prevents her from attending religious gatherings or practising her faith. It also includes harming or threatening to harm women or children in religious or occult rituals, or forcing them to participate in religious activities against their will."

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Although this bench book has a chapter specifically discussing culture and domestic violence, (Chapter 19: Responding to Culture: Use and Misuse of Cultural Evidence), it does not specifically discuss the behaviours around culture and spirituality as a form of abuse.

Cultural and spiritual abuse - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

R v Kina* [1993] QCA 480 (29 November 1993) – Court of Appeal Queensland

Fitzgerald P and Davies JA: 'In this matter, there were, insufficiently recognised, a number of complex factors interacting which presented exceptional difficulties of communication between her legal representatives and the appellant because of: (i) her aboriginality; (ii) the battered woman syndrome; and (iii) the shameful (to her) nature of the events which characterised her relationship with the deceased. These cultural, psychological and personal factors bore upon the adequacy of the advice and legal representation which the appellant received and effectively denied her satisfactory representation or the capacity to make informed decisions on the basis of proper advice'.

Following, harassing and monitoring

Domestic and family violence behaviours that involve a perpetrator following, harassing or monitoring the victim are forms of stalking or surveillance designed to deprive the victim of privacy, autonomy and a sense of safety. These abusive behaviours may occur while the perpetrator and victim are in an intimate relationship, or they may commence or intensify upon separation [Bagshaw 2000].

The perpetrator's detailed knowledge of the victim's workplace, family, friends, daily routines, regular hangouts, online activities, inclinations, concerns and fears enables the perpetrator to employ an array of abusive tactics that may be overt and intimidating (for example: letting the victim know they are being watched or overheard) or covert and thus difficult for the victim to anticipate, detect or trace (for example: amassing information about the victim's movements that can later be used to monitor, threaten or humiliate the victim [Stark 2007]).

Studies indicate that these abusive behaviours may be accompanied by incidents of theft, trespass and property damage, and are compelling risk factors for all other forms of domestic and family violence. Where the perpetrator and victim have children in common, handover occasions may increase the risk of further violence [Mechanic et al 2000] and provide an opportunity to conceal or check tracking and surveillance devices, as well as a wide range of Internet-connected devices such as smart toys. Children may also be co-opted to facilitate abuse, eg. through sharing a parent's passwords [Dragiewicz et al 2022].

Research [Wesnet 2020] demonstrates a dangerous prevalence of online stalking and online surveillance, which use digital information and associated technologies as tools for the perpetration of domestic and family violence, also known as technology-facilitated abuse, digital abuse or digital coercive control [Harris & Woodlock 2022]. These technologies involve the associated use of social media and online accounts, information communication technologies, computers, tablets, recording equipment, smart phones and other digital devices such as global positioning systems (GPS) or satellite navigators, drones, game consoles, emerging smart, internet-connected systems such as doorbells or cameras. Increasingly, digital systems are recognised as easy, accessible and instantaneous methods by which a perpetrator can control, monitor, humiliate and shame the victim, and make it more difficult for the victim to leave the abusive relationship or seek help.

Technology-facilitated methods are highlighted in the following examples:

- Monitoring and stalking (for example, via Skype, via drones, via location sharing apps such as Find My) the whereabouts and movements of the victim or children in real time.
- Remotely accessing, taking control over and altering or deleting the software and files on a victim's digital device.
- Sending abusive messages – even via online banking - and altering the sender identity information so as render the origin untraceable.
- Visiting offensive websites, and then making contact with the host or bloggers under the guise of the victim, and expressing an interest in violent or abusive pornography or being raped or sexually assaulted.
- Sending text messages to the victim communicating threats and verbal abuse.
- Using social media sites such as Facebook to publicly accuse and blame the victim.
- Accessing a tracking device in the victim's car via any digital device and repeatedly texting the victim to communicate the perpetrator's knowledge of the victim's whereabouts.
- Taking intimate images of the victim (with or without consent) on any digital device and distributing them or threatening to do so; this includes the non-consensual sharing of intimate images, commonly referred to as 'image-based abuse' and sometimes as 'revenge porn' [Henry et al, 2017].
- Installing an application or spyware on the victim's digital device that:
  - allows access to the victim's text messages, emails, social media accounts, camera, call logs, photographs, contacts and browsing history;
  - enables the recording and receiving of the victim's phone calls [Sun 2015];
  - converts the victim's digital device to a remote listening device; or
  - enables unauthorised access to property and accounts via remote access [NSW DV Death Review 2020].
- Impersonating an individual or creating a fake profile of an individual (such as the victim, potential romantic partner, or real or fictious child that reaches out to the victim's children).
- Doxxing (publishing private and identifying information such as name and address).
- Financially harm victims e.g., by making online orders without the victim's consent.

Due to the seemingly elusive or ambiguous nature of some of these abusive behaviours, a victim may feel a heightened sense of fear and powerlessness, and yet the victim may be the only means by which the police can gather evidence of the behaviours. A significant barrier for victims of technology-facilitated abuse and stalking may be a perception by police or judicial officers that the behaviours are less serious than physical violence and, as a consequence, there may be a tendency to trivialise the victim's experience and minimise the harm suffered, leading to inadequate legal responses. It is important in protection order application proceedings where a victim is seeking protection from these forms of abusive behaviours that the conditions of the protection order specifically address the behaviours. Victims cannot be expected to simply 'go offline' as essential life dimensions are now mediated through technology e.g., paying taxes, searching and applying for jobs.

In some circumstances, victims may use digital technologies as a safety aid in preventing or escaping domestic and family violence [Dragiewicz et al 2022]. However this may also leave the victim vulnerable to accusations of stalking or surveillance-like behaviour. For example, a victim may record repeated incidents of violence with the intention of proving a pattern of violence. Such behaviour may be lawful [Recording and surveillance]. It is important therefore to distinguish between behaviours that are protective on the part of the victim, and those that constitute violence by a perpetrator. There are resources available that provide information about how to ensure safety when engaging with technology [Using technology safely] [WESNET Tech Safety]. In some cases recording private conversations, and maintaining surveillance, may be legally justifiable [Recording and surveillance]. Increasingly private individuals seek to have their recordings of other's private conversations and activities admitted as evidence in legal proceedings in domestic and family violence related cases. Often the recording and surveillance material is collected covertly. Legislative responses to these issues vary across Australia [Recording and surveillance].

Following, harassing or monitoring may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Following, harassing and monitoring - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

Stalking was defined in the survey as 'any unwanted contact or attention on more than one occasion that could have caused fear or distress, or multiple types of unwanted contact or behaviour experienced on one occasion only that could have caused fear or distress'. Overall, women were more likely than men to have experienced stalking, with approximately 17% of women (1.6 million), and 6.5% of men (587,000), reporting an experience of stalking since age 15 (see Table 34). '

'Women were more likely to have experienced an episode of stalking by someone they knew than by a stranger', with more than three quarters of female victims knowing their stalker. Further, women were also significantly more likely to be stalked by a man than by a woman (see Table 35). This section also contains information regarding whether victims perceived their experiences of stalking as a crime, and whether they reported the episode to the police (see Table 35).

Bagshaw, Dale, et al, 'Reshaping Responses to Domestic Violence' (Final Report, University of South Australia and Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, April 2000).

This Australian research used a variety of methods including an anonymous 'phone-in' and focus groups. 102 women who were victims/survivors of domestic violence participated in the phone-in. According to the study authors, some of the callers reported 'intense levels of surveillance, which leave women without autonomy.' This experience was exacerbated for women living in rural and remote areas, especially on isolated properties. Strategies of surveillance included (p24):

- ‘not allowing the woman to obtain a driver’s licence or paid employment,
- constant telephone calls to check whereabouts, timing the distances to be travelled (for example, home from work) and/or
- preventing the woman from closing the toilet door.’

The writers commented that callers reported that ‘the law was not seen to take threats seriously and placed an unreasonable onus on the victim to provide dates or other evidence of violence, requiring a level of documentation that is generally impossible for a woman living in a state of constant surveillance’ (p46).

Douglas, Heather, Bridget Harris & Molly Dragiewicz, Technology-facilitated Domestic and Family Violence: Women’s Experiences, (2019) 59(3) The British Journal of Criminology 551-70

This article analyses data drawn from interviews undertaken with 55 domestic and family violence survivors in Brisbane, and outlines survivors’ experiences of technology-facilitated domestic and family violence. During the interviews, participants were asked about their experiences of DFV and their engagement with legal processes. Participants provided many examples of technology being used by perpetrators to isolate, stalk and emotionally abuse them and to create a sense of the perpetrator being omnipresent. Although several women used technology to document the abuse, to improve their safety and to stop the abuse, some also pointed to their lack of understanding or skill with respect to technology compared to their abuser. The survivor accounts demonstrate the need to study the context, meaning, motives and outcomes of technology-facilitated activity.

Dragiewicz, Molly, Woodlock, Delanie, Salter, Michael, & Harris, Bridget 'What’s Mum's Password?': Australian Mothers' Perceptions of Children's Involvement in Technology-Facilitated Coercive Control. (2022) 37(1), Journal of Family Violence, 137-149.

This article is based on semi-structured interviews with those 12 mothers. The accounts show how children were directly abused via technology, such father impersonating a child to speak to his daughter and another father calling his daughter “a sneaky bitch” when she refused to provide her mother’s password. Participants recounted how children were drawn into technology-facilitated abuse aimed at the mothers, for example by being asked to provide passwords to abusers or show abusers around their new house via FaceTime. Abuse often escalated at parental separation as abusers lost some avenues of control but gained access to others.

Flynn, A., Powell, A., & Hindes, S. (2021). Technology-facilitated abuse: A survey of support services stakeholders (Research report, 02/2021). ANROWS

Survey of 338 support service workers. The study found that in the experience of support services workers, foremost comprising domestic and sexual violence services, TFA is a significant and gendered problem with victims facing significant impacts and barriers to help-seeking. Support services workers described TFA as a growing issue for their clients, particularly with the ever-expanding and vast landscape of digital technologies. However, they also identified that there are significant obstacles to helping clients who are experiencing TFA, and expressed concerns over the adequacy of current responses. These include difficulty in finding up-to-date information, TFA not being taken seriously by police and courts, and inadequate responses from technology providers. Support services workers called for these key areas to be improved. They also identified areas in which they need additional support and training, including responding to perpetrators, meeting the needs of diverse clients and strategies for preventing TFA. Overall, the vital, practice-based knowledge from support services workers in this study has allowed us to demonstrate tangible ways in which we can more effectively disrupt, prevent and respond to TFA.

Harris, Anita, Nikki Honey, Kim Webster, Kristen Diemer and Violeta Politoff, 'Young Australians' attitudes to violence against women – Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey for respondents 16-24 years' (2015).

The minimisation of technology-facilitated stalking and abuse is reflected in the Australian 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey. In this survey more than 17,500 telephone interviews were undertaken to compare the attitudes of 16-24 year olds to 35-64 years olds. The study found the majority of young people agreed that tracking a female partner by electronic means without consent was serious. Youth males rated it at an overall seriousness level of 80% while youth females rated it at 87%. This is compared to adult men who rated it at 81% with their female counterparts rating it at 90%. The study also found 52% of youth males and 40% of youth females thought non-consensual electronic tracking of a female partner was acceptable to some degree, compared to 41% of adult males and 29% of adult females.

Harris, Bridget and Delanie Woodlock, Spaceless violence: Women's experiences of technology-facilitated domestic violence in regional, rural and remote areas. Trends and Issues paper 644, (Australian Institute of Criminology, 2022).

Semi-structured interviews and focus groups were conducted with 13 victim–survivors.

The participants detailed the way that technology was incorporated into perpetrators' control and intimidation tactics, often extending and exacerbating the abuse these women experienced. When women separated from the perpetrator, his use of technology often escalated. As opportunities to engage in physical abuse were limited, technology enabled the perpetrator to still reach into the victim's private sphere. While digital coercive control is spaceless, the space in which the woman and the perpetrator are physically located matters. The participants in this research emphasised that rural, remote and regional locations shaped both the manifestations and impacts of abuse, as well as the barriers they experienced when seeking help.

Henry, N., Gavey, N., & Johnson, K. (2022). Image-Based Sexual Abuse as a Means of Coercive Control: Victim-Survivor Experiences. Violence Against Women, online first.

Article reports on a study involving interviews with 29 women and one gender-diverse person who experienced image-based sexual abuse as part of a pattern of "coercive control."

From Conclusion: The interviews demonstrated a diversity of experiences well beyond the paradigm of "revenge porn." A common theme across these interviews was the dynamic of coercive control. Image-based sexual abuse is one of many abusive tactics employed (both technology- and nontechnology-based) to isolate and entrap victims within abusive relationships, or at the end of the relationship, to control, intimidate, punish, and degrade them.

Henry, Nicola, Anastasia Powell and Asher Flynn, Not Just 'Revenge Pornography': Australians' Experiences of Image-Based Abuse - A Summary Report (RMIT University, 2017).

This summary report presents the results of a national (Australian) online survey of 4,274 participants, 2,406 of which were female (56%) and 1,868 male (44%).Participants ranged in age from 16 to 49, with an average age of 34 years. In addition, 3,764 (88%) participants identified as heterosexual and 510 (12%) identified as lesbian, gay or bisexual (hereafter, LGB). Of those identifying as LGB, 244 identified as female (48%), and 266 (52%) identified as male. Key findings included:

- 1 in 5 Australians have experienced image-based abuse
- Victims of image-based abuse experience high levels of psychological distress
- Women and men are equally likely to report being a victim
- Perpetrators of image-based abuse are most likely to be male, and known to the victim
- Men and young adults are more likely to voluntarily share a nude or sexual image of themselves
- Women are more likely than men to fear for their safety due to image-based abuse
- Abuse risk is higher for those who share sexual selfies, but they are not the only victims
- 1 in 2 Australians with a disability report being a victim of image-based abuse
- 1 in 2 Indigenous Australians report image-based abuse victimisation
- Image-based abuse victimisation is higher for lesbian, gay and bisexual Australians
- Young people aged 16 to 29 years are also at higher risk of image-based abuse
- 4 in 5 Australians agree it should be a crime to share sexual or nude images without permission

Henry, Nicola, Asher Flynn and Anastasia Powell, Image-based sexual abuse: Victims and perpetrators (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 572 March 2019).

Report abstract:

Image-based sexual abuse (IBSA) refers to the non-consensual creation, distribution or threatened distribution of nude or sexual images. This research examines the prevalence, nature and impacts of IBSA victimisation and perpetration in Australia. This form of abuse was found to be relatively common among respondents surveyed and to disproportionately affect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people with a disability, homosexual and bisexual people and young people. The nature of victimisation and perpetration was found to differ by gender, with males more likely to perpetrate IBSA, and females more likely to be victimised by a partner or ex-partner.

Powell, Anastasia and Nicola Henry, 'Digital Harassment and Abuse of Adult Australians – A Summary Report' (2015).

Researchers at RMIT University and La Trobe University examined the extent, nature and impacts of digital harassment and abuse, as well as technology-facilitated sexual violence and harassment. 3000 Australian adults (aged 18 to 54) were surveyed about their experiences of these forms of abuse. Key findings include:

- Overall, men and women were just as likely to report experiencing digital harassment and abuse
- Women were more likely to report experiencing sexual harassment
- Young adults aged 18 to 24 were more likely than any other age groups to experience digital harassment and abuse
- Non-heterosexual identifying adults were significantly more likely to report being the target of both gender and sexuality based harassment
- 1 in 10 Australians reported that someone had posted online or sent onto others a nude or semi-nude image of them without their permission
- Women overwhelmingly experienced digital harassment and abuse from male perpetrators

- Men experienced digital harassment and abuse equally from males and females
- Women were significantly more likely than men to be 'very or extremely upset' by the digital harassment and abuse they experienced
- More women than men reported that they told the person to stop, changed their online details or profile settings, left the site or turned off their device, as a result of their experience

Sun, Charissa, 'Technology-Facilitated Stalking and Abuse: Putting Our Legal Framework to the Test' (2015) (June) The Law Society Journal of New South Wales 78.

This article reviews the NSW legal response to what is referred to as 'technology assisted stalking and abuse.' It includes helpful examples of this behaviour:

- making numerous and unwanted calls to a person's mobile phone;
- sending threatening and/or abusive messages (text messaging, Whatsapp, Snapchat, facebook messaging, Twitter);
- hacking into a person's email or social media account to discover information about them;
- hacking into a person's email or social media account to impersonate them and send abusive messages to family/friends of that person;
- using surveillance software and devices to spy on or stalk a person (eg placing a GPS tracker on a person's car, placing a video camera in and around a person's home to monitor both the person and other people who may come to the house); and
- sharing, or threatening to share, intimate pictures of a person.

Woodlock, Delanie, 'The Abuse of Technology in Domestic Violence and Stalking' (2017) 23(5) Violence Against Women 584-602.

This study discusses the increasing prevalence of technology in domestic violence and stalking (p 585). The results demonstrate that technology, including phones, computers, tablets, and social media, is frequently used in intimate partner violence (p 590). The use of technology creates an impression of the perpetrator's omnipresence, for example through constant text messages or phone calls (pp 592, 598), and can isolate (pp 594-6, 598), humiliate and punish the victim (pp 596-7, 599). A particular threat of technology is the sharing of sexualised content online to humiliate victims (p 599).

Women's Health East, Women online: The intersection of technology, gender and sexism (Melbourne: Women's Health East, 2018).

The paper examines the intersection of technology, gender and sexism, as well as the prevalence and impacts of cyber violence against women and girls. The authors describe the key drivers of violence, such as gender inequality, and how these interact with the online platforms to create cyber violence. The paper explores 'life online' esp, pp8-12.

Wesnet, Wesnet Second National Survey on Technology Abuse And Domestic Violence In Australia. (2020).

This report explores the 2020 findings of a national Australian survey with 442 frontline DV practitioners about the use of technology by perpetrators.

Almost all survey respondents (99.3%) stated that they had clients who had experienced technology facilitated stalking and abuse.

The type of technology most commonly used by perpetrators was text messaging, with two thirds (60.7%) of practitioners seeing this 'all the time'. Text messages could be used in various ways, from constantly sending messages to victims-survivors, to carefully worded messages that perpetrators would use to cause victim-survivors fear.

Smartphones were the next most commonly used technology (36.1% seeing this 'all the time'). Facebook was also reported to be used frequently by perpetrators to abuse (35.1% noting this as occurring 'all the time').

Respondents noted they were seeing GPS tracking apps used 'all the time' (16.2%) and 'often' (45.6%). Participants noted that because GPS tracking apps such as "Find My" are preloaded on iPhones, that women were often obligated to turn them on, or else they were seen by the perpetrator as having something to hide.

FaceTime was seen as being used to perpetrate technology-facilitated abuse, with almost half seeing this 'often' (42.6%).

iCloud was also noted as commonly used by perpetrators to stalk and place women under surveillance, with almost half (42.2%) observing this 'often'.

Of significance was the high proportion of respondents seeing government accounts such as myGov being misused by perpetrators to abuse women, with almost a third of respondents seeing this 'all the time' (27%) and a further fifth seeing it 'often' (37.8%).

International

Backes, Bethany, Lisa Fedina and Jennifer Holmes, The Criminal Justice System Response to Intimate Partner Stalking: a Systematic Review of Quantitative and Qualitative Research, (2020) Journal of Family Violence.

This international study assesses the range of criminal justice responses to intimate partner stalking (IPS) victimisation and the extent to which these responses are successful in promoting survivor safety, well-being, and justice. The findings identify formal and informal strategies employed by the criminal justice system to address IPS. Successful strategies for mitigating IPS were associated with increased training of law enforcement and prosecution and the granting and enforcement of civil protective orders.

Drouin, Michelle, Jody Ross and Elizabeth Tobin, Sexting: A new digital vehicle for intimate partner aggression (2015) 50 Computers in Human Behaviour 197.

In this study, the authors examined the relationships between sexting coercion, physical sex coercion, intimate partner violence, and mental health and trauma symptoms within a sample of 480 young adult undergraduates (160 men and 320 women). Approximately one fifth of the sample indicated that they had engaged in sexting when they did not want to. Those who had been coerced into sexting had usually been coerced by subtler tactics (e.g., repeated asking and being made to feel obligated) than more severe forms of coercion (e.g., physical threats). Nevertheless, the trauma related to these acts of coercion both at the time they occurred and now (looking back) were greater for sexting coercion than for physical sex coercion. Moreover, women noted significantly more trauma now (looking back) than at the time the events occurred for sexting coercion. Additionally, those who experienced more instances of sexting coercion also endorsed more symptoms of anxiety, depression, and generalized trauma. Finally, sexting coercion was related to both physical sex coercion and intimate partner violence, which suggests that sexting coercion may be a form of intimate partner violence, providing perpetrators with a new, digital route for physical and sexual covictimization.

Katz, E., Nikupeteri, A., & Laitinen, M., 'When Coercive Control Continues to Harm Children: Post-Separation Fathering, Stalking and Domestic Violence' (2020) Child Abuse Review

This article highlights how domestic violence perpetrators can use coercive control against their children after their ex-partner has separated from them. It provides insights into how children experience coercive control post-separation by drawing from two data sets: one from the UK and one from Finland. The data comprised narratives of 29 children and young people aged from 4 to 21 years old. Three overarching themes arose from the data: 1) dangerous fathering that made children frightened and unsafe; 2) 'admirable' fathering, where fathers/father figures appeared as 'caring', 'concerned', 'indulgent' and/or 'vulnerable-victims'; and 3) omnipresent fathering that continually constrained children's lives. Dangerous fathering made children's lives frightening, constrained and unpredictable. Admirable fathering was found to be a powerful tool of control when combined with dangerous fathering, because admirable fathering increased father-child emotional bonds and could make children want to see/live with their fathers, whilst dangerous fathering simultaneously made them fearful of him. Admirable fathering was typically aimed at professionals and wider communities, and could occur alongside fathers/father figures stalking, harassing and/or attacking ex-partners and children when they were not in the public eye. Perpetrators aimed to portray themselves as 'caring', 'concerned', 'indulgent' and/or 'vulnerable-victim' fathers, and to make their ex-partners seem like perpetrators or deficient mothers. Perpetrators disguised their use of coercive control tactics as 'admirable' behaviour. With respect to omnipresent fathering, children were fearful that their father/father figure could appear at any time to attack, harass, manipulate, upset or kidnap them or their mothers. This behaviour led to some children continuously monitoring their surroundings as a protective strategy. Fathers/father figures were able to maintain some degree of control, domination and emotional power over children even when they were not physically present. The article suggests that robust measures are necessary to prevent coercive control perpetrating fathers/father figures from using father-child relationships to continue exerting coercive control on children and ex-partners.

Lo, M., A Domestic Violence Dystopia: Abuse via the Internet of Things and Remedies Under Current Law. California Law Review, [s. l.], v. 109, n. 1, p. 277–315, 2021.

US based note. Abstract: Tactics of domestic violence are nothing new. However, as with various other aspects of modern life, technology threatens disruption. The increasing prevalence of Internet of Things (IoT) devices has given abusers a powerful new tool to expand and magnify the traditional harms of domestic violence, threatening the progress advocates have made in the past thirty years and creating novel dangers for survivors. An IoT device is a "smart," stand-alone, internet-connected device that can be monitored or controlled from a remote location. They are cheap and increasingly common—the number of IoT-enabled devices in the world is already in the billions and expected to grow quickly. IoT devices allow abusers to overcome geographic and spatial boundaries that would have otherwise prevented them from monitoring, controlling, harassing, and threatening survivors. Various advocates are finding ways to protect survivors, and the broader public, from these new dangers. In the domestic violence sphere, domestic violence service providers are creating resources for survivors that explain IoT-facilitated abuse and how to better secure their smart devices. In the technology sphere, consumers, businesses, digital experts, and the media are broadcasting the security risks of IoT devices. Unfortunately, significantly fewer outlets describe the legal remedies available for IoT-facilitated abuse. This Note aims to bridge that gap. It demonstrates that IoT facilitated abuse is a form of technology-facilitated domestic violence and explores how society can use current laws to address IoT facilitated abuse. However, it also questions whether the existing remedies are sufficient and offers recommendations for legal and nonlegal changes that will better protect survivors of IoT-facilitated abuse and hold perpetrators accountable.

Mechanic, Mindy B, Terri L Weaver and Patricia A Resick, 'Intimate Partner Violence and Stalking Behaviors: Exploration of Patterns and Correlates in a Sample of Acutely Battered Women' (2000) 15(1) Violence and Victims 55.

These USA based researchers recruited 114 battered women from shelters, agencies, and from the community at large to complete a survey and an interview about stalking. Results support the view that violent and harassing stalking behaviours occur with high frequency among physically battered women, both while they are in the relationship and after they leave their abusive partners. Emotional and psychological abuse emerged as strong predictors of within- and post-relationship stalking, and contributed significantly to women's fears of future serious harm or death, even after the effects of physical violence were controlled. The length of time a woman was out of the violent relationship was the strongest predictor of post-separation stalking: stalking increased over time.

Messing, Jill et al., Intersections of Stalking and Technology-Based Abuse: Emerging Definitions, Conceptualization, and Measurement, (2020) Journal of Family Violence.

This article analyses stalking and technology-based abuse across 3 samples of IPV survivors (pen-and-paper surveys, web-based surveys and qualitative interviews). Over a 6-year period, data was collected from IPV survivors who received services from domestic violence programs (including shelters). This article highlights the high prevalence of intimate partner stalking, including direct stalking, monitoring, online harassment, and cyberstalking, among shelter and service-seeking survivors of IPV. Around 62-72% of women reported being directly stalked, and 60-63% reported experiencing technology-based abuse by an intimate partner. Women reported monitoring, online harassment, and cyberstalking more readily when directly asked, thereby demonstrating the importance of incorporating technology-based abuse into assessment and intervention.

Stark, Evan, Coercive Control: How Men Entrap Women in Personal Life (Oxford University Press, 2007).

This book is a key text on domestic and family violence. Although Stark is based in the United States his work has been highly influential in Australia. In this book Stark explains that domestic and family violence is a pattern of controlling behaviours akin to terrorism and hostage-taking. Drawing on court records, interviews, and FBI statistics, Stark details coercive strategies that men use to deny women their very personhood. He explains that surveillance and stalking include behaviours such as gathering information without the victim's knowledge and letting the victim know she is being watched, and serve as a means of curtailing the victim's activities and isolating her (p457-8).

Stark also discusses what he refers to as 'micro-surveillance', including activities such as going through diaries and drawers etc; monitoring phone calls, bank accounts and movements; or requiring partners to 'check-in' as a form of coercive control used by abusers in relationships (p461-3). Stark notes on p374 surveillance tactics may be extended to the point the victim is essentially confined, amounting to a deprivation of liberty. 'This diagram illustrates some ways abusers might misuse technology in the context of stalking, domestic and sexual violence. Perpetrators might try to misuse any technology if it enables them to monitor, impersonate, control or harm. Examples of technology abusers misuse include phone interceptors, listening devices and bugs; caller ID spoof and unblock; email, text and instant messages; computer and phone spyware and monitoring; fax machines; assistive devices and relay services; location tracking devices (e.g. GPS) and services; cameras and other recording devices; mobile phones and tablets; social networking and media sites, websites and more.'

Recording and surveillance legislation.

Many private individuals now have access to reliable and inconspicuous recording and surveillance devices. In some cases recording private conversations, and maintaining surveillance, may be legally justifiable.

Increasingly private individuals seek to have their recordings of other's private conversations and activities admitted as evidence in legal proceedings in domestic and family violence related cases. Often the recording and surveillance material is collected covertly. Legislative responses to these issues vary across Australia.

See Groom v Police [2015] SASC 101 for a helpful discussion of these issues in the South Australian context.

The introduction reads: If someone is using technology like text messages, email, or social media (like Facebook) to harass you, this guide will help you "capture" the evidence of the harassment, so you can bring it to court. You might think you can just show the judge your phone in court—but you probably won't be allowed to just show your device. Even if you are allowed, you could risk the court taking your device as evidence. To be sure the judge considers your evidence and that you don't lose your phone (or other device), you need to gather evidence in a form allowed by the court. This guide will provide suggestions on how to capture evidence that can be admitted in court from your devices, such as your cell phone, computer, or tablet (such as an iPad).

R v Kulczycki [2018] ACTSC 9 (30 January 2018) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

(Where the defendant sent the complainant emails and text messages threatening to release a video of the defendant and complainant engaged in sexual activity unless the complainant paid him $20,000) Justice Elkaim remarked on the seriousness of the blackmail in the context of a domestic relationship at [16]: 'blackmail of the type involved in this case must be regarded as serious. This is not so much because of the amount of money demanded but because it involved a threat to breach the privacy of a relationship and to cause severe embarrassment to the complainant'.

R v Gittany (No 5) [2014] NSWSC 49 (11 February 2014) – New South Wales Supreme Court

McCallum J at [40]: 'In my view, that history informs the degree of moral culpability of the offence. The arrogance and sense of entitlement with which Mr Gittany sought to control Lisa Harnum throughout their relationship deny the characterisation of his state of mind in killing her as one of complete and unexpected spontaneity. By an attritional process, he allowed possessiveness and insecurity to overwhelm the most basic respect for her right to live her life as she chose. Although I accept that the intention to kill was formed suddenly and in a state of rage, it was facilitated by a sense of ownership and a lack of any true respect for the autonomy of the woman he claimed to love'.

R v Foodey [2003] QCA 310 (25 July 2003) – Queensland Court of Appeal

Jerrard JA at [11]: 'The applicant's behaviour towards Jennifer Foodey in the two and a half months between their separation and his incarceration was persistently cruel and aggressive. At different times he insulted, degraded, and terrified her. His conduct throughout was in breach of court orders intended to give her protection. Considered in isolation, the sentence imposed by the learned judge does not appear manifestly excessive, and indeed far from it. The same result occurs if regard is had to other sentences for unlawful stalking imposed or approved by this court.

R v Millar* [2002] QCA 382 (25 September 2002) – Queensland Court of Appeal

De Jersey CJ: 'I would say for my part that that is not a feature which should necessarily lead to a lower penalty being imposed, where the stalking follows the break-up of an emotional relationship'.

MB v Queensland Police Service* [2020] QDC 325 (18 December 2020) – Queensland District Court

Aggravating features included that these were instances of domestic violence and "the emotional harm done to the victims and the damage, loss and injury caused." …

> "Charge 12 occurred on 27 August 2020 which was a contravention of domestic violence order. The appellant updated his profile status making threatening comments about the complainant, SH. The post named SH and contained threats and disclosed her sexual preferences to several friends. This had a significant emotional impact on the complainant SH. The appellant was interviewed on 29 August 2020 and said he didn't remember posting the comment but went on to say it was true.
> "A victim impact statement was tendered as Exhibit 4. The offending caused distress and inconvenience to the complainant SH. She had to move regularly as a result of the conduct of the appellant and suffered defamation to her character. She alleged that total out of pocket expenses was $16,748.84."

Howe v S* [2013] TASMC 33 (29 July 2013) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

Magistrate M Brett, in the context of the relevant Tasmanian legislation noted: 'Whilst I accept that the term "harass" as used in the general community could well include an element of persistence or repetition, I see no reason why a person cannot be harassed within the context of a Family Violence Order, by one act alone. This view is in fact consistent with the definition in s.4 of the Family Violence Act of the word "harassing"… The reference in the definition to "any one or more of the following actions" suggests that a single act might be sufficient. Furthermore, it is appropriate, in my view, to interpret the term having regard to the context in which it is used in the order. The reference to "threaten, harass, abuse or assault" suggests that the order is to be understood as providing protection to a person from contact with the respondent which is unwelcome, and might be in various forms or have variable effect' ([12]-[16]).

Laa v The Queen* [2020] VSCA 136 (28 May 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

[49] '… SMS messages, that were the subject of charge 1, comprised an escalating series of threats sent to Ms M late at night and in the early hours of the morning. Plainly they were calculated to instil fear into her, and to undermine her right to feel safe and secure within her own home.'

Social abuse

A perpetrator of domestic and family violence may exert control over the victim by engaging in behaviours that spatially confine or restrain the victim; assert exclusive possession over the victim; monopolise the victim's skills and resources; or prevent the victim from keeping in touch with social networks, escaping the abusive relationship, or seeking help and support [Bagshaw 2000]. These behaviours may intersect with those known as economic or financial abuse and emotional or psychological abuse. The effect may be to physically and socially isolate the victim, and, over time, undermine the victim's sense of identity, independence and self worth. Typically, a perpetrator will be the victim's current or former intimate partner and, as such, may have special knowledge of the victim's circumstances that may be used to carry out these abusive behaviours [Stark 2007].

To physically isolate the victim, a perpetrator may lock the victim in a cupboard, room or car for long periods. The perpetrator may prevent the victim from leaving the house for work, driving a car, or going out alone or with others by blocking the driveway or hiding the victim's clothes, keys or mobile phone. The perpetrator may forbid the victim to work other than in the home, demanding that domestic chores and sexual acts be performed according to a schedule and standard imposed by the perpetrator.

A perpetrator may also dominate or regulate the victim's external activities and connections. For example, where the victim's income is critical to maintaining the perpetrator's lifestyle, the perpetrator may stalk the victim at the workplace; call repeatedly through the workday; contact co-workers to check on the victim's whereabouts; collect the victim at lunchtime to prevent occasions with co-workers; or force the victim to get a second job. Where the victim has valued relationships with family, friends and neighbours, or ties with a church, club or community group, the perpetrator may erode these connections by preventing the victim from making contact; insisting that the perpetrator accompany the victim; or sabotaging the victim's means of communication by stealing or destroying mail, deleting phone contacts and email messages, or impersonating the victim.

In instances where victims attempt to restore their freedom or reassert their independence by, for example, buying new clothes, making new friends, returning to study or joining a sporting team, the perpetrator may respond by imposing further and more stringent restrictions and monitors on the victim.

Where a perpetrator feels threatened by the prospect that the victim may escape the abusive relationship or seek help and support, the perpetrator may cut off the household telephone connection or destroy the victim's mobile phone; ring the police first to prevent the victim from making a complaint; or cancel the victim's medical or counselling appointments, refuse to drive the victim to the hospital, or deny the victim access to funds to cover necessities.

Research [Outlaw 2009] documents a range of experiences of victims of social abuse. The following are extracts of accounts by victims describing how perpetrators behaved towards them:

- Put down my physical appearance
- Told me I could not manage
- Criticised the way I took care of the house
- Became upset if household chores were not done
- Treated me like a personal servant
- Monitored my time
- Irresponsible with money, but stingy when I needed it
- Jealous or suspicious of my friends and other men
- Turned my family against me
- Accused me of having an affair
- Threatened to have an affair
- Tried to convince me I was crazy.

Social abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Anastasia Powell, Nicola Henry, Asher Flynn and Adrian Scott, 'Image-based sexual abuse: The extent, nature, and predictors of perpetration in a community sample of Australian residents' (2019) 92 Computers in Human Behavior 393-402.

Image-Based Sexual Abuse (IBSA) is defined as the non-consensual taking, distributing and/or making of threats to distribute nude or sexual images. IBSA is becoming increasingly criminalised in various jurisdictions worldwide. This article reports on a national online survey that examined the extent, nature and indicators of self-reported IBSA perpetration among a community sample of Australians aged between 16 and 49 years old. 56.7% of the participants were female, whilst 97.5% were non-Aboriginal and 88.3% were heterosexual. Results showed that 11.1% of participants reported having engaged in some form of IBSA perpetration during their lifetime, with men more likely to report IBSA perpetration than women. Participants reported targeting men and women at similar rates and were more likely to report perpetrating against intimate partners or ex-partners, family members and friends than strangers or acquaintances. Participants who were male, lesbian, gay or bi-sexual, disabled, or accepted sexual image-based abuse myths were more likely to engage in IBSA perpetration.

Bagshaw, Dale, et al, 'Reshaping Responses to Domestic Violence' (Final Report, University of South Australia and Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, April 2000).

This Australian research used a variety of methods including an anonymous 'phone-in' and focus groups. 102 women who were victims/survivors of domestic violence participated in the phone-in. 'Social abuse' was reported by 67 per cent of callers. Social abuse included 'systematic isolation of women from family and friends'. Techniques included perpetrators' ongoing rudeness to family and friends that gradually resulted in reluctance by family and friends to make contact due to concerns that contact would trigger abuse from the perpetrator. Other means by which women were socially isolated included moving to new towns or to the country where they knew nobody and were not allowed to go out and meet people. In some cases women were physically prevented from leaving the home and were kept 'prisoners' in their own homes' (p22-23).

Heather Douglas, Bridget Harris and Molly Dragiewicz, 'Technology-Facilitated Domestic and Family Violence: Women's Experiences' (2018) British Journal of Criminology.

The development of technology in recent years has significantly affected women's experiences of, and responses to, domestic violence. Devices and software, such as smartphones, cameras, Internet-connected devices, computers and platforms such as Facebook, may be used not only by perpetrators to facilitate domestic and family violence (DFV), but also by survivors and their allies to attain empowerment, and seek and share information and support. The article analyses qualitative research that outlined survivors' experiences of technology-facilitated DFV. It draws on interviews with 65 women on up to three occasions between 2014 and 2017. At the first interview, 55 participants identified technology-facilitated abuse as part of the DFV they experienced. This result was echoed in the following two interviews. Many participants provided examples of technology being used by perpetrators to isolate, stalk and emotionally abuse them. The frequency and nature of abusive behaviours described by the women provided important contextual data to inform future research into technology-facilitated violence and abuse.

Henry, Nicola, Asher Flynn and Anastasia Powell, Image-based sexual abuse: Victims and perpetrators (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 572 March 2019).

Report abstract:

Image-based sexual abuse (IBSA) refers to the non-consensual creation, distribution or threatened distribution of nude or sexual images. This research examines the prevalence, nature and impacts of IBSA victimisation and perpetration in Australia. This form of abuse was found to be relatively common among respondents surveyed and to disproportionately affect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people with a disability, homosexual and bisexual people and young people. The nature of victimisation and perpetration was found to differ by gender, with males more likely to perpetrate IBSA, and females more likely to be victimised by a partner or ex-partner.

Kristin Natalier, 'State Facilitated Economic Abuse: A Structural Analysis of Men Deliberately Withholding Child Support' (2018) 26 Feminist Legal Studies 121-140.

Economic abuse is a widespread and damaging aspect of intimate partner violence (IPV). Although research has mainly addressed cohabiting couples, women's long-term experiences after separation are seldom explored, and researchers have not developed a gendered analysis of child support-related economic abuse. Interviews with 37 single mothers were conducted to determine how men's deliberate withholding of child support can constitute economic abuse, which may be facilitated through gendered State processes and institutions that order child support transfers. The author argues that the State may facilitate gendered abuse through the design and implementation of the Australian Child Support Program (CSP). Child support-related economic abuse is not the result of a failed system. Instead, it reflects the role of the CSP as regulating, rather than preventing, economic abuse. Findings showed that women participants understood that the withholding of child support by their former partners was a means to control their acquisition and use of money, and undermined their economic security and autonomy. On this basis, women experienced their former partner's behaviours as post-separation economic abuse which, in turn, was normalised and intensified through the CSP policy.

Rees, Susan, and Bob Pease, Refugee Settlement, Safety and Well-being: Exploring Domestic and Family Violence in Refugee Communities (Paper 4 of the Violence Against Women Community Attitudes Project, Immigrant Women's Domestic Violence Service, 2006).

The researchers undertook focus groups with 78 participants (men and women) from refugee communities in Victoria. Social isolation was identified as a form of domestic and family violence with participants identifying that abusive partners may intentionally keep victims from social and community contact. Significantly, the study found that the experience of being a refugee is frequently isolating because of unemployment, limited finances and inadequate English language skills. This isolation places refugee women at an increased high risk of domestic and family violence (pp28-29).

International

Harrington Conner, Dana, 'Financial Freedom: Women, Money and Domestic Abuse' (2013-2014) 20 William and Mary Journal of Women and the Law 339.

This article is mainly focussed on domestic and family violence and economic abuse in the USA however the author presents a useful literature review explaining how socially abusive behaviours may contribute to the isolation of the victim (pp366-369). The author identifies that a woman's strong community and family ties may help to ensure her safety if she is abused while weak community and family ties promote risk. Community ties may include family, friends, neighbours and co-workers and these ties may be called 'social capital'. The perpetrator of abuse may actively work to destroy an abused person's social capital through restricting contact with neighbours, friends and co-workers, resulting in loss of support for the abused person and increased levels of control by the abuser. The author notes that isolation prevents "would-be" witnesses from observing injuries or acts of abuse, the procurement of photographic evidence, calls to law enforcement, and intervention by third parties. The author also observes that the abuser may restrict the victim's use of a car or telephone, having the effect of preventing her from calling for help and maintaining or increasing her social isolation.

Johnson, Margaret E, 'Redefining Harm, Reimagining Remedies and Reclaiming Domestic Violence Law ' (2009) 42 University of California Davis Law Review 1107.

This article criticises the USA focus on physical abuse in the context of domestic and family violence. At pp 1119, 1121-1122 the article discusses how abusers use isolating behaviours (including socially, economically and tangibly – i.e. no access to a car) in an effort to control the victim.

Outlaw, Maureen, 'No One Type of Intimate Partner Abuse: Exploring Physical and Non-Physical Abuse Among Intimate Partners' (2009) 24 Journal of Family Violence 263.

This article reports on a survey of 8,000 women and 8000 men conducted in the USA in 1994-1996. A sub-sample of 11,291 people who responded that they had current partners is examined. Respondents were asked about the experience of abuse within their relationships. In this article the author describes social abuse as generally involving an imposed isolation—victims are cut-off from family and friends, whether by threat, force, or persuasion. Social abuse includes circumstances in which a current partner limits contact with family and friends, insists on knowing where the victim is at all times, or insists on changing residences, even if s/he doesn't want or need to. The article identifies a strong correlation between social abuse and physical abuse.

Stark, Evan, Coercive Control: How Men Entrap Women in Personal Life (Oxford University Press, 2007).

This book is a key text on domestic and family violence. Although Stark is based in the United States his work has been highly influential in Australia. In this book Stark explains that domestic and family violence is a pattern of controlling behaviours akin to terrorism and hostage-taking. Drawing on court records, interviews, and FBI statistics, Stark details coercive strategies that men use to deny women their very personhood, from food logs to micromanaging dress, speech, sexual activity, and work. Stark urges us to move beyond the injury model and focus on this form of victimization. Stark reframes abuse as a liberty crime rather than a crime of assault. He explains how the perpetrator is able to control the victim through a variety of techniques which essentially lead to deprivation of liberty (pp 373-374). He identifies that isolation from friends, family, work and help (i.e. doctors and services) is part of domestic and family violence (pp 373-374; 469-471; 474-476; 478-486). Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

This Bench Book notes the definition of domestic violence used by the Department of Child Protection and Family Support (at [13.2.3]} which includes: "…Social violence is behaviour that limits, controls or interferes with a woman's social activities or relationships with others, such as controlling her movements and denying her access to family and friends. [For example] excessive questioning; monitoring movements and social media communications; preventing the victim from contact with people who share the victim's culture or language; and spreading lies about the victim through their support network as to discredit the victim."

Social isolation is recognised as a method of domination and control throughout this bench book (e.g. Sections 4.2, 11.1.13). Also see the discussion on the use of social isolation for people in same sex relationships (i.e. threatening to disclose their sexual orientation to their family and friends) in Section 8.8.3.

Evan Stark is a professor in the School of Public Affairs and Administration at Rutgers University. He is noted for his expertise in health issues and in legal aspects of domestic violence. His influential book, Coercive Control: How Men Entrap Women in Personal Life, 2007, explains why an expanded view of domestic violence that encompasses coercive control is justified. He asserts that coercive and controlling behaviour is a very common and pernicious form of domestic violence. In this lecture he summaries the core ideas of his book.

Social abuse - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Social abuse - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Lusted v MRB [2013] TASMC 9 (19 February 2013) – Magistrates' Court of Tasmania

Magistrate RW Pearce at [68]: 'Family violence is to be abhorred. It is a significant social problem, of concern to the community and the justice system. The parliament saw fit to enact legislation, the Family Violence Act 2004, expressly to "provide for an integrated criminal justice response to family violence which promotes the safety of people affected by family violence". The nature of family violence is that it is difficult to detect and prosecute. It is frequently the case that offences are committed in private and with little or no independent corroborative evidence. Moreover, family violence offences are often characterised by reluctance on the part of the victim to assist in the prosecution of offences. That is so for a range of factors including fear and a wish to preserve relationships, even dysfunctional ones, for the sake of loyalty, affection, companionship, economic and domestic support and in the perceived interest of children. Sometimes those motivations are misguided but persist nevertheless. As a consequence of such factors victims sometimes act in a way that seems to an outside observer to be incongruous and difficult to understand, including by failing to complain about, or hiding or lying about violence directed at them. Even if victims are willing to give evidence then the success of prosecutions depends principally on credibility of the uncorroborated account of the victim, a factor often taken advantage of by perpetrators and further adding to the reluctance of victims to complain'.

Bropho v Hall [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Mitchell J at [16]: 'The fact that the aggravated assault occurred in a domestic setting is a significant aggravating factor of the offence. An offence of this nature generally involves an abuse of the trust which one partner places in another, often where the victim is in a vulnerable position by reason of greater physical strength of the offender. The vulnerability of the victim is generally increased by the difficulty which she (it is usually a she) may have in extricating herself from the situation. As McLure P has noted, the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator is a hallmark of domestic violence. Recognising that common feature, it remains important for a court sentencing an offender for that kind of offence to take account of the need to protect persons in that vulnerable position, so far as the courts can do so by the imposition of a sentence, bearing a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offence, which has a deterrent effect and, in an appropriate case, removes the offender to a place where there is no opportunity to violently attack their partner' (which was approved by this court in Gillespie v The State of Western Australia [2016] WASCA 216 [48]).

The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [2]-[3]: 'The sentencing judge said: 'The decision to suspend [the sentence of imprisonment] or not is difficult but you are I think a person in whom I can grant suspension, and primarily because of your acceptance of responsibility in these unique circumstances in which there was a matrimonial breakdown, if you like, that you have reconciled, that your partner wants you back, that there is a child of your union and that you are a person who can get employment readily within the community and thereby if the system can rehabilitate you to assume full responsibility for your family through looking after them financially and by getting back into work, then rehabilitation perhaps outweighs the requirement for you to serve the term (ts 20)'.

'The circumstances to which the sentencing judge referred are neither unique nor mitigatory. The hallmark of domestic or relationship related violence is the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator of the violence. The otherwise appropriate penalty should not be reduced because there is a return to the status quo that existed prior to the breakdown of the relationship which precipitated the violence. It is also circular to rely on the return to the relationship status quo as the route to rehabilitation. Moreover, the emphasis on the domestic context marginalises the actual and threatened violence inflicted by the respondent on C'.

Exposing children to domestic and family violence

When domestic and family violence occurs between adults in families with children, those children are exposed to that violence. A significant number of Australian children are exposed to violence perpetrated most often against their mother by their father or their mother's current or former male partner [Richards 2011]. Much higher rates of exposure occur among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities [Flood & Fergus 2008]. According to the 2016 Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, approximately 50% of women 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a current partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, almost 70% of women who had children in their care when they 'experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence' [ABS PSS 2016]. Children do not however need to see or hear the domestic and family violence to be exposed to it.

Childhood exposure to domestic and family violence [FCFCA 2021] may be direct or indirect, with either form having the potential to cause significant harm [Canada DV BB 2020].

Examples include [Richards 2011]:

- Assault prior to birth
- Attempting to stop the violence or defend a parent
- Being threatened, harmed or abused by the perpetrator in order to control or intimidate the victim, for example: being used as a weapon or hostage; being blamed for the violence
- Being forced to watch or participate in the violence, or spy on a parent.
- Witnessing the violence
- Witnessing a parent's physical injuries
- Being neglected as a consequence of a parent's injuries
- Sleeping during the violence, or overhearing the violence from another room and taking measures to avoid being affected, for example: turning up the volume; sleeping with pillows over the ears; leaving the house and walking the streets
- Witnessing damage and destruction to furniture, toys and other family belongings

- Witnessing harm to family pets, or becoming aware that a pet has been given away, harmed or killed
- Experiencing the aftermath of the violence, for example: having to seek emergency assistance; witnessing a parent being interviewed or arrested by police; attending to a parent's injuries; having to interact with the perpetrator; knowing a parent may be stalked; coping with their own trauma, distress and injuries; assuming the care of family members; missing school; being removed home and community because they are not safe; being isolated from family and friends.
- Being forced into poverty or homelessness as a consequence of the perpetrator's economic abuse
- Growing up in an environment of stress without stability or security, and without appropriate adult role models.

A perpetrator may also use a range of tactics to undermine or destroy the relationship between mother and child [Hooker et al 2016]. Depending on the child's age, the perpetrator may deliberately abuse the victim in front of the child so as to induce fear in the child or a sense that their mother is weak and unable to protect herself. The perpetrator may discredit the victim's mothering skills by accusing her of being a bad mother, or he may coach and recruit the child in the perpetration of the violence, or isolate the victim and children from family, friends and other sources of support and care. Over time these corrosive and manipulative behaviours may increasingly restrict and control all aspects of the everyday lives of victims and their children, including their sense of reality and their capacity to act competently and assertively; and may ultimately impair their physical, emotional and mental health and wellbeing.

Different children in the same family may give dramatically different statements and testimony as a consequence of different experiences, for example one child may be the targeted child, another may be the protected child [Canada DV BB 2020].

It should be noted too that notwithstanding the extent of exposure to domestic and family violence a child may be reluctant to disclose their experiences or feelings for fear of not being believed or making the situation worse, or because they have been groomed or coerced not to disclose [Hart 2004]. The prevalence of exposure may also cause the child to perceive violence as normal and disclosure as unnecessary.

Parents and caregivers who perpetrate domestic and family violence are far more likely than other parents and caregivers to also perpetrate direct forms of child abuse and engage in negative parenting practices. The affected children in their care are also more likely to experience multiple additional adversities such as exposure to other forms of physical, sexual and emotional violence and abuse in the home, at school, and in the community [Canada DV BB 2020]. A child's exposure to domestic and family violence at any age may result in a range of poor psychological, behavioural and physical outcomes including depression, anxiety, trauma symptoms, increased aggression, antisocial behaviour, temperament and mood problems, impaired cognitive functioning, learning and schooling difficulties, low self-esteem, pervasive fear, peer conflict, loneliness, increased likelihood of alcohol or substance misuse, and vulnerability to unemployment and homelessness. It is also possible that domestic and family violence -exposed children may as adults exhibit attitudes and behaviours that reflect their childhood experiences [Sety 2011].

Exposing children to domestic and family violence may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

Approximately 50% of women 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a current partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, almost 70% of women who had children in their care when they 'experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Approximately 60% of men 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. See Tables 17-18 for further detail.

Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, Research summary: The impacts of domestic and family violence on children (2nd ed., ANROWS, 2018).

This summary outlines the major issues identified in ANROWS research relevant to children, the factors preventing effective service delivery, and the policy and practice changes recommended by the researchers.

Some key points include (pp 1-2):

- there is a greater likelihood of "impaired parenting" (e.g. parent irritability or inconsistency/low parenting efficacy) in homes with domestic and family violence;
- children are more likely to experience physical and verbal parental conflict after their parents separate;
- a significant number of mothers found that their children had started copying abusive attitudes and behaviours; and
- child protection agencies were less likely to investigate cases reported for domestic and family violence

vs. reports for other matters.

Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. Violence against women: Accurate use of key statistics (ANROWS, 2018).

This short resource includes a summary of information from the 2016 Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Survey on the numbers of pregnant women and children exposed to family and domestic violence (p 6). It states that an estimated 187,800 women who have experienced violence by a current partner have been pregnant during the relationship (and of these women, nearly one in five experienced violence during pregnancy). For violence perpetrated by previous partners, this percentage increased significantly: nearly half of women who experienced violence by a previous partner and were pregnant at some point in that relationship experienced violence during their pregnancy. Additionally, 65 percent of women who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a current or former partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence (p 8).

This literature review cites statistics from a US study collected from household census data from over 20,000 households (G. Fox and M. Benson 'Violent men, bad dads? Fathering profiles of men involved in intimate partner violence.' In R. Day & M. Lamb (Eds.), Conceptualizing and measuring father involvement. (Mahwah, New Jersey: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates Publishers, 2004)):

- 37% of children were accidentally hurt during domestic violence;
- 26% of children were intentionally hurt during domestic violence;
- 49% of mothers were hurt protecting children;
- 47% of perpetrators used the child as a pawn to hurt mothers;
- 39% of perpetrators hurt mothers as punishment for children's acts;
- 23% of perpetrators blamed mothers for perpetrators' own excessive punishment of children.

Flood, Michael, and Lara Fergus, An Assault on Our Future: The Impact of Violence on Young People and Their Relationships (Report, The White Ribbon Foundation, 2008).

Drawing on statistics from the National Crime Prevention Survey (2001) this paper reports that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander young people were significantly more likely to have witnessed physical domestic violence against their mother or step-mother than other young people (42%, compared to 23% for all respondents) (p11).

Hart, Amanda, 'Children Exposed to Domestic Violence: Undifferentiated Needs in Australian Family Law' (2004) 18 Australian Journal of Family Law 170.

This article points out that children may find it difficult to disclose violence because of a fear of not being believed and the possibility of making the situation worse. The article notes that children need to be included in determinations of what is in their best interests (p174).

Hooker, Leesa, Rae Kaspiew, and Angela Taft, Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed methods insights into impact and support needs: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

This comprehensive state of knowledge paper is the first of a three part mixed-methods research project addressing parenting and abuse tactics. This paper presents the current state of knowledge on parenting in the context of DFV by examining the following four research questions:

- What is the prevalence of DFV among parents?
- How does DFV impact on parenting capacity?
- What are the methods and behaviours that perpetrators use to disrupt the mother---child relationship?
- What interventions exist to strengthen and support a positive and healthy mother--child relationship?

This review identifies that DFV may impact negatively on women and children and the parenting capacity of both perpetrators and victims is affected. Altered mother--child relationships may occur due to deliberate undermining of the mother's parenting, and children are often used by perpetrators as tools to abuse mothers and exert control and coercion (p 2).

The report points out that violence does not end when couples separate. It specifically identifies the legal system as a tool of abuse used by perpetrators, and that poor understanding by legal professionals can heighten the risks for women and children (p 2).

Although there is limited information on the parenting style of abusive fathers, abusive men as fathers have been characterised by researchers and victims as authoritarian, under-involved, self-centred and manipulative. These men also engage in high levels of substance abuse. Children exposed to partner violence in the home by their father/stepfather are at heightened risk of child maltreatment including child sexual abuse (p 2).

The report suggests that supportive care includes improved understanding and collaboration between child protection, family law, and domestic violence advocacy services (p 2).

The report also identified issues with forced contact through court:

- Shared parenting can leave mothers and children exposed to continuing abuse (p 26).
- Post-separation matters, including negotiation of property, parenting and child support can be used by abusive ex-partners to maintain power and control (p 27).
- Women feel pressured by lawyers to agree to co-parenting arrangements even though children's safety may be at risk, or make decisions in an environment of fear, pragmatic concern, and family ideology (e.g. perpetrators playing on guilt about "breaking up" the family) (p 28).
- Awareness amongst court staff in screening for family violence and safety concerns still remains problematic, despite legal and policy reform (p 28).

Humphreys, Cathy and Lucy Healey, PAThways and Research Into Collaborative Inter-Agency practice: Collaborative work across the child protection and specialist domestic and family violence interface: Final report (ANROWS, 2017).

PAThways and Research In Collaborative Inter-Agency practice (the PATRICIA Project) is an action research project focused on the collaborative relationship between specialist community-based domestic and family violence support services for women and their children, and statutory child protection organisations.

The study found that even when domestic and family violence was the focus of an initial child protection report, it was poorly addressed—for example, no link being made between an abusive father's patterns of behaviour and the barriers they caused to the healthy, daily functioning of the family (p 12). The study also found that collaborations between child protection and domestic and family violence services showed a lack of engagement with the family law system. Evidence of the impact of abuse on children was rarely adequately recorded in child protection files, and family law issues were rarely addressed in ways that would enable the protection of children from ongoing contact with an abusive father (p 14).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al., Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed method insights into impact and support needs – Final report (ANROWS, 2017).

This report focused on:

- inter-parental conflict (IPC) in families and impacts on the emotional health and parenting behaviours of mothers and fathers and child functioning;
- how domestic and family violence (DFV) experienced before separation, after separation, or both affects parents' emotional health and parent–child relationships; and
- mothers' experiences of engagement with services in the domestic and family violence, child protection, and family law systems in the context of DFV.

Overall, it found that any exposure to IPC or DFV is associated with poorer wellbeing outcomes for mothers and children in both intact and separated families (compared with families where such exposure does not occur). Sustained exposure to IPC and DFV is particularly damaging (p 13). The impacts of DFV on mothering and mother–child relationships are multiple and often continue post-separation (p 10).

The findings also show that for a significant proportion of families, exposure to IPC and DFV is sustained after separation, and it escalates for some (p 12).

The results point to the importance of early reduction in family conflict, and the need for approaches post-separation that prioritise the reduction of exposure to IPC and DFV. This includes the need for approaches to help women and children repair relationships that have been damaged as a result of DFV (p 14).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al., Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed method insights into impact and support needs – Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

In interviews with 50 women across Australia with experience of family violence, the study found that controlling and coercive behaviours were the most common tactic of abuse used by abusive fathers, which included setting rigid routines and/or having unreasonable expectations about children's behaviour. Out of the 50 women interviewed, 45 described direct abuse toward their children, including psychological, emotional, physical, and sexual abuse, as well as witnessing abuse or being a direct victim of incidents that targeted the mother at the same time (p 3).

The report identified negative fathering behaviours occurring before and after separation, in addition to behaviour that was directly abusive to children. This includes (p 5):

- inattentive and inconsistent fathering;
- manipulative behaviours that had the effect of undermining relationships between mothers and children (often through the use of material resources);
- the exertion of controlling tactics in relation to mothers and children; and
- the manifestation of behaviours and negative attitudes to women in general and the mothers in particular, including abusive and denigrating attitudes that were adopted by some of the children (also, e.g. playing the "good" parent").

The study found that courts give limited capacity to women to challenge the ongoing parenting role of the abusive parent due to priority placed on "meaningful relationships" and women's concerns that they may be seen as an "alienating" parent (p 5).

The findings from the longitudinal quantitative analysis in the study showed that children who live with such violence are more likely to have a range of health, development and social problems (p 4).

Meyer, S, Reeves, E, Fitz-Gibbon, K. The intergenerational transmission of family violence: Mothers' perceptions of children's experiences and use of violence in the home. Child & Family Social Work. 2021; 1– 9.

Abstract: Intimate partner violence (IPV) on average affects one in four women, with the majority of victim survivors identifying as mothers in national survey data. Children experiencing parental IPV are now equally understood as victims. Extensive research documents the short- and long-term impacts of children's experiences of IPV on their safety and wellbeing. More recently, research has started to examine adolescent children's use of violence in the home as adolescent family violence (AFV). Contributing to this emerging body of research, we draw on narrative interview data from mothers who participated in a larger study on IPV, help-seeking and the perceived impact on children to better understand how mothers make sense of children's use of violence in the home. Mothers identified an emergence of AFV in male children with childhood experiences of adult IPV. Although mothers' experiences of adult and adolescent violence highlight their dual victimisation, mothers frame their abusive children as victims rather than perpetrators. Implications for future research, policy and trauma-informed practice are discussed.

Powell, Anastasia and Suellen Murray, 'Children and Domestic Violence: Constructing a Policy Problem in Australia and New Zealand' (2008) 17(4) Social and Legal Studies 453.

This article discusses the relationship between domestic violence responses, child protection responses and family law responses, where a child witnesses or experiences domestic violence. It identifies that (p467):

'Where domestic violence responses, child protection responses and family law responses collide, a mother may simultaneously be constructed as being responsible for protecting her children from the influence of an ex-partner's violence, in need of support and protection herself, and responsible for facilitating the other parent's contact with children.'

'Similarly, children may be simultaneously constructed as primary 'victims' in need of protection from exposure to parental violence, as secondary victims who can be protected from exposure to a father's violence by supporting/protecting the mother, or as 'witnesses' of parental conflict who will benefit most from equal contact with both parents. Domestic violence itself is understood differently throughout these contested discourses…'

Richards, Kelly, 'Children's Exposure to Domestic Violence in Australia' (2011) 419 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

This paper presents a helpful overview of relevant literature. It identifies that children who live in homes characterised by violence between parents, or directed at one parent by another, have been called the 'silent', 'forgotten', 'unintended', 'invisible' and/or 'secondary' victims of domestic violence.

It summarises the research that demonstrates that witnessing domestic and family violence can involve a broad range of incidents, including the child:

- hearing the violence;
- being used as a physical weapon;
- being forced to watch or participate in assaults;
- being forced to spy on a parent;
- being informed that they are to blame for the violence because of their behaviour;
- being used as a hostage;
- defending a parent against the violence; and/or
- intervening to stop the violence.

It summarises research on the impact of domestic and family violence on children in the aftermath of violence including:

- having to telephone for emergency assistance;
- seeing a parent's injuries after the violence and having to assist in 'patching up' a parent;
- having their own injuries and/or trauma to cope with;
- dealing with a parent who alternates between violence and a caring role;
- seeing the parents being arrested; and
- having to leave home with a parent and/or dislocation from family, friends and school.

Sety, Megan, 'The Impact of Domestic Violence on Children: A Literature Review' (Report, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 1 August 2011).

This review identifies that:

- Children experience serious emotional, psychological, social, behavioural and developmental consequences as a result of experiencing violence.
- Infants and young children are especially at risk.
- Perpetrators often attack or undermine the mother-child relationship and use children in committing violence, such as threats to harm the children.

- Children continue to be at risk from the effects of violence during and after parents' separation.
- Children experience significant risks in shared parenting arrangements when the arrangement involves substantial shared time with the violent parent.
- The evidence shows that false allegations of domestic violence and child abuse are rare. There is, however, evidence to suggest that perpetrators often deny or minimise their use of violence.

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Tomison, Adam M, 'Exploring Family Violence: Links Between Child Maltreatment and Domestic Violence' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 13, Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2000).

This article reviews the research about the relationship between domestic violence and various forms of child maltreatment. In particular it points to the high proportion of cases of emotional abuse of children identified by child protection workers in families where there is domestic and family violence and to the mild association between presence of domestic violence and a higher than expected proportion of children sustaining injuries. Pages 8-9 of this article discusses the variety of ways a child may be exposed to domestic violence, including as a hostage to ensure the mother's return home and forcing a child to watch assaults.

Wolbers, H, Boxall, H., and Morgan A. (2023) Exposure to intimate partner violence and the physical and emotional abuse of children: Results from a national survey of female carers. Research Report 26, Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Drawing on a large sample of female carers living in Australia (n=3,775), this study aims to document and explore children and young people's experiences of abuse in the past 12 months. We focus on children's exposure to intimate partner violence (IPV) perpetrated against their female carers, as well as children being the target of direct physical and emotional abuse themselves.

Overall, a significant proportion of respondents who had a child in their care during the past 12 months said that a child was exposed to IPV perpetrated against them (14.1%). One in nine said a child in their care had been the target of direct abuse perpetrated by their current or most recent former partner (11.5%). Critically, one-third of respondents who experienced IPV said a child was exposed to the violence at least once in the past 12 months (34.8%).

A number of factors were associated with an increased likelihood of children being subjected to direct abuse. These included the characteristics of respondents and their relationships, children and households. We also present evidence linking economic factors, including changes in employment, with the direct abuse of children.

Edleson, Jeffrey L, 'Children's Witnessing of Adult Domestic Violence' (1999) 14(8) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 839.

In this foundational article, the author reviews 31 research articles published since 1989. As a result of the review, the author attempts to 'expand common definitions of how children witness adult domestic violence by showing how children not only see violence but also hear it occurring, are used as part of it, and experience its aftermath' (p16). A variety of behavioural, emotional, and cognitive-functioning problems among children were found to be associated with exposure to domestic violence. The author identifies factors that appear to moderate the impact of witnessing violence (eg whether the child was also abused, child gender and age and time since last exposure to violence).

Holt, Amanda, 'Adolescent-to-Parent Abuse as a Form of "Domestic Violence": A Conceptual Review' (2016) 17(5) Trauma, Violence, & Abuse 490-499.

This article discusses adolescent-to-parent abuse (APA), varied forms of abusive behaviour perpetrated by a child toward a parent (p 490). Mothers are more likely to be victims of APA than fathers (p 490), and correlations have been identified between APA and abusive behaviours within a young person's dating relationships (p 491). As a distinct form of abuse, it is not necessarily appropriate to approach APA within a traditional domestic violence framework (p 496). Responding to APA raises issues separate from youth crime and domestic and family violence more broadly:

- Parental responsibility orders are inappropriate in cases where the burdened parent is a victim of the perpetrator's APA, as such orders may cause revictimisation (p 492).
- Attitudes that place responsibility or blame on the victim parent must be avoided, as they may lead to victim blaming in cases of APA (p 493).
- The gendered focus on these issues should be reduced in APA cases, in order to properly engage with the child-parent abuse dynamic (p 495).

Jane E M Callaghan et al, 'Beyond "Witnessing": Children's Experiences of Coercive Control in Domestic Violence and Abuse' (2015) Journal of Interpersonal Violence (online).

This article investigates children's experiences with domestic and family violence (DFV), through interviews with 21 children who have been victims of DFV (p 7). The results indicate that children are aware of patterns of coercive control, and the impacts of such abuse (pp 10-3). Such experiences result in an increased sense of constraint, which children may develop specific strategies to cope with (pp 14-6).

Significantly, the article raises children's direct agency in coping with, and responding to, DFV, highlighting the inaccuracy of treating children as merely passive witnesses (pp 17-20). Accordingly, the authors recommend that professional responses to DFV better recognise children's agency, moving beyond perceptions of them as passive witnesses, and tailor strategies for children as direct victims (pp 22, 23-4).

Jofre-Bonet, Mireia, Melcior Rossello-Roig, Victoria Serra-Sastre, The Blow of Domestic Violence on Children's Health Outcomes (City University London, London School of Economics, 2016).

This study examines the effect of domestic violence on children's health outcomes. Drawing results from the UK Millennium Cohort Study, the authors found that 'there was a strong negative externality of household violence on children's health outcomes'. Children living in a household where there was domestic violence appeared to be between 55% and 61% less likely to have their health rated as Excellent'. This paper 'not only sheds light on the negative impact of domestic violence on children's health but provides a robust quantification of this effect'.

Simon Lapierre et al., 'Difficult but Close Relationships: Children's Perspectives on Relationships With Their Mothers in the Context of Domestic Violence' (2018) 24(9) Violence Against Women 1023-1038.

Despite a recent focus in the literature on mother-child relationships, there is a limited understanding of children's perspectives on their relationships with their mothers. This article reports the findings from a participative and qualitative study involving Canadian children who experienced domestic violence, and focuses on their perspectives on their relationships with their mothers under those circumstances. 46 individual interviews were conducted with children to gather their experiences. Results showed that women's and children's victimisations are inextricably linked. Notwithstanding the negative effects of domestic violence on mother-child relationships, the participants' mothers played a significant role in their children's lives and had close relationships with them. Communication was also found to be an important element in mother-child relationships. However, several participants stated that the communication with their mothers was limited whilst they lived with the domestic violence perpetrator. As the participants experienced domestic violence alongside their mothers, the results also revealed a dynamic of mutual protectiveness. Overall, the findings emphasised the need for policies and practices that support mother-child relationships in the context of domestic violence, as well as programs that support mother-child relationships or facilitate mother-child communication.

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

In the context of examining the reasons for the differential treatment of children in the criminal justice system, at pp.151-153, the bench book looks at the issue of child development and immaturity. It notes: ‘It is well recognised today that childhood and adolescence are key developmental phases, and that early experiences can affect that development. Parenting, including parental absence, plays a fundamental role in how children come to perceive themselves, as well as the world around them and how they interact with it. This includes matters such as the understanding of right and wrong, impulse control, and the taking of responsibility for one’s actions’. The bench book provides a discussion of the science regarding children’s development before stating, ‘where children are neglected or abused (particularly if severely or for prolonged periods), they are likely to progress into in a chronic state of fear and to respond accordingly. Such hyper arousal is to the detriment of other functions and also tends to mean these children struggle to comprehend any later attempts at nurturing and kindness’.

The bench book highlights that children are often overlooked in domestic violence proceedings (Section 6.2), and goes on to discuss the different types of harm experienced by children of different ages and how to respond to evidence from them (Section 6.3). Approaches for '[d]esigning agreements and orders to limit child harm' are also considered (Section 6.4), and implementing appropriate court procedures in relation to children testifying are also considered.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Laa v The Queen [2020] VSCA 136 (28 May 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

[52] 'The courts have made it clear that acts of violence in a domestic setting, and in particular by men towards women, are utterly abhorrent and unacceptable. In this case, the infliction by the applicant of the assaults on Ms M, in the presence of their frightened young children, was a serious aggravating factor to the offending. It was a serious breach of his duty as a parent towards his own children. In assaulting their mother before their eyes, he set an appalling example to each of them, and in particular to his son.'

Boden & Boden [2018] FCCA 82 (25 January 2018) – Federal Circuit Court of Australia

Judge Willis remarked at [247]:

> I have the impression that the mother has significant insight into her own behaviour and that of all of the children. She is acutely aware and has the skills to deal with Z and Y cutting themselves, of them suffering depression and anxiety and having self-esteem issues. Some of these issues will, no doubt, be directly related to their exposure to family violence. Day in day out, experts in this Court talk about the effect of family violence in children and their inability to sustain relationships, become depressed and blame themselves for breakdowns. All of these things have happened for Y and Z.

R v Bell [2005] ACTSC 123 (1 December 2005) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Higgins CJ at [30]: Domestic violence, 'is a pernicious and evil phenomenon not only because of the immediate trauma to the victim. Its evil influence spreads to children as well. It is no coincidence that, in my experience, young offenders, more often than not, present with a family history of domestic violence. It used to be regarded as a family matter, to be kept private. Victims would be made to feel humiliated, and ashamed to complain; in truth it is entirely the criminal conduct of the perpetrator which is at fault. It is entirely in the public interest that such conduct be exposed and deterred'.

Pasa v Bell [2014] ACTSC 303 (30 October 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Murrell CJ at [16]: 'When considering the sentencing purposes set out in s 7 of the Sentencing Act, including general and personal deterrence, a sentencing court is entitled to consider the fact that an offence involved domestic violence, and that the violence has occurred at the victim's home. An offence involving domestic violence is one that involves abuse of a partner, former partner or other family member (using the term "family" in the broadest sense). Frequently, such offences occur in the home, where the inhibitions of an offender may be lowered, the impact on the victim may be heightened (as she or he is made to feel that a formerly safe place has been violated) and the occurrence of the offence is more readily concealed. Further, where a domestic violence offence occurs in the victim's home, it is often associated with secondary abuse to other family members'.

R v Eckermann [2013] NSWCCA 188 (15 August 2013) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Price J at [54]: 'When women (and men) enter into a new domestic relationship, they are entitled to do so without the threat of violence from a former partner. This is particularly so when there are children of the prior relationship as acts of violence towards a parent particularly when committed in the children's presence have the potential to impact severely upon their well-being and future development'.

Allen v Kerr [2009] TASSC 10 (25 February 2009) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Porter J at [13]: 'Violence witnessed by children in the domestic environment not only is distressing (usually the victim is a parent or someone in the place of a parent), but it also serves to desensitise impressionable minds to violence, and to encourage the notion that resort to violence is acceptable'.

Mayne v Tasmania [2017] TASSC 38 (29 June 2017) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Wood J said at [43]:

> … it is important that deterrent sentences be imposed not merely for crimes that cause grave physical or psychological harm to victims. There is a need to counter the perception that somehow violence of this kind in the home is less serious than the same kind of violence inflicted on a stranger in a public place. Also, acts of violence committed in a family or domestic context causing fear and distress to victims can have debilitating effects upon their well-being or the well-being of a family member witnessing such violence. It is not only violence resulting in visible injury that must be seen as unacceptable, and these victims, as vulnerable members of our society who have experienced fear and trauma, are entitled to the court's protection.

Bropho v Hall [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Mitchell J at [18]-[19]: ‘ A person exposed to domestic violence in his early life goes on as an adult to perpetrate the violence to which he was exposed as a child, damaging members of his community in the same way he was damaged as a child. For that reason, the fact that the appellant's offence was committed in the presence of children was a significant aggravating factor. The courts are not in a position to solve all of the social problems which contribute to this cycle of violence. However, sentences imposed by courts should contribute, so far as they can within the constraints of the sentencing process, to attempts to break the cycle by giving proper weight to the need for community protection in the sentences which they impose’.

Damaging property

A perpetrator of domestic and family violence may engage in a range of behaviours so as to exert control over or induce fear in the victim. Damaging property may intersect with other behaviours such as emotional or psychological abuse [Mouzos et al 2004], economic abuse [Sanders 2015], physical violence or harm, and sexual or reproductive abuse to produce a complex pattern of violence, the seriousness of which may intensify as the behaviours combine and escalate [Canada DV BB 2020]. For example, victims experience significantly higher levels of physical violence where the perpetrator has also damaged property [Mouzos et al 2004].

Instances reported in Australian research demonstrate the various ways perpetrators seek to control, intimidate, threaten, injure, demean or isolate victims by interfering with property, which may in some cases include abuse of pets and assistance animals. They may steal, damage or destroy personal property that is shared between the victim and perpetrator, owned by or in the possession of the victim, or otherwise used or enjoyed by the victim or the victim's children or other family members. For example, the perpetrator may steal the victim's ATM or bank account access card and empty the victim's account of funds to prevent the victim from leaving the abusive relationship. The perpetrator may cut the telephone cord while the victim attempts to call police; or vandalise or wreck household furnishings or personal effects (including mobile phones and other digital devices) and clothing that the victim has paid for or are sentimental to the victim. The perpetrator may steal, or immobilise or tamper with the victim's car, or use the car as a weapon, for example to run the victim over so as to injure them or hinder their escape. The perpetrator may also attack the victim's home by breaking windows, chopping holes in the roof, or driving a vehicle into a wall [Klein et al 1992-1993].

Damaging property may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Karystianis, G., Adily, A., Schofield, P.W., et. al., 'Automated Analysis of Domestic Violence Police Reports to Explore Abuse Types and Victim Injuries: Text Mining Study' (2019) 21(3) Journal of Medical Internet Research.

The recording of domestic violence-related events by police is an area that requires further investigation. The study aimed to determine if an automated text mining method could identify abuse types and injuries sustained by domestic violence victims. Using data mining to evaluate 492,393 Australian domestic violence police reports, more than one-third noted victim injuries. The most common abuse type was emotional/verbal at 33.46%, followed by punching at 24.58%, and property damage at 22.27%. Bruising was the most common form of injury (29.03%), followed by cut/abrasion (28.93%), and red marks/signs (23.71%). The findings show that text mining can automatically extract information from police-recorded domestic violence events. These findings can be used to support further public health research the purpose of which is to assess the profiling of persons of interest involved in domestic violence events, and to change existing intervention policies for abuse victims.

Mouzos, Jenny, and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey, and provided information on their experiences of physical and sexual violence. In this paper the authors describe damage and destruction of property as a form of emotional abuse. The authors find that women whose current partners damaged or destroyed property or possessions, reported levels of physical violence almost eight times higher during the previous 12 months than the average for current intimate partner violence in general (23% versus 3%) (p48).

Follingstad, Diane R, et al, 'The Role of Emotional Abuse in Physically Abusive Relationships' (1990) 5(2) Journal of Family Violence 107.

This study reports on a qualitative study in which 234 women were interviewed to assess the relationship of emotional abuse to physical abuse. Six major types of emotional abuse were identified. One of the types of emotional abuse identified was damage or destruction of the personal property of the victim. The article provides examples of this form of abuse, including the abuser selecting a favourite personal object belonging to the victim and destroying it or cutting up clothes or tearing up favourite pictures in front of the victim (p109).

Klein, Catherine F, and Leslye E Orloff, 'Providing Legal Protection for Battered Women: An Analysis of State Statutes and Case Law' (1992-1993) 21 Hofstra Law Review 801.

This comprehensive article overviews American statutes and case law in relation to domestic violence civil protection orders. While the law is not relevant here, there is a useful discussion of property damage as a form of domestic and family violence (at p872-874) explaining that perpetrators often damage the victim's property in order to 'terrorise, threaten and exert control' over the victim. This article reports on a number of cases where protection orders were issued in circumstances where perpetrators have: destroyed furniture; broken windows and skylights; chopped holes in the roof with an axe; driven a truck through a garage wall; damaged the victim's car; destroyed household property; destroyed pets (a form of property) and destroyed items of sentimental value to the victim.

Pollet, Susan, 'Economic Abuse: The Unseen Side of Domestic Violence' (2011) 83(2) New York State Bar Association Journal 40.

The article focuses on economic abuse as a form of domestic violence perpetrated against women, commonly, by their intimate partners or ex-partners. The article describes damaging, or destroying property as a form of economic abuse in those cases where it has implications for the victim's autonomy.

Sanders, Cynthia K, 'Economic Abuse in the Lives of Women Abused by an Intimate Partner: A Qualitative Study' (2015) 21(1) Violence Against Women 3.

This article presents research from a qualitative study involving 30 interviewees. The study examined the role of financial issues and economic factors in the lives of women who have experienced domestic and family violence. 'Stealing and Destruction of Property' is considered at p20-21 as a form of abuse. Interviewees gave examples including the destruction of a motor vehicle which was the victim's form of transport and destruction of furniture and children's toys. Victims also spoke of having to hide property including documents to ensure they were kept safe.

'There is growing social recognition that a wide range of behaviours may constitute domestic violence. Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

This Bench Book notes the definition of domestic violence used by the Department of Child Protection and Family Support (at [13.2.3]) which includes: "…Physical violence is any actual or threatened attack on another person's physical safety and bodily integrity. In addition to threatened or actual harm to people, it includes harming or threatening to harm pets or possessions."

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

This bench book recognises property damage as a behaviour of domestic violence throughout the book (e.g. Section 4.2). It notes that damaging property may occur as an interconnected form of abuse with other behaviours: '[e]motional abuse … financial abuse and physical/sexual violence are interconnected phenomena. A pattern of emotional or financial abuse, associated with intimidation, domination and control, often escalates into physical or sexual violence' (Section 9.3.1.2).

In considering responses to domestic violence, the bench book specifically discusses orders relating to personal property, explaining that: ‘[a]ttention to details such as immediate possession of specific items of personal property may be insignificant in terms of absolute value yet can make an enormous difference to family members with limited resources who are attempting to leave violent relationships. Attention to such details can make the difference between putting an end to intimidation, harassment and abuse, and allowing it to continue’ (Section 9.3.5). For instance, orders should consider including provisions to prevent damage to: vehicles; identity papers, visas, passports and immigration documents; diaries; aids for disability (e.g. wheelchairs); and children’s toys, clothing and pets (Section 9.3.5.2).

Damaging property - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Laa v The Queen [2020] VSCA 136 (28 May 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

[50] '… confrontational aggravated burglaries, in the setting of an underlying domestic dispute, are all too prevalent in our society. They are calculated to cause lasting and serious physical and emotional harm to the victim. By their nature, such offences have the potential to escalate into incidents that result in serious harm and, on occasion, human tragedy. For that reason, general deterrence is a sentencing purpose of particular significance in such cases. It is important that the courts, by sentences imposed in such cases, make it clear that those persons who contemplate indulging in such a form of conduct will, upon apprehension, lose their right to be at liberty in society for a substantial period of time.'

[51] 'In addition, it is important, in cases such as this, that the courts express their condemnation of the kind of conduct engaged in by the applicant. Ms M was entitled to feel safe and secure in her own home. The offending in this case constituted a serious violation by the applicant of that fundamental right.'

BJH v CJH [2016] QDC 27 (26 February 2016) – District Court of Queensland

Rackermann DCJ at [11]: 'The action of the appellant in seizing the aggrieved's mobile telephone was behaviour which, in the circumstances, was coercive - being designed to compel the aggrieved to do something which she did not wish to do (ie come downstairs to discuss matters of concern to the appellant). Further, the appellant responded to the aggrieved's attempt to get her telephone back by, amongst other things, throwing the phone onto the floor thereby damaging it. That the phone was discarded in a throwing motion had support in the evidence'.

Groenewege v Tasmania [2013] TASCCA 7 (26 July 2013) – Court of Criminal Appeal of Tasmania

Porter J at [52]-[53]: 'The appellant intentionally set fire to the house and intentionally caused its entire destruction. His motive for doing so was to exact some sort of vengeance on his estranged wife intending to destroy his wife's interest in the building and its availability as a home. He told police that he set the fire "because if I couldn't have it, no one could". He also caused the destruction of the home of his four young children, one of whom suffers from a significant disability. He caused the total destruction of the belongings of the whole of his family'.

'This was obsessive and possessive conduct, involving some violence, committed in the aftermath of a broken relationship. It is the type of conduct which simply cannot be tolerated. Ms Hartnett submitted that the arson crime could be also regarded as a crime of family violence, in addition to the crime of assault. As such the course of conduct involved a breach of trust: Parker v R 57/1994 (AustLII [1994] TASSC 94) per Underwood J at 11. It is unnecessary to decide whether the label of family violence can be correctly applied to the crime of arson in these circumstances. The notions underlying the concept of a breach of trust are effectively the same. To intentionally deprive a spouse of his or her home in such a way amounts to very hurtful subjugation, and exploits a position of vulnerability'.

DPP v Meyers [2014] VSCA 314 (4 December 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The Court at [45] and [46]: 'We would wish to endorse the remarks in Filiz about the particular seriousness of offending involving former domestic partners. Violence of this kind is alarmingly widespread, and extremely harmful. The statistics about the incidence of women being killed or seriously injured by vengeful former partners are truly shocking. Although the cases under consideration do not fall into that worst category, they are symptomatic of what can fairly be described as an epidemic of domestic violence'.

'General deterrence is, accordingly, a sentencing principle of great importance in cases such as these. Those who might, in a mood of anger or frustration or bitterness, contemplate this kind of violent entry into the home of a former spouse or partner must realise that, if they do so, they will almost certainly spend a long time in prison'.

The State of Western Australia v Bennett [2009] WASCA 93 (26 May 2009) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

Miller JA at [50]: ‘It cannot be doubted that the offence of arson committed in this instance was serious enough to bring it within the category of 'very serious cases of arson' in which a range of sentences of 4 to 7 years' imprisonment, in 'pre-transitional' terms, has been identified. This is so because the respondent's offending was apparently motivated by revenge, it caused the destruction of a residential building, and it was against the background of a violent domestic relationship’.

Rimington v The State of Western Australia [2015] WASCA 102 (29 May 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

Beech J at [69]: ‘The sentencing judge correctly identified a number of features of the appellant's offending that made it a very serious example of the offence of arson: (1) the appellant lit three fires over a period of approximately 1 hour; (2) the offences involved a degree of preparation; (3) the offences were founded on the appellant's anger towards his ex-wife. His intention was to destroy the properties that he set on fire in order to defeat his ex-wife's claim to those properties; (4) the appellant acted with 'grim determination'; (5) the offences endangered the lives and safety of a number of people; (6) the fires the subject of counts 3 and 4 were lit at homes in residential areas and caused fear and distress to people living nearby; (7) the fires caused very extensive damage totalling approximately $1.5 million; (8) at both the Honeyeater Loop and Piggot Way properties, the appellant sought to deflect the concerns of a neighbour who saw the appellant preparing to light a fire; (9) as the victim impact statement reveals, the appellant's offences have had devastating and enduring effects on his former wife and on their children’.

Animal abuse

Victims of domestic and family violence may rely on family pets for emotional support while trying to cope with the abusive relationship. A perpetrator may exploit this emotional bond by using overt threats and actual harm to pets in order to further control or intimidate the victim [Roguski 2012]. This behaviour has also been described as a form of emotional abuse [Faver & Strand 2007]. Children may be exposed to animal abuse in the context of domestic and family violence [Ascione et al 2007]. It is recognised that perpetrators may initiate or continue animal abuse post separation; and that threats of abuse to animals may contribute to some victims delaying leaving or returning to the abusive relationship due to concerns for the welfare of family pets, thus increasing the victim's exposure to the possibility of further violence [Ascione et al 2007]. Abuse or threats of abuse have particular implications if the victim has a disability or mental illness and the animal is a service or assistance animal such as a guide dog [Harpur & Douglas 2015].

Some examples of animal abuse include: being skinned alive; beaten against a tree with a crowbar; punched, beaten, or kicked; shot; fed gunpowder; hung; thrown across the room; or subjected to acts of bestiality. Animals may also suffer in other ways, for example, exposing themselves to physical harm by attempting to protect their guardians during an abusive episode, and suffering severe anxiety and distress at witnessing the abuse of their guardian.

Perpetrators who abuse animals are more likely to have committed violent crimes and property and drug-related offences. Perpetrators may sometimes use animals as weapons against victims; and threats of harm to animals may be used to coerce victims to commit illegal acts [Ascione et al 2007], for example there are reported instances of the victim being forced by the perpetrator to watch animal-related pornography or to engage in sexual activities with animals. Victims in these circumstances may feel a great sense of desperation and anguish at having to violate their own value systems [Faver & Strand 2007].

Some victims in the process of leaving an abusive relationship may be unable to make alternative safe arrangements for the care of their pets, for example due to lack of funds or lack of suitable shelter accommodation for animals or for people with animals. In some cases, victims may give away or abandon their pets with the possible consequence of heightening the trauma experienced due to the domestic and family violence. In other cases, the victim may feel they have no choice but to leave the pets in the perpetrator's care, which may result in the perpetrator neglecting, threatening to or actually harming or killing the pets, or otherwise using them to continue to exercise control over the victim, including using the ongoing threats or potential for harm as a means of coercing the victim to return to the abusive relationship to protect the pets [Faver & Strand 2007].

Animal abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control. While animal abuse may also be understood as a form of damage to property many argue this approach denies the sentience of animals [Taylor & Fraser 2019].

Animal abuse - Key Literature

Australia

Harpur, Paul, and Heather Douglas, 'Disability and Domestic Violence: Protecting Survivors' Human Rights' (2015) 23 (3) Griffith Law Review 405.

This paper reviews the literature in relation to domestic violence, the legal system and disability. It considers how disability domestic violence may be manifested eg pp 408-411 identifies that those victims who require support from their partners for daily tasks can be especially vulnerable to abuse (e.g. leaving a person who requires assistance off the toilet on the toilet for hours). Victims who rely on mobility aids, medication or medical technologies are especially vulnerable to partners who restrict access. It notes that people with disabilities have significantly different relationships with their pets when pets are service animals (e.g. guide dogs for blind and deaf people) – perpetrators who threaten or harm pets can have an extremely disabling impact upon a survivor with a disability; threatening to injure or immobilise a service animal is particularly distressing for a person who relies on that animal for their independence.

Kotzmann, J., Bagaric, M Wolf, G. & Stonebridge, M. Addressing the impact of animal abuse: The need for legal recognition of abused pets as sentient victims of domestic violence in Australia. (2022) 45(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 184-208.

This article reviews current literature about animal abuse in the context of domestic violence (pp187-196) It then proposes introducing laws that recognise such animals as sentient victims of domestic violence arguing that this would enable courts to make orders protecting these animals, which would safeguard their welfare and ensure that people with whom they live who are also experiencing domestic violence can escape without worrying about the fate of their animals and it would convey the seriousness of animal cruelty, and might increase support for and awareness of programs for rehoming abused animals, and training of people involved with animals to identify and report animal abuse.

Tania Signal, Nik Taylor, Karena Burke and Luke Brownlow, 'Double Jeopardy: Insurance, Animal Harm, and Domestic Violence' (2018) 24(6) Violence Against Women 718.

This article analyses the overlap between animal harm and insurance discrimination for victims/survivors of domestic violence (DV). Deliberate harm of animals is an indicator of antisocial behaviours, including DV perpetration (p 719). Companion animals may hold special emotional significance for victims of DV, especially when they are also targeted for abuse. Adult victims of DV often risk their own wellbeing to protect their companion animals by delaying leaving, or returning to, a violent relationship. An online search of Australian insurance companies was conducted to assess different policy stipulations regarding companion animals, and to determine whether non-accidental injury caused by an intimate partner would be covered. The authors also discuss the implications of exclusion criteria for victims/survivors of DV, shelters for animals implicated in a violent and/or abusive domestic relationship, and, more broadly, for cross or mandatory reporting (of animal harm) initiatives. The findings suggested that the majority of companies offering companion animal insurance in Australia refuse to pay the treatment costs for animals deliberately injured within a family violence context, which adds emotional and financial stress on human victims of DV (pp 722-3). The authors highlight the need to reconsider current approaches to violence, and to recognise the nuances of DV, especially where animals are involved. Not only does covering costs associated with harm to animals suffered as a result of DV in insurance policies ensure that the animals get treatment, but it also alleviates the pressure from their carers, who already experience high levels of stress and trauma.

Taylor, Nik & Fraser, Heather (2019) Companion animals and domestic violence: Rescuing me, rescuing you (Palgrave Studies in Animals and Social Problems) Palgrave Macmillan, Switzerland.

Abstract: In this book, Nik Taylor and Heather Fraser consider how we might better understand human-animal companionship in the context of domestic violence. The authors advocate an intersectional feminist understanding, drawing on a variety of data from numerous projects they have conducted with people, about their companion animals and links between domestic violence and animal abuse, arguing for a new understanding that enables animals to be constituted as victims of domestic violence in their own right. The chapters analyse the mutual, loving connections that can be formed across species, and in households where there is domestic violence. Companion Animals and Domestic Violence also speaks to the potentially soothing, healing and recovery oriented aspects of human-companion animal relationships before, during and after the violence, and will be of interest to various academic disciplines including social work, anthropology, sociology, philosophy, geography, as well as to professionals working in domestic violence or animal welfare service provision.

Volant, Anne M, et al, 'The Relationship Between Domestic Violence and Animal Abuse: An Australian Study' (2008) 23(9) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1277.

This article reports on the first Australian research to examine the connection between domestic violence and animal abuse. 102 women recruited through 24 domestic violence services in the state of Victoria and a nondomestic violence comparison group (102 women) recruited from the community were interviewed by telephone for this study. Significantly higher rates of partner pet abuse, partner threats of pet abuse, and pet abuse by other family members were found in the violent families compared with the nondomestic violence group. As hypothesized, children from the violent families were reported by their mothers to have witnessed and committed significantly more animal abuse than children from the nonviolent families. Logistic regression analyses revealed, for the group as a whole, that a woman whose partner had threatened the pets was 5 times more likely to belong to the intimate partner violence group.

Ascione, Frank R, et al, 'Battered Pets and Domestic Violence: Animal Abuse Reported by Women Experiencing Intimate Violence and by Nonabused Women' (2007) 13(4) Violence Against Women 354.

Drawing on available literature this study identifies the following reasons for attention to animal abuse in the context of domestic violence (see p355 of this article for relevant references):

- Pets are often viewed as companions or even family members, and some may view animal abuse as another form of family violence.
- Women who are victims of domestic violence may be especially devastated when batterers threaten and/or actually harm family pets.
- If children are present, animal abuse may be an additional form of violence to which they are exposed.
- Individuals who abuse animals are more likely to have been arrested for violent crimes and property and drug-related offences and to self-report engaging in delinquent behaviour.
- Animals may sometimes be used as weapons against domestic violence victims.
- Threats of harm to family pets may be used to coerce women who are battered into committing illegal acts at the behest of the batterer.
- Concern for the welfare of family pets may be an obstacle to some women's seeking safety.

The article also reports on a study of 101 women residing at domestic violence shelters (S group) and another 120 women who were not in shelter and reported that they had not experienced domestic violence (NS group). The S group women were nearly 11 times more likely to report that their partner had hurt or killed pets than a comparison group of women who said they had not experienced intimate violence (NS group). The vast majority of shelter women described being emotionally close to their pets and distraught by the abuse family pets experienced. Children were often exposed to pet abuse, and most reported being distressed by these experiences.

US based study. Abstract: The risk of harm/injury in homes where intimate partner violence (IPV) occurs is not limited to humans; animals reside in as many as 80% of these homes and may be at substantial risk of suffering severe or fatal injury. Gaining a better understanding of IPV-pet abuse overlap is imperative in more accurately identifying the risks of harm for all individuals and animals residing in these homes. The objectives of this study were to utilize law enforcement officers' observations and IPV victim reports from the scene of the incident to (a) determine the prevalence of pet abuse perpetration among suspects involved in IPV incidents, (b) compare characteristics of IPV incidents and the home environments in which they occur when the suspect has a history of pet abuse with incidents involving suspects with no reported history of pet abuse, and (c) compare IPV incident outcomes involving suspects with a history of pet abuse with those involving suspects with no reported history of pet abuse. IPV victims residing in homes with a suspect who has a history of pet abuse often describe "extremely high-risk" environments. With nearly 80% reporting concern that they will eventually be killed by the suspect, victims in these environments should be considered at significant risk of suffering serious injury or death. In addition, IPV victims involved in incidents with a suspect that has a history of pet abuse were significantly more likely to have had at least one prior unreported IPV incident with the suspect (80%) and to have ever been strangled (76%) or forced to have sex with the suspect (26%). Effective prevention/detection/intervention strategies are likely to require multidisciplinary collaboration and safety plans that address the substantial risk of harm/injury for all adults, children, and animals residing in the home.

Faver, Catherine A, and Elizabeth B Strand, 'Fear, Guilt, and Grief: Harm to Pets and the Emotional Abuse of Women' (2007) 7(1) Journal of Emotional Abuse 51.

This article reviews the literature regarding the emotional impact of pet abuse on abused women. It argues that harm inflicted on pets by a perpetrator is a form of emotional abuse. The article recommends among other things that service providers should include questions about pets and pet abuse in all assessments.

Fitzgerald, A. J., Barrett, B. J., Stevenson, R., & Cheung, C. H. (2019). Animal Maltreatment in the Context of Intimate Partner Violence: A Manifestation of Power and Control? Violence Against Women, 25(15), 1806–1828.

The study aimed to understand why animal abuse and IPV commonly co-occur. One hundred female survivors of IPV from sixteen emergency shelters were surveyed for the study. Fifty-five of these respondents had at least one pet at the time of their abusive relationship. The survey questions were designed to identify the sociodemographic of participants as well as to discover how the participants perceived motivation for and the intentionality of any animal maltreatment at the hands of their abusive partners. More specifically, researchers measured animal abuse using the Partner's Treatment of Animals Scale (PTAS) which assessed: (a) emotional abuse of animals; (b) threats to harm; (3) physical neglect; (4) physical abuse: and (e) severe physical abuse. The study hypothesised "that survivors' perceptions of their abusers' mistreatment of their pets as premediated and as intended to upset or control them would be significantly associated with higher levels of the five types of animal maltreatment measured by the PTAS" (1815/10).

Results: 89.1% of the women who kept pets during their abusive relationship reported at least one incident of animal maltreatment by their abusive partner. "The most common forms of pet abuse enacted by the perpetrators include threats to get rid of a pet (65.5%), scaring or intimidating a pet on purpose (60%), smacking a pet (56.4%), and throwing an object at a pet (50.9%)" (1815). At the extreme end of the abuse, 10.9% reported their partner breaking a pet's bones and 14.5% reported their partner killing the pet (1815).

Discussion: The findings of the study were consistent with the existing literature investigating the occurrence of pet abuse during abusive relationships. In particular, the results supported the notion that "survivors of IPV perceive that maltreatment of their pets is driven by their partner's desire to cause them emotional harm and/or to enact power and control over them" (1823)/ "that emotional abuse, threats against, and neglect of animals in the context of IPV are perceived by survivors to be part of the broader matrix of power and control tactics that perpetrators use to control them and/or cause them psychological harm". The study did note, however, that there are some forms of animal maltreatment that are not perceived by IPV survivors in this way, highlighting "the need to move beyond monolithic constructions of ‘animal abuse’ as a singular construct to consider the ways in which different types of animal maltreatment may have distinct correlates with IPV against women" (1823).

Other findings in the study include:

- Participants in the study did not perceive the animal abuse to be premeditated.
- While the survivors in our sample tended to understand the emotional abuse, neglect and threats against their pets as intentional and as motivated to exert and/or to regain power and control, the same is not true of physical animal abuse, particularly severe physical animal abuse.

Randour, M. L., González, D., Schurr, E. M., & Conforti, S. (2023). Pet Protection Orders for Domestic Violence Survivors: Are They Being Used? Violence Against Women, 0(0). 10.1177/10778012231176197

This study examines if and how pet protection orders have been used by domestic violence survivors in the 36 states and the District of Columbia in which they have been enacted. A review of court websites determined if there was a specific item to include a pet in the temporary and/or final protection order. In addition, individual court administrators were contacted in various states to determine if statistics were available on the number of pet protection orders issued. Another mode of investigation included examining appropriate websites in each state to ascertain if the state issued a report on domestic violence statistics, and if so, if that report contained information on pet protection orders. Only one state, New York, keeps track of the number of protection orders that have been issued that include pets.

“Of 503 people (all self-identified as having a diverse gender and /or sexuality) living in either Australia or the UK, 1/5 of those who had experienced IPV reported that animal cruelty had been perpetuated by the violent or abusive partner, associated with greater psychological distress and lower levels of social support."

Roguski, Michael, 'Pets as Pawns: The Co-existence of Animal Cruelty and Family Violence' (Report, Royal New Zealand Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the National Collective of Independent Women's Refuges, 2012).

This New Zealand study draws on 30 interviews with clients of women's refuges, 30 interviews with community stakeholders identified as having some involvement/knowledge of the co-existence of animal cruelty and family violence, the results of a survey of 203 Women's Refuge clients, and the results of a survey of 17 local NZSPCA managers. The study identified that it was common for perpetrators to use overt threats and actual harm to animals as a mechanism to attain and maintain control of their family members. The study determined that cruelty to animals was often present in family violence situations. The study also identified that cruelty to animals by perpetrators post-separation was common and that threats to animals had contributed to some survivors of family violence delaying leaving the relationship.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

The Victorian Bench Book briefly refers to animal abuse as an example of emotional or psychological abuse in the following sections:

5.2.1 – Emotional or psychological abuse: psychological abuse includes 'abusing pets in front of family members'.

Also see 1.1 – Additional Guidance – Common Risk Assessment Framework, lists harming or killing pets as an example of emotional abuse.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

This bench book discusses animal abuse as a form of domestic violence in Section 4.6.4: Animal cruelty and domestic violence:

- 'The Issue: Research studies have demonstrated consistently and repeatedly an association between domestic violence and cruelty to animals. Animal cruelty is used in some domestic violence cases to terrorize intimate partners and to punish, control or silence children. Protection of animals has also been cited … as one of the reasons family members remain or return to abusive homes.
- Potential response: Agreements and orders that secure the safety of pets can enhance safety while offering comfort to children.' For further discussion in connection with civil protection orders, see Chapter 9.3.5.2.

Animal abuse - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Mazaydeh [2014] ACTSC 325 (13 November 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

The offender was a former partner of the female complainant. He refused to leave her apartment, attempted to choke her and held a knife to the throat of her cat.

Murrell CJ at [9]: 'The threat to cause damage to the victim's cat was particularly upsetting to the victim, and the offender was no doubt well aware of the victim's affection for her cat. He seized the cat and held a knife to its throat. That would have been quite devastating for the victim'.

And at [15]-[16]: 'These offences occurred in the context of a previous relationship between the offender and the victim and involved violence within the victim's home, an apparent sense of entitlement on the part of the offender, and humiliation through verbal and text abuse of the victim.

'The sentencing purposes of punishment, general deterrence and denunciation are very important, as well as the recognition of harm to the victim personally and the community generally through offences of this nature. The victim provided a victim impact statement in which she referred to impacts upon her of the type that frequently result from offences of domestic violence, including feelings of anxiety, difficulty sleeping, difficulty concentrating at work and elsewhere, and an adverse effect on her ability to form relationships. Since the incident, the victim has moved house because she felt unsafe in the apartment where the offence occurred'.

R v McLaughlin [2015] ACTSC 201 (16 July 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

The offender started kicking the dogs in front of his wife and children. The wife asked him to stop and he punched her several times.

In assessing the objective seriousness of the offences, Burns J took into account that the offender was significantly larger than the victim, that the offences occurred in the context of a domestic relationship and that the children were present during the attack. Burns J considered the offender's conduct to be 'cowardly, shameful and rightly characterised as criminal' ([7]). A victim impact statement was also prepared by the victim, explaining the trauma and anxiety the offences caused her and the children. Burns J noted that 'As is so often the case in domestic violence offences, the long term burden of your violence will not only be felt by your wife, but also by your children'.

R v French* [2020] NSWDC 767 (17 December 2020) – New South Wales District Court

Priestley SC DCJ found at [13]-[14]:

"The offender argued that what occurred was no more than was necessary to commit the offence, at least in respect of planning. In my view this offending was more than opportunistic. The offender went looking for the cat; it was not as if the cat did something immediately before the offending to irritate the offender and he acted impulsively. It is gratuitous cruelty. The elements of the offence include to commit a serious act of cruelty, and that the animal is killed or seriously injured. In this case as to the first mentioned element, the act of cruelty was reasonably brief in its execution; just how long the cat suffered is not known. As to the second mentioned element, the result is death, not injury, making the offending in my view more serious.

There was some debate based on the animal being a domestic pet compared to some authorities referring to animals that would not normally be considered pets, with the Crown arguing it is a more serious matter if a pet. From the animal's point of view this is a point that is of utter indifference. Yet in the context of offending surrounded in circumstances of domestic violence I tend to the view that it does make it a more serious offence."

Marrah v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 119 (18 June 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The applicant physically and sexually assaulted his partner and threatened to kill her and her dog.

Tate JA at [25]: 'The gravity of the offending was aggravated by the fact that the applicant was at the time the subject of an intervention order, which he flagrantly disregarded. Offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to difficulties in a relationship is one of possessive, violent rage. It goes without saying that such a response, to what is a common human situation, is utterly unacceptable. The sentences must convey the unmistakeable message that male partners have no right to subject their female partners to threats or violence. The sentences must be of such an order as to strongly denounce violence within a domestic relationship'.

DPP v Neve* [2013] VSC 488 (13 September 2013) – Supreme Court of Victoria

Bell J at [70]: 'In relation to the charge of criminal damage (charge 1), yours is a serious example of this crime. The property concerned was Frank, Ms Fuller's beloved dog. I infer from the circumstances that you killed the dog to inflict severe hurt and suffering on Ms Fuller, which she did and does feel. I accept the submission of your counsel that in normal circumstances a first-time offender, such as yourself, would not be given a sentence of imprisonment for this kind of offence. But the circumstances of your killing of the dog make such a sentence warranted, especially having regard to denunciation and general deterrence. It should not be fully concurrent as is counts materially and individually in the criminality of your conduct and the suffering of the victim'.

Systems abuse

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament.

The Bill amends Family Law Act 1975 to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

Australian and international bench books [Other Bench Books] alert judicial officers to various forms of systems abuse or abuse of processes that may be used by perpetrators in the course of domestic and family violence related proceedings to reassert their power and control over the victim. The National Plan to End Violence against Women and Children 2022-2032 [National Plan 2022] observes that perpetrators of domestic and family violence may manipulate legal and other systems to control, threaten and harass a current or former partner. More broadly, as identified in the Western Australian Court of Appeal decision Baron v Walsh [2014] WASCA 124, recourse to legally available processes, when used by a party with improper intent or purpose, could amount to malicious prosecution, abuse of process or a criminal offence.

Research has also recognised that a party to proceedings in domestic and family violence related cases may use a range of litigation tactics to gain an advantage over or to harass, intimidate, discredit or otherwise control the other party [Kaspiew et al Synthesis 2015]. These tactics may be referred to in legislation and other bench books and by judicial officers as malicious, frivolous, vexatious, querulous, or an abuse of process.

Perpetrators of domestic and family violence who seek to control the victim before, during or after separation may make multiple applications and complaints in multiple systems (for example, the courts, Child Support Agency, Centrelink [Cameron 2014] child protection [Douglas & Fell 2020]) in relation to a protection order [Reeves 2020], breach, parenting [Kaspiew 2005], divorce, property, child and welfare support and other matters with the intention of interrupting, deferring, prolonging or dismissing judicial and administrative processes, which may result in depleting the victim's financial resources and emotional wellbeing, and adversely impacting the victim's capacity to maintain employment or to care for children [National Plan 2022]. In the court system, this tactic is sometimes known as ‘burning off’, and is prevalent where, on the one hand, a victim lacks the financial resources to engage legal representation (and is therefore forced to self-represent), and on the other hand, the perpetrator is either financially well-resourced or prepared to incur significant debt (and is therefore able to engage solicitors and counsel, and fund multiple actions over extended periods) [Hover: ALRC 2019]. Where the perpetrator is aware that the victim may be in a financial position to engage legal representation, the perpetrator may use a different tactic known as ‘conflicting out’, which involves seeking preliminary advice from multiple lawyers (this is a particular concern in regional, rural and remote communities) so as to deny the victim access to legal representation on the basis of conflict of interest.

Although there is a widespread belief in the community that mothers frequently fabricate allegations to influence family law proceedings, the research to date indicates that it is more likely that they will be reluctant to raise allegations for fear of having their motives questioned [Laing 2010], and that the making of false allegations is much less common than the problem of genuine victims who fail to report abuse, and the widespread false denials and minimisation of abuse by perpetrators [Jaffe et al 2008]. A 2015 evaluation [Kaspiew et al Synthesis 2015] of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) recognises that parties to proceedings in the Family Court of Australia may use those proceedings as a means of perpetuating harassment of the other party. For example, a parent who is also a perpetrator of domestic and family violence may use this tactic, while the perpetrator or their lawyer states to the court that they ‘just want to see their children’. [Laing 2010]

Cross applications for domestic and family violence protection orders may be used by some perpetrators to intimidate the victim into withdrawing their application, resulting in mutual withdrawal and an end to proceedings. This tactic may also be seen as an extension of the violence itself [Wangmann 2010]. Perpetrators in these circumstances may seek a cross order to neutralise the effect of the victim’s order (or order obtained on the victim’s behalf) on the operation of the presumption/exemption. While some cross applications may be genuine where both parties face a threat of violence and are equally in need of protection from one another, those that constitute intimidation may have the effect of trivialising or silencing the victim’s claims for protection. The consequent risk is that dangerous behaviour may be misinterpreted or overlooked by the court, and the victim may be left unprotected [Douglas & Fitzgerald 2013].

Victims from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds who may be unfamiliar with Australian legal systems, have limited or no English literacy skills and uncertain or contested immigration status, may be particularly vulnerable to further abuse by the perpetrator through judicial processes. Some commonly reported examples include the perpetrator: failing to appear in court; repeatedly seeking adjournments; appealing decisions on tenuous grounds; obtaining a protection order against the victim and misleading the victim into breaching the order; objecting to or refusing to consent to the victim's application for divorce; and giving false evidence to the court that the victim's motivation in applying for a protection order is to obtain an advantage in the immigration/visa process [JCCD, Path to Justice (CALD) 2016].

Research indicates that a court's failure to respond adequately or appropriately to a victim's allegations of domestic and family violence may constitute a form of abuse that is secondary to that already being experienced by the victim. In the context of judicial proceedings, a victim may feel intimidated, isolated or neglected by, for example: having to sit in proximity to the perpetrator and their family and friends in the courtroom; experiencing condescending, reproachful or diminishing language or demeanour from defence lawyers or judicial officers; feeling unable to effectively advocate on behalf of children in their care; or enduring the ongoing economic impact of being a party to judicial proceedings [Hover: ALRC 2019]. In these circumstances, judicial officers may need to weigh up and assess the requirements for procedural fairness and access to justice against protection of the victim from further abuse through the perpetrator's exploitation of the justice system.

Systems abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Systems abuse - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, Report 114 (2010).

This report identifies that 'vexatious applications in protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation can be a means for a person to misuse the legal system to harass or intimidate a victim of family violence. In addition, because the existence of certain kinds of protection order is a relevant consideration to be taken into account by a court when making orders under the Family Law Act, vexatious applications for protection orders have the potential to affect the operation of both the family law and state and territory family violence regimes.' (p473)

[6.166] (p291) Noted that reforms 'should play a significant role in minimising the risk of litigation abuse—especially in the vexatious use of cross applications for protection orders.'

[18.28] False evidence given in protection order proceedings: State and territory family violence legislation generally deals with persons who give false evidence or make false allegations or denials by using provisions relating to vexatious applications or other legislation protecting court processes. A person who gives false evidence may also be charged with a number of offences, including perjury, false swearing and false testimony.

[18.29] (p837) In some circumstances, a court's ability to award costs against a person who brings an application for, or to revoke, a protection order that is 'deliberately false' or made in 'bad faith' is linked to vexatious application provisions.

[18.224] (p880) Vexatious litigation may arise in a number of ways in protection order proceedings. For example, repeated applications for a protection order may be made against the same person based on the same or similar allegations and by the respondent to vary or revoke a protection order. Cross applications for protection orders may also be made without legal grounds. [18.225] While such applications may not, in themselves, be vexatious, where they are repeated or made without legal grounds, concerns arise that people who have committed family violence may use the legal system to further harass, control and abuse the victim.

[17.29] (p764) It is particularly important that if family violence matters have been litigated that they are not re-litigated in another proceeding. Where family violence is at play such re-litigation can be a tactic of further abuse.

Cameron, Prue, 'Relationship Problems and Money: Women Talk about Financial Abuse' (Research Report, Wire Women's Information, 2014).

This research draws on interviews, focus groups and surveys involving more than 200 women. Section four (from p31) focusses on the systemic continuation of financial abuse post-separation and explores abuse perpetrated through the legal system (including tactics of furthering abuse; the emotional cost of legal proceedings; the financial impact of legal costs; vexatious litigation), and Child Support (eg: partner's hiding assets etc to avoid paying child support).

The authors find that a common theme in the women's stories is that on-going engagement with their former partner through the courts, the Child Support Agency and Centrelink, continues, and in some cases facilitates, the pattern of financial abuse for years after the marriage ends (p31). Tactics identified by study participants included: running up legal costs; hiring aggressive, bullying lawyers; using the legal system to 'destroy' their ex-partners; legal proceedings undermining women's ability to work; refusing to comply with parenting orders; contesting parenting orders and masking their income to avoid child support.

Chung, Donna et al (2020). Prioritising women's safety in Australian perpetrator interventions: Mapping the purpose and practices of partner contact (2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

This project documents the practices of men's behaviour change programmes (MBCPs) in contacting victims/survivors and children of participants. The project considers how partner contact is operating in Australia, its strengths and challenges, and the experiences of victim/survivors who received partner contact support.

- Lack of partner contact as part of an MBCP can lead to some perpetrators using their participation in the program to perpetrate abuse towards the victim/survivor and/or other family members.
- Partner contact is labour-intensive, under-resourced, and often a secondary priority.
- There is currently a lack of consistency in partner contact practices and interventions, and limited awareness about existing guidelines and standards.

- Perpetrator accountability has been a growing focus of work in Australia since the launch of the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022 and the subsequent National Outcome Standards for Perpetrator Interventions.
- Men's behaviour change programs (MBCPs) are a key site of perpetrator accountability that aim to improve safety for women and children.
- Partner contact is known and understood to be a critical element of MBCPs, however a review of literature shows that little has been documented in Australia about safety practices in this context.

The report's key recommendations are:

- Partner contact support should be offered to all women (either directly or through organisational partnerships) through all MBCPs.
- National minimum practice standards for partner support as a component of MBCPs should be developed, and these standards should be formally recognised within contractual arrangements and funding service agreements.
- Partner contact services should be resourced and funded in ways that enable those national minimum practice standards to be met, and that ensure women have ongoing access to support irrespective of a perpetrator's MBCP attendance.

Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services) 2022, National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032.

The Glossary provides a definition of systems abuse which acknowledges perpetrators may manipulate legal and other systems in order to exert control over, threaten and harass a current or former partner, by making multiple applications and complaints in multiple systems (eg courts, Child Support, Centrelink) in relation to protections orders breach, parenting, divorce, property, child and welfare support and other matters to interrupt defer, prolong or dismiss judicial and administrative processes. This may deplete a victim's financial resources and emotional well-being and adversely impact the victim's capacity to maintain employment or care for children. It references Douglas (2018) and this bench book.

Douglas, H & Fell, E 2020, 'Malicious Reports of Child Maltreatment as Coercive Control: Mothers and Domestic and Family Violence', Journal of Family Violence, vol. 35, no. 8, pp. 827–837, viewed 24 March 2021.

Abstract: Coercive control is increasingly recognized as fundamental to women's experiences of domestic and family violence (DFV). Systems abuse is also being increasingly recognized by researchers as a tactic of coercive control in the context of DFV. This article explores the phenomenon of abusive partners or ex-partners making malicious false reports of child maltreatment to child protective services as an aspect of coercive control and systems abuse. The article draws on interviews with 65 women who have been victims of DFV, focusing on the experiences of 11 of the interviewees who have been maliciously reported, or received threats that they will be reported, to child protection services by an abusive ex-partner. Those interviewees who had been the victim of malicious reports of child maltreatment by an abusive partner or ex-partner experienced substantial negative impacts. The article concludes that improved investigation processes and investigating both parties, where the reporting party has been found to be a perpetrator of DFV, may better support victims of DFV and deter perpetrators from this form of abuse.

Douglas, Heather, and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes And Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications For Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article reviews cross-applications and orders in Queensland's courts (2008-2010). It identifies concerns around the misuse of DVPOs for vindictive, strategic or tactical reasons (pp58; 60-62). Tactics include cross-orders being used to pressure the other party to mutually withdraw their application (p86).

Douglas, Heather, 'Legal Systems Abuse and Coercive Control' (2018) 18(1) Criminology & Criminal Justice 84-99.

This article explores how legal engagement can be used to exercise coercive control over a former intimate partner, through interviews with victims of domestic and family violence (DFV) who engaged with the legal system (p 87). The results indicate that women's engagement with the legal system is often experienced as an extension of coercive control (from p 88). Legal systems abuse may be adopted by perpetrators as a means of exerting coercive control when other avenues have ceased due to the relationship having ended (p 85). Specific instances of legal systems abuse may include frequent requests for adjournments (pp 88-9), making counter-allegations (pp 89-90), calling irrelevant witnesses (pp 90-1), and initiating excessive litigation in the Family Court (p 91).

Legal responses to legal systems abuse may include having vexatious cases thrown out, pursuing criminal charges, and restraining the abuser from future litigation (pp 92-3). Actions can also be taken by justice personnel, such as adopting an empathetic approach to engaging with victims (p 93), recognising coercive control as central to DFV (pp 94-5), rigorously upholding ethical standards (p 95), and co-ordinating responses with other elements of the legal system (p 95). It is argued that improved understanding of DFV and coercive control by legal professionals may help to prevent future opportunities for legal systems abuse (pp 94-5).

Finch, Emma and Patricia Easteal, 'Vexatious litigation in family law and coercive control: Ways to improve legal remedies and better protect the victims' (2017) 7 Family Law Review 103.

This article examines whether the current Australian family law legislation and court processes adequately protect parties from vexatious litigation. The Family Court has the highest rate of vexatious litigants in Australia (p 105).

The study surveyed ten lawyers on their experience in litigation with vexatious litigants (p 105). The most important issues were:

- controlling behaviours, including persistent litigation and cross-examination (p 106-7);
- effects, including emotional and legal costs (p 107-8); and
- the high threshold necessary to declare a litigant as vexatious (p 109).

The authors recommend suggestions for judicial officers to shield individuals from vexatious proceedings. Notably:

- making more liberal use of costs orders, including making more severe costs orders, and making the vexatious party bear the respondent party's costs (p 113-14);
- case management (pp 112-13); and
- improved communication between courts, to prevent litigants from instigating proceedings in multiple jurisdictions (p 113).

The article also recommends legislative changes, including lowering the threshold to declare a vexatious litigant, and prohibiting self-represented litigants from cross-examining their alleged victims (pp 110-12).

Francia, L., Millear, P., & Sharman R., 'Addressing family violence post separation – mothers and fathers' experiences from Australia' (2019) Journal of Child Custody.

Family violence has been described as the 'core business of the Family Court', and child custody decisions continue to be made on a discretionary basis in the best interests of the child. The study focuses on family violence and separated parents' experiences in the Australian family law system. By means of an analysis of (n40) interviews of separated mothers and fathers, it found that contact with the Australian family law system caused considerable anxiety and distress. Separated parents noted gendered narratives within the system, with mothers referred to as 'alienating' or 'vindictive' and fathers referred to as 'abusers' or 'perpetrators'. The majority of parents also noted that their concerns, primarily around family violence, were rarely taken seriously. When parents reported concerns for their own or their children's safety, they were either not believed or experienced lip service of their concerns without appropriate investigation. Further, separated parents found that professionals, such as child protection workers, judges, police and independent children's lawyers, lacked adequate knowledge or competence in relation to family violence. They also noted coercion by some professionals within the family law system. The article also highlights the 'devastating emotional and psychological aftermath' experienced not only by separated parents, but also their children. In summary, the authors suggest that the Australian family law system may not sufficiently meet the complex needs of families experiencing family violence.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al., Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed method insights into impact and support needs – Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

In interviews with women across Australia with experience of family violence, the study found that controlling and coercive behaviours were the most common tactic of abuse used by abusive fathers, which included setting rigid routines and/or having unreasonable expectations about children's behaviour. Out of the 50 women interviewed, 45 described direct abuse toward their children, including psychological, emotional, physical, and sexual abuse, as well as witnessing abuse or being a direct victim of incidents that targeted the mother at the same time (p 3). The research identified systems abuse is common. For example systems abuse type behaviours by perpetrators included (p 6):

- exploiting the intersections between family law, child protection, and criminal legal systems to their advantage;
- raising counter-allegations and unjustifiable applications in family law or personal protection orders;
- manipulative engagement with family law services;
- non-compliance with court orders; and
- exhausting women's legal and financial resources.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family law and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of the practices and perspectives of family law system professionals(n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- the Court Outcomes Project (CO Project) involving:
    - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
    - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts; and

- an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the ‘Key messages’ from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the ‘prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent’ (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, Rae, ‘Violence in Contested Children’s Cases: An Empirical Exploration’ (2005) 19 Australian Journal of Family Law 112.

This article presents an empirically-based analysis of the treatment of violence in litigated children’s cases.

The author cites growing recognition of the use of litigation, particularly in relation to children, as a control tactic and this was evident in the sample. In a number of cases, there were repeated applications in relation to residence and contact which the mothers claimed were motivated by a desire to harass them, rather than a genuine concern for the children. These cases had the common features of:

- long running litigation,
- a background of violence and
- high levels of denigration against the mothers.

There was judicial acknowledgment in some cases that legal proceedings were being used as a means of harassment (p119).

Notes psychological and judicial approaches may obscure the extent and relevance of a history of violence:

- there is a tendency within judicial discourse to view violence in an 'incident based' way which fails to acknowledge that it is part of an ongoing system of violence and control.
- fails to connect pre-separation violence with post-separation control tactics, in which litigation can play a key part.
- fails to apprehend the gendered dynamics of power that subsist in violent relationships. (p138)

Kaye, M et al., Compromised 'consent' in Australian Family Law Proceedings. (2021) 35(1) International Journal of Law Policy and the Family 1-25, doi: 10.1093/lawfam/ebab033

Drawing on data from a large study that explored the experiences of self-represented litigants (SRLs) in Australian family law proceedings involving allegations about family violence, this article examines the pressures experienced by female SRLs, who are victims of family violence, to consent to orders. These pressures include judicial pressure, lawyers' practices, fear of their former partner, and the financial and emotional costs of litigation. These pressures are significant and can impede the extent to which these agreements can be viewed as consensual. Participants reported that these significant and intersecting pressures resulted in them 'agreeing' to orders that they saw as unsafe, or financial orders that were less than they were entitled to.

This research reports on the experiences of 22 women who were involved in the family law system following their separation from a relationship in which they had experienced domestic violence. In particular see section titled: "'He just wants to see his children' – a lens for excusing men's behaviour" (from pp47-49) that draws on a number of excerpts detailing how fathers have manipulated police to harass and intimidate mothers (e.g. calling police to her house alleging she'd threatened to kill her children; turning up late for contact)

This research reports on interviews with 40 women who attempted to obtain a domestic violence protection order in Sydney. The report highlights examples of police being used as a form of control, such as the abusive partner calling the police on their partner (p34), and the impact cross-applications have on women required to pay for legal advice to defend them.

Parkinson, Patrick, Judy Cashmore and Judi Single, 'Post-Separation Conflict and the Use of Family Violence Orders' (2011) 33(1) Sydney Law Review 1.

- Analysis of the use of family violence orders (FVO) during post separation conflict of 181 parents in 164 different families across Australia. Includes, in a number of cases, accounts from both of the former partners, giving their different perspectives of the same events.
- The research demonstrates the wide range of situations in which FVOs may be sought. While applicants reported a valid legal basis for applying for family violence orders, orders were also sought for 'collateral purposes' such as determining the occupancy of the home on separation or maintaining boundaries between newly separated parents. In certain cases they were used as well for purposes connected with the family law dispute, on legal advice (p1).
- Notes cases where respondents viewed the application for FVOs as tactical, for example to gain advantage in family law proceedings. 'It is difficult to assess such views of FVO applications with only one side of the story, particularly given the evidence that some men seriously minimised the level of their own violence, and also that men may not recognise how frightening their behaviour might be to their former partners. Nonetheless, there were certainly accounts by men of women, or their new partners, seeking FVOs where the timing seemed tactical and where the cases were apparently thrown out.' (p32)

Rathus, Z, 2020, A history of the use of the concept of parental alienation in the Australian family law system: contradictions, collisions and their consequences, Journal of Social Welfare and Family Law, 42:1, 5-17, DOI: 10.1080/09649069.2019.170192

Abstract: This paper presents insights into the history and current deployment of the concept of parental alienation in the Australian family law system. It begins in 1989, when an article on parental alienation syndrome was first published in an Australian law journal. It then traces aspects of the socio-legal and social science research, gender politics, law reform and jurisprudence of the following 30 years, paying attention to moments of significant change. The impacts of major amendments that emphasise the desirability of post-separation shared parenting outcomes in 1996 and 2006 are specifically considered. More recently, in 2012, reforms intended to improve the family law system's response to domestic and family violence were introduced. The history reveals an irreconcilable tension between the 'benefit' of 'meaningful' post-separation parent-child relationships and the protection of children from harm. When mothers' allegations of violence in the family are disbelieved, minimised or dismissed, they are transformed from victims of abuse into perpetrators of abuse – alienators of children from their fathers. Their actions and attitudes collide with the shared parenting philosophy. This is arguably an inescapable consequence of a family law system that struggles to deal effectively with family violence in the context of a strong shared parenting regime.

Reeves, E. (2020) Family violence, protection orders and systems abuse: views of legal practitioners. Current Issues in Criminal Justice, 32(1): 91-110 10.1080/10345329.2019.1665816

The findings of this research suggest that male perpetrators may use the FVIO system to commit 'systems abuse' by encouraging police officers to apply for a FVIO against the genuine victim-survivor. It is argued that there is a strong need for a greater recognition of systems abuse within the police and the judiciary in order to prevent the FVIO system from serving as a tool of abuse readily available to perpetrators of family violence.

This article explores the impacts of misidentification on the lives of women victim–survivors of family violence in Victoria (Australia). Using data from interviews with 32 system stakeholders and survey responses from 11 women who have experienced misidentification in Victoria, this study explores misidentification within the family violence intervention order system. It demonstrates that being misidentified as a predominant aggressor on a family violence intervention order can have a significant impact on women's lives and their access to safety.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33 University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article reviews cross-applications and orders in NSW courts (2002-2003). The article argues that the use of cross-applications is a form of harassment or a bargaining tool (from p967). The article draws on interviews with women and professionals who suggest cross-applications are 'a possible extension of the violence and abuse itself' and identify that 'the use of the law against victims of domestic violence is rarely depicted as part of their continuing experience of violence, yet it is seen that way by victims and clearly evidences a type of act that is directed at exerting control (or reasserting control)' (p968).

Abstract: Although prior research has established that intimate partner violence (IPV) often leads to increased depression, anxiety and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), little is known about how often abusive partners and ex-partners use survivors' children as an abuse tactic, nor whether this form of IPV also is detrimental to survivors' mental health. The current study interviewed 299 unstably housed survivors of intimate partner violence shortly after they sought services from a domestic violence agency. All participants were parents of minor children. In-person interviews asked about abuse experienced in the prior six months, including the ways children were used as a form of IPV. Participants were also asked about their current depression, anxiety, and symptoms of PTSD. As hypothesized, the majority of parents reported their abusive partners and ex-partners had used their children as a form of IPV to control and hurt them. Further, after controlling for other forms of IPV, use of the children significantly predicted both increased anxiety and greater number of PTSD symptoms. Results show the importance of focusing on the use of children as a common and injurious form of abuse used against survivors of intimate partner violence (IPV).

Gutowski, E.R., Goodman, L.A. Coercive Control in the Courtroom: The Legal Abuse Scale (LAS). (2022). Online first Journal of Family Violence doi:10.1007/s10896-022-00408-3

This article highlights various forms of legal systems abuse as part of domestic and family violence. The authors observe that intimate partner violence survivors seeking safety and justice for themselves and their children through family court and other legal systems may instead encounter their partners' misuse of court processes to further enact coercive control. To illuminate this harmful process, this study sought to create a measure of legal abuse. The authors developed and piloted a list of 27 potential items on the basis of consultation with 23 experts, qualitative interviews, and existing literature. They then administered them to a sample of 222 survivor-mothers who had been involved in family law proceedings. The analyses yielded the 14-item Legal Abuse Scale.

Jaffe, Peter G., Janet R. Johnston, Claire V. Crooks, Nicholas Bala, 'Custody disputes involving allegations of Domestic violence: toward a differentiated approach to parenting plans' (2008) 46(3) Family Court Review 500.

Premised on the understanding that domestic violence is a broad concept that encompasses a wide range of behaviors from isolated events to a pattern of emotional, physical, and sexual abuse that controls the victim, this article addresses the need for a differentiated approach to developing parenting plans after separation when domestic violence is alleged. A method of assessing risk by screening for the potency, pattern, and primary perpetrator of the violence is proposed as a foundation for generating hypotheses about the type of and potential for future violence as well as parental functioning. This kind of differential screening for risk in cases where domestic violence is alleged provides preliminary guidance in identifying parenting arrangements that are appropriate for the specific child and family and, if confirmed by a more in-depth assessment, may be the basis for a long-term plan.

Regarding the credibility of allegations of child maltreatment, domestic violence and parental abuse of drugs and alcohol, the authors (at pp506-509) write there is virtually no research on the extent to which spousal abuse allegations are clearly false and maliciously fabricated, but this issue is becoming an increasing concern for the justice system …it is critical to emphasize that the making of false allegations of spousal abuse is much less common than the problem of genuine victims who fail to report abuse, and the widespread false denials and minimization of abuse by perpetrators (Jaffe et al., 2003; Johnston, Lee, et al., 2005; Shaffer & Bala, 2003).

Klein, Andrew, 'Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges' (National Institute of Justice (US), 2009).

This report reviews research in the United States on domestic violence to determine what works best in protecting victims and stopping abuse. The section on judicial responses (from p52) is helpful. It recommends:

- Judges should strive to create user-friendly, safe court environments for petitioners, be sympathetic to the parties before them, but firm with respondents once abuse has been determined. Thus, victim concerns are validated, and respondents' abusive behaviors are clearly condemned. (p60) (Based on limited studies on the impact of judicial demeanour.)
- Judicial attention before trial to address the risk to victims posed by alleged abusers will result in quicker case resolution and decrease re-abuse by defendants who fail to show for trial. (p62) (based on multiple studies).
- Judges should respond to noncompliant abusers immediately to safeguard victims. (p72) (based on multiple studies).

Miller, Susan L, and Nicole L Smolter, '"Paper Abuse": When All Else Fails, Batterers Use Procedural Stalking' (2011) 17(5) Violence Against Women 637.

Drawing on interviews with women who have exited violent relationships, attorneys, and practitioners/policy specialists, this US research considers the continuation of control as women encounter "paper abuse." The article reports on the 'barrage' of frivolous lawsuits, false reports of child abuse, and other system-related manipulations that exert power, force contact, and financially burdens ex-partners. The article draws parallels between paper abuse and stalking, in that they both involve harassing behaviours, however paper abuse is distinct in that it uses legal options rather than criminal acts to perpetrate abuse (p641). That fact means it requires documentation so that it is not overlooked or justified as exercising legitimate legal rights.

Neilson, Linda, 'Assessing Mutual Partner-Abuse Claims in Child Custody and Access Cases' (2004) 42(3) Family Court Review 411.

This article explores issues associated with mutual claims of domestic violence in the context of research on gender and violence, and in the context of litigation tactics commonly employed by perpetrators in child custody and access cases. It identifies:

- Heightened litigation may be a form of stalking (p419).
- Notes that demeanour and presentation are not reliable indicators 'as many abusive partners are both manipulative and highly skilled at presenting positive public images of self.' (p420)
- Litigation tactics are often designed to discredit victim witnesses, such as claiming infidelity or promiscuity to deflect attention from abuse, attempting to discredit minute details of testimony or arguing 'parental alienation' (p422-24)

The author provides suggestions for assessing mutual claims of abuse and responding to litigation tactics (specifically, mutual claims of abuse).

- Careful scrutiny of past conduct and the power and control dynamics of the relationship are critical to accurate assessment when intimate partners make allegations of abuse against each other. (p425)
- Careful consideration of context. Context includes indicators of domination and control in the relationship in association with: patterns of violent action (including emotional abuse) over time, social and cultural context, victim vulnerability, and psychological (as well as physical) impact. Victim fears and perceptions are particularly important. (427)

Neilson, Linda, Enhancing Safety: When Domestic Violence Cases are in Multiple Legal Systems (criminal, family, child protection): A Family Law, Domestic Violence Perspective (2nd ed, 2013).

The importance of awareness by judicial officers of litigation tactics is referred to throughout this report, examples are identified:

- perpetrators attempting to introduce evidence of psychological harm from domestic violence as evidence of unfitness to parent, pp5, 17.
- making spurious complaints to social service and investigation agencies, and engaging in litigation tactics to deflect responsibility, p28.
- using litigation tactics to confuse police etc, p31.
- setting up the party convicted of resistance violence to engage in technical breaches p83.
- a perpetrator's attempts to introduce covert audio or video recordings can actually constitute evidence of continuing monitoring, stalking or surveillance of the targeted parent, or of attempting to ‘set up’ the targeted parent as a litigation tactic p122

This Canadian resource, focused on the family court, recognizes ‘litigation abuse’ as a gendered phenomenon. It highlights some of the possible ways a court may respond to litigation abuse. It observes that the court may regard this as a form of family violence to consider in making decisions about parenting time and responsibilities, or, as a factor in allowing the victim to relocate with the children.

- If a court finds that litigation abuse has occurred, this may affect an award for “costs,” requiring a party who has behaved “unreasonably” in the course of litigation to pay part or all of the legal fees and litigation costs of the other party.
- A person who has been the subject of repeated, unmerited court applications may make an application to have another person declared a “vexatious litigant,” preventing the person who has abused the legal process from bringing further court proceedings.
- In limited circumstances the courts may make a restraining order to prohibit certain types of behaviours associated with the court process, such as a prohibition on posting abusive information related to the proceedings on the internet.

Ptacek, James, Battered Women in the Courtroom: The Power of Judicial Responses (Northeastern University Press, 1999).

This book was one of the first to look at the role of judges in the domestic violence protection order process. Ptacek approaches the issue using three inquiries. He asks: “What do judges do with their authority in restraining order hearings? How do judges interpret their role in responding to woman battering? What effect do judges have on women seeking restraining orders?” (ix).

Ptacek's research was conducted primarily through interviews. He consulted widely with women in shelters, staff at shelters, feminist lawyers, judges, court support staff, and criminal justice researchers. He focused on two courts in Massachussetts that are considered to treat battered women with respect and take seriously their allegations. However, Ptacek identifies types of judicial behaviour can negatively affect victims in court. This form of abuse is sometimes referred to as 'secondary abuse'.

Ptacek has illustrated the judicial responses reinforce women's entrapment in a diagram available here and extracted in the table below. Many of the issues relate to perpetrators' misuse of court process as a way to further their abuse of the victim.

Neglecting women's fears	> ignoring women's fears > lack of safe waiting areas in courthouse > lack of coordination with police and probation > inadequate training of court personnel
Courtroom intimidation	> inattention to the impact of a courtroom on victims > bureaucratic and indifferent treatment of abused women > failure to provide women with information about their legal options
Condescending or harsh demeanour	> patronising displays of authority > harsh or hostile remarks > racist attitudes toward women of colour > bias against unmarried women
Furthering women's isolation	> failure to provide advocates > lack of resources for non-English speakers > lack of resources for deaf and disabled women > lack of coordination with community resources
Minimising, denying, and blaming	> mirroring batterers' actions by making light of the abuse > saying the abuse didn't happen > saying she caused it > making her feel guilty > saying it's just a "lovers' quarrel"

Neglecting the needs of children	failing to see how batterers manipulate women through their children no space in the courthouse for children lack of concern for safety of children
Colluding with violent men	showing greater concern for defendants than for women seeking protection unwillingness to impose sanctions on batterers joking and bonding with defendants
Blindness to the economic aspects of battering	ignoring women's requests for child support and restitution bias against women on welfare

Conversely, Ptacek has also illustrated how the judicial responses that empower battered women in a diagram available here and extracted in the table below.

Prioritising women's safety	asking about women's fears asking about weapons confiscating weapons training court personnel on battering making a safe space for women to wait for hearings
Making the court hospitable to abused women	providing a separate restraining order office informing women of their legal options providing translators making the building handicap accessible
Supportive judicial demeanour	listening to abused women asking questions looking women in the eye recognising the complexity of women's circumstances and choices
Connecting women with resources	Providing advocates for battered women developing relationships with shelters, batterers' programs, and community services
Taking the violence seriously	communicating through words and actions that the court will not tolerate battering > encouraging women to return to the court if they need to Focusing on the needs of children	> demonstrating concern for the safety of children > making space in the courthouse for children > recognising the effects of battering on children

Imposing sanctions on violent men	> imposing sanctions for violating court orders > refusing to joke and bond with violent men > correcting institutional bias toward men
Addressing the economic aspects of battering	> asking whether women need child support > connecting women with community resources around housing and financial assistance

This research examined men's use of coercive controlling tactics against female partners after separation. This mixed-methods study is based on secondary analysis of interviews / surveys involving 346 Canadian women who experienced coercive controlling tactics used by their ex-partners (86.4% identified at least one). The researchers also interviewed another 34 women. The article found that 'abusive partners used numerous strategies to coercively control their ex-partners by stalking/harassing them, using financial abuse and discrediting the women to various authorities' after separation.

Ward, David, 'Recognising and Preventing Abusive Litigation Against Domestic Violence Survivors' (2015-2016) 14 Seattle Journal for Social Justice 429.

This US study interviewed 10 survivors of domestic violence and their lawyers. It identifies different types of abusive litigation tactics (pp 434-47), including seeking sole custody of children, portraying themselves as the victim, initiating frivolous litigation, filing excessively long applications (pp 434-47). It also offers recommendations for judicial officers to respond to abusive litigation, including: having one judicial officer oversee all the litigation, imposing sanctions rather than relying primarily on verbal admonishments, limiting or placing conditions on court filings (457-63).

Chapter 7: Perpetration Characteristics and Litigation Tactics 'discusses options in response to the rationalizations and litigation tactics of domestic violators who engage in the coercive, controlling, dominating aspects of domestic violence in order to gain the upper hand in family and child protection litigation'.

Section 7.4: Perpetrator litigation tactics discusses the use of litigation to control or harass: '[p]rotracted litigation not only forces the targeted parent into continuing contact with the domestic violator, it also depletes resources, increases stress, and interferes with recovery from domestic violence'. The section goes onto consider judicial responses to litigation tactics, including:

- Including explicit findings in judgments relating to and denouncing the misuse of litigation;
- Engaging in coordinated case management and information sharing;
- Exercising the court's authority to prevent abuse of process by declaring a litigant to be vexatious;
- Potential cost options (e.g. interim cost orders);
- Appeal options (i.e. appealing orders is a litigation tactic; responses include requiring security for costs or requiring the appellant to comply with existing orders before entertaining the appeal);
- Avoiding orders that enable harassment and control;
- Additional options in response to excessive litigation (e.g. cost orders to pay for targeted parent's legal representation; prohibit the presence of the abusive party during discovery of documents).

Section 7.4.2: Responding to allegations of the targeted partner's unlawful conduct

- This tactic may be used to discourage survivors from contacting police where survivors have been previously arrested based on the perpetrator's allegations
- See also '6.4.6 When the parties present mirror claims', describing tactics of the batterer to accuse the victim of behaviours similar to his own to distract from his abuse

Section 7.4.12: Interpreting information when only one party is physically present

- This increases the risk of, e.g., orders being enforced without contemplating DV or abuse

Section 7.4.23: When the perpetrator makes spurious child abuse claims

Section 7.4.24: When perpetrators enlist grandparents

- Describes instances where perpetrators' family members 'seek to be added as parties to litigation against the mother'

Section 7.4.28: When perpetrators make complaints against professionals (such as police, evaluators, therapists, supervisors of access, child protection authorities, mediators, lawyers, and judges), and Section 7.4.29: When the perpetrator threatens service providers, lawyers and judges

- Refers to instances of hiring and firing lawyers, and making multiple complaints, dragging out the process for the victim for extended periods of time and prolonging contact and control

Section 7.4.3: When the perpetrator insists on mutual protection orders

Section 7.4.32: When perpetrators file retaliatory parallel claims in multiple courts

Section 5.3: Detection and prevention of intimidation in discovery proceedings and hearings

- This section notes the continued tactics of intimidation and harassment targeted persons may experience in court, emphasising they may be quite subtle. Some possible judicial responses to such actions are identified:
  - Monitoring cross examination, and ensuring this is conducted by a lawyer;
  - Redirecting perpetrator's testimony to relevant issues;
  - Enabling the victim to testify without directly facing the perpetrator (e.g. via video link of from behind a screen);
  - Providing separate waiting rooms for the parties;
  - Staggering the parties' entrances and exits;

- It should be noted that '[s]tressful surroundings can exaggerate underlying psychological reactions and harm produced by domestic violence. Witnesses are being asked to recount traumatic abuse and violence by persons who breached an intimate trust. In such circumstances, it is particularly important for lawyers and service providers, particularly male professionals, to put the witness at ease and to ensure that all questions are phrased in a non-threatening, non-accusatory manner' (Section 5.3.3).

Australian Government: Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Law for the Future – An Inquiry into the Family Law System: Final Report, ALRC Report 135 (March 2019).

In a 2019 report investigating the family law system the Australian Law Reform Commission included a section in which it recognised and discussed a variety of misuses of processes and systems associated with family law interactions (footnotes omitted):

Misuse of processes and systems

10.26 Stakeholders raised the issue of behaviour involving engagement, and non-engagement, with various family law and other systems and processes to achieve ends other than those for which the processes are designed, in the context of family violence. Higher court use and higher rates of unsuccessful engagement with FDR are associated with patterns of violence marked as part of a pattern of coercive control. Research and analysis over a long period of time has highlighted a range of behaviours that can occur in this context, with submissions providing examples of:

- manipulation in engagement with Family Relationship Centre services either prior to lodging a court application or when mandated by a court order;
- refusing to attend meetings, rescheduling meetings, or refusing to sign documents;
- seeking preliminary advice to create a conflict of interest and prevent the other party from obtaining legal advice, using litigation to waste the resources of the other party, and using the threat of indemnity costs to intimidate the other party;
- repeated engagement with parenting orders programs over issues that have been dealt with by other services over a number of years;
- instigating and re-instigating legal proceedings in multiple courts, including applications for final orders and for enforcement of parenting orders in the family courts;
- repeated applications to the court in the same matter, including in relation to recovery orders;
- prolonging court proceedings by requiring adjournments and challenging interim and procedural determinations, sometimes with the intent to and effect of exhausting legal funding (legal aid or private resources), also known as ‘burning off’;

- making cross-applications in proceedings for personal protection orders;
- using processes in one court to obtain an advantage in another, for example, using family court processes to gain evidence that is also relevant to a criminal matter;
- self-representing in court to create opportunities to personally cross-examine victims about family violence, sexual abuse allegations, and other sensitive issues;
- using evidence gathering processes, including subpoenas, to obtain access to sensitive personal material such as the victim’s therapeutic counselling records or sexual assault service records;
- making multiple notifications to child protection agencies or making notifications to child protection agencies in relation to trivial matters;
- challenging and appealing child support determinations;
- deliberately not engaging or delaying engagement with FDR services to delay resolution or force the other party to self-represent in court; and
- non-disclosure of income and assets in property and financial matters.

10.27 Misuse of processes and systems can impede post-separation re-establishment and recovery from the effects of family violence, as well as parenting compromising capacity and the emotional and other resources available to meet children’s needs. It also has significant implications for the efficiency of the system and access to the system.

Family Court of Australia, Family Violence Best Practice Principles, 4th edition (2016).

The Best Practice Principles are applicable in all cases involving family violence or child abuse (or the risk of either) in proceedings before courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cmth), and provide useful background information for decision makers, legal practitioners and individuals involved in these cases including an explanation of the definition of ‘family violence’ and ‘abuse’ under the Family Law Act and the different types of violence and abuse.

The Best Practice Principles recognise:

- the harmful effects of family violence and abuse on victims
- the prominence given to the issue of family violence in the Family Law Act, and

- the principles guiding the case management system for the disposition of cases involving allegations of abuse of children.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Migrant and Refugee Women's Experience of the Courts (A report for the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity), (2016).

See the Executive Summary (p6-9) which makes a number of recommendations. It also identifies and discusses key pre-court barriers:

- Lack of knowledge of legal rights;
- Lack of financial independence;
- The importance of integrated support services;
- Poor police responses;
- The impact of pre-arrival experiences and traumatic backgrounds;
- Community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- Uncertainty about immigration status and fear of deportation; and
- The cost of engagement with the legal system.

Identifies communication barriers: Working with interpreters:

- Lack of clarity about who is responsible for engaging an interpreter;
- Failure to assess the need for an interpreter, or incorrectly assessing need;
- The skill of interpreters being engaged;
- Lack of awareness amongst judicial officers and lawyers about how to work with interpreters;
- Engaging interpreters who are inappropriate in the circumstances; and
- Unethical and poor professional conduct by interpreters.

Identifies barriers to full participation in attending court:

- The intimidating process of arriving at court;
- Safety while waiting at court;
- Lack of understanding of court processes;

- Difficulty understanding forms, charges, orders or judgments;
- Courtroom dynamics;
- The impact of attitudes and actions of judicial officers;
- The need for judicial officers to receive cultural competency training;
- Lack of availability of men's behaviour change programs; and
- Abuse of court processes by perpetrators.

Walpole & Secretary, Department of Communities and Justice [2020] FamCAFC 65 (25 March 2020) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

Ryan and Aldridge JJ criticised the role of the Secretary of the Department of Communities and Justice (NSW) as the Central Authority in pursuing the matter:

[78] 'We have been troubled by what occurred in this case and it is timely to mention the importance of adherence to Model Litigant guidelines. The NSW Guidelines, which apply to the Central Authority, requires more than merely acting honestly and in accordance with the law and court rules. Essentially, the guidelines require that the Central Authority acts with complete propriety and in accordance with the highest professional standards. Relevantly, this includes not requiring the other party to prove a matter which the state or an agency knows to be true.'

[79] 'In this case, the application disclosed the father's final term of imprisonment in NSW. Even though the Requesting Authority knew that the father was permanently banned from Australia, had effectively been deported and had lived in New Zealand for many years, it would seem that no attempt was made to establish his criminal antecedents or the involvement (if any) of child protection agencies in New Zealand in relation to his other children. The same applies in NSW. To be fair, the Requesting Authority and the Central Authority disclosed the mother's application for a protection order and thereby flagged that, on the mother's case, serious risk issues arose.'

[80] 'It is our understanding that systems are in place in NSW which enable the Central Authority to access/request information from the NSW Police. We assume New Zealand operates in the same fashion. Thus, the Requesting Authority and Central Authority were able to examine and present the father's complete criminal history and an entire set of COPS records. Instead, it was left to the mother and the ICL to gather records from New Zealand and domestically. It is no small thing to obtain records from abroad, particularly when time constraints are tight. Fortunately, the mother was granted legal aid, but, what we ask, if she was not? How would this young mother on social security benefits have managed to place this vitally important evidence before the court? The prospect that she would not have been able to do so is obvious.'

Theophane & Hunt* [2014] FamCA 1038 (24 November 2014) – Family Court of Australia

The father lodged a number of vexatious family law applications including: agreeing to consent orders but still pressing on with interim applications for different orders to those which he had just agreed upon; alleging a contravention without any factual material properly supporting it; application seeking injunctions of previous orders of the court x 2; application to appeal a decision where there was no sufficient change of circumstance to warrant fresh proceedings; application for interim relief to remove the Independent Children's Lawyer.

Tree J at [243]: 'It will be appreciated that I have not formed the view that the father's entire conduct, whether in instituting proceedings or in conducting them, has been vexatious. However I am satisfied that on numerous occasions, either the proceedings have been instituted vexatiously or they have been conducted vexatiously. I am therefore satisfied that the father has frequently instituted or conducted vexatious proceedings'.

GRP v ABQ* [2020] QDC 272 (28 October 2020) – Queensland District Court

In considering whether to make a TPO against the respondent, her Honour had regard to the principle in the Act that: "In circumstances in which there are conflicting allegations of domestic violence or indications that both persons in a relationship are committing acts of violence, including for their self-protection, the person who is most in need of protection should be identified" and the respondent's submission that this principle recognises that: "A cross-application may be used by a respondent to continue victimising the aggrieved person, to exact revenge or to gain a tactical advantage in other court proceedings" (at [34]-[35]).

Groom v Police* [2020] SASCA 1 (22 January 2021) – South Australian Court of Appeal

The Court not only dismissed the application for permission to appeal but also held at [10]-[11] that:

> "In our view, the latest material filed in support of the application for permission to appeal demonstrates that the applicant continues to attempt to relitigate matters previously ventilated and considered in the > Magistrates Court, by the various Judges of this Court and by the Full Court.

> We consider the current application for permission to appeal, in the circumstances, to be an abuse of process."

The Court referred the matter to the Attorney-General to consider whether there were proper grounds for an application to be made under s 39 of the Supreme Court Act 1935 (SA) to stay any further proceedings sought to be instituted by the applicant (at [12]-[13]).

Cannell v G; G v Cannell [2018] TASSC 55 (1 November 2018) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

The defendant was charged with contravention of a protection order when the defendant approached the complainant on numerous occasions to serve her with an application for a restraining order:

Brett J: 'The evidence overwhelmingly supported the magistrate's conclusion that the defendant had harassed the complainant by following her, and that following her was deliberate and intentional…. Whilst the service of documents on the complainant was a legitimate purpose, it did not justify conduct on the part of the defendant that was in breach of the [protection] order. It goes without saying that there were other ways of achieving that legitimate purpose which did not involve contravention of the family violence order.' [63]

Baron v Walsh [2014] WASCA 124 (18 June 2014) – Western Australia Supreme Court (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [63]: 'the intent or purpose with which legally available procedures are threatened or used can result in the commission of a tort (malicious prosecution, abuse of process) or a criminal offence…Further, the commencement or maintenance of legal proceedings for an improper collateral purpose is a tort: Williams v Spautz [1992] HCA 34; (1992) 174 CLR 509; Flower & Hart (a firm) v White Industries (Qld) Pty Ltd [1999] FCA 773; (1999) 163 ALR 744. A knowingly frivolous and vexatious claim is also an abuse of process.'

Her Honour went on at [65]: 'To threaten and/or take detrimental action against a person to achieve a collateral outcome is improper (at least) and is to behave in a manner that is intimidating, even if the action involves a person availing himself of legally available procedures. I do not intend to suggest that this is an exhaustive statement of behaviour that is intimidating.'

Conomy v Maden [2016] WASCA 30 (18 February 2016) – Western Australia Supreme Court (Court of Appeal)

The Court at [117]: 'The paramount responsibility which a judicial officer presiding over a criminal trial owes to the community is ensuring that the accused person receives a fair trial. However, the judicial officer also owes other concurrent responsibilities to the community. In a case such as the present they include a responsibility to see that the accused does not utilise the proceedings as a vehicle for harassment of the alleged victim. The exercise of that responsibility will require vigilance in confining an accused person to asking questions which are relevant to the issues raised for the court's determination'.

Forced marriage

A forced marriage exists when a person marries without freely and fully consenting as a result of being coerced, threatened or deceived, or because they are incapable of understanding the nature and effect of a marriage ceremony, for reasons including age or mental capacity [Cth Department of Home Affairs Forced Marriage website]. This is different from an arranged marriage where both parties consent to the marriage being organised by their families [McGuire 2014]. Causing a person to enter a forced marriage is a criminal offence under the Commonwealth Criminal Code Act (1995); and due to the absence of 'real consent', a forced marriage would be void under the Commonwealth Marriage Act (1961).

Forced marriage is conceptualised as a slavery-like practice because it deprives people of their equal enjoyment and exercise of basic human rights and freedoms. The circumstances in which a person is coerced, threatened or deceived so as to diminish or negate their capacity to voluntarily consent to marriage may also involve a range of domestic and family violence behaviours, including physical violence, honour-based violence, threats to kill or harm, restriction of movement or psychological oppression. These behaviours may be perpetrated by the other party or members of either party's family who seek to control behaviour that challenges cultural norms, to protect family honour, or to prevent a marriage that is considered unsuitable [McGuire 2014]. The person may be sent overseas to be forcibly married, or seek asylum in Australia to avoid forced marriage in their country of origin; or a non-citizen forcibly married in Australia may fear being returned to their country of origin and having to face family punishment.

Available data in Australia indicates forced marriage is a practice that disproportionately affects women and girls [Karma Nirvana 2008]. However reliable data for Australia is not available as forced marriage is believed to be significantly underreported [McGuire 2014]. Some of the reasons for underreporting include: social stigma, family pressure, financial constraints, actual and threatened further violence and abuse, concerns about the welfare of children, lack of access to legal information or representation, and fear of deportation where the perpetrator threatens to withdraw sponsorship of the victim's temporary immigration visa.

Children at risk of forced marriage may, under the Family Law Act 1975, apply to the Family Court of Australia for parenting orders prohibiting conduct that would enable the marriage, for example confiscating passports, restraining the child's removal from the country, or placing the child on the Airport Watch List. Currently, there are no equivalent provisions available to adults at risk of forced marriage; however they may seek protection under applicable domestic and family violence legislation.

Forced marriage may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Lyneham, S., & Bricknell, S. (2018), When saying no is not an option: Forced marriage in Australia and New Zealand, Australian Institute of Criminology.

This Australian research explores the context of forced marriage, drawing on interviews with stakeholders (24 interviews with 38 participants), focus groups with stakeholders and community members (5 focus groups with 47 participants), interviews with victim/survivors (6 interviews with 7 participants) and victim/survivor case files (n=10).

'Findings from the research suggest that forced marriage tends to be associated with families and communities characterised by social conservatism, a commitment to tradition and a strict adherence to prescribed behavioural conduct. This environment can produce intense pressure to conform and consequently limited autonomy, often, for women and girls and those (male or female) perceived to be 'different'. The latter includes persons with a disability, those whose sexual preference or sexual behaviour is at odds with desired norms, and those who have aspirations to independent living. In such circumstances, choice is often curbed. This is particularly so for a family interest matter such as marriage.' (p. vii).

McGuire, Magdalena, 'The Right to Refuse: Examining Forced Marriage in Australia' (Report: Good Shepherd Youth & Family Service, Domestic Violence Victoria and Good ShepherdAustralia New Zealand, 2014).

This project drew on The Right to Refuse forum (a cross-sectoral forum on forced marriage which was held by the research partners) and the literature to devise some key findings about forced marriage. These findings include:

- Forced marriage is a form of violence against women and girls. It can lead to a range of negative consequences for victims, including physical, sexual, and psychological violence, economic abuse, denial of education, social isolation, and mental health problems
- Forced marriage and arranged marriage are two distinct practices. While forced marriage is unlawful and harmful, arranged marriage is an acceptable practice (to the extent that it allows potential partners to consent to the marriage). Currently, there is little awareness in the community about the difference between forced marriage and arranged marriage.

- Little is known about the prevalence and manifestation of forced marriage in Australia. Nonetheless, it is clear that forced marriage happens to a diverse range of women and girls in the Australian community. Young women and women with cognitive impairments can be particularly at risk of experiencing forced marriage.
- Forced marriage cases are complex and cross over multiple service sectors. It is rare for victims of forced marriage to present with only one problem for which they require assistance.
- Many women and girls who have experienced forced marriage will require the assistance of domestic violence support services. Domestic violence services can be the first place where forced marriage is identified and responded to.
- Women and girls who have experienced forced marriage can be reluctant to engage with services. A key way to address this barrier is to establish a relationship of trust between the victim of forced marriage and a worker within the relevant service.

Simmons, F & Wong G. Learning from lived experience: Australia's legal response to forced marriage. (2021) 44(4) University of New South Wales Law Journal 1619-1662.

This article explains forced marriage in the Australian context and highlights its prevalence (p1620-1628). The article also explores the limitations of the current approach to forced marriage in Australia. The paper then draws on a qualitative study with eight survivors of forced marriage in Australia to explore their reflections of the experience of forced marriage and the legal response.

Vidal, Laura, Opportunities to Respond to Forced Marriage within Australia's Domestic and Family Violence Framework Issues Paper, 2019, Good Shepherd.

Currently in Australia, responses to the practice of forced marriage are heavily embedded within a criminal justice framework. This paper considers whether there are opportunities to prevent and respond to forced marriage within existing and more holistic domestic and family violence laws and policies instead. It discusses the relationship between forced marriage and family violence, the drivers and impacts of forced marriage, the gendered nature of family violence and forced marriage, policy and legislative responses, general trends in legislative responses, existing intervention orders, and the proposed forced marriage protection order scheme. A table noting where forced marriage is recognised within current Commonwealth and state and territory legislation is included as an appendix.

Karma Nirvana, 'Survivors of Honour Based Violence and Forced Marriage in the UK' (Sample study, 2008).

On 11th April 2008 a dedicated line for reporting honour based violence (HBV) issues was opened in the United Kingdom. 1069 calls were received in the four months since inception. The aim of this report is to provide an overview of all the calls received by the line and then more detailed analysis of a sample size of approximately 10% (100 calls). Findings include:

- 65% of callers were the actual victims of abuse.
- The vast majority of victims were female (89%).
- Approximately one third of all victims were below 22 years of age. 11% of victims were aged 16 years and under, whilst the highest percentage of victims were aged 17 years of age (16%).
- A large percentage of victims were Muslim and of Pakistani origin
- Members of the victim's immediate family (including husbands and partners) were the main perpetrators of abuse.
- Forced marriage and honour based violence were the main triggers for abuse.
- Almost 80% of all callers quoted forced marriage as the type of abuse being perpetrated against them and approx. 70% quoted HBV. Other forms of abuse reported included physical, emotional, psychological, reluctant sponsor, financial, sexual and abuse of children.

Love, H., Dank, M., Esthappan, S., & Zweig, J. (2019) Navigating an Unclear Terrain: Challenges in Recognizing, Naming, and Accessing Services for "Forced Marriage." Violence Against Women, 25(9), 1138–1159.

In exploring the nature of forced marriages and filling the gap in existing research related to the practice in the United States, the study sought to answer the following questions: (1) what factors put an individual at risk of forced marriage; (2) how do social norms influence and support the practice of forced marriage; (3) how do people forced marriages are imposed on seek help; and (4) how are service providers and justice system stakeholders responding to cases of forced marriage. To answer these questions, interviews were conducted with 24 members of the South Asian community in the Washington, DC metropolitan area who had experienced forced marriage either directly or knew someone who had. Eleven of these interviewees had first-hand experiences with the practice (these participants will be referred to as ‘respondents’). Fifteen relevant stakeholders such as service providers, counsellors and religious leaders were also interviewed.

The study provided that the existing – although limited - literature exploring the practice of forced marriage has found that the parties the marriages are imposed upon face several barriers when trying to access help. The interviews conducted during the study supported these findings. The main barriers identified were: lack of awareness of services; difficulties in disclosing forced marriage, especially to professionals; and inadequate service provision options offered to people who experience forced marriage

Respondents’ Experiences

Most participants provided that they had very limited access to information about services for forced marriage and/or associated rights or were unaware that they existed altogether. "In some cases, respondents’ unawareness of services was compounded by the fact that the term ‘forced marriage’ did not fit their understanding of their experience" (1147). Counsellors and other service providers reported a similar reluctance to use the term. When respondents were aware of forced marriage services, they reported that they were often reluctant to access them due to the "stigma associated with intimate violence and with disclosing details of one’s personal life to others" (1148). Stakeholders provided that in addition to this stigma, power and gender dynamics within clients’ families or fear of family members being subjected to criminal ramifications also acted as barriers to respondents seeking help.

Most of the participants "agreed that responding to forced marriage is more complex than arresting those who are ‘forcing’ the marriage" (1150). In fact, many respondents were reluctant to engage in exit strategies that required them to be separated from family members despite the fears of service providers that remaining with or returning to family would allow respondents to be subjected to coercion again. Instead, respondents believed that either nuanced policy responses or "services aimed at addressing he structural causes that facilitate power imbalances and victimisation within relationships, rather than services narrowed to focus on a specific crime or instance of abuse" would be more effective (1150).

Stakeholders’ Experiences

Stakeholders reported that they faced several barriers while trying to deliver services to clients. The three most common were: inconsistent organisational understandings of forced marriage; the lack of standardised methods for identifying clients; and the unmet need for cultural competency. Most stakeholders reported that their organisations did not have a working definition of forced marriage and that they personally only have very limited exposure to forced marriage cases.

When stakeholders did claim to understand the concept, there were large inconsistencies between their definitions. For example, some stakeholders described cases of forced marriage as falling "along a spectrum of coercion in which their clients faced pressure but did not view themselves as victims of force" while others thought of the concept as a form of gender-based violence. The article provided that these inconsistencies "hold tangible ramifications for the quality of services clients receive" and were indicative of the need for increased training. The article also noted that Along with these inconsistencies, "[s]ervice providers also differed in their methods for screening and identifying clients" (1152).

HM Government, Multi-agency practice guidelines: handling cases of forced Marriage, 2014.

A UK government resource developed alongside the statutory guidance "The Right to Choose" issued in 2008 under the Forced Marriage (Civil Protection) Act 2007. The statutory guidance sets out the responsibilities of Chief Executives, Directors and Senior Managers within agencies involved with handling cases of forced marriage.

This document seeks to supplement the statutory guidance with advice and support to front line practitioners who have responsibilities to safeguard children and protect adults from the abuses associated with forced marriage. It sets out a multi-agency response and encourages agencies to cooperate and work together closely to protect victims.

Judicial Council of Victoria and Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, Modern Slavery: Guidance for Australian Courts, (2021).

Modern slavery is an umbrella term which encompasses:

- Slavery;
- Slavery-like practices (servitude);
- Organ trafficking,
- Trafficking in persons (including children);
- Forced labour or services (including deceptive recruiting);
- Debt bondage; and
- Forced marriage.

All of these practices have been criminalised through Divisions 270 and 271 of the Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth) ('Criminal Code'). This Guide.

Notably, forced marriage occurs where one or both parties do not fully and freely consent to the marriage because of coercion, threat or deception, or where one or both parties is incapable of understanding the nature and effect of a marriage ceremony, including for reasons such as age or mental capacity. Forced marriage also occurs where either party to the marriage is under the age of 16. (p14). This guide provides helpful information about this offence and responses to it.

Cronin J at [39] and [43]: '[D]uress is not defined in the Act, but there was no reason to give it any other meaning than that which is normally known to the law. It must be oppression or coercion to such a degree that consent vanishes: In the Marriage of S (1980) FLC 90-820'. Here, 'the wife's physical state at the time of the ceremony was such that she was physically and mentally overborne. Her consent was not real because it was obtained by duress'.

Dowry abuse

Whilst some types of family violence are experienced in all communities, there are certain forms of family violence that arise in culturally and linguistically diverse communities. One notable example is dowry abuse, which is particularly prevalent in India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and the Middle East, though not confined to any ethnic, cultural or religious group [Senate 2019]. Given Australia's status as a multicultural nation, dowry abuse has become an increasing problem.

Dowry is the practice of transferring money, property, goods or other gifts from a person to their spouse's family. The United Nations Division for the Advancement of Women defines dowry-related violence as 'any act of violence or harassment associated with the giving or receiving of dowry at any time before, during or after the marriage' [United Nations 2009]. The practice of dowry is abused when coercive demands are made for further or larger gifts from a victim and their family. These demands are often coupled with acts of physical, emotional or economic abuse, threats, harassment or stalking. Research suggests that dowry abuse can also include abandonment, acid throwing, demands to terminate pregnancy, mutilation, murder, sexual assault, and threats to cancel visa sponsorship or to annul a marriage [GSANZ & inTouch 2018]. Numerous individuals may be involved in perpetrating dowry abuse, such as in-laws, former spouses and fiancés, and other family members and friends [United Nations 2009].

Dowry abuse has been reported to be linked to poor mental health and suicides in women. The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists have observed that culturally and linguistically diverse women found it difficult to recognise the abuse and seek help due to, for example, fears of cultural and social isolation, and pressures from within the community to maintain the family unit [RANZCP 2018]. It is also widely noted that dowry-related violence may be exacerbated by a victim's immigration status. The Family Violence Response Centre reports that their staff observed that women were less likely to report abuse because of their precarious living situation; work restrictions and ineligibility for government support payments; the isolation of living in a new country; and the fear of deportation to their home country and associated feelings of shame. Women who did seek help, however, have encountered barriers because there is limited understanding and awareness among police, social workers and the legal profession about what dowry is, how it is practiced, and how it can be linked to family violence.

There are currently no laws in Australia that criminalise the practice of dowry or dowry abuse. There have been increasing calls for dowry-related violence to be included in the definition of economic abuse in all Australian legislation [Senate 2019]. Victoria recently legislated to refer to dowry abuse as an example of family violence in s 5(1)(a) of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008. Dowry abuse is also mentioned in the Western Australian Restraining Orders Act 1997 under the definition of family violence in s 5A(2)(ha).

Dowry abuse may be one aspect of a complex pattern of behaviours engaged in by perpetrators in order to control another person, sometimes referred to as coercive control.

Good Shepherd Australian New Zealand and InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Submission to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs: The practice of dowry and the incidence of dowry abuse in Australia, 16 August 2018.

This submission observes that dowry practices differ between South Asian and North African communities in Australia: in South Asian communities it is characterised by gifts from the wife's family to the husband's family; in North African communities it is characterised by gifts from the husband's family to the wife's family.

It observes that Indian laws recognised dowry as "a key factor that underpins domestic violence". "The practice of dowry does however have the potential to become exploitative and harmful when it is practised in a way that involves force, fraud, coercion, threats and violence (sexual, physical and psychological)." It recommends dowry abuse be included in definitions of family violence in Australia.

Harmony Alliance. Emerging insights from our national survey on dowry abuse. Canberra: Harmony Alliance, 2020.

This paper highlights significant findings from their national survey on dowry abuse, noting respondents were overall very familiar with the practice of dowry and abusive behaviours linked to dowry demands. Most common behaviours connected to dowry demands were verbal abuse, humiliation and controlling behaviours. Other examples identified included murder, reproductive control, child abuse, threats of deportation, family insult and use of family court proceedings against the woman.

O'Connor, M., 'Dowry-related domestic violence and complex posttraumatic stress disorder: a case report' (2017) 25(4) Australasian Psychiatry 351-353.

This paper highlights the mental health impact of coercive dowry demands, drawing on a specific case study of a South Asian migrant woman whose husband was dissatisfied with her dowry and inflicted significant emotional and physical trauma as a result. His dissatisfaction with the dowry was found to be a principal reason for the abuse, violence and threats perpetrated against his wife. Although the author acknowledges that the exact prevalence of dowry-related domestic violence is uncertain in Australia, it is proposed that the problem is substantial, especially given that two dowry-related murders have been reported in Victoria.

O'Connor, M and Lee, A. The health impacts of dowry abuse on South Asian communities in Australia, Med J Aust 2022; 216 (1): 11-13. || doi: 10.5694/mja2.51358

This article considers the health impacts of dowry abuse particular to the Indian-born Australian population including family violence and associated mental harm.

"Abuse associated with dowry includes controlling and coercive behaviour by the husband and his family who pressure, threaten or demand substantial gifts from the woman and her family in the context of the marriage. Among migrant communities in Australia, dowry abuse can manifest in demands for gold jewellery, white goods, gifts, or cash to start a business or buy a house. Refusal to comply with demands for dowry may be associated with threats, violence, verbal harassment, criticism and abandonment. A series of high profile family violence murders in Australia in the Indian community in 2012–2016 were in part related to dowry issues."

The article refers to the results of the Harmony Alliance 2020 national survey on dowry abuse in which respondents identified behaviours connected with dowry demands:

- verbal abuse (85% of respondents);
- humiliation (77%); and
- controlling behaviour (77%).

32% of respondents reported either experiencing dowry abuse themselves or knowing someone who had.

Dowry-related violence may be exacerbated by a victim's immigration status. The Family Violence Response Centre reports that their staff observed that women were less likely to report abuse because of their precarious living situation; work restrictions and ineligibility for government support payments; the isolation of living in a new country; and the fear of deportation to their home country and associated feelings of shame. Women who did seek help, however, have encountered barriers because there is limited understanding and awareness among police, social workers and the legal profession about what dowry is, how it is practiced, and how it can be linked to family violence.

The Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Psychiatrists have observed that culturally and linguistically diverse women found it difficult to recognise the abuse and seek help due to, for example, fears of cultural and social isolation, and pressures from within the community to maintain the family unit (p4).

The Senate, Legal and Constitutional Affairs References Committee, 2019, Practice of dowry and the incidence of dowry abuse in Australia.

In June 2018, the Australian Senate remitted an inquiry into the nature of dowry as a cultural practice and the incidence of dowry abuse in Australia to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs References Committee. The Final Report of the Practice of Dowry and the Incidence of Dowry Abuse in Australia was delivered on 14 February 2019. The Committee aimed to explore the practice of dowry and the adequacy of current Australian policy frameworks regarding dowry abuse. The Report, however, did not explicitly define ‘dowry’, which presented issues in relation to collecting and presenting evidence.

The Report's main objectives were to explore inter alia:

- the extent, nature and prevalence of dowry in Australia, both before and after marriage;
- reports of dowry abuse, including potential links to family violence, slavery and financial abuse;
- links between dowry, dowry abuse and forced marriage; and
- the adequacy of the family law system, including how divorce and property settlement proceedings deal with dowry and dowry abuse.

It outlined 12 recommendations to government to address dowry abuse in Australia. Although the Report did not propose to criminalise the practice of dowry in its entirety, it did recommend an approach that recognises dowry abuse as economic abuse within the context of family violence, and suggested that it be included in the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

Segrave, M., and Vidal, L., 'Dowry abuse: it's a growing problem in Australia, but new laws aren't the answer' (2019) Monash University Lens.

The authors explore legislative frameworks surrounding dowry abuse and argue that "a key response must be to implement effective legislation covering economic abuse more generally, rather than singling out certain cultural practices". Quantifying the practice of dowry in Australia, and the extent to which it is used as a form of abuse or coercion, is difficult; however, it does exist among certain Australian communities, and the need to implement measures addressing it are only recently being considered. The authors also refer to the Report, Practice of dowry and the incidence of dowry abuse in Australia, and a joint submission noting "the slippage between dowry abuse, arranged and forced marriage and the absence of a clear definition of dowry abuse (given the many forms of payments that occur in the context of marriage, including dowry, dower, bride price, bride service)".

See 3.3.4 Dowry-related violence and harassment. 'Demands for dowry can result in women being harassed, harmed or killed, including women being burned to death, and in deaths of women which are labelled as suicides. It is necessary for dowry to be defined as broadly as possible to capture the full range of exchanges given, or asked for, in the name of dowry.' This paper recommends legislation should 'define dowry-related violence or harassment as any act of violence or harassment associated with the giving or receiving of dowry at any time before, during or after the marriage.' Coercive control

Understanding coercive control

Coercive control is almost always an underpinning dynamic of family and domestic violence: Perpetrators exert power and dominance of victim-survivors using patterns of abusive behaviour over time [National Plan 2022]that create fear and deny victim-survivors liberty and autonomy [Stark 2007].

There is no single agreed definition of coercive control [Boxall & Morgan 2021]. However, research consistently identifies that the behaviours and tactics associated with coercive control can be subtle [Douglas & Ehler 2022], difficult to identify and different in each relationship [Stark & Hester 2019]. Coercive control manifests and is experienced in various ways in different class and cultural contexts. The impacts of coercive control are pervasive, and can be physical, emotional, psychological, spiritual, cultural, social and financial. Impacts are also intersecting and cumulative, rather than incident-specific. Victim-survivors commonly describe coercive control as feeling like 'walking on eggshells' and report they need to ask permission to do small everyday things and fear the repercussions of not fulfilling their abuser's expectations or demands.

Use of retaliatory violence or self-defence against a perpetrator are not coercive control.

Coercive control is mainly perpetrated by men against women [Stark 2007] . Perpetrators can exert power and dominance over victim-survivors in current and former intimate partner relationships. Coercive control can also be perpetrated in broader family relationships, such as against children or young people by parents or relatives, against parents or elders by adult children or grandchildren, or between siblings. Coercive control is particularly prevalent in relationships where there is an imbalance of power [Stark & Hester 2019]. Professor Evan Stark has described coercive control as "a pattern of domination that includes tactics to isolate, degrade, exploit and control" victims [Stark 2007].

The behaviours associated with coercive control can take many different forms including any of the forms of domestic and family violence considered in this benchbook. Common behaviours that may be used by perpetrators as part of coercive control include but are not limited to:

- emotional manipulation including humiliation and threats,
- surveillance and monitoring, often carried out online,

- isolation from friends and family,
- rigid rules about where the person can eat, sleep or pray,
- placing limits on economic autonomy.

As coercive control depends on context, evidence or information about the context may assist the decision-maker to identify coercive control and help ensure the victim-survivor is not misidentified as a perpetrator.

In situations involving coercive control the abuser draws on their specific knowledge of the victim to entrap the victim, and the tactics used to assert control may change over time [Stark 2007]:

- The abuser may target the victim's children to extend their control over the victim, sometimes using children as a tool of surveillance or intimidation [Katz et al 2020].
- The abuser's attack on the victim's autonomy can involve utilising systems [VE: Bianca], including the legal system (sometimes referred to as 'systems abuse').

Research has identified that domestic and family violence is rarely a single incident, rather it is a pattern of behaviour that may or may not include physical force, and extends beyond the home and beyond the duration of a relationship [Kelly et al 2014]. These patterns of behaviour may occur throughout a relationship, or may be initiated or exacerbated at times of heightened risk, for example, pregnancy, attempted or actual separation [Bruton & Tyson 2017], and during court proceedings [Douglas & Ehler 2022].

Some judicial officers have considered coercive control. A selection of examples are contained in the Cases tab attached to this subsection.

In some relationships physical violence is part of the pattern of coercive control but incidents of physical violence may be routine, minor and frequently repeated [Stark 2007]. Other victims-survivors report that physical violence is rare or a once off or occurred early in the relationship, but establishes the abuser's capacity and potential for physical violence [Douglas 2021]. Some people who experience coercive control do not experience physical violence [Boxall & Morgan 2021].

Coercive control can be damaging even when there is no physical violence. Many victim-survivors identify that non-physical abuse deeply impacts on their sense of self and freedom, and often continues to affect them years after separation [Bagshaw et al 2011]. Many victim-survivors of domestic and family violence report that the most difficult forms of abuse they experienced were non-physical forms of abuse, especially emotional abuse [Douglas 2021].

The community and broader service and response system, including law enforcement and the courts, can typically focus on physical violence and single or episodic acts of violence in isolation, rather than considering patterns of physical and non-physical behaviour over time and their cumulative impacts [Stark & Hester 2019]. This can make it easy for perpetrators to hide their actions from systems and can lead to a perpetrator's subtle and highly contextualised abuse, and the compounding impact of coercive control, being overlooked and/or minimised. Incident-based responses can also heighten the risks of misidentifying the victim-survivor as the perpetrator [Nancarrow et al 2020].

Researchers have suggested that coercive control is a common thread running through risk identification and assessment for domestic violence [Myhill & Hohl 2019].

In NSW, a detailed analysis of intimate partner homicides between 2008-2016 demonstrated that 99% (111/112) of the homicides were preceded by coercive control [NSW DV Death Review 2020]. The Queensland Domestic and Family Violence Review and Advisory Board in its 2018-19 Annual Report reported evidence of controlling behaviours by 39.4 per cent and obsessive and/or jealous behaviours by 37.8 per cent of family and domestic violence homicide offenders between 2006 and 2018 [Queensland Government Domestic and Family Violence Death Review 2019] (see also Death review).

Coercive control - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Abstract: This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. Chapter 12 discussed penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders. The report notes that: 'The overwhelming majority of stakeholders that addressed this issue were in favour of sanctions that could help to change the behaviour of those who commit violence. Therefore, there was support for 'perpetrator programs' such as violence and drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs; probation with special conditions, such as attending 'perpetrators' courses or counselling'; men's behaviour programs; psychiatric assessment and treatment; anger management programs; and educational programs on family violence with 'therapeutic interventions'' (at [12.172].) Other options raised (as an alternative to imprisonment) included community service orders (provided the work associated with the penalty is 'meaningful, constructive and rehabilitative') (at [12.173])

The underlying issue in Chapters 13 and 14 is the way in which the criminal law accounts for the nature and dynamics of family violence. Criminal laws are traditionally perceived as 'incident-based', in that they are focused upon discrete acts forming the basis of individual offences. As identified in Chapter 5, family violence is characterised by patterns of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour and may include both physical and non-physical violence [13.2].

Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2021). Defining and responding to coercive control: Policy brief (ANROWS Insights, 01/2021). Sydney: ANROWS.

Abstract: This policy brief aims to assist policymakers developing legal or policy and practice frameworks to prevent or respond to coercive control in relation to domestic and family violence (DFV). It addresses three considerations emerging from current debates on this topic. The first is the need for consistent definition of coercive control and its relationship to the definition of DFV in policy and legislative settings, Australia-wide. The second key consideration, criminalising coercive control, necessitates making an assessment of whether the existing evidence base supports the creation of a specific offence. The third involves reforming the culture of response to DFV, in and around the legal system and in other settings. In considering changes to the way we define and respond to coercive control, it is also necessary to keep front of mind the barriers that diverse groups of women face in our existing justice system, and mitigate risks and unintended consequences of legislative and policy change.

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports on the findings from the analysis of data from two national online surveys (one for adults and one for children), which collected quantitative data and also allowed for qualitative comments about family violence and its impact on parenting and parenting arrangements. The study included adults and children who had separated after 1995 and after the introduction of the Family Law (Shared Parental Responsibility) Amendment Act (Cth) in 2006. The researchers gained the views of a total of 1,153 adults (90%) and children (10%).

Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports.

See in particular at p 53 – 'Some women felt powerless over arrangements to share care of the children with the fathers and felt they had been pressured into unfair agreements. For example, one woman who used services before the 2006 reforms said: 'The power he held over me during the relationship continued afterwards in regard to parenting arrangements and finances'. See also at p 55 where reports of confusion about the meaning of 'equal shared parental responsibility' are discussed.

Overview: This report presents a literature review on coercive control in the context of domestic and family violence, with a particular focus on the understanding of, and responses to coercive control in the Australian context. Commissioned by the Australian Attorney-General's Department, this review focuses on identifying, summarising, analysing and synthesising the existing Australian academic research and evaluations on coercive control. The review highlights the complexities of defining, recognising, and responding to coercive control and identifies relevant gaps in the evidence base. Drawing from a range of quantitative and qualitative studies across scholarly and grey literature, including non-government reports, government and parliamentary reports, peak body reports, and position papers, this review captures the growing recognition of coercively controlling behaviour in the context of family and domestic violence.

Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. Experiences of coercive control among Australian women. Statistical Bulletin no. 30. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Awareness of coercive control within the context of abusive intimate relationships is greater than ever before in Australia. However, there is limited research examining the different patterns and characteristics of abuse, particularly among large Australian samples.

This study examines the characteristics of violence and abuse reported by 1,023 Australian women who had recently experienced coercive control by their current or former partner. The most frequently reported behaviours were jealousy and suspicion of friends, constant insults, monitoring of movements and financial abuse. Over half of the respondents also reported experiencing physical forms of abuse (54%), including severe forms such as non-fatal strangulation (27%). One in three of these women also reported experiencing sexual violence during the survey period (30%). Women were much more likely to seek advice or support when they had also experienced physical or sexual forms of abuse.

Bruton, Crystal and Danielle Tyson, 'Leaving Violent Men: A Study of Women's Experiences of Separation in Victoria, Australia' (2017) 51(3) Australian & New Zealand Journal of Criminology 339-354 https://doi.org/10.1177/0004865817746711

This article explores women's experiences of leaving abusive relationships and seeks to combat assumptions about the nature of such relationships through in-depth interviews with 12 women who had separated from their male intimate partners (p 5). While separation is broadly recognised as a key time for increased risk of violence towards women and their children (p 1), studies demonstrate that most people believe women are able to leave violent relationships, and do not understand why they might stay (p 2). Such views place the responsibility for ending the violence on women, but in reality, these relationships often include complex circumstances, and the 'stay/leave binary' is rarely applicable (p 2). The results indicate that women's experiences of coercive control significantly affected their decision-making in the context of separation (p 6):

- Many women feared leaving because they were aware that separation may provoke retaliatory violence, with some experiencing an escalation of abusive behaviour when they attempted to leave (p 7);
- Many women were motivated to leave the relationship in order to protect their children, especially where violence became directed towards the children (p 8);
- Women's attempts to leave their relationships were often hindered by their partner's control over their finances (p 9); and
- Women adopted strategies to manage their safety both during and following separation (pp 9-10), and many women experienced escalating violence after separation (pp 11-12).

Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services) 2022, National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032.

The new National Plan acknowledges that coercive control is often as significant part of a victim's experience of domestic and family violence. It recognises that a pattern of abuse may include [37]:

- physical abuse (including sexual abuse);
- monitoring the victim's actions;
- restricting freedom or independence;
- social abuse;

- using threats and intimidation;
- emotional of psychological abuse (including spiritual and religious abuse);
- financial abuse;
- sexual coercion;
- reproductive coercion;
- lateral violence;
- systems abuse;
- technology-facilitated abuse; and
- animal abuse.

Douglas, H. Women, Intimate Partner Violence and the Law (2021; OUP).

Abstract: This text explores the results of an interview study involving interviews with 65 women who had experienced domestic and family violence over three years. See chapter 3: Most women reported that the most difficult form of abuse they dealt with were forms of non-physical abuse, especially emotional abuse. Many women identified that non-physical abuse deeply impacted on their sense of self and freedom, and that it continued to affect them for years. Other forms of non-physical abuse that were also highlighted by the women included abusive tactics targeting their role as a mother, isolation within the relationship, financial abuse. The women in the study highlighted the particular impacts of non-physical forms of abuse, including isolation, financial abuse and threats about their visas, for women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds especially those women with insecure visa status.

Douglas H. Legal systems abuse and coercive control. Criminology & Criminal Justice. 2018;18(1):84-99.

Abstract: This article considers how legal engagement can be an opportunity to exercise coercive control over a former intimate partner. Drawing on interviews with 65 women who engaged with the legal system as a result of violence in their intimate relationships, this article explores how women's engagement with the legal system is frequently experienced as an extension of an intimate partner's coercive control. It builds on existing research showing how legal processes provide an opportunity for perpetrators to continue and even expand their repertoire of coercive and controlling behaviours post-separation. I refer to this as legal systems abuse. This article explores women's reported experiences and considers how expectations of equality of access to justice and fair hearing; concepts that underpin legal processes, can be reconciled with legal engagements that seek to end coercive and controlling behaviours. The article concludes that improved understanding of domestic and family violence as coercive control by legal actors may help to circumvent the opportunities for legal systems abuse.

Based on the detailed material outlined in the Report the key themes considered are the key aspects of coercive control that judicial officers seek explanation of; how coercive control should be explained to judicial officers; how judicial officers can respond to coercive control in the court room and general observations and red flags for identifying coercive control.

Article reports on a study involving interviews with 29 women and one gender-diverse person who experienced image-based sexual abuse as part of a pattern of "coercive control."

From Conclusion: The interviews demonstrated a diversity of experiences well beyond the paradigm of "revenge porn." A common theme across these interviews was the dynamic of coercive control. Image-based sexual abuse is one of many abusive tactics employed (both technology- and nontechnology-based) to isolate and entrap victims within abusive relationships, or at the end of the relationship, to control, intimidate, punish, and degrade them.

Joint Select Committee on Coercive Control, Coercive control in domestic relationships. Report 1/57– June 2021, Parliament of New South Wales.

The report of the Joint Select Committee on Coercive Control found that "NSW laws do not respond well to coercive control as a type of abuse, and there is poor understanding of it in our community." The Inquiry sought to identify better ways to respond to coercive control across the New South Wales community.

Chapter 2, "What is coercive control", summarises coercive control:

> Coercive control is a pattern of abuse that degrades, humiliates and isolates victims, and takes away their freedom and autonomy. It has severe psychological impacts on victims. While it does not always involve physical violence, it is a common factor in intimate partner homicides.

This chapter highlights the findings of the New South Wales Death Review Team that in 99% of intimate partner homicides from March 2008 to June 2016 'the relationship between the domestic violence victim and the domestic violence abuser was characterised by the abuser's use of coercive and controlling behaviours towards the victim. In each of these cases the domestic violence abuser (all male) perpetrated various forms of abuse against the victim, including psychological abuse and emotional abuse.'

The chapter acknowledges the evidence of the NSW Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions that 'many people have great difficulty recognising … behaviour that constitutes coercive control.' It also highlights different ways abusers may exploit the individual cultural and personal characteristics of victims to abuse and control them. It also highlights the impacts of coercive control, including case studies of the impacts of psychological abuse, economic abuse, isolation and financial dependence and using temporary visa status to control victims.

Miller P et al. 2016. Alcohol/Drug-Involved Family Violence in Australia (ADIVA). NDLERF monograph no. 68. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Family and domestic violence (FDV) is a significant social issue that causes major social harm across Australia and in response, Commonwealth, state and territory governments have implemented various policy interventions. However, there is, to date, little evidence about what approach is most effective at reducing this violence, and very little research into how specific agencies, like police, can intervene on specific contributing factors of FDV, especially those that might be preventable. Despite the extensive evidence demonstrating the role that alcohol and, to a lesser extent, illicit and other drug use/abuse plays in FDV, there is a lack of information about how interventions that address this issue might be used by police or other agencies to reduce violence.

Nancarrow, H., Thomas, K., Ringland, V., & Modini, T. (2020). Accurately identifying the "person most in need of protection" in domestic and family violence law (Research report, 23/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Abstract: This in-house project was conducted by ANROWS. It aimed to support the effective identification of the "person most in need of protection" in cases where there is some ambiguity about who perpetrated domestic violence and abuse.

The research responded to a recommendation of the Queensland Domestic Violence Death Review and Advisory Board in its 2016-17 Annual Report. The Advisory Board reported that in just under half (44.4%) of all cases of female deaths subject to the review, the woman had been identified as a respondent to a domestic and family violence (DFV) protection order on at least one occasion. Further, in nearly all of the DFV-related deaths of Aboriginal people, the deceased had been recorded as both respondent and aggrieved prior to their death (p. 82). The Board's report recommended research to identify how best to respond to the person most in need of protection where there are mutual allegations of violence and abuse (Recommendation 16).

Responding to that recommendation, the research used a mixed methods approach. This included a national analysis of statistical data (domestic violence order applications, police-issued orders and related criminal charges) and a national desktop review of existing legislative and police requirements and guidance on identifying the DFV victim or perpetrator. The project also involved an in-depth case study of Queensland as a state that has already incorporated the concept of the person most in need of protection into legislation.

The final report emphasises the need for improved guidance for police on identifying patterns of coercive control, and guidance for magistrates on how and when they can dismiss inappropriate applications and/or orders. It recommends clarifying processes of decision-making and accountability between police and the courts as a way of addressing the current ambiguity surrounding responsibility for the determination of the person most in need of protection.

This article examines three Australian law reform processes established to address coercive control: the New South Wales (NSW) Joint Select Committee on Coercive Control, the Queensland Women's Safety and Justice Taskforce, and the exposure Bill released for comment in South Australia (SA). The key question for these law reform processes was whether coercive control should be criminalised following the introduction of such offences in the United Kingdom (UK) and Ireland. Ultimately all three Australian processes answered this question in the affirmative. The article explores the distinct differences in the processes undertaken, including the extent of participation from different groups in society, the level of engagement with implementation issues, and the degree to which the recommended new offence was positioned more critically within what we know about law reform in response to gender-based violence.

This article is based on data derived from a national online survey conducted in Australia in 2021. The aim of this paper is to explore, and better understand male reported experiences of coercive control victimisation. The survey was completed by 1261 people who identified as victim-survivors of coercive control, 206 (17%) of whom identified as men. The paper explores the men's responses.

The authors observe: 'The range of reported experiences of coercive control among this sample reflects remarkable symmetry with what is known about coercive control more generally and reflects similar experiences to that documented among women victim-survivors.' (p10)

Examples of unsatisfactory treatment of victims by judicial officers are listed at p209 and include:

- judicial officers refusing to grant protection orders and instead, telling victims to go to the family courts.
- judicial officers refusing to put any protection orders in place unless the respondent came to court and then placing the burden on the victim to go away and collect further evidence to get protection.
- a judicial officer requiring victims to provide a letter from a medical practitioner before they would allow the victim to make an application that the victim not be cross-examined by the perpetrator.
- judicial officers applying the law inconsistently, including in relation to coercive control.
- a judicial officer who described a perpetrator placing surveillance cameras throughout the house to watch the movements of the victim as merely being signs of an unhealthy relationship breakdown rather than domestic violence.

Domestic abuse continues when abusers are behind bars, through voice or video calling or writing to victims from jail. New, emerging models of system response demonstrate that timely, competent, readily available professional advocacy services and options—delivered through electronic pathways—can buffer against this form of abuse. This research uses case examples to illustrate how detained abusers manipulate and tamper with their victim, along with successful interventions by victim advocates via text message.

L. Kevin Hamberger, Sadie E. Larsen, Amy Lehrner, Coercive control in intimate partner violence, Aggression and Violent Behavior, Volume 37, 2017, Pages 1-11, ISSN 1359-1789.

Abstract: The construct of coercive control has been central to many conceptualizations of intimate partner violence (IPV), yet there is widespread inconsistency in the literature regarding how this construct is defined and measured. This article provides a comprehensive literature review on coercive control in regards to conceptualizations, definitions, operationalization, and measurement; and attempts to provide a synthesis and recommendations for future research. A summary and critique of measures used to assess coercive control in IPV is provided. At least three facets of coercive control are identified: 1) intentionality or goal orientation in the abuser (versus motivation), 2) a negative perception of the controlling behavior by the victim, and 3) the ability of the abuser to obtain control through the deployment of a credible threat. Measurement challenges and opportunities posed by such a multifaceted definition are discussed.

Katz, E (2016) Beyond the Physical Incident Model: How Children Living with Domestic Violence are Harmed By and Resist Regimes of Coercive Control, Child Abuse Review Vol. 25, 46-59.

Abstract: This article begins to build knowledge of how non-violent coercive controlling behaviours can be central to children's experiences of domestic violence. It considers how children can be harmed by, and resist, coercive controlling tactics perpetrated by their father/father-figure against their mother. Already, we know much about how women/mothers experience non-physical forms of domestic violence, including psychological/emotional/verbal and financial abuse, isolation, and monitoring of their activities. However, this knowledge has not yet reached most children and domestic violence research, which tends to focus on children's exposure to physical violence. In this qualitative study, 30 participants from the UK, 15 mothers and 15 of their children (most aged 10-14) who had separated from domestic violence perpetrators, participated in semi-structured interviews. All participants were living in the community. Using the 'Framework' approach to thematically analyse the data, findings indicated that perpetrators'/fathers' coercive control often prevented children from spending time with mothers and grandparents, visiting other children's houses, and engaging in extra-curricular activities. These non-violent behaviours from perpetrators/fathers placed children in isolated, disempowering and constrained worlds which could hamper children's resilience and development and contribute to emotional/behavioural problems. Implications for practice and the need to empower children in these circumstances are discussed.

Katz, E., Nikupeteri, A., & Laitinen, M., 'When Coercive Control Continues to Harm Children: Post-Separation Fathering, Stalking and Domestic Violence' (2020) Child Abuse Review.

Abstract: This article highlights how domestic violence perpetrators can use coercive control against their children after their ex-partner has separated from them. It provides insights into how children experience coercive control post-separation by drawing from two data sets: one from the UK and one from Finland. The data comprised narratives of 29 children and young people aged from 4 to 21 years old. Three overarching themes arose from the data: 1) dangerous fathering that made children frightened and unsafe; 2) 'admirable' fathering, where fathers/father figures appeared as 'caring', 'concerned', 'indulgent' and/or 'vulnerable-victims'; and 3) omnipresent fathering that continually constrained children's lives. Dangerous fathering made children's lives frightening, constrained and unpredictable. Admirable fathering was found to be a powerful tool of control when combined with dangerous fathering, because admirable fathering increased father-child emotional bonds and could make children want to see/live with their fathers, whilst dangerous fathering simultaneously made them fearful of him. Admirable fathering was typically aimed at professionals and wider communities, and could occur alongside fathers/father figures stalking, harassing and/or attacking ex-partners and children when they were not in the public eye. Perpetrators aimed to portray themselves as 'caring', 'concerned', 'indulgent' and/or 'vulnerable-victim' fathers, and to make their ex-partners seem like perpetrators or deficient mothers. Perpetrators disguised their use of coercive control tactics as 'admirable' behaviour. With respect to omnipresent fathering, children were fearful that their father/father figure could appear at any time to attack, harass, manipulate, upset or kidnap them or their mothers. This behaviour led to some children continuously monitoring their surroundings as a protective strategy. Fathers/father figures were able to maintain some degree of control, domination and emotional power over children even when they were not physically present. The article suggests that robust measures are necessary to prevent coercive control perpetrating fathers/father figures from using father-child relationships to continue exerting coercive control on children and ex-partners.

See especially pages 11-12 where the authors draw on Evan Stark's research to explain the concept of coercive control. 'The concept of coercive control recognises that it is the everydayness of living with unpredictability which saps women's energy, depletes their sense of self and isolates them from others: it decreases their 'space for action'… intimate partner violence is rarely a single incident but a pattern of behaviour that extends beyond physical force, beyond the home and beyond the duration of a relationship. The concept of 'coercive control' is particularly insightful since he argues that physical and sexual abuse is interwoven with three equally important tactics: control, intimidation and isolation. It is their toxic combination which entraps leading him to argue that domestic violence is not a simple crime of assault but a 'liberty crime' which creates conditions of un-freedom … Coercive control is distinctive in that it draws on personalised knowledge of women's movements, habits, resources and vulnerabilities.' Myhill A, Hohl K. The "Golden Thread": Coercive Control and Risk Assessment for Domestic Violence. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. 2019; 34(21-22):4477-4497.

Abstract: Research on risk assessment for domestic violence has to date focused primarily on the predictive power of individual risk factors and the statistical validity of risk assessment tools in predicting future physical assault in sub-sets of cases dealt with by the police. This study uses data from risk assessment forms from a random sample of cases of domestic violence reported to the police. An innovative latent trait model is used to test whether a cluster of risk factors associated with coercive control is most representative of the type of abuse that comes to the attention of the police. Factors associated with a course of coercive and controlling conduct, including perpetrators' threats, controlling behavior and sexual coercion, and victims' isolation and fear, had highest item loadings and were thus the most representative of the overall construct. Sub-lethal physical violence—choking and use of weapons—was also consistent with a course of controlling conduct. Whether a physical injury was sustained during the current incident, however, was not associated consistently either with the typical pattern of abuse or with other context-specific risk factors such as separation from the perpetrator. Implications for police practice and the design of risk assessment tools are discussed. We conclude that coercive control is the "golden thread" running through risk identification and assessment for domestic violence and that risk assessment tools structured around coercive control can help police officers move beyond an "incident-by-incident" response and toward identifying the dangerous patterns of behavior that precede domestic homicide.

Stark, Evan, Coercive Control: How Men Entrap Women in Personal Life (Oxford University Press, 2007).

This book is a key text on domestic and family violence. Although Stark is based in the United States his work has been highly influential in Australia. In this book Stark explains that domestic and family violence is a pattern of controlling behaviours more akin to terrorism and hostage-taking. Drawing on court records, interviews, and FBI statistics, Stark details coercive strategies that men use to deny women their very personhood, from food logs to micromanaging dress, speech, sexual activity, and work. Stark urges us to move beyond the injury model and focus on this form of victimization. Stark reframes abuse as a liberty crime rather than a crime of assault. He explains how the perpetrator is able to control the victim through a variety of techniques which essentially lead to deprivation of liberty (pp373-374).

Stark Evan, Hester Marianne. Coercive Control: Update and Review. Violence Against Women. 2019;25(1):81-104.

This article reviews the background, introduction, and critical response to new criminal offenses of coercive control in England/Wales and Scotland. How the new Scottish offense is implemented will determine whether it can overcome the shortcomings of the English law. We then review new evidence on four dimensions of coercive control: the relationship between “control” and “violence,” coercive control in same-sex couples, measuring coercive control, and children’s experience of coercive control. Coercive control is not a type of violence. Indeed, level of control predicts a range of negative outcomes heretofore associated with physical abuse, including post-separation violence and sexual assault; important differences in coercive control dynamics distinguish male homosexual from lesbian couples; measuring coercive control requires innovative ways of aggregating and categorizing data; and how children experience coercive control is a problem area that offers enormous promise for the years ahead.

This research examined men’s use of coercive controlling tactics against female partners after separation.

This mixed-methods study is based on secondary analysis of interviews / surveys involving 346 Canadian women who experienced coercive controlling tactics used by their ex-partners (86.4% identified at least one). The researchers also interviewed another 34 women. The article found that 'abusive partners used numerous strategies to coercively control their ex-partners by stalking/harassing them, using financial abuse and discrediting the women to various authorities' after separation.

Woodyatt, Cory and Rob Stephenson, 'Emotional intimate partner violence experienced by men in same-sex relationships' (2016) 18(10) Culture, Health and Sexuality 1137-1149.

Abstract: This US study is the first to examine the types, antecedents and experiences of emotional intimate partner violence ('IPV') that occur between male partners (p 1145). The study conducted 10 focus group discussions with gay and bisexual men (n = 64 participants) (p 1140). The study found that gay and bisexual men perceive emotional IPV to be commonplace and the 'most threatening form of intimate partner violence' (p 1144-6). The participants identified the most common antecedents to be jealousy, power differentials, and internalised homophobia (p 1143). The descriptions of emotional IPV in male-male relationships is similar to male-female relationships, but some coercive behaviours manifest differently (p 1145). For example, threatening to disclose a partner's sexual identity was identified as an example of emotional violence and coercive control (p 1145).

Coercive control - Cases

Behn & Ziomek* [2019] FamCA 298 (10 May 2019) – Family Court of Australia

McClelland DCJ recognized that the father was using repeated litigation in a way that amounted to coercive and controlling conduct:

[245] Additionally, I find that the manner in which the father has conducted himself throughout this litigation amounts to coercive and controlling conduct as against the mother. As set out above and annexed to these Reasons for Judgment, the father has brought an excessive number of interim applications, including two Contravention Applications. In that regard, during cross-examination, Ms O gave the following evidence:

> Question: … Would you suggest that, should the Court reinstate a regime whereby the father spends time with the child, that the father will continue to do such things as use the Court system to control the mother?
> Answer: That's another very common feature of perpetrators of coercive controlling family violence. Yes. Continued litigation. And that in turn has a negative impact not just on the other parties but on the children obviously because coming before – having to be interviewed by someone like me over and over again or the ICL, or whomever it is, is an incredibly stressful experience for children.

[246] It was not disputed that in the period between 19 April 2016 and 10 May 2016, at the request of the father, the Police attended the mother's home on seven occasions to conduct welfare checks on the child. I am also satisfied that the father acted in a coercive and controlling manner by requesting that the Police conduct such a number of unnecessary welfare checks on the child.

[247] I am further satisfied that the father has sought to exercise control over the mother by dictating to her the appropriate medical treatment for the child and when the child should commence school. I set out the evidence relevant to that issue below.

Garrod & Davenort* [2018] FamCA 825 (12 October 2018) – Family Court of Australia

Bennett J was critical of the Regulation 7 Family Consultant's handling of the matter:

[219] The Regulation 7 Family Consultant agreed with Ms Lewis, counsel for the mother, that the flagrant breach of orders so the father can get what he wants is consistent with him engaging in coercive controlling violence. It is particularly concerning that the father's poor behaviours were not based on a lack of control but on a prerogative of his needs and desires. That indicates to me that very significant changes in attitude and behaviour are required to be undertaken by the father.

Bennett J noted that family violence is not to be assessed on a sliding scale focused solely on physical violence:

[220] …The Regulation 7 Family Consultant did not recognise the father's conduct to Ms O or the mother as being on the higher end of family violence. His manipulative behaviours were insidious and should have been identified as such. The Regulation 7 Family Consultant has assessed family violence on a scale which was an error. Family violence is not to be assessed on a sliding scale. Every child is entitled to be kept safe from harm. Precautions must be proportionate to the harm identified. It does not follow that a cessation of time is reserved only for perpetrators of physically life threatening violence. My strong impression is that the Regulation 7 Family Consultant had regard to some physical violence perpetrated by the father towards the mother but largely gleaned over the coercive controlling violence of the father.

And later, noting the Family Violence Best Practice Principles definition of coercive controlling violence:

[223] …Coercive controlling violence is an ongoing pattern of use of threat, force, emotional abuse and other coercive means to unilaterally dominate a person and induce fear, submission and compliance in them. Its focus is on control, and does not always involve physical harm. [referring to the Family Violence Best Practice Principles, Edition 4, December 2016, Family Court of Australia, 8.] It is inconceivable that the Regulation 7 Family Consultant could have had regard to the definition of violence in which the father was engaged.

Maluka & Maluka [2009] FamCA 647 (24 July 2009) – Family Court of Australia

In this case Benjamin J made several comments about coercive control:

[396] In many ways the facts as between the parties that I have determined in this case fit most, if not all, of the indicators of coercive controlling violence. The father has used coercion, control, violence, intimidation and threats throughout the relationship, including after separation. He seeks to intimidate and control the mother with the attendant violence, abuse, isolation and aggression. From time to time he focuses this on the children. He dominates and controls the children, particularly X, but his behaviour with regard to Y and her reaction to his verbal abuse of her in June 2008 is indicative of his continuing coercive controlling violence.

[397] The father exercised economic power to control and manipulate the mother and effectively the children. He endeavoured to isolate the mother and in effect continues to do so. In that process he denies or minimises his involvement and culpability.

[399] The effect of that long term violence, control and manipulation imposed by the father on the mother has from time to time undermined the mother's parental authority and undermined her parenting role…

Carter and Wilson* [2023] FedCFamC1A 9 (10 February 2023) – Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Division 1)

Per: Bennett J

74. "Coercive control" is a technical phrase in social science literature. It is a concatenation of coercive behaviour and controlling behaviour and is a subcategory of one or both types of behaviour. Whilst the term "coercive control" has been attributed a legal definition in legislation in some jurisdictions, s 4AB of the Act does not do so. Accordingly, it would be an error to describe the behaviour defined in s 4AB as merely "coercive controlling behaviour" or "coercive and controlling behaviour" because to do so could exclude behaviour which is controlling but not coercive or coercive but not controlling, as well as behaviour which cannot be said to constitute a course of conduct. This would limit the ambit of s 4AB in a manner not intended.

75. If the legislature intended to provide a definition of "coercive control", it would have done so. The very wide definition in s 4AB(1) coupled with the non-exhaustive list in s 4AB(2) conveys an intention of width. Therefore, when s 4AB is interpreted and its application to a particular set of facts considered, there needs to be a consideration of whether the application of the definition meets the purpose of the statute.

80. Before leaving this general discussion about the interpretation of s 4AB, I observe that a finding of family violence for the purpose of s 4AB does not require the Court to be satisfied that the perpetrator intended to perpetrate family violence as defined in s 4AB …

Wylder v Wylder* [2022] FedCFamC2F 1366 (9 November 2022) – Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Division 2)

Although the father claimed to be the victim of physical violence from the mother, what concerned Judge Vasta was the father's coercive control of the mother:

81. However, it is not the spectre of physical violence that concerns this Court; rather, it is the spectre of coercive control. Whilst it had been documented that the parents had separated on occasions, the mother said that the father spoke to her in such a way that she felt compelled to return to the relationship. The father denies any such conduct.

82. What has been of concern is the documented history of the litigation. It is incongruous that the mother would make the complaints that she made during the previous filing in this Court (BRC 11666/2019); have a Court make an order that mandated supervised visits between the father and the child; and, then choose to ignore that and, instead, come to a compromise solution with the father that gave him unsupervised equal time with the child.

83. There seems to be no other rational explanation for this other than the father implementing coercive control over the mother to the extent that she felt that she had no other choice but to comply with the father's demands. The judicious use of covertly recorded conversations with one parent by the other parent and then referring to selective excerpts is a feature that is often found in cases of coercive control.

84. In this case, the father did give to the Court such selective recordings. The father pointed to one particular recording where the mother made an "admission" that the father was the favoured parent by the child. In another recording, the mother "admitted" that the father treated her like a queen. In another recording, the mother is said to convey that she arranged custody arrangements for her financial benefit. In a further recording, the mother has "conceded" that she was "not going back to court again". And in a final recording, the mother "admitted" that the father would never hurt his daughter.

85. These recordings were used by the father to intimidate the mother into not pursuing any parenting matter because these recordings would be used against her, as if they were repudiations of her stance. Of course, they have little evidentiary value as they are excerpts from a larger conversation upon which the Court has no information, and therefore, no context.

86. The behaviour in making constant notifications to the Department of Child Safety can also be seen as a manifestation of the coercive control. Further, posting the videos to social media can also be seen as a manifestation of coercive control. One such video records a “Tik Tok” dance that the mother had uploaded to social media. The father recorded himself watching the video where the father made derogatory comments suggesting that the manner of solo dancing in the video was not befitting that of a woman who had a boyfriend, let alone a woman who was a mother.

87. ….

88. The father will attempt to draw the child into his world; a world where the mother is evil and cannot be trusted and a world where institutions such as the police and the Courts are malevolent and must be resisted. This was perfectly illustrated by the manner in which the father dealt with the child when making the videos. He ignored what the child was saying and imposed his own version of the facts and would not brook any variation to that. The child will never be truly free under the care of the father and she will not have the opportunity to grow and experience life because she will be made to conform to his world view.

89. And this is just part of the danger that the father represents. The evidence that the father planned to do harm to his treating psychiatrist because that psychiatrist would not support his application for a pension is concerning enough. But when this is added to the father’s manipulation of the mother to avoid having to endure supervised visits with the child, the reaction of the father to police attempting to serve him with the police protection order, the obsessive determination with which he wished to expose a “rapist” at the school, his Facebook comments to a Member of Parliament as to his capacity for violence and the nonchalance with which he violated a Court order and injunction about posting on social media, the jeopardy at which he places X cannot be overstated.

90. There are absolutely no safeguards that the Court could put in place that would allow the father to have any form of contact with X and yet keep the child safe.

91. It is never an easy task for a Court to make orders that prohibit contact between a parent and child, however there are those rare cases where such an order is the only order that can be made in the best interests of the child. This is one of those cases.

Heilig & Cabiness* [2011] FMCAfam 97 (2 March 2011) – Federal Magistrates’ Court of Australia

Altobelli FM recognised the coercive and controlling behaviour of the father:

[10] He has a long history of law breaking, and there is very little evidence of conscience in his functioning. His controlling abusive behaviour towards young partners I find flabbergasting. The description of his severely burning Ms Cabiness' arm when he considered the coffee she had made for him was ‘crap’ is appalling. The description of his behaviour is almost of treating them as slaves, while enjoying humiliating them.

In paragraph [30], Altobelli FM favourably refers to research quoted in the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal on the Crown manifest inadequacy appeal in relation to the father’s sentencing for violent offending against the mother and other former domestic partners, cited as R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) at [77]:

An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, “Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence”, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pages 6-7.

Mossop J observed:

[25] The sexual intercourse without consent is constituted by the digital penetration of the complainant’s vagina. This is a case in which the sexual intercourse can properly be described as an act of sexual violence. There is nothing which suggests that the act was performed for the purposes of sexual gratification. Rather, it was an assault designed to degrade the victim and formed part of a pattern of demeaning and controlling behaviour on the part of the offender. That demeaning and controlling behaviour is an important part of the context in which the offence occurred.

R v NX (No 2) [2019] ACTSC 131 (24 May 2019) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

In considering the objective seriousness of the offence, Mossop J observed:

[31] The offending in the present case includes very serious offending occurring in a context having features of domestic violence. Those include that the offending was directed to maintaining control over the victim by destroying her property and means of transport and blaming her for the offender's unlawful conduct. The victim was more vulnerable by reason of her need to care for and protect her young child. Her young child was present during some of the offences.

R v Brown [2015] ACTSC 65 (5 March 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Burns J accepted the opinions and statements he quoted from clinical psychologist, Dr Michael Barry's report.

[4] … Dr Barry said:

At the time of the offence, Miss Brown had been in an emotionally and physically abusive relationship for over two years. She described a gradual deterioration in her mental health, reporting low self-worth and feeling overwhelmed, feeling that she did not "fit in anywhere" and she described a "sense of loss in the world". She reported that despite Mr Ruspandini's treatment of her, she felt that he was the only one who she could rely on. Domestic violence and emotional abuse are behaviours used by one person in a relationship to control the other. Research into the cycle of domestic violence suggests that it is common for victims of domestic violence to blame themselves for the abuse and to experience major disruption in their self and world view. Domestic abuse can have a serious impact on the way a person thinks and interacts with the world around them. The chronic exposure to violence, or the threat of violence, and the stress and fear resulting from this exposure, can cause not only immediate physical injury, but also mental shifts that occur as the mind attempts to process trauma or protect the body.

Domestic violence affects a person's thoughts, feeling and behaviours, and can significantly impact on mental stability. While the effects of physical abuse are obvious, the effects of emotional abuse are easier to hide and harder to repair. It is common for victims of emotional abuse to blame themselves and minimise their abuse, particularly when they are repeatedly told that it is their fault that their partner becomes angry or aggressive.

[5] I accept the opinions and statements which I have just quoted from Dr Barry's report.

Roberts v Smorhun* [2013] ACTSC 218 (1 November 2013) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J referred to dicta of the Alberta Court of Appeal in R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) that:

[81] When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterized as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape.

Refshauge J noted that this statement had been cited with approval by the Court of Criminal Appeal of the Supreme Court of Tasmania in Parker v R [1994] TASSC 94 (21 July 1994) and in the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal in R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006). [82]

Purcell v O'Reilly* [2018] ACTSC 60 (9 March 2018) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Penfold J observed:

[48] … the incident giving rise to Mr Purcell's conviction, and its source in Mr Purcell's determination to examine the victim's mobile phone, seem to reflect both an attempt to exercise power or control over his former wife and a belief that this was justified. For this reason, the incident as a whole may legitimately be treated as more serious than it would have been if the TV had been destroyed in anger or frustration generated by some event unrelated to conflict between Mr Purcell and his former wife.

Love v Kumar [2018] ACTMC 23 (31 October 2018) – Australian Capital Territory Magistrates’ Court

In finding the accused assaulted his wife Special Magistrate Hunter OAM observed:

[207] Taken together the evidence if accepted of giving information to officials at Immigration, the refusal to recant that information, the bruise to the head which is consistent with the allegation on 18th and the general information such as not allowing Ms Devi to have a phone, not allow her to contact her brother and the like which could lead to a conclusion that the defendant was controlling her life, (which is not unknown in domestic violence situations). It also leads to a conclusion that Ms Devi is speaking the truth and should be believed.

And:

[209] I am also satisfied that she had been controlled at least to some extent. That is supported by uncontroverted evidence that she had to secret a SIM card so that she could contact her family and brother by phone. This is consistent with the evidence from her brother that she had no access to contact him except by public phone until he gave her the SIM card. I am also satisfied she had limited access to friends and family. That evidence was corroborated by her brother and by the fact she used the SIM card he gave her to make the various phone calls she made to family and friends. I also note the Defendant had alluded to that control in some of his answers in the ROI such as those referred to by Prosecution counsel in her submissions.

Yaman v R* [2020] NSWCCA 239 (25 September 2020) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

[135] The right of all women to determine their own path in life must be protected and upheld by the courts. Where a woman's right is ignored or disregarded by an offender, that right must be vindicated, including by punitive and strongly deterrent sentences where necessary.

[136] The applicant had failed to accept that his former partner had chosen a life that did not include him and, by the commission of a violent crime against her, he sought to force her to resume a relationship with him. His act had to be denounced; stern punishment had to be imposed, and the applicant and others deterred from future conduct of that nature.

Le v R* [2020] NSWCCA 238 (23 September 2020) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Adamson J observed:

[215]: Thus, it was, for example, for the jury to determine whether the applicant's conduct in proposing dinner with the complainant's family on the evening of Sunday 15 October 2017 was inconsistent with that of a man who had just assaulted the complainant and caused her serious injury which, to his knowledge, had resulted in at least a substantial bruise on her hip and in her having difficulty walking. One might postulate, as Mr Dhanji did in argument, that it would be odd for a man who had assaulted his partner to want to expose her to the gaze of her family soon after the event when the effects of the injury would still have been obvious. On the other hand, a jury might regard it as consistent with their plainly abusive relationship that the applicant would oscillate between drug-fuelled violence and affectionate, inclusive gestures to perpetuate the complainant's emotional dependency on him and her compliance with the dictates of their relationship. The jury might have regarded the applicant's conduct in expressing concern about the complainant's welfare, including her consumption of alcohol, as a smoke screen to assuage her family's concerns.

[223]: None of the matters referred to above is, as Mr Dhanji would have it, a matter of "making excuses" for the complainant's inconsistencies. The jury could have formed the view that the complainant was prepared to endure an injury inflicted by the applicant if it was one from which she could recover because she had come to love and depend on him, both financially and emotionally, and believed that he loved her. The jury might have considered that once the complainant appreciated, as she did at the end of October 2017, that he had fractured her hip and that she would have to undergo a serious operation, she realised that he had not been acting in her interests and had permanently harmed her. It was open to the jury to infer that, from that time on, she stopped making excuses for him, as she had done up until that point, both when confiding in her aunt and in telling the police on the first occasion in October 2017 before she knew of the diagnosis. The jury might have considered that this was what led the complainant to participate in a recorded interview in November 2017, having been so reluctant to go on the record or identify the applicant when she was taken to the police station on 24 October 2017 following her call to Triple-0. The jury could have formed the view that the complainant was prepared to endure an injury inflicted by the applicant if it was one from which she could recover because she had come to love and depend on him, both financially and emotionally, and believed that he loved her. The jury might have considered that once the complainant appreciated, as she did at the end of October 2017, that he had fractured her hip and that she would have to undergo a serious operation, she realised that he had not been acting in her interests and had permanently harmed her.

[225] The complainant's conduct towards the applicant involved the inevitable conflict inherent in an abusive relationship: notwithstanding that he hurt her, she loved him and did not want to lose him. It may be that when she called police on 24 October 2017, she did so to assist her in her dual aims of keeping the relationship with the applicant on foot and yet stopping him from assaulting her. Her descriptions to her aunt and to the police of how she sustained the injury to her hip were broadly consistent. I do not consider it to be of any particular significance whether she reported a single kick or more. It is understandable that the jury might have considered that the diagnosis caused her to rethink the relationship and stop making excuses for the applicant.

R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J commented:

[77] An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence", Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pp 6–7'.

And:

[403] I am satisfied that the father represents a real danger to the mother and the children of continuing his coercive controlling violence and that the mother ought to have the ability to bring up these children free of that behaviour and its consequential fear and the children ought to be able to escape the direct and indirect consequences of that behaviour and the actuality of that behaviour by the father.

R v Argyle (a pseudonym) [2021] NSWDC 267 (18 June 2021) – New South Wales District Court

Whitford SC DCJ observed:

[50] On [the victim] Ms Argyle's meeting with and experience of [the accused] Steadman, and his influence over her, [the clinical psychologist] Ms Pratley observed:

…(her) anxiety and posttraumatic symptomatology meant that she believed she had no choice but to participate in the abuse by Steadman, or face physical or sexual harm herself, which she believed put her unborn child at risk. Ms Argyle's trauma history and low self-esteem contribute to her lack of agency…and… impaired problem-solving capacity… (which would be intensified with low cognitive capacity).

…(her) account indicates that she was subject to a pattern of ongoing intimidation by Steadman, which constituted coercive control…

[69] [A factor that diminishes Ms Argyle's culpability is] her experience of the coercive controlling behaviour of Steadman and the attendant duress and fear that he would harm her unborn child and/or herself. Duress in relation to her fear for her unborn child was clearly raised with police in her interview and there is a foundation, in a combination of the agreed facts and the expert reports, for a reasonable conclusion that she was operating under a form of duress. In the whole of the circumstances, Ms Argyle was under the coercive control of Steadman and was unable to think through the consequences either of her actions or of her failure to respond differently to, and to report, what had happened to her sister.

R v Aumash [2020] NSWDC 168 (1 May 2020) – New South Wales District Court

Haesler SC DCJ observed:

[33]-[34] In earlier messages Aumash had sought to control, threaten, and demean Ms White. His intention this day was clear. It was part of a pattern of behaviour. He also sought to cajole her into dropping the charges and excusing his criminal actions toward her. I can infer from those facts that the messages were similar in content to those sent on other days. That conclusion can be drawn beyond reasonable doubt.

The extent of his harassment and the motivation for his actions this day make this a particularly serious example of offences of this type. It requires a custodial sentence: s17 Crimes Act 1914 (Cth).

R v Bohun [2019] NSWDC 807 (25 October 2019) – New South Wales District Court

[33] That Ms Smit and the offender had been in a domestic relationship does not in any way mitigate the offending behaviour. It appears that Ms Smit was personally targeted. Given the breach matters, it does here show that there is pattern of physical and mental violence towards Ms Smit, requiring denunciation.

[34] Here, there could be no clearer example of the exercise of coercive power and control. It may be that at the time, Bohun thought what he did was justified. There could be no justification for such violence. Such behaviour poses a continued threat to victims. They never truly feel safe. Denunciation and appropriate punishment is required. In such matters, the way we do it is by locking someone up: R v Dunn (2004) 144 A Crim R 180.

[35] Gaol, however, puts this offender in cells with other men who are capable of or have demonstrated misogynist violence against their partners. Gaol breaks prosocial bonds. Gaol encourages links with other criminals. Gaols are intrinsically violent environments, and unfortunately can have a crime producing effect rather than discouraging violent crime. Nevertheless, the vulnerable position of Ms Smit must be considered and her dignity vindicated.

Emitja v The Queen* [2016] NTCCA 4 (21 October 2016) – Northern Territory Court of Criminal Appeal

Grant CJ and Kelly J noted the sentencing judge's remarks in relation to the course of conduct in which the appellant engaged with approval:

[28]: It is clear that the appellant had in the years prior to the present offending subjected the victim to a course of repeated violence in the domestic context which left the victim in a state of perpetual fear for her person. This is reflected in the Victim Impact Statement dated 5 March 2014, in which the victim stated:

> I get really stressed out by [the appellant]. I get scared when I see him cause I know each time he's going to hurt me. He goes and tells his family I'm to blame for him going to prison and then they come and threaten me. That DVO doesn't work. It doesn't stop him from coming near me and hurting me. The only time I feel safe is when [the appellant] is in prison.

[29]: It was this course of conduct to which the sentencing judge was referring when he observed:

> The offending is once again a very serious incident of domestic violence committed by the offender. The offender's moral culpability for this offending is very high. The offender engages in domestic violence in order to control the victim and to express his displeasure when she does not behave in a manner that he expects her to behave. The offence was committed while [the offender was] subject to [a] DVO once again. The victim was seriously injured.

Grant CJ and Kelly J held the offender's pattern of coercive controlling behaviour rendered spontaneity less relevant to the assessment of the objective seriousness of the offence:

[52] We do not accept the submission made on behalf of the appellant that the objective seriousness of the offence was lower because it was not premeditated. First, the absence of a factor which would elevate the seriousness of the offending is not a matter of mitigation. Secondly, as the respondent submitted, the offending was the epitome of a particularly pernicious form of domestic violence in which a violent and controlling male seeks to exercise dominion over a female victim; a type of offending in which each episode is spontaneous but part of a pattern which renders spontaneity less relevant to the assessment of the objective seriousness of the offence than it might be in relation to other types of offence. The appellant's history of relevant offending has already been detailed. It shows that the offending the subject of this appeal was simply the latest incident in a deliberate and violent pattern of behaviour engaged in by the appellant for the purposes of intimidating and controlling the victim. The circumstances of the offence under consideration involved direct defiance of the domestic violence order then in place, as have the circumstances of many of the other incidents which form part of the appellant's pattern of behaviour. The instant offence was in no way "an uncharacteristic aberration".

The Queen v Haji-Noor [2007] NTCCA 7 (18 May 2007) – Northern Territory Court of Criminal Appeal

Angel J highlighted the sentencing judge's comments that only the offender is to blame for his behaviour:

[31] …It is not uncommon for men in your position to harbour a belief that their former partner had been unreasonable. Nor is it uncommon for violent men in your position to harbour a belief that the former partner has brought the violence on themselves by being unreasonable. You and others like you must learn that only you are to blame for the situation in which you now find yourself. The female victim is not the true cause of your violent behaviour over the years or in February 2006. You and others who are tempted to behave like you must understand that they are not entitled to use physical violence and, if they do, they will go to gaol.

As to the male victim, it is not uncommon for men in your position to become angry and violent towards the new friend or partner. Those people are also vulnerable to attacks by men like you. It is not a case of saying they are men and can look after themselves. As your violence and the consequences well demonstrate, such men are vulnerable to violent attacks by men in your position and they too are entitled to the full protection of the law. Men in your position must understand that if they attack new friends or partners they will go to gaol. For this reason also, general deterrence is particularly significant.

Southwood J noted:

[185] The crime committed by the respondent was nonetheless a serious crime. It was part of a pattern of fundamentally oppressive and coercive behaviour in which the respondent deliberately engaged to dominate and control Ms Hawksworth.

The Queen v Kerridge [2021] NTSC (sentencing) (1 November 2021) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

Mildren AJ recognised the offender's controlling behaviour in sentencing:

(p7) I have not dealt in detail with all of the assaults and bad behaviour you had exhibited towards the complainant over the whole period of the relationship. Suffice it to say that during the relationship, you were extremely controlling and demanding.

She not only had fulltime employment, but she had to run the finances of your business which ran at a loss, obtain extra money by repairing bicycles and second-hand white goods and furniture, feed you and the children and attend to the children's schooling, ensure that your alcohol was ready for you when you came home after work and to generally act as your personal servant.

You demanded that she send photos of her breasts to you on numerous occasions, as is evidenced by the text messages. You blame her for the fact that there was not enough money to meet all of the expenses, while at the same time, you indulge yourself in your hobby of repairing cars and other vehicles which you ordered both from Queensland and in Alice Springs.

When money was tight, you became angry and violent towards her, regardless of whether this was her fault or not. The level of violence, punishment and degradation that you dealt her was extreme. The words "domestic violence" are inadequate to properly describe the torment that you caused her to suffer. Your behaviour was callous, controlling and sadistic

The Queen v Lynch [2021] NTSC SCC22033629 (4 October 2021) (Sentence) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

Grant CJ recognised the offender's coercive and controlling behaviours in sentencing:

[2] You entered into a relationship with the victim in 2018. She had a young daughter at that time. She then fell pregnant with your child, after which time you started to become more possessive and controlling of her. You would not let her visit friends and relatives, and you were verbally abusive to her, particularly in relation to her mothering skills. However, you had never hit her during the course of the relationship prior to the events in question in this case….She left the house where she was staying with you and returned with police so that she could pick up her infant son. That was because she was too scared to do so by herself. She then returned to Tennant Creek, but you continued to contact her and her family, demanding that she return to Alice Springs.

[3] You told your ex-wife that your purpose in going to Tennant Creek was that you were concerned about the welfare of your infant son. I think the objective reality is that you knew that the victim had resumed seeing her former partner, and that you were both jealous of that relationship and resentful that the former partner was having any part to play in your son's life.

[7] However, I do accept that alcohol was not a contributing factor in this offending. I am not sure whether that works in your favour or not. It seems to suggest that you are unable to resist your possessive and controlling urges even when you are sober…..The reason for that [the offender not showing any remorse], Mr Lynch, I suspect, is that you considered and you still consider that you were in the right, because you felt that the victim – your former partner – was not looking after your son in a manner which you considered to be suitable; and because you consider that you are entitled to impose your will in that respect on your domestic partners. That is reflected, as I say, in your long history of domestic violence offending.

Inquest into the Death of HD (Name Suppressed) [2021] NTLC 029 – Northern Territory Coroners Court

The following extract provides an example of the way in which the deceased's vulnerabilities were used by the partner to justify his controlling behaviour:

[70]: HD's partner was from time to time said to be manipulative and controlling. When questioned about his controlling ways he generally indicated that HD was an alcoholic and he needed to know where she was to either stop her drinking or so as to assist her when she was intoxicated. It appeared to explain his tracking her phone. Her alcoholism was provided as the reason he removed her from the house or used force to keep her there. The same might be said when he escorted her to the police station and asked that her bail be breached for drinking. Perhaps it might be seen in his insistence that he pick her up from work or when he intercepted her at the bus stop.

[71] It is difficult however to see her alcoholism as the reason for him reading her texts and having access to her social media accounts. There are instances where he attempted to warn off a person he thought she was having an affair with using her own Messenger account. It also doesn't explain the constant messaging and telephone calls when she was with her father in Queensland. It appears they were more to do with his belief that she may be talking to another male.

MNT v MEE* [2020] QDC 126 (20 May 2020) – Queensland District Court

Byrne QC DCJ accepted that the first instance decision was based on "more than merely a finding of a singular act of domestic violence, being economic abuse constituted by the one act of the unilateral forgiveness of the debt." [73], holding that domestic violence was proved by evidence of the appellant's controlling behaviours:

[75] Although I am not satisfied that the incident involving the unilateral forgiveness of the debt owed by the appellant's son amounts to economic abuse as defined, I do consider that it comprises an aspect of overall controlling behaviour or emotional or psychological abuse, in the relevant senses. It is, in my view, not sensible in light of the timing and sequence of events to reach any other conclusion. The forgiveness of the debt the month before the appellant spoke to solicitors about family law proceedings suggests on the face of it that it was deliberate attempt to remove the asset (i.e. the debt owing) from the property pool which would inevitably be the subject of focus in the family law proceedings. That neither the appellant nor his son could satisfactorily explain how and why that occurred supports that view.

[77] I am satisfied, as was the Magistrate, that the evidence concerning the manner in which the respondent's property was dealt with amounts to controlling behaviour in the overall context of the relationship, and that contributed to the respondent's fear for her own wellbeing and safety. In addition to the express findings of the Magistrate, I also include the removal of the go-cart and placing it in the weather, the respondent being told what chairs she could sit on and the moving of her clothing and other property from the residence to variously the garage and into the weather in this class of evidence…

[79] I am satisfied, as was the Magistrate, that the incident involving the appellant getting into the bed already occupied by the respondent, at a time after they had commenced living apart on the one property, forms part of that controlling behaviour as described.

[81] I too am satisfied, as was the Magistrate, that the condition of the house and the lack of approvals for work done was another aspect of the appellant's controlling behaviour towards the respondent.

[83] …I am satisfied that the admitted failure by the appellant to attend in any meaningful way to the rectification in the roughly two months between the council notice and the hearing (i.e. more than the 20 business days allowed by the Council notice) is both domestic violence in that it is controlling behaviour which limited the lawful use of the premises and potentially affected the asset base for the intended family law proceedings, and evidences the nature of the previous relationship involving controlling behaviour by the appellant towards the respondent.

CPS v CNJ* [2014] QDC 47 (21 March 2014) – Queensland District Court

Dearden DCJ observed:

[18] I am not persuaded (contrary to the submissions made on behalf of the appellant) that the learned magistrate erred in concluding that "continuous contact and comments" made by the appellant were capable of constituting domestic violence.

[19] The definition of "domestic violence" includes behaviour that is "emotionally or psychologically abusive" [Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act ["DFVPA"] s 8(1)(b)] and/or "is threatening" [DFVPA s 8(1)(d)] and/or "coercive" [DFVPA s 8(1)(e)] or "in any other way controls or dominates the second person and causes the second person to fear for the second person's safety or wellbeing of that of someone else". [DFVPA s 8(1)(f)] It was open to the learned magistrate to conclude, on the basis of the respondent's sworn affidavit … and cross examination, … that the appellant's conduct, verbal and by text, fell within one or more of the categories in DFVPA s 8(1).

[20] I am therefore not persuaded that the learned magistrate fell into error in concluding that the appellant's conduct subsequent to the end of the relationship was harassment which amounted to "domestic violence".

MAA v SAG* [2013] QDC 31 (28 February 2013) – Queensland District Court

McGinness DCJ was satisfied at [44]:

[44] …The appellant's numerous complaints about the aggrieved to government bodies alleging child abuse and mistreatment were unjustified and an abuse of process as were his complaints to organizations about the aggrieved's doctor and lawyer. The appellant did not dispute that he lodged most of these complaints. I consider that one of the purposes of lodging these complainants was to harass and intimidate the aggrieved. I accept the aggrieved's evidence that she felt intimidated and harassed when she became aware of the complaints;

The aggrieved and her daughters were also subjected to repeated investigations due to the appellant's complaints. For example, she and her children were interviewed by police on a number of occasions. None of the complaints were substantiated. This is further evidence of harassment suffered by the aggrieved and her three daughters at the hands of the appellant.

SHW v ABC* [2021] QDC 151 (13 August 2021) – Queensland District Court

In finding the learned Magistrate erred in refusing to grant a restraining order against the respondent because it was not necessary or desirable to protect the appellant from future domestic violence Richards DCJ found:
