	Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) Chapter 4, Part 4.1, Div 4.	Protections are provided for a 'vulnerable witness' - an adult who is the protected person named in a Domestic Violence Order; or a child, an adult witness who suffers from an intellectual disability, who is the alleged victim of a sexual offence to which the proceedings relate or whom a court considers to be vulnerable. Applies to application, variation, revocation or confirmation proceedings related to domestic violence order.
	Sexual Offences (Evidence and Procedure) Act 1983 (NT) Part 2, s5	Complainant (re: sexual offence) cannot be directly cross-examined by the defendant without leave of the court.
Qld	Evidence Act 1977 (QLD) Part 2, Divs 4, 4A, 6	Protections are provided for a 'special witness' - includes a child under 16 years; or a person who, in the court's opinion would, as a result of a mental, intellectual or physical impairment or a relevant matter, be likely to be disadvantaged as a witness, or would be likely to suffer severe emotional trauma or would be likely to be so intimidated as to be disadvantaged whilst giving evidence. Protections are provided for 'affected children' – a child who is a witness in a relevant proceeding and who is not a defendant in the proceeding. Protections are provided for 'protected witness' – include a witness under 16 years, a witness who is a person with an impairment of the mind, for a proceeding for a prescribed special offence, an alleged victim of the offence, and for a proceeding for a prescribed offence, an alleged victim of the offence who the court considers would be likely to be disadvantaged as a witness, or to suffer severe emotional trauma, unless treated as a protected witness. Accused cannot directly cross-examine protected witness.
	Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) Part 5, Div 2, ss150, 151	For proceedings under this Act protections for the aggrieved, child or relative or associate of the aggrieved who is named in the application that relates to the proceeding. (Includes protection from cross-examination by unrepresented respondent in certain cases).
SA	Evidence Act 1929 (SA) Part 2.	Protections are provided for a 'vulnerable witness'- includes a witness who is under 16 years of age, a person who suffers from a cognitive disability (including mental illness), a complainant in a sexual or serious offence, a complainant who, in the opinion of the court, would be specially disadvantaged if not treated as a vulnerable witness, a witness who has been subjected to threats of violence or retribution or has reasonable grounds to fear violence or retribution or any other case where the court deems the witness to be specially disadvantaged.

	Criminal Law (Legal Representation) Act 2001 (SA) Part 2, s6	If unrepresented defendant applies for legal assistance for purpose of cross-examination of a witness, the commission must grant it.
TAS	Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001 (Tas) Parts 3 and 4, ss8, 8A	Protections are provided for a 'special witness' - a person unable to give evidence satisfactorily because of their intellectual, mental or physical disability or a person who is likely to suffer severe emotional trauma or be so intimated or distressed as to be unable to give evidence or give evidence satisfactorily. Note: an 'affected child' is defined as a victim of a sexual offence or a witness in family violence proceedings. Applies to criminal and family violence order proceedings.
	Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) Chapter 2, Divs 3 and 5	The court has control over the questioning of witnesses and can make orders about the way evidence is given; can disallow questions etc.
Vic	Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) Part 4.7, s133; Part 8.2	There are special rules applicable to sexual offences and the giving of evidence in committal hearings. Protections are provided for a 'protected witness' – includes a witness in a sexual offence or family violence proceeding.
	Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) Part 4, ss69-73	The Court may direct alternative arrangements be made in respect of a family violence intervention order or a litigation restraint order proceeding. Protections provided for 'protected witnesses' (including affected family members, protected person, a child, people with a cognitive impairment or otherwise in need of protection) in relation to direct cross-examination. Section 73 identifies that the court may admit evidence from an expert witness about the dynamics and characteristics of family violence.
	Evidence Act 2008 (Vic) Part 2.1, ss26-36, ss40-46	The court has control over the questioning of witnesses and can make orders about the way evidence is given; can disallow questions etc.
WA	Evidence Act 1906 (WA) ss25A, ss37-39F, 106E-106G, 106R, 106RA	Protections are provided for a 'special witness' - a person who the court is satisfied would, by reason of a physical or mental impairment, be unlikely to be able to give evidence or to give evidence satisfactorily; or be likely to suffer severe emotional trauma or to be so intimidated or distressed as to be unable to give evidence satisfactorily; or a complainant to a 'serious sexual offence'. Includes protection of alleged victim from direct cross-examination by the offender in certain circumstances. Sections 38-39F identifies that the court may admit evidence from an expert witness about the nature and effects of family violence.

Sentencing

Sentencing laws vary between states and territories (see Table 1 below).

Where an offence is committed in the context of domestic and family violence and the offence breaches an existing protection order, this is usually considered an aggravating feature for sentencing purposes (it is not a mitigating factor) (see Table 2 below).

In all Australian jurisdictions it is possible for judicial officers to recognise the dynamics of family violence when sentencing offenders who have committed offences in the context of domestic and family violence.

Sentencing provides an important opportunity for judicial officers to clearly denounce domestic and family violence, to emphasise the accountability of the offender and to recognise the harm done to the victim [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

It is important to consider community safety and protection in sentencing for offences that take place in the context of domestic and family violence. The safety of the victim may be a relevant consideration in the selection of an appropriate penalty.

Rehabilitation of the offender may be an appropriate aim in sentencing some offenders who have committed offences in the context of domestic and family violence. In such cases there may be benefits in utilising sentencing approaches that require the perpetrator to attend a perpetrator intervention program.

Courts have recognised that the need to deter future domestic and family violence is an important aim of sentencing for offences committed in the context of domestic and family violence.

Table 1: Approaches to sentencing where offences committed in the context domestic and family violence.

Generally	The Queen v Kilic (2016) 259 CLR 256 at [21] Munda v Western Australia (2013) 249 CLR 600 at [54]–[55]
Australian Capital Territory	Section 34B Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT). See for example: R v Wyper [2017] ACTCA 59

New South Wales	ss 4A, 4B, see also 21A(2)(d) Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW) Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (2021) [NSW Sentencing Bench Book 2021] Thorp v R [2022] NSWCCA 180 (31 August 2022) Diaz v The Queen [2018] NSWCCA 33 (14 March 2018)
Northern Territory	See for example: Emitja v The Queen [2016] NTCCA 4
Queensland	ss 9(10A) and 12A Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021) [DFV Protection Act 2012 Bench Book 2021], See for examples: R v Major; ex parte Attorney-General (Qld) [2011] QCA 210 (30 August 2011) R v Fairbrother; ex parte A-G (Qld) [2005] QCA 105
South Australia	Sentencing Act 2017 (SA) See for example: Warne v The Queen [2020] SASCFC 124 (21 December 2020)
Tasmania	See for example Director of Public Prosecutions v Karklins [2018] TASCCA 6 (20 April 2018) See also: ss 13 and 13A Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas)
Victoria	Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Sentencing Manual (2022) [Vic Sentencing Manual 2022] Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014) especially 4.2 [Vic FV Bench Book 2014] ss124E and 124F Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) regarding sentencing serial family violence offenders. See Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence offences & Serial Family Violence Offenders, 2021
Western Australia	Department of Attorney General (WA), Equality Before the Law: Bench Book (2021) [WA Equal Justice Bench Book 2021] See for example: Bropho v Hall [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015)

See also 9.3.1 Sentencing Considerations- Breaches of protection Orders:

Table 1: Jurisdictional approaches to sentencing breaches of protection orders.

Sentencing - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. Chapter 12 discussed penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders. The report notes that: 'The overwhelming majority of stakeholders that addressed this issue were in favour of sanctions that could help to change the behaviour of those who commit violence. Therefore, there was support for 'perpetrator programs' such as violence and drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs; probation with special conditions, such as attending 'perpetrators' courses or counselling'; men's behaviour programs; psychiatric assessment and treatment; anger management programs; and educational programs on family violence with 'therapeutic interventions'' (at [12.172].) Other options raised (as an alternative to imprisonment) included community service orders (provided the work associated with the penalty is 'meaningful, constructive and rehabilitative') (at [12.173])

The underlying issue in Chapters 13 and 14 is the way in which the criminal law accounts for the nature and dynamics of family violence. Criminal laws are traditionally perceived as 'incident-based', in that they are focused upon discrete acts forming the basis of individual offences. As identified in Chapter 5, family violence is characterised by patterns of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour and may include both physical and non-physical violence [13.2].

Hidderley, Laura, Samuel Jeffs and Lauren Banning, The impact of domestic violence as an aggravating factor on sentencing outcomes: Research brief No. 1, May 2021, Queensland Sentencing Advisory Council.

This research brief explores whether there is a difference in sentencing outcomes for cases involving charges of common assault or assault occasioning bodily harm (AOBH) sentenced as domestic violence offences compared to non-domestic violence offences in Queensland. It concludes that "courts are treating domestic violence offences as more serious offending, warranting the greater use of custodial penalties and longer custodial sentences. This suggests that the sentencing reforms introduced in 2016 may be having their desired impact on sentencing outcomes. However, further research is needed to determine if this is due to the introduction of the new aggravating factor under section 9(10A) of the PSA, or reflects court sentencing practices prior to the introduction of these reforms when the separate identification and recording of offences as domestic violence offences for reporting purposes was not possible."

Sentencing Advisory Council (Tas), Sentencing of Adult Family Violence Offenders: Final report No.5 (2015).

This Report provides advice on the sentencing of adult family violence offenders in Tasmania and includes consideration of the range and adequacy of sentencing options and support programs available and the role of specialist family violence lists or courts in dealing with family violence matters. Included in the terms of reference: (2) Sentencing practices in relation to family violence offences across Tasmania; (3) Sentencing standards for family violence offences in comparison to similar offences outside the family violence context; (4) the range and adequacy of sentencing options and support programs available to the courts when sentencing family violence matters

3.2 SENTENCING PRINCIPLES AND SENTENCING ORDERS

On a finding or plea of guilt the sentencing officer's task is informed by the aims and purposes of sentencing. In Tasmania, these aims (replicating recognised common law objectives) are set out in s 3 of the Sentencing Act 1997and include punishment, deterrence, prevention, denunciation and rehabilitation. The decision on sentence is also shaped by a number of other general common law sentencing principles including the central principle of proportionality, which requires that the punishment imposed be commensurate with the blameworthiness of the offender.

When sentencing for a family violence offence an additional consideration is the fact that the legislation suggests that family violence offences need to be regarded seriously and that victim safety may be a more significant factor in the sentencing exercise. The objects clause of the FVA states that the 'safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence are the paramount considerations.'

4.1 COMPARATIVE SENTENCING STANDARDS

This section of the Report examines sentencing standards by comparing sentences imposed where an offence is committed in the context of family violence with those imposed for the same offence committed in a non-family violence context. The most common of these (and the only one for which sufficient data exists to enable a meaningful comparison) is the offence of assault contrary to the Police Offences Act, 1935.

5.2 DOMESTIC PROGRAMS

All Australian States and Territories have rehabilitation programs as part of their response to family violence but not all have made legislative provision for referral to such programs. Some of the key differences in the programs are: when a treatment order may be made; whether a counselling order is mandatory, voluntary, or made in connection with sentencing; the type of treatment available; and the effect of a counselling order.

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family violence Intervention Orders: Final Report (2009).

This is a report compiled by the Sentencing Advisory Council from Victoria on Intervention Orders in Victoria: their usage, purpose, efficacy and, most importantly, the penalties awarded for their breach. The Council compiled the report by reviewing relevant literature on family data, analysing data on sentencing and conducting new research by consulting those involved in the sentencing process (magistrates, court staff, Victoria Police, community legal centre representatives, family violence service providers, defence lawyers, workers from men's family violence programs and a family violence victims' support group). The report found:

- The sanctions imposed during sentencing for breach of a family violence order were considered by most stakeholders to be far too lenient (viii)
- Fines are inappropriate sentences for breach of intervention orders (viii) as they can punish the victim as well as the offender (ix)

'Some sentences which are intended to punish the offender may fail to achieve that purpose. For example, the most common sentencing disposition for breaching an intervention order is a fine. The purpose of a fine is generally said to be to punish the offender and act as a deterrent to future offending by the offender and others. However, the dynamics of family violence mean that fines can punish the victim(s) as much or more than the offender. Payment of the fine by the offender may affect his ability to provide financial support to the victim and her family. The offender may even coerce the victim into paying the fine.' (at [6.12]).

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing for Contravention of Family Violence Intervention Orders and Safety Notices: Second Monitoring Report (2015).

This report is a continuation of previous monitoring work, examining sentencing patterns over yearly periods from 2009 and 2015 for offences involving contravention of a family violence intervention order (FVIO) or a family violence safety notice (FVSN) made under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). In particular, this report examines sentencing for the offences of:

- contravention of an FVIO;
- contravention of an FVSN;
- contravention of an FVIO intending to cause harm or fear for safety;
- contravention of an FVSN intending to cause harm or fear for safety; and
- persistent contravention of notices and orders.

In terms of sentencing for FVIO and FVSN contravention, there was an increase in the use of imprisonment and community sentences (including community correction orders (CCOs), following the phased abolition of suspended sentences.

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Swift, Certain and Fair Approaches to Sentencing Family Violence Offenders (2017).

This report examines whether 'swift, certain and fair' ('SCF') approaches towards sentencing of family violence offenders are desirable in Victoria (p ix). SCF approaches include:

- targeting offenders serving their sentence in the community;
- monitoring compliance;
- responding to contraventions within 72 hours; and
- responding to contraventions with fixed (usually custodial) sentences, with lengths of between a few hours to a month (p x).

The report concludes that SCF approaches towards sentencing of family violence offenders are not desirable in Victoria because, for example:

- there is an absence of evidence for the effectiveness of SCF approaches to family violence offences (see [3.15]-[3.24]);
- the potential risks to victims (see [3.51]-[3.61]);
- the potential for disproportionate impact on particular groups, especially Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people (see [3.117]-[3.129]); and
- overwhelming stakeholder opposition (p xi).

The report recommends instead that judicial officers make increased use of judicial monitoring conditions in community correction orders (CCO) (Recommendation 5; see [4.56]). The report notes that the Law Institute of Victoria, in its submission, identified judicial monitoring as one of the 'most promising approaches in reducing family violence offending' (see [4.27]). Data from the Victorian Magistrates Court reveals that a judicial monitoring condition was attached in 14% of cases (510 of 3,560) where a family violence offender was sentenced to a CCO during the 2015-16 financial year ([4.34]). It is argued that judicial monitoring hearings, in front of the same judicial officer, help foster a sense of accountability in offenders ([4.104])

International

Cissner et al., A National Portrait of Restorative Approaches to Intimate Partner Violence: Pathways to Safety, Accountability, Healing, and Well-Being (2019).

This study seeks to document how these restorative approaches are being applied to intimate partner violence across the USA. It draws on a national survey of programs along with five in-depth cases studies based on follow-up site visits. The survey results suggest a wide variation in how restorative approaches are being used, some overarching themes emerge: programs that responded prioritize survivor agency and safety, focus on active accountability for those who have caused harm, and emphasize voluntary participation.

Sentencing - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (2021).

[63-505] – [63-520] These sections of the Sentencing Bench Book provide information about sentencing domestic violence matters in NSW.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 20.9 discusses the principles and issues relating to the sentencing for breach of a domestic violence order.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

4.2 discusses criminal offences in the context of family violence, including gravity of offences, sentencing purposes, and the relevance of the attitude of the victim. 4.1.1 discusses the contravention of a family violence intervention order, including sentencing, sentencing practices, and types of sanctions.

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Sentencing Manual (4th edition 2022).

This Bench Book provides a search tool (re: Family Violence). See esp. 5.2.8.3 regarding relevance of family violence regarding the gravity of offending.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Chapter 13 focuses on domestic, family and sexual violence.

Sentencing - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Fiona

Sentencing - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v UG* [2020] ACTCA 8 (27 February 2020) – ACT Court of Appeal

"49. In relation to the application of a separate sentencing regime to family violence offences, s 34(2)(a) of the Sentencing Act expressly addresses the issue, but not in a way that assists the Crown. It provides:

(2) In deciding how an offender should be sentenced for an offence, a court must not reduce the severity of a sentence it would otherwise have imposed because– (a) the offence is a family violence offence; or …

50. There is no mention of increasing the sentence that a court would otherwise have imposed.

51. When sentencing a particular offender for a "family violence offence", the usual sentencing principles apply. This means that, when relevant to the particular case and subject to the De Simoni principle (R v De Simoni (1981) 147 CLR 383), the sentencing court will take into account matters that are frequently associated with "family violence offences". These matters include:

(a) whether the offence forms part of a course of conduct (Sentencing Act s 33(1)(c));

(b) whether and how a weapon was used;

(c) whether the offence was associated with actual or threatened violence;

(d) the impact on victims (Sentencing Act s 33(1)(f)); and

(e) whether the offender was in a position of trust or authority vis-à-vis the victim (Sentencing Act s 33(1)(u)), which is usually–perhaps even "necessarily"–the case in relation to domestic violence offences: see R v Kilic [2016] HCA 48; 259 CLR 256 at [28].

However, such factors are not taken into account because the offence can be labelled a "family violence offence", but because they attach to the particular offending conduct."

Parker v Tasmania [2020] TASCCA 9 (12 June 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

At [28], Estcourt J stated:

> "As I have said in the past, vulnerable women such as the complainant are entitled to the protection of the law against brutal partners, and the community expectation is that such protection will be provided by the courts."

Citing Price v Tasmania [2016] TASCCA 22, Director of Public Prosecutions v Karklins [2018] TASCCA 6, Gregson v Tasmania [2018] TASCCA 14 and Director of Public Prosecutions v Johnson [2020] TASCCA 4, Geason J stated at [41]:

> "…this Court has on a number of occasions emphasised the importance of general deterrence in sentencing for offences involving the infliction of violence on the vulnerable. Too frequently this occurs in a domestic or relationship context. Such conduct requires a sentence that reflects the insidious nature of such offending, and the importance of protecting those vulnerable to such harm…"

Hardwick v Tasmania [2020] TASCCA 2 (20 March 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

At [52]-[53], the Court stated:

> "The dangers attached to choking have been well documented over many years, particularly in homicide cases. Judges sitting in criminal law have become familiar with evidence of pathologists that death in choking cases is usually as a result of pressure applied to the carotid arteries, thereby blocking the arterial blood supply to the brain… In recent years, criminal courts across Australia have come to understand that choking of female victims by male offenders is a prevalent and dangerous feature of violence perpetrated in domestic circumstances."

At [64], the Court noted that:

> "The prevalence and devastating impacts of violence perpetrated against women and children in domestic circumstances are well recognised across Australia by the criminal courts and the wider community. Victims in these cases are vulnerable. The crimes are often committed within the confines of the family home in breach of the sanctity and safety of the home. Choking is a common and dangerous > feature."

Degney v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 183 (19 August 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

At [50], the Court stated:

> '…[T]hose considering similar brutal, degrading abuse of a domestic partner must understand that the courts have a duty to protect vulnerable members of our community and will not hesitate to impose stern punishment upon wrongdoers. In 2014, this Court sent out what it hoped would be an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence – that if they offended, they would be sentenced to lengthy terms of imprisonment. The sentence we are about to impose follows through on that message.'

At [52], the Court observed:

> 'There has been an increasing community disquiet over violence of males towards their female partners (or ex-partners) and this is one reason why denunciation of this conduct must be given full expression in the sentence.'

DPP v Smith* [2019] VSCA 266 (21 November 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

At [35], the Court stated:

'…[T]hose considering similar brutal, degrading abuse of a domestic partner must understand that the courts have a duty to protect vulnerable members of our community and will not hesitate to impose stern punishment upon wrongdoers. In 2014, this Court sent out what it hoped would be an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence – that if they offended, they would be sentenced to lengthy terms of imprisonment. The sentence we are about to impose follows through on that message.'

Director of Public Prosecutions v Foster* [2019] TASCCA 15 (12 September 2019) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

At [29], Estcourt J held:

'Violent behaviour by men towards women in relationships must be condemned and discouraged. Vulnerable women, such as the complainant, are entitled to the protection of the law against brutal partners, and the community expectation is that such protection will be provided by the courts.'

R v Pikula [2015] ACTSC 380 (12 November 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [1]: 'There can be no doubt that one of the marks of a civilised society is that its members can be protected from violence in their lives. While there can, of course, be no guarantee of such protection, nevertheless, the community expects that appropriate steps will be taken to maximise such protection. This is especially true of the need for safety within the family'.

R v Peadon [2015] ACTSC 132 (14 May 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Burns J at [4]:'these offences [were] family violence offences and as such must be treated very seriously by [the] Court. [The] community views with great abhorrence the infliction of violence by people in family relationships'.

R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J at [77]: 'An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence", Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pp 6–7'.

R v Edigarov [2001] NSWCCA 436 (5 October 2001) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Wood CJ at [41]: 'As this Court has confirmed in Glen NSWCCA 19 December 1994, Ross NSWCCA 20 November 1996, Rowe (1996) 89 A Crim R 467, Fahda (1999) NSWCCA 267 and Powell (2000) NSWCCA 108, violent attacks in domestic settings must be treated with real seriousness. Regrettably, that form of conduct involves aggression by men who are physically stronger than their victims and who are often in a position economically, or otherwise, to enforce their silence and their acceptance of such conduct. In truth such conduct is brutal, cowardly and inexcusable'.

R v Dunn [2004] NSWCCA 41 (21 December 2004) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Adams J at [47]: 'Crimes involving domestic violence have two important characteristics which differentiate them from many other crimes of violence: firstly, the offender usually believes that, in a real sense, what they do is justified, even that they are the true victim; and, secondly, the continued estrangement requires continued threat. These elements also usually mean that the victim never feels truly safe. Unlike the casual robbery, where the victim is often simply in the wrong place at the wrong time, the victim of a domestic violence offence is personally targeted'.

R v June Oh Seo [2019] NSWSC 639 (31 May 2019) – New South Wales Supreme Court

Wilson J noted

At [53]-

> She was attacked by him in her own home, a home in which he had no right to be, Ms Choi having asked him to leave. Thus did what should have been a place of peace and safety become a place of great danger for Ms Choi.

At [82] –

> 'Whilst there are men in the community, and it is mostly men, who view women as second class citizens who must bend to their will, when that attitude results in the commission of crime, and particularly violent crime, the courts will impose heavy punishment. Such conduct is never acceptable and it will be strongly repudiated by the courts.'

R v MCW* [2018] QCA 241 (28 September 2018) – Queensland Court of Appeal

The Court referred to the Explanatory Notes for the Criminal Law (Domestic Violence) Amendment Bill (No 2) 2015 at [39] –

> 'The new strangulation offence and the significant penalty attached, reflect that this behaviour is not only inherently dangerous, but is a predictive indicator of escalation in domestic violence offending, including homicide…'

Her Majesty's Attorney-General v O* [2004] TASSC 53 (9 June 2004) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Quoting the Canadian decision of R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242, 249 (as cited in Parker v R [1994] TASSC 94):

'When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape.'

DPP v Smeaton* [2007] VSCA 256 (15 November 2007) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Dodds-Streeton JA at [21]: 'Violence, and in particular violence by men against women as a means of control in current relationships or in relationships which have ended, is a prevalent and even critical social evil'.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou AJA at [53]-[54]: 'Historically perpetrators of family violence were rarely prosecuted. Even when offenders were convicted of such offences, they often received lenient sentences. Fortunately the criminal law now gives greater recognition to the devastating effects of family violence. It has also been recognised that women who are killed by their husband, boyfriend or de facto partner have frequently been assaulted by them many times previously. This makes both specific and general deterrence very important factors in sentencing men who assault their partner.'

'The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and longlasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

R v Davsanoglu* [2019] VSC 332 (24 May 2019) – Victorian Supreme Court

Lasry J noted at [5] -

> 'This is yet another case of a man inflicting his will on a woman by the use of fatal violence in her home. Whilst the circumstances of this case are unusual to a degree, in other respects, they are all too familiar. Violence by men against women remains of epidemic proportions, and it simply must be stemmed.'

Silva v The State of Western Australia* [2013] WASCA 278 (4 December 2013) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

Buss JA with whom Mazza JA agreed (quoting the sentencing judge):

'The law is clear that disputes between partners, no matter how emotionally hurtful, must be resolved peacefully. People must understand that marriage is not a licence to treat a spouse as a chattel and violence in the course of a marriage breakdown will be met with deterrent sentences' ([42]).

Sentencing considerations - breaches of protection orders

This list of considerations is adapted from the Guiding Principles for Sentencing Contraventions of Family Violence Intervention Orders prepared by the Sentencing Advisory Council (Victoria) 2009 [Sentencing Advisory Council Vic 2009] and recommended by the Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010 (rec. 12.8) [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

Sentencing a breach of a protection order can be an extremely complex task. Subject to legislation and relevant case law that requires a specific approach (see Table 1 below), in sentencing an offender for breach of a protection order, the following matters may be important to consider:

1. The purposes of sentencing an offender for breach of a protection order:

   (a) Appropriately balancing the purposes of sentencing is a delicate task in family violence cases, where measures intended to protect the victim can place them at increased risk, and sentences designed to punish the offender may indirectly punish the victim.

   (b) As the function of a protection order is to protect the victim from future harm, an important purpose of sentencing for breach of an order should be to deter non-compliance with the order or future orders to ensure the safety and protection of the victim. The protection of the community, which encompasses protecting the victim, is an important consideration.

   (c) Denunciation and punishment are also important purposes in sentencing for contravention of a protection order. The integrity of an intervention order system relies on there being serious consequences if orders are breached.

   Some sentences which are intended to punish the offender may have an unintended consequence. The dynamics of domestic and family violence may mean the imposition of a fine can also punish the victim. Sentences which are structured to ensure that it is the offender who is punished may be more effective in achieving this sentencing purpose (for example orders that require the offender comply with conditions such as completing community work).

   (d) Another sentencing purpose which can be compatible with protecting the victim (particularly in the long term) is rehabilitation. There will be occasions where a sentence with coercive rehabilitation requirements (such as mandatory attendance at a behavioural change course or parenting course) as well as a punitive element (such as community work, a financial condition or a jail term) strikes a better balance between the purposes of sentencing than a sentence such as a fine.

(a) Factors relating to the victim include:

i) Nature of the breach and its impact on the victim

The nature of the breach of the protection order and its impact on the victim are important factors.

When sentencing for a breach of a protection order regard should be had to the fact that the damage caused to victims who have suffered years of domestic and family violence may make them particularly vulnerable to conduct that in another context would seem relatively innocuous.

Breaches not involving physical violence can have a significant impact on the victim and should not necessarily be treated as less serious than breaches involving physical violence.

Where an offence has taken place in or in the vicinity of the victim's home, thereby depriving the victim of any feeling of safety or sanctuary, the breach may be regarded as more serious.

Consider whether, if there is no victim impact statement, the judicial officer should enquire as to whether the victim has been given the opportunity to make such a statement. It is however important not to insist on the provision of a victim impact statement and judicial officers should not underestimate the effect of the breach on the victim in the absence of a victim impact statement. Victims may feel it is not safe for them to provide a victim impact statement (see (iv) below.)

ii) Abuse of power People in family relationships generally have ongoing emotional, legal and/or financial ties, which can also include the joint care of children. They are therefore in a position to commit the kind of breach that could more seriously affect a family member, not merely physically, but so as to cause mental anguish.

iii) Presence of children When sentencing breaches of protection orders, information about the exposure of any children to family violence may be relevant. Where the original order was imposed to protect children, whether or not alongside another victim or victims, any breach of this order will

2. Sentencing factors

(a) Factors relating to the victim include:

i) Nature of the breach and its impact on the victim

The nature of the breach of the protection order and its impact on the victim are important factors.

When sentencing for a breach of a protection order regard should be had to the fact that the damage caused to victims who have suffered years of domestic and family violence may make them particularly vulnerable to conduct that in another context would seem relatively innocuous.

Breaches not involving physical violence can have a significant impact on the victim and should not necessarily be treated as less serious than breaches involving physical violence.

Where an offence has taken place in or in the vicinity of the victim's home, thereby depriving the victim of any feeling of safety or sanctuary, the breach may be regarded as more serious.

Consider whether, if there is no victim impact statement, the judicial officer should enquire as to whether the victim has been given the opportunity to make such a statement. It is however important not to insist on the provision of a victim impact statement and judicial officers should not underestimate the effect of the breach on the victim in the absence of a victim impact statement. Victims may feel it is not safe for them to provide a victim impact statement (see (iv) below.)

ii) Abuse of power People in family relationships generally have ongoing emotional, legal and/or financial ties, which can also include the joint care of children. They are therefore in a position to commit the kind of breach that could more seriously affect a family member, not merely physically, but so as to cause mental anguish.

iii) Presence of children When sentencing breaches of protection orders, information about the exposure of any children to family violence may be relevant. Where the original order was imposed to protect children, whether or not alongside another victim or victims, any breach of this order will generally be more serious. This will be so whether or not the children are direct victims or were exposed to the breach behaviour.

iv) Attitude of the victim

In NSW the attitude of the victim is not to be taken into account.

In all other jurisdictions generally, the views of the victim should not significantly influence the appropriate sentence for a particular offence. Because victims of family violence may be placed in danger of further violence if they are regarded by the perpetrator as being responsible for the sentence, a court should be mindful as to whether the victim has provided any views on sentence free of pressure or coercion. This may require some consideration of the dynamics of the relationship between the victim and the offender.

v) Contribution of the victim

It may be relevant that the conditions of the order were breached following contact initiated by the victim. However, in assessing the degree to which this may mitigate the seriousness of the offence it is important to consider the history of the relationship between the parties, the nature of the contact and the victim's motivation in making contact (and in particular whether the victim was acting under any pressure or coercion). This may require some consideration of the dynamics of the relationship between the victim and the offender.

Some victims have reported that they feel safer if they maintain contact with the offender so they can monitor their level of risk.

vi) Vulnerability of the victim The particular circumstances of the victim—including any special vulnerability—are relevant to the nature and impact of a breach. Victim vulnerability may aggravate the seriousness of a breach of a protection order such that a higher penalty is justified.

(b) Factors relating to the offender include:

i) Nature of the breach Depending on the dynamics of the relationship even apparently 'minor', 'trivial', 'technical' or 'low level' breaches can have a serious impact on the victim.

ii) Culpability

In considering the offender's culpability in a breach of protection order offence, the court should consider whether the offence was committed intentionally, recklessly or negligently and the offender's level of understanding of the order.

Generally, the fact that the offender was not present in court when the original order was made and the consequences of breach explained should not mitigate culpability. However, there may be situations in which the offender has not properly understood the conditions of the order (for

v) Contribution of the victim

It may be relevant that the conditions of the order were breached following contact initiated by the victim. However, in assessing the degree to which this may mitigate the seriousness of the offence it is important to consider the history of the relationship between the parties, the nature of the contact and the victim's motivation in making contact (and in particular whether the victim was acting under any pressure or coercion). This may require some consideration of the dynamics of the relationship between the victim and the offender.

Some victims have reported that they feel safer if they maintain contact with the offender so they can monitor their level of risk.

vi) Vulnerability of the victim The particular circumstances of the victim—including any special vulnerability—are relevant to the nature and impact of a breach. Victim vulnerability may aggravate the seriousness of a breach of a protection order such that a higher penalty is justified.

(b) Factors relating to the offender include:

i) Nature of the breach Depending on the dynamics of the relationship even apparently 'minor', 'trivial', 'technical' or 'low level' breaches can have a serious impact on the victim.

ii) Culpability

In considering the offender's culpability in a breach of protection order offence, the court should consider whether the offence was committed intentionally, recklessly or negligently and the offender's level of understanding of the order.

Generally, the fact that the offender was not present in court when the original order was made and the consequences of breach explained should not mitigate culpability. However, there may be situations in which the offender has not properly understood the conditions of the order (for example, where the offender has poor English skills, an intellectual disability or a mental illness).

iii) Prior convictions and other offending behaviour A court should take into account information about prior convictions in particular any that relate to the victim in question or other family violence offences, where that information is available.

iv) Previous good character If there is a proven pattern of domestic and family violence, any evidence of the offender's 'good behaviour' and reputation in society generally should be considered in light of the proven pattern.

v) Timing of the breach Where an order is contravened only a short time after the making of the protection order or there has been an earlier breach, this may be an aggravating factor.

(c) Where a criminal offence is charged in combination with a breach of a protection order:

Where the facts which formed the basis of both charges are the same, consideration must be given to the question of 'double punishment'.

Table 1: Jurisdictional approaches to sentencing breaches of protection orders

Australian Capital Territory	section 34B Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT) section 43 Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)
New South Wales	section 14(4) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (2021) [NSW Sentencing Bench Book 2021] [63.515]; [63.518] Browning v The Queen [2015] NSWCCA 147 (17 June 2015)
Northern Territory	section 121(7) Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) Eg. Bush v Lyons [2018] NTSC 20 (28 April 2018)
Queensland	section 9(10A) Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) sections 73, 177-179 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) Queensland Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021) see sections [20.1], [20.2], [20.3]; [20.8]; [20.9] [DFV Protection Act 2012 Bench Book 2021]
South Australia	Section 31 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act (2009) SA Eg. R v Fox [2017] SASC 5 (3 February 2017)
Tasmania	section 35 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) Eg. Harrison v Moore [2018] TASSC 53 (19 October 2018)
Victoria	sections 37, 37A, 123,123A Family Violence Protection Act (2008) Vic. Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book [Vic FV Bench Book 2014] (2014), [4.1.1]- [4.1.3], [4.2]. R v Cotham [1998] VSCA 111 (17 November 1998)
Western Australia	Sections 124E and 124F Sentencing Act 1995 (WA) regarding sentencing serial family violence offenders. Sections 61-61C Restraining Orders Act (1997) WA Sections 67A, 76A, 84CA, 124D-124G Sentencing Act (1995) WA

	eg: Howell v Davies [2019] WASC 220 (27 June 2019)

See also 9.3 Sentencing:

Table 1: Approaches to sentencing where offences committed in the context domestic and family violence.

Sentencing considerations - breaches of protection orders - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. Chapter 12 discussed penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders. The report notes that: 'The overwhelming majority of stakeholders that addressed this issue were in favour of sanctions that could help to change the behaviour of those who commit violence. Therefore, there was support for 'perpetrator programs' such as violence and drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs; probation with special conditions, such as attending 'perpetrators' courses or counselling'; men's behaviour programs; psychiatric assessment and treatment; anger management programs; and educational programs on family violence with 'therapeutic interventions'' (at [12.172].) Other options raised (as an alternative to imprisonment) included community service orders (provided the work associated with the penalty is 'meaningful, constructive and rehabilitative') (at [12.173])

The underlying issue in Chapters 13 and 14 is the way in which the criminal law accounts for the nature and dynamics of family violence. Criminal laws are traditionally perceived as 'incident-based', in that they are focused upon discrete acts forming the basis of individual offences. As identified in Chapter 5, family violence is characterised by patterns of controlling, coercive or dominating behaviour and may include both physical and non-physical violence [13.2].

Sentencing Advisory Council (Tas), Sentencing of Adult Family Violence Offenders: Final report No.5 (2015).

This Report provides advice on the sentencing of adult family violence offenders in Tasmania and includes consideration of the range and adequacy of sentencing options and support programs available and the role of specialist family violence lists or courts in dealing with family violence matters. Included in the terms of reference: (2) Sentencing practices in relation to family violence offences across Tasmania; (3) Sentencing standards for family violence offences in comparison to similar offences outside the family violence context; (4) the range and adequacy of sentencing options and support programs available to the courts when sentencing family violence matters

3.2 SENTENCING PRINCIPLES AND SENTENCING ORDERS

On a finding or plea of guilt the sentencing officer's task is informed by the aims and purposes of sentencing. In Tasmania, these aims (replicating recognised common law objectives) are set out in s 3 of the Sentencing Act 1997and include punishment, deterrence, prevention, denunciation and rehabilitation. The decision on sentence is also shaped by a number of other general common law sentencing principles including the central principle of proportionality, which requires that the punishment imposed be commensurate with the blameworthiness of the offender.

When sentencing for a family violence offence an additional consideration is the fact that the legislation suggests that family violence offences need to be regarded seriously and that victim safety may be a more significant factor in the sentencing exercise. The objects clause of the FVA states that the 'safety, psychological wellbeing and interests of people affected by family violence are the paramount considerations.'

4.1 COMPARATIVE SENTENCING STANDARDS

This section of the Report examines sentencing standards by comparing sentences imposed where an offence is committed in the context of family violence with those imposed for the same offence committed in a non-family violence context. The most common of these (and the only one for which sufficient data exists to enable a meaningful comparison) is the offence of assault contrary to the Police Offences Act, 1935.

5.2 DOMESTIC PROGRAMS

All Australian States and Territories have rehabilitation programs as part of their response to family violence but not all have made legislative provision for referral to such programs. Some of the key differences in the programs are: when a treatment order may be made; whether a counselling order is mandatory, voluntary, or made in connection with sentencing; the type of treatment available; and the effect of a counselling order.

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family violence Intervention Orders: Final Report (2009).

This is a report compiled by the Sentencing Advisory Council from Victoria on Intervention Orders in Victoria: their usage, purpose, efficacy and, most importantly, the penalties awarded for their breach. The Council compiled the report by reviewing relevant literature on family data, analysing data on sentencing and conducting new research by consulting those involved in the sentencing process (magistrates, court staff, Victoria Police, community legal centre representatives, family violence service providers, defence lawyers, workers from men's family violence programs and a family violence victims' support group). The report found:

- The sanctions imposed during sentencing for breach of a family violence order were considered by most stakeholders to be far too lenient (viii)
- Fines are inappropriate sentences for breach of intervention orders (viii) as they can punish the victim as well as the offender (ix)

'Some sentences which are intended to punish the offender may fail to achieve that purpose. For example, the most common sentencing disposition for breaching an intervention order is a fine. The purpose of a fine is generally said to be to punish the offender and act as a deterrent to future offending by the offender and others. However, the dynamics of family violence mean that fines can punish the victim(s) as much or more than the offender. Payment of the fine by the offender may affect his ability to provide financial support to the victim and her family. The offender may even coerce the victim into paying the fine.' (at [6.12]).

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing for Contravention of Family Violence Intervention Orders and Safety Notices: Second Monitoring Report (2015).

This report is a continuation of previous monitoring work, examining sentencing patterns over yearly periods from 2009 and 2015 for offences involving contravention of a family violence intervention order (FVIO) or a family violence safety notice (FVSN) made under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). In particular, this report examines sentencing for the offences of:

- contravention of an FVIO;
- contravention of an FVSN;
- contravention of an FVIO intending to cause harm or fear for safety;
- contravention of an FVSN intending to cause harm or fear for safety; and
- persistent contravention of notices and orders.

In terms of sentencing for FVIO and FVSN contravention, there was an increase in the use of imprisonment and community sentences (including community correction orders (CCOs), following the phased abolition of suspended sentences.

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Swift, Certain and Fair Approaches to Sentencing Family Violence Offenders (2017).

This report examines whether 'swift, certain and fair' ('SCF') approaches towards sentencing of family violence offenders are desirable in Victoria (p ix). SCF approaches include:

- targeting offenders serving their sentence in the community;
- monitoring compliance;
- responding to contraventions within 72 hours; and
- responding to contraventions with fixed (usually custodial) sentences, with lengths of between a few hours to a month (p x).

The report concludes that SCF approaches towards sentencing of family violence offenders are not desirable in Victoria because, for example:

- there is an absence of evidence for the effectiveness of SCF approaches to family violence offences (see [3.15]-[3.24]);
- the potential risks to victims (see [3.51]-[3.61]);
- the potential for disproportionate impact on particular groups, especially Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people (see [3.117]-[3.129]); and
- overwhelming stakeholder opposition (p xi).

The report recommends instead that judicial officers make increased use of judicial monitoring conditions in community correction orders (CCO) (Recommendation 5; see [4.56]). The report notes that the Law Institute of Victoria, in its submission, identified judicial monitoring as one of the 'most promising approaches in reducing family violence offending' (see [4.27]). Data from the Victorian Magistrates Court reveals that a judicial monitoring condition was attached in 14% of cases (510 of 3,560) where a family violence offender was sentenced to a CCO during the 2015-16 financial year ([4.34]). It is argued that judicial monitoring hearings, in front of the same judicial officer, help foster a sense of accountability in offenders ([4.104])

Weatherburn, Don and Sara Rahman, 'General offending by domestic violence offenders' Crime and Justice Bulletin (Contemporary Issues in Crime and Justice, Number 215, 2018).

The purpose of the paper is to assess 1) the extent to which domestic violence (DV) offenders specialise in DV offending; 2) the types and frequency of involvement in non-DV offences by DV offenders; and 3) the similarities and differences between DV assault offenders and non-DV assault offenders. The first two questions were answered by examining non-DV offending by offenders convicted in New South Wales of a DV offence between 2008 and 2017. To address the third question, classification techniques were employed to determine how well DV assault offenders and non-DV assault offenders can be separated on the basis of demographic and criminal justice variables. Results showed that DV offenders committed more than 2.5 times as many non-DV offences as DV offences. The most common non-DV offences committed by the DV offenders were traffic offences (27.99%), theft offences (14.67%) and drug offences (12.31%). There was very little difference between DV and non-DV assault offenders in terms of their demographic and criminal justice profile. The findings, therefore, suggest that most DV offenders do not specialise in DV offending, but a significant proportion of convicted DV offenders do. The fact that most DV offenders commit other offences is significant because measures aimed at deterring and incapacitating them may have consequential benefits in relation to other types of crime (page 8).

Sentencing considerations - breaches of protection orders - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (updated 2021).

See [63.515]-[63.518] sentencing domestic violence offences.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Sections [20.1], [20.2], [20.3]; [20.8];[20.9] discuss the principles and issues relating to the sentencing for breach of a domestic violence order or police protection notice.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

See [4.1.1] - [4.1.3] for a discussion of sentencing and family violence in the context of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008.

See [4.2] for a discussion of sentencing for other criminal offences in the context of family violence.

Sentencing considerations - breaches of protection orders - Other Resources

> Sentencing Range and Factors.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence offences & Serial Family Violence Offenders, 2021.

This sheet provides information about family violence offences and the consequences of committing them. It explains when a court may declare a person to be a Serial Family Violence Offender and the consequences of such a declaration.

Sentencing considerations - breaches of protection orders - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Anna

Carol

Fiona

Jennifer

Melissa

Sentencing considerations - breaches of protection orders - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Khan v Evans [2013] ACTSC 211 (4 October 2013) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge ACJ at [52]: 'While the offence against Mr Khan's father could also be described as domestic violence, the fact is that the interim personal protection order and the personal protection orders are there to protect the complainant from what might be described as domestic violence in its widest sense. Therefore, such orders are an important component of the criminal justice system's response to domestic violence. Breaches of personal protection orders are serious matters which the courts must treat seriously to ensure the integrity of the system which the protection orders are intended to put in to effect'.

Jeffries v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA 144 (26 June 2008) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J at [91]: 'Significant aggravating factors existed, given that the offences were committed whilst the Applicant was on bail for an offence of violence committed against AW and was subject to an apprehended domestic violence order intended to control his conduct towards his domestic partner. The present offences were committed in flagrant breach of both forms of conditional liberty, which were intended to protect AW'.

Suksa-Ngacharoen v Regina [2018] NSWCCA 142 (10 August 2018) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Wilson J said at [132]:

> 'The criminality of breaching an ADVO rests in the complete disregard for an order of a court, conduct which has the practical effect of undermining the authority of the courts, and preventing the courts from extending effective protection to persons at risk of harm from another. The legislative intent of the scheme for apprehended domestic violence orders is to permit a court to restrain the conduct of an individual who poses a risk to a person with whom he or she is or was in a domestic relationship…

Conduct which involves deliberate disobedience of a court order must be treated as serious, and should ordinarily be separately punished from any offence that occurs at the same time, always having regard to the requirements of the totality principle as set out in Pearce v The Queen (1989) 194 CLR 610.'

R v MJ* [2016] NSWDC 272 (12 May 2016) – New South Wales District Court

Berman J at [42]: 'Despite the rehabilitation that the offender appears to have achieved leading up to the jury's verdict, there still is a need for specific deterrence. The offender's history, and it is a history, of acting in a violent way towards partners is of great concern. True it is that he has not always done that; indeed, some of the people with whom he was in relationships with have spoken positively about him in references tendered to the Court today. But much more important than specific deterrence is, of course, general deterrence. Again, I go back to what I said at the beginning of these remarks on sentence. Offences such as these cause enormous harm, both to the individual victims concerned and to the community generally. Offenders who commit crimes such as I have described, particularly after they have been subject to apprehended violence orders, put in place to protect their partners from precisely such conduct, need to be given in sentences which will deter others who may be tempted to act in a similar way. Most fundamentally in assessing the relevant sentence to impose upon the offender is, of course, the objective gravity of what he has done'.

Andalong v O'Neill* [2017] NTSC 77 (19 October 2017)– Northern Territory Supreme Court

The question is whether the elements of the offences charged are identical, or substantially the same in the sense that all the elements of one offence are wholly included in the other ([23])

Queensland Police Service v KBH* [2023] QDC 26 (16 February 2023) – Queensland District Court

In holding that the sentences were manifestly inadequate Coker DCJ observed:

[30] With the greatest of respect to the learned Magistrate, these were not minor breaches by any stretch of the imagination. Rather, they were repeat instances of exactly the behaviour which had previously led to periods of imprisonment being imposed in relation to this matter.

[31] I set out at some length those particular issues in relation to this matter because, in my assessment, it is important that they be detailed so as to explain the reason why, in my assessment, this appeal must be upheld. It was not simply a situation where the penalty imposed was more lenient than might have been expected or, more particularly, more lenient than I might have imposed in relation to this matter. Rather, it was manifestly inadequate and, as indicated within the cases, an imposition in relation to the matter which simply indicates that it was unreasonable and inadequate in all of the circumstances; noting particularly, as I do, the acknowledgement on the part of the respondent himself, that imprisonment was well within range.

[32] I am satisfied, that, therefore, the imposition of a fine of a very lenient character in itself is simply outside the range of what might have been appropriate in relation to this matter. In that regard, I note particularly the more recent developments in relation to the domestic violence legislation, and of the very real need to accept that domestic violence is something far more than simply the imposition of physical force by one party to an intimate relationship upon another. There are a multitude of means by which there can be control exercised upon another and it is important, in fact, in my view, overwhelmingly so, that penalties imposed reflect the recognition of the importance of ensuring that such behaviours do not continue.

[33] As was indicated by President McMurdo, as her Honour then was. In R v Fairbrother; ex parte the Attorney-General [2005] QCA 105 the following was said:

> Domestic violence has a deleterious on-going impact not only on the immediate victim but on the victim's wider family and ultimately on the whole of society. It is not solely a domestic issue; it is a crime against the State warranting salutary punishment ... Perpetrators of serious acts of domestic violence must know that society will not tolerate such behaviour. They can expect the Courts to impose significant sentences of imprisonment involving actual custody to deter not only individual offenders, but also others who might otherwise think they can commit such acts with near impunity.

[34] I would hasten to add here that this is not a serious act of domestic violence but it is a repeat act of domestic violence in circumstances where, clearly, the respondent to this appeal has failed to accept the opportunities previously given and, as such, more significant penalties are appropriately required to be imposed in relation to this matter. It is not a situation where the offending is minor or trivial, lacking in real impact. It has continued to impact upon the aggrieved and, as identified by President McMurdo in R v Fairbrother, is a situation where it is a crime against the State warranting salutary punishment.

[35] Here it is clear, in circumstances where the respondent had prior convictions, 10 it is submitted, - for domestic violence offences, all against this same aggrieved, and had previously been sentenced to various penalties, including terms of imprisonment subject to operational periods for suspended sentences, that it was a significant consideration, as well as the fact that the reoffending occurred only 21 days after the most recent sentence, prior to coming before the Court.

[36] In my view the imposition of a fine was unreasonable and unjust. It fell below what could even be considered the most lenient of penalties that might be imposed in relation to the matter and, as I have indicated, it is my view, therefore, that the appeal must be successful.

In accepting the appellant's submission that the sentence imposed was so lenient that it should be considered an erroneous exercise of the court's jurisdiction, and it amounts to a manifestly inadequate sentence that ought to be corrected on appeal, citing JRB v Bird [2009] QDC 277, TZL v QPS [2015] QDC 171, PFM v QPS [2017] QDC 210 and Queensland Police Service v JSB [2018] QDC 120, Coker DCJ observed:

[38] What those particular cases show is that there are significantly greater penalties warranted in relation to offending, even where there are not direct indications of domestic violence of a physical character. As was clear in each of those cases, penalties can and should be imposed which reflect the continued and repetitive nature of offending and of the very real need to ensure that there is a clear indication, not only to the individual offender but also to the community at large, that such offending will be met with significant penalties.

R v MKW* [2014] QDC 300 (18 June 2014) – Queensland District Court

The crucial issue was whether the original prosecution for the breach offence against the Act constituted a 'proceeding' under that act. If it did, s 138(3)(a) would apply so that the prosecution for the breach offence would not affect any other proceeding against the applicant arising out of the same conduct.

Craill v Police* [2016] SASC 168 (4 November 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court

Stanley J at [28]: 'In R v McMutrie this Court said that a breach of a restraining order is a matter of particular gravity. The object of the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) is the prevention of domestic and non-domestic abuse, and the exposure of children to the effects of such abuse. The principal instrument for achieving this objective is the making of intervention orders. The protective objects of the Act can only be achieved if courts are scrupulous in doing what they can to ensure that persons who are subject to such orders comply with them. The repeated breaches of those orders by the appellant demonstrate a persistent, blatant and contumelious disregard for the orders and the authorities that impose them. Crimes of domestic violence are often occasions for the exercise, or attempted exercise, of power over the victim by the offender. Breaches of intervention orders can be occasions for the offender to intimidate the victim with an implied threat that such orders will not protect them. The courts must act to contradict this impression'.

Mullins v Police [2013] SASC 148 (20 September 2013) – South Australia Supreme Court

I accept the submission of counsel for the respondent that if, say, an assault is performed in circumstances where the offender knows that the assault is also a contravention of an Intervention Order, then that knowledge is an aggravating feature of the offending and should be taken into account on sentencing without there being a separate charge of contravening an Intervention Order.

R v McMutrie [2002] SASC 253 (8 August 2002) – South Australia Supreme Court

On appeal Counsel for the Crown accepted that there was a risk of a miscarriage of justice. It was acknowledged that the jury may have relied on the one set of facts as the basis for both convictions. It was accepted that if this had happened the appellant was entitled to a defence of autrefois acquit to the charge possessing a knife with intent. The Crown's concession was appropriate. The conviction on count 3 must be set aside.[11]

DPP v Johnson [2011] VSCA 288 (23 September 2011) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Neave JA at [4]-[5]: 'All Australian states have enacted legislation which is intended to protect potential victims of family violence from physical injury and from being placed in fear by harassment or threats. Family violence is a serious problem in Australia. In 2004, it was reported that family violence is 'the leading contributor of death, disability and illness in women in Victoria aged 15 to 44 years'.[1] Breach of intervention orders is relatively common.[2] In its Report on Breaching Intervention Orders, the Sentencing Advisory Council said that, between July 2004 and June 2007, the Magistrates' Court of Victoria and the County Court of Victoria imposed on average approximately 14,000 intervention orders per year. Over a quarter of all intervention orders imposed were breached.

'Further, offenders who breach orders and continue to threaten and assault their partners may go on to seriously injure or even kill them.[3] As was recognised during parliamentary debates on the Family Violence Protection Bill 2008,[4] intervention orders can only protect victims of threatened violence if they are effectively enforced and if breach of an order attracts an appropriate sentence. The Victorian Law Reform Commission, in its report which 'underpin[ned]' many of the changes in the Bill,[5] observed: 'The response to a breach of an intervention order is crucial to ensuring the intervention order system is effective in protecting family violence victims. If police or the courts do not respond adequately to breaches of intervention orders, they will be perceived as ineffectual – 'not worth the paper they are written on' – by victims and perpetrators alike".

DPP v Paulino* (Sentence) [2017] VSC 794 (21 December 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

In relation to protection orders, Bell J stated at [11]:

> In the context of aggravation, I referred to the intervention order not for reasons of formality. To murder a person protected by a family violence intervention order is a very serious matter. Family violence intervention orders are not worthless pieces of paper. The general purpose of such an order is to provide legally enforceable protection for the safety of the individual, usually a woman at risk of violence from a man. The contravention in the present case is not separately charged but represents a seriously aggravating feature of the murder.

Filiz v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 212 (11 September 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Redlich JA at [21]-[23]: 'Senior counsel for the applicant rightly conceded that general deterrence is a significant sentencing factor in this case, not only in relation to aggravated burglary generally, but most particularly in relation to violent offending against a former domestic partner (Felicite v The Queen at [20]; DPP v Pasinis at [53]). Of particular significance is the fact that the applicant was already subject to a Family Violence Intervention Order. Offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to the breakdown of a relationship is one of possessive, violent rage. It goes without saying that such a response, to what is a common human situation, is utterly unacceptable. This Court has made it clear that such offending will attract serious consequences and even harsher penalties where it involves the breach of an order which exists for the victim's protection (Cotham v The Queen at [14]; DPP v Johnson at [38]-[49]).

'At the oral hearing it was said that the complainant's fear would have been greater if her home had been invaded by strangers seeking to steal personal property. It was suggested that the context of the offending affected its seriousness. We do not accept that these matters affect the objective gravity of the offences. The level of fear engendered by the applicant, in kicking in the locked bedroom door and proceeding to beat the victims with an iron rod, did not have to be evaluated according to such niceties. The attack the applicant launched upon his ex-partner was strongly suggestive of a desire to do her and her partner serious harm, and anybody in their position would have feared that such harm would occur. The complainant's victim impact statement makes clear that the physical and emotional effects will be lasting.

'It is a shameful truth that family violence is a leading cause of illness, disability and death among Victorian women aged between 15 and 44. It is also sadly true that there are a great number of women who live in real and justified fear of the men who are, or were, their intimate partners. In such circumstances, the submission that the complainant's level of fear when being attacked by her ex-partner was less than it might have been if she had been attacked by a stranger should be rejected'.

Marrah v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 119 (18 June 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Tate JA at [25]: 'The gravity of the offending was aggravated by the fact that the applicant was at the time the subject of an intervention order, which he flagrantly disregarded. Offending of this nature is too often perpetrated by men whose response to difficulties in a relationship is one of possessive, violent rage. It goes without saying that such a response, to what is a common human situation, is utterly unacceptable. The sentences must convey the unmistakeable message that male partners have no right to subject their female partners to threats or violence. The sentences must be of such an order as to strongly denounce violence within a domestic relationship'.

R v Cotham* [1998] VSCA 111 (17 November 1998) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Charles JA at [14]: 'Intervention orders must be strictly adhered to, and it is very much in the interests of the community that those against whom such orders are made be under no misapprehension that the courts will punish severely those who breach such orders. The applicant's actions suggest that he believed he could breach the intervention order with impunity. Only by appropriately severe penalties can the courts make clear to the applicant and the broader community that such conduct will not be tolerated'.

Brown v Roe [2004] WASCA 210 (16 September 2004) – Western Australia Supreme Court (Court of Appeal)

Barker J at [42],[44],[46]: 'It is plain from what the Magistrate said in his reasons that he held the view that the protected person had elected from time to time to enforce, at her discretion, the terms of the VRO. He said she used it as a "walking stick". It is not immediately apparent to me that this view is correct. Indeed, it appears to be a gratuitous comment. The explanation given by the protected person as to why, on some occasions, she tolerated the presence of the respondent at her home and, on other occasions, she did not, is quite understandable. In short, she has found it easier to attempt to manage the situation on many occasions when the respondent has called at her home unannounced or uninvited, but on other occasions when has become troublesome and she has invited him to leave, she has found it necessary to complain to the police and enforce the terms of the order.

'It may be recognised that, in many circumstances, the continuing relationship between persons who were once in a close personal relationship will be strained, especially after a VRO has been granted by a Court. Nonetheless, a person who is bound by a VRO must take all appropriate steps to ensure that the terms of the order are complied with. It may well be that, on some occasions, by virtue of a course of conduct, a person bound by the order may feel entitled to approach physically or telephone a protected person. It may be that a prior course of conduct in some cases implies a consent to approach the protected person in that way, at least initially. But if the protected person makes it plain that she or he does not consent to that contact or that initial contact continuing, then it behoves the person bound by the order to back off and strictly comply with the order.

'In my view, it is not appropriate for a Court, while a VRO is in place, effectively to suspend the operation of a VRO by taking the view that a person protected is inclined to use the VRO as a "walking stick", as the Magistrate in this case suggested'.

Dennis v Lanternier (No 2)* [2017] WASC 5 (12 January 2017) – Western Australia Supreme Court

Jenkins J referred to the role of the Restraining Orders Act in deterring domestic violence at [152]:

> The long title of the Restraining Orders Act reflects Parliament's intention for the Act to provide for orders to 'restrain people from committing acts of family or domestic or personal violence by imposing restraints on their behaviour and activity'. In order for the Act to be effective, offenders must appreciate that if they breach a VRO they will receive a significant penalty. The community and the courts have [an] intolerance and abhorrence of violence and threatened violence in domestic and former domestic relationships. The penalties imposed for breaches of VROs must reflect that intolerance and abhorrence, in the hope that the penalties deter offenders and protect victims.

Lutey v Jacques* [2010] WASC 78 (28 April 2010) – Western Australia Supreme Court

Simmonds J at [62]: ‘ The approach is one recognising that the Act is social legislation of the utmost importance as part of the legal response to domestic violence: Pillage v Coyne [2000] WASCA 135 [13] (Miller J); it is essential the courts ensure their orders are not ignored: Kenny v Lewis(Unreported, WASC, Library No 990113, 12 March 1999) (Kennedy J) 10; and violence restraining orders are notoriously difficult to enforce, and the need for general and individual deterrence will ordinarily outweigh subjective or other mitigating considerations: Dominik v Volpi [2004] WASCA 18 [80] (Roberts-Smith J)’.

Musgrove v Millard* [2012] WASC 60 (22 February 2012) – Western Australia Supreme Court

38 However, on this occasion, I do not consider that it is necessary to resolve the controversy over whether or not s 11 applies directly in the circumstances of this case. In view of the complexities involved and as there is a satisfactory alternative route to the conclusion of this appeal, it seems desirable to leave such contentious issues to another occasion when it might be essential to resolve them. This is because it is acknowledged by counsel for the respondent that there is an associated principle, often termed the 'common elements principle', which applies when two offences of which an offender stands convicted contain common elements so that it would be wrong to punish that offender twice for the commission of the elements that are common: Pearce v The Queen [1998] HCA 57; (1998) 194 CLR 610 [40] and Eves v The State of Western Australia

[2008] WASCA 7 [5], [10] (Steytler P) and [27] (McLure JA).

Sakkers v Thornton* [2009] WASC 175 (22 June 2009) – Western Australia Supreme Court

Section 11(1) of the Sentencing Act 1995 provides that a person is not to be sentenced twice on the same evidence. Simmonds J stated at [22] – 'Here the offence of aggravated stalking was constituted by the course of conduct whose constituents were the 12 breaches of the violence restraining order. The sentences for the 12 breaches of violence restraining order, globally, are the same as the sentence for the aggravated stalking.' As such, the global sentence for the breach offences was set aside.

Wallam v Grosveld* [2015] WASC 145 (24 April 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

Martin J at [78]: 'Those significant statutory penalties speak loudly as to the seriousness of a breach of a restraining order and dictate how closely and carefully the underlying circumstances of such an offence must be assessed in every case. In the past there have, of course, been well referenced instances where terrible crimes of violence have been committed in the community against protected persons by individuals otherwise bound by a restraining order, but who chose to ignore it. Plainly, the statutory right to apply for a VRO is meant to assist the more vulnerable to protect themselves from violence, especially (but not solely) women who are the victims of domestic violence. Thus, issues of general and specific deterrence concerning offenders are more than usually important in this arena. To that end, I note a recent report canvassing some of these issues - Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, Enhancing Laws Concerning Family and Domestic Violence, Final Report (2014)'.

Specific considerations - Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people

Due to social and cultural influences unique to the lives of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people including gender-specific cultural roles and protocols, and experiences of colonisation, dispossession, racism, assimilation and the Stolen Generations, the broader understanding of domestic and family violence applied in other Australian contexts may not fully reflect the experience of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people [Blagg et al 2015].

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people may delay reporting or be reluctant to report, assist prosecution authorities or seek help for the domestic and family violence they experience as they may fear retribution from the perpetrator or the perpetrator's family; they may fear the child protection agency will remove their children; they may distrust or fear the police [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016], criminal justice system and mainstream services where they themselves have a record of violence or offending; they may fear the perpetrator will be jailed or that he will die in custody; or they may fear gossiping and shaming by members of the local community. Some Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women with children, feeling a duty to keep the family together, may prefer that the violence stops to leaving the perpetrator whom they may continue to feel empathy for and committed to.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people may experience a range of complex factors such as a loss of traditional culture, fragmentation of kinship systems, discrimination, poverty, unemployment, homelessness, drug and alcohol misuse, and a decline in traditional gender roles and status.

In the context of deciding an appeal against sentence involving an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander man's manslaughter of his Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander defacto partner the High Court in Munda v Western Australia [2013] HCA 38 (2 October 2013) observed that while mitigating factors such as social disadvantage need to be afforded appropriate weight in sentencing, this cannot result in the imposition of a penalty which is disproportionate to the gravity of the offending. In particular, the joint majority of the High Court (French CJ, Hayne, Crennan, Kiefel, Gageler and Keane JJ) noted at [53] – 'to accept that Aboriginal offenders are in general less responsible for their actions than other persons would be to deny Aboriginal people their full measure of human dignity' and 'Further, it would be wrong to accept that a victim of violence by an Aboriginal offender is somehow less in need, or deserving, of such protection and vindication as the criminal law can provide.' The Court also addressed the argument that general deterrence has less significance in relation to crimes which are not premeditated in the context of social disadvantage. In dismissing this assertion, the Court noted that the criminal law is not limited to the 'utilitarian value of general deterrence' and stated that the obligation of the State is 'to vindicate the dignity of each victim of violence, to express the community's disapproval of that offending, and to afford such protection as can be afforded by the state to the vulnerable against repetition of violence' (see at [54]). The joint majority of the High Court (at [42]) approved the following remarks of McLure P in Western Australia v Munda [2012] WASCA 164: 'While the role of the criminal law in deterring the commission of violent acts is problematic, and particularly so in relation to Aboriginal communities, it is important to indicate very clearly that drunken violence against Aboriginal women is viewed very seriously.'

In some jurisdictions imprisonment of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander offenders is currently the most common form of punishment in domestic and family violence related matters, however researchers and judicial officers have observed that, while incarceration may give the victim some respite from the violence, it may not be effective in deterring the offender or like-minded offenders from violence in the future or in positively changing offender behaviours [Blokland 2016]. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women victims may not report violence so as to avoid the prospect of incarceration of the offender [Blagg et al 2015]; instead they may express a preference for restorative justice responses to the types of offending behaviour they believe the community can appropriately manage [Nancarrow 2006].

Restorative justice principles applied in the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander context are focused on healing and the restoration of relationships, taking into account cultural sensitivities, and provide opportunities for self-determination [Blagg et al 2015]. For example, circle sentencing is practised in some New South Wales courts where community members sit with the Magistrate in a circle to discuss the offender, the offence, and the appropriate sentence. In the Murri Court in Queensland, coupled with suitable punishment, probation orders can include regular meetings with community Elders or Community Justice Groups, attending counselling through the Indigenous Healing Centre, or attending substance misuse programs with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health organisations [Hennessy & Willie 2006]. An Australian study examining the use of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander sentencing courts, where Elders and community representatives participate as moral and cultural guides, found that offenders considered the process fairer and more supportive than the mainstream criminal justice system, while also more challenging due to the sense of shame they experienced in having to face and account to respected members of their community [Marchetti 2015].

Specific considerations - Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Key Literature

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Social Justice Commissioner, Ending family violence and abuse in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities (Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, 2006).

This report overviews a number of issues about domestic and family violence in Indigenous communities. The section titled: 'Resolving conflicts between human rights and Aboriginal customary law' (p14) makes a number of points relevant to sentencing, in particular that Indigenous custom and law can adapt to general societal change and women's right to individual safety and freedom from violence should be ensured.

Blagg, Harry, Nicole Bluett-Boyd and Emma Williams, Innovative Models In Addressing Violence Against Indigenous Women: State Of Knowledge Paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This state of knowledge paper draws on both national and international literature and policy and program evaluations, to establish what is currently known about innovative responses to violence against Indigenous women in Australia. It provides an overview of current literature about innovate justice practices that have been developed specifically for and often by Indigenous communities. The authors identify a trend towards holistic and responses. Among other things the authors identify that part of a holistic response to violence against women in Indigenous communities requires: 'The increased provision of behavioural change programs, including anger management programs and drug and alcohol programs, and the introduction of skills-oriented employment programs that are accessible and culturally appropriate.(p17) While the authors identify support for secondary and tertiary interventions (including men's behaviour change programs), they caution that programs should be culturally sensitive and specific to address the needs of Indigenous men and that logistical and administrative issues may need to be addressed (for example transport to the program.) These issues may be particularly pertinent for men living in rural and remote communities.(p13-14)

Blokland, Justice Jenny, 'Unnecessary suffering: Violence against Aboriginal women in the Northern Territory – A discussion of contemporary issues and possible ways forward' (2016) 3 Northern Territory Law Journal 3.

The author is a Justice of the Northern Territory Supreme Court. She observes that imprisonment is the most common form of punishment in cases of assaults by men against women (p. 4). She observes: 'Although incarceration as a response to violence in this setting may serve a purpose in providing respite to victims for the term of imprisonment, it is clearly not deterring like-minded offenders. More significantly, for many offenders, it is not effecting behavioural changes to stop the physical violence. All studies emphasise the need to engage men both as individuals and members of social groups to effect transformative change. Recent international literature dealing with similar problems emphasises primary, secondary and tertiary interventions, the first two being preventative to assist in reducing violence of this kind and other harmful practices'(p. 13).

In the Northern Territory, respectful relationships education to young people is being used as a primary prevention strategy to stop men and boys using violence in the first place (p. 13). Secondary measures are aimed at reducing opportunities for violence. These include the imposition of DVOs (p. 14). In terms of tertiary stage intervention, the Indigenous Family Violence Offender Program (Family Violence Program) is important. The FVP aims to re-educate and shift attitudes in relation to women. It is particularly effective when people have self-referred and is inappropriate for serious matters. Participation in the program needs to be encouraged at the first sign of offending (p. 15). 'Practitioners need to proceed with an awareness of how entrenched the ideas of control by violence are for many Aboriginal men' (p. 16).

Bolger, Audrey, Aboriginal women: A report for the Criminology Research Council and the Northern Territory Commissioner of Police (ANU, North Australian Research Unit, 1991).

The research underlying this ground breaking report was carried out in the Northern Territory in 1989-1990. Data were collected in a variety of ways, the major ways being informal talks with Aboriginal women individually or in small groups, meetings of women's organisations, or by observation of events in communities. Aboriginal men in communities who were willing to discuss the issues were also approached both as individuals and as members of Aboriginal organisations. See especially p50: 'As in other societies around the world there was still, in the final analysis, a culture of male dominance. However, it seems clear that the combination of inaccurate anthropological representations of Aboriginal women and the experience of colonisation have worked against them so that their status has deteriorated. Their situation today is affected by issues of race and gender, which intersect to influence negatively their position both within Australian society at large and within their own culture. One result of this is that they are now subject to violence from their own men of a kind which would not have been countenanced within traditional society. There are now three kinds of violence in Aboriginal society “alcoholic violence, traditional violence and bullshit traditional violence.” Women are victims of all three. By bullshit traditional violence is meant the sort of assault on women which takes place today for illegitimate reasons, often by drunken men which they then attempt to justify as a traditional right’.

Gallant, David et al ‘Aboriginal men's programs tackling family violence: A scoping review’ (2017) 20(2) Journal of Australian Indigenous Issues 48-68.

This study evaluates 11 studies of the effectiveness of interventions for Aboriginal men who commit domestic violence. A significant finding was that programs targeted at Aboriginal men must address multiple power constructs. Interventions should recognise that colonisation continues to have a significant impact on Aboriginal communities, but should not excuse the impact that men’s violence has on female victims (p 61).

Hennessy, Annette and Carolyn Willie, Sentencing Indigenous Offenders in Domestic and Family Violence Matters: A Queensland Experience. Paper presented at the ANZSOC 2006 Conference: Criminology and Human Rights, Hobart, 7-9 February 2006).

This Australian paper draws predominately on findings and observations from the Murri Court in Queensland to consider important factors that arise when sentencing indigenous offenders for domestic violence.Author Hennessey is a practicing magistrate and author Willie is a community development officer. The authors highlight the importance of ensuring that any rehabilitation aspect of sentencing is culturally appropriate and effective. They note an inequity in relation to the availability of appropriate programs for Indigenous people. Drawing on a small sample the authors explain that through the Murri Court, (a specialist sentencing court) domestic violence offenders can be placed on a probation orders, requiring regular meetings with community Elders or a Community Justice Group, attending counselling through an Indigenous Healing Centre, attending counselling for substance abuse with an indigenous health organisation and other programs as may be appropriate to the offender’s situation (p 7). The authors argue that this approach reduced short term recidivism (p 8). The authors empahsise the need to consider culturally appropriate and effective counselling and treatment for offenders whilst, at the same time, ensuring they are suitably punished (p 10).

Kelly, Judith, 'The intersection of Aboriginal customary law with the NT criminal justice system: the road not taken?' Paper presented at the NTBA, Dili, Conference 10 July 2014 Dili.

In this presentation, a judge of the Northern Territory Supreme Court considers how traditional Aboriginal law and the law of the Northern Territory can co-exist. Domestic Violence is mentioned sporadically throughout the paper and it is concluded that despite whatever used to be the norm with regard to domestic violence, traditional law has reformed and violence in any respect is no longer appropriate. The authors state that Indigenous Australians traditionally did have a different approach to violence, punishment and discipline and state: 'The practice of interpersonal violence as a form of punishment, the infliction of violent revenge, and the belief in the legitimacy of such practices, have continued through the second half of the twentieth century and beyond.' (p7)

Marchetti, Elena, 'An Australian Indigenous-Focussed Justice Response to Intimate Partner Violence: Offenders' Perceptions of the Sentencing Process' (2015) 55(1) British Journal of Criminology 86.

Abstract: 'This article draws on research conducted over the past four years on the use of Indigenous sentencing courts in Australia for sentencing Indigenous offenders of intimate partner violence (IPV). It presents interview findings of offenders' perceptions of justice of a sentencing process that involves the participation of Elders and Community Representatives, as moral and cultural guides. This study concludes that the vast majority of interview participants found an Indigenous sentencing court process is fairer than a mainstream sentencing court process despite the fact that it is more challenging and confronting facing Elders and Community Representatives when being sentenced for an IPV offence. Their respect for Elders and Community Representatives, and the respect afforded to Elders and Community Representatives by the mainstream criminal justice system created a forum that both 'shamed' and supported the offenders in ways that reflected cultural values and norms' (p. 86).

Marchetti, Elena and Kathleen Daly, 'Indigenous Partner Violence, Indigenous Sentencing Courts, and Pathways to Desistance' (2016) Violence Against Women 1.

Indigenous sentencing courts exist 'to create a more meaningful sentencing process that has a deeper impact on Indigenous offenders' attitudes and, ultimately, their behaviour. Drawing from interviews with 30

Indigenous offenders, [this paper explores] the ways in which the courts can motivate Indigenous partner violence offenders on pathways to desistence' (p.1).

The study shows that it is not impossible to change offending behaviours. Marchetti and Daly write, '[u]sing culture as a "hook for change" (Giordano, Cernkovich, & Rudolph, 2002), Indigenous perpetrators of partner violence, with a readiness to change, can find the support and motivation to desist from further offending in towns that have Indigenous sentencing courts. By "using culture" as a hook for change, we mean a rekindling of Indigenous values, and of being reminded of one's cultural heritage and identity, which requires respecting not only one's Elders, but also family, kin, and partners. When we probe with care into patterns of offending after an Indigenous sentencing process, we are able to re-define "success" by including those who are on pathways to desistance' (pp.16-17). They also note that the process of change is not 'linear and immediate, but zigzag and lengthy' (p.17).

Nancarrow, Heather 'In search of justice for domestic and family violence: Indigenous and non-Indigenous Australian women's perspectives' (2006) 10:1 Theoretical Criminology 87-106.

In this Australian research, the attitude of women towards responses to domestic violence is examined. The author interviewed 10 Indigenous women and ten non-Indigenous women (the Indigenous women in the sample were drawn from various urban and remote locations which were spread over a distance of almost 2000 kilometres and included two indigenous communities). None of the Indigenous women interviewed preferred the criminal justice system as a response to domestic and family violence (p 95). However Indigenous women did say criminal law needed to be applied in cases of homicide, serious assaults and sexual abuse of children - as these types of cases were too 'big' (sensitive) for communities to handle on their own. The majority of Indigenous women interviewed preferred restorative justice. Indigenous critique of criminal justice system (p 97): irrelevant (symbolically), it often escalated rather than ended violence and its interventions continued to separate families.

Olsen, Anna and Ray Lovett, Existing knowledge, practice and responses to violence against women in Australian Indigenous communities: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2016).

This resource provides a brief summary of published literature on Indigenous women and violence. It is based on Existing knowledge, practice and responses to violence against women in Australian Indigenous communities: State of knowledge paper. This literature review found that "the cumulative nature of socio-economic disadvantage (such as personal, family and economic related stressors) and the lasting effects of colonisation are thought to be linked to violence against women in Indigenous communities. Any attempts to reduce violence in Indigenous communities requires a multi-faceted and holistic approach including efforts to improve the wider social, economic and health of Indigenous communities".

Pascoe Gaymarani, George, 'Yolngu Ngarra Law customary law painting presentation' (2011) 4 Balance: Journal of the Northern Territory Law Society 26.

In this presentation the author (a traditional Owner for Milingiimbi, Gamurr-Guyurra, Arnhem Land, Northern Territory of Australia; leading Yolngu customary law identity and Ngarra Elder) attempts to describe the Ngarra law of Arnhem Land in order to provide access to the law for interested people, especially "white" (Balanda) lawyers. The law described is that of the Yolngu people (who speak the Yolngu matha languages). The author notes: 'domestic violence is not permitted. Domestic violence is no longer appropriate. Ngarra law has no place for domestic violence. In the past, husbands did hit their wives sometimes – this happened in both Balanda and Yolgnu society. The law – both Balanda law and Yolgnu law – allowed it to happen. Not anymore! We do not have to be ashamed of what happened in the past, but we all need to work together now as a nation.' (p28)

''Pay back' is another thing that has changed over time. When 'pay back' happened in the past, it involved physical punishment, just like in the Old Testament: 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth'. These days 'pay back' is more like a mutual obligation: when you look after my children when they visit you, I have to 'pay back' by looking after your children when they visit me. When people break the Ngarra law these days they can be punished by other means, including compensation of discipline training camps in the bush (Gunapipi).When there has been a really serious breach of law, say murder or rape, the Balanda system can take care of it. The Ngarra law can work together with the Balanda law'(p28).

Purdie Nola, Pat Dudgeon and Roz Walker, eds. Working together: Aboriginal and Torres Strait islander mental health and Well-being Principles and Practice, 2nd edition (2014, Telethon Kids).

This book includes chapters on a wide range of issues associated with Aboriginal and Torres Strait islander mental health. The editors identify that the purpose of the book is to provide an appropriate resource for a range of health professionals who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health workers, counsellors, and other staff of Indigenous health services. Chapter 1 ’Australian Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Mental Health: An Overview’ by Robert Parker provides a good summary of relevant issues, see especially from p5-7. See also chapter 10 ‘Trauma, Transgenerational Transfer and Effects on Community Well-being’ by Judy Atkinson et al.

Specific considerations - Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

2.3.8 discusses points to consider in sentencing Aboriginal offenders, however it does not deal specifically with domestic and family violence related offences.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2005).

'The Royal Commission into Aboriginal Deaths in Custody recommended that incarceration be used only as a last resort when sentencing Indigenous people. Throughout Queensland there are examples of local Indigenous community groups working constructively with the police and the courts in deterring and dealing with Indigenous crime and assisting in the sentencing process […]The Murri Court was officially opened in Brisbane in August 2002 and serves to assist Magistrates, court officers and, in particular, Indigenous defendants. The purpose of the Brisbane Murri Court is "to impose appropriate sentences by having regard to the offence committed and the defendant's personal and cultural background"' (p. 102). It takes into account cultural issues relevant to the defendant and provides a forum where Indigenous people have an input into the sentencing process. 'It seeks to overcome language and cultural barriers by having an Elder present to assist in dialogue between the defendant, Magistrate and other court officers' (p. 103).

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2016).

Chapter 10, Part VI:

"The Department of Justice and Attorney-General funds Community Justice Groups (CJGs) in a number of urban, regional and remote Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Communities in Queensland. CJGs consist of Elders, traditional owners and community members and they provide support to Indigenous people who have come into contact with Queensland's Criminal Justice System as either victims or offenders. The introduction of CJGs forms part of the Queensland Government's response to recommendations made following the Royal Commission into Aboriginal Deaths in Custody. Judges can obtain assistance with sentencing from Community Justice Groups. Section 9(2) of Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld) provides:

"In sentencing an offender, a court must have regard to –

…

(o) if the offender is an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander person—any submissions made by a representative of the community justice group in the offender's community that are relevant to sentencing the offender, including, for example:

i) the offender's relationship to the offender's community; or

ii) any cultural considerations; or

iii) any considerations relating to programs and services established for offenders in which the community justice group participates".

Section 150(1)(g) of the Youth Justice Act 1992 (Qld) is in similar terms with respect to Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander children.

The Supreme Court and District Court have also facilitated the making of CJG submissions through practice directions. Apart from assisting in the sentencing process, CJGs are also involved in providing a range of local initiatives intended to reduce crime and divert Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander offenders away from the criminal justice system." [p112]

WA

Fryer-Smith, Stephanie, Aboriginal Benchbook for Western Australia Courts (2nd ed, 2008).

Chapter 8 of the bench book deals with sentencing of Aboriginal offenders.

Chapter 8.1 Introduction

By way of introduction, the bench book notes that Aboriginal customary law 'is characterised by notions of summary justice, strict liability, payback and family/group punishment and responsibility: Bolton v Nielsen (1951) 53 WALR 48' [8.1.1]. 'Principles of substantive equality may support a special approach to the sentencing of Aboriginal offenders' [8.1.3]. The Royal Commission into Aboriginal Deaths in Custody:

National Report examined the role of sentencing in the high incarceration rate of Aboriginal people and made a number of recommendations to reduce that rate including that imprisonment should be used as a last resort, criminal records should be expunged after an appropriate time has lapsed, authorities should consult with Aboriginal communities and organisations, and an appropriate range of non-custodial sentencing options should be made available [8.1.4].

Chapter 8.3 Aboriginality

Sentencing principles: 'The same principles are to be applied in every case, irrespective of the identity of a particular offender or his membership of an ethnic or other group: Neal v the Queen (1982) 42 ALR 609; Rogers and Murray (1989) 44 A Crim R 301; State of Western Australia v Richards [2008] WASCA 134' [8.3.1].

Chapter 8.4 Aggravating factors

Domestic violence: 'The primary concern of the courts must be to protect women in the community from vicious, drunken and abusive behaviour: Woodley (1994) 76 A Crim R 302; 'Even where a complainant continues to cohabit with an offender, the court should deal with assaults upon that complainant as it would a member of the wider community: Woodley (1994) 76 A Crim R 302; 'Courts cannot deal with the core problem of an offender being unable to resist the use of physical violence when intoxicated and angered by his/her partner's conduct: Woodley (1994) 76 A Crim R 302; Daniel (1997) 94 A Crim R 96' [8.4.1].

Chapter 8.5 Mitigating factors

Facts existing only by reason of ethnicity, circumstances underlying alcohol/substance abuse, emotional stress, cultural dislocation, effect of removal from family, socio-economic factors, the impact of imprisonment, customary punishment, the wishes of the Aboriginal community, the impact of traditional belief.

Specific considerations - Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Other Resources [Former] Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Reconciliation Action Plan 2019 – 2021.

"This RAP provides a platform to introduce practical measures to promote reconciliation, and addresses some of the barriers faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. It also prioritises establishing relationships with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and community leaders, agencies servicing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, legal services and other stakeholders, in order to assist Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples to access the Court."

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Experience of the Courts (2016).

See p6: 'this report is a summary of consultations undertaken by the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity. As such, the views expressed in the document are those of stakeholders who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait women. The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;
- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Indigenous women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

At p7: 'Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women had trouble communicating in the language of the justice system, adversely impacting on their ability to deal with police, engage with support services including legal representatives, and communicate with court staff and judicial officers.'

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity Website.

The Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity is an advisory body formed to assist Australian courts, judicial officers and administrators to positively respond to the diverse needs of the judiciary, including the particular issues that arise in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. This website includes a number of useful resources and links.

Law Society Northern Territory, Indigenous Protocols for Lawyers (second edition, 2015).

This handbook is written for lawyers and identifies and discusses six protocols to assist lawyers in communicating with their clients. See p5 which sets out the six protocols. The remaining part of the document discusses these protocols in depth.

Protocol 1:	Assess whether an interpreter is needed before proceeding to take instructions.
Protocol 2:	Engage the services of a registered, accredited interpreter through the Aboriginal Interpreter Service.
Protocol 3:	Explain your role to the client.
Protocol 4:	Explain the relevant legal or court process to the client prior to taking instructions.
Protocol 5:	Use ‘plain English’ to the greatest extent possible.
Protocol 6:	Assess whether your client has a hearing or other impairment that may affect their ability to understand

Specific considerations - Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Munda v Western Australia [2013] HCA 38 (2 October 2013) – High Court of Australia

The majority at [53]: ‘Mitigating factors must be given appropriate weight, but they must not be allowed "to lead to the imposition of a penalty which is disproportionate to the gravity of the instant offence." It would be contrary to the principle stated by Brennan J in Neal to accept that Aboriginal offending is to be viewed systemically as less serious than offending by persons of other ethnicities. To accept that Aboriginal offenders are in general less responsible for their actions than other persons would be to deny Aboriginal people their full measure of human dignity. It would be quite inconsistent with the statement of principle in Neal to act upon a kind of racial stereotyping which diminishes the dignity of individual offenders by consigning them, by reason of their race and place of residence, to a category of persons who are less capable than others of decent behaviour. Further, it would be wrong to accept that a victim of violence by an Aboriginal offender is somehow less in need, or deserving, of such protection and vindication as the criminal law can provide’.

At [55]: ‘A consideration with a very powerful claim on the sentencing discretion in this case is the need to recognise that the appellant, by his violent conduct, took a human life, and, indeed, the life of his de facto spouse. A just sentence must accord due recognition to the human dignity of the victim of domestic violence and the legitimate interest of the general community in the denunciation and punishment of a brutal, alcohol-fuelled destruction of a woman by her partner. A failure on the part of the state to mete out a just punishment of violent offending may be seen as a failure by the state to vindicate the human dignity of the victim; and to impose a lesser punishment by reason of the identity of the victim is to create a group of second-class citizens, a state of affairs entirely at odds with the fundamental idea of equality before the law’.

Reid v Smith [2014] ACTSC 349 (21 October 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Penfold ACJ at [24]: In Bugmy v The Queen, the High Court said at [37],[41],[44],[44]: ‘An Aboriginal offender's deprived background may mitigate the sentence that would otherwise be appropriate for the offence in the same way that the deprived background of a non-Aboriginal offender may mitigate that offender's sentence… the appellant's submission that courts should take judicial notice of the systemic background of deprivation of Aboriginal offenders cannot be accepted. It, too, is antithetical to individualised justice. Aboriginal Australians as a group are subject to social and economic disadvantage measured across a range of indices, but to recognise this is to say nothing about a particular Aboriginal offender. In any case in which it is sought to rely on an offender's background of deprivation in mitigation of sentence, it is necessary to point to material tending to establish that background… An offender's childhood exposure to extreme violence and alcohol abuse may explain the offender's recourse to violence when frustrated such that the offender's moral culpability for the inability to control that impulse may be substantially reduced. However, the inability to control the violent response to frustration may increase the importance of protecting the community from the offender'.

At [27]: '[W]hile the decision in Bugmy is certainly relevant to the sentencing of aboriginal offenders, it is also relevant in clarifying that a claim of failure to give adequate weight to particular considerations arising in such a sentencing is not a useful appeal ground. While it might have been an error on the Magistrate's part if she had entirely disregarded Mr Reid's somewhat troubled background, her Honour instead made specific mention of it. The fact that she did not as a result grant as much leniency to Mr Reid as he apparently hoped for does not establish a specific error of the kind alleged'.

Drew v R* [2016] NSWCCA 310 (16 December 2016) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

At [84], N Adams J held –

> '…A Court may not aggravate an offence by taking judicial notice of the fact that some Aboriginal women might be less likely to complain of domestic violence because of a culture of silence and ostracism in their communities. Whether or not the victim in each case is in such a class of vulnerable victims will always be a matter that must be proved beyond reasonable doubt based on the evidence in that case.'

At [88], her Honour states –

> 'It is notorious that offences committed within the context of domestic violence are under-reported and that such under-reporting is not confined to Indigenous communities.'

At [89], her Honour states –

> 'High rates of non-disclosure by Indigenous victims of domestic violence have been attributed, among other things, to the potential for stigma and ostracism from family and community members. Indigenous victims may also, for historical and pragmatic reasons, fear contact with police and the courts or regard the authorities as unable to help them'

Emitja v The Queen* [2016] NTCCA 4 (21 October 2016) – Northern Territory Court of Criminal Appeal

Grant CJ and Kelly J quoted from Amagula v White (unreported, Northern Territory Supreme Court, 7 January 1998): 'The courts must do what they can to see that the pervasive violence against women in Aboriginal communities is reduced. There is a fairly widespread belief that it is acceptable for men to bash their wives in some circumstances; this belief must be erased'.

Their Honours continued at [32]-[34]: 'As this Court has repeatedly observed before and since that statement was made, such conduct must be dealt with in a manner which reflects the serious nature of the offending and its corrosive effect on well-being in Aboriginal communities'.

While 'some Aboriginal communities have an unusually high incidence of serious crimes of violence and that the courts are powerless to alleviate the dysfunction and deprivation which underlies that violence. Aboriginal women and children living in those communities 'are entitled to equality of treatment in the law's responses to offences against them'. The protection which the law affords includes the imposition of sentences which include a component designed to deter other members of the community from committing crimes of that nature'.

There are also practical societal reasons to consider personal and general deterrence. As in The Queen v Haji-Noor: 'The offender's crime against Mr Ellis was committed in a domestic context. Domestic violence is a leading contributor to death, disability and illness in the community. Such violence affects the whole community. Medical and hospital treatment for the victims of domestic violence is extremely costly and imposes a considerable strain on the health system and those who work in it'.

R v Stevenson* [2015] NTSC – Sentencing Remarks 21353266 (Kelly J) (14 September 2015) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

Kelly J: 'Taking away somebody's life is one of the most serious crimes anyone can commit. I have to give you a sentence that says just how much the court and the whole community disapproves of violent crimes like this and that will discourage other men from doing the same thing. Drunken violence is far too common in our community. It is particularly common, unfortunately, in Aboriginal communities and vulnerable Aboriginal women, vulnerable people of all kinds, deserve the fullest protection that the law can give them'.

R v MBY [2014] QCA 17 (18 February 2014) – Queensland Court of Appeal

Morrison JA at [67] and [69] discussing High Court authority: 'Properly understood, the High Court [in Bugmy v the Queen] was going no further than to say that the deprived background of an offender, be they Aboriginal or otherwise, and whether or not derived from a situation of endemic alcohol abuse and alcohol fuelled violence, may mitigate the sentence imposed on the offender because of its impact on the assessment of moral culpability. However, the proper weight to be given to that factor will depend upon the particular case. Further, the weight that is given to such a factor, in terms of mitigation, will depend upon the interplay of considerations relevant to sentencing, including punishment, protection of society, personal deterrence and general deterrence'.

'The High Court [in Munda v Western Australia]…said: 'Mitigating factors must be given appropriate weight, but they must not be allowed "to lead to the imposition of a penalty which is disproportionate to the gravity of the instant offence"'.

R v Bell & Anor; ex parte Attorney-General (Qld) [1994] QCA 220 (20 June 1994) – Queensland Court of Appeal

The appellant was an Aboriginal man. Fitzgerald P: 'It was right for [the sentencing judge] to have regard to the respondent's disadvantages and open to him, as a result, to sentence the respondent as leniently as the circumstances of his offence admitted. However, such disadvantages do not justify or excuse violence against women or, to take another example, abuse of children. Women and children who live in deprived communities or circumstances should not also be deprived of the law's protection. A proposition that such offences should not be adequately penalised because of disadvantages experienced by a group of which an offender is a member is not one which is acceptable to the general community or one which we would expect to be accepted by the particular community of which an offender and complainant are members'.

R v Kina [1993] QCA 480 (29 November 1993) – Queensland Court of Appeal

Fitzgerald P and Davis JA: 'In this matter, there were, insufficiently recognised, a number of complex factors interacting which presented exceptional difficulties of communication between her legal representatives and the appellant because of: (i) her aboriginality; (ii) the battered woman syndrome; and (iii) the shameful (to her) nature of the events which characterised her relationship with the deceased. These cultural, psychological and personal factors bore upon the adequacy of the advice and legal representation which the appellant received and effectively denied her satisfactory representation or the capacity to make informed decisions on the basis of proper advice'.

Wongawol v The State of Western Australia [2011] WASCA 222 (17 October 2011) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [39]: 'This is a case where the protection of the community in which the appellant lives and both personal and general deterrence are very weighty sentencing considerations. The incidence of alcohol and drug fuelled violence within Aboriginal communities is distressingly high. A new generation of children are scarred. The cycle continues'.

R v Nelson [2017] SASCFC (8 May 2017) – Supreme Court of South Australia (Full Court)

"It was necessary for the sentencing judge to take into account, as his Honour did, the defendant's background of disadvantage and social deprivation arising from his upbringing in a traditional and remote Aboriginal community. However, the fact that … the defendant had very recently been released after a period of imprisonment imposed for two assaults on a different female drinking companion operated to reduce the leniency that his personal circumstances might otherwise have attracted. Moreover, the attack by the defendant upon his domestic partner was particularly brutal and has had grave consequences for her … The sentence did not give appropriate effect to the views consistently expressed by this Court concerning the need to give significant weight to considerations of specific and general deterrence when sentencing defendants who have engaged in serious domestic violence." Parker J stated at [45]-[47].

Listening to victims

In recent decades researchers [Booth 2012] and practitioners involved in reform of court procedures have given greater attention to the merits of allowing victims to participate in some way in the sentencing process. More generally, it is better understood that many victims have certain expectations of the criminal justice system [Clark 2010], including that their experiences will be taken seriously and validated [Anderson 2015], and that they will be provided a forum though which they are able to voice their experiences [Bluett-Boyd & Fileborn 2014]. In a sentencing context however, victims' expectations must be balanced with the need to maintain the integrity of the court in an adversarial system.

The purpose of a sentencing hearing is for the judicial officer to determine the appropriate sentence according to the law. Within legislative constraints, the judicial officer exercises their discretion having regard to the available evidence regarding relevant factors. The victim is not a party to proceedings that have resulted in the finding that an offence has been committed, for example where a person is found to have breached a protection order; and yet they are directly affected by the offending behaviour and possibly by the sentence. A victim's emotional need to be heard by the court—to be given the opportunity to explain the impact of the offender's violence—should be accommodated where possible [Booth 2012].

One way of enabling a victim's involvement in sentencing is through a victim impact statement that is submitted, quoted from, or read aloud to the court. These are not permitted in relation to some offences. Where permitted, bench books [Other Bench Books] advise that sentencing courts must treat the victim's statements with caution. For example, the victim may express forgiveness towards the offender. A victim may, as a result of the domestic and family violence they have experienced, be pressured or coerced by the perpetrator or the perpetrator's family members and friends to present a view of the harm experienced, the offender and the offence that is not commensurate with the seriousness of the offender's behaviour, the resulting harm and future risk [Klein 2009].

Research clearly acknowledges healing and restorative benefits to some victims in giving their account of their experiences of violence to the court, orally or in writing, provided they are fully informed of the limits of their capacity to influence sentencing outcomes [Herman 2005].

Listening to victims - Key Literature

Australia

Bluett-Boyd, Nicole and Bianca Fileborn, 'Victim/survivor-focused justice responses and reforms to criminal court practice: Implementation, current practice and future directions' (Research Paper No 27, Australian Institute of Family Studies, Australian Government, 2014).

This report focuses on possible law reform aimed at meeting victim/survivor needs in sexual assault matters, it contains relevant observations to listening to victims. Participants in the research identified a number of victim/survivor justice needs including: receiving emotional support and counselling; having a voice and being heard; being believed; having their version of events vindicated; being informed about the status of their case; being educated as to how the criminal justice system works, the reason for processes such as cross-examination, what acquittals and convictions mean, and so forth; avoiding having to constantly retell their story; being able to give evidence remotely; confronting their perpetrator in a public setting; their perpetrator being brought to justice or being convicted; and having closure and a sense of finality to their experience (p. 21). There is a useful table (p. 27) that provides a summary of the key justice needs of victim/survivors across the criminal justice process. (p. 28).

Booth, Tracey '"Cooling out" victims of crime: Managing victim participation in the sentencing process in a superior sentencing court' (2012) 45(2) Australian & New Zealand Journal of Criminology 214-230.

This research draws on an observation study of 18 sentencing hearings in the NSW Supreme Court, selected randomly from published court lists, between July 2007 and December 2008. The study was supplemented with digital copies of the transcripts of 16 of the 18 hearings and 22 of the 30 Victim Impact Statements (VISs) read aloud in those hearings. Although not focussed on domestic and family violence cases specifically, this study found that victims reading out VISs did raise the emotional tension in the hearings but that any potential adverse impact was managed and contained through various cooling out processes and structures. Relevant here are the cooling out processes in the courtroom that operate to defuse the expression of victim distress and/or anger and lessen the strains of the ordeal of presenting VISs. For example the author points to judge's remarks that recognised the victims' interests and status as victims in the particular matter by acknowledging their disappointment and taking the time to explain the legal position around VISs to them (p225, 226). She notes 'empathic responses to the plight of the family victims were fundamental to the cooling out processes…'(p226).

Clark, Haley, ''What is the justice system willing to offer?' Understanding sexual assault victim/survivors' criminal justice needs' [2010] (85) Family Matters 1.

This article includes some relevant observations about what victims expect from the criminal justice system. The findings are drawn from interviews with 22 adult victim / survivors:

- Justice: 'Participants emphasised that establishing justice was integral to criminal justice system responses, but the meaning of 'justice' differed considerably according to individual participants. For some, justice involved retribution, while others sought official acknowledgement of the crimes, and yet others felt that community safety was their primary justice goal' (p. 30).
- Information: Victim/ survivors emphasised the value of having clear accessible information about the criminal justice system and its procedures including practical information about the various stages of the system, the key players, their role in the procedures, the potential implications for them of the legal processes, and possible outcomes. Such information was considered important as it allowed them to make informed decisions about engaging with the system, and to prepare for the criminal justice processes' (p. 31).
- Validation: 'Expressing belief to victims/survivors is recognised as being necessary to their healing process, and corresponds with reduced victim trauma and increased help-seeking. In terms of procedural justice for victims, being believed is a stepping stone to attaining acknowledgement, validation, victim status and support. Victims/survivors in this study expressed that being believed by system officials was essential in criminal justice responses' (p. 32).
- Voice: Participants advocated for a forum through which they could voice their experience. For many, the most customary place for this was a courtroom. Many stipulated that they wanted their 'day in court'. (pp. 33-34).
- Control: Many identified their lack of control over the process (p. 34).

Sentencing Advisory Council, Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family violence Intervention Orders: Final Report (2009).

This is a report compiled by the Sentencing Advisory Council Victoria on Intervention Orders in Victoria; it includes a consideration of the penalties awarded for breach of intervention orders. The Council compiled the report by reviewing relevant literature on family data, analysing data on sentencing and conducting new research by consulting those involved in the sentencing process (magistrates, court staff, Victoria Police, community legal centre representatives, family violence service providers, defence lawyers, workers from men's family violence programs and a family violence victims' support group). It found that the sanctions imposed during sentencing for breach of a family violence order were considered by most stakeholders to be far too lenient (viii) it noted that in sentencing an offender for breach of an order, the protection of the community, which encompasses ensuring the future safety and protection of the victim should be the central purpose against which all other sentencing purposes are balanced (ix).

International

Anderson, Kristin 'Victims' Voices and Victims' Choices in Three IPV Courts' (2015) 21 (1) Violence Against Women 105.

This article in written in the context of USA where there is significant debate about mandatory processes. Drawing on current literature, this paper provides a helpful overview of the key debates about mandatory policies. It draws a distinction between voice and choice, suggesting that allowing victims a voice while accepting that in certain contexts they may not have a choice is a compromise position. The author also reports on an observational study of court processes. The author comments 'courts that provided victims with an opportunity to be heard also validated the harm of domestic violence, communicated that the wishes of victims were important, and demonstrated the worth of victims by treating them with respect'.(p121)

Cattaneo, Lauren Bennett et al, 'Intimate partner violence victims' accuracy in assessing their risk of re-abuse' (2007) 22(6) Journal of Family Violence, 429.

This paper reports on an exploratory study undertaken in the USA primarily involving low-income African American women. It provides a discussion of the literature on the reliability of victim's assessment of their level of risk of future domestic violence. The authors identify that prediction of re-abuse or assessment of danger is a major research focus in the area of intimate partner violence. They observe that victims choose certain courses of action based on their assessments of how much danger they are in. They also note that taking these assessments into account is often a key component of counselling victims or making system-related decisions. While the authors conclude that overall, their findings document victims' considerable strengths in accurately assessing their risk of re-abuse, they also note considerable limitations to their study and with other research currently available.

Dancig-Rosenberg, Hadar and Dana Pugach, 'Pain, Love and the Voice: The Role of Domestic Violence Victims in Sentencing' (2012) 18(2) Michigan Journal of Gender and Law 423-483.

The article is predominately theoretical and draws on past literature. See from p465 in relation to the question: should consideration be given to the request of women living under the shadow of violence to impose lighter sentences? The article identifies a complex range of views based on a review of literature. For example on one view refusing to consider the apparently "irrational" request by women to lighten the sentence of their violent partners is actually a device for protecting them, preserving their dignity and creating a "protective space" for them in which the dynamic of men controlling them will not succeed.(p467). Also conceiving the phenomenon of domestic violence as one that endangers the peace and security of society as a whole is consistent with the desire to follow an uncompromising policy that does not take into account the wishes of the individual woman (p468). On the other hand the authors note that some people argue that respecting women's requests for leniency is an empowering mechanism that is adapted to female ethical thinking. Giving voice is an act of empowerment particularly where the experience of victimization entails repression and control (p469).

Erez, Edna, Julie L Globokar and Peter R Ibarra, 'Outsiders inside: Victim management in an era of participatory reform' (2014) 20(1) International Review of Victimology 169.

This article identifies the issues associated with victims' participation in court processes: stress placed on victims during court proceedings because of the emotions associated with the crime; victims' apprehension regarding the legal process and its uncertain outcomes; logistical challenges and disruptions posed to victims' daily lives, particularly in the context of prolonged court cases. Professionals noted that the emotional stress of involvement can be exacerbated when the victim and defendant are known to one another, such as with cases of domestic violence and intrafamilial sex crimes, in which victims may be particularly fearful of, or struggle with a sense of allegiance to, the defendant. (p. 174).

Fisher, Hilary, 'Justice for Women: From Reporting to Sentencing.' Presented at the All Party Parliamentary Group on Domestic and Sexual Violence Inquiry, Paris, 9 December 2013.

This paper, prepared on behalf of Women's Aid (England) is the culmination of submissions discussing key issues affecting women experiencing domestic violence, including their experience of the criminal justice system. Conclusions with regard specifically to sentencing (p 5): Many respondents (both organisations and individual survivors) believed that perpetrators received very minimal sentences, with no support to prevent reoffending on their release. Many respondents submitted that women frequently report their abusers being given a longer sentence for assaulting strangers than them, this results in them feeling worthless and the perpetrator with the message that domestic violence is a lesser crime.

Harne, Lynne and Jill Radford, Tackling Domestic Violence: theories, policies and practice (Open University Press, 2008).

Chapter 4 and 5 consider criminal interventions in domestic violence cases including sentencing. Of relevance the authors note that many victims of domestic and family violence expressed fears of further violence once a perpetrator program had ended and felt that being referred to a program was a soft option – the program was only effective when combined with the sanction of imprisonment for further violence.

Herman, Judith Lewis, 'Justice From the Victim's Perspective' (2005) 11(5) Violence Against Women 571.

The author draws on interviews with 22 victims of violent crime. She argues that survivors' views of justice do not fit well into either retributive or restorative models. This has implications for current efforts to use restorative models in cases of violence against women' (p. 571). She observes that the wishes and needs of victims are often diametrically opposed to the requirements of legal proceedings. Victims need:

- social acknowledgement and support; the court requires them to endure a public challenge to their credibility;

- to establish a sense of power and control over their lives; the court requires them to submit to a complex set of rules and bureaucratic procedures that they may not understand and over which they have no control.
- an opportunity to tell their stories in their own way, in a setting of their choice; the court requires them to respond to a set of yes-or-no questions that break down any personal attempt to construct a coherent and meaningful narrative.
- to control or limit their exposure to specific reminders of the trauma; the court requires them to relive the experience. Victims often fear direct confrontation with their perpetrators; the court requires a face-to-face confrontation between a complaining witness and the accused. Indeed, if one set out intentionally to design a system for provoking symptoms of traumatic stress, it might look very much like a court of law (p. 574).

The most important object for participants in interacting with the justice system was to gain validation from the community. This required an acknowledgment of the basic facts of the crime and an acknowledgement of harm. Beyond acknowledgment, what survivors sought must frequently was vindication. The wanted their communities to take a clear and unequivocal stand in condemnation of the offence (p. 585).

Klein, Andrew, Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (National Institute of Justice (US), 2009).

This report reviews research in the United States on domestic violence to determine what works best in protecting victims and stopping abuse. It review the available studies and literature about sentencing. Specifically it suggests that victim preferences should generally not be taken in to account, from p*53:* ‘Although victim perceptions of the dangerousness of suspects have been found to be good predictors of subsequent revictimization], victim preferences on how the case should be disposed are not good predictors. The victims in the Quincy, Mass., study who wanted the charges dropped were as likely to be revictimized (51 percent vs. 48 percent after one year) as those who did not want the charges dropped. Similarly, studies in New York found that victim cooperation with prosecutors did not predict recidivism. In other words, when judges imposed sentences to which victims objected, these victims were no more or less likely to be revictimized than victims who wanted their abusers to be prosecuted and sentenced.’

Listening to victims - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (updated 2021).

This bench book discusses the experience of court processes of a range of vulnerable groups (Aboriginal people, people from CALD backgrounds, people of a particular religious affiliation, people with disabilities, children and young people, women, GLBTIQ people, and older people). The discussion is mostly not specific to proceedings relating to domestic and family violence matters, however the practical guidance provided to judicial officers is likely to be useful in those proceedings, including considerations of the victim's circumstances and vulnerabilities, and the impact of the behaviour, crime, decision and/or sentence on the victim.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (updated 2022).

[See 63.500] Domestic Violence Offences

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

4.2 discusses criminal offences in the context of family violence, including the relevance of the attitude of the victim.

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Sentencing Manual (2022).

This manual provides comprehensive overview on sentencing generally in Victoria.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

See general [10.4] Practical Considerations.

See also [13.9.8] Sentencing other decisions and judgment writing

Points to consider:

- If a witness is not personally capable of giving a victim impact statement for any reason, consider whether it is appropriate for someone else to do so on the victim's behalf
- Consider whether to quote from a victim impact statement in court.

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

See Section 5.4.2: What if the targeted person has forgiven the past abuse and violence?: '[d]omestic violence is a cumulative phenomenon… The fact that a targeted person has forgiven or reconciled does not erase DV or the accumulating damage it causes. Forgiveness does not erase the effects on children or the association between domestic violence and parenting deficits. In other words, evidence of past domestic violence, forgiven or not, is both necessary and pertinent to decisions about adult safety, risk assessment, and child custody and access.'

Listening to victims - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Vincent [2018] ACTSC 347 (12 December 2018) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

At [13], his Honour noted –

> 'Expressions of reconciliation by victims of domestic violence are often a regrettable reflection of the dominance of the abuser.'

R v Stanley [2015] ACTSC 322 (12 October 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge ACJ at [71]-[74]: 'The victim prepared a victim impact statement which the Crown Prosecutor read out. That can be important as it then is clear that the offender has heard what the victim has to say. It was difficult to hear that victim impact statement without experiencing some of the pain and hurt that the victim described. Courts know of the serious effects of such violence and invasions of the bodily integrity of victims but it is very valuable to hear the voices of the victims and understand how the hurt and damage can be different for each victim.'

R v Mazaydeh [2014] ACTSC 325 (13 November 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Murrell CJ at [15]-[16]: 'These offences occurred in the context of a previous relationship between the offender and the victim and involved violence within the victim's home, an apparent sense of entitlement on the part of the offender, and humiliation through verbal and text abuse of the victim.

'The sentencing purposes of punishment, general deterrence and denunciation are very important, as well as the recognition of harm to the victim personally and the community generally through offences of this nature. The victim provided a victim impact statement in which she referred to impacts upon her of the type that frequently result from offences of domestic violence, including feelings of anxiety, difficulty sleeping, difficulty concentrating at work and elsewhere, and an adverse effect on her ability to form relationships. Since the incident, the victim has moved house because she felt unsafe in the apartment where the offence occurred'.

Guy v Anderson* [2013] ACTSC 5 (14 January 2013) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [78]-[79]: 'I also accept that the fact that the complainant and Mr Guy have reconciled needs to be approached cautiously. I did not detect any error in her Honour's approach to this issue which, in fact, she hardly mentioned. Forgiveness by victims of domestic violence offences is highly problematic and must be treated with considerable caution for the reasons outlined by Simpson J in R v Glen [1994] NSWCCA 1 (19 December 1994) at 8. As her Honour said, "the victim's attitude to sentencing … was not a matter which should have influenced the sentencing decision." See also R v Palu [2002] NSWCCA 381; (2002) 134 A Crim R 174 at 183–4; [37]; R v Burton [2008] NSWCCA 128 at [102]–[105].

'In Shaw v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA 58, Fullerton J, with whom McClellan CJ at CL and Grove J agreed, confirmed that approach (at [27]) but did point out (at [45]) that the reconciliation of the complainant and the offender (as opposed to her forgiveness) can be relevant as to prospects of rehabilitation. That is also clearly relevant here'.

Talukder v Dunbar* [2009] ACTSC 42 (16 April 2009) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [82]: 'In my view, there is a great danger in putting a victim of domestic violence in the position where they are seen to have some power to influence a sentence. This is often likely to be an intolerable choice between the bonds of affection which often persist despite the violence and their need for protection against recurrence and for the offender to be held accountable'.

R v Quach* [2002] NSWCCA 173 (15 May 2002) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

O'Keefe J at [28]: 'The fact that he expressed contrition to his wife and that she said that she forgave him did not detract from the duty of the judge to impose a proper sentence. Her views in relation to the contrition of the Applicant, as opposed to what he said to her, do not seem to have been tested. Furthermore, even the stated acceptance by the victim of her acceptance of her attacker's contrition does not bind the court, nor does it detract from the need to give proper weight to the principle of general deterrence, Regina v Kanj

[2000] NSWCCA 408, a principle that is important in cases of domestic violence (Regina v Green [2001] NSWCCA 258; Regina v Glen [1994] NSWCCA unreported 19 December 1994). Furthermore, the fact that a victim may forgive her attacker is not determinative. Indeed, its weight in relation to general deterrence will be a variable depending on the offence and the circumstances. It is a matter for judgment by the sentencing judge'.

R v Glen* [1994] NSWCCA 1 (19 December 1994) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Simpson J: 'In my opinion, exceptional caution should be exercised in the receipt, and the use, of evidence of that kind [general evidence of forgiveness and desire that the assailant/ partner not be imprisoned] in cases that fall within the general description of domestic violence offences, of which this case is one. It is a fact known to the courts and to the community that victims of domestic violence frequently, and clearly contrary to their own interests and welfare, forgive their attackers. It is said, and has been said so often and for so long as to be almost notorious, that it was this pattern of post offence forgiveness, accompanied by apparent remorse or contrition on the part of the offender, that prevented the prosecution of such offenders. In turn, it appeared that the victim of domestic violence was in a class different to the rest of the community insofar as the protection of the law was concerned. Domestic violence was not seen as a crime which attracted the sanction of the law in the same way or to the same extent as other crimes, whether or not of violence. The perpetrator of domestic violence was relatively safe to commit crimes with impunity, at least provided he or she (and, in the cases that have to date come before the courts, it has almost invariably been he) could attain the victim's forgiveness.

'There are two main arguments of principle against the proposition that this Court should give any weight to the expressed wish of the victim in this case that the applicant not be incarcerated. The first concerns the importance, especially great in cases of domestic violence, given the history that I have alluded to, of general deterrence. This Court must send a signal to domestic violence offenders that, regardless of self interest denying forgiveness on the part of victims, those victims will nevertheless receive the full protection of the law, insofar as the courts are able to afford it to them. It must not be forgotten, that, if it is to be accorded weight by the courts, forgiveness by the victim also operates contrary to the interests of other victims. Until it is recognised that domestic violence will be treated with severe penalties regardless of a later softening of attitude by the victim, no progress is likely to be made in its abolition or reduction. Put simply, the importance of general deterrence in such cases overrides any minor relevance that evidence of forgiveness might have.

‘For too long the community in general and the agencies of law enforcement in particular, have turned their backs upon the helpless victims of domestic violence. Acceptance of the victim's word that he/she forgives the offender, casts too great a burden of responsibility upon one individual already in a vulnerable position. Neither the community, the law enforcement agencies, nor the courts can be permitted to abdicate their responsibility in this fashion. Protection of the particular victim in the particular case is a step towards protection of other victims in other cases.

‘The second reason of principle for treating with extreme caution the evidence of the forgiveness of the victim in the circumstances of this case is that the legislature has, since 1982, made clear its intention that special considerations apply to offences of domestic violence’.

R v Kershaw* [2005] NSWCCA 56 (1 March 2005) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Bryson JA at [24]: ‘In cases involving domestic violence it happens from time to time that a complainant is shown to have a forgiving and optimistic attitude about violence in the relationship which it is difficult for others to understand or share. The sentencing process is not and of course should not be in the hands of complainants, and the merciful or relenting attitude of a complainant does not reduce the gravity of the offence and does not have much effect on the interest of justice in imposing an appropriate sentence. Cf R v. Glen (unreported, NSWCCA, 19 December 1994) per Simpson J’.

Walker v Verity* [2010] NTSC 68 (7 December 2010) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

Barr J at [40]-[41]: ‘I accept the respondent’s submission that in domestic violence cases such as the present, the importance of general deterrence may well override any relevance that evidence of forgiveness might have: R v Rowe; that in cases involving domestic violence, the sentencing process is not and should not be in the hands of complainant victims; and that the merciful or relenting attitude of a complainant does not reduce the gravity of the offence and does not have much effect on the interest of justice in imposing an appropriate sentence: Regina v Kershaw. In my opinion those statements of principle are equally applicable here, where the victim’s attitude was not one of forgiveness as such, but rather one of claimed insight into the appellant’s alcoholism, leading to her belief as to the need for a non-custodial disposition’.

R v Murray* [2014] QCA 160 (18 July 2014) – Queensland Court of Appeal

McMurdo P at [35]: 'The offence was a serious example of grievous bodily harm in a domestic violence situation. It required a deterrent sentence, both generally and personally. His recidivism also made the protection of those with whom he forms intimate relationships a relevant factor in sentencing. The fact that the young Ms Coolwell, the victim of her abusive relationship with the applicant, was a reluctant complainant is not a mitigating feature. The only matters in his favour were his guilty plea and his dysfunctional background'.

Commissioner of Police v DGM* [2016] QDC 022 (15/3279) Kingham DCJ 22 February 2016 – District Court of Queensland

Kingham DCJ at [33]-[35]: 'On appeal, the prosecutor submitted the sentencing Magistrate placed too much weight on this factor. Ongoing support of the victim is often a feature of domestic violence and can be associated with repeat offending against that victim.

'Courts in Queensland and in other states of Australia, have recognised the need to approach submissions about reconciliation with real caution, because of the particular features of domestic and family violence. The fact that a victim is a reluctant complainant is not a mitigating factor (R v Murray [2014] QCA 160 at [35]). Likewise, reconciliation after the victim has complained ought not mitigate the sentence.

'There may be cases in which reconciliation is relevant to an offender's prospects of rehabilitation (Shaw v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA 58). However, that comes from the offender's conduct, not the victim's forgiveness. The nature of the relationship means victims may, contrary to their own welfare, forgive their attacker. That does not reduce the risk posed by the offender and, depending on the dynamics in a particular relationship, it could well exacerbate the risk. Necessarily, prospects of rehabilitation must be assessed by reference to the offender's attitude and conduct, not the victim's.

'Even if the complainant's support for Mr DGM is relevant, it is only one factor to be considered on sentence (R v O'Neill [2006] QCA 383 at p.6). Denunciation and deterrence are the dominant considerations on sentence for such offences (R v King [2006] QCA 466 at [18]; R v Rowe (1996) 89 A Crim R 467 (3 October 1996); Pasinis v R [2014] VSCA 97 at [15]; Guy v Anderson [2013] ACTSC 5 at [78]'.

Craill v Police* [2016] SASC 168 (4 November 2016) – Supreme Court of South Australia

Stanley J at [33], [36]: 'While the attitude of the victim to an offence is not an irrelevant factor in sentencing (Coulthard v Kennedy (1992) 60 A Crim R 415), that attitude cannot be determinative of what constitutes an appropriate sentence. Moreover, this principle must be applied with considerable caution in cases of domestic violence.

'The reason for such caution is obvious. In situations of domestic violence a victim's motivation for advocating a particular penalty is often influenced by their ongoing relationship with the defendant and an unhealthy relationship of dependency between them. Their attitude is often influenced by apprehension about the consequences for them in the future given a continuing relationship with the defendant. This attitude frequently fails to reflect what is in their best interests and what the court might consider appropriate in all the circumstances. It would be contrary to sound sentencing practice to place victims of domestic violence in the position where they hold, or appear to hold, the keys to the offender's release. To place victims in that position is to impose on them a burden they ought not be required to bear (R v Fadah [1999] NSWCCA 267 at [26])'.

Director of Public Prosecutions (Acting) v J C N* [2015] TASFC 13 (27 November 2015)– Supreme Court of Tasmania

Pearce J at [18], [20]: 'Thus, because the respondent is charged with family violence offences, he is not to be granted bail unless he satisfies this Court that his release on bail would not be likely to adversely affect the safety, wellbeing and interests of the complainant and her children. The Act thereby creates a presumption against bail: Re S [2005] TASSC 89; (2005) 157 A Crim R 451. The onus is on the respondent to displace the presumption: Olsen v State of Tasmania [2005] TASSC 40.

'The respondent also deposes, in a recent affidavit, that the complainant "is not afraid of my release". What is to be conveyed by that proposition is not entirely clear. It may mean simply that the complainant is "not afraid". It may also be intended to carry an inference that the complainant supports the respondent's release on bail. In the absence of evidence from the complainant, it is not possible to make findings about such matters, but some comments can be made. The response to family violence is often complex. Family violence offences are not uncommonly accompanied by support of a perpetrator by a victim and reluctance on the part of the victim to assist a criminal prosecution. That is so for a range of possible factors including fear and a wish to preserve relationships, even dysfunctional and violent ones, for the sake of loyalty, affection, companionship, economic and domestic support. Sometimes those motivations are misguided but persist nevertheless. As a result, victims sometimes act in a way that seems to an objective observer to be incongruous and difficult to understand. In such cases a court has a duty to consider the interests of persons who may be affected by family violence and, if necessary, act to protect them. By doing so it may sometimes act contrary to the wishes of an affected person. None of these comments is intended to suggest that the complainant in this case supports the respondent's application for bail, or that she does not and will not support his prosecution. Rather, it is to indicate that, in my assessment of this application, whether the complainant is afraid of the respondent, whether she supports the grant of bail or whether she instigated or acquiesced in the previous breaches, are considerations of little weight. The task of this Court is to consider the safety, wellbeing and interests of the complainant and her children in the particular circumstances of this case'.

Hester v The Queen* [2007] VSCA 298 (29 November 2007) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Neave JA at [27]: 'It is a common pattern of behaviour for perpetrators of domestic violence to express penitence and persuade their victims to reconcile. For a number of complex reasons which have been discussed in the social science literature dealing with this issue, many victims are assaulted on several occasions before they summon the courage to leave an abusive relationship. Often they require considerable support in order to do so. In my view, these are matters which should be given considerable weight by a judge who is considering the weight that should be given to a victim impact statement made by a person who has been the victim of domestic violence. I therefore agree with the comments of Simpson JA in R v Glen that evidence of forgiveness of the victim of domestic violence should be treated with extreme caution'.

R v Sa* [2004] VSCA 182 (7 October 2004) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Eames JA at [38]-[40]: 'The statement of his Honour that the attitude of the victim could not "govern" the sentencing approach was consistent with the principles stated in Skura. In the present case, however, there was good reason why the judge would be cautious in evaluating the weight to be given to the evidence of the victim. In the first place, he was not the only victim of the appellant's crime; the two children also witnessed what must have been a horrifying incident, although there was no evidence of any long lasting adverse effects on the children. Crimes of violence frequently create alarm and distress to people other than the immediate victims, and in assessing the need for general deterrence a sentencing judge must have regard to the impact of crime more broadly than merely upon the immediate victim.

'An additional reason for being cautious about the weight to be given to the evidence of the victim related to the nature of Tofa's evidence. One reason why courts do not allow the wishes of the victim to determine the sentence to be imposed is that the victim might not always be able to assess what is in his or her own best interest. For example, when considering what weight to give to factors of general and specific deterrence in a case of a woman assaulted by her partner a sentencing judge would be minded to have regard to the imperatives which might motivate a battered wife to plead for leniency towards her attacker. In such circumstances the sentencing judge might be cautious about giving undue weight to such a plea for leniency.

'In the present case, the victim was himself in a difficult position among other members of the Samoan community, and his acceptance of the apology might have been motivated by a range of considerations'.

R v Skura [2004] VSCA 53 (7 April 2004) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Eames JA at [12]-[13]: 'This Court has often acknowledged that the introduction of victim impact statements has served an important purpose of ensuring that sentencing judges have a full appreciation of the consequences of criminal conduct to the victims of the crimes, thereby ensuring that judges properly weigh the factors relevant to victims which must be considered by virtue of s.5 of the Sentencing Act 1991. The courts have also warned that the victim impact statements should not be misused so as to produce a sentence which is unfair, and that an articulate or emotional victim impact statement could not justify a sentence being imposed which was not just in all the circumstances.

'Whilst judges must be careful that they do not allow the contents of a victim impact statement to unbalance the sentencing process so as to cause a miscarriage of the judicial sentencing discretion it is undoubtedly the case that consideration of victim impact statements in many instances would have the effect of producing a more severe sentence than a judge might, at first, have thought appropriate to the circumstances. If a victim impact statement can have that effect in encouraging a view of the case which would justify a more severe sentence, then in my view sentencing judges ought to give equally appropriate weight to a victim impact statement where the victim positively expresses support for the accused and argues for a more lenient sentence'.

The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [2]-[3]: 'The sentencing judge said: 'The decision to suspend or not is difficult but you are I think a person in whom I can grant suspension, and primarily because of your acceptance of responsibility in these unique circumstances in which there was a matrimonial breakdown, if you like, that you have reconciled, that your partner wants you back, that there is a child of your union and that you are a person who can get employment readily within the community and thereby if the system can rehabilitate you to assume full responsibility for your family through looking after them financially and by getting back into work, then rehabilitation perhaps outweighs the requirement for you to serve the term (ts 20)'.

'The circumstances to which the sentencing judge referred are neither unique nor mitigatory. The hallmark of domestic or relationship related violence is the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator of the violence. The otherwise appropriate penalty should not be reduced because there is a return to the status quo that existed prior to the breakdown of the relationship which precipitated the violence. It is also circular to rely on the return to the relationship status quo as the route to rehabilitation. Moreover, the emphasis on the domestic context marginalises the actual and threatened violence inflicted by the respondent on C'.

Options

In the following sections three possible options are considered for sentencing an offender convicted of an offence / offences committed in the context of domestic and family violence (imprisonment, intermediate sanctions and fines). While other options may be available these options have received some attention in the research literature in the context of domestic and family violence.

Imprisonment

In some circumstances a period of imprisonment will be the only appropriate option or the only option available in sentencing an offender charged with an offence committed in the context of domestic and family violence.

Australian and international studies demonstrate that offenders in general who are sentenced to a term of imprisonment are no less likely to reoffend than offenders given a non-custodial sanction. In fact, a prison sentence may increase the likelihood of reoffending where the offender has the opportunity to learn criminal behaviour and attitudes while in custody, or the stigma of having been incarcerated reduces their prospects of leading a non-criminal way of life on release [Trevena & Weatherburn 2015].

A New South Wales lower courts study has shown that domestic and family violence related offenders are less likely than those convicted of other offences to be sentenced to imprisonment; and, when imprisoned, they receive significantly shorter terms [Bond & Jeffries 2014]. A judicial study conducted in the Northern Territory reported however that imprisonment of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander offenders is currently the most common form of punishment in domestic and family violence related matters. It observed that while incarceration may give the victim some respite from the violence, it may not be effective in deterring the offender or like-minded offenders from violence in the future or in positively changing offender behaviours [Blokland 2016]. A US study found that offenders who served a prison sentence or were placed in a community corrections facility or received a suspended sentence exhibited much higher rates of recidivism, and that imprisonment proved effective only when combined with mandated treatment of the offending behaviour [Klein 2009].

The Australian Law Reform Commission review [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010] of legal responses to domestic and family violence highlighted the drawbacks of imprisonment as a sentencing option for domestic and family violence related offenders. While it may be a means of serving traditional sentencing objectives and providing a period of safety for victims during the offender's time in custody, it may be damaging to family relationships and financial wellbeing and to the offender's capacity to live a socially productive life.

Imprisonment - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Chapter 12 discusses penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders. Of note:

- The drawbacks of imprisonment are highlighted: “The use of imprisonment is costly in both financial and human terms, including for families. It may be an important means for providing some period of safety for victims, at least in the interim while the offender is in custody, as well as serving other traditional sentencing objectives, but it can be damaging. The alleged benefits of incarceration should not be overstated. Offenders may not necessarily receive access to appropriate treatment or other programs while in custody. The negative effects of prison may further undermine the offender’s capacity to live a socially productive life. Imprisonment should be used sparingly and when justified by the facts.” (12.165)
- Other options raised (as an alternative to imprisonment) included financial sanctions and community service orders (provided the work is ‘meaningful, constructive and rehabilitative’) (12.173)

Blokland, Justice Jenny, ‘Unnecessary suffering: Violence against Aboriginal women in the Northern Territory – A discussion of contemporary issues and possible ways forward’ (2016) 3 Northern Territory Law Journal 3.

Imprisonment is the most common form of punishment in cases of assaults by men against women (p. 4). ‘Imprisonment has generally been the sentencing outcome regardless of the contribution of the minimum mandatory terms of imprisonment. Imprisonment will obviously continue to be utilised; however, it is clear the imprisonment is not reducing the incidence of this form of violence. The reason this article focuses on this form of violence is in an attempt to understand and improve the situation, not to demonise any Aboriginal person, male or female, or their legal representatives, but to encourage diverse approaches that might deal with the problem’ (p. 10).

‘Although incarceration as a response to violence in this setting may serve a purpose in providing respite to victims for the term of imprisonment, it is clearly not deterring like-minded offenders. More significantly, for many offenders, it is not effecting behavioural changes to stop the physical violence'(p. 13).

Bond, Christine EW and Samantha Jeffries, 'Similar Punishment? Comparing Sentencing Outcomes in Domestic and Non-Domestic Violence Cases' (2014) 54 British Journal of Criminology 849.

Using a population of cases sentenced in New South Wales lower courts between January 2009 and June 2012, this article reports 'multivariate analyses of the sentencing of domestic violence and non-domestic violence offences.' Results show that when sentenced under statistically similar circumstances, domestic violence offenders are less likely than those convicted of crimes outside of domestic contexts to be sentenced to prison although the substantive impact is small. Further, of those imprisoned, domestic violence offenders receive significantly shorter terms of imprisonment. The findings also suggest that, 'for domestic violence offences, there may be a 'punishment cost' to being older, male and Indigenous' (p. 849).

Trevena, Judy and Don Weatherburn, 'Does the first prison sentence reduce the risk of further offending?' [2015] (187) Contemporary Issues in Crime and Justice 1.

This study examines whether short prison sentences (up to 12 months) exert a special deterrent effect (it does not specifically examine sentencing in family violence cases). Australian and international studies 'have found little evidence that offenders given a prison sentence are any less likely to re-offend than comparable offenders given a non-custodial sanction. In fact, a prison sentence may increase the likelihood of re-offending, perhaps by providing opportunities to learn criminal behaviour and attitudes from others while in custody or because the stigma of being labelled reduces opportunities to pursue a non-criminal way of life on release' (p. 1). 'The main finding of this study is that, in a matched comparison between groups of offenders who got either a prison sentence or a suspended sentence, the subsequent time to re-offend did not depend on the type of sentence received. This suggests that there is no particular deterrent effect in receiving a prison sentence for people who had not previously been sentenced to prison, and is consistent with other findings (p. 11).

International

Bell, Margret E et al, 'Criminal Case Outcomes, Incarceration, and Subsequent Intimate Partner Violence' (2013) 28(5) Journal of Family Violence 489.

Abstract: ‘Given the centrality of court interventions to the U.S. response to intimate partner violence (IPV), it is crucial to evaluate their impact on reabuse. To do so, this study examined whether female IPV victims’ experiences of abuse in the year following a criminal court case against their partner varied by case outcome or by whether the batterer had or had not been incarcerated. Consistent with prior research, [this article found] no main effect differences in reabuse trajectories by court case outcome or by incarceration. [This study] also examined variables that might moderate the impact of case outcome and incarceration on rebause and found that although batterer legal history did not affect the impact of case outcome, his age, Time 1 employment status, the couple’s Time 1 living arrangement, and duration of abuse did interact with case outcome’ (p. 489).

Joel H. Garner, Christopher D. Maxwell, and Jina Lee, The Specific Deterrent Effects of Criminal Sanctions for Intimate Partner Violence: A Meta-Analysis, 111 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 227 (2020).

From abstract: …this research uses meta-analytic methods to assess the specific deterrent effects of three post-arrest criminal sanctions—prosecution, conviction, and incarceration—for one offense type—intimate partner violence. Based upon 57 studies that reported 237 tests of specific deterrence theory, the effects of sanctions varied: there is a marginal deterrent effect for prosecution, no effect for conviction, and a large escalation effect among incarcerated offenders. In addition, deterrent effects in the available research are stronger in tests that use more rigorous research designs, that measure repeat offending using victim interviews instead of official records, and that use new offenses against the same victim—not new arrests or new convictions against any victim—as the criteria for repeat offending.

Klein, Andrew Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (National Institute of Justice, U.S. Department of justice Programs: 2009).

This is a comprehensive review of USA based research on issues relevant to domestic violence and law enforcement. The recommendations are made in the US context. This study notes: ‘The research is fairly consistent. Simply prosecuting offenders without regard to the specific risk they pose, unlike arresting domestic violence defendants, does not deter further criminal abuse. The minority of abusers arrested who are low risk are unlikely to reabuse in the short run, whether prosecuted or not. Alternatively, without the imposition of significant sanctions including incarceration, the majority of arrested abusers who are high risk will reabuse regardless of prosecution — many while the case against them is pending.' (at 52).

The author references a study that confirms that 'the more intrusive sentences — including jail, work release, electronic monitoring and/or probation — significantly reduced rearrest for domestic violence as compared to the less intrusive sentences of fines or suspended sentences without probation. The difference was statistically significant: Rearrests were 23.3 percent for defendants with more intrusive dispositions and 66 percent for those with less intrusive dispositions' (at p52).

The author concludes: 'Simply imposing guilty findings may not reduce the risk of reabuse. Judges should consider more intrusive sentences, including incarceration, for repeat abusers and those with prior criminal histories. (Research basis: Although studies conflict with each other on the subject of abuse prosecution, several sentencing studies suggest that more intrusive sentences may significantly deter reabuse.)' (p53)

Kramer, Ronald, 'Differential Punishment of Similar Behaviour: Sentencing Assault Cases in Specialised Family Violence Court and 'Regular Sentencing' Courts' (2015) British Journal of Criminology Advance Access 1.

Based on fieldwork conducted in a large, urban district court in New Zealand, this article explores legal responses to domestic and non-domestic assaults. It finds that men who assault intimate partners receive sentences that emphasize their rehabilitative needs and often result in discharges without conviction. Conversely, non-domestic assaults are met with relative severity' (p. 1).

Imprisonment - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (updated 2021).

[63-500] 'Domestic violence offences' is a dedicated chapter of the bench book dealing with the sentencing approach to domestic violence and apprehended violence orders. For breaches of apprehended violence orders, the bench book notes s 14(4) of the Crimes (Domestic and personal Violence) Act 2007 that states '[u]nless the court otherwise orders, a person who is convicted of an offence against subsection (1) must be sentenced to a term of imprisonment if the act constituting the offence was an act of violence against a person' [63-520].

[2-240] 'To prevent crime by deterring the offender and other persons from committing similar offences: s 3A(b)' notes that 'weight should be given by a court to general and specific deterrence for a range of offences' including 'violent offences: committed in a domestic context: Simpson v R [2014] NSWCCA 23 at [35]; Smith v R [2013] NSWCCA 209 at [69]; R v Hamid (2006) 164 A Crim R 179 at [68]; and premeditated violence, particularly leading to grievous bodily harm, in R v Najem [2008] NSWCCA 32 at [33]'.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Sentencing Manual (2022).

The bench book does not contain observations regarding imprisonment specifically in the context of family violence cases. However, it does contain some general observations.

Part 8.1 Sanction of last resort

'Legislation and the common law state that imprisonment is the sanction of last resort and is not to be imposed unless the court is satisfied that no other penalty is appropriate. Specifically, the Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic) ss 5(4)-(4C) ('the Act') state that a sentence requiring confinement of the offender cannot be imposed unless the court considers that the sentencing purposes cannot be met by another sentence.'

Imprisonment - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v NQ* [2015] ACTSC 308 (14 October 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Robinson AJ at [15]: 'I have come to the view that only a sentence of imprisonment is appropriate to the level of offending in this case. There is a need to punish this offending and to send a clear message by way of general deterrence to others that participation in sexual behaviour is a matter of choice not subjugation'.

R v Aumash* [2020] NSWDC 168 (1 May 2020) – New South Wales District Court

> "Placing men in gaol, an intrinsically violent environment is an ineffective way of addressing the underlying causes of crimes against women. But the need for community protection, supported by growing community perceptions about the impact of domestic violence, requires that men who commit such offences, particularly those who do so repeatedly, be removed from the community" [62].

R v Wilkinson* [2008] SASC 172 (4 July 2008) – South Australia Supreme Court

Gray J at [27]: 'Although imposing longer and longer terms of imprisonment does remove perpetrators from the community, domestic violence continues and its incidence increases. The imposing of sentences of imprisonment is a blunt instrument that does not adequately address the underlying causes of domestic violence in any real way'.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou AJA at [57]: 'General deterrence is of fundamental importance in cases of domestic violence. The victims of such violence are often so enveloped by fear that they are incapable of either escaping the violence or reporting it to the authorities. The key to protection lies in deterring the violent conduct by sending an unequivocal message to would-be perpetrators of domestic violence that if they offend, they will be sentenced to a lengthy period of imprisonment so that they are no longer in a position to inflict harm'.

DPP v Neve* [2013] VSC 488 (13 September 2013) – Victorian Supreme Court

Bell J at [67]: 'Denunciation of your crimes and general deterrence are powerful sentencing considerations in your case, leading to an immediate sentence of imprisonment. Ms Fuller was your wife. You are guilty of committing appalling domestic violence towards her. Many of your actions were not only violent but calculated to belittle and demean her and place her in abject fear. The double barrel shotgun was a common feature of all five charges and it was loaded when the first four offences were committed. This criminal conduct deserves the strongest condemnation of the court. Others must be made to appreciate the consequences of committing crimes of this nature'.

Pedrochi v Brown* [2021] WASC 81 (25 March 2021) – Western Australia Supreme Court

The applicant's application for leave to appeal against a sentence of 2 years and 6 months imprisonment was allowed only insofar as to correct the commencement date by 4 days. It was noted at [62]-[63]:

> "It is characteristic of offences of this kind that they involve significant power imbalances (as the offence in this case did), that they are committed behind closed doors (as the offence in this case was) and that they are accompanied by lies and gas lighting (as the offence in this case undoubtedly was).
>
> These features underscore the need for the courts, in imposing sentences commensurate with the seriousness of the offence in each case and applying all relevant sentencing principles, to send a strong signal that violence of this kind is intolerable and will be dealt with accordingly. The "firming up" of sentences for such violence, referred to in Duncan v The Queen [2018] WASCA 154, reflects that need."

In addition, the court emphasised at [64] that:

> "offences involving strangulation are particularly serious. As [the magistrate] said "a case of non-fatal strangulation … is extremely serious" and that "the courts now recognise how serious that action is." In my view, her Honour can here be taken to be referring to the growing appreciation of the particular dangers associated with offences involving strangulation and with the role they play in cases of intimate and family violence. That recognition has, of course, led to legislative action, introducing a specific offence of suffocation or strangulation. That offence was, of course, not in existence at the time of the appellant's offending against Ms Hallam. Nevertheless, as the learned Magistrate recognised, the recognition of the seriousness and danger of non fatal strangulation predated those legislative reforms and was a relevant sentencing consideration."

Intermediate sanctions

While Australian state and territory sentencing legislation and case law vary in terminology and approach, there are sentencing options available in each jurisdiction that allow for suitable offenders who have committed offences involving domestic and family violence to be placed on orders requiring them to be supervised in the community and/or to abide by specific conditions. Such conditions may include performing community-based work, undertaking a rehabilitation program, or other conditions that ensure the offender complies with a current Family Court order or a protection order.

The Australian Law Reform Commission's review of legal responses to domestic and family violence [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010] notes significant support from stakeholders for sanctions that are designed to help change the behaviour of violent offenders, including rehabilitation programs addressing the offending behaviour, drug and alcohol misuse, counselling and psychiatric needs, and other therapeutic interventions.

The Sentencing Advisory Council Victoria [Vic Sentencing Advisory Council 2009] observes that multiple sanctions requiring community work and mandatory attendance at a behaviour change program may provide a constructive balance between punitive and coercive rehabilitation measures, while also ensuring the protection of the victim and community. They may also be more effective in achieving deterrence and long-term compliance with a protection order than a fine or term of imprisonment.

USA studies have shown that while a suspended sentence or fine negated the deterrent value of a conviction [Ventura & Davis 2005], specialised domestic violence probation supervision programs for lower-risk offenders [Klein et al 2008] (with conditions similar to those already identified) resulted in significantly reduced recidivism rates, improved offender accountability and greater victim satisfaction with outcomes.

Intermediate sanctions - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. Chapter 12 discussed penalties and sentencing for breach of protection orders. The report notes that: 'The overwhelming majority of stakeholders that addressed this issue were in favour of sanctions that could help to change the behaviour of those who commit violence. Therefore, there was support for 'perpetrator programs' such as violence and drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs; probation with special conditions, such as attending 'perpetrators' courses or counselling'; men's behaviour programs; psychiatric assessment and treatment; anger management programs; and educational programs on family violence with 'therapeutic interventions'' (at [12.172].) Other options raised (as an alternative to imprisonment) included community service orders (provided the work associated with the penalty is 'meaningful, constructive and rehabilitative') (at [12.173])

Queensland Police Service, 'The Domestic and Family Violence GPS-Enabled Electronic monitoring Technology, Evaluation Report, April 2019, Government of Queensland.

This report presents the findings of a trial of GPS tracking for family violence offenders and victims in Queensland. The trial assessed the effectiveness, reliability and responsiveness of GPS-enabled technology to track an individual accurately and activate an alert in the event of a pre-programmed zone being breached. The GPS-enabled technology was tested in different geographical areas and with police personnel rather than actual offenders and victims. Thirty-five tests were carried out, with the technology failing to respond in 26% of cases. The technical issues are discussed in more detail. Overall, the findings demonstrate that electronic monitoring does not provide an effective risk-mitigating solution for high-risk perpetrators and is not a reliable substitute for perpetrator case management. However, it may be of use in some lower-risk cases, in conjunction with other measures. This trial was a suggestion of the 2015 Queensland Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence, which noted how little was known about electronic monitoring programs.

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family violence Intervention Orders: Final Report (2009).

This report was compiled by the Sentencing Advisory Council Victoria and examines the penalties awarded for the breach of protection orders. The Council compiled the report by reviewing relevant literature on family data, analysing data on sentencing and conducting new research by consulting those involved in the sentencing process (magistrates, court staff, Victoria Police, community legal centre representatives, family violence service providers, defence lawyers, workers from men's family violence programs and a family violence victims' support group). The report made a number of comments around community based sentencing responses: (at 2)

- It observed that 'sentences with more flexibility in terms of punishment (such as conditional orders that can incorporate community work and/or a financial condition), which are structured to ensure that it is the offender that must serve the punishment, may be more effective in achieving this sentencing purpose'
- It noted that 'another sentencing purpose that can be compatible with protecting the victim (particularly in the long term) is rehabilitation. There will be occasions where a sentence with coercive rehabilitation requirements (such as mandatory attendance at a behavioural change course) as well as a punitive element (such as community work or a financial condition) strikes a better balance between the purposes of sentencing than a sentence such as a fine. Such sentences may achieve more in ensuring long-term compliance with the intervention order.
- It identified that the 'central purpose [in sentencing] should be achieving compliance with the order to ensure the protection of the victim and the community. This is not to suggest that these offenders should always receive sentences of imprisonment. The Council would suggest that in some cases sanctions that intervene in the offender's pattern of violent behaviour, such as community-based orders and intensive correction orders, may be more appropriate.'

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing for Contravention of Family Violence Intervention Orders and Safety Notices: Second Monitoring Report (2015).

This report is a continuation of previous monitoring work, examining sentencing patterns over yearly periods from 2009 and 2015 for offences involving contravention of a family violence intervention order (FVIO) or a family violence safety notice (FVSN) made under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). In particular, this report examines sentencing for the offences of:

- contravention of an FVIO;
- contravention of an FVSN;
- contravention of an FVIO intending to cause harm or fear for safety;
- contravention of an FVSN intending to cause harm or fear for safety; and
- persistent contravention of notices and orders.

In terms of sentencing for FVIO and FVSN contravention, there was an increase in the use of imprisonment and community sentences (including community correction orders (CCOs), following the phased abolition of suspended sentences.

Trimboli, Lili, 'Persons convicted of breaching Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders: their characteristics and penalties' NSW Bureau of Crime and Statistics Research, Issue 102, January 2015.

This paper describes the characteristics of those found guilty of breaching an Apprehended Domestic Violence Order (ADVO) in NSW in 2013 and the principal penalties they received. Of 3,154 persons who were found guilty of breaching an ADVO as their principal offence n132 (4.2%) received a community based sentence with an average of 111 hours of work and n489 (15.5%) received a good behaviour bond with supervision (average time 16 months).(at 3)

International

Joel H. Garner, Christopher D. Maxwell, and Jina Lee, The Specific Deterrent Effects of Criminal Sanctions for Intimate Partner Violence: A Meta-Analysis, 111 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 227 (2020).

From abstract: …this research uses meta-analytic methods to assess the specific deterrent effects of three post-arrest criminal sanctions—prosecution, conviction, and incarceration—for one offense type—intimate partner violence. Based upon 57 studies that reported 237 tests of specific deterrence theory, the effects of sanctions varied: there is a marginal deterrent effect for prosecution, no effect for conviction, and a large escalation effect among incarcerated offenders. In addition, deterrent effects in the available research are stronger in tests that use more rigorous research designs, that measure repeat offending using victim interviews instead of official records, and that use new offenses against the same victim—not new arrests or new convictions against any victim—as the criteria for repeat offending.

Klein, Andrew et al. Evaluation of the Rhode Island Probation Specialized Domestic Violence Supervision Unit (2008) National Criminal Justice Reference Service.

This USA based study examines a specialised domestic violence probation supervision compared to standard probation supervision where supervision includes a mix of cases. It found several significant differences. The specialised domestic violence probation supervision program consists of a 26 week batterer intervention program, routine checks by a parole officer and a substantial percentage of offenders were ordered to have no contact with their victims. Few were required to undergo treatment for and/or remain abstinent from drugs and/or alcohol. The study is on 552 random male probationers drawn from nearly 3000 misdemeanour probationers in Rhode Island as of January 1, 2003.The study concluded that lower-risk abusers, constituting almost half of the probation abuser caseload supervised by the specialized unit, were significantly less likely to be rearrested for domestic violence and nondomestic violence crimes than were those supervised in the traditional mixed caseloads. Victims' satisfaction appeared to be higher, and abusers were held more accountable (the authors make this statement based on the higher number of probationers charged with technical breaches that those in the mixed case group). The authors speculate on the reasons why this specialised approach to probation may have positive effects on recidivism.

A version of this report is also published as: Crowe, Ann and Andrew Klein, 'Findings From and Outcome Examination of Rhode Island's Specialised Domestic Violence Probation Supervision Program' (2008) 14(2) Violence Against Women 226-246.

Klein, Andrew Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (National Institute of Justice, U.S. Department of justice Programs: 2009).

This is a comprehensive review of USA based research on issues relevant to domestic violence and law enforcement. The recommendations are made in the US context. Notes that a review of reported studies confirms that 'the more intrusive sentences — including jail, work release, electronic monitoring and/or probation — significantly reduced rearrest for domestic violence as compared to the less intrusive sentences of fines or suspended sentences without probation. The difference was statistically significant: Rearrests were 23.3 percent for defendants with more intrusive dispositions and 66 percent for those with less intrusive dispositions' (at p52).

Johnson, Richard, 'Correlates of Re-arrest among Felony Domestic Violence Probationers' (2008) 72(3) Federal Probation 42- 47.

This USA based study considers the factors associated with recidivism whilst on probation for a domestic violence offence. A sample of 273 domestic violence offenders in a suburban county in the Chicago metropolitan area was examined. Of the 273 offenders, 112 (41%) the following characteristics increased the likelihood of reoffending (p 45): young age, employment instability, residential instability, residing with the victim, substance abuse, prior criminal and violence convictions. Whether or not the offender had successfully completed a domestic batterer counselling program prior to his current sentencing was not significantly associated with re-arrest, (p 46). The strongest predictor for re-arrest was having a prior conviction for a drug and/or alcohol offence, this almost doubled an offender's odds of re-arrest while on probation. The article concludes that taking into account the characteristics of an offender and tailoring a probation program on the likelihood of re-arrest could significantly increase the efficiency of legal responses to domestic violence (p 47).

Johnson, Richard, 'Intensive Probation for Domestic Violence Offenders' (2001) 65(3) Federal Probation 36-39.

This USA based study investigates a specialist Domestic Violence Program (the Domestic Violence Officer Program) set up in Kane County, Illinois (within the Chicago Metropolitan area). The program selected high-risk domestic violence offenders (classified as repeat or serious offenders) for specialised supervision (which included a 26-week domestic violence counselling program) as part of a sentence. The first 25 offenders placed in the program were monitored and compared to a control group of similar offenders and it was found that those who completed the domestic violence counselling program were less likely to be arrested for a new criminal or domestic violence offence in the 24 months after being sentenced to probation. The short term results of the program appeared promising, but note that the program was not probation alone but rather probation combined with heightened supervision and counselling. It is noted that the supervision of domestic violence offenders on probation can be difficult and sometimes dangerous.

Olson, David and Loretta Stalans, 'Violent Offenders on Probation: Profile, Sentence, and Outcome Differences Among Domestic Violence and Other Violent Probationers' (2001) 7(10) Violence Against Women 1164-1185.

This USA based research reports on the analysis of data collected from every adult probationer discharged from supervision during a 4-week period in November and December 1997 in Illinois. The information collected was grouped into three categories: probationer characteristics, conditions of the probation sentence and measures of case outcome. Data from 2438 offenders was obtained – 124 (5%) of those were domestic violence offenders. The authors report that domestic violence offenders were more likely to report a substance abuse history (though less likely to report alcohol abuse). However there were no other significant differences between domestic violence perpetrators and others. Because domestic violence offenders were primarily charged with lower level offences, the sentence length was significantly shorter (15.4 months v 22.4 months. Sentences for domestic violence offences had more conditions attached – the offenders were more likely to have to pay fines, attend programs, but less likely to be required to do community service. Domestic violence offenders were 3 times more likely to re-victimise the original victim, they were more likely to be contacted by probation officers. Those convicted and ordered probation were four times more likely to re-victimise. Those ordered to complete treatment were five times more likely to re-victimise (the authors speculate that this was possibly because these were more serious offenders).

Uekert, Brena et al., Juvenile Domestic and Family Violence: The Effects of Court-Based Intervention Programs on Recidivism (The National Centre for State Courts, 2006).

This is a USA based study on the effectiveness of court-based intervention programs (essentially probation with intensive supervision) for juvenile domestic and family violence perpetrators. The study involved three sites: Santa Clara, San Francisco and Contra Costa County. Agency and community-based staff were interviewed, court hearings were observed and agency protocols and reports were collected. Data on program completion showed among other things that: offenders with prior delinquency records were less likely to successfully complete probation and program requirements than were those without prior records; all things being equal- the likelihood of successfully completing the probation program increased if the offender did not violate probation, the offender was placed on electronic monitoring, the offender was not in Santa Clara County, and the offender was young. Primary findings from the study include the following:

The specialised intervention programs in both Santa Clara and San Francisco counties had a deterrent effect on first-time offenders. The deterrent effect, which lasted up to two years following the date of the incident, was especially apparent in Santa Clara County.

Ventura, L., and G. Davis. "Domestic Violence: Court Case Conviction and Recidivism." (2005) 11(2) Violence Against Women 255-277.

This USA based study examined recidivism among a cohort of 519 cases. While fines and suspended sentences were found to be significantly associated with recidivism (p271), by comparison, of the 189 convicted batterers who received sanctions of jail time, work release sentence, electronic monitoring, or probation, only 44 (23.3%) were rearrested on domestic violence during the follow-up period (p272). The authors conclude in part: 'that any deterrent value of conviction may be negated when the sanctions imposed are only suspended sentences or fines. Such sanctions may have little impact on the convicted batterer. The authors speculate that if a convicted batterer receives only a fine or a suspended jail sentence without probation, the offender has no specific rules or treatment requirements to complete to avoid incarceration.

Intermediate sanctions - Other Bench Books

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

See section 20.9 and 20.10 for a discussion of sentencing breach of protection order conditions.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

See 4.1.1.3 for a discussion of sentencing responses to contravention of protection order charges.

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book* (updated 2022).

[63-500] 'Domestic violence offences' is a dedicated chapter of the bench book dealing with the sentencing approach to domestic violence and apprehended violence orders.

Fines

Sentencing Advisory Councils in Victoria [Vic Sentencing Advisory Council 2009] and Tasmania [Tas Sentencing Advisory Council 2015] explain that the purpose of a fine is to punish the offender and act as a deterrent to future offending by the offender and others. However, it is acknowledged that, in the context of domestic and family violence, a fine may not be an appropriate sanction because it may adversely impact the victim. For example, the fine may need to be paid from the joint financial resources of the victim and offender, or the offender may threaten or coerce the victim into paying the fine. This outcome may perpetuate the violence experienced by the victim and erode financial resources necessary to meet the daily living needs of the victim and their families [Stewart 1999].

In some studies victims have reported feeling that the imposition of a fine trivialised or minimised the harm [Douglas & Stark 2010] they had experienced, or feeling that the court had not taken a breach of a protection order charge seriously [Douglas & Godden 2002] where a fine was ordered. US research indicates that less intrusive sentences (such as fines and suspended sentences) impose limited responsibility on an offender to account for the harm they have caused, or to take steps to change their behaviour [Klein 2009].

Other Australian bench books [Other Bench Books] explain the potentially adverse implications of fines as a penalty option in the domestic and family violence context, and encourage judicial officers to have regard to all relevant factors, including the offender's financial means.

Fines - Key Literature

Australia

Douglas, Heather and Tanja Stark, Stories from Survivors: Domestic Violence and Criminal Justice Interventions (2010).

This research draws on interviews with 20 women who had experienced domestic violence, many of whom gave evidence in domestic violence-related court proceedings. Some of the women reported:

- Speaking out in court was the first time many women spoke publicly about their abuse;
- Some women felt that they were in danger when they went to court (p 70);
- That court staff should be properly trained about domestic violence;
- It would be helpful if court staff could advise when the violent partner had left court (p 71);
- It was extremely stressful waiting in the court foyer for their matter to be called. Some women experienced further intimidation and abuse from their former partners while waiting for their case to be called on while others were worried that further trouble might arise;
- When they had access to safe rooms to wait they felt much safer and less intimidated (p 73);
- Different access points to the court for victims and offenders (p 74).

Douglas, Heather and Lee Godden, 'Decriminalisation of Domestic Violence: Possibilities for Reform' (Paper presented at the "Expanding Our Horizons" Conference, Sydney, 18-22 February 2002).

This paper examined the interaction between the Queensland Criminal Code and the Domestic Violence (Family Protection) Act. Specifically, with regards to fines, the paper reports: there is a broad recognition that the imposition of fines is inappropriate in matters of domestic violence, as they are often paid by the accused or from the joint household income (p 10). In some studies it is noted that women believed that fines were an indication that the court had not taken the incident seriously (p 14)

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing Practices for Breach of Family Violence Intervention Orders: Final Report (2009).

This is a report compiled by the Sentencing Advisory Council from Victoria on Intervention Orders in Victoria: their usage, purpose, efficacy and, most importantly, the penalties awarded for their breach. The Council compiled the report by reviewing relevant literature on family data, analysing data on sentencing and conducting new research by consulting those involved in the sentencing process (magistrates, court staff, Victoria Police, community legal centre representatives, family violence service providers, defence lawyers, workers from men's family violence programs and a family violence victims' support group). The report found:

- The sanctions imposed during sentencing for breach of a family violence order were considered by most stakeholders to be far too lenient (viii)
- Fines are inappropriate sentences for breach of intervention orders (viii) as they can punish the victim as well as the offender (ix)

'Some sentences which are intended to punish the offender may fail to achieve that purpose. For example, the most common sentencing disposition for breaching an intervention order is a fine. The purpose of a fine is generally said to be to punish the offender and act as a deterrent to future offending by the offender and others. However, the dynamics of family violence mean that fines can punish the victim(s) as much or more than the offender. Payment of the fine by the offender may affect his ability to provide financial support to the victim and her family. The offender may even coerce the victim into paying the fine.' (at [6.12]).

Sentencing Advisory Council (Vic), Sentencing for Contravention of Family Violence Intervention Orders and Safety Notices: Second Monitoring Report (2015).

This report is a continuation of previous monitoring work, examining sentencing patterns over yearly periods from 2009 and 2015 for offences involving contravention of a family violence intervention order (FVIO) or a family violence safety notice (FVSN) made under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic). In particular, this report examines sentencing for the offences of:

- contravention of an FVIO;
- contravention of an FVSN;
- contravention of an FVIO intending to cause harm or fear for safety;
- contravention of an FVSN intending to cause harm or fear for safety; and
- persistent contravention of notices and orders.

In terms of sentencing for FVIO and FVSN contravention, there was an increase in the use of imprisonment and community sentences (including community correction orders (CCOs), following the phased abolition of suspended sentences.

Stewart, Anna, Domestic Violence: Deterring Perpetrators. Paper presented at the 3rd National Outlook Symposium Mapping the Boundaries of Australia's Criminal Justice System, Canberra, 22-23 March 1999.

This paper explores how the criminal justice system can adequately respond to the issue of domestic violence and the role of the victim in deterring perpetrators. With regard to the imposition of fines, the author considered them an unhelpful punishment as they were inevitably paid for out of the household budget (p 10)

Sentencing Advisory Council (Tas), Sentencing of Adult Family Violence Offenders: Final report No.5 (2015).

See section 3.83 The Use of Fines.

'The purpose of a fine is 'generally said to be to be to punish the offender and to act as a deterrent to future offending by the offender and others.' However, in the context of family violence, a fine may also in effect punish the victim as well. The Victorian Sentencing Advisory Council has considered the use of fines for breaches of family orders and suggests that they are 'generally an inappropriate sanction.' The Council noted that they do not address the offending behaviour and in any case it is often the victim who ends up with the burden of paying the fine. The offender may threaten or coerce the victim into paying the fine for him. Funds which would otherwise be used to satisfy the needs of the family — food, clothing, rent or child support — are directed instead to paying the fine. The Victorian Council recognised that 'sentences with more flexibility in terms of punishment (such as conditional orders that can incorporate community work and/or a financial condition)' which are structured to ensure that the burden of the penalty falls on the offender are more appropriate for this offence.' (p31)

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced. South Australia now imposes a maximum term of 10 years imprisonment for a breach which is a second or subsequent aggravated offence involving physical violence or a threat thereof. The Northern Territory imposes a mandatory 7 days imprisonment for repeat offenders and multiple states have tiered penalties for subsequent offences.

The authors note: 'The penalties for breaches of protection orders vary across states and territories which can be expected given that each respective domestic violence law has had its own history of development and amendments.' This paper presents an overview of available monetary penalties for breach of protection order in Australian jurisdictions in 2015 (see p16-17). The authors identify the variety of different levels of fines available.

Trimboli, Lili, 'Persons convicted of breaching Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders: their characteristics and penalties' NSW Bureau of Crime and Statistics Research, Issue 102, January 2015.

This paper describes the characteristics of those found guilty of breaching an Apprehended Domestic Violence Order (ADVO) in NSW in 2013 and the principal penalties they received. Of 3,154 persons who were found guilty of breaching an ADVO as their principal offence about one in five (22.5%) received a bond without supervision (average length=14 months) as their principal penalty; 17.8 per cent (n 560) were fined (average amount=$432) (p4).

International

Klein, Andrew Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (National Institute of Justice, U.S. Department of justice Programs: 2009).

This is a comprehensive review of USA based research on issues relevant to domestic violence and law enforcement. The recommendations are made in the US context. Notes that a review of reported studies confirms that 'the more intrusive sentences — including jail, work release, electronic monitoring and/or probation — significantly reduced rearrest for domestic violence as compared to the less intrusive sentences of fines or suspended sentences without probation. The difference was statistically significant: Rearrests were 23.3 percent for defendants with more intrusive dispositions and 66 percent for those with less intrusive dispositions' (at47).

Ventura, L., and G. Davis. "Domestic Violence: Court Case Conviction and Recidivism." (2005) 11(2) Violence Against Women 255-277.

This USA study examined recidivism among a cohort of 519 cases. The only sanction found to be significantly associated with recidivism was receiving a suspended sentence or fines (p271). Of the 15 'batterers' who received a suspended sentence or fines recidivated on another domestic violence charge during the 1-year follow-up period. By comparison, of the 189 convicted batterers who received sanctions of jail time, work release sentence, electronic monitoring, or probation, only 44 (23.3%) were rearrested on domestic violence during the follow-up period. (p272) The authors conclude in part: 'that any deterrent value of conviction may be negated when the sanctions imposed are only suspended sentences or fines. Such sanctions may have little impact on the convicted batterer. If a convicted batterer receives only a fine or a suspended jail sentence without probation, the offender has no specific rules or treatment requirements to complete to avoid incarceration. There is no ongoing monitoring of the batterer. This lack of monitoring and lack of accountability maybe interpreted by a batterer as the equivalent of receiving a free pass to do as he pleases.'

Fines - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sentencing Bench Book (updated 2022).

[6-110] 'Availability'

There are restrictions imposed on the court in exercising the discretion to impose a fine. Section 6 Fines Act 1996 provides that:

In the exercise by a court of the discretion to fix the amount of any fine, the court is required to consider:

(a) such information regarding the means of the accused as is reasonably and practicably available to the court for consideration, and

(b) such other matters as, in the opinion of the court, are relevant to that fixing of the amount.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

See 4.1.1.3 for a discussion of sentencing responses to contravention of protection order charges.

Fines - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Carol

Family law proceedings

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- amend the parenting order framework by refining the list of 'best interests' factors, removing the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and related equal time and substantial and significant time provision, and clarifying the circumstances in which a court can vary an existing parenting order;
- redraft provisions relating to compliance with, and enforcement of, parenting orders;
- amend definitions relating to the concept of 'family' to be more inclusive of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture and traditions;
- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view;
- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;
- makes consequential amendments to the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021;

Amends the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021 to:

- allow registrars of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCOA) to be delegated the power to impose a make-up time parent order in contravention proceedings;
- bring forward the review of the Act by 2 years;
- provide that a judge of the Family Court of Western Australia can be dually appointed as a judge of Division 1 of the FCFCOA; and

Amends Family Law Act 1975 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021

- to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

Family law proceedings - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Erin

Felicity

Gillian

Jane

Susan

Foundational information

Foundational information - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. The effect of family violence and parenting arrangements is discussed at [15.11] (p 675). The report notes that –

- 'Spousal abuse may not end with separation—in particular, abusive controlling violence may escalate after separation.
- People who use family violence may be deficient or even abusive parents and poor role models for their children. They may also undermine their victims' parenting role.
- Victims of family violence may find parenting difficult, as a result of abuse, poor self-esteem and the stress of separation and court proceedings. Time, protection and support may be required to re-establish their parenting role. A victim's behaviour under the stress of an abusive relationship or separation should not prejudice parenting decisions.'

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Law for the Future – An Inquiry into the Family Law System, ALRC Report 135, March 2019

The ALRC was commissioned to consider appropriate reforms to the family law system and Family Law Act necessary or desirable in relation these matters (see the Terms of Reference and p5 of the Final Report):

- the appropriate, early and cost-effective resolution of all family law disputes
- the protection of the best interests of children and their safety
- family law services, including (but not limited to) dispute resolution services
- family violence and child abuse, including protection for vulnerable witnesses
- the best ways to inform decision makers about the best interests of children, and the views held by children in family disputes
- collaboration, coordination, and integration between the family law system and other Commonwealth, state and territory systems, including family support services and the family violence and child protection systems

- whether the adversarial court system offers the best way to support the safety of families and resolve matters in the best interests of children, and the opportunities for less adversarial resolution of parenting and property disputes
- rules of procedure, and rules of evidence, that would best support high quality decision making in family disputes
- mechanisms for reviewing and appealing decisions
- families with complex needs, including where there is family violence, drug or alcohol addiction or serious mental illness
- the underlying substantive rules and general legal principles in relation to parenting and property
- the skills, including but not limited to legal, required of professionals in the family law system
- restriction on publication of court proceedings
- improving the clarity and accessibility of the law
- any other matters related to these terms of reference.

The ALRC released its report in March 2019, including 60 recommendations for reform. Key recommendations include:

- closing jurisdictional gaps between Commonwealth and state/territory courts
- factors to be considered when determining parenting arrangements that promote a child's best interests
- compliance with children's orders
- introducing a statutory tort of family violence applicable in the context of determining the division of property interests
- encouraging amicable resolution between parties of property and financial matters
- case management and social support services for people engaged with the family law system.

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports key findings of two national online surveys with adults and children in relation to postseparation parenting, which formed part of the larger research. Adult respondents described how family violence affected their parenting arrangements and their use of family services to assist with parenting decisions. There were gender differences in the reported experiences of and responses to violence, with women reporting more serious forms of violence than men. Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports. The study raised many questions about how well family law policies, as expressed in the legislation and implemented in the national service system, respond to violence in families such as those who were involved in this research (p 49).

Bromfield, Leah, et al, 'Issues for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children in Families with Multiple and Complex Problems: The Co-Occurrence of Domestic Violence, Parental Substance Misuse and Mental Health Problems' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2010).

This paper investigates the separate impacts of parental substance misuse, domestic violence and parental mental health problems. It presents evidence regarding the extent to which these problems co-occur and a discussion of the wider context of exclusion and disadvantage, its causes and its consequences. Finally, it provides an overview of research and theory for working with families with multiple and complex problems. This literature review cites statistics from a US study, the statistics were collected from household census data from over 20,000 households (G. Fox and M. Benson 'Violent men, bad dads? Fathering profiles of men involved in intimate partner violence.' In R. Day & M. Lamb (Eds.), Conceptualizing and measuring father involvement. (Mahwah, New Jersey: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates Publishers, 2004)):

- 37% of children were accidentally hurt during domestic violence;
- 26% of children were intentionally hurt during domestic violence;
- 49% of mothers were hurt protecting children;
- 47% of perpetrators used the child as pawn to hurt mothers;
- 39% of perpetrators hurt mothers as punishment for children's acts;
- 23% of perpetrators blamed mothers for perpetrators' own excessive punishment of children.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

See generally from p 4 – 'There are few more difficult or more important challenges for the family law system than dealing with cases where family violence is an issue. Family violence happens throughout the community, and is especially likely to be present among families that separate and resort to the family law system. More than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent, and violence issues often go together with other problems, for example those associated with substance abuse and mental ill-health. Violence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is directed specifically at them. These cases present the courts with truly daunting tasks: to provide a setting in which the parties feel safe and confident that they will be treated with respect; to deal with the cases with necessary efficiency but most importantly with justice and fairness; and to ensure as far as possible that arrangements made for children, whether as a result of the parties' consent or by the court's adjudication, are suitable for their needs, which will include being safe and having both parents contribute to their developmental needs' (p 4).

The theme of the report is discussed at p 5 - 'A theme that recurred during the Review was that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon. This theme seems helpful whether we are thinking of a lawyer interviewing a client, a dispute resolution practitioner dealing with a new case, the work of a counter clerk at a family court, or of a judicial officer. The family law system, and each component in it, needs to encourage and facilitate the disclosure of family violence, ensure that it is understood, and act effectively upon that understanding'.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter discusses the history and place of family law in Australia's federal system. Difficulties in addressing family violence in what is an often fragmented legal framework are discussed. Many different courts and jurisdictions are involved, especially where the dispute extends between states or territories. This is particularly problematic where child protection is an issue.

De Maio, John, et al, 'Survey of Recently Separated Parents: A study of parents who separated prior to the implementation of the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Matters) Act 2011' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2013).

This report presents key findings from the Survey of Recently Separated Families (SRSP) 2012. The study aimed to gain a more detailed understanding of parents' experiences of family violence and concerns about child safety, and how well the legal system responds. Interviews were conducted with 6,119 parents who separated between 31 July 2010 and 31 December 2011 - that is, five years after the family law reforms of 2006 and one year prior to the legislative reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011. The study found that family violence is common among separated families, and though many of the participants reported this violence to police or other services, a sizeable minority (47%) of them did not.

Family Law Council, 'In Response to the first two terms of reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems' (Interim Report to the Attorney-General, June 2015).

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the first two matters. The remaining matters will be dealt with in a report due June 2016.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

This report comprehensively summarises the legislative provisions governing the resolution of parenting disputes under the Family Law Act, and the intersection with legal systems governing family violence and child protection. Some important observations:

- Fragmented legal systems – families most likely to be involved with more than one of these jurisdictions are those with support needs associated with DFV and at a time of high risk and vulnerability (child protection/children's court; family courts; state/territory DFV courts)
- Reluctance by state/territory magistrates to use s68R FLA to vary Family Court orders when making DFV orders in order to resolve inconsistencies between DFV orders and parenting orders; can be done on its own motion without the consent of the parties; and sometimes magistrates assume that the parenting order is sufficient to protect child without needing to include the child on the DFV order (concerns about inadequate time limits in s68T on variation/suspension of parenting order where done in interim proceedings)
- The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions examined similar concerns about the use of s 68R by state and territory magistrates and the application of s 68T in their 2010 Family Violence – A National Legal Response report. They concluded that the underuse of s 68R at that time was attributable to a range of factors, including:
    - a lack of awareness or understanding of s 68R among judicial officers, lawyers police and others involved in family violence protection order proceedings;
    - a view taken by some magistrates that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for the family courts;
    - judicial officers lacking adequate information or evidence necessary to amend the parenting orders;

and

- parties to proceedings not having access to appropriate legal advice.

Family Law Council, Report to the Attorney-General on 'Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems: Final Report, June 2016 (Terms, 3, 4 & 5)'.

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the matters listed below in items 3, 4 and 5.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

The Family Law Council made 22 recommendations (summarised at pp12-18) in the following areas:

- Family safety services
- Early whole-of-family risk assessments
- Family lawyers and risk identifications
- Family dispute resolution practitioners and risk management strategies

- Judicial risk assessments and court-ordered programs
- A court-based integrated services model
- Case-managed integrated services in the family relationships sector
- Self-represented litigants with complex needs
- Support services for families in rural and regional areas
- Collaboration between family law and state and territory courts
- Family violence competency
- Joint professional development
- Children's views and experiences
- Family dispute resolution and confidentiality
- State and territory courts exercising family law jurisdiction
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families
- Culturally and linguistically diverse families
- Court support workers
- Self-represented litigants and misuse of process
- Crossover cases
- Consent parenting orders
- Legislative reform.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the protection of children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers how the [former] Family Court of Australia deals with matters involving children where there are allegations of abuse. It identifies that the balancing of the interests of the children and the parents, and frequently of other people associated with the children, is at the centre of what is just in the family law system. This issue is examined here, together with the differences in the roles of judges and experts in child development and abuse, and child psychology and psychiatry, and how each has a part to play in the system of justice. Also of concern is how the voices of children are being heard in the system. Evidence issues are discussed in detail.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, '[Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments]' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of practices and perspectives of family law professionals (n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
    - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
    - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts and
    - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who had separated between 1 July 2010 and 31 December 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who had separated between 1 July 2012 and 31 December 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 represents parents' their post-reform experiences.

Together with the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families (LSSF) Wave 1 data, these samples of separated parents reported similar levels of family violence, with around 1 in 5 parents indicating they suffered physical hurt by their former partner and nearly 2 in 5 reporting emotional abuse alone (p 14). See generally chapter 3 – 'Family Violence and Safety Concerns'. Most parents in both cohorts reported at least one type of emotional abuse before/during or since separation (p 58). Further, 'overall, mothers reported experiencing emotional abuse in greater proportions than fathers both before/during separation and since separation' (p 58). The most commonly reported form of emotional abuse (see p24) was '—insults with the intent to shame, belittle or humiliate' (p 58). A similar proportion of parents in both cohorts reported that their children saw or heard family violence prior to or during separation (p 60). However, the proportion of parents reporting that their children witnessed family violence in the period since separation decreased in the second cohort.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

It concludes that 'overall, the general patterns in findings suggest a positive response to the 2012 family violence reforms, with practitioner responses indicating that protection from harm is given greater weight now than it was previously, and that advice-giving practices have shifted in a direction consistent with the intent of the reforms to better identify families where this is an issue. At the same time, the responses do not suggest that any less weight is placed on maintaining relationships with parents and children after separation where this is appropriate' (p 13).

Practitioners' views about striking the right balance between protecting a child from harm and maintaining a meaningful relationship with both parents (in the context of the 2012 reforms and the 'tie-breaker' provision (s 60CC(2A)) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) are discussed from p 14. Many practitioners were positive about the effect of s 60CC(2A) in re-prioritising family violence and protecting children from harm which leads to better outcomes for children.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children.

The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

The report contains numerous statistical comparisons of the situation pre- and post-reform. It identified that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility in the context of family violence or child abuse is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

A detailed overview of the prevalence of family violence allegations in family court proceedings after the amendments is provided from p 43. 36% of cases after the 2012 amendments involved allegations of family violence, compared with 26% pre-reform. The prevalence of allegations of both physical and emotional abuse also increased after the reforms, but this was more marked for physical violence.

The proportion of allegations made against both parents also increased (p 43). Other statistical interpretations of this data, such as the prevalence of family violence allegations after the reforms according to the way the matters were resolved (p 45) are provided.

An overview of factual issues raised (particularly how factual issues changed following the reforms) is provided from p 46. It is noted that issues such as substance abuse and mental ill health are ‘not uncommon’ for parents who use family law services (p 47).

Parental capacity is discussed in section 4.5 (p 89).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, ‘Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms’ (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

- See generally Chapter 2: ‘Characteristics of separated parents: Challenges and issues for family relationships and wellbeing’. Of particular relevance is the discussion from p 24 dealing with ‘Separated parents’ reports of experiencing family violence’. It was found that nearly two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that they suffered emotional abuse from their partner before or during separation. 26% of mothers and 16.8% of fathers indicated that they suffered physical abuse prior to their separation. Of this group, most respondents indicated that their children witnessed violence or abuse.

- See from p 29 which considers - 'Co-occurrence of family violence, mental health problems and addiction issues'. It was found that parents who indicated that both mental health and addiction issues were present were most likely to report that the other parent had physically hurt them (43% of fathers and 50% of mothers). Overall, 'experiences of family violence were reported by 85% of fathers and 92% of mothers who said that both mental health and addiction issues had been present before separation, compared with 41% of fathers and 46% of mothers who said that neither of these problems had been present. In other words, family violence seemed to be pervasive among families in which both mental health and addiction issues were thought to be present' (p 30).
- See Chapter 10: 'Family violence and child abuse: Parents' pathways and professionals' perspectives'. This chapter is relevant in relation to its general discussion of family violence in the family law system.
- See Chapter 11, 'Children's wellbeing', in particular section 11.3 (p 262) which discusses 'Family violence, safety issues and the nature of inter-parental relationships'.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders. See especially from p 179 which discusses ‘Shared parenting and family violence’. The author notes, ‘the issue of protecting women and children from violence has not proved effective as an argument against laws that recognise the indissolubility of parenthood, nor against having any provisions in legislation that encourage the continuing involvement of non-resident parents. One reason is the lack of an evidence base for the supposed connection between laws that encourage the involvement of non-resident parents in their children’s lives, and an increased risk of violence. There is simply no evidence for a linear relationship between the time that non-resident parents spend with their children, and a greater incidence of post-separation violence towards the primary caregiver.’

The chapter concludes – ‘There is no future in arguments that say encouraging the involvement of both parents in children’s lives through legislation will expose women and children to a greater risk of violence. Successive Australian parliaments have responded to this argument not by winding back the emphasis in the law on the involvement of both parents but by enacting stronger and stronger legislative provisions that address, or purport to address, the issue of family violence… The issue of violence against women is one of great importance, but the middle ground is to be found in articulating more clearly the circumstances when parenthood ought to be dissoluble, rather than resisting the historic transformation in the law of parenting after separation. In that way, the law can avoid too simplistic a bifurcation where the only issue that might stand in the way of court orders for substantially shared care is if there is a proven history of family violence’ (p 183).

Qu, Lixia et al, ‘Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years’ (Commissioned report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2014).

The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examines the experiences, circumstances, and wellbeing of separated parents and their children in Australia. It was commissioned as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms, and three waves of surveys have now been conducted. This current report presents findings from wave 3, conducted in 2012 with 9,028 parents five years after separation. It explores the opinions and experiences of separated parents regarding: quality of inter-parental relationships; child-focused communication between parents; safety concerns and violence and abuse; use and perceived helpfulness of family law services; pathways for developing parenting arrangements; family dispute resolution; stability and change in care-time arrangements; property division and their timing and perceived fairness; and child support arrangements and compliance. The report also asks parents about their child's wellbeing, and compares this with care-time arrangements and family dynamics.'

The findings painted a positive picture of separated families overall but there were still a minority of parents who faced significant issues such as violence and abuse and held safety concerns. 'It has become increasingly clear that each of the mainstream professions in the family law system has a potentially constructive role to play in helping to untangle the serious predicaments in which a minority of family law clients find themselves' (p xix).

For example, higher levels in children's wellbeing emerged where parents indicated that there was a positive inter-parental relationship – 'consistently low or worsened child wellbeing was more likely to be reported by parents who reported experiencing violence/abuse, holding safety concerns, or having negative inter-parental relationship in both waves compared with reports of other parents' (p 162).

Also, where emotional abuse was experienced by a small minority of parents (in Wave 3 of the data), large proportions of these victims indicated that the abuse occurred 'sometimes or often', as opposed to 'rarely or only once' in the preceding 12 months (p 40).

'In fact, most respondents who stated that the other parent had engaged in humiliating insults, monitored their whereabouts, or circulated of defamatory comments also indicated that these behaviours occurred sometimes or often. After about five years of separation, the monitoring of a person's whereabouts may be particularly likely to reflect obsessive harassment, unless such monitoring has been instigated by genuine concerns about personal safety or the safety of others, including the children' (p 40).

Tomison, Adam M, 'Exploring Family Violence: Links Between Child Maltreatment and Domestic Violence' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 13, Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2000).

This article reviews the research about the relationship between domestic violence and various forms of child maltreatment. In particular, it points to the high proportion of cases of emotional abuse of children identified by child protection workers in families where there is domestic and family violence and to the mild association between presence of domestic violence and a higher than expected proportion of children sustaining injuries. Pages 8-9 of this article discusses the variety of ways a child may be exposed to domestic violence, including as a hostage to ensure the mother's return home and forcing a child to watch assaults.

Foundational information - Other Resources

Children: Safety and Risk.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website

. This webpage contains information about requirements to notify the Court about family violence and child abuse, family violence orders, risk assessment, Lighthouse, staying safe at court and getting help and support.

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Family Violence Information Sheet (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This information sheet contains important information for litigants who allege they have experienced, or are alleged to have perpetrated, family violence, including safety at court, legal and support services at court, and cross-examination.

Family Violence: Overview.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage outlines the principles which guide the FCFCA's response to family violence, behaviours which may constitute family violence, coercive and controlling behaviours which may amount to family violence and common forms of family violence.

It also contains links to information on:

- Help and support;
- Family violence orders;
- Family violence and children;
- How the court considers safety and risk;
- Safety at court;
- Frequently asked questions; and
- Lighthouse.

Family Violence Plan - Former Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan ‘builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation’. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan ‘contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.’

See in particular at p 2, ‘The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child’s best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.’

Guidelines for Independent Children’s Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

Independent Children’s Lawyer information sheet.

Accessible via Legal Aid Western Australia.

Independent Children’s Lawyers, National Legal Aid: About.

Includes information about the role of Independent Children’s Lawyers and links to information brochures for children, parents and potential supervisors.

Parental conflict and its effect on Children (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This fact sheet provides information for parents about the ways family conflict affects children, both in families who live together and in families who have separated.

In families where there is a high level of conflict and animosity between parents, children are at a greater risk of developing emotional, social and behavioural problems, as well as difficulties with concentration and educational achievement.

Frequent and intense conflict or fighting between parents also has a negative impact on children's sense of safety and security which affects their relationships with their parents and with others. Parental conflict that focuses on children is also linked to adjustment problems, particularly when children blame themselves for their parents' problems.

'Good quality parenting', that is parenting that provides structure, warmth, emotional support and positive reinforcement, has been found to reduce the impact of conflict.

Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Former Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the jurisdiction of the Court, including its family law jurisdiction, and the Court's aspirations for engagement with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. The Plan 'provides a platform to introduce measures to promote reconciliation and addresses some of the barriers faces by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. In doing this, the Plan provides four focus areas for the Court: relationships; respect; opportunities; and tracking progress.

What is an Independent Children's Lawyer?

A brochure accessible via:

Legal Aid New South Wales

Legal Aid Queensland

Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania

FCFCA Family Violence Best Practice Principles

> Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

FCFCA Family Violence Best Practice Principles - Cited References

The following references are cited in the Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence: Improving Legal Frameworks (Consultation Paper, 2010).

On 17 July 2009, the Attorney-General of Australia, the Hon Robert McClelland MP, asked the Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC) to conduct an Inquiry together with the New South Wales Law Reform Commission (NSWLRC) into particular questions in relation to family violence that had arisen from the 2009 report of the National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time for Action. At its meeting on 16–17 April 2009, the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General (SCAG) agreed that Australian law reform commissions should work together to consider these issues. The ALRC was asked to consider the issues of:

1. the interaction in practice of State and Territory family/domestic violence and child protection laws with the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and relevant Commonwealth, State and Territory criminal laws; and
2. the impact of inconsistent interpretation or application of laws in cases of sexual assault occurring in a family/domestic violence context, including rules of evidence, on victims of such violence' (p 7).

The Consultation Paper is arranged in five Parts: an introductory section, followed by parts dividing up the subject areas of the Terms of Reference as providing the lens through which the interaction issues are considered' (p 91).

Bartels, Lorana, 'Emerging Issues in Domestic/Family Violence Research', Research in Practice report no.10, Australian Institute of Criminology, April 2010.

The paper presents an overview of the key emerging issues in Australian domestic and family violence research. In particular, the paper considers this research in the context of gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex communities; the elderly; those with disabilities; people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds; Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities; homelessness; the impact on children; and issues around perpetrator programs.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

Professor Chisholm was required to 'assess the appropriateness of the legislation, practices and procedures' that apply in cases where family violence is an issue and to recommend improvements. The author acknowledged the challenges that family violence presents for the family law system and observed that more than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent (p 4). The report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

Jaffe, Peter G et al 'Custody Disputes Involving Allegations of Domestic Violence: Towards a Differentiated Approach to Parenting Plans' (2008) 46 Family Court Review 500.

Premised on the understanding that domestic violence is a broad concept that encompasses a wide range of behaviors from isolated events to a pattern of emotional, physical, and sexual abuse that controls the victim, this article addresses the need for a differentiated approach to developing parenting plans after separation when domestic violence is alleged. A method of assessing risk by screening for the potency, pattern, and primary perpetrator of the violence is proposed as a foundation for generating hypotheses about the type of and potential for future violence as well as parental functioning.

James, Kerrie, 'Domestic Violence Within Refugee Families: Intersecting Patriarchal Culture and the Refugee Experience' (2010) 31 The Australian and New Zealand Journal of Family Therapy 275.

This article examines the stages of the refugee journey and the intersections of domestic violence with culture, trauma, resettlement and masculinity. Arguing that therapists must challenge aspects of culture that promote violations of women's human rights while understanding the unique situation of refugee families, the article concludes by identifying principles for therapeutic and community based interventions. See in particular at 276 where the author notes 'The popular view of culture is essentialist; that is, a view of culture as fixed and immutable. Yet 'culture' is not a bounded entity experienced in the same way by all people within it. Culture is diverse, fluid and contested, intersecting with oppression and power. Within cultures there is often strong opposition to harsh and unjust practices and to people using religion or tradition to justify women's oppression and exploitation.'

Kelly, Joan B & Johnson, Michael P, 'Differentiation Among Types of Intimate Partner Violence: Research Update and Implications for Interventions' (2008) 46 Family Court Review 476.

A growing body of empirical research has demonstrated that intimate partner violence is not a unitary phenomenon and that types of domestic violence can be differentiated with respect to partner dynamics, context, and consequences. The authors describe four patterns of violence: Coercive Controlling Violence, Violent Resistance, Situational Couple Violence, and Separation-Instigated Violence. The controversial matter of gender symmetry and asymmetry in intimate partner violence is discussed in terms of sampling differences and methodological limitations. Implications of differentiation among types of domestic violence include the need for improved screening measures and procedures in civil, family, and criminal court and the possibility of better decision making, appropriate sanctions, and more effective treatment programs tailored to the characteristics of different types of partner violence. The authors argue that in the family court, reliable differentiation should provide the basis for determining what safeguards are necessary and what types of parenting plans are appropriate to ensure healthy outcomes for children and parent–child relationships.

Laing, Lesley, 'No Way To Live' (June 2010).

This research explored the experiences of 22 women as they navigated the family law system following their separation from a relationship in which they had experienced domestic violence. The research was conducted following the 2006 reforms to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) relating to shared parental responsibility.

McIntosh, Jennifer et al, 'Post-Separation Parenting Arrangements and Development Outcomes for Infants and Children' [2011] (86) Family Matters 41.

In recent years there has been much interest in the impacts on children, both positive and negative, of different patterns of parenting after separation, especially where the care of children is shared equally or substantially between both parents. This article summarises key findings from two recent Australian studies of outcomes for two potential risk groups: school-aged children living in separations characterised by high inter-parental conflict (Study 1), and infants and preschoolers in the general population of separated families (Study 2). Both studies were commissioned by the Australian Government Attorney-General's Department.

National Scientific Council on the Developing Child, 'Excessive Stress Disrupts the Architecture of the Developing Brain' Working Paper No 3 (2005).

This working paper from the National Scientific Council on the Developing Child defines the concept of "toxic stress"—what happens when children experience severe, prolonged adversity without adult support. It discusses how significant adversity early in life can alter a child's capacity to learn and adapt to stressful situations, as well as how sensitive and responsive caregiving can buffer the effects of such stress.

Perry, Bruce D, 'Applying Principles of Neurodevelopment to Clinical Work with Maltreated and Traumatized Children', in Working with Traumatized Youth in Child Welfare, ed by Nancy Boyd Webb, Guilford Press NY (2006).

This chapter examines therapeutic work with maltreated children from a neurodevelopmental perspective. The overarching premises of this perspective are that an awareness of human brain development and functioning provides practical insights into the origins of the abnormal functioning seen following adverse developmental experiences (e.g. abuse, neglect, and trauma), and, furthermore, that an understanding of how neural systems change suggests specific therapeutic interventions (p 27). See in particular at p 40, where the author notes 'The majority of (the) sequential and use-dependent development of the brain takes places in early childhood. Indeed, by age 4, a child's brain is 90% adult size. The organizing brain is very malleable and responsive to the environment. This means that of all the experiences throughout the life of an individual, the organizing experiences of early childhood have the most powerful and enduring effects on brain organization and functioning. Three years of neglect can cause a lifetime of dysfunction and lost potential'.

Sturge, Claire and Danya Glaser, 'Contact and Domestic Violence – The Experts' Court Report' (2000) 30 Family Law, 615-629.

This expert report was prepared for the cases Re L (Contact: Domestic Violence); Re V (Contact: Domestic Violence); Re M (Contact: Domestic Violence); Re H (Contact: Domestic Violence) [2000] 2 FLR 334. The experts were asked to prepare an opinion on the circumstances in which a child should have no contact with a parent who has used or exposed the child to domestic and family violence. The adverse effects on children of being exposed to family violence are discussed.

At p 615, the authors discuss the psychiatric principles of contact between the child and the non-residential parent as guided by developmental and psychological knowledge, theory and research. This includes knowledge of child development, interactional issues and innate factors. These core principles should guide decisions relating to contact. The different purposes of contact are discussed at p 616. The benefits and risk of direct and indirect contact with the non-residential parent is discussed from p 617-619.

Warrier, Sujata 'It's in Their Culture: Fairness and Cultural Considerations in Domestic Violence' (2008) 46 Family Court Review 537.

This essay attempts to critique the prevailing thinking on culture and cultural competency within the context of domestic violence. See in particular at p 539, where the author notes 'Thinking of culture as fixed leads us to make generalizations based only upon ethnic or racial identification. Such thinking conveniently overlooks the intersection of other categories such as class, sexual orientation, disability, immigration status, and so on. Further, none of these categories are fixed in time or one-dimensional. All these categories intersect in individuals and groups differently and change over time as the social and political landscape changes.'

Key statutory provisions in Family Law Act (Cth) and Family Court Act (WA)

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- amend the parenting order framework by refining the list of 'best interests' factors, removing the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and related equal time and substantial and significant time provision, and clarifying the circumstances in which a court can vary an existing parenting order;
- redraft provisions relating to compliance with, and enforcement of, parenting orders;
- amend definitions relating to the concept of 'family' to be more inclusive of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture and traditions;
- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view;
- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;
- makes consequential amendments to the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021;

Amends the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021 to:

- allow registrars of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCOA) to be delegated the power to impose a make-up time parent order in contravention proceedings;
- bring forward the review of the Act by 2 years;
- provide that a judge of the Family Court of Western Australia can be dually appointed as a judge of Division 1 of the FCFCOA; and

Amends Family Law Act 1975 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021

- to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

Commonwealth Family Law Act 1975

Definitions

- Interpretation : "abuse" – Section 4
- Definition of family violence etc – Section 4AB

Best interests of the child

- Objects of Part – Section 60B
- Child's best interests paramount consideration in making a parenting order – Section 60CA
- How a court determines what is in a child's best interests – Section 60CC (note: s60CC(2A) risk of harm prioritised over meaningful relationship)
- Informing court of relevant family violence orders – Section 60CF
- Court to consider risk of family violence – Section 60CG
- Informing court of care arrangements under child welfare laws – Section 60CH
- Informing court of notifications to, and investigations by, prescribed State or Territory agencies – Section 60CI
- Adviser's obligations in relation to best interests of the child – Section 60D

Family dispute resolution

- Attending family dispute resolution before applying for Part VII order – Section 60I (note: exception in s60I(9))
- Family dispute resolution not attended because of child abuse or family violence – Section 60J

Parental responsibility

- Meaning of parental responsibility – Section 61B

- Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility when making parenting orders – Section 61DA

Parenting orders

- Court to consider child spending equal time or substantial or significant time with each parent in certain circumstances – Section 65DAA
- Effect of parenting order that provides for shared parental responsibility – Section 65DAC

Allegations of child abuse and family violence

- Where member of the Court personnel, family counsellor et al suspects child abuse etc – Section 67ZA
- Where interested person makes allegation of family violence – Section 67ZBA
- Court to take prompt action in relation to allegations of child abuse or family violence – Section 67ZBB
- Cross examination of parties where allegations of family violence – Sections 102NA and 102NB

Injunctions

- Injunctions – Section 68B
- Powers of arrest – Section 68C
- Injunctions – Section 114

Recovery orders

- Recovery orders – Section 67U FLA
- Stop and search, entry powers and the use of force – Section 67Q FLA

Family violence

- Obligations of court making an order or granting an injunction under this Act that is inconsistent with an existing family violence order – Section 68P
- Power of court making a family violence order to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an existing order, injunction or arrangement under this Act – Section 68R
- Special provisions relating to proceedings to make an interim (or interim variation of) family violence order – Section 68T

Conducting child-related proceedings

- Principles for conducting child-related proceedings – Section 69ZN

- General duties – Section 69ZQ
- Evidence relating to child abuse or family violence – Section 69ZW

Vexatious proceedings

- Summary decrees – Section 45A
- Definitions: "vexatious proceedings" – Section 102Q
- Making vexatious proceedings orders – Section 102QB

Western Australia Family Court Act 1997

Definitions

- Interpretation : "abuse" – Section 5
- Definition of family violence etc – Section 9A

Best interests of the child

- Objects of Part – Section 66
- Child's best interests paramount consideration in making a parenting order – Section 66A
- How a court determines what is in a child's best interests – Section 66C (note: s66C(3A) risk of harm prioritised over meaningful relationship)
- Informing court of relevant family violence orders – Section 66F
- Court to consider risk of family violence – Section 66G
- Informing court of care arrangements under child welfare laws – Section 66HA
- Informing court of notifications to, and investigations by, prescribed State or Territory agencies – Section 66HB
- Adviser's obligations in relation to best interests of the child – Section 66HC

Family dispute resolution

- Attending family dispute resolution before applying for Part VII order – Section 66H (note: exception in s66H(8))
- Family dispute resolution not attended because of child abuse or family violence – Section 66I

Parental responsibility

- Term used: parental responsibility – Section 68
- Presumption of equal shared parental responsibility when making parenting orders – Section 70A

Parenting orders

- Court to consider child spending equal time or substantial or significant time with each parent in certain circumstances – Section 89AA
- Effect of parenting order that provides for shared parental responsibility – Section 89AC

Allegations of child abuse and family violence

- Where member of the Court personnel, family counsellor et al suspects child abuse etc – Section 160
- Where interested person makes allegations of family violence – Section 162A
- Court to take prompt action in relation to allegations of child abuse or family violence – Section 162B

Injunctions

- Injunctions – Section 235
- Injunctions – Section 235A
- Powers of arrest where injunction breached – Section 236

Recovery orders

- Recovery orders – Section153
- Stop and search, entry powers and the use of force – Section 149

Family violence

- Obligations of court making an order or granting an injunction under this Act that is inconsistent with an existing family violence order – Section 174
- Power of court making a family violence order to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an existing order, injunction or arrangement under this Act – Section 176
- Special provisions relating to proceedings to make an interim (or interim variation of) family violence order – Section 178

Conducting child-related proceedings

- Principles for conducting child-related proceedings – Section 202B
- Evidence relating to child abuse or family violence – Section 202K

Vexatious proceedings

- Frivolous or vexatious proceedings – Section 242

Intersection of legal systems

The most common legislative mechanism used to address domestic and family violence at state and territory level is the protection order (referred to as a 'family violence order' under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) – a civil law response to a victim's immediate concerns of safety (and in some jurisdictions, police are also empowered to initiate proceedings [Croucher 2014]).

Where domestic and family violence occurs in the context of families with children, and parents separate, parties may also apply to a court exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (primarily, the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia or Family Court of Western Australia) for parenting orders (under Part VII of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) and Part 5 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA) – here called a 'Family Court'). Proceedings for a parenting order can also be instituted in a state or territory court of summary jurisdiction subject to the limitations set out in Section 69N FLA and Section 43 FCA.

In all parenting proceedings the child's best interests are the paramount consideration (Section 60CA FLA; Section 66A FCA). In any determination of what is in a child's best interests a Family Court must give greater weight to ensuring that the child lives in an environment where they are safe from violence or abuse than any benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both parents (Section 60CC(2A) FLA; Section 66C(3A) FCA).

When allegations of child abuse or family violence are raised each party has an obligation to file and serve a Notice of Child Abuse, Family Violence or Risk of Family Violence (see Sections 67Z and 67ZBA FLA and Sections 159 and 162A FCA).

When an allegation of family violence or abuse is raised, a Federal Circuit and Family Court is required to take prompt action (Section 67ZBB FLA and Section 162B FCA). Such prompt action includes considering what interim or procedural orders (if any) should be made to enable appropriate evidence about the allegation to be obtained as expeditiously as possible and so as to protect the child or any of the parties to the proceedings. Prompt action also includes making such orders as the court considers appropriate (such as orders or injunctions for personal protection of the child or any other person) and dealing with the issues raised by the allegations as expeditiously as possible.

A Family Court has the power to gather evidence directly through:

- Obtaining material from a child welfare authority, police or other prescribed government agency by order (Section 69ZW FLA; Section 202K FCA);
- Requesting information as a "Prescribed Body" under state and territory child welfare laws;
- Requesting material from other courts and tribunals, subject to any legislative limitations on such requests. This may be of particular assistance when seeking to obtain transcripts of evidence given in other courts or tribunals so that it may be received into evidence in child-related proceedings (Section 69ZX FLA; Section 202L FCA);
- Ordering parties to attend one or more appointments with a Family Consultant who then prepares and provides a report to the Court (Sections 11F and 62G FLA; Sections 65 and 73 FCA);
- Appointing an Independent Children's Lawyer (Section 68L FLA; Section 164 FCA);
- Requiring that a party or Independent Children's Lawyer file and serve a subpoena.

When making a parenting order, a Family Court must apply a presumption that it is in the best interests of the child for the child's parents to have equal shared parental responsibility (Section 61DA(1) FLA; Section 70A(1) FCA). However, the presumption does not apply where there are reasonable grounds to believe that a parent or person living with a parent has engaged in child abuse or family violence and the presumption may be rebutted by evidence which demonstrates that the application of the presumption is contrary to the child's best interests.

Parties are required to ensure that a copy of any existing protection order is filed with a Family Court when making an application for parenting orders (Section 60CF FLA; s.66F FCA) (see also 10.5 Information sharing) and if a protection order is in force the court must consider any relevant inferences that can be drawn from the protection order by taking into account the nature of the order, the circumstances in which the order was made, any evidence admitted in proceedings for the order, any findings made in the protection order proceedings and any other relevant matter (Section 60CC(3)(k) FLA; Section 66C(3)(k) FCA). Where, however, a party withdraws their protection order application on the basis of undertakings given by the other party to the court; where a protection order is made by consent without admission; and where the responding party makes a cross application resulting in mutual orders [ALRC & NSWLRC 2010], there may be no admission of fact capable of being relied upon by a Family Court in making a determination regarding the perpetration of domestic and family violence.

In considering a parenting order, a Family Court must, to the extent that it is possible to do so consistently with the child's best interests being the paramount consideration, ensure that the order is consistent with any protection order and does not expose any person to an unacceptable risk of domestic and family violence (Section 60CG FLA; Section 66G FCA). While a Family Court has no jurisdiction to vary a protection order, it is permitted by Section 68P FCA and Section 174 FCA to make a parenting order (or make a recovery order or grant an injunction) that is inconsistent with the protection order, however the court must ensure the parties fully understand the nature and effect of the parenting order. This may occur in cases where information or evidence comes before a Family Court that was not available to the court of summary jurisdiction that made the protection order. In circumstances of ongoing violence, where a protected person is having difficulty with enforcement of a protection order as a result of the operation of a parenting order made by a Family Court, the protected person may need to return to the court of summary jurisdiction and make application under Section 68R FLA or Section 176 FCA to ensure the consistency and enforceability of orders.

In making or varying a protection order, a court of summary jurisdiction is empowered to resolve any inconsistencies with an existing parenting order (Section 68R FLA; Section 176 FCA). There is, however, an inherent tension between the focus of protection orders and parenting orders: on the one hand, the protection order may direct one parent to keep away from the other parent and their children; on the other hand, the parenting order is focused on the time (with possible conditions including supervision) that children are to spend with their parents and with whom the children shall live.

Intervention by a child protection authority may present additional challenges: a parent experiencing domestic and family violence by the other parent is expected to be protective of their children, or risk having them removed by the relevant child protection authority. When a protection order is in force it is possible that a Family Court determining a subsequent application for a parenting order may make an order that permits the respondent in the protection order application proceedings to spend time with the children, or requires the parent protected by the protection order to continue to have contact with the respondent (for example, at changeover times [Croucher 2014]). Such determinations would be made by reference to the evidence in the particular case and an assessment of risk. For example, a Family Court may consider it necessary for changeovers to occur at a neutral venue and/or to be arranged in a way where the parties are not required to come into contact with one another.

When a child is subject to a state or territory child welfare order a Family Court cannot make a parenting order with respect to that child unless the order is expressed to come into effect at the expiration of the child welfare order or with the consent of the relevant child protection authority (Section 69ZK FLA; Section 202 FCA). The 2010 joint Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission Report [ALRC & NSWLRC 2010], Family Violence—A National Legal Response noted that "…each state and territory has its own system of child protection laws and supporting agencies. These laws are invoked when parents are determined to be insufficiently protective of a child. In each jurisdiction there are thresholds for intervention by child protection authorities to protect children and to assist parents and families."

As these thresholds vary considerably between jurisdictions, a Family Court considering a parenting order application may experience some difficulty in deciding the relevance of and weight to be given to information provided by a child protection authority. Child protection cases may potentially present themselves in multiple jurisdictions: a state or territory children's court for care proceedings; a state or territory criminal court if the violence or abuse is subject to criminal charges; a state or territory magistrates' court for a protection order application; and a Family Court for parenting orders. The need to go to multiple courts increases the possibility of inconsistent orders, and the possibility that parties will drop out of the system without the protections they need, thus putting them at risk of further violence abuse [ALRC & NSWLRC 2010].

The families most likely to be involved with more than one of these jurisdictions are those with support needs associated with domestic and family violence at a time of high risk and vulnerability. For example, a party may be an applicant for a protection order, a prosecution witness for assault charges where they are the victim, a respondent in a child protection application, and simultaneously experiencing related legal issues concerning parenting issues and housing and debt [Family Law Council 2015]. While the expectation of the courts is that in matters relating to domestic and family violence and child abuse the legal responses should be as seamless as possible, the fragmentation of legal systems and differing requirements and processes in each may be confusing to affected parties, in particular those who are self-represented, and may result in delays in the finalisation of cases [Croucher 2014].

Intersection of legal systems - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. The effect of family violence and parenting arrangements is discussed at [15.11] (p 675). The report notes that –

- ‘Spousal abuse may not end with separation—in particular, abusive controlling violence may escalate after separation.
- People who use family violence may be deficient or even abusive parents and poor role models for their children. They may also undermine their victims’ parenting role.
- Victims of family violence may find parenting difficult, as a result of abuse, poor self-esteem and the stress of separation and court proceedings. Time, protection and support may be required to re-establish their parenting role. A victim’s behaviour under the stress of an abusive relationship or separation should not prejudice parenting decisions.’

Chisholm, Richard, ‘Family Courts Violence Review: A Report’ (Canberra: Attorney-General’s Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

See generally from p 4 – ‘There are few more difficult or more important challenges for the family law system than dealing with cases where family violence is an issue. Family violence happens throughout the community, and is especially likely to be present among families that separate and resort to the family law system. More than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent, and violence issues often go together with other problems, for example those associated with substance abuse and mental ill-health. Violence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is directed specifically at them. These cases present the courts with truly daunting tasks: to provide a setting in which the parties feel safe and confident that they will be treated with respect; to deal with the cases with necessary efficiency but most importantly with justice and fairness; and to ensure as far as possible that arrangements made for children, whether as a result of the parties' consent or by the court's adjudication, are suitable for their needs, which will include being safe and having both parents contribute to their developmental needs' (p 4).

The theme of the report is discussed at p 5 - 'A theme that recurred during the Review was that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon. This theme seems helpful whether we are thinking of a lawyer interviewing a client, a dispute resolution practitioner dealing with a new case, the work of a counter clerk at a family court, or of a judicial officer. The family law system, and each component in it, needs to encourage and facilitate the disclosure of family violence, ensure that it is understood, and act effectively upon that understanding'.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter discusses the history and place of family law in Australia's federal system. Difficulties in addressing family violence in what is an often fragmented legal framework are discussed. Many different courts and jurisdictions are involved, especially where the dispute extends between states or territories. This is particularly problematic where child protection is an issue.

Family Law Council, 'In Response to the first two terms of reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems' (Interim Report to the Attorney-General, June 2015).

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the first two matters. The remaining matters will be dealt with in a report due June 2016.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

This report comprehensively summarises the legislative provisions governing the resolution of parenting disputes under the Family Law Act, and the intersection with legal systems governing family violence and child protection. Some important observations:

- Fragmented legal systems – families most likely to be involved with more than one of these jurisdictions are those with support needs associated with DFV and at a time of high risk and vulnerability (child protection/children's court; family courts; state/territory DFV courts)
- Reluctance by state/territory magistrates to use s68R FLA to vary Family Court orders when making DFV orders in order to resolve inconsistencies between DFV orders and parenting orders; can be done on its own motion without the consent of the parties; and sometimes magistrates assume that the parenting order is sufficient to protect child without needing to include the child on the DFV order (concerns about inadequate time limits in s68T on variation/suspension of parenting order where done in interim proceedings)
- The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions examined similar concerns about the use of s 68R by state and territory magistrates and the application of s 68T in their 2010 Family Violence – A National Legal Response report. They concluded that the underuse of s 68R at that time was attributable to a range of factors, including:
    - a lack of awareness or understanding of s 68R among judicial officers, lawyers police and others involved in family violence protection order proceedings;

- a view taken by some magistrates that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for the family courts;
- judicial officers lacking adequate information or evidence necessary to amend the parenting orders; and
- parties to proceedings not having access to appropriate legal advice.

Family Law Council, Report to the Attorney-General on 'Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems: Final Report, June 2016 (Terms, 3, 4 & 5)'.

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the matters listed below in items 3, 4 and 5.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

The Family Law Council made 22 recommendations (summarised at pp12-18) in the following areas:

- Family safety services
- Early whole-of-family risk assessments
- Family lawyers and risk identifications
- Family dispute resolution practitioners and risk management strategies
- Judicial risk assessments and court-ordered programs
- A court-based integrated services model
- Case-managed integrated services in the family relationships sector
- Self-represented litigants with complex needs
- Support services for families in rural and regional areas
- Collaboration between family law and state and territory courts
- Family violence competency
- Joint professional development
- Children's views and experiences
- Family dispute resolution and confidentiality
- State and territory courts exercising family law jurisdiction
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families
- Culturally and linguistically diverse families
- Court support workers
- Self-represented litigants and misuse of process
- Crossover cases
- Consent parenting orders
- Legislative reform.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the protection of children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers how the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia deals with matters involving children where there are allegations of abuse. It identifies that the balancing of the interests of the children and the parents, and frequently of other people associated with the children, is at the centre of what is just in the family law system. This issue is examined here, together with the differences in the roles of judges and experts in child development and abuse, and child psychology and psychiatry, and how each has a part to play in the system of justice. Also of concern is how the voices of children are being heard in the system. Evidence issues are discussed in detail.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of practices and perspectives of family law professionals (n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
    - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
    - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts and
    - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who had separated between 1 July 2010 and 31 December 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who had separated between 1 July 2012 and 31 December 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 represents parents' their post-reform experiences.

Together with the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families (LSSF) Wave 1 data, these samples of separated parents reported similar levels of family violence, with around 1 in 5 parents indicating they suffered physical hurt by their former partner and nearly 2 in 5 reporting emotional abuse alone (p 14). See generally chapter 3 – 'Family Violence and Safety Concerns'. Most parents in both cohorts reported at least one type of emotional abuse before/during or since separation (p 58). Further, 'overall, mothers reported experiencing emotional abuse in greater proportions than fathers both before/during separation and since separation' (p 58). The most commonly reported form of emotional abuse (see p24) was '—insults with the intent to shame, belittle or humiliate' (p 58). A similar proportion of parents in both cohorts reported that their children saw or heard family violence prior to or during separation (p 60). However, the proportion of parents reporting that their children witnessed family violence in the period since separation decreased in the second cohort.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

It concludes that 'overall, the general patterns in findings suggest a positive response to the 2012 family violence reforms, with practitioner responses indicating that protection from harm is given greater weight now than it was previously, and that advice-giving practices have shifted in a direction consistent with the intent of the reforms to better identify families where this is an issue. At the same time, the responses do not suggest that any less weight is placed on maintaining relationships with parents and children after separation where this is appropriate' (p 13).

Practitioners' views about striking the right balance between protecting a child from harm and maintaining a meaningful relationship with both parents (in the context of the 2012 reforms and the 'tie-breaker' provision (s 60CC(2A)) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) are discussed from p 14. Many practitioners were positive about the effect of s 60CC(2A) in re-prioritising family violence and protecting children from harm which leads to better outcomes for children.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children.

The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

The report contains numerous statistical comparisons of the situation pre- and post-reform. It identified that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility in the context of family violence or child abuse is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

A detailed overview of the prevalence of family violence allegations in family court proceedings after the amendments is provided from p 43. 36% of cases after the 2012 amendments involved allegations of family violence, compared with 26% pre-reform. The prevalence of allegations of both physical and emotional abuse also increased after the reforms, but this was more marked for physical violence.

The proportion of allegations made against both parents also increased (p 43). Other statistical interpretations of this data, such as the prevalence of family violence allegations after the reforms according to the way the matters were resolved (p 45) are provided.

An overview of factual issues raised (particularly how factual issues changed following the reforms) is provided from p 46. It is noted that issues such as substance abuse and mental ill health are 'not uncommon' for parents who use family law services (p 47).

Parental capacity is discussed in section 4.5 (p 89).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

- See generally Chapter 2: 'Characteristics of separated parents: Challenges and issues for family relationships and wellbeing'. Of particular relevance is the discussion from p 24 dealing with 'Separated parents' reports of experiencing family violence'. It was found that nearly two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that they suffered emotional abuse from their partner before or during separation. 26% of mothers and 16.8% of fathers indicated that they suffered physical abuse prior to their separation. Of this group, most respondents indicated that their children witnessed violence or abuse.

- See from p 29 which considers - 'Co-occurrence of family violence, mental health problems and addiction issues'. It was found that parents who indicated that both mental health and addiction issues were present were most likely to report that the other parent had physically hurt them (43% of fathers and 50% of mothers). Overall, 'experiences of family violence were reported by 85% of fathers and 92% of mothers who said that both mental health and addiction issues had been present before separation, compared with 41% of fathers and 46% of mothers who said that neither of these problems had been present. In other words, family violence seemed to be pervasive among families in which both mental health and addiction issues were thought to be present' (p 30).
- See Chapter 10: 'Family violence and child abuse: Parents' pathways and professionals' perspectives'. This chapter is relevant in relation to its general discussion of family violence in the family law system.
- See Chapter 11, 'Children's wellbeing', in particular section 11.3 (p 262) which discusses 'Family violence, safety issues and the nature of inter-parental relationships'.

Intersection of legal systems - Other Resources

Family Violence Information Sheet (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This information sheet contains important information for litigants who allege they have experienced, or are alleged to have perpetrated, family violence, including safety at court, legal and support services at court, and cross-examination.

Family Violence Plan - Former Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan 'builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation'. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan 'contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.'

See in particular at p 2, 'The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child's best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.'

Jurisdiction of FCFCA

In Australia, there is now a single court where jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) is predominantly exercised: the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCA). State courts of summary jurisdiction (usually the relevant local court or magistrates' court) are also able to exercise jurisdiction under the FLA. Prior to 2021 there were two federal courts exercising jurisdiction under the FLA, the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

The former Family Court was a superior court of record which has original jurisdiction to hear family law matters. It is intended by the merger of the Family Court and the Federal Circuit Court that Divison 1 of the FCFCA will be a continuation of the Family Court of Australia and Division 2 will be a continuation of the Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Division 1 of the FCFCA deals with the most complex and intractable parenting disputes requiring substantial court time. These cases often involve allegations of physical or sexual abuse of children, family violence, mental health issues, and substance abuse. Other areas of family law affecting children that Division 1 deals with include domestic and international relocation, international child abduction and the Hague convention, as well as medical procedures requiring court authorisation. Division 1 also acts as an appeal court from decisions of single judges of Division 1 (and the former Family Court) and Division 2 (and the former FCCC). The number of cases that are now dealt with at first instance in the Division 1 (formerly the Family Court) represents a small percentage of all family law cases as the majority of parenting cases are now dealt with in Division 2.

Division 2 is also a court of record and of law and equity however it is not a superior court. Division 2 is considered the high-volume or trial court and deals with most divorce applications and the majority of first instance family law applications nationally (excluding Western Australia). On 12 April 2013 the name of the former FCCA was changed from the Federal Magistrates Court to the FCCA. Division 2 regularly conducts regional circuits and has judges based in all capital cities and some regional cities. Division 2 has jurisdiction in family law and child support though does not have jurisdiction to determine matters relating to adoption or applications for nullity or validity of marriage.

In Western Australia, family law cases are dealt with by the Family Court of Western Australia.

Jurisdiction of FCFCA - Other Resources

About the Court.

Open via the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage outlines the anticipated benefits of the new Court structure.

The Court now “comprises two divisions:

- Division 1 (a continuation of the Family Court of Australia) deals with family law matters. Division 1 has 35 specialist family law judges hearing both trials and appeals.
- Division 2 (a continuation of the Federal Circuit Court of Australia) deals with family law, migration and general federal law matters. Division 2 has 76 judges; 55 of which are specialists in family law and the remainder experts in various areas of general federal law and migration.

The Court will operate under the leadership of one Chief Justice with the support of one Deputy Chief Justice, who each hold a dual commission to both Divisions of the Court. A second Deputy Chief Judge assists in the management of the general federal law and Fair Work jurisdictions of Division 2.”

Family Violence Information Sheet (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This information sheet contains important information for litigants who allege they have experienced, or are alleged to have perpetrated, family violence, including safety at court, legal and support services at court, and cross-examination.

Family Violence Plan - [Former] Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan ‘builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation’. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan ‘contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.’

See in particular at p 2, ‘The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child’s best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.’

Jurisdiction of the Family Court of Western Australia

The Family Court of Western Australia (FCWA) is the only state Family Court in Australia, established under the Family Court Act 1975 (WA; now repealed,) and continued by the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA).

The FCWA and the Magistrates Court of Western Australia exercise federal jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in relation to matrimonial causes where there is a nexus to Western Australia (s35 FCA, s38 FCA) between married parties, or unmarried parents of a child located outside Western Australia.

The FCWA's non -federal jurisdiction (s36 FCA) includes making parenting orders in respect of children of unmarried parents, and determination of financial disputes between unmarried parties when the threshold tests of jurisdiction are satisfied (s205X FCA). The principles the court must apply in the exercise of its non-federal jurisdiction mirror the principles set out in s43 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (s37 FCA). Appeals in the non-federal jurisdiction lie to the Supreme Court of Western Australia. See CDW v LVE [2015] WASCA 247 for discussion on the appeal process for interlocutory decisions.

Western Australian Family Law Magistrates are "specialist" magistrates co-located with the FCWA. In practice, federal and non-federal jurisdiction is exercised by Judges and Registrars of the FCWA and Family Law Magistrates throughout the state. Western Australian Magistrates not appointed Family Law Magistrates are unable to exercise family law jurisdiction in the Perth metropolitan region. Outside that region the family law jurisdiction is exercised by non-Family Law Magistrates initially, and defended cases are then transferred to a circuit of the FCWA (usually conducted by a Family Law Magistrate).

Although Family Law Magistrates have power to make restraining orders under the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) as "specialist" family law magistrates, they are not resourced to do so. The Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) empowers a court exercising family law jurisdiction to make a restraining order (s63(2)) subject to a number of conditions, including that the person against whom the order is sought must be present when the order is made and has been given the opportunity to be heard (s63(4)(c)).

The Family Court of Western Australia's case management guidelines provide that applications seeking parenting orders (regardless of whether other relief is sought) are allocated to a first return date in a child-related proceedings list, conducted by a Family Law Magistrate and allocated to the Magistrate's Track. The Family Law Magistrate is assisted by a family consultant in the child-related proceedings list, the family consultant having read the files and made enquiries regarding police information and DCPFS (Department for Child Protection and Family Support) information regarding the parties and the children. This information is reported to the Family Law Magistrate in open court in the presence of the parties. The family consultant may also suggest appropriate therapeutic services to which the parties may be ordered or referred. Proceedings are managed by the same Family Law Magistrate unless and until the proceedings are allocated to either the Standard Track (matters in which the trial is likely to exceed two days, or the monetary limit exceeds the ceiling of magistrates' jurisdiction in financial matters) or the Complex track (matters involving, for example, interstate or international relocation; complicated issues of fact, law or evidentiary material; or international issues such as jurisdiction).

Jurisdiction of the Family Court of Western Australia - Other Resources

Forms and resources of the Family Court of Western Australia.

This resource has links to Forms, Information Kits and Brochures and Legal Resources for use in the Family Court of Western Australia.

Jurisdiction of state/territory courts

Courts of summary jurisdiction, usually local, magistrates' or children's courts, have limited jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) (Sections 39, 39B, and 69J FLA). The position in Western Australia is different as it is the only state that has its own Family Court established under the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA) (Sections 38 and 39 FCA). Courts of summary jurisdiction have jurisdiction to hear defended property proceedings in relation to property with a total value up to $20,000 or such higher amount as prescribed by regulation (Section 46 and 46A FLA; Section 43A FCA) without restriction (Sections 39B FLA). They can also hear matters where the value of the property exceeds $20,000 or such higher amount as prescribed by regulation, with the consent of all parties. If a party does not consent, the matter must be transferred to the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Section 46 and 46A FLA; Section 43A FCA).

Courts of summary jurisdiction and courts prescribed in regulations under Section 69GA FLA also have jurisdiction in relation to children's matters. However, these courts cannot hear defended proceedings for a parenting order unless all parties consent (Section 69N FLA; Section 43 FCA). Should the parties not consent to the court determining the matter, then the court of summary jurisdiction or prescribed court must transfer the matter to the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. Before transferring the matter, the court of summary jurisdiction or prescribed court can make such orders as it considers necessary. If the parties consent to the court hearing a defended matter, the court of summary jurisdiction may still transfer the matter on its own initiative. Where a court is prescribed in regulations under Section 69GA FLA, the regulations may prescribe particular classes of proceedings in which the court has jurisdiction in relation to children's matters. The regulations may also prescribe state or territory rules of court as applying when the prescribed court is exercising its jurisdiction in relation to children's matters.

In addition to this jurisdiction, the FLA and FCA allow state and territory courts of summary jurisdiction, when making or varying a protection order under state or territory family violence legislation, to vary a parenting order. Section 68R FLA and Section 176 FCA permit a state or territory court with jurisdiction under Part VII Division 11 FLA/Part 5 FCA to 'revive, vary, discharge or suspend':

- a parenting or recovery order;
- an injunction granted under Section 68B or 114 FLA/Section 235 or 235A FCA

- an undertaking given to a court exercising jurisdiction under the FLA or FCA;
- a registered parenting plan; or
- a recognisance entered into under an order under the FLA or FCA.

Jurisdiction of state/territory courts - Other Resources

Forms and resources of the Family Court of Western Australia.

This resource has links to Forms, Information Kits and Brochures and Legal Resources for use in the Family Court of Western Australia.

Prevalence of domestic and family violence in the family law system

Parents engaged in the family law system may be affected by a complex range of interrelated issues including domestic and family violence, mental ill-health and substance misuse. For some of those parents, domestic and family violence may adversely affect their capacity to make decisions about parenting arrangements [Bagshaw et al 2011] and about the safety of themselves and their children [De Maio et al 2013].

Confirming earlier comparative findings, the Australian Institute of Family Studies reported in 2015 [Kaspiew et al Evaluation 2015] that family violence is a common experience among separated parents, with a majority of parents reporting either emotional or, to a lesser extent, physical abuse. Mothers reported experiencing either form of abuse before, during and since separation in greater proportions than fathers. In the post-separation period mothers were also more likely to report that they felt fearful, while fathers reported in greater proportions than mothers that they often felt coerced or controlled; reports in this context by mothers were substantially higher than those made by fathers. Feelings of fear, coercion and control were more commonly reported by parents who had experienced physical hurt and or/attempted unwanted sexual activity rather than emotional abuse. Research [Qu et al 2014] shows that by five years post separation, a minority of parents continue to face significant problems, including ongoing domestic and family violence, safety concerns, and highly conflictual or fearful inter-parental relationships.

The most commonly reported effects on day-to-day activities of experiencing domestic and family violence related to mental health, with mothers reporting a higher incidence. Significantly, for children of parents with domestic and family violence and safety concerns, a 2015 survey conducted by the Australian Institute of Family Studies showed an overall shift to spending 100% of nights with their mother, and daytime only contact with their father [Kaspiew et al Synthesis 2015].

Prevalence of domestic and family violence in the family law system - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. The effect of family violence and parenting arrangements is discussed at [15.11] (p 675). The report notes that –

- 'Spousal abuse may not end with separation—in particular, abusive controlling violence may escalate after separation.
- People who use family violence may be deficient or even abusive parents and poor role models for their children. They may also undermine their victims' parenting role.
- Victims of family violence may find parenting difficult, as a result of abuse, poor self-esteem and the stress of separation and court proceedings. Time, protection and support may be required to re-establish their parenting role. A victim's behaviour under the stress of an abusive relationship or separation should not prejudice parenting decisions.'

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports key findings of two national online surveys with adults and children in relation to post-separation parenting, which formed part of the larger research. Adult respondents described how family violence affected their parenting arrangements and their use of family services to assist with parenting decisions. There were gender differences in the reported experiences of and responses to violence, with women reporting more serious forms of violence than men. Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports. The study raised many questions about how well family law policies, as expressed in the legislation and implemented in the national service system, respond to violence in families such as those who were involved in this research (p 49).

Bromfield, Leah, et al, 'Issues for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children in Families with Multiple and Complex Problems: The Co-Occurrence of Domestic Violence, Parental Substance Misuse and Mental Health Problems' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2010).

This paper investigates the separate impacts of parental substance misuse, domestic violence and parental mental health problems. It presents evidence regarding the extent to which these problems co-occur and a discussion of the wider context of exclusion and disadvantage, its causes and its consequences. Finally, it provides an overview of research and theory for working with families with multiple and complex problems. This literature review cites statistics from a US study, the statistics were collected from household census data from over 20,000 households (G. Fox and M. Benson 'Violent men, bad dads? Fathering profiles of men involved in intimate partner violence.' In R. Day & M. Lamb (Eds.), Conceptualizing and measuring father involvement. (Mahwah, New Jersey: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates Publishers, 2004)):

- 37% of children were accidentally hurt during domestic violence;
- 26% of children were intentionally hurt during domestic violence;
- 49% of mothers were hurt protecting children;
- 47% of perpetrators used the child as pawn to hurt mothers;
- 39% of perpetrators hurt mothers as punishment for children's acts;
- 23% of perpetrators blamed mothers for perpetrators' own excessive punishment of children.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

See generally from p 4 – ‘There are few more difficult or more important challenges for the family law system than dealing with cases where family violence is an issue. Family violence happens throughout the community, and is especially likely to be present among families that separate and resort to the family law system. More than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent, and violence issues often go together with other problems, for example those associated with substance abuse and mental ill-health. Violence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is directed specifically at them. These cases present the courts with truly daunting tasks: to provide a setting in which the parties feel safe and confident that they will be treated with respect; to deal with the cases with necessary efficiency but most importantly with justice and fairness; and to ensure as far as possible that arrangements made for children, whether as a result of the parties’ consent or by the court’s adjudication, are suitable for their needs, which will include being safe and having both parents contribute to their developmental needs’ (p 4).

The theme of the report is discussed at p 5 - ‘A theme that recurred during the Review was that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon. This theme seems helpful whether we are thinking of a lawyer interviewing a client, a dispute resolution practitioner dealing with a new case, the work of a counter clerk at a family court, or of a judicial officer. The family law system, and each component in it, needs to encourage and facilitate the disclosure of family violence, ensure that it is understood, and act effectively upon that understanding’.

Croucher, Rosalind, ‘Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System’ in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter discusses the history and place of family law in Australia’s federal system. Difficulties in addressing family violence in what is an often fragmented legal framework are discussed. Many different courts and jurisdictions are involved, especially where the dispute extends between states or territories. This is particularly problematic where child protection is an issue.

De Maio, John, et al, 'Survey of Recently Separated Parents: A study of parents who separated prior to the implementation of the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Matters) Act 2011' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2013).

This report presents key findings from the Survey of Recently Separated Families (SRSP) 2012. The study aimed to gain a more detailed understanding of parents' experiences of family violence and concerns about child safety, and how well the legal system responds. Interviews were conducted with 6,119 parents who separated between 31 July 2010 and 31 December 2011 - that is, five years after the family law reforms of 2006 and one year prior to the legislative reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011. The study found that family violence is common among separated families, and though many of the participants reported this violence to police or other services, a sizeable minority (47%) of them did not.

Family Law Council, 'In Response to the first two terms of reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems' (Interim Report to the Attorney-General, June 2015).

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the first two matters. The remaining matters will be dealt with in a report due June 2016.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

This report comprehensively summarises the legislative provisions governing the resolution of parenting disputes under the Family Law Act, and the intersection with legal systems governing family violence and child protection. Some important observations:

- Fragmented legal systems – families most likely to be involved with more than one of these jurisdictions are those with support needs associated with DFV and at a time of high risk and vulnerability (child protection/children's court; family courts; state/territory DFV courts)
- Reluctance by state/territory magistrates to use s68R FLA to vary Family Court orders when making DFV orders in order to resolve inconsistencies between DFV orders and parenting orders; can be done on its own motion without the consent of the parties; and sometimes magistrates assume that the parenting order is sufficient to protect child without needing to include the child on the DFV order (concerns about inadequate time limits in s68T on variation/suspension of parenting order where done in interim proceedings)
- The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions examined similar concerns about the use of s 68R by state and territory magistrates and the application of s 68T in their 2010 Family Violence – A National Legal Response report. They concluded that the underuse of s 68R at that time was attributable to a range of factors, including:
    - a lack of awareness or understanding of s 68R among judicial officers, lawyers police and others involved in family violence protection order proceedings;
    - a view taken by some magistrates that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for the family courts;
    - judicial officers lacking adequate information or evidence necessary to amend the parenting orders; and
    - parties to proceedings not having access to appropriate legal advice.

Family Law Council, Report to the Attorney-General on 'Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems: Final Report, June 2016 (Terms, 3, 4 & 5)'.

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the matters listed below in items 3, 4 and 5.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

The Family Law Council made 22 recommendations (summarised at pp12-18) in the following areas:

- Family safety services
- Early whole-of-family risk assessments
- Family lawyers and risk identifications
- Family dispute resolution practitioners and risk management strategies
- Judicial risk assessments and court-ordered programs
- A court-based integrated services model
- Case-managed integrated services in the family relationships sector

- Self-represented litigants with complex needs
- Support services for families in rural and regional areas
- Collaboration between family law and state and territory courts
- Family violence competency
- Joint professional development
- Children's views and experiences
- Family dispute resolution and confidentiality
- State and territory courts exercising family law jurisdiction
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families
- Culturally and linguistically diverse families
- Court support workers
- Self-represented litigants and misuse of process
- Crossover cases
- Consent parenting orders
- Legislative reform.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the protection of children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers how the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia deals with matters involving children where there are allegations of abuse. It identifies that the balancing of the interests of the children and the parents, and frequently of other people associated with the children, is at the centre of what is just in the family law system. This issue is examined here, together with the differences in the roles of judges and experts in child development and abuse, and child psychology and psychiatry, and how each has a part to play in the system of justice. Also of concern is how the voices of children are being heard in the system. Evidence issues are discussed in detail.

Kaspiew, R., Carson, R., Rhoades, H., Qu, L., De Maio, J., Horsfall, B., & Stevens, E. (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022). ANROWS.

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. The other three parts of the research program are based on data collection from family law court files involving contravention applications, an online survey of parents and carers with family law parenting orders, and an analysis of the approaches applied to contravention in three international jurisdictions. (p11)

Systemic factors include shortcomings in the identification, assessment and management of risk. (p13)

When working with parents for the development of parenting orders, it is critical that practitioners ensure that safety and risk are adequately assessed and considered in the parenting arrangements. (p14)

This evidence demonstrates that the parents who obtain family law parenting orders are a particularly complex group, with concentrated levels of risk indicators. In light of the small proportion of parenting orders that involve contravention matters…, it is important to emphasise that the contravention regime is applied to a small subset of a particularly complex group of families. (p17)

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of practices and perspectives of family law professionals (n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently

Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and

- Court Outcomes Project involving:
  - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
  - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts and
  - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who had separated between 1 July 2010 and 31 December 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who had separated between 1 July 2012 and 31 December 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 represents parents' their post-reform experiences.

Together with the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families (LSSF) Wave 1 data, these samples of separated parents reported similar levels of family violence, with around 1 in 5 parents indicating they suffered physical hurt by their former partner and nearly 2 in 5 reporting emotional abuse alone (p 14). See generally chapter 3 – 'Family Violence and Safety Concerns'. Most parents in both cohorts reported at least one type of emotional abuse before/during or since separation (p 58). Further, 'overall, mothers reported experiencing emotional abuse in greater proportions than fathers both before/during separation and since separation' (p 58). The most commonly reported form of emotional abuse (see p24) was '—insults with the intent to shame, belittle or humiliate' (p 58). A similar proportion of parents in both cohorts reported that their children saw or heard family violence prior to or during separation (p 60). However, the proportion of parents reporting that their children witnessed family violence in the period since separation decreased in the second cohort.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

It concludes that 'overall, the general patterns in findings suggest a positive response to the 2012 family violence reforms, with practitioner responses indicating that protection from harm is given greater weight now than it was previously, and that advice-giving practices have shifted in a direction consistent with the intent of the reforms to better identify families where this is an issue. At the same time, the responses do not suggest that any less weight is placed on maintaining relationships with parents and children after separation where this is appropriate' (p 13).

Practitioners' views about striking the right balance between protecting a child from harm and maintaining a meaningful relationship with both parents (in the context of the 2012 reforms and the 'tie-breaker' provision (s 60CC(2A)) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) are discussed from p 14. Many practitioners were positive about the effect of s 60CC(2A) in re-prioritising family violence and protecting children from harm which leads to better outcomes for children.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children.

The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

The report contains numerous statistical comparisons of the situation pre- and post-reform. It identified that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility in the context of family violence or child abuse is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

A detailed overview of the prevalence of family violence allegations in family court proceedings after the amendments is provided from p 43. 36% of cases after the 2012 amendments involved allegations of family violence, compared with 26% pre-reform. The prevalence of allegations of both physical and emotional abuse also increased after the reforms, but this was more marked for physical violence.

The proportion of allegations made against both parents also increased (p 43). Other statistical interpretations of this data, such as the prevalence of family violence allegations after the reforms according to the way the matters were resolved (p 45) are provided.

An overview of factual issues raised (particularly how factual issues changed following the reforms) is provided from p 46. It is noted that issues such as substance abuse and mental ill health are 'not uncommon' for parents who use family law services (p 47).

Parental capacity is discussed in section 4.5 (p 89).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

- See generally Chapter 2: 'Characteristics of separated parents: Challenges and issues for family relationships and wellbeing'. Of particular relevance is the discussion from p 24 dealing with 'Separated parents' reports of experiencing family violence'. It was found that nearly two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that they suffered emotional abuse from their partner before or during separation. 26% of mothers and 16.8% of fathers indicated that they suffered physical abuse prior to their separation. Of this group, most respondents indicated that their children witnessed violence or abuse.
- See from p 29 which considers - 'Co-occurrence of family violence, mental health problems and addiction issues'. It was found that parents who indicated that both mental health and addiction issues were present were most likely to report that the other parent had physically hurt them (43% of fathers and 50% of mothers). Overall, 'experiences of family violence were reported by 85% of fathers and 92% of mothers who said that both mental health and addiction issues had been present before separation, compared with 41% of fathers and 46% of mothers who said that neither of these problems had been present. In other words, family violence seemed to be pervasive among families in which both mental health and addiction issues were thought to be present' (p 30).
- See Chapter 10: 'Family violence and child abuse: Parents' pathways and professionals' perspectives'. This chapter is relevant in relation to its general discussion of family violence in the family law system.
- See Chapter 11, 'Children's wellbeing', in particular section 11.3 (p 262) which discusses 'Family violence, safety issues and the nature of inter-parental relationships'.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders. See especially from p 179 which discusses 'Shared parenting and family violence'. The author notes, 'the issue of protecting women and children from violence has not proved effective as an argument against laws that recognise the indissolubility of parenthood, nor against having any provisions in legislation that encourage the continuing involvement of non-resident parents. One reason is the lack of an evidence base for the supposed connection between laws that encourage the involvement of non-resident parents in their children's lives, and an increased risk of violence. There is simply no evidence for a linear relationship between the time that non-resident parents spend with their children, and a greater incidence of post-separation violence towards the primary caregiver.'

The chapter concludes – 'There is no future in arguments that say encouraging the involvement of both parents in children's lives through legislation will expose women and children to a greater risk of violence. Successive Australian parliaments have responded to this argument not by winding back the emphasis in the law on the involvement of both parents but by enacting stronger and stronger legislative provisions that address, or purport to address, the issue of family violence… The issue of violence against women is one of great importance, but the middle ground is to be found in articulating more clearly the circumstances when parenthood ought to be dissoluble, rather than resisting the historic transformation in the law of parenting after separation. In that way, the law can avoid too simplistic a bifurcation where the only issue that might stand in the way of court orders for substantially shared care is if there is a proven history of family violence' (p 183).

Qu, Lixia et al, 'Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years' (Commissioned report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2014).

The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examines the experiences, circumstances, and wellbeing of separated parents and their children in Australia. It was commissioned as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms, and three waves of surveys have now been conducted. This current report presents findings from wave 3, conducted in 2012 with 9,028 parents five years after separation. It explores the opinions and experiences of separated parents regarding: quality of inter-parental relationships; child-focused communication between parents; safety concerns and violence and abuse; use and perceived helpfulness of family law services; pathways for developing parenting arrangements; family dispute resolution; stability and change in care-time arrangements; property division and their timing and perceived fairness; and child support arrangements and compliance. The report also asks parents about their child's wellbeing, and compares this with care-time arrangements and family dynamics.'

The findings painted a positive picture of separated families overall but there were still a minority of parents who faced significant issues such as violence and abuse and held safety concerns. 'It has become increasingly clear that each of the mainstream professions in the family law system has a potentially constructive role to play in helping to untangle the serious predicaments in which a minority of family law clients find themselves' (p xix).

For example, higher levels in children's wellbeing emerged where parents indicated that there was a positive inter-parental relationship – 'consistently low or worsened child wellbeing was more likely to be reported by parents who reported experiencing violence/abuse, holding safety concerns, or having negative inter-parental relationship in both waves compared with reports of other parents' (p 162).

Also, where emotional abuse was experienced by a small minority of parents (in Wave 3 of the data), large proportions of these victims indicated that the abuse occurred 'sometimes or often', as opposed to 'rarely or only once' in the preceding 12 months (p 40).

‘In fact, most respondents who stated that the other parent had engaged in humiliating insults, monitored their whereabouts, or circulated of defamatory comments also indicated that these behaviours occurred sometimes or often. After about five years of separation, the monitoring of a person’s whereabouts may be particularly likely to reflect obsessive harassment, unless such monitoring has been instigated by genuine concerns about personal safety or the safety of others, including the children’ (p 40).

Prevalence of domestic and family violence in the family law system - Other Resources

Children: Safety and Risk.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage contains information about requirements to notify the Court about family violence and child abuse, family violence orders, risk assessment, Lighthouse, staying safe at court and getting help and support.

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Family Violence Information Sheet (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This information sheet contains important information for litigants who allege they have experienced, or are alleged to have perpetrated, family violence, including safety at court, legal and support services at court, and cross-examination.

Family Violence: Overview

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage outlines the principles which guide the FCFCA's response to family violence, behaviours which may constitute family violence, coercive and controlling behaviours which may amount to family violence and common forms of family violence.

It also contains links to information on:

- Help and support;
- Family violence orders;
- Family violence and children;
- How the court considers safety and risk;
- Safety at court;
- Frequently asked questions; and
- Lighthouse.

Family Violence Plan - Former Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan 'builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation'. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan 'contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.'

See in particular at p 2, 'The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child's best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.'

Guidelines for Independent Children's Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

Independent Children's Lawyer information sheet.

Accessible via Legal Aid Western Australia.

Parental conflict and its effect on Children (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This fact sheet provides information for parents about the ways family conflict affects children, both in families who live together and in families who have separated.

In families where there is a high level of conflict and animosity between parents, children are at a greater risk of developing emotional, social and behavioural problems, as well as difficulties with concentration and educational achievement.

Frequent and intense conflict or fighting between parents also has a negative impact on children's sense of safety and security which affects their relationships with their parents and with others. Parental conflict that focuses on children is also linked to adjustment problems, particularly when children blame themselves for their parents' problems.

'Good quality parenting', that is parenting that provides structure, warmth, emotional support and positive reinforcement, has been found to reduce the impact of conflict.

Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Former Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the jurisdiction of the Court, including its family law jurisdiction, and the Court's aspirations for engagement with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. The Plan 'provides a platform to introduce measures to promote reconciliation and addresses some of the barriers faces by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. In doing this, the Plan provides four focus areas for the Court: relationships; respect; opportunities; and tracking progress.

What is an Independent Children's Lawyer?

A brochure accessible via:

Legal Aid New South Wales

Legal Aid Queensland

Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania

Impact of domestic and family violence on children and parenting capacity

Where domestic and family violence occurs in families with children, the victim is most likely to be the perpetrator's female intimate partner and the mother of the children. A perpetrator may also directly abuse the children or otherwise expose them to violence. These children are also victims of domestic and family violence.

The experience of domestic and family violence may also adversely affect a victim's parenting capacity, and may be compounded by the effects of mental illness or substance misuse that emerge as a consequence of the violence, placing children at heightened risk of abuse and neglect.

An extensive review [Bromfield et al 2010] by the Australian Institute of Family Studies of Australian and international literature indicates a co-occurrence in this context of multiple and complex parenting problems, often within a broader experience of social isolation and economic disadvantage. For example, mothers who are victims of domestic and family violence may remain with their violent partner if they consider it too dangerous to leave; they may prioritise the violent partner's needs over their children's needs in order to reduce the risk of further violence; the debilitating effects of violence may make them unavailable or unable to meet their children's needs; and frequent belittling, undermining, insulting, and physical harm by the violent partner in front of the children may affect the children's respect for their mother's authority or her ability to assert her authority. In relation to the capacity of violent fathers to parent, the research is limited, however children who are exposed to their father's violence may feel a loss of trust, love and respect for their father, or see their father as a source of fear and terror [Bromfield et al 2010].

If mental illness or substance misuse are also relevant, a parent's cognition, moods, perception, self-awareness and self-esteem may be adversely affected, resulting in possible further impacts on a parent's capacity to perform basic tasks, maintain daily routines, respond to children's physical, material, and emotional needs, and provide consistent and positive parenting [Bromfield et al 2010].

Impact of domestic and family violence on children and parenting capacity - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. The effect of family violence and parenting arrangements is discussed at [15.11] (p 675). The report notes that –

- 'Spousal abuse may not end with separation—in particular, abusive controlling violence may escalate after separation.
- People who use family violence may be deficient or even abusive parents and poor role models for their children. They may also undermine their victims' parenting role.
- Victims of family violence may find parenting difficult, as a result of abuse, poor self-esteem and the stress of separation and court proceedings. Time, protection and support may be required to re-establish their parenting role. A victim's behaviour under the stress of an abusive relationship or separation should not prejudice parenting decisions.'

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports key findings of two national online surveys with adults and children in relation to post-separation parenting, which formed part of the larger research. Adult respondents described how family violence affected their parenting arrangements and their use of family services to assist with parenting decisions. There were gender differences in the reported experiences of and responses to violence, with women reporting more serious forms of violence than men. Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports. The study raised many questions about how well family law policies, as expressed in the legislation and implemented in the national service system, respond to violence in families such as those who were involved in this research (p 49).

Bromfield, Leah, et al, 'Issues for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children in Families with Multiple and Complex Problems: The Co-Occurrence of Domestic Violence, Parental Substance Misuse and Mental Health Problems' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2010).

This paper investigates the separate impacts of parental substance misuse, domestic violence and parental mental health problems. It presents evidence regarding the extent to which these problems co-occur and a discussion of the wider context of exclusion and disadvantage, its causes and its consequences. Finally, it provides an overview of research and theory for working with families with multiple and complex problems. This literature review cites statistics from a US study, the statistics were collected from household census data from over 20,000 households (G. Fox and M. Benson 'Violent men, bad dads? Fathering profiles of men involved in intimate partner violence.' In R. Day & M. Lamb (Eds.), Conceptualizing and measuring father involvement. (Mahwah, New Jersey: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates Publishers, 2004)):

- 37% of children were accidentally hurt during domestic violence;
- 26% of children were intentionally hurt during domestic violence;
- 49% of mothers were hurt protecting children;
- 47% of perpetrators used the child as pawn to hurt mothers;
- 39% of perpetrators hurt mothers as punishment for children's acts;
- 23% of perpetrators blamed mothers for perpetrators' own excessive punishment of children.

Carson, Rachel, Edward Dunstan, Jessie Dunstan and Dinika Roopani, Children and young people: Family law system experiences and needs - Final Report 2018 (Research Report – June 2018, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

This report sets out findings from the Children and Young People in Separated Families: Family Law System Experiences and Needs project, a qualitative study commissioned and funded by the Australian Government Attorney-General's Department (AGD). This study aimed to investigate the experiences and needs of young people whose parents had separated and had accessed the family law system.

The study comprised in-depth, semi-structured interviews carried out between May 2017 and April 2018, with 61 children and young people aged between 10 years and 17 years (supplemented by interviews with 47 parents of these children). The interviews with 47 parents of these children were undertaken by telephone to enable the collection of demographic information by way of background to the data provided by the children and young people. These data enabled the research team to understand the services accessed by the parents and the pathways used to resolve their family law matters. Against this backdrop, the data from the interviews with children and young people provided rich insights into the experiences and needs of children and young people whose parents had separated and had accessed the family law system.

Findings are included in the executive summary and included:

- Most children and young people (76%) wanted parents to listen more to their views in relation to parenting arrangements and regarding the separation more generally, to provide them with space and time to process events, and for their parents to respect their views as their own even if they disagree with them.
- Of those children and young people who indicated that they felt both parents listened to them (21% of participants), all except one felt either quite close or very close with both parents.
- More than one-third (38%) of children and young people described wanting ongoing communication with parents and others to understand more about what was going on in the post-separation context.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

See generally from p 4 – 'There are few more difficult or more important challenges for the family law system than dealing with cases where family violence is an issue. Family violence happens throughout the community, and is especially likely to be present among families that separate and resort to the family law system. More than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent, and violence issues often go together with other problems, for example those associated with substance abuse and mental ill-health. Violence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is directed specifically at them. These cases present the courts with truly daunting tasks: to provide a setting in which the parties feel safe and confident that they will be treated with respect; to deal with the cases with necessary efficiency but most importantly with justice and fairness; and to ensure as far as possible that arrangements made for children, whether as a result of the parties' consent or by the court's adjudication, are suitable for their needs, which will include being safe and having both parents contribute to their developmental needs' (p 4).

The theme of the report is discussed at p 5 - 'A theme that recurred during the Review was that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon. This theme seems helpful whether we are thinking of a lawyer interviewing a client, a dispute resolution practitioner dealing with a new case, the work of a counter clerk at a family court, or of a judicial officer. The family law system, and each component in it, needs to encourage and facilitate the disclosure of family violence, ensure that it is understood, and act effectively upon that understanding'.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter discusses the history and place of family law in Australia's federal system. Difficulties in addressing family violence in what is an often fragmented legal framework are discussed. Many different courts and jurisdictions are involved, especially where the dispute extends between states or territories. This is particularly problematic where child protection is an issue.

De Maio, John, et al, 'Survey of Recently Separated Parents: A study of parents who separated prior to the implementation of the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Matters) Act 2011' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2013).

This report presents key findings from the Survey of Recently Separated Families (SRSP) 2012. The study aimed to gain a more detailed understanding of parents' experiences of family violence and concerns about child safety, and how well the legal system responds. Interviews were conducted with 6,119 parents who separated between 31 July 2010 and 31 December 2011 - that is, five years after the family law reforms of 2006 and one year prior to the legislative reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011. The study found that family violence is common among separated families, and though many of the participants reported this violence to police or other services, a sizeable minority (47%) of them did not.

Family Law Council, 'In Response to the first two terms of reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems' (Interim Report to the Attorney-General, June 2015).

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the first two matters. The remaining matters will be dealt with in a report due June 2016.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

This report comprehensively summarises the legislative provisions governing the resolution of parenting disputes under the Family Law Act, and the intersection with legal systems governing family violence and child protection. Some important observations:

- Fragmented legal systems – families most likely to be involved with more than one of these jurisdictions are those with support needs associated with DFV and at a time of high risk and vulnerability (child protection/children's court; family courts; state/territory DFV courts)
- Reluctance by state/territory magistrates to use s68R FLA to vary Family Court orders when making DFV orders in order to resolve inconsistencies between DFV orders and parenting orders; can be done on its own motion without the consent of the parties; and sometimes magistrates assume that the parenting order is sufficient to protect child without needing to include the child on the DFV order (concerns about inadequate time limits in s68T on variation/suspension of parenting order where done in interim proceedings)
- The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions examined similar concerns about the use of s 68R by state and territory magistrates and the application of s 68T in their 2010 Family Violence – A National Legal Response report. They concluded that the underuse of s 68R at that time was attributable to a range of factors, including:
    - a lack of awareness or understanding of s 68R among judicial officers, lawyers police and others involved in family violence protection order proceedings;
    - a view taken by some magistrates that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for the family courts;
    - judicial officers lacking adequate information or evidence necessary to amend the parenting orders; and
    - parties to proceedings not having access to appropriate legal advice.

Family Law Council, Report to the Attorney-General on 'Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems: Final Report, June 2016 (Terms, 3, 4 & 5)'.

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the matters listed below in items 3, 4 and 5.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

The Family Law Council made 22 recommendations (summarised at pp12-18) in the following areas:

- Family safety services
- Early whole-of-family risk assessments
- Family lawyers and risk identifications
- Family dispute resolution practitioners and risk management strategies
- Judicial risk assessments and court-ordered programs
- A court-based integrated services model
- Case-managed integrated services in the family relationships sector
- Self-represented litigants with complex needs
- Support services for families in rural and regional areas
- Collaboration between family law and state and territory courts
- Family violence competency
- Joint professional development
- Children's views and experiences
- Family dispute resolution and confidentiality

- State and territory courts exercising family law jurisdiction
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families
- Culturally and linguistically diverse families
- Court support workers
- Self-represented litigants and misuse of process
- Crossover cases
- Consent parenting orders
- Legislative reform.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the protection of children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers how the Family Court of Australia deals with matters involving children where there are allegations of abuse. It identifies that the balancing of the interests of the children and the parents, and frequently of other people associated with the children, is at the centre of what is just in the family law system. This issue is examined here, together with the differences in the roles of judges and experts in child development and abuse, and child psychology and psychiatry, and how each has a part to play in the system of justice. Also of concern is how the voices of children are being heard in the system. Evidence issues are discussed in detail.

Humphreys, Cathy and Monica Campo, Fathers who use violence: Options for safe practice where there is ongoing contact with children (CFCA Paper No. 43 – June 2017, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

The following summarises the key aspects of this paper:

Background

This paper responds to a challenge that has continued to frustrate workers attempting to intervene to support women and children living with DFV – that the DFV intervention system (in the specialist women's DFV sector and statutory child protection) is structured around women and their children separating from men who use violence. However, many women and children may not be in a position to separate from their abusive and violent partners, and some women and children's wellbeing and safety may not be enhanced by separation.

Inquiry

The paper explored these questions by conducting a review of exisitng literature:

- What is the practice or evidence base for working with families where the perpetrator remains in the home?
- Are there safe ways to work with women and children living with a perpetrator of DFV, or for women and children who still have significant contact with a perpetrator post-separation?
- In particular, whether there are strategies for working with fathers who use violence, that engage and address the issues for children, women and men who are continuing to live with DFV.

Observations

This review demonstrates that there is a paucity of evidence for effective approaches for responding to DFV in families where the perpetrator remains in the home or in regular contact with women and children. There are, however, a number of practices developing in these areas: nurse home visits; restorative justice approaches; couple counselling; statutory child protection investigations; and interventions with vulnerable families/whole of family approaches. All urge caution and all recommend a priority on training workers, and only ever bringing men and women together under certain circumstances and with strict caveats. This is necessary if work is to be effective and not inadvertently escalate danger and/or collude with the power and controlling tactics of the perpetrator of violence.

Conclusions

There is some experimentation with interventions in these complex family situations, and some early signs of success. The challenges of working with the diverse nature of fathers who use violence are significant. Nevertheless, this may prove to be an important practice development for future DFV intervention.

Kaspiew, R., Carson, R., Rhoades, H., Qu, L., De Maio, J., Horsfall, B., & Stevens, E. (2022).

Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022). ANROWS.

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. The other three parts of the research program are based on data collection from family law court files involving contravention applications, an online survey of parents and carers with family law parenting orders, and an analysis of the approaches applied to contravention in three international jurisdictions. (p11)

Systemic factors include shortcomings in the identification, assessment and management of risk. (p13)

When working with parents for the development of parenting orders, it is critical that practitioners ensure that safety and risk are adequately assessed and considered in the parenting arrangements. (p14)

This evidence demonstrates that the parents who obtain family law parenting orders are a particularly complex group, with concentrated levels of risk indicators. In light of the small proportion of parenting orders that involve contravention matters…, it is important to emphasise that the contravention regime is applied to a small subset of a particularly complex group of families. (p17)

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children.

The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

The report contains numerous statistical comparisons of the situation pre- and post-reform. It identified that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility in the context of family violence or child abuse is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

A detailed overview of the prevalence of family violence allegations in family court proceedings after the amendments is provided from p 43. 36% of cases after the 2012 amendments involved allegations of family violence, compared with 26% pre-reform. The prevalence of allegations of both physical and emotional abuse also increased after the reforms, but this was more marked for physical violence.

The proportion of allegations made against both parents also increased (p 43). Other statistical interpretations of this data, such as the prevalence of family violence allegations after the reforms according to the way the matters were resolved (p 45) are provided.

An overview of factual issues raised (particularly how factual issues changed following the reforms) is provided from p 46. It is noted that issues such as substance abuse and mental ill health are 'not uncommon' for parents who use family law services (p 47).

Parental capacity is discussed in section 4.5 (p 89).

Kaspiew, R., Horsfall, B., Qu, L., Nicholson, J. M., Humphreys, C., Diemer, K., … Dunstan, J. Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed method insights into impact and support needs (ANROWS, 2017).

The Domestic and Family Violence and Parenting Research program examined the impact of domestic and family violence (DFV) on parenting capacity and parent–child relationships in Australia. It focused on three main issues:

- parental conflict in families and impacts on the emotional health and parenting behaviours of mothers and fathers and child functioning;
- how DFV experienced before separation, after separation, or both affects parents' emotional health and parent–child relationships; and
- mothers' experiences of engagement with services in the domestic and family violence, child protection, and family law systems in the context of DFV.

A mixed method approach involved: literature review; analysis of the Longitudinal Study of Australian Children; analysis of two (Australian Institute of Family Studies) datasets of over 16,000 separated parents; qualitative in-depth interviews with 50 women who had experienced DFV and engaged with services in the DFV sector, the child protection system, or the family law system.

The Key findings and future directions research summary related to this report identifies specific implications for practitioners engaging with mothers, fathers, and children against a background of DFV:

- Women who engage with services against a background of DFV have a number of complex material and psycho-social needs.
- If women are not already engaged with a specialist DFV service, then such a referral is usually necessary.
- It is likely that women and their children are experiencing ongoing abuse unless contact with the perpetrator has ceased and other safety measures to prevent abuse are available (e.g. being legally permitted to live at an undisclosed address to prevent stalking).
- Women may need assistance and referral in relation to financial and housing needs, including being informed about the availability of Financial Wellbeing and Capability services and Financial Counselling.
- Women and their children may be experiencing physical and emotional consequences from DFV and abuse and may need long-term therapeutic assistance.
- Mothers may need referrals to programs and services that will support the restoration of parenting capacity from a perspective of understanding the dynamics of DFV, including programs that offer services to mothers and children together. Children may also need assistance separately.
- Where relationships between fathers and children are being maintained, fathers may need referral to services in relation to parenting. Where this is occurring, the wellbeing and safety of children need to be monitored.
- Service providers should be alert to the fact that their services and other types of services and agencies may be used in a pattern of systems abuse. Staff, including legal professionals, should be trained to recognise this and provide appropriate advice and referrals wherethis is occurring.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

- See generally Chapter 2: ‘Characteristics of separated parents: Challenges and issues for family relationships and wellbeing’. Of particular relevance is the discussion from p 24 dealing with ‘Separated parents’ reports of experiencing family violence’. It was found that nearly two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that they suffered emotional abuse from their partner before or during separation. 26% of mothers and 16.8% of fathers indicated that they suffered physical abuse prior to their separation. Of this group, most respondents indicated that their children witnessed violence or abuse.
- See from p 29 which considers - ‘Co-occurrence of family violence, mental health problems and addiction issues’. It was found that parents who indicated that both mental health and addiction issues were present were most likely to report that the other parent had physically hurt them (43% of fathers and 50% of mothers). Overall, ‘experiences of family violence were reported by 85% of fathers and 92% of mothers who said that both mental health and addiction issues had been present before separation, compared with 41% of fathers and 46% of mothers who said that neither of these problems had been present. In other words, family violence seemed to be pervasive among families in which both mental health and addiction issues were thought to be present’ (p 30).
- See Chapter 10: ‘Family violence and child abuse: Parents’ pathways and professionals’ perspectives’. This chapter is relevant in relation to its general discussion of family violence in the family law system.
- See Chapter 11, ‘Children’s wellbeing’, in particular section 11.3 (p 262) which discusses ‘Family violence, safety issues and the nature of inter-parental relationships’.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, ‘Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments’ (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of practices and perspectives of family law professionals (n=653)

- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
  - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
  - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts and
  - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who had separated between 1 July 2010 and 31 December 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who had separated between 1 July 2012 and 31 December 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 represents parents' their post-reform experiences.

Together with the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families (LSSF) Wave 1 data, these samples of separated parents reported similar levels of family violence, with around 1 in 5 parents indicating they suffered physical hurt by their former partner and nearly 2 in 5 reporting emotional abuse alone (p 14). See generally chapter 3 – 'Family Violence and Safety Concerns'. Most parents in both cohorts reported at least one type of emotional abuse before/during or since separation (p 58). Further, 'overall, mothers reported experiencing emotional abuse in greater proportions than fathers both before/during separation and since separation' (p 58). The most commonly reported form of emotional abuse (see p24) was '—insults with the intent to shame, belittle or humiliate' (p 58). A similar proportion of parents in both cohorts reported that their children saw or heard family violence prior to or during separation (p 60). However, the proportion of parents reporting that their children witnessed family violence in the period since separation decreased in the second cohort.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

It concludes that 'overall, the general patterns in findings suggest a positive response to the 2012 family violence reforms, with practitioner responses indicating that protection from harm is given greater weight now than it was previously, and that advice-giving practices have shifted in a direction consistent with the intent of the reforms to better identify families where this is an issue. At the same time, the responses do not suggest that any less weight is placed on maintaining relationships with parents and children after separation where this is appropriate' (p 13).

Practitioners' views about striking the right balance between protecting a child from harm and maintaining a meaningful relationship with both parents (in the context of the 2012 reforms and the 'tie-breaker' provision (s 60CC(2A)) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) are discussed from p 14. Many practitioners were positive about the effect of s 60CC(2A) in re-prioritising family violence and protecting children from harm which leads to better outcomes for children.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders. See especially from p 179 which discusses 'Shared parenting and family violence'. The author notes, 'the issue of protecting women and children from violence has not proved effective as an argument against laws that recognise the indissolubility of parenthood, nor against having any provisions in legislation that encourage the continuing involvement of non-resident parents. One reason is the lack of an evidence base for the supposed connection between laws that encourage the involvement of non-resident parents in their children's lives, and an increased risk of violence. There is simply no evidence for a linear relationship between the time that non-resident parents spend with their children, and a greater incidence of post-separation violence towards the primary caregiver.'

The chapter concludes – 'There is no future in arguments that say encouraging the involvement of both parents in children's lives through legislation will expose women and children to a greater risk of violence. Successive Australian parliaments have responded to this argument not by winding back the emphasis in the law on the involvement of both parents but by enacting stronger and stronger legislative provisions that address, or purport to address, the issue of family violence… The issue of violence against women is one of great importance, but the middle ground is to be found in articulating more clearly the circumstances when parenthood ought to be dissoluble, rather than resisting the historic transformation in the law of parenting after separation. In that way, the law can avoid too simplistic a bifurcation where the only issue that might stand in the way of court orders for substantially shared care is if there is a proven history of family violence' (p 183).

Qu, Lixia et al, 'Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years' (Commissioned report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2014).

The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examines the experiences, circumstances, and wellbeing of separated parents and their children in Australia. It was commissioned as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms, and three waves of surveys have now been conducted. This current report presents findings from wave 3, conducted in 2012 with 9,028 parents five years after separation. It explores the opinions and experiences of separated parents regarding: quality of inter-parental relationships; child-focused communication between parents; safety concerns and violence and abuse; use and perceived helpfulness of family law services; pathways for developing parenting arrangements; family dispute resolution; stability and change in care-time arrangements; property division and their timing and perceived fairness; and child support arrangements and compliance. The report also asks parents about their child's wellbeing, and compares this with care-time arrangements and family dynamics.'

The findings painted a positive picture of separated families overall but there were still a minority of parents who faced significant issues such as violence and abuse and held safety concerns. 'It has become increasingly clear that each of the mainstream professions in the family law system has a potentially constructive role to play in helping to untangle the serious predicaments in which a minority of family law clients find themselves' (p xix).

For example, higher levels in children's wellbeing emerged where parents indicated that there was a positive inter-parental relationship – 'consistently low or worsened child wellbeing was more likely to be reported by parents who reported experiencing violence/abuse, holding safety concerns, or having negative inter-parental relationship in both waves compared with reports of other parents' (p 162).

Also, where emotional abuse was experienced by a small minority of parents (in Wave 3 of the data), large proportions of these victims indicated that the abuse occurred 'sometimes or often', as opposed to 'rarely or only once' in the preceding 12 months (p 40).

'In fact, most respondents who stated that the other parent had engaged in humiliating insults, monitored their whereabouts, or circulated of defamatory comments also indicated that these behaviours occurred sometimes or often. After about five years of separation, the monitoring of a person's whereabouts may be particularly likely to reflect obsessive harassment, unless such monitoring has been instigated by genuine concerns about personal safety or the safety of others, including the children' (p 40).

Tomison, Adam M, 'Exploring Family Violence: Links Between Child Maltreatment and Domestic Violence' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 13, Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2000).

This article reviews the research about the relationship between domestic violence and various forms of child maltreatment. In particular, it points to the high proportion of cases of emotional abuse of children identified by child protection workers in families where there is domestic and family violence and to the mild association between presence of domestic violence and a higher than expected proportion of children sustaining injuries. Pages 8-9 of this article discusses the variety of ways a child may be exposed to domestic violence, including as a hostage to ensure the mother's return home and forcing a child to watch assaults.

Impact of domestic and family violence on children and parenting capacity - Other Resources

Children: Safety and Risk.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage contains information about requirements to notify the Court about family violence and child abuse, family violence orders, risk assessment, Lighthouse, staying safe at court and getting help and support.

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Family Violence Information Sheet (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This information sheet contains important information for litigants who allege they have experienced, or are alleged to have perpetrated, family violence, including safety at court, legal and support services at court, and cross-examination.

Family Violence: Overview

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage outlines the principles which guide the FCFCA's response to family violence, behaviours which may constitute family violence, coercive and controlling behaviours which may amount to family violence and common forms of family violence.

It also contains links to information on:

- Help and support;
- Family violence orders;
- Family violence and children;
- How the court considers safety and risk;
- Safety at court;
- Frequently asked questions; and
- Lighthouse.

Family Violence Plan - Former Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan 'builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation'. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan 'contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.'

See in particular at p 2, 'The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child's best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.'

Guidelines for Independent Children's Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

Independent Children's Lawyer information sheet.

Accessible via Legal Aid Western Australia.

Parental conflict and its effect on Children (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This fact sheet provides information for parents about the ways family conflict affects children, both in families who live together and in families who have separated.

In families where there is a high level of conflict and animosity between parents, children are at a greater risk of developing emotional, social and behavioural problems, as well as difficulties with concentration and educational achievement.

Frequent and intense conflict or fighting between parents also has a negative impact on children's sense of safety and security which affects their relationships with their parents and with others. Parental conflict that focuses on children is also linked to adjustment problems, particularly when children blame themselves for their parents' problems.

'Good quality parenting', that is parenting that provides structure, warmth, emotional support and positive reinforcement, has been found to reduce the impact of conflict.

Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Former Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the jurisdiction of the Court, including its family law jurisdiction, and the Court's aspirations for engagement with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. The Plan 'provides a platform to introduce measures to promote reconciliation and addresses some of the barriers faces by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. In doing this, the Plan provides four focus areas for the Court: relationships; respect; opportunities; and tracking progress.

What is an Independent Children's Lawyer?

A brochure accessible via:

Legal Aid New South Wales

Legal Aid Queensland

Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania

Independent children's lawyer

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view.

More information can be found here:
www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

The Court can appoint an independent children's lawyer (ICL) under Section 68L of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Section 164 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA), or on the application of a child, an organisation concerned with the welfare of children or any other person, to represent and promote the best interests of a child in family law proceedings.

An ICL is usually appointed by the Court upon application by a party to the proceedings where one or more of the following circumstances exist:

- there are allegations of abuse or neglect in relation to the children
- there is a high level of conflict and dispute between the parents
- there are allegations made as to the views of the children and the children are of a mature age to express their views
- there are allegations of family violence
- serious mental health issues exist in relation to one or both of the parents or children, and/or
- there are difficult and complex issues involved in the matter.

ICLs are obliged to consider the views of the child, but ultimately provide their own, independent perspective about what arrangements or decisions are in the child's best interests.

Their main roles include:

- arranging for necessary evidence, including expert evidence, to be obtained and put before the court

- facilitating the participation of the child in the proceedings in a manner which reflects the age and maturity of the child and the nature of the case
- acting as an honest broker between the child and the parents and facilitating settlement negotiations where appropriate.

Guidelines [Guidelines for ICL 2021] have been issued to assist practitioners, parties, children and other people in contact with the family law courts with information about the Courts' general expectations of ICLs. These Guidelines have been endorsed by the Chief Justice of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia.

Judicial consideration has also been given to the role of ICLs.

Independent children's lawyer - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. The effect of family violence and parenting arrangements is discussed at [15.11] (p 675). The report notes that –

- 'Spousal abuse may not end with separation—in particular, abusive controlling violence may escalate after separation.
- People who use family violence may be deficient or even abusive parents and poor role models for their children. They may also undermine their victims' parenting role.
- Victims of family violence may find parenting difficult, as a result of abuse, poor self-esteem and the stress of separation and court proceedings. Time, protection and support may be required to re-establish their parenting role. A victim's behaviour under the stress of an abusive relationship or separation should not prejudice parenting decisions.'

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports key findings of two national online surveys with adults and children in relation to post-separation parenting, which formed part of the larger research. Adult respondents described how family violence affected their parenting arrangements and their use of family services to assist with parenting decisions. There were gender differences in the reported experiences of and responses to violence, with women reporting more serious forms of violence than men. Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports. The study raised many questions about how well family law policies, as expressed in the legislation and implemented in the national service system, respond to violence in families such as those who were involved in this research

(p 49).

Bromfield, Leah, et al, 'Issues for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children in Families with Multiple and Complex Problems: The Co-Occurrence of Domestic Violence, Parental Substance Misuse and Mental Health Problems' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2010).

This paper investigates the separate impacts of parental substance misuse, domestic violence and parental mental health problems. It presents evidence regarding the extent to which these problems co-occur and a discussion of the wider context of exclusion and disadvantage, its causes and its consequences. Finally, it provides an overview of research and theory for working with families with multiple and complex problems. This literature review cites statistics from a US study, the statistics were collected from household census data from over 20,000 households (G. Fox and M. Benson 'Violent men, bad dads? Fathering profiles of men involved in intimate partner violence.' In R. Day & M. Lamb (Eds.), Conceptualizing and measuring father involvement. (Mahwah, New Jersey: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates Publishers, 2004)):

- 37% of children were accidentally hurt during domestic violence;
- 26% of children were intentionally hurt during domestic violence;
- 49% of mothers were hurt protecting children;
- 47% of perpetrators used the child as pawn to hurt mothers;
- 39% of perpetrators hurt mothers as punishment for children's acts;
- 23% of perpetrators blamed mothers for perpetrators' own excessive punishment of children.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

See generally from p 4 – ‘There are few more difficult or more important challenges for the family law system than dealing with cases where family violence is an issue. Family violence happens throughout the community, and is especially likely to be present among families that separate and resort to the family law system. More than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent, and violence issues often go together with other problems, for example those associated with substance abuse and mental ill-health. Violence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is directed specifically at them. These cases present the courts with truly daunting tasks: to provide a setting in which the parties feel safe and confident that they will be treated with respect; to deal with the cases with necessary efficiency but most importantly with justice and fairness; and to ensure as far as possible that arrangements made for children, whether as a result of the parties’ consent or by the court’s adjudication, are suitable for their needs, which will include being safe and having both parents contribute to their developmental needs’ (p 4).

The theme of the report is discussed at p 5 - ‘A theme that recurred during the Review was that family violence must be disclosed, understood, and acted upon. This theme seems helpful whether we are thinking of a lawyer interviewing a client, a dispute resolution practitioner dealing with a new case, the work of a counter clerk at a family court, or of a judicial officer. The family law system, and each component in it, needs to encourage and facilitate the disclosure of family violence, ensure that it is understood, and act effectively upon that understanding’.

Croucher, Rosalind, ‘Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System’ in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter discusses the history and place of family law in Australia’s federal system. Difficulties in addressing family violence in what is an often fragmented legal framework are discussed. Many different courts and jurisdictions are involved, especially where the dispute extends between states or territories. This is particularly problematic where child protection is an issue.

De Maio, John, et al, ‘Survey of Recently Separated Parents: A study of parents who separated prior to the implementation of the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Matters) Act 2011’

(Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2013).

This report presents key findings from the Survey of Recently Separated Families (SRSP) 2012. The study aimed to gain a more detailed understanding of parents' experiences of family violence and concerns about child safety, and how well the legal system responds. Interviews were conducted with 6,119 parents who separated between 31 July 2010 and 31 December 2011 - that is, five years after the family law reforms of 2006 and one year prior to the legislative reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011. The study found that family violence is common among separated families, and though many of the participants reported this violence to police or other services, a sizeable minority (47%) of them did not.

Family Law Council, 'In Response to the first two terms of reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems' (Interim Report to the Attorney-General, June 2015).

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the first two matters. The remaining matters will be dealt with in a report due June 2016.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

This report comprehensively summarises the legislative provisions governing the resolution of parenting disputes under the Family Law Act, and the intersection with legal systems governing family violence and child protection. Some important observations:

- Fragmented legal systems – families most likely to be involved with more than one of these jurisdictions are those with support needs associated with DFV and at a time of high risk and vulnerability (child protection/children's court; family courts; state/territory DFV courts)
- Reluctance by state/territory magistrates to use s68R FLA to vary Family Court orders when making DFV orders in order to resolve inconsistencies between DFV orders and parenting orders; can be done on its own motion without the consent of the parties; and sometimes magistrates assume that the parenting order is sufficient to protect child without needing to include the child on the DFV order (concerns about inadequate time limits in s68T on variation/suspension of parenting order where done in interim proceedings)
- The Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions examined similar concerns about the use of s 68R by state and territory magistrates and the application of s 68T in their 2010 Family Violence – A National Legal Response report. They concluded that the underuse of s 68R at that time was attributable to a range of factors, including:
    - a lack of awareness or understanding of s 68R among judicial officers, lawyers police and others involved in family violence protection order proceedings;
    - a view taken by some magistrates that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for the family courts;
    - judicial officers lacking adequate information or evidence necessary to amend the parenting orders; and
    - parties to proceedings not having access to appropriate legal advice.

Family Law Council, Report to the Attorney-General on 'Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems: Final Report, June 2016 (Terms, 3, 4 & 5)'.

The Attorney-General requested the Family Law Council to consider the following matters in relation to the complex needs of families seeking to resolve their parenting disputes, including emotional, sexual and physical abuse, family violence, substance abuse, neglect and mental health issues. This report relates to the matters listed below in items 3, 4 and 5.

(a) The possibilities for transferring proceedings between the family law and state and territory courts exercising care and protection jurisdiction within current jurisdictional frameworks (including any legal or practical obstacles to greater inter-jurisdictional co-operation).

(b) The possible benefits of enabling the family courts to exercise the powers of the relevant state and territory courts including children's courts, and vice versa, and any changes that would be required to implement this approach, including jurisdictional and legislative changes.

(c) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing within the family law system, such as between the family courts and family relationship services.

(d) The opportunities for enhancing collaboration and information sharing between the family law system and other relevant support services such as child protection, mental health, family violence, drug and alcohol, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and migrant settlement services.

(e) Any limitations in the data currently available to inform these terms of reference.

The Family Law Council made 22 recommendations (summarised at pp12-18) in the following areas:

- Family safety services
- Early whole-of-family risk assessments
- Family lawyers and risk identifications
- Family dispute resolution practitioners and risk management strategies
- Judicial risk assessments and court-ordered programs
- A court-based integrated services model
- Case-managed integrated services in the family relationships sector
- Self-represented litigants with complex needs
- Support services for families in rural and regional areas
- Collaboration between family law and state and territory courts
- Family violence competency

- Joint professional development
- Children's views and experiences
- Family dispute resolution and confidentiality
- State and territory courts exercising family law jurisdiction
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families
- Culturally and linguistically diverse families
- Court support workers
- Self-represented litigants and misuse of process
- Crossover cases
- Consent parenting orders
- Legislative reform.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the protection of children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers how the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia deals with matters involving children where there are allegations of abuse. It identifies that the balancing of the interests of the children and the parents, and frequently of other people associated with the children, is at the centre of what is just in the family law system. This issue is examined here, together with the differences in the roles of judges and experts in child development and abuse, and child psychology and psychiatry, and how each has a part to play in the system of justice. Also of concern is how the voices of children are being heard in the system. Evidence issues are discussed in detail.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of practices and perspectives of family law professionals (n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
  - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
  - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts and
  - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who had separated between 1 July 2010 and 31 December 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who had separated between 1 July 2012 and 31 December 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 represents parents' their post-reform experiences.

Together with the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families (LSSF) Wave 1 data, these samples of separated parents reported similar levels of family violence, with around 1 in 5 parents indicating they suffered physical hurt by their former partner and nearly 2 in 5 reporting emotional abuse alone (p 14). See generally chapter 3 – 'Family Violence and Safety Concerns'. Most parents in both cohorts reported at least one type of emotional abuse before/during or since separation (p 58). Further, 'overall, mothers reported experiencing emotional abuse in greater proportions than fathers both before/during separation and since separation' (p 58). The most commonly reported form of emotional abuse (see p24) was '—insults with the intent to shame, belittle or humiliate' (p 58). A similar proportion of parents in both cohorts reported that their children saw or heard family violence prior to or during separation (p 60). However, the proportion of parents reporting that their children witnessed family violence in the period since separation decreased in the second cohort.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

It concludes that ‘overall, the general patterns in findings suggest a positive response to the 2012 family violence reforms, with practitioner responses indicating that protection from harm is given greater weight now than it was previously, and that advice-giving practices have shifted in a direction consistent with the intent of the reforms to better identify families where this is an issue. At the same time, the responses do not suggest that any less weight is placed on maintaining relationships with parents and children after separation where this is appropriate’ (p 13).

Practitioners’ views about striking the right balance between protecting a child from harm and maintaining a meaningful relationship with both parents (in the context of the 2012 reforms and the ‘tie-breaker’ provision (s 60CC(2A)) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) are discussed from p 14. Many practitioners were positive about the effect of s 60CC(2A) in re-prioritising family violence and protecting children from harm which leads to better outcomes for children.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, ‘Court Outcomes Project’ (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) ‘were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children.

The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments’ (p vii).

The report contains numerous statistical comparisons of the situation pre- and post-reform. It identified that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility in the context of family violence or child abuse is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

A detailed overview of the prevalence of family violence allegations in family court proceedings after the amendments is provided from p 43. 36% of cases after the 2012 amendments involved allegations of family violence, compared with 26% pre-reform. The prevalence of allegations of both physical and emotional abuse also increased after the reforms, but this was more marked for physical violence.

The proportion of allegations made against both parents also increased (p 43). Other statistical interpretations of this data, such as the prevalence of family violence allegations after the reforms according to the way the matters were resolved (p 45) are provided.

An overview of factual issues raised (particularly how factual issues changed following the reforms) is provided from p 46. It is noted that issues such as substance abuse and mental ill health are 'not uncommon' for parents who use family law services (p 47).

Parental capacity is discussed in section 4.5 (p 89).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

- See generally Chapter 2: 'Characteristics of separated parents: Challenges and issues for family relationships and wellbeing'. Of particular relevance is the discussion from p 24 dealing with 'Separated parents' reports of experiencing family violence'. It was found that nearly two-thirds of separated mothers and just over half of separated fathers indicated that they suffered emotional abuse from their partner before or during separation. 26% of mothers and 16.8% of fathers indicated that they suffered physical abuse prior to their separation. Of this group, most respondents indicated that their children witnessed violence or abuse.
- See from p 29 which considers - 'Co-occurrence of family violence, mental health problems and addiction issues'. It was found that parents who indicated that both mental health and addiction issues were present were most likely to report that the other parent had physically hurt them (43% of fathers and 50% of mothers). Overall, 'experiences of family violence were reported by 85% of fathers and 92% of mothers who said that both mental health and addiction issues had been present before separation, compared with 41% of fathers and 46% of mothers who said that neither of these problems had been present. In other words, family violence seemed to be pervasive among families in which both mental health and addiction issues were thought to be present' (p 30).

- See Chapter 10: 'Family violence and child abuse: Parents' pathways and professionals' perspectives'. This chapter is relevant in relation to its general discussion of family violence in the family law system.
- See Chapter 11, 'Children's wellbeing', in particular section 11.3 (p 262) which discusses 'Family violence, safety issues and the nature of inter-parental relationships'.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders. See especially from p 179 which discusses 'Shared parenting and family violence'. The author notes, 'the issue of protecting women and children from violence has not proved effective as an argument against laws that recognise the indissolubility of parenthood, nor against having any provisions in legislation that encourage the continuing involvement of non-resident parents. One reason is the lack of an evidence base for the supposed connection between laws that encourage the involvement of non-resident parents in their children's lives, and an increased risk of violence. There is simply no evidence for a linear relationship between the time that non-resident parents spend with their children, and a greater incidence of post-separation violence towards the primary caregiver.'

The chapter concludes – ‘There is no future in arguments that say encouraging the involvement of both parents in children’s lives through legislation will expose women and children to a greater risk of violence. Successive Australian parliaments have responded to this argument not by winding back the emphasis in the law on the involvement of both parents but by enacting stronger and stronger legislative provisions that address, or purport to address, the issue of family violence… The issue of violence against women is one of great importance, but the middle ground is to be found in articulating more clearly the circumstances when parenthood ought to be dissoluble, rather than resisting the historic transformation in the law of parenting after separation. In that way, the law can avoid too simplistic a bifurcation where the only issue that might stand in the way of court orders for substantially shared care is if there is a proven history of family violence’ (p 183).

Qu, Lixia et al, ‘Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years’ (Commissioned report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2014).

The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examines the experiences, circumstances, and wellbeing of separated parents and their children in Australia. It was commissioned as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms, and three waves of surveys have now been conducted. This current report presents findings from wave 3, conducted in 2012 with 9,028 parents five years after separation. It explores the opinions and experiences of separated parents regarding: quality of inter-parental relationships; child-focused communication between parents; safety concerns and violence and abuse; use and perceived helpfulness of family law services; pathways for developing parenting arrangements; family dispute resolution; stability and change in care-time arrangements; property division and their timing and perceived fairness; and child support arrangements and compliance. The report also asks parents about their child's wellbeing, and compares this with care-time arrangements and family dynamics.’

The findings painted a positive picture of separated families overall but there were still a minority of parents who faced significant issues such as violence and abuse and held safety concerns. ‘It has become increasingly clear that each of the mainstream professions in the family law system has a potentially constructive role to play in helping to untangle the serious predicaments in which a minority of family law clients find themselves’ (p xix).

For example, higher levels in children’s wellbeing emerged where parents indicated that there was a positive inter-parental relationship – ‘consistently low or worsened child wellbeing was more likely to be reported by parents who reported experiencing violence/abuse, holding safety concerns, or having negative inter-parental relationship in both waves compared with reports of other parents’ (p 162).

Also, where emotional abuse was experienced by a small minority of parents (in Wave 3 of the data), large proportions of these victims indicated that the abuse occurred ‘sometimes or often’, as opposed to ‘rarely or only once’ in the preceding 12 months (p 40).

‘In fact, most respondents who stated that the other parent had engaged in humiliating insults, monitored their whereabouts, or circulated of defamatory comments also indicated that these behaviours occurred sometimes or often. After about five years of separation, the monitoring of a person’s whereabouts may be particularly likely to reflect obsessive harassment, unless such monitoring has been instigated by genuine concerns about personal safety or the safety of others, including the children’ (p 40).

Independent children's lawyer - Other Resources

Children: Safety and Risk.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage contains information about requirements to notify the Court about family violence and child abuse, family violence orders, risk assessment, Lighthouse, staying safe at court and getting help and support.

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Family Violence Information Sheet (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This information sheet contains important information for litigants who allege they have experienced, or are alleged to have perpetrated, family violence, including safety at court, legal and support services at court, and cross-examination.

Family Violence: Overview

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage outlines the principles which guide the FCFCA's response to family violence, behaviours which may constitute family violence, coercive and controlling behaviours which may amount to family violence and common forms of family violence.

It also contains links to information on:

- Help and support;
- Family violence orders;
- Family violence and children;
- How the court considers safety and risk;
- Safety at court;
- Frequently asked questions; and
- Lighthouse.

Family Violence Plan - Former Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan ‘builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation’. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan ‘contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.’

See in particular at p 2, ‘The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child’s best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.’

Guidelines for Independent Children’s Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

Independent Children’s Lawyer information sheet.

Accessible via Legal Aid Western Australia.

Parental conflict and its effect on Children (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This fact sheet provides information for parents about the ways family conflict affects children, both in families who live together and in families who have separated.

In families where there is a high level of conflict and animosity between parents, children are at a greater risk of developing emotional, social and behavioural problems, as well as difficulties with concentration and educational achievement.

Frequent and intense conflict or fighting between parents also has a negative impact on children's sense of safety and security which affects their relationships with their parents and with others. Parental conflict that focuses on children is also linked to adjustment problems, particularly when children blame themselves for their parents' problems.

'Good quality parenting', that is parenting that provides structure, warmth, emotional support and positive reinforcement, has been found to reduce the impact of conflict.

Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Former Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the jurisdiction of the Court, including its family law jurisdiction, and the Court's aspirations for engagement with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. The Plan 'provides a platform to introduce measures to promote reconciliation and addresses some of the barriers faces by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. In doing this, the Plan provides four focus areas for the Court: relationships; respect; opportunities; and tracking progress.

What is an Independent Children's Lawyer?

A brochure accessible via:

Legal Aid New South Wales

Legal Aid Queensland

Legal Aid Commission of Tasmania

Family dispute resolution

Among the objectives of the 2006 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) and the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA) were the discouragement of adversarial approaches to family dispute resolution (FDR) and the introduction of a national network of family relationship centres resourced with accredited FDR practitioners [Bagshaw et al 2011]. Section 60I FLA and Section 66H FCA aim to ensure that all parties who have a dispute about Part VII FLA or Part 5 FCA (children) matters make a genuine effort to resolve the dispute by FDR before applying for an order under the Part. FDR can be provided through the 65 Family Relationship Centres, other government funded organisations, Legal Aid Commissions and private services [Other Resources].

A court must not hear an application under Part VII FLA or Part 5 FCA unless the applicant has either filed and served a certificate by an FDR practitioner (certifying that the parties have attended or attempted to attend FDR (s.60I(7) FLA; s.66H(7) FCA) and the FCFCA Fact Sheet) or have attended upon a Registrar and obtained an exemption from attending FDR (s.60I(9) FLA; s.66H(9) FCA) on the basis that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there has been or that there is a risk of family violence or child abuse by one of the parties to the proceedings; or the application relates to the contravention of an order made under this part in the previous 12 months; or there are circumstances of urgency or impracticality. The Family Violence Best Practice Principles make it clear that it is not compulsory for parties to participate in FDR in these circumstances. Where family violence issues are not identified in the FDR intake process, but become apparent in the course of the negotiations, a certificate may be issued by an FDR practitioner under Section 60I FLA or Section 66H FCA certifying that it would be inappropriate to continue [AG s60I Certificate Fact Sheet]. It is important to note that the assessment of the suitability of parties to attend dispute resolution at any stage, has not changed as a result of the merger of the Courts and the implementation of Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Family Law) Rules 2021 (FCFCOA Rules) (Sch 1 Part 1 cl 1(8) and Sch 2 Part 1 cl 1(8)) and the Central Practice Direction Family Law - Case Management 2021 (Central Practice Direction). However, it appears from the pre-action procedures that in the event FDR is not appropriate, for whatever reason, a written notice of an intention to start a proceeding must be given to the other party prior to the filing of an application to the Court (FCFCOA Rules Sch 1 Part 1 cl 3(4) and Sch 1 Part 2 cl 3(4)).

Where a FDR practitioner assesses it safe to do so, a matter involving family violence may proceed to FDR. The specific model of FDR utilised (for example, telephone, skype, online, shuttle, legally-assisted) will be dependent on the circumstances, complexities and needs of individual families.

Any communications made to an FDR practitioner during FDR are confidential unless disclosure is required or authorised by law (Section 10H FLA or Section 53 FCA). Such communications made in FDR are also not admissible in any court or proceedings in any jurisdiction (Section 10J FLA or Section 54 FCA). Additionally, a communication made when a professional consultation is being carried out, on referral from an FDR practitioner, is inadmissible in any court or proceedings in any jurisdiction. However, an admission or disclosure that indicates that a child under 18 has been abused, or is at risk of abuse, may be admitted as evidence unless there is sufficient evidence of the admission or disclosure available to the court from other sources.

Under Section 13C FLA or Section 65K FCA, a judge may also refer parties back to FDR, family counselling, a course, program or service at any stage of the family law proceedings but before doing so must consider seeking the advice of a family consultant about the services appropriate to the parties' needs (Section 11E FLA or Section 64 FCA).

With the introduction of the FCFCA Rules and the Central Practice Direction,there has been an increased focus on the importance of and reliance on dispute resolution and Family Dispute Resolution (FDR). "Dispute Resolution" is defined in the FCFCOA Rules to include a mediation and conference (r. 105). One of 10 the core principles underpinning the family law jurisdiction and designed to facilitate the resolution of family law matters is the importance of dispute resolution. In the Central Practice Direction this is described as follows:

1. The Court encourages the use of dispute resolution procedures;
2. Before commencing actions, parties are expected to make a genuine attempt to resolve the dispute including by complying with requirements and obligations of Section 60I of the FLA and the preaction procedures set out in the FCFCOA Rules;
3. After commencement of an action, parties are expected to:
   (a) Be proactive and identify the appropriate time and appropriate way in which they can participate in dispute resolution; and
   (b) Be prepared to make and consider reasonable offers of settlement at any stage. Failure to do so may have a cost consequence.

It is also important to note that another of the 10 core principles is assessment of risk. This includes the prioritisation of the safety of children, vulnerable parties and litigants as well as the identification and appropriate handling of issues of risk including alleged family violence. As a result, participation in family dispute resolution and dispute resolution more broadly needs to be considered in this context.

The Central Practice Direction also includes consideration after any interim hearings, as to whether dispute resolution is appropriate and whether measures can be implemented to ensure safety in matters involving family violence and safety concerns. This includes parties being referred off to private mediation, private or community based Family Dispute Resolution, and/or arbitration with the consent of the parties. If the Court is satisfied that it is appropriate for the parties to participate in dispute resolution, the matter will be listed for a date within 6 months of filing for a Conciliation Conference, a Judicial Settlement Conference or a Family Dispute Conference. The Central Practice Directions also note that a second or subsequent dispute resolution may be listed at any time if it appears to the Court that it is reasonably likely this will assist with the resolution or narrowing of the dispute.

There are additional requirements included in the FCFCOA Rules and the Central Practice Direction that parties provide a detailed list of documents to the Mediator or FDR Practitioner and to the other party involved not less than 7 days before the mediation/FDR. These include the following:

1. All relevant Applications, Responses, Affidavits and Financial Statements filed in the proceedings;
2. Any relevant expert reports;
3. A Balance Sheet setting out agreed and disputed assets and liabilities;
4. Any documents exchanged between the parties which is directly relevant to an issue remaining in dispute (with relevant passages highlighted);
5. A Minute setting out the precise terms of orders required to give effect to the settlement proposal;
6. A confidential case outline document in the approved form;
7. Particulars of any financial resource and a valuation of any asset the value of which is in dispute;
8. Valuations or market appraisals for any parcel of real estate in which any party has an interest, or any motor vehicle in which the value is not agreed;
9. Valuation of any superannuation interests and written confirmation that the superannuation trustee of any fund that may be subject to a splitting order has been afforded procedural fairness;

10. Any family violence orders currently in place; and

11. Any other documents reasonably requested by the mediator/FDRP.

Research [Kaspiew et al 2015 (Survey of Family Law Practices & Experiences)] by the Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS) in 2015 suggests that parties, and perhaps other professionals involved in the FDR process, may not have a thorough understanding of the 60I/66H exemption. This research shows that some parents who experience family violence continue to present for FDR services, although many who experience family violence proceed directly to the Court without attending or attempting to attend FDR. This research found there was a significant reluctance by parties to disclose family violence issues in the FDR process, and a low 60I/66H exemption rate where family violence issues are disclosed [Kaspiew et al 2015 (Survey of Family Law Practices & Experiences)]. A separate AIFS study shows that among those parents who used FDR services as a means of resolving parenting issues, substantial proportions of parents reported having experienced physical violence or emotional abuse [Kaspiew et al, Synthesis Report 2015].

Another Australian study [Bagshaw et al 2011] reported that women were more likely than men not to disclose family violence and twice as likely as men to report that FDR proceeded notwithstanding a disclosure of family violence. Central to disclosure is what Chisholm has called the victim's dilemma: a victim's choice of balancing the risk to the child of not taking protective action to prevent further family violence, against the risk to the child of doing so unsuccessfully due to, for example, insufficient evidence, with the possible result that the child spends more time with the perpetrator [Chisholm 2009].

The critical question remains in each case, however, as to whether FDR or other mediated or facilitated negotiation processes are appropriate or effective where there is a history of family violence between parties attempting to reach agreement as to parenting arrangements. AIFS has observed in its research that in some circumstances, the process may be empowering for the victim; in other circumstances, the process may cause the victim further fear and trauma, making the victim more vulnerable to the impacts of ongoing power imbalances with the perpetrator, and may produce coerced outcomes that may not be in the best interests of the child [Kaspiew et al 2012]. Overall, fewer parents reach agreement using FDR processes where family violence issues exist, and many are unable to reach agreement [De Maio et al 2013]. For those who do reach agreement, there is evidence that the consequent parenting arrangements may be unstable due to unresolved and ongoing family violence issues and safety concerns, and as a result, these families are likely to need additional support [Qu et al 2010]. There is an acknowledged need for constant vigilance by FDR practitioners in recognising and assessing a party's fear and safety concerns prior to the commencement and throughout the course of the FDR process and, where necessary, issuing a 60I/66H certificate [Kaspiew et al 2009].

If parties reach agreement through FDR they may wish to apply to the Court for consent orders. Where an application is made to the FCFCA for a parenting order by consent (whether or not resulting from an outcome mediated through FDR), the parties must formally advise the Court whether any allegations of family violence or child abuse or neglect (or risk thereof), or of mental ill-health, drug or alcohol misuse, serious parental incapacity or any other allegation involving a risk to the child concerned have been made AND whether a party considers that the child concerned has been or is at risk of abuse, neglect or family violence, and whether a party considers that he or she or another party to the proceedings has been or is at risk of family violence. Should any of these circumstances be advised, the parties must explain to the Court how the parenting order attempts to deal with the allegations (see Rule 10.05 of FCFCA Rules).

Family dispute resolution - Key Literature

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports key findings of two national online surveys with adults and children in relation to post-separation parenting, which formed part of the larger research. Adult respondents described how family violence affected their parenting arrangements and their use of family services to assist with parenting decisions. There were gender differences in the reported experiences of and responses to violence, with women reporting more serious forms of violence than men.

See in particular from p 54 where the issue of disclosure is discussed. The article observes that fear of disclosing family violence is a significant issue in the context of Family Dispute Resolution (and more broadly). In particular, 'Only 60% of the respondents who attended FRCs said they disclosed their experiences of family violence and only 10.5% of those who reported violence to a FDR service were given a certificate of exemption (see s60I of the Family Law Act) from using the service. In this context, women were more likely than men not to disclose violence and twice as likely to report that family dispute resolution proceeded if family violence was disclosed' (p 54).

Caruana, Catherine, 'Dispute resolution choices: A comparison of family dispute resolution, family law conferencing services and collaborative law' [2010] (85) Family Matters 80.

This article provides a comparison of family dispute resolution, family law conferencing and collaborative law. Practitioners' views, differences in the lawyer's role, cost and the range of applicable issues in each theatre are discussed. Traditional mediation (known as Family Dispute Resolution - FDR) is discussed on p 81. The article identifies that careful screening processes for issues such as domestic violence and child abuse are conducted and FDR practitioners 'may refuse mediation where they believe there is a concern about the safety of the clients or the mediators, or where there is a power imbalance that cannot be adequately addressed within the process' (p 81). It points out that while the client must be able to negotiate on their own behalf, there are mechanisms available to support clients including conducting the mediation 'on a shuttle basis where the parties are located in separate rooms and the mediators move between the rooms' (p 81).

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers court practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

See in particular from p 27 where the author discusses the 'victim's dilemma' where 'the victim has experienced family violence and has well-founded fears for the safety of the children if they are to be in the care of the perpetrator.' The dilemma relates to 'balancing the risk to the child from not taking protective action against the risk to the child of doing so unsuccessfully, with the consequence that the child spends more time with the perpetrator' (p 28). If a victim were to seek orders to protect the children from risk (such as no-contact or supervised contact orders), it may be seen 'as vindictive or punitive, dwelling on the past and old grievances, or as a way of alienating the children from the perpetrator.'

This could result in the decision maker taking an adverse view of the victim and making orders which place the children with the perpetrator for longer periods 'to protect them from what it might see as a style of parenting by the victim that would harm the children by alienating them from the other parent. Such an outcome, the victim would believe, would place the children at additional risk of harm' (p 27).

The author notes that often, a history of domestic violence in the relationship which may not have previously been disclosed will contribute to the seriousness of the victim's dilemma. This may make it difficult for the victim to disclose the violence later (such as in Family Dispute Resolution (FDR) or court proceedings) because such disclosure 'may be met with the criticism that if such things had happened, the victim would have complained: it will be argued that the victim's lack of action at the time is a sign that there really had been no such family violence, or that it was of a trivial nature' (p 28). The author notes that the dilemma applies at all stages of proceedings and before proceedings begin. (p 28).

See further at p 152, where the author discusses the risks associated with delay in relation to FDR agencies.

De Maio, John, et al, 'Survey of Recently Separated Parents: A study of parents who separated prior to the implementation of the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Matters) Act 2011' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2013).

This report presents key findings from the Survey of Recently Separated Families (SRSP) 2012. The study aimed to gain a more detailed understanding of parents' experiences of family violence and concerns about child safety, and how well the legal system responds. Interviews were conducted with 6,119 parents who separated between 31 July 2010 and 31 December 2011 - that is, five years after the family law reforms of 2006 and one year prior to the legislative reforms introduced by the Family Law Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011. The study found that family violence is common among separated families, and though many of the participants reported this violence to police or other services, a sizeable minority (47%) of them did not.'

At p E2, it is noted that the most common services accessed by separating parents were Family Dispute Resolution (FDR) (and lawyers). Further, where parents experienced the two broad categories of family violence (physical violence with or without the presence of emotional abuse, and emotional abuse alone), use of all types of family law services including FDR increased. In particular, '69% of parents who experienced physical violence before/during separation contacted a counselling, mediation or family dispute resolution service, compared with 40% of parents who did not report experiencing any family violence' (p 46).

Section 4.3.1 discusses FDR specifically. It is noted that, 'A smaller proportion of parents who reported experiencing family violence before/during the separation than those who didn't experience family violence reached an agreement through FDR' (Table 4.13) (p 52).

Qu, Lixia et al, 'Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years' (Commissioned report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2014).

The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examines the experiences, circumstances, and wellbeing of separated parents and their children in Australia. It was commissioned as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms, and three waves of surveys have now been conducted. This current report presents findings from wave 3, conducted in 2012 with 9,028 parents five years after separation. It explores the opinions and experiences of separated parents regarding: a number of issues including family dispute resolution (FDR).

FDR is considered in section 4.6 from p 59. The study identifies that dealing with family violence/abuse is 'core business' for FDR practitioners (p 67). The data suggests that 'although the experience of family violence/abuse is common among those parents who attempt FDR, those who do not reach agreement but who are not issued with a certificate, are more likely than those who reach agreement to report this experience, while those who are issued with a certificate are the most likely of all to make such a report. A similar pattern can be seen when safety concerns are examined. Those who reach agreement are the least likely to report safety concerns; those who do not reach agreement but are not issued with a certificate are somewhat more likely to report safety concerns; and those who are issued with a certificate are the most likely to have such concerns' (p 62).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

Chapter 5 discusses family dispute resolution (p 93). In situations where FDR or mediation was clearly reported as having been attempted, 'Parents who reported experiencing violence (physical or emotional) were much more likely to have attempted FDR (41% of those who experienced physical violence and 35% of those who had experienced emotional abuse only) than those who did not report experiencing violence (15%)' (p 100).

Table 5.6, which reports on the outcomes of FDR according to whether family violence had been experienced is particularly relevant. (p 100). Table 5.7 discusses FDR agreement rates for mothers and fathers 'by fear, abuse or threats an ability to negotiate'. (pp 100-101). Table 5.8 examines similar issues but in relation to the issuing of s 60I certificates. It suggests 'a strong correlation between mothers' reporting of fear, both generally and inside the sessions, and the issuing of a certificate. There is a weaker though still statistically significant correlation between fathers' reporting of abuse or threats outside the sessions and the issuing of a certificate' (p 102). Authors note there are cases where no certificates are issued but there are reports of fear and threats (p102). There were also reports from some who felt pressured into FDR or into reaching an agreement (p 110). A survey of 2335 clients of family relationships services suggested, in relation to the effectiveness of service responses to concerns and fears of the other person who attended the service in 35% of cases, the participant indicated their fears weren't adequately addressed.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of a pilot of legally assisted and supported family dispute resolution in family violence cases' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2012).

The Coordinated Family Dispute Resolution model was developed to provide a safe, non-adversarial, and child-sensitive means for parents to sort out their post-separation parenting disputes. The model was trialled in five sites across Australia. This report presents an evaluation of the model, examining whether the model addressed practitioner and family safety during the program, safe parenting arrangements, the best interests of children, and power imbalances between parents. The evaluation also examines challenges and advantages due to the interdisciplinary nature of the model.

Chapter 7 (p 102) discusses 'CFDR negotiation in the shadow of family violence'. See further at p 116 – Notes: '…FDR is based on the notion that the process supports parents in agreeing on parenting arrangements and is a step in the direction of future self-management. In the context of family violence, this ideal is recognised to be difficult to achieve because of the power dynamics such a history creates in a relationship, at a general level, and more specifically, because of the potential ongoing effects of trauma.'

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence in three respects:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of professional practices and perspectives
- Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 based on a large-scale survey of parents' experiences and perspectives

- Court Outcomes Project involving: a quantitative analysis of patterns in orders for parental responsibility and time made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia; a national analysis of court filings data provided by those courts and an analysis of published judgments

See in particular section 3.1.5 (esp. p24) – Family dispute resolution outcomes.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

See in particular figure 5.1, which shows, inter alia, 'the estimates of the proportion of cases that are unsuitable for family dispute resolution due to the presence of concerns about family violence and child abuse and neglect'. The findings show that these issues are relevant in a substantial proportion of cases though family violence is more frequently identified than child abuse' (p 89).

Qu, Lixia and Ruth Weston, 'Parenting dynamics after separation: A follow-up study of parents who separated after the 2006 family law reforms' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2010).

This report examines, 'the pathways that separating families have taken through the family law system, and the impact the changes to the family law system have had on these families. The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examined relationships and wellbeing in separated families in Australia. Some 10,000 separated parents with children were interviewed for the first wave in 2008, as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms. This report presents findings from the second wave, when the parents had been separated for two to three years'. See in particular section 4.2 – 'Use of family dispute resolution (FDR)'. Recent use of FDR in the context of physical or emotional abuse is considered at p 49. Use of FDR was reported by around one in three fathers and one in four mothers who said that they had experienced physical or emotional abuse between survey waves and by only around 10% of parents who had not experienced either form of abuse' (p 49).

Qu, Lixia, Family dispute resolution: Use, timing, and outcomes (2019) Australian and New Zealand Journal of Family Therapy 24-42.

After the 2006 Australian family law reforms, it became mandatory for separating or separated parents to mediate disputes over children before filing an application for the courts. The process is known as Family Dispute Resolution (FDR).

This paper examines three cohorts of parents who had separated in different periods after the reforms. It shows that parents who went to FDR were typically able to reach an agreement, but also that the use of and outcomes from FDR were closely linked to circumstances surrounding separation. And finally that parents who used FDR typically did so in the early stage of separation, with its use much less common after a separation of three or four years.

Key points:

1. Use of FDR is quite common among separated parents and the take-up has increased. Among the two cohorts of recently separated parents (surveys conducted in 2012 and 2014), nearly four in 10 reported use of FDR within a year and half after separation, representing an increase from three in 10 for a similar 2008 survey.
2. Separated parents who used FDR differed from those who did not, with a higher likelihood of use associated with higher socio-economic status, separation from a registered marital relationship and having children of primary or junior high school age. More importantly, FDR use was closely associated with experience of toxic issues (family violence, mental health, or substance misuse) before or during separation and poor quality of inter-parental relationship and post-separation safety concerns.
3. Parents who used FDR were more likely to reach an agreement than to have other outcomes. The rate of reaching agreements increased over time, with close to one-half of FDR users among the more recent cohort (2014 survey) reporting this positive outcome. On the other hand, the rate of issuing a certification fell.

4. The longitudinal data of separated parents who were interviewed at three time points after separation (1.5, 2.5, and 5.5 years) revealed that most used FDR once, which typically occurred soon after separation.
5. The data further reveal that the longer the separation, the less likelihood parents reached an agreement through FDR.

Family dispute resolution - Other Resources

- Australian Government, Attorney-General's Department website.

Family Relationships Online – Family Dispute Resolution.

Family Relationships Online, an Australian Government initiative, provides all families (whether together or separated) with access to information about family relationship issues, ranging from building better relationships to dispute resolution. It also allows families to find out about a range of services that can assist them to manage relationship issues, including agreeing on appropriate arrangements for children after parents separate.

Family Relationships Online – Family Dispute Resolution Register.

Family Relationships Online maintains details in the FDR Register (the Register), for administrative purposes only, of those practitioners accredited under the Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008. Courts that deal with family law matters, such as the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia and the Family Court of Western Australia will be authorised to access some information in the Register to verify that certificates are issued under section 60I of the Family Law Act by accredited FDR practitioners. The courts will have access to the names of practitioners included on the Register, the organisation for which they provide services (if any) and the registration number of the practitioner.

Section 60I Certificates Fact Sheet* – website.

This Fact Sheet outlines general information about certificates issued under Section 60I of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and the Family Law (Family Dispute Resolution Practitioners) Regulations 2008. It includes information about the:

1. Certificate template
2. Purpose of 60I certificates
3. Types of certificates

4. Issuing of certificates
5. Time frame for issuing certificates
6. Revocation of certificates.

Court-based dispute resolution in the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (September 2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This factsheet outlines the practical measures the Court will take to fulfil the Court's overarching purpose 'to facilitate the just resolution of disputes a) according to law and b) as quickly, inexpensively and efficiently as possible'."

"The Court's new case management pathway, and particularly the events which are conducted by judicial registrars in court lists and in dispute resolution, is designed to focus parties on potential areas of agreement, and move towards a final resolution of all issues as safely as possible, and without the impact, stress and expense of protracted family law litigation."

"Not all matters are appropriate for dispute resolution including those where there are significant allegations of risk of harm including as a result of domestic and family violence, drug and alcohol abuse and/or coercive control. In all cases, very careful consideration will be given to whether or not a dispute resolution conference is appropriate."

Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016*.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

See at p 8 where it is noted that 'It is important that people seeking assistance from the courts know IT IS NOT COMPULSORY for parties to participate in family dispute resolution processes prior to the commencement of court proceedings, in cases where the court is satisfied there are reasonable grounds to believe:

(a) there has been family violence or abuse, or

(b) there is a risk of family violence or abuse'.

Court and case management

Child-related proceedings

Part VII, Division 12A of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Part 5, Division 11A of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) contain the provisions relating to the conduct of child-related proceedings. Section 69ZN FLA and Section 202B FCA set out the five principles governing the conduct of proceedings relating to children as follows:

1. The Court is to consider the needs of the child concerned, and the impact that the conduct of the proceedings may have on the child, in determining the conduct of the proceedings.
2. The Court is to actively direct, control and manage the conduct of the proceedings.
3. The proceedings are to be conducted in a way that will safeguard:
   - the child concerned against family violence, child abuse and child neglect, and
   - the parties to the proceedings against family violence.
4. The proceedings are, as far as possible, to be conducted in a way that will promote cooperative and child-focused parenting by the parties.
5. The proceedings are to be conducted without undue delay and with as little formality as possible.

Research indicates that cases involving allegations of domestic and family violence may present additional challenges as the objective of parents setting aside their conflict and working cooperatively to achieve a shared parenting arrangement may work against the interests of the party experiencing violence. Allegations of domestic and family violence may require a factual determination as to their veracity. The safety of children and other parties at risk of violence is paramount, while also ensuring that the party experiencing violence has the opportunity to engage in the proceedings [Chisholm 2007]. It may be more difficult than usual for a person who has experienced violence to be self-represented and to have to conduct their own proceedings [Kaspiew et al 2009].

In some registries the Court is screening for family violence through Lighthouse [Lighthouse].

Child-related proceedings - Key Literature

Chisholm, Richard, '"Less adversarial" proceedings in children's cases' [2007] (77) Family Matters 28.

The author discusses the 'Less Adversarial Proceedings' approach in relation to hearing child related proceedings, introduced in 2006 amendments to the Family Law Act. This article overviews the less adversarial principles and duties under the new legislation (at 31-32).

Family Court of Australia, Finding a Better Way: A bold departure from the traditional common law approach to the conduct of legal proceedings (April 2007).

This document contains a general overview of the Family Court's transition from the traditional common law adversarial trial to the less adversarial trial (LAT). It contains a history of procedural reforms to the Family Court. It discusses the differences between adversarial and inquisitorial systems, and contains detailed discussion of the operation of the LAT model.

See in particular at pp 6-7, where it is noted that traditional adversarial processes such as cross-examination present particular difficulties in family disputes which are often compounded when there are family violence allegations or more subtle imbalances of power in the relationship.

Family violence generally is discussed at pp 55-56 - 'The frequency with which issues of both child and spousal abuse are raised in Family Court proceedings makes it vital that any procedural changes provide at least the same level of protection to possible targets of violence as did the processes which they replaced.'

The LAT improves the Court's responses to family violence allegations through

- Early consideration of the issue;
- Determination of single issues of disputed fact separately and;
- Judicial consistency (the same judicial officer handles the case for its duration).

See further - 'The direct dialogue between the judge and the parties enables the judge to assess the circumstances of the family without the buffer of formality and, hopefully, without the parties being intimidated or overwhelmed by the courtroom environment. There is a need for care in dealing with such cases particularly where one party may be in fear of the other. A party may well have concerns about speaking freely in the presence of the other party and the judge must be conscious of such a possibility. Arrangements can include changes to the format of the courtroom, permission to have additional companions present or special arrangements for a party being able to participate by video as is consistent with the Court's family violence strategy. Family consultants may play a significant role in such cases, especially where they have had prior involvement with the family' (pp 55-56).

Family Court of Australia, 'Implications of the Australian Institute of Family Studies "Allegations of Family Violence and Child Abuse in Family law Children's Proceedings" report: Response from the Family Court of Australia' [2007] (77) Family Matters 16.

This article emphasises the value of reliable evidence and guidelines in judicial decision making, and highlights Family Court initiatives in improving practices and outcomes, such as the Less Adversarial Trial, the Child Responsive Model, and staff training.

See in particular at p 17 – 'The issue-based focus of the Less Adversarial Trial and the greater control exercised by the trial judge over the conduct of proceedings, including the evidence to be relied upon, enables the Family Court to bring a more structured and purposive approach to its consideration of allegations of violence and abuse'…'Although the report highlighted the lack of expert evidence in particular cases, the new Less Adversarial Trial process will allow the judge to identify issues of violence or abuse at an early stage and direct the appropriate evidence to be put before the Court.'

Kaspiew, R., et al., (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022).

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. See page 11-12 for key findings.

The findings in this report demonstrate that non-compliance arises from a complex range of issues, with five overlapping themes emerging as particularly significant: family violence and safety concerns, child-related issues, circumstances where parents' behaviour is seen as particularly difficult (including situations where systems abuse may be occurring), orders that are seen as unworkable for technical or substantive reasons, and the existence of a contravention regime that is widely regarded as ineffective.

In relation to responding to non-compliance: The financial cost associated with legal proceedings was the most commonly identified obstacle to taking action in relation to compliance, with 96 per cent of the sample agreeing this discourages clients from taking action. Similarly, reluctance to re-engage with a court process and the level of complexity associated with legal proceedings were seen as obstacles by 93 per cent and 88 per cent of participants respectively. Fear of the other party was nominated as an obstacle by 80 per cent of the sample.

A majority of the professionals involved in the survey and interviews considered the system for responding to contraventions was ineffective, with 56 per cent disagreeing with the proposition that the regime is effective in discouraging non-compliance with parenting orders and only 14 per cent agreeing.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files.

See further in section 14.3 (p 328-330) which contains qualitative insights into less adversarial proceedings. Some judicial officers and legal practitioners expressed reservations about the way family violence cases were handled within the less adversarial framework. The report notes: 'There were two aspects to these concerns. First, some believed the more personal nature of LAT proceedings, where parties speak directly to the judge, may not be optimal for parties who have experienced family violence. Second, some maintained that the informality of the LAT may not be the best approach for determining allegations that often concern serious criminal offences.'

Views that the less adversarial processes achieved appropriate outcomes for cases involving allegations of family violence or child abuse were expressed less frequently. However, those who espoused this view suggested that less adversarial trials allowed a broader picture of a child's circumstances, including in relation to family violence and child abuse, to be put before the court (p 329).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of a pilot of legally assisted and supported family dispute resolution in family violence cases' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2012).

This report presents an evaluation of the Coordinated Family Dispute Resolution model piloted in the community sector. The evaluation also examines challenges and advantages due to the interdisciplinary nature of the model. This was not intended to be integrated into court-based practice.

See generally chapter 7 – 'CFDR negotiation in the shadow of family violence'. It is noted that 'The application of mediation-based processes in circumstances where there has been a history of family violence raises significant challenges to some of the core notions that underpin approaches to mediation. For a range of reasons linked primarily to the power imbalances that ensue from a history of family violence, facilitated processes such as mediation have frequently been thought to be inappropriate for these cases. At the same time, empirical evidence and the practice literature demonstrate that such processes are quite widely applied in circumstances in which family violence has been alleged. Sometimes the process can be an empowering one for the victim, but sometimes it can engender fear and/or leave the victim in an even more vulnerable position' (p 102).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The findings indicate that considerable value is placed on the role, especially by judges. There are three overlapping aspects to the ICL role, relating to participation, litigation management and evidence gathering. In fulfilling the litigation management and evidence-gathering role, ICLs are seen to bring a child focus to proceedings that would otherwise be conducted bilaterally and adversarially. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent. It is also clear from the range of responses across participant groups that there are concerns about the capacity and commitment of some practitioners. (p xii)

It was found that ICLs play an important role 'in influencing the focus of proceedings that would otherwise be conducted bilaterally in an adversarial manner' (p 53). See also section 8.4.3 (p 127) – 'ICL involvement in cases of family violence and child abuse'. There was a strong theme from parental interviews that the ICLs 'did not maintain a position of impartiality and that this in turn influenced the stance adopted in relation to their evidence-gathering role', particularly in relation to cases where family violence and child abuse concerns were present. Further, 'Almost all of the women who reported a history of family violence or concerns about child safety identified the ICL as having had a negative effect on the case, from their perspective' (p 130).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014. See in particular section 6.3.2 – lawyers (p 124). This section contains family lawyers' views ofthe 2012 family violence reforms.

Maloney, et al, 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study' (Research Report No. 15, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2007).

'The study examines (a) the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings filed in 2003 in selected registries; (b) the extent to which alleging parties provided evidence in support of their allegations, and to which allegations were denied, admitted or left unanswered by the other party; and (c) the extent to which court outcomes of post-separation parenting disputes appeared to be related to the presence or absence of allegations.'

Qu, Lixia et al, 'Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years' (Commissioned report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2014).

'The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examines the experiences, circumstances, and wellbeing of separated parents and their children in Australia. It was commissioned as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms, and three waves of surveys have now been conducted. This current report presents findings from wave 3, conducted in 2012 with 9,028 parents five years after separation. It explores the opinions and experiences of separated parents regarding: quality of inter-parental relationships; child-focused communication between parents; safety concerns and violence and abuse; use and perceived helpfulness of family law services; pathways for developing parenting arrangements; family dispute resolution; stability and change in care-time arrangements; property division and their timing and perceived fairness; and child support arrangements and compliance. The report also asks parents about their child's wellbeing, and compares this with care-time arrangements and family dynamics.'

See in particular at p 13 where it is noted that 'How to create and maintain child-focused dialogues against a background of high levels of emotion, disappointment and anger has been recognised as an important challenge for family dispute resolution practitioners and service providers. Approaches that involve greater collaboration between lawyers and less adversarial processes within courts have also been developed as steps in the direction of discouraging the conflation of interpersonal difficulties and the resolution of parenting disputes.'

International

James-Hanman, D & Holt, S. Post-Separation Contact and Domestic Violence: our 7-Point Plan for Safe[r] Contact for Children (2021) 36 Journal of Family violence 991-1001 doi: 10.1007/s10896-021-00256-7

This commentary poses some difficult questions, challenging a conversation about both the risks and benefits of contact in the context of a history of domestic violence and abuse. The authors outline a seven-point plan, based on the evidence, that they argue could make a significant difference to safe(r) post-separation contact for children. The seven points are discussed in the paper but include:

- The emphasis must be on safe and meaningful contact
- Be aware that domestic violence and abuse is a specific and deliberate attack on the mother-child bond and interventions need to therefore repair this, not damage it further
- Question parental knowledge of and genuine interest in their children
- Recognise that children are active agents in their lives: reports should not be written about them without their input; decisions about contact should be informed by children's voices
- Improved processes in the family courts

- Understand that past physical assaults are not a good indicator of future risk
- Making evidence informed decisions

Child-related proceedings - Other Resources

Guidelines for Independent Children's Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

'The Guidelines have also been issued for the purposes of providing practitioners, parties, children and other people in contact with the family law courts, with information about the courts' general expectations of ICLs. The Guidelines set out these expectations as they relate to children in circumstances where allegations of child abuse and/or family violence are made, children from culturally and linguistically diverse families and communities, children with disabilities, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, and where applications arise for the authorisation of special medical procedures and other orders relating to the welfare of children.'

See in particular at section 6.4 (p 6) –

'The ICL is to remain independent, objective and focused upon promoting the child's best interests in all dealings throughout the proceedings. The parties and their legal representatives should be encouraged to be non-adversarial where possible and to maintain a focus on the child's best interests. The ICL should promote this approach whenever appropriate.'

National Strategic Framework for Information Sharing between the Family Law and Family Violence Child Protection Systems. (webpage).

This Framework supports the appropriate and timely two-way information exchange between the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia and the Family Court of Western Australia (the family law courts) on the one hand, and state and territory courts, child protection, policing, and firearms agencies on the other.

Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Open via Federal Circuit Court of Australia website.

This document explains the jurisdiction of the Court, including its family law jurisdiction, and the Court's aspirations for engagement with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. The Plan 'provides a platform to introduce measures to promote reconciliation and addresses some of the barriers faces by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. In doing this, the Plan provides four focus areas for the Court: relationships; respect; opportunities; and tracking progress.

Lighthouse.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the role of Lighthouse in the Court's response to cases which may involve family violence.

"The Courts are leading the way in helping families that have experienced family violence and other safety risks to navigate the family law system. Lighthouse plays a central role in the Court's response to cases which may involve risk relating to family violence, mental health, drug and alcohol misuse and child abuse and neglect, by shaping the allocation of resources and urgency given to such cases."

The three parts of Lighthouse are:

- Screening (using the Family DOORS Triage risk screening process);
- Triage and case pathways; and
- Case management (including referral to the specialist Evatt List in certain registries).

Lighthouse operates in the family law registries in Adelaide, Brisbane, Cairns, Canberra, Dandenong, Darwin, Hobart, Launceston, Melbourne, Newcastle, Parramatta, Rockhampton, Sydney, Townsville and Wollongong.

Cross-examination

Family violence allegations in family law proceedings – personal cross-examination ban

Provisions of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) (see also s219AK Family Court Act 1997 (WA)) ensure that appropriate protections for victims of family violence are in place during cross-examination in all family law proceedings.

Section 102NA FLA bans personal cross-examination in family law proceedings in certain circumstances where allegations of family violence have been raised. The ban may apply automatically or the court may use its discretion to impose a ban.

The automatic ban applies where there are allegations of family violence between two parties and any of the following circumstances apply:

- either party has been convicted, or is charged with, an offence involving violence, or a threat of violence, to the other party.
- a family violence order (other than an interim order) applies to both parties.
- an injunction under section 68B or 114 FLA for the personal protection of either party is directed against the other party.

The court also has discretion to make an order to ban personal cross-examination even if those circumstances do not apply. The court may make such an order on its own initiative or on the application of either the examining party, the witness party, or an independent children's lawyer (subsection 102NA(3) FLA).

Where personal cross-examination is prohibited, cross-examination of both parties must be conducted by a lawyer (subsection 102NA(2) FLA). Parties will need to engage a private lawyer or apply to their relevant state or territory legal aid commission for legal representation under the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme. If a party does not have legal representation, they will not be permitted to cross-examine the other party.

Section 102NB FLA requires that where there is an allegation of family violence, but a party is not prohibited from personally cross-examining another party under section 102NA FLA, the court must ensure that during cross-examination there are appropriate protections for the party who is the alleged victim on the family violence.

Other powers to control proceedings

More generally, in the federal jurisdiction, section 26 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) gives the court power to make orders it considers just regarding the questioning of witnesses; and under section 41 Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) the court must disallow questions that it considers improper on certain grounds. In the family law jurisdiction specifically, Part VII, Division 12A of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Part 5, Division 11A of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) contain provisions relating to the conduct of child-related proceedings (see also the Family Violence Best Practice Principles [FCA/FCCA FV BPP 2016]). Section 69ZN FLA and Section 202B FCA set out the governing principles, including the court's role in actively directing, controlling and managing the conduct of the proceedings, and in safeguarding children and parties against family violence. Section 69ZT FLA and Section 202H FCA empower the court to dispense with certain rules of evidence, and Section 69ZX FLA and Section 202L FCA give the court considerable flexibility to make orders and directions in relation to evidentiary matters, including to limit or not allow cross examination of a particular witness.

Where a judicial officer is concerned about the safety of a party they may facilitate a safety plan, which may, for example, provide for the party to give evidence by electronic medium and to be attended by a support person in the courtroom and precinct.

A judicial officer must balance the need for procedural fairness in the presentation of both parties' cases, including proper testing of evidence by cross-examination, with the need to ensure the safety of parties.

Cross-examination may present particular difficulties in family disputes where there are allegations of domestic and family violence between the parties to the proceedings, and a self-represented perpetrator wishes to cross-examine the victim [Harrison 2007] or a self-represented victim is expected to cross-examine the perpetrator.

Where a party who is a victim of domestic and family violence is self-represented and required to cross examine the perpetrator, their capacity to appropriately and fully question may be diminished or negated by their fear of the perpetrator [Coy et al 2012]. Where the perpetrator is represented, a self-represented victim may feel particular pressure to withdraw or not proceed with an application [Qld Special DFV Taskforce Report 2015], or to consent to orders as a result of fear or intimidation, or to avoid being compromised or intimidated by a hearing or other ongoing proceedings [Kaspiew et al 2009].

In some cases a perpetrator may choose to be self-represented to try to secure the opportunity to directly cross-examine the victim. The victim's capacity to give evidence or the quality of the victim's evidence in these circumstances may be compromised by the victim's fear of the perpetrator and, as a consequence, the probative value of the evidence may be diminished or negated.

Where a perpetrator uses their own or the victim's self-represented status to subject the victim to further abuse [Chisholm 2009] through judicial processes [FLC LIP Report 2000], the victim may experience a form of secondary abuse.

These scenarios should be understood in the context of the complex dynamics of domestic and family violence characterised by a pattern of abusive behaviour involving a perpetrator's exercise of control over the victim, often for an extended period.

Cross-examination - Key Literature

Australia

Booth, Tracey, Miranda Kaye, & Jane Wangmann. (2022). Addressing the problem of direct cross-examination in Australian family law proceedings. University of New South Wales Law Journal, 45(4), 1415–1448.

Difficulties experienced by victims of family violence who are cross-examined by the unrepresented perpetrator of that violence (or vice versa) in family law proceedings are well-documented. Such direct cross-examination can be traumatic and unlikely to generate high quality evidence. In 2019 this problem was addressed in Australia by the Family Violence and Cross-Examination Scheme ('Scheme'). Under this Scheme, direct cross-examination by self-represented litigants is prohibited on a mandatory or discretionary basis in certain family law cases involving allegations of family violence. This article examines the implementation of the Scheme by drawing on data from a large ethnographic project that was concerned with self-representation in family law proceedings involving allegations of family violence and an analysis of recent case law. We highlight issues in the early administration of the Scheme as well as more complex ongoing issues. This article provides an evidence base to guide policy and legislative developments in this area.

Bryant, Diana, 'The Family Courts and Family Violence' (Paper Presented at the Judicial Conference of Australia Colloquium, 9-11 October 2015).

This paper discusses various issues which confront the family courts where family violence is a feature. The Chief Justice identifies cross-examination by alleged perpetrators of alleged victims as one of 16 particularly complex issues. See at p 4 – 'Where the alleged perpetrator cannot afford a lawyer, or chooses not to get one, and is ineligible for legal aid, there is a need for the court to ensure that each party is afforded procedural fairness in presenting their case and, where facts are in issue in parenting matters (beyond the question of whether or not violence has occurred), to deal with the issue of cross examination of the alleged victim by the alleged perpetrator.'

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

Professor Chisholm was required to ‘assess the appropriateness of the legislation, practices and procedures’ that apply in cases where family violence is an issue and to recommend improvements.

He observes that: ‘In relation to safety at court as well as other aspects of dealing with family violence issues, measures need to be in place to ensure that risk is disclosed, and understood, and that necessary actions are then taken’. For example, the Federal Magistrates’ Court (at the time) submitted that electronic means of giving evidence should be universally available to ‘balance the requirement of procedural fairness in allowing testing of the evidence when there may be a victim of violence being cross-examined by an abusive partner’ (p 161).

See especially at pp 168-169, where the author cites one submission which noted that sometimes ‘cross-examination of a victim by an unrepresented violent partner can be experienced as a continuation of the violence’.

Moreover, the Family Law Section of the Law Council of Australia submitted – ‘Self-represented litigants can be at a significant disadvantage. For victims of violence to present a case and argue it, including cross-examining the perpetrator, can be very difficult. If perpetrators are unrepresented this means they may be personally cross-examining the victim. These outcomes are increasingly frequent as legal assistance is under-funded and unable to assist many litigants who cannot otherwise afford representation’ (p 169).

Harrison, Margaret, Finding a Better Way: A bold departure from the traditional common law approach to the conduct of legal proceedings (April 2007).

This document contains a general overview of the Family Court’s transition from the traditional common law adversarial trial to the less adversarial trial (LAT). It contains a history of procedural reforms to the Family Court. It discusses the differences between adversarial and inquisitorial systems, and contains detailed discussion of the operation of the LAT model.

See in particular at pp 6-7, where it is noted that traditional adversarial processes such as cross-examination present particular difficulties in family disputes which are often compounded when there are family violence allegations or more subtle imbalances of power in the relationship.

Family Law Council, 'Litigants in Person: A Report to the Attorney-General' (August 2000).

This commissioned report extensively considers the issue of litigants in person in the family law context. The report was written in the broader context of the number of self-represented litigants increasing. It contains discussion of the reasons for the increase in unrepresented litigants as well as general characteristics of unrepresented litigants.

See firstly at p 9, where the report notes various concerns that in family law matters involving allegations of family violence, women were suffering a continuing form of abuse through their unrepresented former partners cross-examining them and filing endless interim applications. Note, at p 17, the report notes – 'adequate presentation of a case includes testing the opponent's case by cross-examination and other measures'. At p 25 – 'In many instances a litigant may be intransigent or genuinely disgruntled and not necessarily vexatious. The judge has authority to control proceedings if the unrepresented litigant uses cross examination of the former spouse as an opportunity for harassment. However, judges have to balance concerns about harassment with the unrepresented litigant's right to put evidence to the court, and they generally attempt to avoid any perceptions of bias'.

Fogarty, John, 'Family Court of Australia: into a brave new world' (2009) 20(3) Australian Family Lawyer 2-24.

In this article, the author critiques the rationale and operation of the 'less adversarial trial' (LAT). The 'radical' nature of the changes in particular are criticised. The author advocates instead for carefully explained, incremental reform 'with, in particular, strong control over the early identification of the issues and the evidence' (p 10).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. Of relevance here see:

- See Chapter 9: ‘Legal system professionals regularly made the point that women felt pressured to agree to outcomes in negotiations that they didn’t feel were in their children’s interests. While this was said to be happening frequently, particular concerns were expressed about the nature of the agreements reached in two different situations. The first concerned cases where there had been a history of family violence. The second situation causing concern involved matters where a lack of legal representation at all, or a perceived imbalance in the quality of the legal representation, failed to alleviate the apparent pressure caused by the imbalance in bargaining power, resulting in women agreeing to inappropriate arrangements’ (p 221).
- Also see ‘15.1.2 Consent orders’ (from p337), noting that ‘The tensions in this area are succinctly summarised in this comment by a legal practitioner about the choice litigants face in deciding whether or not to settle: “Most of them settle by consent and you’ve got a real tension because those that settle by consent feel as if they’ve been bullied into it, get a settlement because they can’t afford it and they want to get it over and done with. Those that run the full trial feel as though they got shafted anyway because they didn’t get heard properly. So either way they feel as though they’ve lost”. In reflecting on their practices concerning consent orders, a common observation among registrars and judicial officers was the limited supervisory role courts have in the context of a system that encourages parties to reach agreement by themselves’.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, ‘Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences’ (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014. See in particular from p 114 –16 on leading evidence and cross-examination.

Queensland, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Submissions to taskforce raised the lack of legal representation and assistance as a major concern for victims, particularly where a male respondent can afford legal representation. Submissions stated that this often results in the victim withdrawing or not pursuing a legal response and can lead to a failure in protection for an aggrieved. Submissions also noted the benefits from a duty lawyer system:

- 'Mitigating the trauma of the court process for victims;
- Parties are better informed of their rights and the legal process and know what they can and cannot ask of the court
- Victims will receive assistance and advice with completing their application forms. This will ensure all relevant information is before the court. The court process will proceed more smoothly as a consequence of properly prepared documents and legally informed clients appearing before it
- Queensland Police Prosecutors will also indirectly benefit as a consequence in the same way as the court will
- More appropriate orders and conditions can be applied for which improves victims safety, and reduces the risk of recidivism, breach and applications for variations of the orders
- Timely legal advice and information to respondents could lead to a less litigious approach to proceedings and appropriate referrals
- Victims will be empowered to pursue their matters and not withdraw because of fear or intimidation by the perpetrator or because of lack of knowledge of the complex legal system. The result will be greater safety for older people, women and children experiencing domestic and family violence. (p 312)

International

Coy, Maddy et al, Picking up the pieces: domestic violence and child contact (Rights of Women and CWASU, 2012).

Section 5 of this report presents quantitative and qualitative data on women and legal professionals' experience of legal proceedings. In relation to legal representation, this report found that there were instances where women had to represent themselves (and thus have to cross-examine men who had been violent to them) or face the prospect of being cross-examined by their ex-partners. Women were afraid of these two scenarios (p 38). Solicitors and barristers surveyed identified two issues relating to potential abuse and intimidation that self-representation raises. First, ‘perpetrators representing themselves used cross-examination as another route to harass and undermine their ex-partners’. Second, fearful victim-survivors representing themselves may not disclose the full details of their abuse and may inhibit themselves from questioning perpetrators about their actions and motivations (p 39). The report identifies multiple ways in which the outcome of the case can be influenced where women and/or their abusive ex-partners represent themselves:

1. Victim-survivors are not enabled to give their best evidence about histories of abuse, which may be crucial to determining whether contact, and in what form, is deemed appropriate.
2. The difficulties of cross-examining their perpetrators may mean they do not ask sufficiently probing questions or challenge responses, which again informs what evidence is available to the court.
3. They are rarely equipped with the legal knowledge and experience to prepare documentation and negotiate family law processes e.g. requesting finding of fact hearings.
4. Pressure to reach speedy resolution may mean that women accede to arrangements which are not necessarily in their own or their children’s best interests’ (p 40).

Cross-examination - Other Resources

Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Family Violence Best Practice Principles (4 ed, 2016).

The Family Violence Best Practice Principles was developed in 2016, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts. A new version is currently being developed and will be available in 2022.

The Family Violence Best Practice Principles are applicable in all cases involving family violence or child abuse (or the risk of either) in proceedings before courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA).

The latest edition reflects the extensive powers of the judiciary in regard to the cross-examination of vulnerable witnesses by alleged perpetrators of family violence. For example, in child-related proceedings, the power to make orders limiting, or not allowing, cross-examination of a particular witness (Section 69ZX(2)(i) FLA)* and/or to, with forewarning, refuse permission to continue cross-examination.

The Statement of Principle on pp. 4-5 provides inter alia that:

'These Best Practice Principles have been developed by the [former] Family Court of Australia (FCA) and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia (FCCA). They contribute to furthering the courts' commitment to protecting children and any person who has a parenting order from harm resulting from family violence and abuse.

The Best Practice Principles recognise:

- the harmful effects of family violence and abuse on victims
- the place accorded to the issue of family violence in the FLA and
- the principles guiding the Magellan case management system for the disposition of cases involving allegations of sexual abuse or serious physical abuse of children.

The Best Practice Principles are applicable in all cases involving family violence or child abuse or the risk of family violence or child abuse in proceedings before courts exercising jurisdiction under the FLA (FCA and FCCA). They provide useful background information for decision makers, legal practitioners and individuals involved in these cases…

Ensuring the safety of a child is central to all determinations of what is in a child's best interests.

The courts aim to protect children and family members from all forms of harm resulting from family violence and abuse.

All persons attending courts exercising family law jurisdiction are entitled to be safe and the courts will take all appropriate steps to ensure the safety of their users. This includes the creation of an individually tailored safety plan where appropriate.

A safety plan is a document that can be varied at any time and which includes a variety of options available to a person to ensure their safety at court. These include attendance by electronic medium, attendance with support persons, staggered attendances, use of security entrances and, where necessary, security personnel. All court staff are able to prepare a safety plan. Safety planning is one of the strategies that may be implemented to ensure that a person who fears for their safety remains protected from harm. A safety plan for attendances at court events is but one component of safety planning that needs to be incorporated into the individual's overall plan for their safety.'

*This provision is mirrored in Section 202L Family Court Act 1997 (WA)

> Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australian: Family violence information sheet.

Self-represented litigants

The question of the extent to which a judicial officer is obliged to intervene in proceedings involving a party or parties who are self-represented (here called self-represented litigants – SRLs) was addressed comprehensively by the Full Court of the Family Court in Re F: Litigants in Person Guidelines [2001] FamCA 348. The Court set out a number of guidelines regarding interventions judicial officers may make without raising an apprehension of bias. The overriding task of the judicial officer is to ensure procedural fairness to all parties.

The guidelines are expressed as not exhaustive, and are intended to assist judicial officers in their exercise of discretion in any particular case, rather than prescribe how proceedings should be conducted. They include:

- informing the SRL of procedural matters;
- generally explaining the SRL's right to object and claim of privilege;
- questioning witnesses;
- clarifying the relevant issues;
- clarifying the substance of the SRL's submissions and orders sought; and
- identifying submissions and applications that ought to be made.

In the early 2000s, the former Family Court of Australia recognised the challenge of increasing numbers of litigants who are self-represented at some stage or stages in family law proceedings. Findings of court-commissioned research included:

- The majority of SRLs cannot afford legal representation, however a significant minority said they did not need or want representation;
- SRLs are likely to need information about court procedures and support services; advice about completion of court forms, preparation of documents, formulation of legal argument, and court etiquette; and other forms of practical and emotional support;
- Judicial officers and registry staff experience difficulties when dealing with SRLs who lack legal and procedural knowledge;
- SRLs consume more of the Court's resources than represented clients;

- Giving assistance to SRLs may compromise judicial impartiality;
- A need for consistent approaches by judicial officers and registry staff to responding to the needs of SRLs; and
- A link was identified between the unavailability of legal aid and self-representation [FCA SRL Project 2002].

Further research conducted at the time noted the diversity in skills, knowledge, cultural background, socio-economic status, personality and motivations of SRLs; and the need for courts to be flexible when dealing with SRLs and aware that the manner in which SRLs engage in litigation may be influenced by their lack of knowledge and experience of court procedures and family law. However in some cases an SRL's behaviour may be designed to harass or annoy or for another wrongful purpose, which may be considered vexatious. The study observed that:

- matters involving SRLs are more likely to go to a hearing than be resolved by out-of-court settlement;
- SRLs experience significant difficulties cross-examining their former partner; and
- judicial officers, in addressing the needs of SRLs, must consider and weigh both the need to redress any power imbalance between the parties due to lack of representation or a history of domestic and family violence and the need to avoid any perception of leniency or unfair advantage towards the SRL [FLC LIP Report 2000].

Later research also indicated that where one or both parties are unrepresented, the Court's ability to receive appropriate evidence and make decisions in the child's best interests may be jeopardised [Chisholm 2009].

An extensive Australian Institute of Family Studies evaluation [Kaspiew et al 2009] of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act reported that women regularly felt pressured to agree to outcomes in negotiations that they didn't feel were in the children's interests. There were particular concerns regarding the suitability of agreements reached in cases where there was a lack of representation at all and the parties agreed to shared or equivalent care, or there was a perceived imbalance between the parties in the quality of legal representation, and cases where there had been a history of domestic and family violence. Where a self-represented party had also experienced violence, there were additional concerns that the party found it difficult to speak personally to the judicial officers. The circumstances surrounding consent orders raised similar concerns where orders were made to formalise agreements made either outside the court process or sometime after court proceedings had been initiated.

In some cases where consent orders are proposed it may be appropriate for the judicial officer to ask questions or request further information in order to closely scrutinise the suitability of the proposal, or to appoint an Independent Children's Lawyer or order a Family Report or expert report to determine what is in a child's best interests.

Where an application is made to the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia for a parenting order by consent, the parties must formally advise the Court whether any allegations had been made in the proceedings of family violence or child abuse or neglect (or risk thereof), or of mental ill-health, drug or alcohol, serious parental incapacity or any other allegation involving a risk to the child concerned AND whether a party considers that the child concerned has been or is at risk of abuse, neglect or family violence, and whether a party considers that he or she or another party to the proceedings has been or is at risk if family violence. Should any of these circumstances be advised, the parties must explain to the Court how the parenting order attempts to deal with the allegations (see Rule 10.05 of the FCFCOA Rules).

Research has shown the value to the court and parties of self-represented parties receiving advice and information on appropriate conduct and language in the courtroom prior to any court appearance or hearing. Legal assistance providers deliver duty lawyer services to self-represented litigants at many locations of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia including providing legal advice and information about court processes, help with the preparation of documents, and in some cases, representation.

With the merger of the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia it is intended that the Court process will be simplified and make it easier to navigate for SRL's. However, in practice the addition of a new set of Rules - coupled with an already complex piece of legislation, regulations and protocols - it is not clear whether the new FCFCA will make things easier or more difficult for SRLs. This is a problem that has confronted the Court for some time.

Important note: The expression "self-represented" is used in this bench book to refer to any situation where a party is not represented by a lawyer. It is acknowledged that the expression may be inappropriate in some contexts. It may, for example, suggest that a party has exercised a choice to represent themselves, when in fact they do so due to lack of financial resources or access to legal assistance. On the other hand, some parties choose to represent themselves because they believe they are best equipped to do so and may object to the use of an expression such as "unrepresented" on the basis that it may, for example, be interpreted to suggest that they are unable to properly or fully participate in the proceedings in their own right.

Self-represented litigants - Key Literature

Anstie, Lara, 'Cross examination of victims of family and domestic violence by self-represented perpetrators in family law proceedings' (2016) 43(4) Brief 38.

Authored by a Western Australian family law practitioner, this article discusses the potential for cross-examination to be exploited by perpetrators to commit further emotional abuse against victims, and in that context, the court's obligation to ensure procedural fairness to an alleged perpetrator while protecting the interests of an alleged victim of domestic and family violence. Reference is made to the Family Court of Australia's Family Violence Best Practice Principles and the Family Court of Western Australia's Family Violence Policy, and recommendations are made for changes to the Family Court Rules 1998 (WA) and Family Court Act 1997 (WA) that provide for a process for the protection of victim witnesses in cross-examination and otherwise in giving oral testimony.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases that include family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation.

In discussing appropriate legal representation (see p 168-169), the report notes that the 'importance of appropriate legal representation can hardly be overstated in parenting cases, especially those that involve issues of family violence'. The author notes that where one or more parties are unrepresented this jeopardises the ability of the court to receive appropriate evidence and to make decisions about the child's best interests. 'Settled cases, too, are a worry when parties are unrepresented, because they may reach agreements in ignorance of the legal situation, or because they know they cannot properly put their case before the court. It is universally agreed in the family law system that despite a lot of good work done to help unrepresented parties, such cases are the most likely to occupy the court's time unfruitfully, or, as sometimes happens, effectively collapse because one or both parties is unable to organise witnesses or present their case in a satisfactory way. One submission pointed out that in some circumstances, cross-examination of a victim by an unrepresented violent partner can be experienced as a continuation of the violence. In such cases children are at risk, because they do not have the protection of a well-informed judicial outcome'.

Dewar, John, et al, 'Litigants in Person in the Family Court of Australia: A report to the Family Court of Australia', 2000).

(The findings of this report were summarised concisely in: Family Court of Australia, Self-represented Litigants - A Challenge: Project Report (December 2000-December 2002) and Family Law Council, 'Litigants in Person: A Report to the Attorney-General' (August 2000) - see below)

The methodology is set out at p28-32. This study employed quantitative and qualitative approaches, primarily questionnaires and semi-structured interviews with judges, judicial registrars, registrars and litigants in person; the researchers interviewed a small number of legal practitioners, and convened focus groups with various groups. 49 unrepresented litigants who had conducted their own matters at the interim stage were also interviewed. A number of hearings involving litigants in person were also observed

Findings Include:

- Most unrepresented litigants were unrepresented because they could not afford legal representation. A significant minority of unrepresented litigants did not want to be represented by a lawyer, and a further significant minority had not applied for legal aid because they were advised that they were ineligible.
- Unrepresented litigants are more likely to have limited formal education, limited income and assets and to have no paid employment.
- The needs of unrepresented litigants vary, but include information, support and advice.
- Courts are affected by unrepresented litigants with judicial officers and registry staff reporting high levels of stress and frustration, difficulty maintaining an appearance of impartiality, and balancing the needs of the unrepresented litigant and the opposing party.
- Unrepresented litigants are more demanding of the time of judicial officers and registry staff than represented parties, although matters involving unrepresented litigants tend to have shorter disposition times.

Family Court of Australia, Self-represented Litigants - A Challenge: Project Report (December 2000-December 2002).

In a context where the number of partially or fully self-represented litigants before the Family Court is increasing, the Court launched the Self-represented Litigants – A Challenge project in December 2000. The goals of the project included developing a nationally consistent approach to providing services to self-represented litigants and improving court services (including practices, procedures, protocols and proformas) (p 3).

'The Family Court recognises that self-representing and other litigants are entitled to all reasonable information and assistance from the Court, so far as is possible, to enable a person to understand what is required to present his or her case to the Court or to engage in dispute resolution processes under the Court's auspices' (p 5).

Family Law Council, 'Litigants in Person: A Report to the Attorney-General' (August 2000).

This commissioned report extensively considers the issue of litigants in person in the family law context. The report was written in the broader context of the number of self-represented litigants increasing. It contains discussion of the reasons for the increase in unrepresented litigants as well as general characteristics of unrepresented litigants.

Various theoretical issues are considered from p 14.

See also from p 30 which deals with 'The Effects of Unrepresented Litigants' discussing effects on the current system.

See generally chapter 3 which deals with responses to the needs of self-represented litigants.

See further at p 72 – 'The vexatious, persistent or relentless unrepresented litigant, who chooses to proceed unrepresented, must be distinguished from the first time unrepresented litigant with no knowledge or experience of court procedures and family law. However, even this apparently polarised example is fraught with difficulty. Unrepresented litigants vary in their demeanour, background, knowledge, skills, personality, knowledge of English, culture, intentions, socio-economic status and more. This diversity illustrates the fundamental need for flexibility and adaptability by courts and legal service providers when dealing with unrepresented litigants.'

Kaspiew, Rae et al, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. Of relevance here see:

- Chapter 9: 'Legal system professionals regularly made the point that women felt pressured to agree to outcomes in negotiations that they didn't feel were in their children's interests. While this was said to be happening frequently, particular concerns were expressed about the nature of the agreements reached in two different situations. The first concerned cases where there had been a history of family violence. The second situation causing concern involved matters where a lack of legal representation at all, or a perceived imbalance in the quality of the legal representation, failed to alleviate the apparent pressure caused by the imbalance in bargaining power, resulting in women agreeing to inappropriate arrangements' (p 221).
- See 14.4 which discusses the Family Court of Western Australia Model.
- Also see '15.1.2 Consent orders' (from p337).

Wangmann, J., Booth, T., & Kaye, M. (2020). "No straight lines": Self-represented litigants in family law proceedings involving allegations about family violence (Research report, 24/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Abstract: This research focuses on documenting current practice and generating new knowledge about the impact and effect of self-representation by one or both parties in Family Law proceedings involving allegations of family violence.

The research team conducted semi-structured interviews with SRLs and professionals who engage with SRLs in family law proceedings to produce a general interview sample. The researchers then also undertook an intensive case study that involved court observation, case file review, and interviews with SRLs or other representatives involved in those observed/reviewed cases.

The research confirmed that there are high numbers of SRLs engaged in family law cases involving allegations of family violence, and the primary motivation for self-representing is financial. The study revealed that SRLs are impacted by their self-representation, as well as histories of family violence, in numerous ways. Primarily, SRLs lack knowledge of the legal process: for example, they are often unaware of the heavy emphasis on paperwork and negotiation in family law cases, and they are unprepared to complete paperwork, or negotiate, in ways that effectively support their case. Intersecting with the lack of knowledge is the impact of family violence: ability to complete paperwork and negotiate is also affected by experiences of violence and resulting trauma, and perceptions of safety.

Given these findings, the report stresses the importance of enhanced, up-to-date and practical information for SRLs in multiple formats, as well as increased access to lawyers and legal advice. The report also raises the need to explore possible system change, particularly with a view to the fragmentation of areas of law that respond to family violence. Alongside enhancing family violence expertise across key court personnel, the report recommends integrating information about safety into routinely accessed documents in order to raise awareness about available services.

Self-represented litigants - Other Resources

Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Former Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the jurisdiction of the Court, including its family law jurisdiction, and the Court's aspirations for engagement with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. The Plan 'provides a platform to introduce measures to promote reconciliation and addresses some of the barriers faces by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. In doing this, the Plan provides four focus areas for the Court: relationships; respect; opportunities; and tracking progress.

Self Represented Litigants Handbooks (2019).

Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

These handbooks are published by the Family Court of Western Australia and include information about property and children's cases.

These booklets are designed to help those people who do not have a lawyer to present their cases in the Family Court of Western Australia.

They are not a substitute for legal advice, but it is hoped the information provided will make it easier for people to navigate through the court system.

It is expected that each party who does not have a lawyer will have tried their best to become familiar with the booklets before coming to Court.

Both handbooks contain practical advice for self-represented litigants in the Family Court of Western Australia about matters including: information about the court; preparing for trial; trial processes; filing documents and the relevant law.

Vexatious proceedings

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends Family Law Act 1975 to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

Section 45A(4)-(8) of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) empowers the court, on its own initiative or on application by a party, to dismiss all or part of proceedings at any stage if satisfied they are frivolous, vexatious or an abuse of process; and to make such costs order it considers just. A similar provision is contained in Section 242 in Part 12 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA), however it is limited to proceedings the court is satisfied are frivolous or vexatious. While Part XIB of the FLA (no equivalent in WA) deals specifically with vexatious proceedings, Section 102QA preserves the court's broader powers to deal with frivolous or vexatious proceedings, for example under Section 45A FLA. For the purposes of Part XIB, Section 102Q defines 'vexatious proceedings' to include proceedings in a court or tribunal that are an abuse of process; that are instituted or conducted to harass or annoy, cause detriment, or for another wrongful purpose; or are instituted or pursued without reasonable ground. Section 102QB sets out the process for the making and types of vexatious proceedings orders. The court must be satisfied as to the threshold issue that a party has frequently instituted or conducted vexatious proceedings or has acted in concert with another person who has done so. It is not necessary for the multiple proceedings to be in the same court or tribunal, and as such the provision serves as an important discouragement to forum shopping.

The legislative definition of vexatious proceedings reflects the understanding expressed in the 2010 joint report of the Australian Law Reform and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010], Family Violence – A National Legal Response. While the report specifically deals with vexatious litigation in the context of state and territory protection order proceedings, it recognises the difficulties that vexatious litigation may present in domestic and family violence related proceedings generally. In particular, concerns arise where perpetrators of violence may use the legal system to further harass, control or abuse the victim. Elsewhere in this bench book, this behaviour is referred to as systems abuse. While any single application may not in itself be considered vexatious, it may be difficult for a court to identify the application as part of a pattern of litigious behaviour that is vexatious without also understanding the history of domestic and family violence perpetrated by the party making the application. Further underlining the difficulty associated with identifying vexatious litigation where there is a history of violence, a victim of long-term violence may, with reasonable grounds, make multiple and frequent applications, for example to enforce parenting orders that have been repeatedly breached by the perpetrator [Chisholm 2009]. Where a party is also self-represented, a court may need to consider the party's lack of knowledge and experience of legal concepts and processes as a legitimate contributing factor to their frequent engagement with the legal system [Dewar et al 2000].

Subsection 45A(5) FLA provides that proceedings or a part of proceedings are not to be considered frivolous, vexatious or an abuse of process just because a related application is made and later withdrawn.

It is intended that with the FCFCA Rules, the Central Practice Direction and the introduction of the FCFCA that there be greater focus on accountability for vexatious litigants (and/or their legal representatives personally) earlier on in proceedings.

Vexatious proceedings - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, Report 114 (2010).

This report identifies that 'vexatious applications in protection order proceedings under state and territory family violence legislation can be a means for a person to misuse the legal system to harass or intimidate a victim of family violence. In addition, because the existence of certain kinds of protection order is a relevant consideration to be taken into account by a court when making orders under the Family Law Act, vexatious applications for protection orders have the potential to affect the operation of both the family law and state and territory family violence regimes.' (p473)

[18.28] False evidence given in protection order proceedings: State and territory family violence legislation generally deals with persons who give false evidence or make false allegations or denials by using provisions relating to vexatious applications or other legislation protecting court processes. A person who gives false evidence may also be charged with a number of offences, including perjury, false swearing and false testimony.

[18.29] (p837) In some circumstances, a court's ability to award costs against a person who brings an application for, or to revoke, a protection order that is 'deliberately false' or made in 'bad faith' is linked to vexatious application provisions.

[18.224] (p880) Vexatious litigation may arise in a number of ways in protection order proceedings. For example, repeated applications for a protection order may be made against the same person based on the same or similar allegations and by the respondent to vary or revoke a protection order. Cross applications for protection orders may also be made without legal grounds. [18.225] While such applications may not, in themselves, be vexatious, where they are repeated or made without legal grounds, concerns arise that people who have committed family violence may use the legal system to further harass, control and abuse the victim.

[17.29] (p764) It is particularly important that if family violence matters have been litigated that they are not re-litigated in another proceeding. Where family violence is at play such re-litigation can be a tactic of further abuse.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

This report considers extensively the issue of family violence in the family law system. Of relevance see '4.6 – Other Matters' (p 172) which considers the abuse of litigation and s 118 Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)) (note that s118 was amended in 2012 and s102QB Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) now governs the making of vexatious litigation orders.) The author notes – 'Some submissions referred to the use of litigation as a vehicle for harassment of the other party. In some cases, no doubt, litigation which appears to one party as a vehicle for harassment will be considered by the other party to be reasonable and necessary, for example to enforce parenting orders where the other party is frequently in breach. However it is certainly possible for litigation to be abused.

Dewar, John, et al, 'Litigants in Person in the Family Court of Australia: A report to the Family Court of Australia', (Research Report No. 20, 2000).

(The findings of the report were summarised concisely in 'Family Law Council, "Litigants in Person: A Report to the Attorney-General")

The methodology is set out at p28-32. This study employed quantitative and qualitative approaches, primarily questionnaires and semi-structured interviews with judges, judicial registrars, registrars and litigants in person; the researchers interviewed a small number of legal practitioners, and convened focus groups with various groups.

See in particular at p 34, where the views of judges, judicial registrars and registrars are considered. Participants who were interviewed believed that 'A significant number (of self-represented litigants) are considered to be dysfunctional 'serial' litigants, many of whom may be emotionally disturbed or mentally ill. Some serial litigants would seem to be vexatious'. See further at pp 52-53 where the effects of the family law system on litigants in person is discussed: 'The system is not adequately equipped to deal with litigants in person whose personalities are such that they do not accept that a decision may not go their way. In fact the system allows them to persist with repeated applications unless they are declared vexatious. There is a small percentage who keep coming back because they do not believe that the system is right or that they have not had their say. There is a group of "problem litigants", usually associated with children's matters. Litigants in person may lodge lengthy affidavits.'

Family Law Council, 'Litigants in Person: A Report to the Attorney-General' (August 2000).

This commissioned report extensively considers the issue of litigants in person in the family law context. The report was written in the broader context of the number of self-represented litigants increasing. It contains discussion of the reasons for the increase in unrepresented litigants as well as general characteristics of unrepresented litigants.

See in particular at p 25 where s 118 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) is discussed (note that s118 was amended in 2012 and s102QB Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) governs the making of vexatious litigation orders.)

'In many instances a litigant may be intransigent or genuinely disgruntled and not necessarily vexatious. The judge has authority to control proceedings if the unrepresented litigant uses cross examination of the former spouse as an opportunity for harassment. However, judges have to balance concerns about harassment with the unrepresented litigant's right to put evidence to the court, and they generally attempt to avoid any perceptions of bias.

See further at p 72 – 'The vexatious, persistent or relentless unrepresented litigant, who chooses to proceed unrepresented, must be distinguished from the first time unrepresented litigant with no knowledge or experience of court procedures and family law. However, even this apparently polarised example is fraught with difficulty. Unrepresented litigants vary in their demeanour, background, knowledge, skills, personality, knowledge of English, culture, intentions, socio-economic status and more. This diversity illustrates the fundamental need for flexibility and adaptability by courts and legal service providers when dealing with unrepresented litigants.'

Kaspiew, Ray, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the overall findings of the Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), which substantively came into effect on 7 June 2012. The report is based on data from 12,198 parents (pre-reform: n = 6,119, post-reform: n = 6,079) (ESPS), 653 family law system professionals (RFV), 1,892 family law court files (pre-reform: n = 895, post-reform: n = 997) and other data.

See especially [7.3.3] (p68-70) noting a range of studies and analyses highlighting the potential for legal systems and processes to be used as a means of perpetuating harassment, including through litigation over parenting arrangements and other separation-related matters (at p69).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014.

See in particular at p 187, where concerns about false, frivolous or vexatious allegations of family violence are identified. The report states: 'it should be noted that such concerns have been longstanding and mirror a persistent belief held by about half of the community that women make up false allegations of family violence to obtain advantage in "custody proceedings"'.

Family consultants and expert witnesses

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;

More information can be found here:
www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

Family Consultants [Family Consultants FAQs] are psychologists and/or social workers who specialise in child and family issues after separation and divorce, and are specifically appointed to the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, or the Family Court of Western Australia. Save for external appointments under Reg 7 of the Family Law Regulations 1984, Family Consultants are co-located within the court premises: in the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia within the Court Childrens Services; and in the Family Court of Western Australia, within the Court Counselling and Consultancy Service.

With the introduction of the FCFCA and the FCFCA Rules, there is a new intended pathway for both parenting and property matters to pass through the Court. This is outlined below:

1. First Court Event;
2. Interim Hearing;
3. Dispute Resolution;
4. Compliance and Readiness Hearing;
5. Trial Management Hearing (if required);
6. Trial.

In parenting matters, at the First Court Event, the Court will consider whether a report from a Family Consultant, social scientist, psychologist, psychiatrist or other appropriately qualified expert is necessary.

Depending on the facts and circumstances of the particular case, the court may order (pursuant to Section 11F FLA or Section 65 FCA) that the parties to child-related proceedings take part in an assessment conducted by a Family Consultant. Some of the common assessments are set out below. Central to all of these assessments is screening for family violence and risk assessment. If the court is made aware that a party has any concerns about their safety, a safety plan will be put in place by the court for these appointments.

Child Dispute Conference: In Division 2 of the FCFCA, the case will be heard by a judge who may ask a Family Consultant to interview the parents/carers and make a preliminary assessment of the issues. This is called a Child Dispute Conference. Children and lawyers are not included. The conference gives the court a preliminary understanding of the family situation, what issues are in dispute, and the steps that might be taken to obtain or commission evidence, assist in the resolution of the proceedings (such as the appointment of an Independent Children's Lawyer), or assist the parties (such as orders to attend family counselling or to participate in an assessment of suitability for Family Dispute Resolution). The focus is on what the children need, and can assist the court in making short-term decisions about arrangements for the children. It may also help the parties reach an agreement. The main purpose of the conference is to conduct a brief and preliminary assessment, but there may also be an opportunity to attempt to negotiate any or all of the issues if time permits.

Child Inclusive Conference: The Division 2 judge hearing the case may ask a Family Consultant to interview the parents/carers and the children and make a preliminary assessment of the issues. This is called a Child Inclusive Conference. Lawyers are not included. The conference is intended to give the court a preliminary understanding of the family situation, particularly the children's experience. The conference can assist the court in making short-term decisions about arrangements for the children. It may also help the parties reach an agreement.

Child Responsive Program: In Division 1 of the FCFCOA, a case may first be heard by a registrar who may order that the family takes part in a Child Responsive Program. This program involves a series of meetings between a Family Consultant, the parties, and usually the children. The aim is to help the parties and the court understand what the children need. When parties cannot agree on the best arrangements for the children, the case will proceed to a Less Adversarial Trial, and the Family Consultant will assist the court with expert opinion and evidence about the children and family.

Case Assessment Conference [WA Case Assessment Conference]: This is an assessment process provided by the Western Australian Court Counselling and Consultancy Service. It involves a meeting between a Family Consultant, the parties, their lawyers if any, and the Independent Children's Lawyer if appointed. The primary purpose of the conference is risk assessment. A written report is provided to the court, each party and the Independent Children's Lawyer if appointed. In the report, the Family Consultant may suggest information that is currently relevant but missing, as well as various case management and therapeutic options regarding the case.

A Family Report [Family Reports FAQs] is prepared by a Family Consultant as ordered by the court (Section 62G FLA and Section 73 FCA. Based on their observations of the parties and/or their children, the Family Consultant considers the family circumstances, explores issues relevant to the case, and recommends to the court arrangements that will best meet the children's future care, welfare and developmental needs. The best interests of the children (Section 60CC FLA and Section 66C FCA) are the main focus of the report. Where family violence is an issue, the Family Violence Best Practice Principles set out the range of matters the court may determine the Family Report to address. In all cases where a Family Report has been ordered, the court must formally release the report and only the parties and their lawyers can receive it unless the court gives permission for it to be shown to other people.

The purpose of the Family Report is not to make findings about disputed facts. The Family Consultant may however consider it appropriate to remark on the apparent veracity of allegations, for example about family violence, after having discussed the allegations with the alleged perpetrator, alleged victim or children. For example, the Family Consultant may wish to record any admissions, inconsistencies or other reflections made or disclosed by the parties in relation to the disputed facts [Moloney et al 2007].

Since the 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and the Family Court Act 1997 (WA), research by the Australian Institute of Family Studies affirms that Family Reports are an important source of independent, expert insight into family dynamics, and are more likely to be generated in cases involving allegations of family violence or child abuse. In particular, there is greater attention in Family Reports to considerations of issues of risk and safety than prior to the legislative reforms, though in nearly half the number of reports analysed there are no conclusions made in relation to risk [Kaspiew et al Court Outcomes 2015].

The conduct of family assessments and development of family reports play a critical role in the decision-making process of judicial officers when dealing with family law parenting disputes. The Australian Standards [Aust Standards Family Assessments & Reporting] launched in 2015 by the Chief Justice of the former Family Court of Australia, the Chief Judge of the Family Court of Western Australia and the Chief Judge of the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, are designed to inform all those involved with family law of the standards expected of practitioners preparing Family Reports.

While a Family Report is considered an expert report, it is part of a broader category of expert reports that deal with issues beyond those dealt with in a Family Report. An expert report (that is not Family Report) is ordered by the court where the expert evidence required to assist the resolution of the proceedings is beyond the expertise of a Family Consultant. For example, where there are mental health issues to be considered, the court may require that an expert opinion from a psychiatrist be obtained. Sometimes the Family Consultant will recommend that an expert opinion be obtained from an expert with particular expertise. For example, an addiction specialist may be required when dealing with parental substance misuse or the opinion of an expert maybe required where sexual offending is an issue. Chapter 7 of the FCFCA Rules deals with expert evidence. The purpose of this part is to ensure that there is a single expert appointed by the court who provides an expert report to the court, rather than allowing the parties to appoint their own expert.

Family consultants and expert witnesses - Key Literature

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

Professor Chisholm was required to 'assess the appropriateness of the legislation, practices and procedures' that apply in cases where family violence is an issue and to recommend improvements. The author acknowledged the challenges that family violence presents for the family law system – 'More than half the parenting cases that come to the courts involve allegations by one or both parties that the other has been violent, and violence issues often go together with other problems, for example those associated with substance abuse and mental ill-health. Violence is bad for everyone, and particularly dangerous for children, whether or not it is directed specifically at them.' (p 4). Part 2 considers practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. The author considers family reports in general terms from p 234-237.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence in three respects:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of professional practices and perspectives
- Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 based on a large-scale survey of parents' experiences and perspectives
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
  - a quantitative analysis of patterns in orders for parental responsibility and time made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia
  - a national analysis of court filings data provided by those courts
  - an analysis of published judgments

Family reports are discussed at pp 42-43. The analysis found that the availability of family reports for matters involving family violence substantially increased after the reforms, and that an explicit indication of a risk assessment being undertaken was evident in family reports in three in ten cases after the reforms. In relation to whether family reports provided recommendations that addressed the implications of information about family violence, child abuse and child safety concerns after the reforms, responses indicated unevenness in practice in this regard – 'Two-fifths of the aggregate sample of lawyers and judicial officers agreed that Family Reports or memoranda almost always or often provided such recommendations (RFV report, Figure 6.5). A further 34% reported that this was sometimes their experience, with 16% reporting that this was rarely or never the case' (p 43).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children. The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii). Family reports are considered from pp 26-27. The report notes that they, 'are an important source of independent, expert insight into family dynamics' (p 26). More specifically, see section 3.3.1 - family reports and risk assessments (from p 50).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014. See in particular, table 4.16 (p 77), which considers evidence-gathering practices for family reports (and family consultants' memoranda). See generally from p 113, which also deals with survey data relating to family reports. At p 114, the results from open-ended survey questions of family consultants and single experts are cited.

Moloney, et al, 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study' (Research Report No. 15, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2007).

'The study examines (a) the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings filed in 2003 in selected registries; (b) the extent to which alleging parties provided evidence in support of their allegations, and to which allegations were denied, admitted or left unanswered by the other party; and (c) the extent to which court outcomes of post-separation parenting disputes appeared to be related to the presence or absence of allegations.' See in particular the following comments at p 91 (re Family Reports).

Family consultants and expert witnesses - Other Resources

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia

Court Children's Service.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Australian Standards of Practice for Family Assessments and Reporting – February 2015.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Australian Standards of Practice for Family Assessments and Reporting was developed in 2015, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

Family Consultants FAQs.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, The Impact of Family Violence on Children.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The fact sheet outlines how children experience family violence, how family violence effects parenting, other ways children can be impacted by family violence and factors which can help protect children from the impacts of family violence.

The fact sheet notes – 'Growing up in an environment where family violence is perpetrated can have a profound impact on a child's life. In addition to risks of physical harm, family violence can impact a child's wellbeing in a number of areas:

- Behavioural
- Emotional

- Social
- Developmental
- Educational'

Further 'The risks to children do not necessarily stop following the separation of the parents. Family violence can continue to b perpetrated after parents separate, and for many families separation is a time at which family violence can escalate. In some families, separation is the time at which family violence can commence.'

Family Reports FAQs.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Family Violence Best Practice Principles (2016).

In particular, Part B - Family and other expert reports, pp13-14.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Why am I going to see a family consultant ?

- Information for teenagers

  Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
- Information for kids aged 5-8

  Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
- Information for kids aged 9-12

  Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Family Court of Western Australia

Counselling and Consultancy Service.

Includes information regarding:

- Child-related proceedings
- Family reports
- Case assessment conferences

Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

Family consultants and expert witnesses - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Erin

Information sharing

The Family Law Amendment (Information sharing) Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The bill gives effect to the National Strategic Framework for Information Sharing between the Family Law and Family Violence and Child Protection Systems by amending the Family Law Act 1975 to expand the information sharing framework for information relating to family violence, child abuse and neglect risks in parenting proceedings before the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia.

More information can be found here:
www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_LEGislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7009

The former Family Court of Australia (FCA) and former Federal Circuit Court of Australia (FCCA) (collectively called here "the former courts") made a commitment [FCA/FCCA FV Plan 2019] to provide timely, reliable and relevant information to state and territory courts, police and child protection agencies; and to continue to explore opportunities to work with state and territory courts dealing with family violence and child protection matters (and others with a proper interest in such matters, including police and child protection agencies) to ensure that those courts and agencies have reliable and timely access to relevant information about existing or pending family law orders. (See also 10.1.3 Intersection of legal systems). This commitment continues despite the merger of the Courts.

Information-sharing agreements exist between the courts and child welfare and other agencies in Australian state and territory jurisdictions. The terms of these agreements and related protocols vary considerably and are reviewed from time to time to improve procedures [Chisholm 2013].

An important resource in the courts is the National Enquiry Centre (NEC) established in 2000. The NEC is the entry point for all telephone and email enquiries; staff provide users with information and procedural advice, forms and publications and referrals to other services [NEC].

Within the broader commitment to provide information, the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) provide various mechanisms by which the court can obtain information, including statutory notification requirements in particular circumstances. These are explained in the following paragraphs.

In family law proceedings where a party, an Independent Children's Lawyer or any other interested person alleges that a child has been or is at risk of being abused, Section 67Z FLA and Section 159 FCA require that person to file a notice of child abuse with the court, and the court registry to notify the relevant child welfare authority as soon as practicable. Where in the course of performing duties or exercising powers any court personnel, family consultant or counsellor, family dispute resolution practitioner, arbitrator or lawyer has reasonable grounds for suspecting a child has been or is at risk of being abused, ill-treated, or psychologically harmed, Section 67ZA FLA and Section 160 FCA require that person to notify the relevant child welfare authority soon as practicable. In any proceedings affecting the welfare of a child, the presiding court may request the intervention of a child welfare officer in the proceedings and the officer may act on that request (Section 91B FLA and Section 207 FCA). Even where the officer elects not to intervene, the court's request has the effect of bringing relevant information to the attention of the child welfare authority.

Section 67ZBA FLA and Section 162A FCA provide that where a party to child-related proceedings, or any other interested person as defined, alleges that there has been, or there is a risk of, family violence by one of the parties to the proceedings, that person must file a statutory notice of risk with the court.

The FCFCOA requires the filing of a Notice of child abuse, family violence or risk (Notice of Risk) to be filed with any Initiating Application, Application for Consent Orders or Response to Initiating Application. The Notice of Risk (in the form prescribed by section 67Z FLA) requires answers to specific questions directed at eliciting information about child abuse, family violence and a range of other risks. If the notice alleges child abuse or a risk of child abuse (or family violence of such a kind as would satisfy the statutory definition of child abuse), the court registry must notify the relevant state or territory child welfare authority. The child welfare authority may provide a response containing information held by the authority about the child the subject of the proceedings.

Where a Notice of risk is filed, Section 67ZBB FLA and Section 162B FCA require the court to make the necessary interim orders and to act as expeditiously as possible to enable evidence of the allegations to be obtained, to protect the children and any party to the proceedings, and to deal with the issues raised by the allegations. Section 69ZW FLA and Section 202K FCA empower the court to make an order in child-related proceedings requiring a state or territory agency to provide the court with specified documents or information about the engagement of a party or child with that agency. Information in this context may include information that is not in the form of a document but is capable of being attested to by an individual. The court is not permitted to disclose the identity of a person who has made a notification to an agency unless the person consents or disclosure is critically important to the proceedings and failure to do so would prejudice the proper administration of justice. These mechanisms are available in conjunction with the court's powers to subpoena set out in Part 6.5 of the FCFCOA Rules, which include subpoena to produce, to give evidence, and to both produce and give evidence.

Although Section 69ZW FLA and Section 202K FCA impose additional responsibilities on the police, child welfare authority and other agencies, the purpose of sharing information is to ensure the protection of children and the fulfilment of the court's obligations. The information-sharing provisions allow relevant evidence to be gathered at an early stage and a judicial determination to be made as to how the matter should proceed and whether any expert evidence is required [Faulks 2014]. The experiences of families affected by family violence and child safety concerns (including parents who are issued a 60I/66H Certificate) progressing from counselling, family dispute resolution and other services and agencies to the courts reinforces the need for continuing consideration of information sharing between multiple systems. Depending on the extent of engagement underlying the issuing of a Certificate, a significant amount of intake and assessment activity may have occurred before the parent starts to engage with the court system, yet this activity may not be visible in the court beyond the existence of the Certificate [Kaspiew et al Synthesis Report 2015]. Sections 10D & 10H FLA and Sections 49 & 53 FCA permit the disclosure of communications made in the course of family counselling or family dispute resolution in certain circumstances, including where the family counsellor or family dispute resolution practitioner reasonably believes the disclosure is necessary to comply with the law, to protect a child from the risk of harm, or to assist an Independent Children's Lawyer to properly represent a child's interests.

More broadly it is acknowledged that interagency collaboration can better meet the needs of families that are vulnerable and at risk [McDonald & Rosier 2011]. Research has found that gaps in protection may reflect gaps in the flow of information, in particular between the family law system, the family violence system and the child welfare system. As a consequence, these gaps may impede timely responses to family violence and have a negative impact on victims [Peel & Croucher 2011].

Information sharing - Key Literature

Bryant, Diana, 'The Family Courts and Family Violence' (Paper Presented at the Judicial Conference of Australia Colloquium, 9-11 October 2015).

This paper discusses various issues which confront the family courts where family violence is a feature.

Her Honour noted the importance of the sharing of information between federal courts and state authorities. Her Honour cited s 69ZW of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) before noting that there are also protocols in place between the state authorities and federal courts for the sharing of information in some places.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Information-sharing in Family Law & Child Protection: Enhancing Collaboration' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2013).

Chapters 2 and 3 of this report review the relevant legal framework, in particular the federal and state laws that affect information-sharing. Chapter 4 describes a number of formal written information-sharing agreements between the family courts and child protection departments (and other parties). Chapter 5 reviews general issues about drafting such agreements, and makes a number of recommendations. Chapter 6 deals with the most important specific issues, making recommendations about how formal agreements might best address each issue. Chapter 7 deals with information-sharing mechanisms other than formal agreements. In chapter 6, family violence is specifically considered (p 105).

Chisholm, Richard, 'The Sharing of Experts' Reports Between the Child Protection System and the Family Law System' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2014).

This report is a supplement to the Richard Chisholm's earlier report 'Information-sharing in Family Law & Child Protection: Enhancing Collaboration' (2013). It is noted that experts' reports are one instance of information that can usefully be shared between the systems. Some features of experts' reports require special consideration, and these form the focus of this report (p 1). Part 2 considers the advantages and disadvantages of sharing experts' reports while part 3 considers the legality of the sharing of experts' reports. Part 4 discusses practical issues and recommendations, including the regulation of the disclosure of experts' reports provided to the courts.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the protection of children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

See in particular at p 157, where the author outlines information sharing procedures between the Family Court and state child protection agencies.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence in three respects:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of professional practices and perspectives
- Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 based on a large-scale survey of parents' experiences and perspectives.
- Court Outcomes Project involving: a quantitative analysis of patterns in orders for parental responsibility and time made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia; a national analysis of court filings data provided by those courts and an analysis of published judgments

At p 28, the report notes that there is a need for information sharing between the court system and service providers (such as FDR practitioners): 'depending on the extent of engagement underlying the issuing of a certificate, a significant amount of intake and assessment activity may have occurred before the parent starts to engage with the court system, yet this activity may not be visible in courts beyond the existence of the certificate'. Similar comments are made at p 39-40 where issues of confidentiality in this context are also raised.

McDonald, Myfanwy and Kate Rosier, 'Interagency Collaboration: Part A. What is it, what does it look like, when is it needed and what supports it?' (AFRC Briefing No. 21, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2011).

These two papers focus attention upon how interagency collaborations benefit children and families. Part A looks at what collaboration is, the benefits and risks of involving families in collaborations, when interagency collaborations are likely to be most effective and explores how they can be supported through specific models of governance. Part B investigates the evidence regarding the relationship between collaboration and improved outcomes for children and families.

Peel, Sara and Rosalind Croucher, 'Mind(ing) the gap: Law reform recommendations responding to child protection in a federal system' [2011] (89) Family Matters 21.

This paper considers the 'gap' between the child protection system and the federal family law system. Existing provisions address these gaps to some extent; for example, by enabling family courts to obtain information from child protection agencies, and to issue subpoenas (Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), s69ZW, Family Law Rules 2004 (Cth), pt 15.3). Family courts may also request child protection agencies to intervene in the court proceedings, thus becoming a party to proceedings; and agencies may choose to intervene in cases that involve allegations of abuse. Information sharing is considered specifically from p 28.

Information sharing - Other Resources

Family Court of Western Australia, Practice Direction (No. 1 of 2014).

This practice direction contains discussion of procedural issues relating to information sharing protocols between the Family Court of Western Australia and the Department for Child Protection and Family Support. These protocols, 'provide an important mechanism for gathering evidence in child-related proceedings'.

To be read with Practice Direction (17 July 2014).

Do you need information about the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia?

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The National Enquiry Centre (NEC) is the entry point for all telephone and email enquiries on Family Law matters. The NEC provides first level user support for the Commonwealth Courts Portal. This role involves registration, guidance and support for users of the portal. The NEC can provide information and procedural advice, forms and brochures and referral advice to community and support services. NEC staff cannot provide legal advice.

Family Violence Plan – [Former] Family Court of Australia and Federal Circuit Court of Australia – April 2019.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

The Family Violence Plan was developed in 2019, prior to the commencement of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia. The current issue does not reflect the recent structural changes to the Courts.

The Plan 'builds on the important work undertaken by the courts under the 2014-16 Plan and reflects the ongoing commitment of the courts to addressing family violence in all areas of operation'. Along with including the measures contained in the joint Family Violence Best Practice Principles, the Plan 'contains actions for the administration of the courts, and for decision makers, legal practitioners, service providers and others involved in the family law system.

The Plan sets out three priority areas, each of which has defined goals, identified actions and timelines: protection from family violence; safety at court; and information and communication.

The Plan reflects contemporary understandings of the aetiology, dynamics and effects of family violence, informed by social science research. It has been developed in the context of the ongoing commitment of the Government to address and eradicate family violence.'

See in particular at p 2, 'The courts recognise the close connection between family breakdown and violence, and the detrimental impact on both adult victims and children living with family violence. Protecting family members, and particularly children, from the effects of family violence is central to all determinations of what is in a child's best interest. Ensuring the safety of all people engaged in the family law system, including when attending court, is also a high priority for the courts.'

National Strategic Framework for Information Sharing between the Family Law and Family Violence Child Protection Systems. (webpage).

This Framework supports the appropriate and timely two-way information exchange between the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia and the Family Court of Western Australia (the family law courts) on the one hand, and state and territory courts, child protection, policing, and firearms agencies on the other.

Unacceptable risk and best interests

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- amend the parenting order framework by refining the list of 'best interests' factors, removing the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and related equal time and substantial and significant time provision, and clarifying the circumstances in which a court can vary an existing parenting order;
- redraft provisions relating to compliance with, and enforcement of, parenting orders;
- amend definitions relating to the concept of 'family' to be more inclusive of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture and traditions;
- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view;
- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;
- makes consequential amendments to the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021;

Amends the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021 to:

- allow registrars of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCOA) to be delegated the power to impose a make-up time parent order in contravention proceedings;
- bring forward the review of the Act by 2 years;
- provide that a judge of the Family Court of Western Australia can be dually appointed as a judge of Division 1 of the FCFCOA; and

Amends Family Law Act 1975 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021

- to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

The central tenet of Part VII of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Part 5 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) is to ensure that the best interests of children are met. Section 60CA FLA and Section 66A FCA require a court making a parenting order to regard the best interests of the child as the paramount consideration. In determining what is in a child's best interests, Section 60CC(2)/(2A) FLA and Section 66C(2)/(3A) FCA stipulate the primary considerations as the benefit to the child of having a meaningful relationship with both parents and the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm due to family violence or abuse, with greater weight to be given to the need to protect the child from harm.

Depending on the facts and circumstances of the particular case, the court may order (pursuant to Section 11F FLA or Section 65 FCA) that the parties to child-related proceedings take part in an assessment conducted by a Family Consultant to assist the court in understanding the children's needs and in making short-term decisions about arrangements for the children. Central to all of these assessments is screening for family violence and risk assessment. The court may order that the Family Consultant prepare a Family Report based on their observations during these appointments. The best interests of the children are the main focus of the report. The Family Violence Best Practice Principles set out the range of matters the Court may determine the Family Report to address.

When considering what order to make, Section 60CG FLA and Section 66G FCA provide that the court must (where possible to do so consistently with the child's best interests as the paramount consideration), ensure that the order is consistent with any family violence order, and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence.

The exercise of determining unacceptable risk requires the court, in the first instance, to identify the risk/s with specificity, and then to consider the steps or orders that can and should be made to minimise the specific risk/s. The High Court of Australia has considered the meaning of unacceptable risk in cases of child sexual abuse. This decision has subsequently been applied in cases of family violence and non-sexual abuse. To assess for unacceptable risk is to identify the nature and degree of the risk and whether, with or without safeguards, it is acceptable. The presiding court is not required to make a finding about whether a person has perpetrated violence or abuse; rather, it must determine whether orders for residence or contact create an unacceptable risk of harm for the child. The court must consider any risk to the child based on the facts, and balance this risk against the desirability of the child maintaining contact with both parents. The facts may include evidence of past violence or abuse proven on the balance of probabilities [Higgins & Kaspiew 2011], but there may also be a range of other factors not proven to that standard that support a conclusion of unacceptable risk. It is appropriate for the court to rely on expert opinion evidence to assist in determining the child's best interests. The High Court also acknowledged that the magnitude of the risk may be less if contact is supervised, however even supervised contact may present a risk of physical, emotional or psychological disturbance to the child.

Section 67ZBA FLA and Section 162A FCA provide that where a party to child-related proceedings, or any other interested person as defined, alleges that there has been family violence or there is a risk of family violence by one of the parties to the proceedings, that person must file a 'statutory notice' with the court. In the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia any party seeking parenting orders must file with their application or response, a 'notice of child abuse, family violence or risk' (Notice of Risk) (Rule 2.04 of FCFCA Rules). The Notice of Risk (in the form prescribed by section 67Z FLA) requires answers to specific questions directed at eliciting information about child abuse, family violence and a range of other risks.

Where a Notice of Risk is filed, Section 67ZBB FLA and Section 162B FCA require the court to make the necessary interim orders and to act as expeditiously as possible to enable evidence of the allegations to be obtained, to protect children and any party to the proceedings, and to deal with the issues raised by the allegations. The Family Violence Best Practice Principles recognise that the interim hearing stage is critical in matters involving serious allegations of family violence as it often occurs in a context of urgency, and yet the court may not be able to make findings about disputed facts because not all relevant evidence is available or tested. When considering appropriate interim orders pending a final hearing, the court must assess the risk of future family violence. A screening tool often used by the court (known as 'PPP') analyses risk by reference to three factors: the potency of the violence (level of severity, dangerousness or risk of lethality); the pattern of violence and coercive control; and indicators of who is the primary perpetrator [Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016]. Where an Independent Children's Lawyer (ICL) is involved in the proceedings at this stage, the relevant court guidelines [Guidelines for Independent Children's Lawyer (2021)] indicate that to assist the court in dealing with allegations of unacceptable risk, the ICL should, where possible, issue subpoenas to relevant agencies and be in a position to tender relevant material. The court must consider whether the evidence provided in support of any allegations satisfies the relevant standard of proof, the balance of probabilities [Higgins & Kaspiew 2011].

Research [Faulks 2014] acknowledges the complexity of the concept of unacceptable risk. If the court is satisfied that the alleged events (involving a parent perpetrating violence or abuse) did occur, there must necessarily be some risk for the child spending time with that parent, at least unsupervised. The position is complicated where the court does not or is not able to make a determination about the alleged events. For the court in these circumstances to disallow contact between parent and child would certainly protect the child from any risk of violence or abuse from the parent, but it may cause other difficulties for the child in the development of their relationship with that parent and perhaps other people. If, on the other hand, the court allows unsupervised contact, and the parent had in fact perpetrated violence or abuse, the child may be at risk and not adequately protected.

A 2015 evaluation by the Australian Institute of Family Studies [Kaspiew et al Synthesis Report 2015] identifies a heightened emphasis by courts and practitioners on identifying family violence issues and safety concerns. It observes that parents self-select into disclosing family violence based on their view of the behaviour, the consequences of disclosure and its implications for parenting arrangements. It also conveys the views of professionals in the family law system indicating that the screening and assessment of family violence and safety concerns remain challenging, particularly in assessing how these issues impact on parenting arrangements. Section 67ZBB FLA and Section 162B FCA are critical to the court's powers in responding to these issues.

Unacceptable risk and best interests - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

This report presents a comprehensive review of legal responses to Family Violence in Australia. The commissions received many submissions. At p 268, the report notes – '…in making parenting orders, family courts have to ensure that the order is consistent with any family violence order and does not expose a person to an unacceptable risk of family violence'.

Chisholm, Richard, 'Family Courts Violence Review: A Report' (Canberra: Attorney-General's Department, 2009).

Professor Chisholm was required to 'assess the appropriateness of the legislation, practices and procedures' that apply in cases where family violence is an issue and to recommend improvements. The report considers the issue of family violence in the family law system. Part 2 considers practices and procedures of the federal family courts in cases with family violence issues. Part 3 discusses issues with the applicable legislation in force at the time. Part 4 considers other matters, mainly relating to support services, information sharing and legal representation. See in particular from p 101, where the author discusses risk.

Faulks, John, 'Justice and the Protection of Children' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014)'.

This chapter considers how the Family Court of Australia (now the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia) deals with matters involving children where there are allegations of abuse. The author discusses the issue of unacceptable risk in relation to child abuse at pp 161-162. A particular 'conundrum' is considered – 'If the court were satisfied that the events alleged had occurred, then there must necessarily be some risk for the child in spending time with that parent, at least unsupervised. If the court is satisfied that the events alleged had not occurred, is it not reasonable that the parent and the child should have the opportunity to develop a proper relationship?'

Harrison, Margaret, Finding a Better Way: A bold departure from the traditional common law approach to the conduct of legal proceedings (April 2007).

This document contains a general overview of the Family Court's transition from the traditional common law adversarial trial to the less adversarial trial (LAT). It contains a history of procedural reforms to the Family Court. It discusses the differences between adversarial and inquisitorial systems, and contains detailed discussion of the operation of the LAT model. See in particular at p 22, which contains discussion of the issue of unacceptable risk, specifically in relation to the 'Magellan' case management model in the Family Court and the decision in M and M (1988) 166 CLR 69.

Higgins, Daryl and Rae Kaspiew, 'Child protection and family law… Joining the dots' (NCPC Issues No. 34, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2011).

This paper looks at the specific issues facing those responsible for ensuring the safety and wellbeing of children in the context of parental separation, and the two separate legal systems: family law and child protection. Of most relevance here is the discussion from p8 which considers the family law system specifically. In particular, the discussion on p 12 considers the application of the 'unacceptable risk test' in the context of allegations of child abuse and child neglect in the family courts. The paper also contains summaries of cases which serve to illustrate the interaction between the family law and child protection systems.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who used family law system services in 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who experienced the system in 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 their post-reform experiences.

The core focus of the SRSP 2012 and 2014 studies were on investigating parents' experiences of family violence and safety concerns (including children's exposure to family violence) and their experiences in disclosing family violence and safety concerns to family law system professionals. These data sets indicate that family violence is a common experience among separated parents, with a majority of participating parents in both cohorts reporting physical or emotional abuse before/during separation, and mothers reporting these experiences in greater proportions compared to fathers.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. See generally chapter 10 – 'Family violence and child abuse: Parents' pathways and professionals' perspectives'. The discussion from p 250 regarding burdens of proof is especially relevant for risk considerations.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence. See generally chapter 4 which considers risk assessment. Section 4.3.2 deals with the use of screening and assessment tools such as DOORS (Detection of Overall Risk Screen) (pp 38-39).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children. The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii). See generally chapter 4 which deals with risk considerations and contains extensive analysis of relevant cases. See in particular, section 4.2.2 for discussion of the uncertainty around the application of the unacceptable risk test (pp 68-70).

Moloney, et al, 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study' (Research Report No. 15, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2007).

This study examines (a) the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings filed in 2003 in selected registries; (b) the extent to which alleging parties provided evidence in support of their allegations, and to which allegations were denied, admitted or left unanswered by the other party; and (c) the extent to which court outcomes of post-separation parenting disputes appeared to be related to the presence or absence of allegations.

Moloney, et al, 'Understanding parenting disputes after separation' (Research Report No. 36, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2016).

'This report explores the behaviour of separated parents by exploring the psychology of post-separation parental disputes and then interrogating three independent data sets to see what further insights they provide on the issues.'

See in particular the findings in Chapter 3, which considered, 'Practitioners' experiences of Parenting Disputes': 'Practitioners noted that often families who were in entrenched conflict had multiple problems, including psychiatric, substance use and violence issues. These issues contributed to disputes as they are often sources of safety concerns' (p 36).

Parkinson, Patrick, 'Violence, abuse and the limits of shared parental responsibility' [2013] (92) Family Matters 7.

The thesis of this article (and a book by the author published in 2011) is that family law around the Western world has shifted fundamentally and irreversibly. Jurisdictions across the Western world have come to the sometimes painful conclusion that while marriage may be dissoluble, parenthood is not. The author argues that one issue with Australian legislation is that it focuses on a historyof family violence or abuse at any time in the course of the relationship, rather than on current safety concerns, and without sufficient clarity about how that history needs to be taken into account in decision-making (see esp. p 12-15).

Strickland, Justice Steven, 'Attachment Theory and Family Violence: a judicial perspective' (Paper delivered at AFCC 49th Annual Conference, Chicago, 6-9 June 2012).

This paper discusses the 2006 and 2011 family law reforms from the perspective of attachment theory. Attachment theory, which relates to the need for strong bonds with 'attachment figures' from an early age is outlined from p 3. See also in particular the comments regarding notices of risk at pp 31-32.

Unacceptable risk and best interests - Other Resources

Children: Safety and Risk.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage contains information about requirements to notify the Court about family violence and child abuse, family violence orders, risk assessment, Lighthouse, staying safe at court and getting help and support.

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Guidelines for Independent Children's Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

'The Guidelines have also been issued for the purposes of providing practitioners, parties, children and other people in contact with the family law courts, with information about the courts' general expectations of ICLs. The Guidelines set out these expectations as they relate to children in circumstances where allegations of child abuse and/or family violence are made, children from culturally and linguistically diverse families and communities, children with disabilities, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, and where applications arise for the authorisation of special medical procedures and other orders relating to the welfare of children.' See at pp 9-10 (section 6.8), which considers Interim hearings.

Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Parenting orders and impact on children

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- amend the parenting order framework by refining the list of 'best interests' factors, removing the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and related equal time and substantial and significant time provision, and clarifying the circumstances in which a court can vary an existing parenting order;
- redraft provisions relating to compliance with, and enforcement of, parenting orders;
- amend definitions relating to the concept of 'family' to be more inclusive of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture and traditions;
- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view;
- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;
- makes consequential amendments to the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021;

Amends the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021 to:

- allow registrars of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCOA) to be delegated the power to impose a make-up time parent order in contravention proceedings;
- bring forward the review of the Act by 2 years;
- provide that a judge of the Family Court of Western Australia can be dually appointed as a judge of Division 1 of the FCFCOA; and

Amends Family Law Act 1975 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021

- to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

The Family Law Amendment (Information sharing) Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The bill gives effect to the National Strategic Framework for Information Sharing between the Family Law and Family Violence and Child Protection Systems by amending the Family Law Act 1975 to expand the information sharing framework for information relating to family violence, child abuse and neglect risks in parenting proceedings before the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_LEGislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7009

Parenting orders and impact on children - Key Literature

Australia

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports on the findings from the analysis of data from two national online surveys (one for adults and one for children), which collected quantitative data and also allowed for qualitative comments about family violence and its impact on parenting and parenting arrangements. The study included adults and children who had separated after 1995 and after the introduction of the Family Law (Shared Parental Responsibility) Amendment Act (Cth) in 2006. The researchers gained the views of a total of 1,153 adults (90%) and children (10%).

Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports.

See in particular at p 53 – 'Some women felt powerless over arrangements to share care of the children with the fathers and felt they had been pressured into unfair agreements. For example, one woman who used services before the 2006 reforms said: 'The power he held over me during the relationship continued afterwards in regard to parenting arrangements and finances'. See also at p 55 where reports of confusion about the meaning of 'equal shared parental responsibility' are discussed.

Bailey, Alice, 'Separating safety from situational violence: Response to "Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings"' [2007] (77) Family Matters 26.

The paper discusses the report: Moloney et al. 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study Research Report No. 15 — May 2007' (Australian Institute of family Studies, 2007)- see below. The article notes the Maloney et al report provides evidence challenging a common myth that women frequently claim false allegations of family violence in child custody cases and that unless allegations are accompanied by strong evidence, they will have little impact on post-separation child contact.

Carson, R., et al., (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Final Report, ANROWS.

This research (based on surveys, analysis of court data and overseas models of order enforcement) explores non-compliance with family law orders.

The researchers note: ‘Contravention applications are not particularly common, comprising approximately 8 per cent of all applications for final orders in parenting matters.’(p13)

The research demonstrates that non-compliance arises from a complex interplay of difficult interpersonal dynamics, including family violence, and systemic limitations in the response to them. The researchers observe that ‘parties who engage in litigation over their parenting arrangements following separation are a particularly complex subset of separated parents.’ They show that ‘parents who subsequently experience problems with compliance with parenting orders are an even more complex subset: their families are often characterised by family violence, challenging interpersonal dynamics, conflict over a protracted period of time, and serious concerns about child wellbeing.’ (p14)

‘Women are significantly more likely than men to describe relationships as fearful, and men are significantly more likely than women to describe them as conflictual.’ (p14)

‘Family violence and safety concerns are also a key contributor to non-compliance where such concerns were not brought to the court’s attention or were not given due consideration in the development of parenting orders, resulting in inappropriate or unsafe parenting orders or orders not accepted as safe by the contravening party.’ (p15)

Fehlberg, Belinda and Christine Millward, ‘Family violence and financial outcomes after parental separation’ in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This article provides and analysis of interviews conducted with 60 separated parents as part of a wider study on links between post-separation parenting and financial settlements, following major family law and process amendments in 2006.

The authors note that their interviews suggested that disclosure of family violence was discouraged in a context where there was pressure to support the abusive partner's involvement and agree to shared time' (p 239). The authors conclude that 'family violence often influenced parenting arrangements and thus indirectly influenced financial settlements. Family violence often affected mothers' child support receipt, including in CSA Collect/Child Support Collect cases. Mothers who described family violence that affected property settlements also commonly described problems obtaining child support from their ex-partner. Family violence that diminished or ceased after separation could still have a continuing influence, discouraging pursuit of legal remedies by those exposed. (at 24)

Humphreys, Cathy and Meredith Kiraly, 'Developmentally sensitive parental contact for infants when families are separated' [2010] (85) Family Matters 49.

This paper uses data from an initial research study which explored issues with infants where the children's court ordered high-frequency contact (4-7 days per week) between infants and their parents while the infant was living with foster or kinship carers. The infants originally came into care due to significant issues in relation to child abuse and neglect. The applicable issues for infants taken into out-of-home care are different from situations where infants' parents have separated. However, family law proceedings relating to separated parent of infants contain similar dilemmas in relation to contact orders (p 49).

Importantly, 'experiencing violence and abuse is also dangerous territory for infants. Babies who are "incubated in terror" show attachment disruption and poor neurological development, as the chemicals released in a pervasive environment of fear are inimical to healthy brain development. Protection from violence and abuse is pivotal to the infant's healthy development and safety, particularly given their physical fragility. This issue cuts across all jurisdictions'…'Adversarial processes may not be optimal to finding the way through to the best interests of babies, particularly when some flexibility may be needed. This is true of both the Children's Court and family law jurisdictions. However, by definition, violence and abuse tramples on the rights of the most vulnerable (in this case, infants) and they may in the end need the protection of the court in order to safeguard their interests.' (p 58)

Kaspiew, R., Carson, R., Rhoades, H., Qu, L., De Maio, J., Horsfall, B., & Stevens, E. (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022). ANROWS.

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. The other three parts of the research program are based on data collection from family law court files involving contravention applications, an online survey of parents and carers with family law parenting orders, and an analysis of the approaches applied to contravention in three international jurisdictions. (p11)

Systemic factors include shortcomings in the identification, assessment and management of risk. (p13)

When working with parents for the development of parenting orders, it is critical that practitioners ensure that safety and risk are adequately assessed and considered in the parenting arrangements. (p14)

This evidence demonstrates that the parents who obtain family law parenting orders are a particularly complex group, with concentrated levels of risk indicators. In light of the small proportion of parenting orders that involve contravention matters…, it is important to emphasise that the contravention regime is applied to a small subset of a particularly complex group of families. (p17)

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence in three respects:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of professional practices and perspectives
- Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 based on a large-scale survey of parents' experiences and perspectives
- Court Outcomes Project involving:

- a quantitative analysis of patterns in orders for parental responsibility and time made in the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia
- a national analysis of court filings data provided by those courts
- an analysis of published judgments

See especially at p 49 relating to court orders for parental responsibility - 'The analysis demonstrates largely consistent levels in the proportions of orders for shared parental responsibility in the consent after proceedings and consent without litigation samples, with around nine out of ten children in each sample subject to orders for equal shared parental responsibility (CO report, Table 3.25). In judicial determination files, 40% of children were subject to orders for shared parental responsibility after the reforms, compared with 51% pre-reform. Overall, the proportion of children with shared parental responsibility outcomes where no allegations of family violence or child abuse were raised remained stable in the two time frames, at about nine in ten (CO report, Table 3.26). Where both these issues were raised, marginal decreases were evident, with the proportion of such children subject to orders for shared parental responsibility decreasing slightly, from 72% to 70%. Where only one of these issues was raised, the likelihood of a shared parental responsibility order increased slightly after the reforms, rising from 80% to 84%.'

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who used family law system services in 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who experienced the system in 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 their post-reform experiences.

See in particular section 5.3.3 entitled 'Influence on care-time arrangements of disclosure of family violence and safety concerns'. 53% of parents in both cohorts who disclosed family violence 'reported that this "very much" or "somewhat" influenced their child's parenting arrangements. This was similar to the corresponding proportion of parents who disclosed safety concerns (2012: 56% and 2014: 53%)' (p 111).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children. The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

It identified that arguments about family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. Table 3.13 on page 45 sets out the extent to which allegations of family violence and child abuse were raised in the pre- and post-reform samples according to the way in which matters were resolved (by judicial determination OR by consent after the proceedings had been issued or by application for consent orders). The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Post-separation parenting arrangements involving minimal time with one parent' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter examines recent empirical evidence on post-separation parenting arrangements, with a particular focus on arrangements where children have little or no contact with one parent. It demonstrates that a range of factors is linked with circumstances in which fathers have little or no contact with children, but that contact with services and courts is supportive of maintaining, and in some circumstances, increasing fathers' involvement with their children' (p 224-225).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. The Survey of FRSP Clients 2009 also revealed high rates of family violence in separated families. The data shows that 33% of clients reported being physically hurt by the person about whom they attended the service and 77% reported being seriously put down or insulted. The participating client reported the other party making threats to harm them, themselves (i.e., the other party) or others (including pets) in 43% of cases. Controlling behaviour on the part of the other party had been experienced by 50% of clients participating in the survey.' (pp26-27)

Family lawyers expressed concerns that arrangements were being made that were developmentally inappropriate or in the context of a history family violence, and such arrangements proved to be unworkable in practical terms' (p 214).

Laing, Lesley, No Way to Live: Women's Experiences of Negotiating the Family Law System in the Context of Domestic Violence (Faculty of Education and Social Work, University of Sydney, 2010).

This research reports on the experiences of 22 women who were involved in the family law system following their separation from a relationship in which they had experienced domestic violence. In particular see section titled: "'He just wants to see his children' – a lens for excusing men's behaviour" (from pp47-49) that draws on a number of excerpts detailing how fathers have manipulated police to harass and intimidate mothers (e.g. calling police to her house alleging she'd threatened to kill her children; turning up late for contact).

Moloney, Lawrie, Bruce Smyth, Ruth Weston, Nicholas Richardson, Lixia Qu and Matthew Gray, 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study Research Report No. 15 — May 2007' (Australian Institute of family Studies, 2007).

This research was commissioned by the Federal Attorney-General's Department to provide baseline information to assist in informing the Australian Government's Family Law Violence Strategy. The study examines (a) the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings filed in 2003 in selected registries; (b) the extent to which alleging parties provided evidence in support of their allegations, and to which allegations were denied, admitted or left unanswered by the other party; and (c) the extent to which court outcomes of post-separation parenting disputes appeared to be related to the presence or absence of allegations. The study was based on a content analysis of two random samples of court files from the Melbourne, Dandenong and Adelaide registries of the former Family Court of Australia (FCoA) and the former Federal Magistrates Court (FMC): 240 files from the general population of cases in which parenting matters were in dispute (the general litigants sample), and 60 files from judicially determined matters in which parenting was in dispute (the judicial determination sample). In summary, a total of 300 court files were analysed: 150 from the former Family Court of Australia and 150 from the former Federal Magistrates Court. It should not be assumed that this sample is representative of the divorcing population. In other words, the findings should not be generalised to this population. The research found that more than half the cases in the former FCoA and former FMC in both samples contained allegations of adult family violence and/or child abuse. Note the discussion in chapter 8 which identifies that the 'most extensive work to date on the subject …has concluded in that country (Canada) that false denials are more common that false allegations.' Findings included that:

- Cases in the FCoA that required judicial determination were more likely than other cases to contain evidence of spousal violence that appeared to have some strong probative weight.
- Cases that seemed to contain the most severe allegations of spousal violence were especially likely to be accompanied by evidentiary material. Many of these cases required a judicial determination.

McIntosh, Jennifer et al, 'Post-Separation Parenting Arrangements and Development Outcomes for Infants and Children' [2011] (86) Family Matters 40.

This article summarises key findings from two recent Australian studies of outcomes for two potential risk groups: school-aged children living in separations characterised by high inter-parental conflict (Study 1), and infants and pre-schoolers in the general population of separated families (Study 2). Both studies were commissioned by the Australian Government Attorney-General's Department.

See in particular at p 46, where it is noted that 'regardless of socio-economic background, parenting or inter-parental cooperation, shared overnight care of children less than four years of age had an independent and significantly deleterious impact on several emotional and behavioural regulation outcomes.' For example, young infants less than two years old living with a non-resident parent for only one or more nights a week 'were more irritable, and were more watchful and wary of separation from their primary caregiver than young children primarily in the care of one parent. Children aged 2–3 years in shared care (at the policy definition of five nights or more per fortnight) showed significantly lower levels of persistence with routine tasks, learning and play, than children in the other two groups' (p 46). They also showed 'severely distressed behaviours in their relationship with the primary parent' which is consistent with attachment theory. However, by kindergarten or school entry (children aged around 4-5 years), these effects were no longer evident as the children were capable of, inter alia self-soothing and organising their own behaviour. That is, the child truly 'knows what tomorrow is' which makes them better able to straddle households in a shared overnight parenting arrangement (p 46).

See also at p 48 'The task continues to be to determine those arrangements and attitudes that will maximally support each child within his/her unique developmental context'.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'Violence, abuse and the limits of shared parental responsibility' [2013] (92) Family Matters 7.

In this article Parkinson argues that it is important to focus on current safety concerns rather than a history of violence throughout the relationship so as to direct resources to the parents and children at most risk as a result of post-separation parenting arrangements (pp 12-13). He nevertheless acknowledges that a history of coercive controlling violence remains important in relation to, for example, a child's attitude towards living with or visiting a violent parent. It is also important 'in assessing the mother's capacity for parenting and her attitude towards contact between the child and the other parent. For many women who experience this kind of subjugation and control, the psychological effects may have a greater lasting impact than the physical abuse. These effects include fear and anxiety, loss of self-esteem, depression and post-traumatic stress (p 14).

Qu, Lixia and Ruth Weston, 'Parenting dynamics after separation: A follow-up study of parents who separated after the 2006 family law reforms' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2010).

This report examines, 'the pathways that separating families have taken through the family law system, and the impact the changes to the family law system have had on these families. The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examined relationships and wellbeing in separated families in Australia. Some 10,000 separated parents with children were interviewed for the first wave in 2008, as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms. This report presents findings from the second wave, when the parents had been separated for two to three years'.

See in particular at p 117 – 'the presumption of "equal shared parental responsibility" does not apply where there are reasonable grounds to believe that a child's parent, or another person in this parent's household, had engaged in family violence or child abuse. In Wave 2, as in Wave 1, decisions were less likely to be shared equally where respondents expressed safety concerns or said that their child's other parent had been abusive towards them during the preceding 12 months, with abuse in Wave 2 mainly taking the form of humiliating insults.'

Also, 'Although the emergence of safety concerns or experiences of abuse in the 12 months preceding Wave

2 was associated with a decline in the rate of shared decision-making, a substantial minority who reported safety concerns in Wave 2, whether recently emerging or longstanding, said that decisions were made jointly. For fathers, safety concerns mostly represented concerns about their child, and often related to their child's mother. Furthermore, quite serious behaviours, such as violence and anger management issues, were generally behind these concerns (see Chapter 3) (p 117).'

Weston, Ruth et al, 'Care-time arrangements after the 2006 reforms' [2011] (86) Family Matters 19.

This article examines the prevalence of different care-time arrangements for separating families after the 2006 reforms, parents' views about the flexibility and workability of their arrangements, characteristics of families with different care-time arrangements and the strength of the relationship between child wellbeing on the one hand and care-time arrangements and family dynamics on the other.

Note at p29: 'Across all care-time arrangements, children's wellbeing appeared to have been compromised where there had been a history of family violence, where parents held safety concerns (for them or their child) associated with ongoing contact with the other parent, and where the inter-parental relationship was either highly conflictual or fearful. Children in shared care-time arrangements appeared to be no worse off than other children where there had been a history of family violence or a negative inter-parental relationship. However, mothers' assessments suggested that, where there were safety concerns, children in shared care fared worse than those who lived mostly with their mother.'

International

Jaffe, Peter G., Janet R. Johnston, Claire V. Crooks, Nicholas Bala, 'Custody disputes involving allegations of Domestic violence: toward a differentiated approach to parenting plans' (2008) 46(3) Family Court Review 500.

Premised on the understanding that domestic violence is a broad concept that encompasses a wide range of behaviours from isolated events to a pattern of emotional, physical, and sexual abuse that controls the victim, this article addresses the need for a differentiated approach to developing parenting plans after separation when domestic violence is alleged. A method of assessing risk by screening for the potency, pattern, and primary perpetrator of the violence is proposed as a foundation for generating hypotheses about the type of and potential for future violence as well as parental functioning. This kind of differential screening for risk in cases where domestic violence is alleged provides preliminary guidance in identifying parenting arrangements that are appropriate for the specific child and family and, if confirmed by a more in-depth assessment, may be the basis for a long-term plan.

Regarding the credibility of allegations of child maltreatment, domestic violence and parental abuse of drugs and alcohol, the authors (at pp506-509) write there is virtually no research on the extent to which spousal abuse allegations are clearly false and maliciously fabricated, but this issue is becoming an increasing concern for the justice system …it is critical to emphasize that the making of false allegations of spousal abuse is much less common than the problem of genuine victims who fail to report abuse, and the widespread false denials and minimization of abuse by perpetrators (earlier research sources cited in support).

Parenting orders and impact on children - Other Resources

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Guidelines for Independent Children’s Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

This document is intended to provide guidance to the Independent Children's Lawyer (ICL) in fulfilling his/her role. The Guidelines have also been issued for the purposes of providing practitioners, parties, children and other people in contact with the family law courts, with information about the courts' general expectations of ICLs. The Guidelines set out these expectations as they relate to children in circumstances where allegations of child abuse and/or family violence are made, children from culturally and linguistically diverse families and communities, children with disabilities, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, and where applications arise for the authorisation of special medical procedures and other orders relating to the welfare of children.

Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Lighthouse.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the role of Lighthouse in the Court's response to cases which may involve family violence.

"The Courts are leading the way in helping families that have experienced family violence and other safety risks to navigate the family law system. Lighthouse plays a central role in the Court's response to cases which may involve risk relating to family violence, mental health, drug and alcohol misuse and child abuse and neglect, by shaping the allocation of resources and urgency given to such cases."

The three parts of Lighthouse are:

- Screening (using the Family DOORS Triage risk screening process);
- Triage and case pathways; and
- Case management (including referral to the specialist Evatt List in certain registries).

Lighthouse operates in the family law registries in Adelaide, Brisbane, Cairns, Canberra, Dandenong, Darwin, Hobart, Launceston, Melbourne, Newcastle, Parramatta, Rockhampton, Sydney, Townsville and Wollongong.

Parenting orders and impact on children - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Bianca

Erin

Susan

Allegations of domestic and family violence

Section 4AB of the Family Law Act 1975 describes family violence as violent, threatening or other behaviour by a person that coerces or controls a member of the person's family (the family member), or cause the family member to be fearful.

The definition of family violence in the Family Law Act was expanded in 2011 to incorporate notions of coercion and control and came into effect on 7 June 2012. At the same time, the definition of child abuse was amended to include serious psychological harm arising from the child being subjected to or exposed to family violence (s 4(1) of the Family Law Act).

Many parenting matters determined by consent after proceedings are initiated, or by judicial determination, involve allegations of domestic and family violence and/or child abuse [Kaspiew et al Court Outcomes 2015]. Family Violence can take many forms: it can be physical, emotional, psychological or sexual. Common forms of family violence as outlined by the FCFCA are as follows (but are not limited to the below):

1. Spouse/partner abuse (violence among adult partners and ex partners);
2. Child abuse/neglect (abuse/neglect of children by an adult);
3. Parental abuse (violence perpetrated by a child against their parent); and
4. Sibling abuse (violence between siblings).

Research conducted into family violence allegations indicates that it is more likely that victims of family violence will be reluctant to raise allegations for fear of having their motives questioned [Laing 2010], as opposed to people raising false allegations of family violence. It also shows that the making of false allegations is much less common than the problem of genuine victims who fail to report abuse, and the widespread false denials and minimisation of abuse by perpetrators [Jaffe et al 2008]. A parent who feels pressure to support the family violence perpetrator's parenting role may feel discouraged from raising allegations of domestic and family violence [Fehlberg & Millward 2014], or may attempt family dispute resolution despite being in circumstances where they are experiencing threats, fear or abuse [Kaspiew et al 2009]. A parent may be even less likely to disclose domestic and family violence where they are self-represented and unfamiliar with the relevant provisions of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) or the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA), or their legal representative has not made sufficient enquiries regarding allegations of violence.

Allegations that are accompanied by evidence of strong probative weight may influence the nature of court-based parenting outcomes [Moloney et al 2007], for example the court may decide to make an Order whereby the child spends no time with the parent who has inflicted family violence, or that the time spent with that parent be supervised or restricted to daytime only [Kaspiew et al Synthesis 2015]. However, the FLA and FCA do not require independent verification or corroboration of allegations [FV Best Practice 2016] of domestic and family violence (such as police or medical reports) for the court to be satisfied that it has occurred. As the Full Court of the Family Court of Australia said in Amador & Amador ([2009] FAMCAFC 196 per May, Coleman and Le Poer Trench JJ:

> Where domestic violence occurs in a family it frequently occurs in circumstances where there are no witnesses other than the parties to the marriage, and possibly their children. We cannot accept that a Court could never make a positive finding that such violence occurred without there being corroborative evidence from a third party or a document or an admission. (at [79])
>
> The victims of domestic violence do not have to complain to the authorities or subject themselves to medical examinations, which may provide corroborative evidence of some fact, to have their evidence of assault accepted. (at [81])

When corroboration evidence is available but is not called, adverse inferences might appropriately be drawn.

In some registries the Court is screening for family violence through the Lighthouse Project [Lighthouse]. In addition the Commonwealth is piloting the co-location of state and territory child protection and policing officials [Co-location of child protection] in registries across Australia.

Allegations of domestic and family violence - Key Literature

Australia

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports on the findings from the analysis of data from two national online surveys (one for adults and one for children), which collected quantitative data and also allowed for qualitative comments about family violence and its impact on parenting and parenting arrangements. The study included adults and children who had separated after 1995 and after the introduction of the Family Law (Shared Parental Responsibility) Amendment Act (Cth) in 2006. The researchers gained the views of a total of 1,153 adults (90%) and children (10%).

Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports.

See in particular at p 53 – 'Some women felt powerless over arrangements to share care of the children with the fathers and felt they had been pressured into unfair agreements. For example, one woman who used services before the 2006 reforms said: 'The power he held over me during the relationship continued afterwards in regard to parenting arrangements and finances'. See also at p 55 where reports of confusion about the meaning of 'equal shared parental responsibility' are discussed.

Bailey, Alice, 'Separating safety from situational violence: Response to "Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings"' [2007] (77) Family Matters 26.

The paper discusses the report: Moloney et al. 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study Research Report No. 15 — May 2007' (Australian Institute of family Studies, 2007)- see below. The article notes the Maloney et al report provides evidence challenging a common myth that women frequently claim false allegations of family violence in child custody cases and that unless allegations are accompanied by strong evidence, they will have little impact on post-separation child contact.

Fehlberg, Belinda and Christine Millward, 'Family violence and financial outcomes after parental separation' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This article provides and analysis of interviews conducted with 60 separated parents as part of a wider study on links between post-separation parenting and financial settlements, following major family law and process amendments in 2006.

The authors note that their interviews suggested that disclosure of family violence was discouraged in a context where there was pressure to support the abusive partner's involvement and agree to shared time' (p 239). The authors conclude that 'family violence often influenced parenting arrangements and thus indirectly influenced financial settlements. Family violence often affected mothers' child support receipt, including in CSA Collect/Child Support Collect cases. Mothers who described family violence that affected property settlements also commonly described problems obtaining child support from their ex-partner. Family violence that diminished or ceased after separation could still have a continuing influence, discouraging pursuit of legal remedies by those exposed. (at 24)

Humphreys, Cathy and Meredith Kiraly, 'Developmentally sensitive parental contact for infants when families are separated' [2010] (85) Family Matters 49.

This paper uses data from an initial research study which explored issues with infants where the children's court ordered high-frequency contact (4-7 days per week) between infants and their parents while the infant was living with foster or kinship carers. The infants originally came into care due to significant issues in relation to child abuse and neglect. The applicable issues for infants taken into out-of-home care are different from situations where infants' parents have separated. However, family law proceedings relating to separated parent of infants contain similar dilemmas in relation to contact orders (p 49).

Importantly, 'experiencing violence and abuse is also dangerous territory for infants. Babies who are "incubated in terror" show attachment disruption and poor neurological development, as the chemicals released in a pervasive environment of fear are inimical to healthy brain development. Protection from violence and abuse is pivotal to the infant's healthy development and safety, particularly given their physical fragility. This issue cuts across all jurisdictions'…'Adversarial processes may not be optimal to finding the way through to the best interests of babies, particularly when some flexibility may be needed. This is true of both the Children's Court and family law jurisdictions. However, by definition, violence and abuse tramples on the rights of the most vulnerable (in this case, infants) and they may in the end need the protection of the court in order to safeguard their interests.' (p 58)

Kaspiew, R., Carson, R., Rhoades, H., Qu, L., De Maio, J., Horsfall, B., & Stevens, E. (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022). ANROWS.

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. The other three parts of the research program are based on data collection from family law court files involving contravention applications, an online survey of parents and carers with family law parenting orders, and an analysis of the approaches applied to contravention in three international jurisdictions. (p11)

Systemic factors include shortcomings in the identification, assessment and management of risk. (p13)

When working with parents for the development of parenting orders, it is critical that practitioners ensure that safety and risk are adequately assessed and considered in the parenting arrangements. (p14)

This evidence demonstrates that the parents who obtain family law parenting orders are a particularly complex group, with concentrated levels of risk indicators. In light of the small proportion of parenting orders that involve contravention matters…, it is important to emphasise that the contravention regime is applied to a small subset of a particularly complex group of families. (p17)

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence in three respects:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of professional practices and perspectives
- Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 based on a large-scale survey of parents' experiences and perspectives
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
  - a quantitative analysis of patterns in orders for parental responsibility and time made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia
  - a national analysis of court filings data provided by those courts
  - an analysis of published judgments

See especially at p 49 relating to court orders for parental responsibility - 'The analysis demonstrates largely consistent levels in the proportions of orders for shared parental responsibility in the consent after proceedings and consent without litigation samples, with around nine out of ten children in each sample subject to orders for equal shared parental responsibility (CO report, Table 3.25). In judicial determination files, 40% of children were subject to orders for shared parental responsibility after the reforms, compared with 51% pre-reform. Overall, the proportion of children with shared parental responsibility outcomes where no allegations of family violence or child abuse were raised remained stable in the two time frames, at about nine in ten (CO report, Table 3.26). Where both these issues were raised, marginal decreases were evident, with the proportion of such children subject to orders for shared parental responsibility decreasing slightly, from 72% to 70%. Where only one of these issues was raised, the likelihood of a shared parental responsibility order increased slightly after the reforms, rising from 80% to 84%.'

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who used family law system services in 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who experienced the system in 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 their post-reform experiences.

See in particular section 5.3.3 entitled 'Influence on care-time arrangements of disclosure of family violence and safety concerns'. 53% of parents in both cohorts who disclosed family violence 'reported that this "very much" or "somewhat" influenced their child's parenting arrangements. This was similar to the corresponding proportion of parents who disclosed safety concerns (2012: 56% and 2014: 53%)' (p 111).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children. The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

It identified that arguments about family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. Table 3.13 on page 45 sets out the extent to which allegations of family violence and child abuse were raised in the pre- and post-reform samples according to the way in which matters were resolved (by judicial determination OR by consent after the proceedings had been issued or by application for consent orders).

The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Post-separation parenting arrangements involving minimal time with one parent' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter examines recent empirical evidence on post-separation parenting arrangements, with a particular focus on arrangements where children have little or no contact with one parent. It demonstrates that a range of factors is linked with circumstances in which fathers have little or no contact with children, but that contact with services and courts is supportive of maintaining, and in some circumstances, increasing fathers' involvement with their children' (p 224-225).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. The Survey of FRSP Clients 2009 also revealed high rates of family violence in separated families. The data shows that 33% of clients reported being physically hurt by the person about whom they attended the service and 77% reported being seriously put down or insulted. The participating client reported the other party making threats to harm them, themselves (i.e., the other party) or others (including pets) in 43% of cases. Controlling behaviour on the part of the other party had been experienced by 50% of clients participating in the survey.' (pp26-27)

Family lawyers expressed concerns that arrangements were being made that were developmentally inappropriate or in the context of a history family violence, and such arrangements proved to be unworkable in practical terms' (p 214).

Laing, Lesley, No Way to Live: Women's Experiences of Negotiating the Family Law System in the Context of Domestic Violence (Faculty of Education and Social Work, University of Sydney, 2010).

This research reports on the experiences of 22 women who were involved in the family law system following their separation from a relationship in which they had experienced domestic violence. In particular see section titled: "'He just wants to see his children' – a lens for excusing men's behaviour" (from pp47-49) that draws on a number of excerpts detailing how fathers have manipulated police to harass and intimidate mothers (e.g. calling police to her house alleging she'd threatened to kill her children; turning up late for contact).

Moloney, Lawrie, Bruce Smyth, Ruth Weston, Nicholas Richardson, Lixia Qu and Matthew Gray, 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study Research Report No. 15 — May 2007' (Australian Institute of family Studies, 2007).

This research was commissioned by the Federal Attorney-General's Department to provide baseline information to assist in informing the Australian Government's Family Law Violence Strategy. The study examines (a) the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings filed in 2003 in selected registries; (b) the extent to which alleging parties provided evidence in support of their allegations, and to which allegations were denied, admitted or left unanswered by the other party; and (c) the extent to which court outcomes of post-separation parenting disputes appeared to be related to the presence or absence of allegations. The study was based on a content analysis of two random samples of court files from the Melbourne, Dandenong and Adelaide registries of the former Family

Court of Australia (FCoA) and the former Federal Magistrates Court (FMC): 240 files from the general population of cases in which parenting matters were in dispute (the general litigants sample), and 60 files from judicially determined matters in which parenting was in dispute (the judicial determination sample). In summary, a total of 300 court files were analysed: 150 from the former Family Court of Australia and 150 from the former Federal Magistrates Court. It should not be assumed that this sample is representative of the divorcing population. In other words, the findings should not be generalised to this population. The research found that more than half the cases in the former FCoA and FMC in both samples contained allegations of adult family violence and/or child abuse. Note the discussion in chapter 8 which identifies that the 'most extensive work to date on the subject …has concluded in that country (Canada) that false denials are more common that false allegations.' Findings included that:

- Cases in the FCoA that required judicial determination were more likely than other cases to contain evidence of spousal violence that appeared to have some strong probative weight.
- Cases that seemed to contain the most severe allegations of spousal violence were especially likely to be accompanied by evidentiary material. Many of these cases required a judicial determination.

McIntosh, Jennifer et al, 'Post-Separation Parenting Arrangements and Development Outcomes for Infants and Children' [2011] (86) Family Matters 40.

This article summarises key findings from two recent Australian studies of outcomes for two potential risk groups: school-aged children living in separations characterised by high inter-parental conflict (Study 1), and infants and pre-schoolers in the general population of separated families (Study 2). Both studies were commissioned by the Australian Government Attorney-General's Department.

See in particular at p 46, where it is noted that 'regardless of socio-economic background, parenting or inter-parental cooperation, shared overnight care of children less than four years of age had an independent and significantly deleterious impact on several emotional and behavioural regulation outcomes.' For example, young infants less than two years old living with a non-resident parent for only one or more nights a week 'were more irritable, and were more watchful and wary of separation from their primary caregiver than young children primarily in the care of one parent. Children aged 2–3 years in shared care (at the policy definition of five nights or more per fortnight) showed significantly lower levels of persistence with routine tasks, learning and play, than children in the other two groups' (p 46). They also showed 'severely distressed behaviours in their relationship with the primary parent' which is consistent with attachment theory. However, by kindergarten or school entry (children aged around 4-5 years), these effects were no longer evident as the children were capable of, inter alia self-soothing and organising their own behaviour. That is, the child truly 'knows what tomorrow is' which makes them better able to straddle households in a shared overnight parenting arrangement (p 46).

See also at p 48 'The task continues to be to determine those arrangements and attitudes that will maximally support each child within his/her unique developmental context'.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders.

Parkinson, Patrick, 'Violence, abuse and the limits of shared parental responsibility' [2013] (92) Family Matters 7.

In this article Parkinson argues that it is important to focus on current safety concerns rather than a history of violence throughout the relationship so as to direct resources to the parents and children at most risk as a result of post-separation parenting arrangements (pp 12-13). He nevertheless acknowledges that a history of coercive controlling violence remains important in relation to, for example, a child's attitude towards living with or visiting a violent parent. It is also important 'in assessing the mother's capacity for parenting and her attitude towards contact between the child and the other parent. For many women who experience this kind of subjugation and control, the psychological effects may have a greater lasting impact than the physical abuse. These effects include fear and anxiety, loss of self-esteem, depression and post-traumatic stress (p 14).

Qu, Lixia and Ruth Weston, 'Parenting dynamics after separation: A follow-up study of parents who separated after the 2006 family law reforms' (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2010).

This report examines, 'the pathways that separating families have taken through the family law system, and the impact the changes to the family law system have had on these families. The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examined relationships and wellbeing in separated families in Australia. Some 10,000 separated parents with children were interviewed for the first wave in 2008, as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms. This report presents findings from the second wave, when the parents had been separated for two to three years'.

See in particular at p 117 – 'the presumption of "equal shared parental responsibility" does not apply where there are reasonable grounds to believe that a child's parent, or another person in this parent's household, had engaged in family violence or child abuse. In Wave 2, as in Wave 1, decisions were less likely to be shared equally where respondents expressed safety concerns or said that their child's other parent had been abusive towards them during the preceding 12 months, with abuse in Wave 2 mainly taking the form of humiliating insults.'

Also, 'Although the emergence of safety concerns or experiences of abuse in the 12 months preceding Wave 2 was associated with a decline in the rate of shared decision-making, a substantial minority who reported safety concerns in Wave 2, whether recently emerging or longstanding, said that decisions were made jointly. For fathers, safety concerns mostly represented concerns about their child, and often related to their child's mother. Furthermore, quite serious behaviours, such as violence and anger management issues, were generally behind these concerns (see Chapter 3) (p 117).'

Weston, Ruth et al, 'Care-time arrangements after the 2006 reforms' [2011] (86) Family Matters 19.

This article examines the prevalence of different care-time arrangements for separating families after the 2006 reforms, parents' views about the flexibility and workability of their arrangements, characteristics of families with different care-time arrangements and the strength of the relationship between child wellbeing on the one hand and care-time arrangements and family dynamics on the other.

Note at p29: 'Across all care-time arrangements, children's wellbeing appeared to have been compromised where there had been a history of family violence, where parents held safety concerns (for them or their child) associated with ongoing contact with the other parent, and where the inter-parental relationship was either highly conflictual or fearful. Children in shared care-time arrangements appeared to be no worse off than other children where there had been a history of family violence or a negative inter-parental relationship.

However, mothers' assessments suggested that, where there were safety concerns, children in shared care fared worse than those who lived mostly with their mother.'

International

Jaffe, Peter G., Janet R. Johnston, Claire V. Crooks, Nicholas Bala, 'Custody disputes involving allegations of Domestic violence: toward a differentiated approach to parenting plans' (2008) 46(3) Family Court Review 500.

Premised on the understanding that domestic violence is a broad concept that encompasses a wide range of behaviors from isolated events to a pattern of emotional, physical, and sexual abuse that controls the victim, this article addresses the need for a differentiated approach to developing parenting plans after separation when domestic violence is alleged. A method of assessing risk by screening for the potency, pattern, and primary perpetrator of the violence is proposed as a foundation for generating hypotheses about the type of and potential for future violence as well as parental functioning. This kind of differential screening for risk in cases where domestic violence is alleged provides preliminary guidance in identifying parenting arrangements that are appropriate for the specific child and family and, if confirmed by a more in-depth assessment, may be the basis for a long-term plan.

Regarding the credibility of allegations of child maltreatment, domestic violence and parental abuse of drugs and alcohol, the authors (at pp506-509) write there is virtually no research on the extent to which spousal abuse allegations are clearly false and maliciously fabricated, but this issue is becoming an increasing concern for the justice system …it is critical to emphasize that the making of false allegations of spousal abuse is much less common than the problem of genuine victims who fail to report abuse, and the widespread false denials and minimization of abuse by perpetrators (earlier research sources cited in support).

Allegations of domestic and family violence - Other Resources

Co-location of State and Territory child protection and other officials in Family Law Court Registries.

Open via Department of Social Services: National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children website.

This initiative has funded the co-location of 16 child protection officials and 6 policing officials at family law court registries until 30 June 2025. It's intended outcomes include:

The intended outcomes of this program include:

- a more coordinated response to family safety issues (demonstrated in part by the sharing of data relating to information or intervention requests in matters where child abuse is suspected or alleged)
- judicial officers being able to make decisions with full knowledge of prior involvement by child protection and law enforcement agencies
- strengthened judicial decision-making, with family safety risks identified and addressed earlier in family law proceedings
- improved inter-jurisdictional understanding and cooperation, leading to better information sharing practices.

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – "Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child's family towards another member of the child's family, or

- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child's family by another member of the child's family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child's family who has been assaulted by another member of the child's family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child's family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child's family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child's family by another member of the child's family."

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Guidelines for Independent Children's Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

This document is intended to provide guidance to the Independent Children's Lawyer (ICL) in fulfilling his/her role. The Guidelines have also been issued for the purposes of providing practitioners, parties, children and other people in contact with the family law courts, with information about the courts' general expectations of ICLs. The Guidelines set out these expectations as they relate to children in circumstances where allegations of child abuse and/or family violence are made, children from culturally and linguistically diverse families and communities, children with disabilities, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, and where applications arise for the authorisation of special medical procedures and other orders relating to the welfare of children.

Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Lighthouse.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the role of Lighthouse in the Court's response to cases which may involve family violence.

"The Courts are leading the way in helping families that have experienced family violence and other safety risks to navigate the family law system. Lighthouse plays a central role in the Court's response to cases which may involve risk relating to family violence, mental health, drug and alcohol misuse and child abuse and neglect, by shaping the allocation of resources and urgency given to such cases."

The three parts of the Lighthouse project are:

- Screening (using the Family DOORS Triage risk screening process);
- Triage and case pathways; and
- Case management (including referral to the specialist Evatt List in certain registries).

Lighthouse operates in the family law registries in Adelaide, Brisbane, Cairns, Canberra, Dandenong, Darwin, Hobart, Launceston, Melbourne, Newcastle, Parramatta, Rockhampton, Sydney, Townsville and Wollongong.

Court-based parenting outcomes

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- amend the parenting order framework by refining the list of 'best interests' factors, removing the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and related equal time and substantial and significant time provision, and clarifying the circumstances in which a court can vary an existing parenting order;
- redraft provisions relating to compliance with, and enforcement of, parenting orders;
- amend definitions relating to the concept of 'family' to be more inclusive of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture and traditions;
- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view;
- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;
- makes consequential amendments to the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021;

Amends the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021 to:

- allow registrars of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCOA) to be delegated the power to impose a make-up time parent order in contravention proceedings;
- bring forward the review of the Act by 2 years;
- provide that a judge of the Family Court of Western Australia can be dually appointed as a judge of Division 1 of the FCFCOA; and

Amends Family Law Act 1975 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021

- to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

Section 61DA FLA and Section 70A FCA provide that, when making a parenting order, the court must apply a presumption that it is in the best interests of the child for the child's parents to have equal shared parental responsibility (Section 65DAC FLA and Section 89AC FCA). The presumption does not apply if there are reasonable grounds to believe that a parent of the child (or person living with a parent) has engaged in child abuse or family violence. The presumption may be rebutted by evidence that equal shared parental responsibility would not be in the best interests of the child. Where the presumption applies, the court must also consider ordering "equal time" or "substantial and significant time" with each parent where it is reasonably practicable and in the best interests of the child (Section 65DAA FLA and Section 89AA FCA).

In addition to the primary considerations of the benefit of the child having a meaningful relationship with both parents and the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm, there are a number of additional considerations the court needs to look at when determining what is in the child's best interests. These include things such as the nature of the relationship between the child and his/her parents, the likely effect of changes in circumstances, the parent's capacity to provide for the needs of the child (including emotional and intellectual needs) and several additional factors outlined in s 60CC(3) of the FLA and s66C of the FCA. Section 60CC(3)(k) provides that in the event that a family violence order applies, or has applied, to the child or any member of the child's family, any relevant inferences that can be drawn from the order need to be taken into account.

Research indicates that children who are exposed to domestic and family violence may be significantly harmed [Family violence and children 2021].

Concerns may be sufficient to warrant an order for supervised changeovers and/or time; and a specified contact centre may be considered appropriate to provide the necessary supervision to lessen the risk of exposure to family violence. In cases where there is a risk of serious harm to the child or the primary caregiver, the court may decide that sole parental responsibility is more appropriate than trying to preserve an ongoing co-parenting relationship [Parkinson 2013]. The Court may also consider making an order that the child spend no time with the parent who inflicts family violence.

In addition to addressing the risk of ongoing domestic and family violence and associated safety concerns, there may be other related considerations for judicial officers when making a parenting order. For example, a judicial officer may need to consider the extent to which ongoing conflict and violence between parents affects either parent's capacity to care for the child [Moloney et al 2007], or whether it is appropriate to make provision for support to be given during contact to a parent who may be coping with the effects of substance misuse, mental illness or domestic and family violence [Humphreys & Kiraly 2010].

Further, in order to determine those arrangements that will best support the child within their unique developmental context, a judicial officer should consider matters relevant to the child's age and developmental stage. In making this determination, a judicial officer may give weight to recommendations made in a court-ordered Family Report or other court-ordered expert report, or to submissions made to the court by an Independent Children's Lawyer (ICL). Research has identified the need for ICLs [Guidelines for ICL 2021] to be well trained; and to have the necessary skills to communicate with children and to understand and respond to their experiences of domestic and family violence and child abuse [Kaspiew et al ICL Study 2014].

The Family Violence Best Practice Principles comprehensively deal with the range of considerations that are likely to be important in framing orders at interim and final hearing stage in cases where there are disputed allegations of domestic and family violence and child abuse.

In some cases where consent orders are proposed it may be appropriate for the judicial officer to ask questions or request further information in order to closely scrutinise the suitability of the proposal, or to appoint an Independent Children's Lawyer or order a Family Report or expert report to determine what is in a child's best interests.

Where an application is made to the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia or the Federal Circuit Court of Australia for a parenting order by consent, the parties must formally advise the court whether any allegations had been made in the proceedings of family violence or child abuse or neglect (or risk thereof), or of mental ill-health, drug or alcohol, serious parental incapacity or any other allegation involving a risk to the child concerned AND whether a party considers that the child concerned has been or is at risk of abuse, neglect or family violence, and whether a party considers that he or she or another party to the proceedings has been or is at risk if family violence. Should any of these circumstances be advised, the parties must explain to the Court how the parenting order attempts to deal with the allegations (see Rule 10.05 of the FCFCA Rules).

There has been reported confusion among parents about the meaning of equal shared parental responsibility, some believing that it is the equivalent of equal-time [Kaspiew et al 2009]. Research has shown that where domestic and family violence continues after separation, in particular where there are ongoing attempts to exercise control in parenting arrangements, some mothers feel pressured by their former partners/the fathers of their children into agreeing to equal-time, believing that the court would require it [Bagshaw et al 2011]. A 2015 study of separated parents conducted by the Australian Institute of Family Studies reports an increase in the number of children of parents with domestic and family violence and safety concerns having only daytime contact with the alleged perpetrator of family violence [Kaspiew et al Synthesis 2015].

Court-based parenting outcomes - Key Literature

Australia

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'The effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements The experiences and views of children and adults from families who separated post-1995 and post-2006' [2011] (86) Family Matters 49.

This article reports on the findings from the analysis of data from two national online surveys (one for adults and one for children), which collected quantitative data and also allowed for qualitative comments about family violence and its impact on parenting and parenting arrangements. The study included adults and children who had separated after 1995 and after the introduction of the Family Law (Shared Parental Responsibility) Amendment Act (Cth) in 2006. The researchers gained the views of a total of 1,153 adults (90%) and children (10%).

Many adults felt dissatisfied with service providers' acknowledgement and appreciation of the impact of family violence on adult and child victims. Adults were most dissatisfied with services for decision-making regarding planning for their children's care post-separation. Their concern for their children's safety was supported by children's own reports.

See in particular at p 53 – 'Some women felt powerless over arrangements to share care of the children with the fathers and felt they had been pressured into unfair agreements. For example, one woman who used services before the 2006 reforms said: 'The power he held over me during the relationship continued afterwards in regard to parenting arrangements and finances'. See also at p 55 where reports of confusion about the meaning of 'equal shared parental responsibility' are discussed.

Bailey, Alice, 'Separating safety from situational violence: Response to "Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings"' [2007] (77) Family Matters 26.

The paper discusses the report: Moloney et al. 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study Research Report No. 15 — May 2007' (Australian Institute of family Studies, 2007)- see below. The article notes the Maloney et al report provides evidence challenging a common myth that women frequently claim false allegations of family violence in child custody cases and that unless allegations are accompanied by strong evidence, they will have little impact on post-separation child contact.

Fehlberg, Belinda and Christine Millward, 'Family violence and financial outcomes after parental separation' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This article provides and analysis of interviews conducted with 60 separated parents as part of a wider study on links between post-separation parenting and financial settlements, following major family law and process amendments in 2006.

The authors note that their interviews suggested that disclosure of family violence was discouraged in a context where there was pressure to support the abusive partner's involvement and agree to shared time' (p 239). The authors conclude that 'family violence often influenced parenting arrangements and thus indirectly influenced financial settlements. Family violence often affected mothers' child support receipt, including in CSA Collect/Child Support Collect cases. Mothers who described family violence that affected property settlements also commonly described problems obtaining child support from their ex-partner. Family violence that diminished or ceased after separation could still have a continuing influence, discouraging pursuit of legal remedies by those exposed. (at 24)

Humphreys, Cathy and Meredith Kiraly, 'Developmentally sensitive parental contact for infants when families are separated' [2010] (85) Family Matters 49.

This paper uses data from an initial research study which explored issues with infants where the children's court ordered high-frequency contact (4-7 days per week) between infants and their parents while the infant was living with foster or kinship carers. The infants originally came into care due to significant issues in relation to child abuse and neglect. The applicable issues for infants taken into out-of-home care are different from situations where infants' parents have separated. However, family law proceedings relating to separated parent of infants contain similar dilemmas in relation to contact orders (p 49).

Importantly, 'experiencing violence and abuse is also dangerous territory for infants. Babies who are "incubated in terror" show attachment disruption and poor neurological development, as the chemicals released in a pervasive environment of fear are inimical to healthy brain development. Protection from violence and abuse is pivotal to the infant's healthy development and safety, particularly given their physical fragility. This issue cuts across all jurisdictions'…'Adversarial processes may not be optimal to finding the way through to the best interests of babies, particularly when some flexibility may be needed. This is true of both the Children's Court and family law jurisdictions. However, by definition, violence and abuse tramples on the rights of the most vulnerable (in this case, infants) and they may in the end need the protection of the court in order to safeguard their interests.' (p 58)

Kaspiew, R., Carson, R., Rhoades, H., Qu, L., De Maio, J., Horsfall, B., & Stevens, E. (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022). ANROWS.

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. The other three parts of the research program are based on data collection from family law court files involving contravention applications, an online survey of parents and carers with family law parenting orders, and an analysis of the approaches applied to contravention in three international jurisdictions. (p11)

Systemic factors include shortcomings in the identification, assessment and management of risk. (p13)

When working with parents for the development of parenting orders, it is critical that practitioners ensure that safety and risk are adequately assessed and considered in the parenting arrangements. (p14)

This evidence demonstrates that the parents who obtain family law parenting orders are a particularly complex group, with concentrated levels of risk indicators. In light of the small proportion of parenting orders that involve contravention matters…, it is important to emphasise that the contravention regime is applied to a small subset of a particularly complex group of families. (p17)

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family violence in three respects:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of professional practices and perspectives
- Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 based on a large-scale survey of parents' experiences and perspectives
- Court Outcomes Project involving:
  - a quantitative analysis of patterns in orders for parental responsibility and time made in the former Family Court of Australia, the former Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia
  - a national analysis of court filings data provided by those courts
  - an analysis of published judgments

See especially at p 49 relating to court orders for parental responsibility - 'The analysis demonstrates largely consistent levels in the proportions of orders for shared parental responsibility in the consent after proceedings and consent without litigation samples, with around nine out of ten children in each sample subject to orders for equal shared parental responsibility (CO report, Table 3.25). In judicial determination files, 40% of children were subject to orders for shared parental responsibility after the reforms, compared with 51% pre-reform. Overall, the proportion of children with shared parental responsibility outcomes where no allegations of family violence or child abuse were raised remained stable in the two time frames, at about nine in ten (CO report, Table 3.26). Where both these issues were raised, marginal decreases were evident, with the proportion of such children subject to orders for shared parental responsibility decreasing slightly, from 72% to 70%. Where only one of these issues was raised, the likelihood of a shared parental responsibility order increased slightly after the reforms, rising from 80% to 84%.'

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Experiences of Separated Parents Study' (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This element is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who used family law system services in 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who experienced the system in 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents' pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 their post-reform experiences.

See in particular section 5.3.3 entitled 'Influence on care-time arrangements of disclosure of family violence and safety concerns'. 53% of parents in both cohorts who disclosed family violence 'reported that this "very much" or "somewhat" influenced their child's parenting arrangements. This was similar to the corresponding proportion of parents who disclosed safety concerns (2012: 56% and 2014: 53%)' (p 111).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children. The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

It identified that arguments about family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. Table 3.13 on page 45 sets out the extent to which allegations of family violence and child abuse were raised in the pre- and post-reform samples according to the way in which matters were resolved (by judicial determination OR by consent after the proceedings had been issued or by application for consent orders). The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Post-separation parenting arrangements involving minimal time with one parent' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter examines recent empirical evidence on post-separation parenting arrangements, with a particular focus on arrangements where children have little or no contact with one parent. It demonstrates that a range of factors is linked with circumstances in which fathers have little or no contact with children, but that contact with services and courts is supportive of maintaining, and in some circumstances, increasing fathers' involvement with their children' (p 224-225).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Independent Children's Lawyers Study' (Final Report (2nd Edition), Australian Institute of Family Studies, June 2014).

This report has examined the role of ICLs in the family law system. The capacity of many ICLs is recognised to be excellent (p xii). Issues identified throughout the report include the need for ICLs to have greater awareness of child development issues and the overall limitations of ICLs in consulting effectively with children. Indeed, some ICLs emphasised the delineation of their role from that of a social science expert. It is important to ensure ICLs do not go beyond their expertise (pp48-49). However, it was nevertheless thought prudent for ICLs to have more training in child development issues.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family Law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. The Survey of FRSP Clients 2009 also revealed high rates of family violence in separated families. The data shows that 33% of clients reported being physically hurt by the person about whom they attended the service and 77% reported being seriously put down or insulted. The participating client reported the other party making threats to harm them, themselves (i.e., the other party) or others (including pets) in 43% of cases. Controlling behaviour on the part of the other party had been experienced by 50% of clients participating in the survey.'

(pp26-27)

Family lawyers expressed concerns that arrangements were being made that were developmentally inappropriate or in the context of a history family violence, and such arrangements proved to be unworkable in practical terms' (p 214).

Laing, Lesley, No Way to Live: Women's Experiences of Negotiating the Family Law System in the Context of Domestic Violence (Faculty of Education and Social Work, University of Sydney, 2010).

This research reports on the experiences of 22 women who were involved in the family law system following their separation from a relationship in which they had experienced domestic violence. In particular see section titled: "'He just wants to see his children' – a lens for excusing men's behaviour" (from pp47-49) that draws on a number of excerpts detailing how fathers have manipulated police to harass and intimidate mothers (e.g. calling police to her house alleging she'd threatened to kill her children; turning up late for contact).

Moloney, Lawrie, Bruce Smyth, Ruth Weston, Nicholas Richardson, Lixia Qu and Matthew Gray, 'Allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings: A pre-reform exploratory study Research Report No. 15 — May 2007' (Australian Institute of family Studies, 2007).

This research was commissioned by the Federal Attorney-General's Department to provide baseline information to assist in informing the Australian Government's Family Law Violence Strategy. The study examines (a) the prevalence and nature of allegations of family violence and child abuse in family law children's proceedings filed in 2003 in selected registries; (b) the extent to which alleging parties provided evidence in support of their allegations, and to which allegations were denied, admitted or left unanswered by the other party; and (c) the extent to which court outcomes of post-separation parenting disputes appeared to be related to the presence or absence of allegations. The study was based on a content analysis of two random samples of court files from the Melbourne, Dandenong and Adelaide registries of the former Family Court of Australia (FCoA) and the former Federal Magistrates Court (FMC): 240 files from the general population of cases in which parenting matters were in dispute (the general litigants sample), and 60 files from judicially determined matters in which parenting was in dispute (the judicial determination sample). In summary, a total of 300 court files were analysed: 150 from the former Family Court of Australia and 150 from the former Federal Magistrates Court. It should not be assumed that this sample is representative of the divorcing population. In other words, the findings should not be generalised to this population. The research found that more than half the cases in the former FCoA and FMC in both samples contained allegations of adult family violence and/or child abuse. Note the discussion in chapter 8 which identifies that the 'most extensive work to date on the subject …has concluded in that country (Canada) that false denials are more common that false allegations.' Findings included that:

- Cases in the FCoA that required judicial determination were more likely than other cases to contain evidence of spousal violence that appeared to have some strong probative weight.
- Cases that seemed to contain the most severe allegations of spousal violence were especially likely to be accompanied by evidentiary material. Many of these cases required a judicial determination.

McIntosh, Jennifer et al, 'Post-Separation Parenting Arrangements and Development Outcomes for Infants and Children' [2011] (86) Family Matters 40.

This article summarises key findings from two recent Australian studies of outcomes for two potential risk groups: school-aged children living in separations characterised by high inter-parental conflict (Study 1), and infants and pre-schoolers in the general population of separated families (Study 2). Both studies were commissioned by the Australian Government Attorney-General's Department.

See in particular at p 46, where it is noted that 'regardless of socio-economic background, parenting or inter-parental cooperation, shared overnight care of children less than four years of age had an independent and significantly deleterious impact on several emotional and behavioural regulation outcomes.' For example, young infants less than two years old living with a non-resident parent for only one or more nights a week 'were more irritable, and were more watchful and wary of separation from their primary caregiver than young children primarily in the care of one parent. Children aged 2–3 years in shared care (at the policy definition of five nights or more per fortnight) showed significantly lower levels of persistence with routine tasks, learning and play, than children in the other two groups' (p 46). They also showed 'severely distressed behaviours in their relationship with the primary parent' which is consistent with attachment theory. However, by kindergarten or school entry (children aged around 4-5 years), these effects were no longer evident as the children were capable of, inter alia self-soothing and organising their own behaviour. That is, the child truly 'knows what tomorrow is' which makes them better able to straddle households in a shared overnight parenting arrangement (p 46).

See also at p 48 ‘The task continues to be to determine those arrangements and attitudes that will maximally support each child within his/her unique developmental context’.

Parkinson, Patrick, ‘The ties that bind: Separation, divorce and the indissolubility of parenthood’ in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This chapter considers the history and contemporary issues around reform to family law in Australia, particularly in relation to parenting orders.

Parkinson, Patrick, ‘Violence, abuse and the limits of shared parental responsibility’ [2013] (92) Family Matters 7.

In this article Parkinson argues that it is important to focus on current safety concerns rather than a history of violence throughout the relationship so as to direct resources to the parents and children at most risk as a result of post-separation parenting arrangements (pp 12-13). He nevertheless acknowledges that a history of coercive controlling violence remains important in relation to, for example, a child’s attitude towards living with or visiting a violent parent. It is also important ‘in assessing the mother’s capacity for parenting and her attitude towards contact between the child and the other parent. For many women who experience this kind of subjugation and control, the psychological effects may have a greater lasting impact than the physical abuse. These effects include fear and anxiety, loss of self-esteem, depression and post-traumatic stress (p 14).

Qu, Lixia and Ruth Weston, ‘Parenting dynamics after separation: A follow-up study of parents who separated after the 2006 family law reforms’ (Commissioned Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2010).

This report examines, ‘the pathways that separating families have taken through the family law system, and the impact the changes to the family law system have had on these families. The Longitudinal Study of Separated Families examined relationships and wellbeing in separated families in Australia. Some 10,000 separated parents with children were interviewed for the first wave in 2008, as part of the evaluation of the 2006 Family Law reforms. This report presents findings from the second wave, when the parents had been separated for two to three years'.

See in particular at p 117 – 'the presumption of "equal shared parental responsibility" does not apply where there are reasonable grounds to believe that a child's parent, or another person in this parent's household, had engaged in family violence or child abuse. In Wave 2, as in Wave 1, decisions were less likely to be shared equally where respondents expressed safety concerns or said that their child's other parent had been abusive towards them during the preceding 12 months, with abuse in Wave 2 mainly taking the form of humiliating insults.'

Also, 'Although the emergence of safety concerns or experiences of abuse in the 12 months preceding Wave 2 was associated with a decline in the rate of shared decision-making, a substantial minority who reported safety concerns in Wave 2, whether recently emerging or longstanding, said that decisions were made jointly. For fathers, safety concerns mostly represented concerns about their child, and often related to their child's mother. Furthermore, quite serious behaviours, such as violence and anger management issues, were generally behind these concerns (see Chapter 3) (p 117).'

Weston, Ruth et al, 'Care-time arrangements after the 2006 reforms' [2011] (86) Family Matters 19.

This article examines the prevalence of different care-time arrangements for separating families after the 2006 reforms, parents' views about the flexibility and workability of their arrangements, characteristics of families with different care-time arrangements and the strength of the relationship between child wellbeing on the one hand and care-time arrangements and family dynamics on the other.

Note at p29: 'Across all care-time arrangements, children's wellbeing appeared to have been compromised where there had been a history of family violence, where parents held safety concerns (for them or their child) associated with ongoing contact with the other parent, and where the inter-parental relationship was either highly conflictual or fearful. Children in shared care-time arrangements appeared to be no worse off than other children where there had been a history of family violence or a negative inter-parental relationship. However, mothers' assessments suggested that, where there were safety concerns, children in shared care fared worse than those who lived mostly with their mother.'

International

Jaffe, Peter G., Janet R. Johnston, Claire V. Crooks, Nicholas Bala, 'Custody disputes involving allegations of Domestic violence: toward a differentiated approach to parenting plans' (2008) 46(3) Family Court Review 500.

Premised on the understanding that domestic violence is a broad concept that encompasses a wide range of behaviors from isolated events to a pattern of emotional, physical, and sexual abuse that controls the victim, this article addresses the need for a differentiated approach to developing parenting plans after separation when domestic violence is alleged. A method of assessing risk by screening for the potency, pattern, and primary perpetrator of the violence is proposed as a foundation for generating hypotheses about the type of and potential for future violence as well as parental functioning. This kind of differential screening for risk in cases where domestic violence is alleged provides preliminary guidance in identifying parenting arrangements that are appropriate for the specific child and family and, if confirmed by a more in-depth assessment, may be the basis for a long-term plan.

Regarding the credibility of allegations of child maltreatment, domestic violence and parental abuse of drugs and alcohol, the authors (at pp506-509) write there is virtually no research on the extent to which spousal abuse allegations are clearly false and maliciously fabricated, but this issue is becoming an increasing concern for the justice system …it is critical to emphasize that the making of false allegations of spousal abuse is much less common than the problem of genuine victims who fail to report abuse, and the widespread false denials and minimization of abuse by perpetrators (earlier research sources cited in support).

Neilson, Linda C, 'Parental Alienation Empirical Analysis: Child Best Interests or Parental Rights?' (Muriel McQueen Fergusson Centre for Family Violence Research and The FREDA Centre for Research on Violence Against Women, 2018).

This article considers how 'Canadian courts are responding to parental alienation claims', to evaluate the validity of concerns regarding the theory (pp 2-3). Common concerns include a lack of scientific support for the theory (p 5); the potential for inappropriate application in cases of family violence, particularly to undermine safety considerations (pp 5, 31-3); implicit gender bias (p 9); the potential for parental alienation claims to deflect attention from child best interest considerations (p 18); and impacts on domestic violence evidence (p 22). The author concludes that courts continue to consider child best interest factors, but that judges often display implicit bias against mothers and domestic violence evidence in cases that endorse parental alienation theory (pp 45-6). Moreover, there is evidence of limited understanding of the impact of domestic violence on victims, and child development principles (p 46). Detailed ‘scrutiny of child best interest factors’, child-development principles, and trauma-informed practice should be adopted in place of single controversial theories and victim blaming approaches (p 48). The article includes detailed consideration of Canadian caselaw throughout.

Court-based parenting outcomes - Other Resources

Family violence and children (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This webpage provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

It states – “Examples of situations that may constitute a child being exposed to family violence include (but are not limited to):

- overhearing threats of death or personal injury by a member of the child’s family towards another member of the child’s family, or
- seeing or hearing an assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family, or
- comforting or providing assistance to a member of the child’s family who has been assaulted by another member of the child’s family, or
- cleaning up a site after a member of the child’s family has intentionally damaged property of another member of the child’s family, or
- being present when police or ambulance officers attend an incident involving the assault of a member of the child’s family by another member of the child’s family.”

The long-term impact of family violence on children is also discussed, and examples of the impacts of family violence on babies and toddlers, school-aged children and adolescents are listed.

Guidelines for Independent Children’s Lawyer (2021).

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.
Open via Family Court of Western Australia website.

This document is intended to provide guidance to the Independent Children's Lawyer (ICL) in fulfilling his/her role. The Guidelines have also been issued for the purposes of providing practitioners, parties, children and other people in contact with the family law courts, with information about the courts' general expectations of ICLs. The Guidelines set out these expectations as they relate to children in circumstances where allegations of child abuse and/or family violence are made, children from culturally and linguistically diverse families and communities, children with disabilities, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children, and where applications arise for the authorisation of special medical procedures and other orders relating to the welfare of children.

Family Violence Best Practice Principles – December 2016.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

Lighthouse.

Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia website.

This document explains the role of Lighthouse in the Court's response to cases which may involve family violence.

"The Courts are leading the way in helping families that have experienced family violence and other safety risks to navigate the family law system. Lighthouse plays a central role in the Court's response to cases which may involve risk relating to family violence, mental health, drug and alcohol misuse and child abuse and neglect, by shaping the allocation of resources and urgency given to such cases."

The three parts of Lighthouse are:

- Screening (using the Family DOORS Triage risk screening process);
- Triage and case pathways; and
- Case management (including referral to the specialist Evatt List in certain registries).

Lighthouse operates in the family law registries in Adelaide, Brisbane, Cairns, Canberra, Dandenong, Darwin, Hobart, Launceston, Melbourne, Newcastle, Parramatta, Rockhampton, Sydney, Townsville and Wollongong.

Relocation

It is common for victims of domestic violence to seek to move away from the geographical location where the abusive partner resides in an attempt to ensure their safety and their childrens' safety and escape the coercive controlling behaviours of their abuser. In addition, a perpetrator of family violence may seek to, or threaten to, relocate the residence of the children to exert control over or "punish" the abused partner. Such relocation may be proposed or unilaterally undertaken, and may involve relocation to intrastate, interstate or international locations.

Where parents are unable to reach agreement as to whether one party may change the place of residence of their child or children to another town, state or country, they may apply under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) or the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA) to have the matter determined by the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia or the Family Court of Western Australia (collectively called here "the family courts"). In many cases where relocation is allowed the presumption of shared parental responsibility is rebutted.

Orders enjoining a parent, as opposed to a child, from relocating or to relocate are rare and should only be made to the extent "necessary to secure the best interests of the child" (Sampson & Hartnett (No. 10) [2007] FamCA 1365 (22 November 2007) per Bryant CJ and Warnick J at 58). (See also AMS v AIF [1999] HCA 26; 199 CLR 160; 163 ALR 501; 73 ALJR 927 (17 June 1999) at [145], [191], [47] and U v U [2002] HCA 36; 211 CLR 238; 191 ALR 289; 76 ALJR 1416 (5 September 2002) at [144]-[145]). If parties cannot agree, they can ask the Court to make parenting orders, including:

- an order which allows the party to relocate with the child/ren or
- an order prohibiting the other party from relocating the child's residence outside of a certain area (for example, that the child's residence is not to be further than 30 kilometres from the child's current school, or that the child's residence is to be within a specific metropolitan area).

The Court may also make a recovery order where a party has unilaterally changed the place of residence of a child or children, requiring the return of the child.

Where allegations of domestic or family violence or child abuse are made, applications for orders allowing or prohibiting relocation are decided in the same manner as other parenting applications where there are allegations of family violence or child abuse; there is not a specific subcategory of application related to relocation (see Cowley & Mendoza [2010] FamCA 597 (16 July 2010)). The best interests of the child are always the paramount consideration (section 60CA FLA; section 66A FCA), a primary consideration in determining a child's best interests is the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm, from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence (which is given greater weight than the benefit to the child of a meaningful relationship with both parents) section 60CC FLA; section 66C FCA and the Family Courts are required to consider the risk of family violence section 60CG FLA, section 66G FCA. The considerations are the same whether the application is to relocate intrastate, interstate or internationally.

Relocation cases can be 'amongst the most difficult decisions for family court judges' [George & Gallwe 2016] due to their highly sensitive nature [ALRC 2010]. There is a high incidence of family violence in relocation applications. A 2012 study of litigated relocation disputes characterised 80% of relationships as 'high conflict or abusive' [Kaspier et al 2011].

In some cases, family violence is a driving factor behind relocation. For example, in Stringer & Nissen (No 2) [2019] FamCAFC 185, the mother unilaterally relocated to another town to escape family violence by the father without consent to remove the child from the risk of exposure to family violence. The Full Court of the Family Court of Australia overturned interim orders that the parties have equal shared parental responsibility and that if the mother did not return to their prior town and live with the child, the child live with the father). The Full Court found that the interim hearing judge did not appropriately weigh the mother's allegations of family violence, concerns for the father's alcohol abuse and an existing protection order when determining the child's best interests. Furthermore, if family violence was appropriately found, the presumption for equal shared parental responsibility would not have applied, resulting in an alternative parenting outcome in favour of the relocated mother. Ainslie-Wallace J noted that the conclusion that the child's best interests were to live in the first town was effectively a coercive order which required the mother to return to the father's place of residence.

In Russell & Russell [2012] FamCA 99 (7 March 2012) Young J allowed a mother who alleged a history of violence perpetrated by the father to return with the child to India, despite the father's stated intention to remain in Australia regardless of the Court's decision. The mother had limited English skills, poor work prospects and no family support in Australia and there was a high level of conflict between the parties exacerbated by cultural issues. Both parties' extended families remained in India. Young J found the presumption of shared parental responsibility was rebutted due to the conflict between the parties, their lack of communication and cultural issues.

A 2016 English study reported that unsuccessful applicants to relocation disputes often felt like courts had "put [their] abuser right back in control" when deciding to increase other-parent contact, rather than allow relocation [George & Gallwe 2016]. In its 2010 report, the Australian Law Reform Commission also noted that victims may not feel safe from violence if they remain proximate to their abuser [ALRC 2010], or isolated from support systems located elsewhere.

Relocation - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—Improving Legal Frameworks, Consultation Paper 1 (2010).

Abstract: Following a 2009 National Council Report, the Australian Law Reform Commission ('ALRC') inquired into the interaction between state and territory family violence and child protection laws and the federal Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

The ALRC notes that relocation disputes are highly sensitive, as "refusing to make relocation orders in situations involving family violence has serious repercussions for the safety of victims and their children". It recognises that many relocation disputes are associated with unilateral moves after separation but prior to court proceedings. This may give rise to a recovery order under pt VII of the Family Law Act or the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention).

Behrens, J. & Bruce Smyth, Australian Family Court Decisions About Relocation: Parents' Experience and Some Implications for Law and Policy. (2010) 38 Federal Law Review 1-20.

The project reports on in-depth semi-structured interviews with parents (11 mothers and 27 fathers) who had a contested court order in relation to relocation between 2002 and mid–2005 and a detailed analysis and coding of judgments in relocation cases for the same period.

The themes that emerged from the interviews included:

- the pre-court circumstances were important in predicting outcome;
- a high prevalence of high conflict and/or abusive relationships predating the relocation dispute, including a significant minority of short, unhappy relationships with separation occurring during pregnancy or shortly after the birth of a single child;
- the relocation dispute was one of many sources of conflict and dispute between most parents we spoke with;
- smoother paths after relocation for parents who were in less high conflict relationships, and for whom this was really a 'relocation only dispute';

- relocation as a significant point of transition in parent–child relationships,
- those applying to relocate giving complex, multiple reasons for their decision, often including the poor quality of their relationship with the other parent.

Horsfall, Briony and Rae Kaspiew, 'Relocation in separated and non-separated families: Equivocal evidence from the social science literature' (2010) 24 AJFL 34.

Abstract: The article examines social science evidence relevant to the issue of relocation. It aims to identify and analyse the literature on the impact of relocation on children, young people and adults in separated and not separated families. The article concludes that relevant research is diverse and contested across psychological and social variables. Emergent themes from surveys of international studies and Australian family law court decisions include that socio-economic difficulties often underlie frequent relocation and significant negative outcomes, and that domestic violence is a potential issue in relocation disputes.

See in particular Part 3 on 'Domestic violence, post-separation parenting and relocation'. The article outlines United States based research by Bowermaster (1998) on relocation and family violence, which suggests that aspects of relocation disputes may be linked to "the greater likelihood of litigation in high conflict couples and the controlling tendencies of abusive husbands seeking to restrict women's movements" (p 49). The authors also note that Australian legal literature recognises the potential for abusive partners to engage in vexatious litigation as a means to exert control, which raises the possibility of children being exposed to the harms inflicted by family violence and for "relocation to be intended, in part, to protect a parent and children from further exposure" (p 50).

The article concludes that research investigating relocation in the particular context of parental separation is scarce, with limited social science literature being a barrier to accurately informing practice, policy and decision-making in the Australian context of relocation disputes.

Kaspiew, Rae, Juliet Behrens and Bruce Smyth, 'Relocation disputes in separated families prior to the 2006 reforms: An empirical study' [2011] (86) Family Matters 72.

Abstract: This article reports on the findings of a mixed-method research project that examined relocation cases litigated prior to the 2006 reforms to the family law system. The study was based on an analysis of 190 court judgments made between 2002 and 2004 in the Family Court of Australia, and qualitative interviews with 38 parties to relocation disputes between 2002 and mid-2005. A key finding from the study is that most litigated disputes over relocation between separated partners occur in the context of fractured inter-parental relationships, being the product of conflict rather than the single source.

In particular, the article reports findings from the judgment sample that among litigated relocation disputes, 80% of relationships could be characterised as ‘high conflict or abusive’, with allegations of violence being raised in nearly 70% of cases (p 73). When asked of their reasons for relocating, 8% of litigants reported doing so to ‘escape family violence, threats or the drug scene’ (p7 4). The authors also highlighted the gendered nature of relocation disputes, with 88% of the parties who made the application being women (p 73).

See also findings from the interview sample that the majority of relationships described by parents were ‘marked by significant levels of conflict, with allegations of abuse and family violence relevant in the majority of cases’ (p 75). Of 38 participants, 24 reported significant conflict before, during and after the dispute (most of whom reported family violence and some alleged instances of child abuse). A smaller group of 4 participants were marked by the most severe levels of family violence and mental health problems, citing a ‘complete, or almost complete, diminution of contact between one parent and the children after the dispute’ (p 75).

The authors also note the need for greater empirical examination of parents’ and children’s experiences in relocation disputes (p 77).

Parkinson, Patrick, ‘The realities of relocation: Messages from judicial decisions’ (2008) 22 Australian Journal of Family Law 35.

Abstract: This article examines relocation decisions since the law changed in July 2006 to place a greater emphasis on the importance of involving both parents in the lives of children. The analysis of these 58 relocation cases indicates that it is harder for a primary caregiver to relocate than before the 2006 amendments. The authors note that in a number of the cases where a relocation was allowed, an order was also made for sole parental responsibility. The article also notes it is harder to justify a relocation overseas than within Australia.

The caselaw analysis demonstrates the importance of lawyers and mediators helping parents to 'reality test' the costs and benefits of a proposed relocation, and also to give realistic advice to a parent who wants to oppose a relocation. Issues for parents wanting to relocate include the risks of residential mobility, and the costs and burden of the children's travel. Issues for parents opposing a relocation include whether there would be a significant diminution in the quality of the relationship between the parent and child if the relocation occurred, whether there might be evidence of a history of violence, and whether it is reasonable and practicable for that parent to relocate also.

Parkinson, Patrick and Judith Cashmore, 'When Mothers Stay: Adjusting to Loss After Relocation Disputes' (2013) 47 (1) Family Law Quarterly 65.

This article reports on the experiences of fifteen mothers over a 4-5 year period following the conclusion of a relocation dispute where the initial application to move was unsuccessful. Eight of the surveyed mothers indicated that in hindsight, it had been better for their children to stay in close proximity to their father (all of whom said the children were "fairly" or "very" close to their father). The level of toxicity in the father-mother relationship was found to be one of four key factors affecting mothers' adjustment to the result.

See in particular that three of the four mothers who had not adjusted to being unable to relocate reported "high levels of acrimony or hostility" with the father (p 83-84). Hostility and anger were also reported by three mothers who had adjusted to the outcome. Toxicity in these relationships had varying causes, with several cases involving allegations of verbal and emotional abuse during the relationship and controlling behaviour post-separation.

See also findings at pp 69-70 that six of the fifteen surveyed mothers reported instances of family violence. Of these, one participant reported recurring violence throughout their cohabitation, a second reported a standalone incident of physical assault, a third reported the existence of a restraining order whilst cohabiting, and the remaining three reported having restraining orders post-separation.

International

Rob George & April Gallwe, 'How do parents experience relocation disputes in the family courts?' (2016) 38(4) Journal of Social Welfare and Family Law 394.

Abstract: This article reports the findings of an empirical study of parents who were involved in relocation disputes in England, expressing their views on the experience of being involved in such a case. The authors consider the origins of the disputes and parents' perceptions of how their cases were resolved, as well as some initial discussion of the aftermath of the cases as seen in the first few months.

The authors also note that relocation cases are known to be amongst the most difficult decisions for family court judges. See in particular p 405, where two mothers who had been subjected to violence and abuse by the relevant fathers described having their relocation request denied. In both cases, the court reinforced contact time between the father and children. This included one case where, although the father had a protection order made against him after stalking the mother, the court refused the relocation application and approved significant overnight contact each week with the father. The mother reported that this outcome felt as if they had "[put] our abuser right back in control".

Relocation - Other Resources

Children: Relocation, travel and the Hague Convention – Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (2021).

This page provides information for parents about reaching agreement about relocation, court applications which may be made where agreement cannot be reached, overseas travel and passports, that it is an offence to take or retain a child outside of Australia contrary to an order or authenticated written consent, agreeing to or preventing children being taken overseas, formalising travel arrangements, emergency court contact details, Hague convention applications and practice directions in relocation matters.

Children: Recovery orders - Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (2021).

Information on this page includes:

- What is a recovery order?
- Who can apply for a recovery order?
- How do I apply for a recovery order?
- How is a recovery order implemented?
- What is a location order?
- How do I apply for a location order (including a Commonwealth information order)?
- What is a publication order?
- My child has been taken overseas without my permission.

Relocation - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Bianca

Relocation - Cases

Stringer & Nissen (No. 2) [2019] FamCAFC 185 (23 October 2019) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

At [45], the Court found:

"The allegations of family violence, together with the mother's concern as to the father's alcohol abuse were matters on which she relied to demonstrate that it would not be in the child's best interests to live with the father and his Honour ignored a fundamental integer of the mother's case which was that there was a risk to the child from being exposed to family violence. The orders she sought for time would however, provide for the maintenance of the child's relationship with the father while he remained living with his mother. His Honour's approach was erroneous in principle and to the facts."

Behn & Ziomek [2019] FamCA 298 (10 May 2019) – Family Court of Australia

In allowing the mother's relocation with the child to her native Germany, McClelland DCJ held:

> There are, in my view, two elements to assessing whether the child faces an unacceptable risk in spending time with the father. The first is that the father has a history of engaging in controlling and coercive conduct in respect to the mother. The second is that the father's controlling nature has manifest itself in physical violence to the child. [200]

Russell & Russell [2012] FamCA 99 (7 March 2012) – Family Court of Australia

In finding the presumption of shared parental responsibility rebutted Young J observed:

> [334] Perhaps of more significance the submission was that he wholly minimised, failed to understand and acknowledge and had no comprehension of the extent of his violent actions and abuse of the wife, and largely in the presence of the child, as most events occurred in the one bedroom apartment where the family resided until separation.
>
> [335] I have found that the husband had intentionally lied on certain significant issues… I do not generally believe him on issues of violence.

[336] …there are areas where her evidence was likely exaggerated or misstated however on the issues of and relating to her role as a woman and wife, her husband's attitude towards her, ownership of the P apartment, the first termination and his ownership of her and various levels of violence and mistreatment I do accept the wife's evidence.

And in allowing the wife's relocation to India:

[432] As I have found that the wife should have a sole parental responsibility order, the child should live with her and both in his circumstances and for the wife, her security, wellbeing, happiness and future life she should be therefore permitted to relocate to India with the child.

[433] The proposal for her to remain as a long term resident in Australia, in all of her current and likely future circumstances is inappropriate and would not lead to a better and more fulfilling life and upbringing for the child.

Byrne & Krilly [2018] FCWA 158 (23 August 2018) – Family Court of Western Australia

In allowing the mother to relocate to Europe with the child in circumstances that the child and mother would be closer to both the child's maternal and paternal extended family Duncanson J noted:

[151] Ms C reported as to the mother describing a "bleak" future in terms of continuing to reside in Australia. The mother spoke of isolation and the need for support. I consider that a move to Europe would be beneficial to R as he is likely to gain from his mother's security and happiness.

And held:

[182] There was family violence between the parties during their relationship and following separation. [listing incidents including pushing the mother into a glass window, which broke, being argumentative and aggressive towards the mother when he drank to excess, repeatedly accusing her of infidelity, monitoring the mother by installing a camera in their ensuite, stalking the mother and sending text messages saying he knew where she was, refusing to allow her to leave a hotel room with the child]

[192] The mother described herself as isolated, trapped and afraid.

Duncanson J found:

> [217] The mother has acted protectively of R including through very difficult times. The father's mental health was unstable, the mother feared for her safety and that of R. She has been left traumatised. She feels isolated and strongly desires the support of family. Her desire to return to Europe to be with her family has not waned.
>
> [218] Having weighed all the factors carefully, I conclude that the mother should have permission to relocate R to Europe. I consider this to be in R's best interests. I am mindful of the impact on R of a separation from the father. Their relationship is developing well and I am satisfied that their relationship can be maintained and continue to develop from a distance. Further, an order permitting the mother to return to Europe with R will be beneficial to her mental health and is likely to enhance her parenting of R. Her happiness is likely to impact positively upon him.

Eddon and Eddon [2012] FCWA 104 (6 November 2012) – Family Court of Western Australia

In considering the need to protect the child from harm (in a case where the father's Hague Convention application had prompted the mother's consent to return to Australia pending the outcome of the FCWA proceedings), Thackray CJ noted:

> [111] I find that the father's abuse of the mother would have had an adverse impact on Samuel, both by being exposed to the abuse directly and by the impairment of the mother's capacity to care for him to the extent of her ability. The mother did what she could to protect Samuel from the abuse, while at the same time trying to save her marriage. In my view, she was justified in removing Samuel from the home and then later keeping him in the UK where both she and Samuel would be safe.
>
> [112} It is impossible to predict whether Samuel will be exposed to such abusive conduct by his father in the future. The difficulty with a person who is prepared to conduct himself in the way the father did in one relationship is that he may do so again in other relationships. In this regard it is noted that the father has recently commenced another relationship, although his girlfriend has not yet met Samuel and was not called as a witness. I draw no adverse inference about her not having been produced as a witness, but it remains a matter of concern whether the pattern of behaviour will be repeated.

In finding in favour of the mother's application to relocate to the United Kingdom Thackray CJ noted:

> [164] It is not the function of this Court to punish bad behaviour, but it is the function of this Court to deal with the consequences of it insofar as it impacts upon a child. Whilst it is an entirely unsatisfactory for Samuel to be removed from the company of a father who I consider has much to offer to him, the physical and emotional health of the child's primary carer is a matter of the utmost importance.
>
> [165] Whilst the outcome is difficult, it is also clear, namely that the mother should be permitted to return to her homeland to enjoy the company and support of her family while she seeks to recover from the abuse she has suffered.

Hobbs & Roth [2018] FCWA 163 (21 August 2018) – Family Court of Western Australia

In allowing the mother's uncontested application to relocate with the child from a regional Western Australian town to Perth, Duncanson J considered:

> [43] There has been family violence between the parties as set out above. There continues to be family violence between the father and Ms D. The mother's sister was assaulted by a relative of the father. The maternal grandmother was assaulted by a relative of the father's partner. The mother was involved in an assault with a friend of the father. These incidents occurred in Regional Town A. The mother seeks to remove herself from that environment.
>
> [44] L has been exposed to problems of excessive alcohol consumption and violence in Regional Town A. The mother also wishes to remove him from that environment.

And found:

> [51] There has been family violence between the parties. The presumption that it is in L's best interests that his parents have equal shared parental responsibility for him does not apply. I intend to order that the mother have sole parental responsibility for him. She is able to make decisions about long-term issues for him in the future.

Peak & Cleary [2017] FCWA 166 (24 November 2017) – Family Court of Western Australia

In allowing the mother's application to relocate overseas, Duncanson J considered the evidence of Dr Watts that child did not have the same deep attachment to the father as to the mother and noted:

[194] The parties' relationship was one characterised by severe family violence. The mother has been left traumatised, with a sense of entrapment aggravated by a financial dependency upon the father.

[200] Both parties have exposed S to family violence in the past. That would not be a cause for concern for S in the care of the mother in the future and provided she does not drink to excess, S will not be at risk in her care.

[201] The family violence perpetrated by the father upon the mother was severe and has left her psychologically damaged. S is not exposed to family violence in the care of the father at this time and provided he does not abuse alcohol and drugs, S will not be at risk in his care.

Duncanson J held:

[204] Having weighed all of the factors carefully I have concluded that the mother should have permission to relocate S to Country A. I consider this to be in S's best interests. It is likely that the relocation will enhance the mother's parenting of S and her own happiness is likely to have an impact positively upon him.

Recovery orders

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- amend the parenting order framework by refining the list of 'best interests' factors, removing the presumption of equal shared parental responsibility and related equal time and substantial and significant time provision, and clarifying the circumstances in which a court can vary an existing parenting order;
- redraft provisions relating to compliance with, and enforcement of, parenting orders;
- amend definitions relating to the concept of 'family' to be more inclusive of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture and traditions;
- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view;
- clarify restrictions on communicating identifiable information arising in family proceedings; and enable standards and requirements to be prescribed for professionals who prepare family reports;
- makes consequential amendments to the Child Support (Assessment) Act 1989 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021;

Amends the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021 to:

- allow registrars of the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (FCFCOA) to be delegated the power to impose a make-up time parent order in contravention proceedings;
- bring forward the review of the Act by 2 years;
- provide that a judge of the Family Court of Western Australia can be dually appointed as a judge of Division 1 of the FCFCOA; and

Amends Family Law Act 1975 and Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia Act 2021

- to introduce 'harmful proceedings orders' and extend the 'overarching purpose of family law practice and procedure' and the accompanying duty to all proceedings instituted under the Family Law Act 1975.

More information can be found here:

www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

A parent may act inconsistently with family court orders and unilaterally remove their children from, or fail to deliver, or refuse to return their children to the care of the other parent. Where there has been a history of family violence this may be done in an attempt to ensure their own safety and their children's safety and to escape the coercive and controlling behaviours of the abusive parent.

Alternatively, removing the children may be a form of family violence and be done in an attempt to exert, or extend, control over or "punish" the other parent.

Division 8, subdivision C of the Family Law Act (FLA) gives the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia and Division 8, subdivision 3 of the Family Court Act (FCA) gives the Family Court of Western Australia (collectively herein referred to as the "family law courts") the power to make orders for the location and recovery of children within Australia. If children are believed to have been taken outside Australia parties may need to consider whether it is possible to bring an application pursuant to the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction.

Where allegations of domestic or family violence or child abuse are made, family law courts considering applications for recovery orders must ensure the best interests of the child are always the paramount consideration (section 60CA FLA, section 66A FCA). A primary consideration in determining a child's best interests is the need to protect the child from physical or psychological harm, from being subjected to, or exposed to, abuse, neglect or family violence (which is given greater weight than the benefit to the child of a meaningful relationship with both parents) (section 60CC FLA; section 66C FCA). The Family Courts are also required to consider the risk of family violence (section 60CG FLA, section 66G FCA).

Where a child has been taken or moved within Australia from a person with parental responsibility, a recovery order may be sought, usually on an urgent basis: Atkinson v Atkinson [2017] FamCAFC 266 (13 December 2017). Recovery orders may also authorise stop and search, entry powers and the use of force to recover the child (section 67Q FLA; section 149 FCA). Pursuant to section 67U FLA; section 153 FCA the family law courts may make such recovery order as the court deems proper.

Family violence is commonly reported by parties to recovery proceedings and is often a critical factor underpinning judicial decisions. The contested and private nature of such allegations often complicates interim recovery hearings where evidence remains untested. For example, Wilson J upheld the mother's appeal against the father's recovery order in Pollard and Nordberg [2019] FamCA 365 (7 June 2019) on the basis of family violence allegations against him, despite no expert report being admitted.

> If I dismiss the mother's appeal, the recovery order will operate in such a way that the children are physically, and if necessary, forcibly, returned by police to the father in Victoria. If the allegations of family violence are proved at trial, that means I will order the children to be returned to a violent environment. It must not be overlooked that the mother has alleged that the father has been violent to the children, independently of the allegations of his violent behaviour towards the mother. I refuse to make an interim order returning the children to the father in circumstances where the father may at trial be found to have engaged in family violence. In my judgment this court must act protectively towards the children and remove them from any risk associated with family violence. To do so is consistent with the imperative recorded in s 60CC(2A). [155]

Australian research suggests a connection between family violence and involvement in recovery applications. A 2022 study found that family violence and safety concerns were common drivers behind non-compliance with parenting orders, including unilaterally removing children [Kaspiew et al 2022]. A 2015 study of separated parents found that 20 per cent of mothers held safety concerns as a result of ongoing contact, with 63 per cent of those reporting previous attempts to limit the child's contact with the other parent as a result of such concerns [Kaspiew et al 2015]. However, in other cases, parents who previously experienced family violence may seek to escape their ex-partner, even where the perpetrator's contact with the children (and child contact handovers) can be made safe [Parkinson 2013].

Research also indicates that threats of enforcement litigation or non-compliance with parenting orders, such as threats of abduction, can form part of a pattern of control [Kaspiew et al 2022].

Recovery orders - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—Improving Legal Frameworks, Consultation Paper 1 (2010).

Abstract: Following a 2009 National Council Report, the Australian Law Reform Commission ('ALRC') inquired into the interaction between state and territory family violence and child protection laws and the federal Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

The ALRC notes that relocation disputes are highly sensitive, as "refusing to make relocation orders in situations involving family violence has serious repercussions for the safety of victims and their children". It recognises that many relocation disputes are associated with unilateral moves after separation but prior to court proceedings. This may give rise to a recovery order under pt VII of the Family Law Act or the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (ANROWS, 2022).

Abstract: This report presents findings from a research study which examines compliance with and the enforcement of parenting orders. The study is based on a survey of 343 professionals and 11 judicial officers from Australian Family Law courts. The relevant findings indicate that the drivers of non-compliance with parenting orders are complex. Systemic issues contribute, including shortcomings in the responses to family violence, safety concerns and limitations on the participation of children and young people.

The article raises two main issues relating to the enforcement regime. Firstly, there is potential for punitive responses to contraventions to disincentivise parents from seeking safer parenting orders. Secondly, there is potential for enforcement litigation to become part of an ongoing family violence dynamic, marked by a pattern of coercive control. From this perspective, non-compliance or legal action in relation to contravention may play a factor in ongoing abuse. In response to enquiries about the dynamics of families alleging contraventions, 66% of surveyed professionals reported that ongoing parental conflict applied to at least three quarters of relevant clients, followed by 46% reporting family violence and 22% reporting other safety concerns. A high percentage of professionals with family violence training nominated other reasons for parental non-compliance, including that it was no longer safe for the child or contravening party to comply with an order. Almost one fifth of surveyed professionals referred to circumstances relating to family violence and safety concerns and “justifiable non-compliance” in these circumstances (p 49).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, ‘Experiences of Separated Parents Study’ (Evaluation of 2012 Family Violence Amendments)’ (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Abstract: This report sets out the findings of a core element of the Evaluation the 2012 Family Violence Amendments project—the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS). This research is based on a comparison of data from two cross-sectional samples of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents (SRSP): the 6,119 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2012, who used family law system services in 2011; and the 6,079 parents surveyed in the SRSP 2014, who experienced the system in 2013. The family violence amendments introduced by the Family Law Legislation Amendment (Family Violence and Other Measures) Act 2011 came substantially into effect on 7 June 2012, meaning the SRSP 2012 survey represents parents’ pre-reform experiences and the SRSP 2014 their post-reform experiences. The SRSP 2012 and 2014 studies found that family violence is a common experience among separated parents, with a majority of participating parents in both cohorts reporting either physical or emotional abuse.

See in particular section 3.7.1, titled ‘Reports of current safety concern’ (pp 43-45). 17% of parents in the SRSP 2014 reported having concerns about their child’s and their own safety as a result of ongoing contact with the focus parent (consistent with SRSP 2012). This was significantly higher among mothers than fathers (mothers: 20%; fathers: 15%). Of those parents reporting safety concerns, around half in both studies reported that they had tried to limit the focus child’s contact with the focus parent because of these concerns; with mothers reporting at twice the rate of fathers (2012—mothers: 62% cf. fathers: 28%; 2014—mothers: 63% cf. fathers: 36%). Participating parents were not asked whether they lived overseas or cohabited at the relevant times of limiting contact.

Laing, Lesley, No Way to Live: Women’s Experiences of Negotiating the Family Law System in the Context of Domestic Violence (Faculty of Education and Social Work, University of Sydney, 2010).

Abstract: This research reports on the experiences of 22 women who were involved in the family law system following their separation from a relationship in which they had experienced domestic violence.

In particular, see the section titled ‘The emotional toll on women’ (p14-15) that outlines reports by women of feeling trapped due to their ex-partner using care issues to continue exercising control. One excerpt reads that: “He’s always there and I hate the – he’s got a say in my life for the next 18 years. Like if I want to move for work – like he doesn’t work, I do work. If I want to move for work, I pretty much have to ask him for permission. I can’t take the [children] with me” (p 14).

The author also outlines mothers’ reports of problems with the coordinated response to child protection at p 16, including barriers to contact services and a lack of ongoing case management of complex and high risk cases. This was found to result in mothers being left with the sole option of returning to the Family Courts if they continued to have fears for their child’s safety, which often depended upon financial resources or the availability of Legal Aid.

Parkinson, Patrick , ‘Violence, abuse and the limits of shared parental responsibility’ [2013] (92) Family Matters 7.

Abstract: This article argues that while supporting the maintenance of a child’s relationship with both parents is suitable for most separated parents, limitations on joint parental responsibility are also appropriate in cases where there are family violence concerns.

See especially the part on ‘Two safety priorities’ (p 14-15), which notes that a parent’s experience of coercive controlling violence may explain their resistance to regular contact between the child and the father, even if contact can be made safe through contact handovers. It may also explain the parent’s ‘desire to relocate a long way from the other parent when there is not another convincing rationale for the move other than to get away’ (p 14).

Recovery orders - Other Resources

Family Court of Western Australia, Recovery orders.

Open via Family Court of Western Australia website

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, Children: Recovery orders.

Abstract: Open via Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia of Australia website

Recovery orders - Cases

Atkinson v Atkinson [2017] FamCAFC 266 (13 December 2017) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

In finding that the primary judge did not err in failing to appoint a single expert before making interim orders including a recovery order after the father retained the child Ryan J noted (Johnston and Thackray JJ agreeing):

> [49] …the mother's application was for a recovery order after the father retained the child. The application demanded a prompt response and in my view an adjournment for in all probability many months would not have been in the best interests of the child.

Pollard and Nordberg [2019] FamCA 365 (7 June 2019) – Family Court of Australia

Wilson J upheld the mother's appeal against the father's recovery order on the basis of family violence allegations against him, despite no expert report being admitted:

> [155]If I dismiss the mother's appeal, the recovery order will operate in such a way that the children are physically, and if necessary, forcibly, returned by police to the father in Victoria. If the allegations of family violence are proved at trial, that means I will order the children to be returned to a violent environment. It must not be overlooked that the mother has alleged that the father has been violent to the children, independently of the allegations of his violent behaviour towards the mother. I refuse to make an interim order returning the children to the father in circumstances where the father may at trial be found to have engaged in family violence. In my judgment this court must act protectively towards the children and remove them from any risk associated with family violence. To do so is consistent with the imperative recorded in s 60CC(2A).

Hague Convention international return and removal of children

The Family Law Amendment Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The Bill amends the Family Law Act 1975 to:

- permit the appointment of independent children's lawyers (ICLs) in matters brought under the Hague Convention and require ICLs to meet with a child and give them an opportunity to express a view.

More information can be found here:
https://www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_Legislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7011

The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (the "Hague Convention") is an international agreement which provides a means for recovery of or access to children outside of Australia. The Family Law (Child Abduction Convention) Regulations 1986 (Cth) ("the Regulations") give effect to section 111B of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) which enable both the performance of Australia's obligations, and the ability of Australia to obtain benefits under the Hague Convention.

The Hague Convention is a multilateral treaty, which provides a procedure for the prompt return of children unilaterally removed or retained away from their country of habitual residence so that parenting disputes can be decided in the jurisdiction where the children are habitually resident. An application under the Hague Convention for the return of a child can only be made to or from a country that is party to the Convention. Unlike most treaties, the Hague Convention requires other states to accept accessions to the Convention. The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction is in force between Australia and the countries listed here.

Article 13(b) of the Hague Convention provides that a country may deny a return request if "there is a grave risk that [the child's] return would expose the child to physical or psychological harm or otherwise place the child in an intolerable situation." The best interests of the child is not a paramount consideration De L v Director-General Department of Community Services (NSW) [1996] HCA 5; 187 CLR 640; 70 ALJR 532; 136 ALR 201 (10 October 1996).

The dual objectives of the Hague Convention are the "promotion of the return of the child to the state of habitual residence" and "taking measures to prevent child abduction" (per Watts J in Walpole & Secretary, Department of Communities and Justice [2020] FamCAFC 65, [87]). It is possible, however, that Hague Convention applications may be used by a perpetrator of domestic or family violence, to coerce or attempt to coerce the return of an abused partner when they have escaped a situation of danger. Australian and international research indicates that most respondents to Hague Convention applications are now primary care-giving mothers [Freeman & Taylor 2020], many of whom seek to escape domestic and family violence or child abuse [Bozin 2016]. The requirement to demonstrate "grave risk" or that the return would "place the child in an intolerable situation" can be difficult to meet, even where there is a documented history of family violence and child safety concerns.

In the leading Australian case of Murray & Director of Family Services ACT [1993] FamCA 103; (1993) FLC 92-416, (1993) 16 Fam LR 982 the court refused an appeal seeking to prevent the return of children to New Zealand in circumstances where the father was a member of a Dunedin motorcycle gang and the mother alleged a serious history of and threats of domestic violence towards her. The court expressed the view that the powers to prevent return should be limited to the most extreme cases of risk, noting there was nothing in a return order requiring the mother to return, or for her or the children to reside in the same part of New Zealand as the father, and that it was offensive to suggest New Zealand courts and authorities would be unable to protect the mother and children from any risk of return.

In the more recent case of Walpole & Secretary, Department of Communities and Justice [2020] FamCAFC 65 a mother, who had fled from New Zealand and moved to Australia to escape an abusive partner with a history of child abuse with the assistance of New Zealand police, was initially ordered to return her children to New Zealand when the first instance judge accepted she was separated from the father and that she would return to New Zealand where the children could reside with her. This failed to take into account her history of returning to the abusive relationship, in spite of the disclosure of a protection order in favour of the mother. Ryan and Aldridge JJ criticised the role of the Secretary of the Department of Communities and Justice (NSW) as the Central Authority in pursuing the Hague Convention application matter while failing to obtain the full criminal antecedents or child protection records of the father whom it was aware had left Australia under threat of deportation, necessitating the lesser resourced mother to obtain his Australian and New Zealand antecedents and child protection records for the purposes of her appeal.

Hague Convention international return and removal of children - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence—Improving Legal Frameworks, Consultation Paper 1 (2010).

Following a 2009 National Council Report, the Australian Law Reform Commission inquired into the interaction between state and territory family violence and child protection laws and the federal Family Law Act 1975 (Cth).

It identified that many relocation disputes are associated with unilateral international moves after separation but prior to court proceedings. This may give rise to a recovery order under pt VII of the Family Law Act or the Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (Hague Convention). The Hague Convention is a multilateral treaty, which seeks to protect children from the harmful effects of abduction and retention across international boundaries by providing a procedure to bring about their prompt return. There is an exception to the requirement for the immediate return of a child, however, if it is established that the child would be exposed to physical or psychological harm or otherwise be placed in an intolerable situation.

Bozin, Danielle, 'The Hague Child Abduction Convention's Grave Risk of Harm Exception: Traversing the Tightrope and Maintaining Balance between Comity and the Best Interests of the Child' (2016) 35(1) University of Tasmania Law Review 24-42, doi: 10.3316/INFORMIT.135379927197544

This article provides a critical analysis of divergent judicial opinions about how Australian courts should interpret the 'grave risk of harm' exception in the Hague Convention on Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. Conflicting views about the extent to which the exception to a child's return should permit consideration of a child's best interests may be a manifestation of the 'balancing act' that must be performed during return proceedings. The Convention seeks to protect children from the harmful effects of international parental child abduction through prompt return, whilst also accommodating situations where non-return is justified on welfare considerations.

See in particular that since the Convention's creation, there has been a trend away from abducting by non-custodial fathers to abducting by primary-caregiving mothers. The article notes that abducting mothers are often “principally motivated by a need to flee domestic violence and/or child abuse”, as well as a desire to return to their homeland, family and social support networks (p30). The article concludes that given that the ‘grave risk of harm’ exception is most often raised in circumstances of alleged domestic and family violence, how Australian courts interpret this exception is particularly important.

Chisholm, R & Fehlberg, B. (2022) The High Court and family law: The Hague child abduction cases. Australian Journal of Family law, 35: 39-67.

This paper provides a short overview and history of the Hague convention. It then reviews the six Hague cases that the High Court has decided and considers their contribution:

- De L v Director-General, New South Wales Dept of Community Services (1996) 187 CLR 640; (1996) 20 Fam LR 390; FLC 92–706; [1996] HCA 5
- DP v Commonwealth Central Authority (2001) 206 CLR 401; (2001) 27 Fam LR 569; (2001) FLC 93-081; [2001] HCA 39
- JLM v Director-General, NSW Department of Community Services (2001) 206 CLR 401; (2001) 27 Fam LR 569; (2001) FLC 93-081; [2001] HCA 39
- MW v Director-General of the Department of Community Services (2008) 244 ALR 205; 82 ALJR 629; 39 Fam LR 1; [2008] HCA 12
- LK v Director-General Department of Community Services (2009) 237 CLR 582; 2009) 40 Fam LR 495; [2009] HCA 9
- RCB v Forrest (2012) 292 ALR 617; 48 Fam LR 236; [2012] HCA 47

International

Freeman, Marilyn and Nicola Taylor, ‘Domestic violence and child participation: contemporary challenges for the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention’ (2020) 42(2) Journal of Social Welfare and Family Law 154, (UK) doi: 10.1080/09649069.2020.1751938

This article addresses two contemporary challenges for the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention: (i) domestic violence and (ii) child participation. The published literature on these topics, including the children’s objections exception, is explored, as are the ways in which these challenges are addressed within some of the Contracting States to the Convention and through the Guide to Good Practice on Article 13(1)(b). Other current international initiatives are discussed, including the development of a child-friendly version of the Convention through The International Association of Child Law Researchers, as well as certain Contracting States (ie Switzerland and japan) including provisions specific to domestic violence in their enabling legislation.

The authors note that domestic violence and its treatment under the Convention have become critical issues in recent years, as the profile of abductors has shifted from non-custodial fathers to primary and joint primary carer mothers. Many of these women abduct to escape family violence or abuse. The article summarises existing literature at p 155 that the tension between discouraging child abduction and protecting victims of domestic violence manifests in the 'unjust treatment of domestic-violence victims under the Hague Convention' (Quillen 2014).

Trimmings, Katarina, Onyója Momoh, 'Intersection between Domestic Violence and International Parental Child Abduction: Protection of Abducting Mothers in Return Proceedings' (2021) 35(1) International Journal of Law, Policy and the Family 1-19 (UK).

The focus of the article is on the intersection between domestic violence and parental child abduction. In particular, it considers the interpretation of the Article 13(1)(b) 'grave risk of harm' defence in cases involving allegations of domestic violence by the abducting mother against the left-behind father, and on the protection of such abducting mothers in return proceedings. The content of the article is divided into two substantive parts. The first part explores the courts' approach to the grave risk of harm exception to return in circumstances where allegations of domestic violence have been raised. The second part of the article examines the courts' approach to protective measures, including undertakings, in child abduction cases involving allegations of domestic violence.

Vesneski, William M. et al, 'U.S. Judicial Implementation of the Hague Convention in Cases Alleging Domestic Violence' (2011) 62(2) Juvenile Family Court Journal 1-20, doi: 10.1111/j.1755-6988.2011.01058.x

This qualitative study examined U.S. legal cases where abused mothers living abroad fled with their children to the United States. These women subsequently faced child abduction lawsuits brought by their abuser. The cases are governed by the Hague Convention. Using content analysis, the study analysed 47 published U.S. state and federal judicial opinions involving the Convention and allegations of domestic violence. It finds that U.S. courts are reluctant to employ Convention provisions that could prevent children from being returned to their mother's abuser.

The Article emphasises that transnational family relationships have become more common in the past thirty years. The article notes that for abused women with children, ending these relationships is exceedingly complicated and thus mothers often turn to family members for assistance in repairing their lives. The authors also recognise that because the Convention focuses exclusively on children, it does not explicitly recognize domestic violence between children's parents as a reason to deny children's return to the habitual residence, even if return means placement with the children's abusive parent. This gap in the Convention is significant, because social science research suggests that many families experience both domestic violence and child maltreatment. The authors view that this gap "falls short of accounting for the actual, lived experience of battered women and their children" (p 16) and patterns of coercion inherent in domestic violence that prevent a woman from participating in decisions about where she and her children live.

The article concludes that "the failure of the Hague Convention and its U.S. implementation to recognize these dynamics creates an additional barrier to safety for women seeking to protect themselves from a violent partner" (p 16).

Zashin, Andrew A, Domestic violence by proxy: a framework for considering a child's return under the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of Child Abduction's Article 13(b) Grave risk of harm cases post Monasky, (2021) 33 Journal of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers 571-592.

This review considers American cases that have interpreted the 'grave risk of harm 'test. The author observes that one can not separate undisputed violence from the habitual residence considerations (p574). The author observes that some US courts 'have aligned in their analysis of more severe fact patterns (e.g., agreeing that sexual abuse to a child is sufficient to create the grave risk of harm), the courts have continuously met cases of domestic violence with confusion and dissonance.' (p585) The author observes that grave risk cases can create a spectrum of harm, and where cases fall on the spectrum can illuminate the zone of danger. On one end are cases evidencing a grave risk of harm due to the psychological and physical abuse endured by a minor child, and on the other are cases where no abuse to the minor child or spouse exist, but where a respondent parent argues that factors relative to the environment of the habitual residence create a grave risk of harm (p587).

Hague Convention international return and removal of children

- Other Resources

Australian Government, Attorney-General's Department, International family law and children.

This page provides information on the Hague Convention and links to resources for people in Australia, including:

- International parental child abduction—find out what you can do if your child has been, or may be, abducted to another country.
- International child access—find out how to make an application for access to a child under the Hague Child Abduction Convention or Australia's bilateral agreements with Egypt and Lebanon.
- Registration of overseas child orders—find out how to have overseas child court orders registered in Australia, or Australian orders registered in other countries.
- Information for responding parents—information for parents who have brought their child to Australia and may need to respond to a Hague Convention application for the return of their child to another country. Also, information if you are required to return your child to Australia by a court order or if you are voluntarily returning your child to your home country (habitual residence), including information on emergency housing, financial assistance, counselling and support services.
- International child protection—for information on the 1996 Hague Child Protection Convention.
- Support and assistance—contact details and links to organisations that can provide support in Hague matters.

Australian Government, Attorney-General's Department, Guide for applicants - Applying for the return of a child under the Hague Convention.

The guide helps applicants to understand what requirements must be satisfied to meet the terms of the convention.

Australian Government, Attorney-General's Department, Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction.

The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction is the main international agreement that covers international parental child abduction. It provides a process through which a parent can seek to have their child returned to their home country. The Australian Central Authority in the Attorney-General's Department is responsible for administering the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. The Australian Central Authority is only able to provide assistance in relation to children in a Hague Convention country, and the Hague Convention is in force between Australia and that country.

The Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction is in force between Australia and the countries listed on this website.

Australian Government, Attorney-General's Department, International parental child abduction.

This site provides information on international parental child abduction including:

- If your child has been abducted from Australia—what should you do?
- Application process for the return of an abducted child to Australia
- Bilateral agreements with Egypt and Lebanon
- If your child is at risk of being abducted from Australia:
  - Stopping your child leaving Australia
  - Preventing the issuing of a passport to your child
  - If you are thinking of taking your child overseas
- Hague Convention application statistics

It also includes a diagram of the application process for return of an abducted child to Australia.

Federal Circuit Court and Family Court of Australia, Children: Relocation, travel and the Hague Convention.

This fact sheet contains links to the Commonwealth Attorney General's Department information on the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction and advises:

> If a child you have parental responsibility for has left Australia without your permission, you should contact the Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department on 1800 100 480 or go to [AG International child abduction] International parental child abduction for more information.
>
> For a list of applicable countries, and more information about the Hague Convention, see the Hague Convention page on the website of the Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department.
>
> If your child is in another country, you may want to seek private legal advice in that country about your options. The Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade may be able to assist left-behind parents in accessing an English-speaking lawyer in a non-Hague country.

Hague Convention international return and removal of children

- Cases

HZ & State Central Authority [2006] FamCA 466 (7 June 2006) – Family Court of Australia

The court acknowledged the limitations of the Hague Convention in cases where domestic and family violence is alleged:

[48] The operation of the Convention which has the effect of potentially sending a mother back into a situation of risk to her own physical wellbeing has been a matter of significant academic criticism…

[75]…As we have already indicted, the return of these children to Greece was anticipated to be in their mother's company. She had found accommodation for herself remote from that of the father. She led no evidence to suggest that the Greek authorities would be unable to provide her and the children with appropriate protection pending her utilising lawful means to relocate the children from Greece. The finding by the trial Judge that the mother had not persuaded her that the return of the children to Greece would raise a grave risk of harm to the children or otherwise place them in an intolerable situation was a finding clearly open to the trial Judge.

[78]…Given that these were children who were born in Greece and had spent effectively the entirety of their life in Greece until the mother unilaterally determined to retain them in Australia, Greece was clearly the appropriate forum for issues relating to the welfare of these children to be determined. In those circumstances it was appropriate for her Honour to place significant weight on the first of the objects referred to in Article 1 of the Convention namely the prompt return of the children who had been wrongfully retained in Australia.

Murray & Director of Family Services ACT [1993] FamCA 103 (6 October 1993) – Family Court of Australia

The Full Court in rejecting the mother's appeal characterised the evidence as:

"almost entirely directed at the prospective threat to the wife of a return to New Zealand and more particularly to a return by her to Dunedin."[170]

They said:

[171] Whilst there is nothing that requires the wife to return to New Zealand, it is obviously desirable and from the point of view of the children that she does so. However, there is no requirement imposed by this court that she or they must return to Dunedin. It is open for her to return to another part of New Zealand where the danger to her may be less and it is of course open to her to seek orders from the New Zealand courts both for personal protection and interim and final custody immediately upon her arrival in New Zealand. She can also, if she wishes, seek leave from the New Zealand court to take the children to Australia.

[172] As his Honour pointed out, New Zealand has a system of family law and provides legal protection to persons in fear of violence which is similar to the system in Australia.

[173] It would be presumptuous and offensive in the extreme for a court in this country to conclude that the wife and the children are not capable of being protected by the New Zealand courts or that relevant New Zealand authorities would not enforce protection orders which are made by the courts.

[174] In our view and in accordance with the views expressed by this Court in Gsponer's case [Gsponer v Director General, Department Community Services Victoria (1989) FLC 92-001], the circumstances in which Regulation 16(3) comes into operation should be largely confined to situations where such protections are not available…

[175] For us to do otherwise would be to act on untested evidence to thwart the principal purposes of the Hague Convention which are to discourage child abduction and where such abduction has occurred to return such children to the country of habitual residence so the courts of that country can determine where or with whom their best interests lie. These children are New Zealand citizens who have lived all their lives in New Zealand and it is for a New Zealand court to determine their future.

Walpole & Secretary, Department of Communities and Justice* [2020] FamCAFC 65 (25 March 2020) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

Ryan and Aldridge JJ criticised the role of the Secretary of the Department of Communities and Justice (NSW) as the Central Authority in pursuing the Hague Convention application matter while failing to obtain the full criminal antecedents of the father whom it was aware had effectively been deported from Australia:

[79] 'In this case, the application disclosed the father's final term of imprisonment in NSW. Even though the Requesting Authority knew that the father was permanently banned from Australia, had effectively been deported and had lived in New Zealand for many years, it would seem that no attempt was made to establish his criminal antecedents or the involvement (if any) of child protection agencies in New Zealand in relation to his other children. The same applies in NSW. To be fair, the Requesting Authority and the Central Authority disclosed the mother's application for a protection order and thereby flagged that, on the mother's case, serious risk issues arose.'

[80] 'It is our understanding that systems are in place in NSW which enable the Central Authority to access/request information from the NSW Police. We assume New Zealand operates in the same fashion. Thus, the Requesting Authority and Central Authority were able to examine and present the father's complete criminal history and an entire set of COPS records. Instead, it was left to the mother and the ICL to gather records from New Zealand and domestically. It is no small thing to obtain records from abroad, particularly when time constraints are tight. Fortunately, the mother was granted legal aid, but, what we ask, if she was not? How would this young mother on social security benefits have managed to place this vitally important evidence before the court? The prospect that she would not have been able to do so is obvious.'

Wolfe & Director-General, Department of Human Services [2011] FamCAFC 42 (4 March 2011) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

Bryant CJ, Finn and May JJ noted the first instance judge's comments with approval:

"[i]n part, she relied on her own refusal to establish that a return of the children would place them in an intolerable situation". Her Honour disposed of this aspect of the mother's case by saying, correctly, in our view, that "[i]t is well established that, ordinarily, the objects of the Convention should not be frustrated by a parent's refusal to return with children to their country of habitual residence". [32]

Parental alienation

In general, the court will focus on the behaviour and conduct of children and their parents and carers rather than attempting to label behaviour and then take the label into account in determining appropriate orders.

The family law system has a range of tools to support an informed assessment of claims about child or parental conduct, through legislation, case law, judicial discretion and access to and testing of evidence from expert witnesses.

When a child does not wish to see one or both parents, this is one of the situations in which it is recommended that an independent children's lawyer should be appointed in a family law matter to assess the reasons for this (Re K Appeal [1994] FamCA 21; (1994) FLC 92-461).

In some matters, the phrase 'parental alienation' is raised by parties. There is considerable variation in opinion on what this phrase means. The phrase 'is employed by some professionals to describe parental conduct in separated families where the children are, apparently without good reason, reluctant or resistant to spending time with one parent' [Rathus 2020]. While the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Violence Against Women has described parental alienation as a 'pseudo-concept', their Report states that 'broadly speaking, parental alienation is understood to refer to deliberate or unintentional acts that cause unwarranted rejection by the child towards one of the parents, usually the father' [UN General Assembly 2023].

The phrase is not used or defined in any Australian legislation; however family courts have recognised:

- the phrase 'parental alienation' does not have one accepted meaning - McGregor and McGregor (2012) 47 Fam LR 498, 47,
- the conduct of one parent that obstructs contact of a child with another parent must be considered in the context in which it occurs – Carter and Wilson [2023] FedCFamC1A 9.

The phrase 'parental alienation' may be misused in family law matters as a tool to either minimise the court's focus on the actions of an abusive parent, or to mischaracterise the non-abusive parent's efforts to protect [UN OHCHR SR 2022] the child. For example, the Queensland Women's Safety and Justice Taskforce, in its enquiry into coercive control and domestic and family violence in Queensland, found that 'mothers who act protectively in the best interests of their children to limit the contact their children have with a perpetrator-father are often accused of parental alienation within the family law system' [Women's Safety and Justice Taskforce 2021]. This tactic can penalise family violence victims for alleging abuse and uphold impunity for perpetrators of family violence [UN OHCHR SR 2022].

The lack of a consistent understanding of the phrase 'parental alienation' can lead to inappropriate outcomes in circumstances where the behaviour or rejection of a parent might be understandable, appropriate and / or justified – for example, one parent acting to protect a child from an abusive parent, or a child refusing contact because they are scared of the parent.

Therefore, in order to understand the parent's or child's behaviour, it is essential to consider the behaviour in context. For example, is one parent seeking to protect their child from the abuse of another parent? Is the child influenced by other factors such as their developmental stage; prolonged absence of a parent; normal adjustment difficulties with family transition; loyalty conflicts; and sibling influences? [Johnston and Sullivan, 2020]. Is the parent's behaviour part of a pattern of abuse?

Where one parent actively tries to turn a child against the other parent, for no legitimate reason, this behaviour may have significant negative impacts on the child's development and mental health [Kruk 2018], as well as the mental health of the parent who has not had contact with the child [Lee-Maturana et al 2019]. However, ordering a child to have contact with an abusive parent may also have damaging effects on the child [UN General Assembly 2023].

In circumstances where a child does not wish to see one of both parents 'reunification therapy' may be raised by a party/legal representative or expert witness. However, this term appears to mean a range of different things when raised in family law matters. Furthermore, there is a lack of empirical support for the effectiveness [Rhoades 2022] of some therapies that are described as 'reunification therapy' [Trane, Champion, Kelly 2022]. Notably 'some teenagers have reported adverse effects of programs they attended, and there is evidence that there is danger to some who are placed with abusive parents and prevented from having contact with … other family members who could monitor their well-being' [Mercer and Drew 2022].

Parental alienation syndrome (PAS) [Ralton and Ralton 2017] is not a recognised psychiatric disorder in the scientific community [Joint Select Committee 2021] (and was removed from the International Classification of Diseases by the World Health Organization in 2020 [UN General Assembly 2023].)

Parental alienation - Key Literature

Australia

Joint Select Committee, Second interim report: Improvements in family law proceedings, (2021: Commonwealth of Australia).

[4.84] As highlighted in the first interim report, the committee heard a diverse range of views on the extent to which a parent can be alienated from their children by another parent or family member. The committee acknowledges that parental alienation syndrome is not a recognised psychiatric disorder within the scientific community.

[4.85] The committee has heard evidence of a number of instances where a parent has denied the other parent access to their children, for no apparent reason other than spite or to achieve greater financial outcomes. In contrast, the committee has also heard that there can be a perception that parental alienation is occurring when there are actually other factors in play, such as family violence. The committee were also told by the Australian Institute of Family Studies that parental alienation was not something that was apparent in their research: … I would say that it's not an issue that's emerged in the context of our very extensive research in the family law and family violence space.

Committee view

[4.87] The committee acknowledges that there are instances where one parent will deny access to and seek to turn a child against the other parent after the relationship breaks down. In many cases, there will be a substantive reason for this behaviour, though that may not always be the case. The committee considers that better education around family dynamics and family violence for professionals in the family court system will assist the court to identify cases where parental alienation is occurring or where a parent is legitimately seeking to protect their child from harm. The committee has recommended that family law professionals undertake training in a number of areas, including family violence, complex trauma, family systems and the dynamics of parental alienation at Recommendation 15.

Lee-Maturana et al, Characteristics and experiences of targeted parents of parental alienation from their own perspective: A systematic literature review (2019) 71 Australian Journal of Psychology 83-

91.

Abstract

Objective: The aims of this systematic literature review were to identify and synthesise all relevant information about targeted parents' characteristics and experiences from their own perspective.

Results: Nine relevant articles were included after conducting inclusion criteria and quality assessment. Data were collated and analysed using guidance on the conduct of narrative synthesis in systematic reviews.

Conclusion: Targeted parents report consistent stories about the nature of the alienation tactics used by alienating parents across the included studies. Targeted parents expressed dissatisfaction with legal and mental health system services available to them. Further, despite feeling despair, frustration, and isolation, targeted parents appear to be resilient and seek out positive coping strategies. This review showed that research on targeted parents from their own perspective is sparse, and more studies are needed.

'Targeted parents reported negative consequences of being exposed to alienating behaviour, such as dissatisfaction with the legal and mental health systems, emotional and financial implications, and psychological distress… The lack of understanding of parental alienation by those involved in the legal and mental health systems may be contributing to increased feelings of anxiety and depression in targeted parents' at 89 (references removed).

Rathus, Z. A history of the use of the concept of parental alienation in the Australian family law system: contradictions, collisions and their consequences. (2020) 42 (1) Journal of Social Welfare and Family Law 5-17.

Abstract

'This paper presents insights into the history and current deployment of the concept of parental alienation in the Australian family law system. It begins in 1989…[and] traces aspects of the socio-legal and social science research, gender politics, law reform and jurisprudence of the following 30 years, paying attention to moments of significant change. … The history reveals an irreconcilable tension between the 'benefit' of 'meaningful' post-separation parent-child relationships and the protection of children from harm. When mothers' allegations of violence in the family are disbelieved, minimised or dismissed, they are transformed from victims of abuse into perpetrators of abuse – alienators of children from their fathers…'

‘It is impossible to provide a concise definition of 'parental alienation' (PA) … because of its contested position in scientific and legal literature. It is employed by some professionals to describe parental conduct in separated families where the children are, apparently without good reason, reluctant or resistant to spending time with one parent.’ (p.6, references removed).

Rhoades, H, ‘Book Review: Challenging Parental Alienation: New Directions for Professionals and Parents, Jean Mercer and Margaret Drew (eds)’ (2022) 35 Australian Journal of Family Law 290-294.

‘The book (see further reference below- International) also provides a valuable warning to readers outside the US about the dangers of reunification therapies, which appear to have flourished despite a lack of empirical support for their effectiveness. Their coercive approach provides a stark contrast to the trauma-informed programs for rebuilding parent-child relationships that are provided in Australia’s services sector, programs that were often designed in consultation with children’ at 294.

Women’s Safety and Justice Taskforce, Hear her voice: Report one, Volume 2 ‘The Mountains we must climb’ (2021)

‘The Taskforce has heard that attempts by victims of coercive control to protect themselves and keep their children safe may be considered to be parental alienation in the family law system and counterintuitively act against them in that jurisdiction’ p274.

‘Perpetrators of domestic and family violence and coercive control often use family law proceedings and outcomes as a mechanism to continue to exert power and control over their victims. This undermines efforts by states and territories to continuously improve responses to domestic and family violence to protect victims, including children, and hold perpetrators to account and stop the violence. Community perceptions of the presumption of shared parental responsibility in the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) often lead victims of domestic and family violence to believe they are compelled to offer equal shared care to abusive fathers. Victims are frightened that the court will view them as alienating the children from their father if they try to protectively limit contact. This potentially exposes children to significant harm and means victims are subject to ongoing power and control by the perpetrator during periods of contact over the children. Mothers who act protectively in the best interests of their children to limit the contact their children have with a perpetrator-father are often accused of parental alienation within the family law system' at 276.

International

Johnston, JR and Sullivan, MJ, 'Parental alienation: in search of common ground for a more differentiated theory' (2020) 58(2) Family Court Review 270-292.

Abstract: The concept of parental alienation (PA) has expanded in popular usage at the same time that it remains mired in controversy about its scientific integrity and its use as a legal strategy in response to an increasing range of issues in family court. In this paper we describe how competing advocacy movements (for mothers, fathers and children) in the family justice field have, over time, helped shape the shifting definitions and widening focal concerns of PA - from children who make false allegations of abuse, to those who resist or refuse contact with a parent, to parent relocation, and to the emotional abuse wrecked upon children who are victims of a manipulative parent….

'… it is not a simple task to show that the child's beliefs, perceptions and behavior are unwarranted, that no adequate reason or legitimate rationale exists for the child's negative stance. The problem is that this is a "residual" or default definition and requires the PA proponent to undertake extensive hypothesis testing to prove a series of non-events. In practice, this often involves showing that abuse and/or deficit parenting on the part of the target parent did not occur. It should also involve showing other "reasonable" explanations for the child's negative stance do not exist- like the developmental stage of child; prolonged absence of target parent; normal adjustment difficulties with divorce transition and step-family formation; untenable loyalty conflict in response to parental conflict; and sib-ling influences' at pp276-277.

'The worry is that PA seems to be becoming an increasingly influential "all-purpose" or generic legal strategy in family litigation. Its uncritical admission in expert testimony in court can potentially bolster petitions for substantial changes in custody and orders to participate in unwanted treatments without ensuring due investigation into the multiple factors that contribute to the severity, longevity, etiology, prognosis, nature and effects of children's resistance or refusal of contact with a parent. PA may also be used to rebut relocation petitions and to counter a wide range of allegations of family violence and abuse. Unquestionably, some children need to be protected from harmful PA behaviors and family court may be the only recourse. If so, critical care with respect to the admission and usage of PA in court proceedings is needed to avoid misleading, simplistic and erroneous testimony. Without responsible stewardship governing the use of PA constructs, there is the potential for them to contribute to unjust, harmful and litigious outcomes' at 286.

Kruk, E, 'Parental alienation as a form of emotional child abuse: current state of knowledge and future directions for research' (2018) 22(4) Family Science Review, 141-164.

Abstract: This article examines the current state of research on parental alienation, which reveals that alienation is far more common and debilitating for children and parents than was previously believed. In extreme cases, one can make the argument that parental alienation is a serious form of emotional child abuse. Careful scrutiny of key elements of parental alienation in the research literature consistently identifies two core elements of child abuse: parental alienation as a significant form of harm to children that is attributable to human action. As a form of individual child abuse, parental alienation calls for a child protection response. As a form of collective abuse, parental alienation warrants fundamental reform of the family law system in the direction of shared parenting as the foundation of family law….

'…numerous studies show that alienated children exhibit severe psychosocial disturbances. These include disrupted social-emotional development, lack of trust in relationships, social anxiety, and social isolation. Such children have poor relationships with both parents. As adults, they tend to enter partnerships earlier, are more likely to divorce or dissolve their cohabiting unions, more likely to have children outside any partnership, and more likely to become alienated from their own children… Low self-sufficiency, lack of autonomy, and lingering dependence on the alienating parent are a third characteristic of alienated children. … Alienated children are more likely to play truant from school and leave school at an early age. They are less likely to attain academic and professional qualifications in adulthood. They tend to experience unemployment, have low incomes, and remain on social assistance. They often seem to drift aimlessly through life. Alienated children experience difficulties controlling their impulses, struggling with mental health, addiction, and self-harm …. They are more likely to smoke, drink alcohol, and abuse drugs, often succumb to behavioral addictions, and tend to be promiscuous, foregoing contraception and becoming teenage parents…' at 150-151 (references removed).

Meier, J, Dickson, S., O'Sullivan, C., & Rosen, L. (2022) The Trouble with Harman and Lorandos' Parental Alienation Allegations in Family Court Study (2020) Journal of family, trauma, child custody & child development, 19(3-4): 295-317, doi:10.1080/26904586.2022.2036286.

In this article Meier and colleagues respond to a study by Harman and Lorandos which in turn responded to a study by Meier and colleagues.

The Harman J & Lorandos, D. study can be found here: (2021). Allegations of family violence in court: How parental alienation affects judicial outcomes. Psychology, Public Policy and Law, 27(2), 187–208 https://doi.org/10.1037/law0000301. The Meier and colleagues' study that Harman and Lorandos critique can be found here: Meier, J., Dickson, S., Rosen, R., O'Sullivan, C., & Hayes, J. (2019). Child custody out- comes in cases involving parental alienation and abuse allegations, Final Report to National Institute of Justice.

This Meier and colleagues (2022) critique overviews this debate and points to 'pervasive design and methodological errors' in the Harman & Lorandos study and asserts that they 'undermine both the appearance and assertion of rigor in their approach; these problems and the foundational differences in their dataset from [Meier et al's] own disqualify their study from serving as any kind of credible test or disconfirmation of our study.'

Highlighting significant gaps in the research, Meier and colleagues (2022) conclude: 'There are genuinely important questions here – most fundamentally, how often are abuse allegations true, false, or knowingly fabricated in family court? How often are parental alienation claims deployed to nullify credible risk? Neither study can directly answer these questions, but they are at the root of the divide between those who espouse the view that parental alienation and false abuse allegations are common, and those who assert that abuse allegations are rarely fabricated but alienation is widely misused to deny credible abuse. Answering these questions requires reasoned and deliberate research and consideration by objective scholars and practitioners acting in good faith.' p20

Mercer, J and Drew, M, 'Introduction to parental alienation concepts and practices' In Mercer J and Drew, M. eds. Challenging Parental Alienation: New Directions for Professionals and Parents, (2021) Routledge.

Abstract: The idea of parental alienation has been used with increasing and alarming frequency in child custody decisions since its introduction in the 1990s, despite a lack of evidence showing that the basic concept applies in more than a few cases. For the system of ideas that relates a preferred parent's actions to a child's avoidance or rejection of the other parent, the term parental alienation belief system is used…. (US focussed resource but includes perspectives from Britain, Canada, and Australia)

‘There are several serious problems associated with the use of the parental alienation belief system in child custody work. One is the simple fact that there is no established method for discriminating between children who reject a parent for ample reason (e.g., experience of that parent as violent, physically, or emotionally abusive, or sexually predatory) and those whose rejection has been created or inappropriately influenced by the preferred parent…’ 7

‘…there are no data on incidence or prevalence of child avoidant behavior or of parent encouragement of such behavior. No information exists for determining how frequently there are false positive claims that actual encouragement of avoidant behavior has occurred, nor indeed how often there are false negative findings, the latter possibly meaning that children who have really been inappropriately persuaded are not identified and helped.’ 7

‘A second and serious parental alienation-related problem involves the recommendations of parental alienation proponents testifying in child custody conflicts. These recommendations invariably include some form of parental alienation treatment, sometimes called reunification therapy, but such treatments do not usually stand alone. Children sent for some treatments are by court order transferred to the custody of the nonpreferred parent and prohibited from contact with the preferred parent, for periods of time that may begin with 90 days but may be extended for years. Some teenagers have re-ported adverse effects of programs they attended…and there is evidence that there is danger to some who are placed with abusive parents and prevented from having contact with the preferred parent or other family members who could monitor their well-being. The burden on the preferred parent is extraordinarily heavy. The anxiety and concerns of the preferred parent for the child are likely to be great, particularly if there is a history of domestic violence.’ 7

Mercer, Jean and Drew, Margaret (eds) Challenging Parental Alienation: New Directions for Professionals and Parents, 2021, Routledge.

Book description: This book addresses the concept of parental alienation – the belief that when a child of divorced parents avoids one parent, it may be because the preferred parent has persuaded the child to do this. It argues against the unquestioning use of parental alienation concepts in child custody conflicts. Increasing use of this concept in family courts has led at times to placement of children with abusive or violent parents, damage to the lives of preferred parents, and the use of treatments that have not been shown to be safe or effective. The 13 chapters cover the history and theory of "parental alienation" principles and practices. Methodological and research issues are considered, and diagnostic and treatment methods associated with "parental alienation" beliefs as well as those recommended by research and ethical evidence are analyzed. The connections of "parental alienation" with gender and domestic violence issues are discussed as are the experiences of individuals who have experienced "parental alienation" treatments. The book argues that "parental alienation" principles and practices should be avoided by family courts, in the best interests of children in custody disputes.

Trane, Sarah T., Champion, Kelly M., and Hupp, Steven D. A. Comparison of Parental Alienation Treatments and Evidence-Based Treatments for Children. In Mercer J and Drew, M. eds. Challenging Parental Alienation: New Directions for Professionals and Parents, (2021) Routledge.

Conclusion: ‘Psychology and other social sciences have delineated the importance of research methods for describing treatments as evidence-based. Parental alienation treatments lack the evidence required to be considered evidence-based by agreed-upon professional standards. In addition to the review provided in this chapter, a 2017 review also concluded that no rigorous research could be identified for parental alienation treatments. Moreover, their safety remains in question, let alone their effectiveness at reaching purported treatment goals. If treatment goals are the reduction of coercion among parents and children, psychology research has a lot to say about best methods and procedures for improvements in this regard. Indeed, methods almost universally suggest the need for parents to demonstrate improvements in their own emotion regulation skills, communication skills, and ability to create a safe and supportive environment for their children before their children can be expected to demonstrate such skills. It behooves the Court, attorneys, and other professionals involved with these most challenging cases to understand that there remains a distinct lack of evidence to assure that the existing parental alienation programs are psychologically safe or effective for families. While it is possible that these programs emerged with the best of intentions to assist distressed and desperate parents, they do not rise to the ethical imperative to create EBTs that warrant court-ordered participation.’ (p155, References removed).

UN General Assembly, Custody, violence against women and violence against children Report of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women and girls, its causes and consequences (Report of the Special Rapporteur on violence against women and girls, its causes and consequences, Reem Alsalem) (2023).

Abstract: ‘The report addresses the link between custody cases, violence against women and violence against children, with a focus on the abuse of the term “parental alienation” and similar pseudo-concepts.’

In Part III the report discusses the definition of what the Special Rapporteur describes as the ‘pseudo-concept of “parental alienation”’:

9. ‘There is no commonly accepted clinical or scientific definition of “parental alienation”. Broadly speaking, parental alienation is understood to refer to deliberate or unintentional acts that cause unwarranted rejection by the child towards one of the parents, usually the father.’

10. ‘The pseudo-concept of parental alienation was coined by Richard Gardner, a psychologist, who claimed that children alleging sexual abuse during high conflict divorces suffer from “parental alienation syndrome” caused by mothers who have led their children to believe that they have been abused by their fathers and to raise allegations of abuse against them. He recommended draconian remedies to address the syndrome, including a complete cut-off from the mother in order to “deprogramme” the child.’

11. ‘It was argued that the more that children rejected the relationship with their fathers, the more evidence of the alienating syndrome was observed. Gardner’s theory has been criticized for its lack of empirical basis, for its problematic assertions about sexual abuse and for recasting abuse claims as false tools for alienation, which, in some cases, have dissuaded evaluators and courts from assessing whether abuse has actually occurred. It has been dismissed by medical, psychiatric and psychological associations, and in 2020 it was removed from the International Classification of Diseases by the World Health Organization. Nevertheless, it has gained considerable traction and has been widely used to negate allegations of domestic and sexual abuse within family court systems on a global scale.’ (references removed- see original).

In Part IV: A of the Report there is discussion about the high rates of domestic violence in intimate relationships and observes:

‘Allegations of domestic violence tend to receive insufficient scrutiny by courts and to trigger problematic assumptions, for example that it causes little harm to the mother or child and that it ceases with separation. The consequences of domestic violence and its effects on children are also misunderstood and underestimated by judges, who tend to prioritize and grant contact with fathers. In doing so, judges fail in their duty to protect children from harm, giving abusive fathers unsupervised access to their children, including in cases where judges have found that physical and/or sexual violence has occurred.' (references removed- see original) [12]

The Report states: 'The use of parental alienation is highly gendered and frequently used against mothers.' [14]

Further in Part IV: B of the Report there is a discussion about the tactics used to trump allegations of domestic violence. The Report states 'there are numerous ways in which allegations of domestic violence are sidelined and delegitimized through invoking parental alienation' including ignoring the history of domestic violence against mothers and children in decisions of custody and visitation rights; efforts to scrutinize domestic violence are not actively pursued and that despite a history of domestic violence; the 'pseudo concept' of parental alienation has been involved or mothers have been blamed for purposely isolating children from their fathers, even where the safety of the mother or the child was at risk. The Report states: 'By ignoring or undermining domestic violence in a family, courts fail to acknowledge the issue in their decisions, thereby presenting domestic violence as an exception rather than the norm in cases of parental alienation.'

In Part V the Report discusses the impact of parental alienation on the best interest of the child. The Report observes that '[i]n the context of domestic violence, there is a duty to listen [to ensure] that decisions are better informed and that the child's safety and welfare are promoted.'

23. 'When custody decisions are made in favour of the parent who claims to be alienated without sufficiently considering the views of the child, the child's resilience is undermined and the child continues to be exposed to lasting harm. It may also sever the stable and safe bond with the non-abusive primary caretaker. Submissions from Australia [and other countries] report cases where children were removed from the primary carer and compelled to reside with the perpetrator parent, whom they resist. In addition, submissions noted how police child protection services have enforced access and custody orders in cases where the child clearly did not wish to comply, traumatizing both the child and the mother.'

UN OHCHR, Special Rapporteur on violence against women and girls, its causes and consequences (SR), https://www.ohchr.org/en/calls-for-input/2022/call-inputs-custody-cases-violence-against-women-and-violence-against-children (2022).

Purpose: To inform the Special Rapporteur on violence against women and girls' report on the nexus between custody and guardianship cases, violence against women and violence against children, with a focus on the abuse of the concept of "parental alienation" and related or similar concepts.

'The tendency to dismiss the history of domestic violence and abuse in custody cases extends to cases where mothers or children have brought forward credible allegations of child physical or sexual abuse. In several countries, family courts tend to judge such allegations as deliberate efforts by the mothers to manipulate their child and pull them away from their father. This supposed effort by a parent alleging abuse is often termed "parental alienation." The term generally refers to the presumption that a child's fear or rejection of one parent, typically the noncustodial parent, stems from the malevolent influence of the preferred, typically the custodial parent.'

'Although these concepts lack a universal clinical or scientific definition, emerging patterns across various jurisdictions of the world indicate courts worldwide are using the concept of "parental alienation" or similar concepts explicitly or are allowing for its instrumentalization. The vast majority of those accused of 'alienating' their child while alleging abuse are women. Consequently, many women victims of violence and abuse face double victimization as they are punished for alleging abuse, including by losing custody or at times being imprisoned. Children who are victims of violence and abuse by a parent (in many cases the father) often continue to be subjected to such violence and abuse, against themselves and/or the other parent (in most cases the mother) post-separation, through imposed contact with the abusive parent. These dynamics often allow parents to be intimidated, coerced or forced by their abusive ex-partners and pressured by the courts to withdraw their allegations of abuse or to agree to a specific custody arrangement. In many instances, when given the risk of losing contact with their children and the high impunity the violence committed by their partner, women end up withdrawing their allegations or not reporting at all. According to experts, in many cases, the perpetrators of violence have deliberately inflicted violence on their children as a continuation of the violence inflicted on their partner who is the parent of their children and therefore a continuation of the attempt and process of controlling the target (i.e. the mother).'

Parental alienation - Cases

Campi and Ferrin* [2022] FedCFamC2F 1621 (24 November 2022) – Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Division 2)

Newbrun J considered proposals for children to attend intensive family therapy in the context of mother's allegations of parental alienation by father:

[9] The Court has a real concern that the children may be exposed to a significant risk of psychological harm if they participate in the intensive therapy Reportable Intensive Family Therapy ("RIFT") model proposed by the Mother to be afforded by the psychologist Dr B. And further, the Court has a real concern that should the children be required to participate in the proposed intensive therapy RIFT model that they may well become even more resistant to spending time with the Mother; if this risk comes to pass, then the prospect of restoring the children's relationship with the Mother may become even more difficult.

[38] As to the Mother's proposed order that Dr B be permitted to conduct intensive four day family therapy RIFT model [Reportable Intensive Family Therapy], and provide an expert report in relation to the issue of parental alienation, the Court is of the view that such an order would not be in the best interests of the children, and nor would such an order be in the interests of justice, and in reaching these views, and in summary, takes into account the following matters having regard to rule 7.04 and section 13C(1)(c) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth):

(a) The Court's concern that the children may be exposed to psychological harm if subjected to the proposed intensive four-day family therapy RIFT model;

(b) The lack of material before the Court relating to risk screening of the children prior to participating in the proposed intensive family therapy;

(c) The lack of material before the Court relating to the nature of the proposed intensive family therapy;

(d) The lack of any independent evaluation of the proposed intensive family therapy;

(e) The content of the Family Report does not suggest that expert evidence from a clinical psychologist such as Dr B and/or further family therapy is required to elucidate the issue of parental alienation;

(f) The Family Report writer, appointed under section 62G of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) to provide a Family Report, is well able to provide appropriate evidence and opinions in relation to the issue of parental alienation (the Family Report writer, refers to and/or discusses the issue of parental alienation in paragraphs 76, 100, 102, 104, 108, 111, 112, 113 albeit she does indicate that the Court needs to conduct a further assessment of this issue). The Court is of the view that it is not necessary in this case for it to have a range of opinion on the issue of parental alienation;

(g) The content of the Family Report does not refer to and/or support Dr B's proposed intensive four day family therapy RIFT model.

Carter and Wilson [2023] FedCFamC1A 9 (10 February 2023) – Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Division 1)

The full court (McClelland DCJ, Bennett & Campton JJ) observed that 'controversially… the primary judge also found that the mother's conduct in limiting the amount of time the child spent with the father and her insistence upon such time being supervised amounted to controlling conduct for the purpose of the definition of family violence as set out in s 4AB of the Act' [6]. The Full Court observed:

[71] Section 4AB of the Act is drafted in very wide terms in order to catch behaviour which is thought to be undesirable. In so doing, the section also catches behaviour which is both acceptable and necessary (for example, exerting control over a child in the exercise of the parenting powers). Therefore, in practical terms and save for blatant acts of family violence, an evaluation of evidence to ascertain the context in which alleged behaviour took place may be a precondition to the Court characterising behaviour as family violence within the meaning of s 4AB. Contextualising the behaviour calls for findings of fact.

[85] In placing the mother's behaviour in context, I assume that the relevant period during which the primary judge found that the mother's behaviour constituted family violence was from the child's birth until the first parenting order, that is, from 2016 to 30 January 2019. However, there is no analysis of evidence or reasoning by the primary judge as to why the mother's behaviour around the child spending time with the father "initially" (or otherwise) is evaluated as behaviour that controlled the child in the sense contemplated by s 4AB(1) as family violence.

[87] Whilst it is uncontroversial that the mother did not allow unsupervised time between the father and the child when she and the father were living separately and apart prior to orders being made, the primary judge does not identify the extent to which the father's limited participation in the first three years of the child's life is attributable to the mother's behaviour, or why the control exercised by the mother was not consistent with steps taken by a parent who is acting protectively.

[88] The primary judge refers to the mother's behaviour as controlling of the child, the father and of the child's relationship with the father. However, his Honour's reasons do not include an analysis of the evidence or findings about the respects in which he was satisfied that the mother's behaviour exceeded legitimate parental control and should be characterised as family violence.

Frangoulis and Xennon [2019] FamCA 103 (28 February 2019) – Family Court of Australia

Berman J considered the father's application for reunification therapy with his child:

[49] … For reunification therapy to be appropriate I consider that there needs to be an assessment undertaken that would satisfy the Court that the potential risk to the child of engaging in what can be an intensive program is outweighed by the reasonable prospect of a successful reinstatement of X's relationship with her father.

[50] The concept of reunification therapy is not a matter of abstract consideration but rather, should be the subject of evidence that it is a proper therapeutic process and will be undertaken by a practitioner with demonstrated expertise.

[51] A report should be obtained from the nominated practitioner that brings to account the issues raised in the proceedings and provides an assessment as to the prospects of success, limited or otherwise.

Khoury and Ganem [2021] FCCA 869 (1 April 2021) – Federal Circuit Court of Australia

Among other orders the father sought orders for reunification therapy in circumstances where the mother argued it was not in the child's best interests to see the father because of controlling behaviours, disrespect of women and extreme religious beliefs [98]. The father denies allegations.[99] Per Bender J:

[100] As has been set out in this judgment, therapeutic reunification counselling to assist in rebuilding the relationship between X and the Father was not successful and was a distressing and unhappy experience for X.

[101] [expert witnesses] both expressed the view that a further attempt at such therapy could be too distressing for X, especially given her current levels of anxiety and fear and her resistance to spending any time with the Father.

[102] Therefore, the real question for this Court is whether the risk to X of a meaningful relationship with the Father is outweighed by the emotional and psychological risk to X in forcing her to undertake further counselling in the hope that a relationship with the Father might be achieved.

McGregor v McGregor* (2012) FLC 93-507; [2012] FamCAFC 69 (28 May 2012) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

In circumstances where it was alleged that the father had 'alienated' the children from the father the Full Court (Bryant CJ, Faulks DCJ & Ainslie-Wallace J) commented:

[47] '… it is clear to us that the term "alienation" does not enjoy one accepted meaning.'

Ralton and Ralton* [2017] FamCAFC 182; (7 September 2017) – Family Court of Australia (Full Court)

Parental alienation was considered in circumstances where the mother appealed against parenting orders on the basis that orders had been made with insufficient consideration of the alleged family violence of the father and the expert witnesses were biased (the Full Court (Bryant CJ, Strickland & Aldridge JJ).

[187] The primary judge was at pains to avoid the use of labels such as "parental alienation" or "enmeshment". Speaking of the Associate Professor's evidence, which included a discussion of these concepts, his Honour said:

> The issues that he raises with respect to the concept of alienation as a syndrome are well set out in the literature. However, to become focused upon the academic discussion of alienation and whether or not it is a syndrome – and it seems clear that it is not – becomes more of a distraction than anything in this individual case. What is necessary in this case is a careful analysis of the evidence of the parties, the circumstances confronting these two children in each of the households and the behaviours exhibited in order to ascertain what is going to be in their best interests. (quoting from the primary judgment at [70])

[192] … There is therefore no need for us to consider whether or not the evidence justified a finding of parental alienation or enmeshment or whether or not they are valid concepts.

In the Matter Of: Re K Appeal [1994] FamCA 21; (1994) FLC 92-461 (10 March 1994) – Family Court of Australia

The mother died and the father was charged with her murder and was awaiting trial at the time of the hearing before the trial Judge. Those proceedings concerned applications by the maternal aunt and the paternal grandparents and aunt for custody of the only child of the marriage. The applicant father indicated that he supported the application of the grandparents and paternal aunt that they be granted custody of the child. The trial Judge made orders granting sole guardianship and custody of the child to the maternal aunt and permission for her to remove the child from Australia to the United States where she resided. The husband, grandparents and paternal aunt appealed against those orders.

[95] In this regard we lay stress upon the words "intractable conflict". There is a dispute of course in all contested custody cases and there is usually a degree of conflict, but we have in mind that category of cases where there is a high level of long standing conflict between the parents. In such cases the child is very much a pawn in the dispute and is often used as such by either or both parents. In these circumstances we think it important that the child have the support and assistance of an independent person and that the Court similarly have the assistance of such a person to present the child's point of view.

[96] If the child is alienated from both parents, the need for such representation is obvious. Where the child is alienated from one of them, this may or may not be for good cause and may have been largely brought about or contributed to by the conduct of the parent from whom the child is not alienated. In most cases it seems to us to be highly desirable for the child to have access to a person independent of the conflict who will have his or her interests at heart and who will be capable of assisting the child and putting both the child's view and submissions as to the child's best interests to the Court: see Law Council of Australia (1989) "Law Council Submission on Role of Separate Representatives" Vol. 4 No. 4 Australian Family Lawyer, 15. In this regard we also see the separate representative as having an investigative role which may be of great assistance to the Court. Further, the separate representative may well, in this and the previous category of cases, perform the role of an "honest broker" as between the child and or the parents.

Property proceedings

Where separated parties to a marriage or de facto relationship are unable to reach agreement as to the division of their property, they may apply under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) (FLA) and the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) (FCA) to have the matter determined by the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia or the Family Court of Western Australia or the Federal Circuit Court of Australia (collectively called here "the family courts"). State and territory courts have jurisdiction to hear defended property proceedings in limited circumstances. They may also, when making a protection order, impose conditions affecting parties' property, which may in some cases be inconsistent with proposed property orders.

Section 79 FLA (property of marriage) and Section 90SM FLA and Section 205ZG FCA (property of de facto relationship) give the family courts broad discretion to make property orders having regard to a range of factors and the need to be satisfied that any order is just and equitable in all the circumstances. Retrospective factors include the respective past contributions of each party to, for example, the acquisition and maintenance of property, the financial support of the couple or family, and the welfare of the couple or family in the capacity of homemaker or parent. Prospective factors set out in Section 75(2) FLA include the age and state of health of each party, future earning capacity, parenting responsibilities and entitlement to superannuation [Qu et al 2014]. It is important to note that after a decision handed down in 2012 (Standord v Stanford [2012] HCA 52), the Court must determine whether it is just and equitable to make an order altering the legal and equitable interests of the parties under s 79(2) at the beginning of the matter. Although this will not impact the majority of cases in practice as this threshold question will - in most cases- be easily satisfied, in cases such as Stanford it played a pivotal role in how the property matter was determined.

Sections 79 and 90SM do not specify domestic and family violence as a factor to be taken into account by the court when considering an appropriate property order. Rather, judicial officers are guided by case law. The leading authority is the 1997 decision, Marriage of Kennon [1997] FamCA 27 in which the majority stated that where there is a course of violent conduct by one party towards another during the marriage which is demonstrated to have had a significant adverse impact on that party's contribution to the marriage, or, put the other way, to have made his or her contributions significantly more arduous than they ought to have been, that is a fact which a trial judge is entitled to take into account in assessing the parties' respective contributions pursuant to section 79. The court emphasised that this principle would only apply in exceptional cases.

It has been noted that the Kennon test sets a high threshold for recognition of domestic and family violence in the context of property settlement proceedings as parties alleging violence must prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the violence had a discernible impact on their capacity to contribute to the marriage, or to the arduousness of making such contributions [Fehlberg & Millward 2014]. Further, the Kennon test does not address the potential relevance of domestic and family violence to the prospective factors set out in Section 75(2) [ALRC FV – Improving Legal Frameworks 2010]. The family courts have increasingly recognised the relevance of domestic and family violence in property settlement proceedings; however the Kennon test is difficult to satisfy.

Where the parties have reached a property settlement by agreement, either before the commencement of or in the course of property settlement proceedings, and consent orders are filed with the court for approval, it may be appropriate for the judicial officer to inquire as to whether issues of domestic and family violence have been raised and whether consent has been properly given in order to be satisfied that the order is just and equitable in all the circumstances.

Australian research suggests that domestic and family violence may affect the share of property and other financial resources a victim receives in any post-separation property division with their violent former partner [Fehlberg & Millward 2014]. For example, following the 2006 reforms to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), findings [Kaspiew et al 2009] indicated that mothers who had experienced violence were receiving a reduced share of property. The potential underlying issues were identified as, first, mothers trading off property entitlements in order to secure more time with their children, and, second, fathers seeking shared time arrangements in order to obtain a larger proportion of property [Kaspiew et al 2009]. A later study observed that a reported history of emotional abuse or physical harm may result in a victim feeling pressured or intimidated by the perpetrator/partner into receiving a lower share of the joint property division and being more likely to experience a sense of unfairness [Qu et al 2014]. It is important to note that there is no suggestion that the property settlement outcomes reported in these studies are reflected in the jurisprudential approaches of the family courts.

Property proceedings - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence: Improving Legal Frameworks, Consultation Paper No 1 (2010).

The ALRC notes that notably absent from the factors set out in ss 75(2) and 79(4) Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) is the notion of fault. In Kennon, (Re: Cassandra Kathleen Kennon (Appellant/Wife) and Ian William Kennon (Cross-Appellant/Husband) Appeal (1997) FLC 92-757; [1997] FamCA 27 (10 June 1997)) the court recognised family violence as a relevant factor in determining property disputes under the Family Law Act (p.425). This paper goes on to critically analyse the application of Kennon.

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response: Final Report, Report No 114 (2010).

Chapter 17 of the report deals with the jurisdiction and practice of the Federal Family Courts. It notes that s 79 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) permits federal family courts to make orders about the distribution of the property of parties to a marriage upon the breakdown of that marriage. Section 90SM governs how property is to be distributed between parties to a de facto relationship, and mirrors s 79 to a large extent (p.791). The report notes that in Kennon(Re: Cassandra Kathleen Kennon (Appellant/Wife) and Ian William Kennon (Cross-Appellant/Husband) Appeal (1997) FLC 92-757; [1997] FamCA 27 (10 June 1997)) , the court established the principle that 'when assessing a party's contributions, the court can take into account a course of violent conduct by one party towards the other that has had a significant adverse impact on that party's contribution or has made his or her contributions significantly more arduous than they ought to have been'. Further, '[w]hile family violence, in itself, is not relevant to an assessment of future needs of a party, the consequences of family violence—for example its effect on the state of the victim's health or physical and mental capacity to gain appropriate employment—can be considered when assessing future needs'. The report goes on to critically analyse the application of Kennon (pp.792-796).

Carson, R., Qu, L., Kaspiew, R., Stevens, E., Sakata, K., Horsfall, B. et al. (2022). Evaluation of the Lawyer-assisted Family Law Property Mediation: Legal Aid Commission Trial: Final Report. Melbourne: Australian Institute of Family Studies.

An evaluation of the lawyer assisted family law property mediation program which aims to assist parties (particularly women) with property pools < $500 K especially where they have experienced family violence.

Fehlberg, Belinda and Christine Millward, 'Family violence and financial outcomes after parental separation' [2014] (24) Families, policy and the law 235.

This article is based on an analysis of interviews conducted with 60 separated parents as part of a wider study on links between post-separation parenting and financial settlements, following major family law and process amendments in 2006. The authors note that while the family law courts have increasingly recognised the relevance of family violence in proceedings to divide property under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), this test is difficult to satisfy, adjustments have been infrequent and small, and, further, most family law disputes are not decided by the courts (p.235).

The authors conclude: 'In our study, family violence often influenced parenting arrangements and thus indirectly influenced financial settlements. Family violence often affected mothers' child support receipt, including in CSA Collect/Child Support Collect cases. Mothers who described family violence that affected property settlements also commonly described problems obtaining child support from their ex-partner. Family violence that diminished or ceased after separation could still have a continuing influence, discouraging pursuit of legal remedies by those exposed'. The authors observe: 'In our study, family violence was often relevant to disputes and to disadvantageous processes and outcomes for both finances and parenting (property and child support) matters, and could add to financial difficulties for primary carers and children' (p.242).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

Chapter 9 examines the impact of the 2006 introduction into the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) of the presumption in favour of equal shared parental responsibility (s61DA), with a linked obligation on courts to consider making orders for children to spend equal (s65DAA(1)) or substantial and significant (s65DAA(2)) time with each parent where the presumption is applied. The report notes that the quantitative data suggested that mothers were receiving a reduced share of property following the reforms. This raised two issues potentially underlying the trends. First, the bargaining dynamics and trade-offs made in negotiations that may involve both care-time arrangements and property settlement and second, the extent to which a party's responsibility for future care of the children might influence property division.

Qu, Lixia, et al, 'Post-separation parenting, property and relationship dynamics after five years' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

For the first time in the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families (LSSF), Wave 3 included a module exploring post-separation property and financial arrangements. Chapter 6 'Property Division' looks at key relevant issues including the amount and nature of assets held, how they were divided after separation, and what mechanisms were used to support the finalisation of property division. Under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), the post-separation property division regime remains discretionary in nature. Broadly the courts have the discretion to make orders concerning property interests 'as [they] consider appropriate' (FLA s 79).

A range of retrospective and prospective factors may be taken into account in the exercise of this discretion. Retrospective factors include the respective contributions of each party to, for example, the acquisition and maintenance of property, the financial support of the couple or family, and the "welfare" of the couple or family in the capacity of "homemaker" or parent (FLA s 79(4)). Prospective considerations include the age and state of health of each party, future earning capacity, parenting responsibilities and entitlement to superannuation (FLA s 79(4)(e) and FLA s 75(2)). Courts need to be satisfied that any order is "just and equitable" "in all the circumstances" (FLA s 79(2) and s 90SM(3)).

At 6.5 'Property division ratios reported by mothers and fathers', the report discusses factors associated with how property is divided including family violence/abuse. The authors state at p.106:

'Fathers who reported experiencing emotional abuse and/or physical hurt before or during separation indicated that mothers received a higher share (and thus the fathers accepted a lower share) compared with fathers who had not been the recipient of violence/abuse. Similarly, mothers who reported experiencing physical hurt inflicted by the other parent received a lower proportion compared with mothers who had not been the recipient of violence/abuse. However, there was no statistically significant difference between mothers who reported experiencing emotional abuse alone and mothers who reported no violence/abuse.

Mothers who experienced family violence/abuse before or during separation were more likely to be the one who left the family house. For example, one-half of the mothers who reported experiencing physical hurt before separation indicated that she left the house at separation, compared to one-third of the mothers who reported no violence/abuse leaving the house. Excluding the variable of who left the house at separation from the model for mothers, the effect of physical hurt was statistically significant. It is likely that parents who experienced violence/abuse may have accepted the less satisfactory settlements due to fears of reprisal or simply wanting to get out of the negotiation process as quickly as possible due to their experiences'.

The report concludes, in relation to family/abuse abuse, 'A reported history of emotional abuse or physical hurt is associated with a lower share of property division and a greater likelihood of experiencing a sense of unfairness (p.115).

Smallwood, Emma, Stepping Stones: Legal Barriers to Economic Equality After Family Violence (Women's Legal Service Victoria, 2015).

This research reports on a study involving 30 interviews with women experiencing family violence and 40 surveys completed by community service workers. This report includes case studies and discusses the experiences reported by the interviewees. See at pp.40-44, the report discusses the treatment of family violence by the Family court in relation to property matters.

Property proceedings - Other Resources

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, Finances and property: Overview.

This webpage published by the Family Court provides general information on property and finances after separation.

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, Application for Consent Orders (do it yourself kit).

Part H of this document deals with details for property or maintenance orders. It notes that 'the Court may refuse to make the financial orders you seek if the proposed orders are not just and equitable'.

Property proceedings - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Bianca

Victim experiences - Angelina

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Cultural abuse] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [People from CALD backgrounds] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sexual abuse] [Social abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Angelina was born overseas and English is her second language. She met Barry after coming to Australia on a student visa. She was working to support herself; and studying to improve her English skills and have her foreign professional qualifications recognised. Barry had a responsible job. Neither had been married or in a long-term relationship. They soon started living together as a couple, and Angelina applied for a partner visa with Barry as her sponsor. They registered their defacto relationship and separated after nearly twelve months. There are no children.

Early on in the relationship, Barry urged Angelina to get a different job that didn't involve night and weekend shifts so that she could be home to take care of the cooking and house, and available to go on short breaks and holidays with Barry. Angelina however enjoyed her job and was happy to work hard for good pay. Barry kept insisting until one day when Angelina was leaving for work, he hid the car keys. Eventually, he gave her the keys, but told her it was 'the last time' he would allow it. Barry tried, and failed, to find Angelina a full-time weekday job for higher pay, so she was forced to give up her shift work and become a 'housewife' to Barry. While bored and frustrated at home, she applied for countless positions without success. Barry pushed her to apply for roles that she had not yet qualified for; she resisted.

Barry took more and more control of their daily lives. He scheduled weekends away according to a strict timetable that didn't suit Angelina; he took her on long car trips that Angelina found unpleasant, and wouldn't allow her to listen to the music she likes; and he chose destinations that she didn't enjoy. Angelina would not tolerate being dictated to, and they argued frequently. Often, Barry reminded her that he controlled her visa, and threatened to write to the immigration authority withdrawing his sponsorship. Barry had all of Angelina's immigration documents and details in his possession.

In time, Angelina got another shift job that she was reasonably content with. Barry was angry because she was earning less money and he complained that her English was getting worse. Barry demanded that Angelina transfer all of her wages to him, and he would then put an amount each week in a joint account that she could access to pay for groceries and household expenses. Again, Angelina questioned these demands asserting that she was happy to share, but was also entitled to her own money to buy, for example, gifts for him. Barry never deposited enough money in the joint account, and Angelina had to regularly ask for more, which she found humiliating. Meanwhile, Barry was free to spend his wage and the balance of Angelina's wage as he pleased.

Angelina was made responsible for cooking and household duties while also working and studying. He criticised and belittled her efforts around the house. He bought her clothes that she felt were age inappropriate and uncomfortable. Sex occurred on Barry's terms without any regard for Angelina's wishes. He told her she was required to sleep with him as a condition of the visa, and if she didn't, he would report her. He also told Angelina that Australian women manipulated men so they could have children, and acquire the majority share of income and assets before divorcing them. Angelina concluded that Barry had pursued her because he believed he could take advantage of her visa dependency.

When they first met, Barry spoke to Angelina of his many friends; however, the only person they ever saw was Barry's mother. Barry refused invitations for them to spend time with some of Angelina's close family members who lived nearby. He monitored her phone and internet activity. Barry objected to Angelina speaking her first language. On one occasion when she was on the phone to a family member in her home country, Barry wielded a knife demanding that she end the conversation and cook dinner. Angelina was aware that Barry also kept rifles at home.

Angelina was becoming increasingly isolated, demeaned and depressed by Barry's abuse. She started working more to get away from him. Barry then set up a whiteboard in the kitchen recording her rosters; he would ring and text her repeatedly at work demanding to know her shift times. Angelina says she felt like a slave: working long hours, being constantly monitored, and relinquishing her wages.

The situation became intolerable for Angelina and she left to stay with a friend. A family member encouraged her to get some advice from the support service at the local Magistrates' Court. She was referred to other services that helped her with her visa application and recommended she apply for a protection order. She also started seeing a psychologist as her emotional health and confidence had deteriorated markedly.

After separation, Barry went to Angelina's workplace and spoke with her employer more than once, embarrassing Angelina. He followed her; and Angelina believes he broke into her relatives' home and stole goods. Barry went to Angelina's home and took photos of her and the car licence plate. It was at that point that she rang the police, and then proceeded to obtain a temporary protection order. Police advised her that Barry had tried to avoid service. On the hearing date she felt pressured to accept a two-year undertaking for Barry to be of good behaviour towards her. Barry's lawyer told her it would be sufficient, and that a protection order wasn't necessary. She therefore offered an undertaking and Barry's lawyer agreed to it on behalf of Barry on the basis that she provide a reciprocal undertaking. Angelina felt humiliated by this tactic; she refused to provide the undertaking and insisted that the matter be heard. Barry gave the undertaking and the matter was dismissed. She felt the Magistrate was understanding of her circumstances and could see that Barry was an untruthful opportunist.

Barry has made no contact with Angelina since the court date. Angelina left the relationship with only her clothes and personal possessions. She is entitled to be reimbursed the wages she earned and to retrieve furniture she purchased, however she would rather forgo her rights than have any further involvement with Barry. Angelina is on medication to cope with the depression she has suffered as a consequence of Barry's abuse. She is trying hard to re-establish her family and social networks, and to complete her studies.

Victim experiences - Anna

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Breach of protection order] [Children] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Parenting orders] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sentencing] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women] [Young people]

Anna and Nathan met one another at high school, however neither completed year 12. During their five-year relationship, they lived together for periods, on and off, and had a child who was aged two when they separated. Anna has experienced physical and mental health problems since early adolescence, which, as an adult, have prevented her from gaining a qualification or employment. She is on a disability pension and, as the primary carer of the child, receives parenting and public housing support. When younger, Anna took party drugs to cope with her anxiety and depression, but feels now that she has grown out of the habit. Nathan's drug taking and dealing and associated criminal activity have dominated his life for many years, and on one occasion resulted in a serious conviction for which he served a sentence of probation. Anna describes Nathan as extremely aggressive—and more so when taking drugs or alcohol—and possibly having a mental illness, though she believes undiagnosed. The child has been diagnosed with various behavioural disorders, which are now managed with medication and ongoing medical treatment. There are Family Court parenting orders in place granting Anna residence and allowing Nathan weekly contact, however Nathan rarely sees or telephones the child.

From early on in the relationship, Nathan would regularly (and wrongly) accuse Anna of cheating on him, he would often check on her whereabouts and who she was spending time with, and constantly monitored her money while refusing to make any contribution himself to rent and other joint expenses. On a few occasions when Nathan got drunk and felt that Anna was giving him attitude, he would put his hands around her throat strangling her in front of others. Anna became pregnant when Nathan was on probation, and child protection was alerted to Nathan's physical and emotional violence towards her. On a visit during her pregnancy, a child protection officer told her the child would be taken away from her if she stayed with Nathan. Anna wasn't overly concerned because she had good family support around her and, with the help of a local youth service, was attending parenting and ante-natal classes and getting set up at home.

Nathan's physical violence did however escalate during and after the pregnancy. Nathan wielded a knife at Anna causing her to barricade herself in a locked room. While the baby slept, he strangled and beat her so badly that she blacked out and, with help from a family member, was taken by ambulance to the hospital and treated for multiple fractures, and facial and scalp wounds. Two months later, he yanked her arm forcefully, resulting in a serious elbow injury and lengthy recovery. Nathan was often drunk or stoned during these violent rampages, and would always flee the scene leaving Anna to fend for herself. On one occasion, Nathan assaulted Anna while they were walking with their child to the local shops. He took off with the child, leaving Anna on the street with severe cuts and bruising and torn clothes. Police were alerted and successfully applied to the court for a two-year protection order on Anna's behalf, with the child named as a protected party.

On the expiration of the first order, police obtained a further identical order, which is due to expire in the coming months. Anna has spoken to a local domestic violence support worker who is encouraging her to seek a five-year order. Anna reports feeling both frustrated and terrified because, despite having these orders and being on the police high-alert list, Nathan has repeatedly and flagrantly breached the orders, and continues to do so regularly, by stalking Anna and the child, ringing and letting her know where she has been and with whom, and threatening physical harm and death. Nathan has ready access to guns and knives and, on one occasion when he was facing the possibility of a jail term for another offence, threatened to shoot Anna's mother and Anna herself if Anna tried to disappear with the child. Anna has returned to police, repeatedly, to make statements attesting to Nathan's breaches, and at times, has had to appear at the hearing, self-represented (due to no access to Legal Aid), accompanied by a local domestic violence support worker, and intimidated by the prospect of Nathan being in the courtroom. Nathan would frequently seek and obtain adjournments for the breach hearings; and whilst he was often found guilty of breach, he has never received other than a fine as penalty. Following each hearing, Anna expected that the police would contact her to advise the outcome, but she found that she had to constantly ring and ask. She was only ever told about the fines, and can't say whether convictions were recorded, or whether Nathan has ever been charged with stalking, assault or any other offence related to his domestic and family violence towards her and the child.

Anna believes that Nathan continues to be involved with criminal activities and that he is known to police. Although Nathan doesn't physically approach Anna, he continues to monitor her and the child through his family and friends. Anna feels constantly unsafe and under threat, and won't venture out of the house without people who can protect her and the child. Anna regularly changes her appearance and telephone number, and has recently changed the locks on her house. The police have cautioned her to lock herself in. Still young, Anna is desperate to establish a normal and happy life; however she feels trapped and damaged by Nathan's ongoing domestic and family violence, and by what she perceives to be the failure of the justice system to recognise the seriousness of Nathan's crimes and to punish him appropriately, and to protect her and the child adequately.

Nathan has only ever paid a negligible amount of child support; ultimately, his violence resulted in Anna having to obtain an exemption from claiming. Despite having contact orders, Nathan has always flouted the conditions, or not bothered to see or speak with the child at all. Anna would like to have the orders varied to disallow contact on the basis of Nathan's serious and ongoing violence, however she expects to be criticised by the court for seeking to prevent a relationship between Nathan and the child; and yet has had the experience of being told by child protection that if she remains with Nathan, the child will be removed from her.

Having tried and failed, time and again, over five years to secure proper protection from Nathan, at this stage, Anna can't see what else she can do to improve her situation. She doesn't have the financial resources to engage a private lawyer, and her health is so compromised that her prospects of future employment are limited. She is also very concerned about the daily and long-term impacts of the violence and fear on the child.

Victim experiences - Barbara

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Monitoring] [Older people] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Sexual abuse] [Social abuse] [Women]

Barbara was a 65 year old woman referred to the Seniors Legal and Support Service by a community health service following concerns that she was being physically, sexually, financially and psychologically abused by her husband of six years, Stan.

It was initially difficult to speak to Barbara as her husband was controlling and would not allow her to have contact with people he did not know. Barbara had reported to her community health service worker that her husband abused her by:

- Shouting, swearing and name calling.
- Rarely leaving her alone so that she was unable to have contact with anyone without his knowledge or presence. Barbara's only outing and contact with friends was through Church as she was permitted to attend the Sunday service.
- Intentionally tripping her on a number of occasions while knowing that she had multiple health problems and was physically frail.
- Sexually abusing her on a regular basis and refusing to take "no" for an answer.
- Terrifying her to the point that she feared taking any action in case he retaliated with abuse.

In addition, Barbara was financially dependent on her husband and he controlled all their finances. She was unable to receive social security benefits because of her husband's income and assets. Barbara owned the house she and her husband were living in and she was fearful that he would "trash the house" if she left him.

Barbara informed the Seniors Legal and Support Service that her husband became abusive soon after they married. His son was also disrespectful towards Barbara and she was anxious that he would move in with them. Barbara had no contact with her own daughter from a previous relationship although she did have a close relationship with her sister who lived in Adelaide. Her sister contacted her by phone daily but was unable to provide practical assistance due to distance. Her sister was also afraid of Stan.

Barbara had become socially isolated during her marriage to Stan and had lost contact with many friends and family at his insistence. She had several serious medical conditions and had been advised that her prognosis is poor and she should not expect to live long.

Barbara instructed the Seniors Legal and Support Service that she would like her husband out of her life so that she could “live in peace” for the remainder of her life.

The solicitor and social worker made initial contact by phone when Stan was at work. Barbara was provided with immediate advice on her options for a DVO and an ouster condition. Barbara was reluctant to act on this fearing that her husband’s abuse and violence would escalate if he discovered she had sought legal advice. Domestic violence counselling and support was provided to Barbara in partnership with community services to help her make clear decisions about her safety and future. Safety plans put in place while Barbara continued to live with her husband.

The Seniors Legal and Support Service solicitor helped Barbara to draft a DVO application with ouster condition when Barbara decided she would separate from her husband. Care was taken to ensure her safety during this process - Barbara was only seen in a safe place, and phone calls were only made to her mobile at times when it was safe to ring. The Seniors Legal and Support Service solicitor provided legal representation for her DVO application.

The solicitor also provided advice regarding Stan and Barbara’s Binding Financial Agreement and liaised with Barbara’s community health service worker to assist with an application to Centrelink for income support.

Later, the solicitor also assisted with a divorce application while the social worker continued to provide emotional support and counselling as Barbara coped with the trauma of living with an abusive spouse and then made adjustments to living on her own. A psychology service referral was given but Barbara’s frailty and unwillingness to trust “officials” meant she did not take this up.

With assistance over 15 months, Barbara was able to remove her husband from her home and live without violence, fear and anxiety. Barbara also wanted closure by ending the marriage and all efforts were made by the Seniors Legal and Support Service to expedite a divorce application, however, Barbara passed away prior to the hearing.

Victim experiences - Ben

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Parenting orders] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Social abuse] [Systems abuse]

Ben and Alison were in a relationship for around 3 years. They have 1 child together, James. James is now 2 years old.

During the relationship, Ben experienced Alison to be very extreme in her emotions. There were times when Alison became very upset and angry in situations which seemed to be unprompted or arise out of relatively minor or unexpected disagreements. Alison often became very jealous and often, without reason, accused Ben of having affairs with other people.

Alison would often become angry and upset when Ben went out with any of his friends or family. If Ben was going out, Alison would often quiz Ben on whom he was going with and where he was going. Ben often did not spend time with his friends or family so that Alison did not become upset.

There were several occasions where Alison broke Ben's belongings, sometimes throwing them around. Sometimes, Alison physically assaulted Ben.

On an occasion, when Ben was driving, Alison accused Ben of having affairs with his friend's wife as well as a neighbour. Alison then punched Ben in the face with a closed fist while driving, causing Ben to bleed from his mouth and nose.

On another occasion, Ben's family invited Ben, Alison and James over to their home for Christmas lunch. Alison was unhappy about Ben seeing his family. Alison refused to see Ben's family and would not allow James to go. Ben went over to his family's home alone. Upon his return, Ben brought back gifts for Alison and James from his family. Alison threw the bag of gifts at the wall breaking the items and pushed Ben in the chest and in the back as he tried to walk away from her.

Often unprompted or after a minor disagreement, Alison would demand that Ben leave their home. If Ben would not agree with something Alison wanted, she would threaten to call the Police on Ben or threaten to kill herself until he relented.

After Ben and Alison separated, Alison became increasingly threatening.

Alison told Ben to "watch his back" and talked about her friends in motorcycle gangs. Alison also sent text messages to Ben on many occasions with comments like "I dreamed you died. Let's hope dreams come true". Alison often threatened that Ben would never see James again.

Alison also became increasingly emotionally abusive towards Ben. Often, Alison made comments to Ben like "everyone thinks you are a disgusting and pathetic cunt". Alison was particularly derogatory about Ben's relationship with his son. She would tell Ben that James hates him; and make sexually explicit comments about Ben and James. Also, Alison often made taunting comments about Ben's sister who had died.

Initially after separation, Alison would only allow James to spend time with Ben in very limited ways or not at all. Ben did not have any risk issues affecting his parenting.

On one occasion, Alison agreed to meet Ben at a shopping centre so that Ben could spend time with James. During the time, Alison became very agitated about how Ben was putting a jumper on James. Alison started to verbally abuse Ben, and then accused him of having affairs during their relationship. Alison slapped Ben in the face. After this incident, Alison made a private application for a protection order against Ben. Alison did not attend any of the Court dates and the application was dismissed.

On another occasion, Alison stalked Ben whilst he was spending time with James. There was an occasion when Ben was at his parent's home with James at a time when Alison thought James should be having his nap. Alison sent Ben text messages demanding that he leave his parent's home. Alison was very controlling around James' time with Ben. Alison would demand that Ben send constant photos of James to her to prove that he was caring for James in accordance with her requirements. This included photos of James wearing the pyjamas she wanted him to wear, the right bed clothes in his cot and the right toys.

After Ben was unable to have any regular time with James, he invited Alison to dispute resolution to try and sort out some arrangements for Ben. Alison did not respond to the invitation.

In the meantime, Alison told Ben that she was taking James to Bali for a short holiday. At first, Ben was concerned about agreeing to a passport for James. But after Alison threatened to kill herself, Ben agreed to Alison taking James overseas. Alison went to Bali with James and refused to return for over a year. Indonesia is not a party to the Hague Convention. On two occasions, at Alison's request, Ben sent Alison hundreds of dollars to pay for flights for Alison and James to return. Alison took the money but did not use it for their return.

Eventually, Alison returned to Australia with James. Ben initiated family law proceedings. Ultimately, the Family Law Court made final orders for James to spend regular but age appropriate time with Ben.

Ben did not particularly identify himself as a victim of domestic and family violence. Ben did recognise that the relationship with Alison had a damaging effect on his self esteem and sense of self; and engaged in counselling.

Victim experiences - Bianca

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Animal abuse] [Children] [Coercive control] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children to domestic and family violence] [Factors affecting risk - strangulation] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Legal representation and self-represented litigants] [Parenting orders and impact on children] [People living in regional, rural and remote communities] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Property proceedings] [Protection orders] [Relocation] [Systems abuse] [Women]

Bianca and Tom were in a relationship for 13 years and have three children who were between pre and primary school age at separation. Both Bianca and Tom are tertiary educated with professional qualifications. Apart from when the children were infants, Bianca worked in professional, well-remunerated employment and was the sole income earner for most of the relationship. Tom had worked sporadically early in the relationship but stopped working soon after the birth of their first child and hasn't worked since.

Bianca met Tom through a mutual friend when she was in her late teens. It was her first intimate relationship. Tom had been in a previous relationship where his partner alleged domestic violence. Bianca says she has always been a high energy, driven sort of person who likes to get things done. Tom on the other hand lacks motivation and found employment difficult to maintain despite being highly intelligent. Bianca tended to 'mother' Tom from early in the relationship and took on all of the household duties while also working full-time, without being conscious of or concerned by the imbalance. This however emerged as a problem after the birth of their first child when Bianca's attentions necessarily turned to the baby, and she began asking Tom to help around the house. He mostly resisted, and when Bianca insisted, he did so begrudgingly. Even when Bianca was recovering from C-section births, Tom would refuse to bring the baby to her for feeding during the night, claiming there was no point in both of them being tired.

Over time, Bianca and Tom argued often about the division of labour. As the demands of children and work grew, Bianca felt that Tom's failure to contribute in any useful way was unreasonable and intolerable. Tom claimed Bianca was constantly nagging him and trying to control him, and he would frequently become angry and verbally abusive towards her. She had experienced trauma as a child and suffered Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) for many years as a result. Before and after the birth of their third child, Bianca began experiencing anxiety and panic attacks reminiscent of her earlier years. When hospitalised, she felt a sense of safety and calm that she realised was absent from her home life. Tom resented her time in hospital; he told her she needed to get over it, and that it was too much for him to have to look after the house and children while she was away receiving treatment.

After Bianca and Tom built their home on a small rural block, Tom developed an obsession with guns. He purchased five guns and went hunting most weekends. Tom's firearms licence required him to secure the guns in a safe in the house; Bianca had to constantly ensure that he complied with these requirements as he was lax. Tom regularly spoke about guns and shooting in conversation, he read books about serial killers and snipers, he would make home-made guns in his shed, and he even explained to Bianca on one occasion the steps involved in administering lethal poison without leaving a trace. As their relationship deteriorated, Bianca observed veiled threats in these behaviours and found them intimidating and troubling. During the relationship, Tom shot and killed Bianca's dog and pony for no valid reason. He also deliberately released her hand-raised cockatiel into the wild.

Bianca describes three physically violent incidents that occurred in the course of an otherwise increasingly dysfunctional relationship. As the situation worsened, Bianca felt she was constantly 'walking on eggshells' around Tom, trying to placate him and take the pressure off him so as to avoid any escalation of his anger, but his behaviour continued.

The first incident was when Bianca and Tom's first child was aged two. They had been arguing and Tom picked Bianca up under her arms and threw her across the room and into a door frame, causing bruising to the back of her head. Tom is more than a foot taller than Bianca, thick set, muscular and immensely strong. Bianca was in shock and terrified; she retreated to the other end of the house unable to comprehend what had happened. In the days following she sought help from a counsellor (who she continued to see for many years) and told Tom that it must never happen again.

The second incident was some years later, by which stage they had three young children. Bianca had arrived home late after a long and demanding day at work. Tom hadn't fed the children or made any attempt to prepare them for bed; the house was in chaos and Tom was playing violent computer games. Bianca was angry and frustrated with Tom's selfishness and lack of effort. Tom called her a 'fat cunt' (knowing that this was particularly hurtful to Bianca who had suffered an eating disorder) and pushed her into the wall. In front of the children, he threatened to shoot himself in the head, and then walked out to the car parked in the yard. He was due to go hunting the next morning and he normally locked his guns in the car the night before. Bianca feared that he was going to retrieve a gun from the car and carry out his threat of suicide, so she rang the ambulance. Multiple ambulance and police officers arrived. Tom was taken to the hospital for review and then spent a couple of nights at his mother's house. On this occasion, Bianca did not tell police about the violence and abuse in the relationship; she didn't want to get Tom into trouble or make him angrier and therefore more abusive. She felt that if she decided to leave, she would need a plan to get away quickly to somewhere safe.

After the second incident, Bianca rang a domestic violence support service for some advice about how she might safely leave the relationship. Bianca believed they were more interested in reporting the incident to child safety than giving her any support as the victim of abuse. She felt insulted that a judgement had been made about her ability to protect her children and that she may be exposing them to harm by staying with a suicidal partner.

Bianca decided she needed to address the relationship problems with Tom before making any other decisions about leaving. She wrote him a letter and let him know that she wouldn't tolerate verbal or physical abuse and that they needed marriage counselling. Tom agreed and for a time, things improved between them. Soon enough though, Bianca reverted to taking on most of the household and parenting responsibilities and continuing to work full-time so as to avoid any instance where Tom may become angry and abusive. Tom spent most of his days playing computer games even when their youngest child was home from pre-school. The relationship deteriorated further: the arguments continued, and Bianca discovered that, at two separate times, Tom had placed a key logger on her computer in order to log her internet activity. When confronted, Tom claimed that he was trying to keep Bianca safe, a story she rejected. She told him she had nothing to hide, he could have all her passwords, but it was not acceptable for him to secretly monitor her.

One night, after a particularly heated argument, the third incident occurred. Tom started drinking scotch and went on to drink most of the bottle. He rarely drank alcohol; this was out of character. As Tom became more intoxicated, he became emotional about his past failed relationships. He said he should just die, and could understand how murder-suicides happen. He also threatened to wake the children up and ask them which parent they loved most. Bianca was very concerned by this talk, but felt it was likely to be caused by the alcohol, so suggested to Tom that he go to bed. She then tried to get up from the couch and Tom grabbed her tightly by the wrists and held her in place for three hours, both by the wrists and through the weight of his body on hers. Meanwhile, he used Bianca's hands to hit himself hard and repeatedly in the face, saying 'I'd rather you punch me than leave me'. Bianca's hands turned blue, and despite her pleading, Tom would not release his grip, saying he couldn't let her go because she would escape and the police would take his guns away. Later, Bianca pleaded with him not to kill her, at which point he released his hands and placed them around her throat, squeezing tightly and saying 'you stupid woman, of course I'm not going to kill you; the reason I haven't already is that I don't want to'. Terrified for her life, Bianca decided to try and settle Tom down: telling him it was all a misunderstanding, that they could work it out in the morning after some sleep. Tom grabbed her by the wrists again and dragged her down the hall and into bed with him where he continued holding her. Bianca waited for him to fall asleep, got her phone out of her back pocket, switched it to silent mode, and texted two friends she knew would respond at that hour of night. They called the police and Bianca fled to the neighbour's house and waited. She felt she had no other choice, but was also extremely worried that Tom would wake up and a hostage situation may arise given that the children were still asleep in the house.

The police arrived promptly; they removed Tom and took him to the watch house and located the guns. The police initiated a protection order application on Bianca's behalf and the matter was dealt with the following day. Bianca was traumatised and exhausted and unable to properly process what was going on. The magistrate told Tom he didn't have to agree to an order naming the children as it would have family law implications for him. The police prosecutor asked Bianca if she would agree to a one-year order without admissions where the children weren't named. She wanted the matter over and felt sorry for Tom who was crying, so she agreed. Bianca later regretted this decision as the 'no admissions' condition meant that she had no evidence of domestic and family violence that she could use to substantiate her claims in the subsequent parenting proceedings in the Federal Circuit Court. She was however satisfied that it was appropriate not to have the children named on the protection order as she was and remains committed to the children having a relationship with their father. Bianca was informed by police shortly after Tom's guns were confiscated that they had been released to Tom's brother (with Tom's consent), who holds a valid gun license. In releasing Tom's guns to his brother, Bianca is concerned that he now has ready access to them.

On the evening of the third incident the police had asked Bianca if she wanted to have Tom charged with deprivation of liberty. She declined, and police did not take any steps to obtain evidence of the offence, for example photos of bruising on Bianca's wrists caused by Tom's grip. Some months later however, after time with her counsellor, Bianca made a complaint and gave a statement. Tom was represented, and on advice on the morning of the trial, accepted a plea bargain and pleaded guilty to common assault in lieu of deprivation of liberty. No conviction was recorded and Tom was ordered to observe a six month good behaviour bond and pay a $500 fine. For Bianca, this was some acknowledgement of Tom's violence towards her, though somewhat mitigated; and she avoided the ordeal of cross-examination, which she had endured from Tom personally only weeks earlier at the hearing for the variation of the police-initiated protection order.

Bianca applied prior to its expiration to vary the police-initiated protection order by extending it for another year. The magistrate refused to grant a temporary order to bridge the gap between lodgement and expiry, insisting that the matter be heard. Tom made a cross application alleging abuse by Bianca in the form of name calling. Both applications were heard together. Bianca prepared all of her own affidavit material and engaged a barrister for the hearing. Bianca felt highly distressed and vulnerable in the courtroom and PTSD evidence was tendered to support a claim for protected witness status. The magistrate rejected the submission concluding that Bianca was articulate and intellectually well-equipped and did not require protection during the proceedings. As a result, Tom, self-represented in this matter, was permitted to cross examine Bianca for three hours. Tom taunted and demeaned her with his questions—Bianca felt it was another version of the abuse she had long-experienced—and the magistrate gave him considerable leeway. Bianca felt that the magistrate was demonstrating the need for procedural fairness, but equally that her evidence had been taken seriously. The Magistrate granted Bianca the one-year extension and dismissed Tom's application.

While the criminal and protection order matters were being dealt with, Bianca sought to address parenting and property issues.

A property settlement was reached with Tom fairly quickly, though Bianca queries its fairness. They jointly owned an unencumbered house worth $300,000. Bianca was the sole income earner and principal homemaker throughout the relationship. Tom made negligible homemaker contributions and earned no income. Bianca had accumulated $160,000 in super. Tom received the unencumbered house property, and Bianca received $85,000 in cash (paid by Tom's mother) and some furniture of little value.

The parenting proceedings were more prolonged and complex, requiring an interim and final hearing in the Federal Circuit Court. Essentially, Bianca sought to relocate to an area where she felt safer while maintaining her job position and yet still continuing the arrangements with Tom for some weekend contact. Relocation necessarily involved the children changing schools, and this became a central issue of contention. At the interim hearing, Bianca was ordered to resume living with the children in a certain area and to return them to the local primary school. The interim order was very difficult for Bianca because it meant that she had to live in a small, rural town close to Tom and his family; she avoided going to shops or community spaces for fear of coming into contact with them. She needed medication to cope with her heightened anxiety. These circumstances continued for more than a year pending the final hearing and orders. After considerable expense and time, the final orders endorsed Bianca's initial application. She and the children, and her new partner and his two children, now live in the area she originally proposed, and Tom's contact arrangements continue unchanged.

Bianca and her new partner have bought a house, and they are settling in well together with their children as a combined family, while contact arrangements with Tom are mostly straightforward and without incident. Tom's moods around contact times remain unpredictable, and Bianca has developed ways of dealing with his moods so that her safety isn't compromised.

For the past five years post separation, Tom commenced a campaign of complaints to QPS and Child Safety regarding allegations of risk to the children in Bianca's care. While the process of investigation of Tom's complaints by these systems was humiliating and stressful for Bianca, both QPS and Child Safety have deemed Tom's complaints unsubstantiated on each occasion. Bianca has experienced numerous police welfare checks at her home, and felt violated by the unnecessary intrusion of these systems into her private life once again. Recently Tom has been encouraging the children to use their smart phones to covertly record their mother in her home and to 'airdrop' these recordings to him. Tom continues to denigrate Bianca and her partner in the children's presence. Bianca is concerned about the emotional harm caused to the children through their continued involvement by Tom and worries about the long-term psychological impact of Tom's sustained manipulation of the children upon them. It is difficult for Bianca to effectively parent under these circumstances. Tom has also deliberately contravened the Family Court Orders in place, retaining the children longer than permitted and picking them up from school on days when they are not in his care. Bianca believes that these actions are designed to continue to impress upon her that he is "in charge" and that she remains at the mercy of his unpredictable moods and behaviours. Bianca continues to feel helpless and traumatised but has little faith in the systems set up to support survivors of DFV in dealing with these more insidious and subtle manifestations of coercive control – especially technology facilitated abuse and the involvement of the children.

Bianca also experiences continuing stress in relation to the level of debt she has had to incur to meet legal expenses associated with the protection order, parenting and property matters. She estimates this at more than $100,000. Bianca has borrowed from family and on credit facilities, and the repayments are unmanageable. While Bianca earns an annual salary of around $90,000, debt costs are disproportionate to normal living expenses and the costs associated with bringing up children. Tom pays no child support. Bianca has been unable throughout all these matters to obtain legal aid due to her income level. She has however been able to obtain Victim Assist for some relocation costs and the installation of a home security system.

Bianca has spent considerable time, personal effort, resources, and compromised health on securing her own safety, protecting the wellbeing of her children, and ensuring the children's relationship with their father, while coping personally with long-term domestic and family violence. She feels the police have been attentive, supportive and respectful in all their dealings with her. She will always value the support given by a particular female police officer at any hour of the day and night. Bianca also respects the court system and the judicial officers making the decisions, although she found those processes traumatic. She is proud of the time and effort she spent in preparing affidavit material for these proceedings, and believes it helped to achieve the best outcome for her children and herself.

Victim experiences - Brenda

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Older people] [People with mental illness] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Social abuse]

Brenda is a 70 year old woman who was referred to a Seniors Legal and Support Service, a State Government-funded service to respond to elder abuse.

Brenda lived with her husband Kevin in a caravan on her daughter's property. Kevin was physically, verbally and emotionally abusive towards Brenda. The police and a domestic violence prevention service helped Brenda to apply for a domestic violence prevention order after Kevin pushed and hit her on several occasions.

Brenda stated that the verbal and emotional abuse had continued after the protection order was made and that he also pushed her from time to time. She could no longer tolerate her husband's behaviour towards her and wished to separate from him.

Brenda's daughter and son-in-law decided they no longer wanted Brenda and Kevin living on their property and became "nasty" towards Brenda. They also blocked Brenda's access to the laundry located in their house.

Kevin told Brenda he intended to travel around Australia for six months in the caravan but Brenda didn't want to leave Brisbane and asked the Seniors Legal and Support Service to help her relocate safely.

She also asked for advice about financial abuse and exploitation from another daughter, Kim. Brenda had lent Kim $105,000 two years previously to help her to purchase her own home. Kim had since sold the house, initially refused to discharge the loan, and then later offered to repay Brenda $150 per week which she said

Brenda could access using her ATM card. Brenda was worried that there was no written agreement and a risk that her daughter would not make regular payments or cease repayments before the full amount was repaid.

Brenda had suffered Post Traumatic Stress Disorder following a home invasion when she was confronted by an intruder. As a result, she feared living alone, being unsupported or socially isolated. She acknowledged that her relationships with her daughters and son-in-law were tense and her relationships with her siblings were also poor.

The Seniors Legal and Support Service lawyer and social worker arranged for a meeting room at the local community centre and community transport so that Brenda could meet them there for a confidential discussion.

Safety plans were discussed with Brenda, including ways the legal service could contact her that would not jeopardise her safety.

The solicitor explained to Brenda that she should call the police if her husband continued to abuse her and clarified that she was required to report any breaches so that orders could be enforced to give her protection.

Brenda considered advice about putting in place a written repayment agreement with Kim but was reluctant to take that step, fearing she would lose her relationship with Kim and that Kim would retaliate by stopping all repayments. Brenda understood that the informal arrangement meant she still risked irregular or possible cessation of payments.

The social worker worked through future housing options with Brenda, taking into account her need for social contact and the financial constraints as a single pensioner once separated from Kevin. The service helped her investigate retirement village, private rental, over-50s private rentals and social housing rental options. Brenda was anxious about her financial survival as an ageing, single renter. The service advocated to the social/public housing authorities to take into account her vulnerabilities.

As a result of a range of supports and legal advice, Brenda was able to obtain a protection order; she learnt more about how the domestic violence legislation applied to her situation and understood her options in dealing with breaches. She also understood her options in dealing with the loan arrangements with her daughter and how to obtain a divorce. Psycho-social supports and practical assistance in securing housing meant Brenda was able to leave an abusive and negative home environment.

Social work support continued to provide Brenda with emotional support while she adjusted to the changes in her life.

Brenda was satisfied that she had made informed decisions for her life and knows how to seek further help and advice from a range of sources should she require it.

Brenda had contacted the Seniors Legal and Support Service twice, about a year apart. She felt unable to act on the issues initially but was encouraged to recontact at any time.

Brenda is vulnerable due to her age and related health issues, social isolation and lack of family support. A protection order and access to ongoing support service advice have given Brenda some confidence and feeling of safety to deal with her situation.

Victim experiences - Carol

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Factors affecting risk] [Fines] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Legal representation and self-represented litigants] [People with children] [People with mental illness] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Sentencing] [Social abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Carol and Rod were both born overseas, sharing a country of origin where they met and lived together for some years before marrying and immigrating to Australia. English is their first language. They have two children who are now adults. Carol and Rod separated after twenty- five years; however they remain married to one another. Carol completed high school and obtained an industry qualification. She now works part-time. Rod is university educated, has a professional qualification and works in highly-remunerated employment. Throughout the relationship Rod worked overseas at remote locations for extended periods, returning home periodically. Rod continues to work in this manner, however Carol believes that he now returns only occasionally as he is concerned about being charged for multiple breaches of the protection order she has against him. Rod sends Carol his pay slips to show her how much money he is earning; he never paid child support. Carol believes that Rod has been mentally unwell for many years, though he's never sought help or a diagnosis. Carol believes Rod has not accepted that the marriage is over even after 12 years of separation; he continues to wear his wedding ring, and tells her and others that they're still together.

Carol describes their long relationship as turbulent and dysfunctional and recognises that Rod's controlling behaviours began in the early years and escalated after they arrived in Australia with their infant first child. When the couple were still living overseas and Carol was pregnant, Rod sought to isolate Carol from her close family and support network by insisting on buying property some distance away from the town where her many family members resided. When Carol needed to buy business wear that was often expensive Rod would monitor her spending. On the advice of a friend, Carol carried a red texta pen so she could mark the tags as sale price before bringing them home for Rod to scrutinise. Carol opened a separate bank account of her own for her earnings and made sure the statements weren't posted to their address; Rod insisted however that her earnings be exhausted first on groceries and household expenses before he made a contribution. Once in Australia, as well as his financially controlling and socially isolating behaviours, Rod became physically violent towards Carol, often punching and at times strangling her over many years. Rod would not allow the children to eat meals with him and Carol; he told them he wanted their mother to himself. Rod also often told the children Carol was mad, and when the children were adults he announced to them and other of Carol's family members that she was dying. At one stage during a separation Rod tried to have Carol declared an unfit mother alleging alcoholism and mental illness; he subpoenaed her medical records, however was unable to substantiate his claims. Carol tried to leave the relationship on four occasions before their final separation. She returned each time because she found it too difficult to care for the children properly, she did not have adequate financial resources of her own, and Rod would regularly turn up at the homes of friends or family where she was staying and try to claim her back.

One evening Rod's behaviour became so terrifying to Carol that she believed he would kill her. Rod had pinned their older child up against the wall; Carol retaliated telling him never to touch the children. For years, Carol had put up with Rod's violence and abuse for fear that resistance would only exacerbate his behaviour; but she would not tolerate the children being harmed. Rod's response was to force Carol into a chair, strangle her and hold two knives to her throat. The following day Carol's neighbour told her that they thought an animal was being tortured in the garden. Somehow Carol managed to call the police; they attended quickly and, witnessing the marks on Carol's neck and Rod's state, took the matter seriously. As the police were arriving at the house, Rod took his shirt off and started drinking spirits from a bottle, though he'd not drunk previously that night. He tried to push past the police to get at Carol, and when stopped he smashed the glasses on the kitchen bench. The police handcuffed Rod and detained him elsewhere for the night while an officer remained and took a statement from Carol. She was extremely concerned that if the police took action against Rod, he would return the next day and kill her. The police persisted telling Carol that they must proceed and get a protection order on her behalf against Rod to ensure her safety. The matter was set down to be dealt with at the Magistrates Court the following afternoon, however Rod failed to appear and a warrant was issued for his arrest. The hearing proceeded and a final two-year protection order was made by the court prohibiting Rod from any form of contact with Carol and allowing Rod only supervised visits with the children.

Carol found the court experience intimidating and unfamiliar: Rod was represented by a private lawyer; she was required to be in the courtroom with Rod at close proximity and no screens or other protections were offered. On a positive note the court's domestic violence service arranged for her to sit in a separate waiting room before the hearing.

On the day the first protection order was granted, Rod withdrew hundreds of thousands of dollars from various joint accounts and a line of credit never previously used, and sent the money to overseas bank accounts Carol had no knowledge of. Carol does not recall signing any documentation for the joint line of credit and was astonished and distraught that the bank would allow it to be drawn down without her authorisation. Rod had on many occasions promised to financially cripple Carol.

Following the protection order—which Carol says marked their final separation—the children lived with Carol, and saw their father occasionally under supervision by family members or friends. Rod did not seek parenting orders from the Family Court to secure this arrangement or to increase his contact time. Eventually, family and friends told Carol that they could no longer supervise Rod's visits with the children because he did not spend the time with the children; rather he used it as an opportunity to question them about Carol.

Since separation Rod's abuse of Carol has been constant and menacing, and continues after 12 years. Being out of the country is no bar to Rod's capacity to abuse Carol. When overseas Rod rings or texts or emails Carol at least twice daily, and often more frequently. These communications are chaotic, disturbing and intimidating: they include taunts and insults; appeals to Carol to return to the marriage with pledges such as I love you, I'm worried about you, and I miss you; and goading with questions such as: Have I tipped you over the edge yet? Why are you making me having to kill you? He has sent pictures of dead children. He also sends Carol postcards, flowers, gifts and grocery deliveries. When in Australia, Rod has slept in the garden of the property where Carol lives (and owns jointly with Rod); he has broken into the property, stalked Carol and her friends in the local area, and twice followed her on overseas trips. On one occasion, knowing he was following her, Carol drove home quickly and locked herself in the house. Rod tried every door and window to gain access. While she sat behind the front door so that Rod couldn't see her, Carol called the police in whispered tones, again so as not to alert him to her presence; the police later told Carol that they did not give the call priority because they expected that if she were genuinely fearful she would be screaming.

Carol has been forced to seek multiple protection orders over the years, and still requires an order even though she questions how effective they are given Rod's serial and flagrant breaches. Due to Rod's regular periods overseas and generally elusive behaviour, service of orders has been recurrently problematic, sometimes taking weeks for service to be effected. Carol has had to apply for substituted service. Rod has also prolonged and thwarted court proceedings by having his lawyer regularly seek adjournments on work grounds. Carol has been vigilant in recording Rod's breaches and regularly reporting them to the police; however she feels that she may be regarded as an annoyance by some police officers. Rod has nevertheless been charged and convicted on five occasions for breaches of protection orders. Each time he has received a fine, which Carol believes has no deterrent effect due to Rod's significant income, and the fine amount has reduced over time despite Rod's reoffending. At no stage has Rod ever been charged with stalking or strangulation offences nor have police ever discussed these possibilities with Carol, though they have mentioned to her that they believe a term of imprisonment is appropriate for a future breach conviction. Carol believes that imprisonment would make a difference to Rod's behaviour especially if he was also required to undertake a perpetrator intervention program as she feels that this is the best opportunity for his mental ill health to be addressed.

Carol has done her best to stay healthy and positive despite the history of abuse she continues to experience. She believes Rod is becoming more dangerous and the fear that Rod will one day kill her remains real and front of her mind. She avoids social media because she's very concerned that it would be another means by which Rod could track her. She has also given up on developing any intimate relationship as she knows that Rod would attempt to follow and intimidate her and any partner.

Carol's financial resources are limited, she earns a modest income, and has no assets of significant value other than the house property she resides in and owns jointly with Rod. Carol has for decades serviced the original debt on the property; she feels she can manage this with her earnings. Rod further mortgaged the property some years ago, and continues to service that liability. Carol's preference is to divorce Rod but this would require a property settlement. Carol knows this process will precipitate the sale of the house property and the equity will largely be exhausted in paying debts accrued by Rod and yet held in their joint names.

Carol has had a long engagement with court processes mostly as a self-represented party attempting to seek protection against Rod's violence and abuse. Her confidence has grown over the years, but she remains concerned that she is unable to secure the legal protection from Rod's abuse that she needs. On one occasion she received advice from legal aid for a breach hearing against Rod; but she has always appeared in protection order matters on her own. She believes that police have mostly taken her complaints seriously, though at times she has felt that she's an annoyance due to her frequent reporting of breaches, or that she's been disbelieved, for example looking to exploit the process to achieve a favourable financial outcome for herself. Carol also feels that the Magistrates she has appeared before have rarely read or fully understood the material setting out the history of the violence and abuse, and that the penalties for breaches of protection orders are inconsistent, inadequate and Magistrate specific. Carol's concerns and fears continue unabated.

Victim experiences - Cassy

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people] [Breach] [Exposing children] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Women]

Cassy and Glen were in a relationship for five years and during that time had five children together aged between four and near newborn at separation. They are both Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander, and neither has been in employment or received any post-secondary training or education. Their income during the relationship was in the form of various welfare benefits. Cassy used cannabis regularly from the age of 13, but has been clean since soon after the birth of their fifth child. Glen is a long-term speed and ice user; his drug taking increased during the relationship and made him more violent particularly when he was 'coming down' or when he couldn't access the drugs readily. Cassy was abused during her childhood by a family friend who was imprisoned briefly as a result, and later, by a close family member. Growing up, Cassy was also significantly involved in the care of a disabled relative.

Glen's violence towards Cassy started several months after their first child was born. Glen punched Cassy in the nose causing severe pain and bleeding. A passerby called the police and an ambulance took her to the hospital. A police-initiated protection order was issued allowing Cassy and Glen to continue living together on the condition that Glen maintained good behaviour towards Cassy. At that stage, Cassy felt committed to the relationship and hoped that she could influence Glen to stop his violence and drug taking. At Cassy's request, Glen was not charged with assault.

During Cassy's second pregnancy, despite the protection order, Glen's violence became more frequent and aggressive, though not as physically severe as previously. Cassy describes the violence as 'blow outs' now and then, rather than an exercise of ongoing control. This continued through to Cassy's third pregnancy when, at six months, Glen beat Cassy badly one afternoon before travelling together on a train with their two children, and again at home the following morning. Cassy was taken by ambulance to the hospital and afterwards, with the children, went to stay with her sister for a week before returning to live with Glen. Again, police asked if Cassy wanted Glen charged with assault, and she declined and he was not charged. Cassy reasoned to herself that the violence was the price she was prepared to pay for having 'beautiful children' with someone who 'had his good sides, and wasn't always an arsehole'.

After their third child was born, when Glen's ice-use was escalating, Cassy started using ice occasionally, hoping that it might bring them closer together. Cassy felt she loved Glen and wanted the relationship to work; she also believed he was a great father and, despite his violence towards her, he would never harm the children. However, the violence continued. When Cassy found out she was pregnant with their fourth child, Glen seriously bashed her nose after an angry verbal exchange between the two of them, and when Glen was 'coming down' from an ice hit. Once again, the police were called and Cassy went to hospital for treatment.

Despite not having been charged for any of his assaults on Cassy, Glen had by that stage been convicted of a breach of the protection order, and received a two-year probationary order with a good behaviour bond and no conviction recorded. He was then convicted of drug possession and received an extended probationary period before being charged with the assault and rape of a relative and a relative's girlfriend respectively. Child protection was alerted and began visiting the home every week to check on the wellbeing of the children and how Cassy was coping. Cassy thought the situation was stable and manageable until child protection acted on a report from a third party claiming that Glen had harmed their son. Cassy does not believe that Glen would have done that, and observed that the child was happy and unharmed on the day in question. Child protection removed all the children from Cassy and Glen's care and resettled them with some of Cassy's relatives.

When Cassy was pregnant with their last child, Glen went into custody on remand awaiting trial of the assault and rape charges. Two days after the birth, child protection removed the child, again to one of Cassy's relatives. Given that Glen was now in custody, Cassy couldn't understand why the infant, or any of the other children, were deemed to be at ongoing risk. She accepted however that they needed to be protected from the violent relationship and believed that the children were being well cared for by her relatives. With the assistance of a lawyer, Cassy was able to ensure the child protection order was made for only 12 months rather than the longer period sought by the child protection department. She commenced supervised contact with all of the couple's children each week, and attended counselling sessions and a parenting program in preparation for their return. She also stopped using illegal drugs.

While Cassy feels she had little support and understanding from police and child protection, she believes that she has benefited a great deal from the advice she received from her lawyers and counsellors. It is critically important to her that the children return to her care, happy and healthy, and she believes she understands the damaging effects of her violent relationship with Glen. When Glen is out of prison she is adamant that she does not want to continue the relationship, and that she will be careful to make proper, safe arrangements for him to have contact with the children.

Victim experiences - Celia

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Factors affecting risk] [Myths and misunderstandings] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Responses in criminal proceedings] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Victims as (alleged) perpetrators] [Women]

Celia has been the victim of violence from Harry over a 20 year relationship. They have a child together.

There is an incident at their home. Police are called. Harry claims that Celia scratched his face. Police observe scratch marks on Harry. Police charge Celia with assault occasioning actual bodily harm and intimidation. Police apply for a protection order against Celia. Celia is required to leave the home; and cannot see her child.

Celia discloses to her lawyer that she has actually been the victim of serious physical and sexual violence by Harry for years. Harry has also been extremely controlling of her. Celia tells her lawyer that on the night in question, Harry had attempted to strangle her and tried to take her phone to stop her from calling police. Celia feared for her life and defended herself.

With the assistance of a lawyer, Celia defends the criminal charges and the protection order. The medical evidence confirms injuries to Celia from attempted strangulation; and the Triple 000 calls confirm Celia's version of events. The Court ultimately accepts Celia's account of violence.

The charges and the protection order against Celia are successfully dismissed.

Victim experiences - Celina

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [People from CALD backgrounds] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Social abuse] [Women]

Celina and David grew up in the same country of origin, however at the time they met through an online dating website, David had been living in Australia for 7 years, and Celina was still living in her home country with her mother. Celina also has a sister and family living in Australia. Both Celina and David have been married previously, are professionally qualified and aged in their thirties. David has a primary-school age child who lives with his former wife and spends regular weekend and holiday time with David. After Celina and David married overseas, David promptly returned to Australia and Celina applied to Australian Immigration for a joint visa for herself and her mother, with David as their sponsor. When the visa was granted, Celina resigned from her professional employment and travelled to Australia to live with David; Celina's mother followed a few months later to allow them some time to settle in together.

Celina speaks fondly of her early days living with David. She described him as gentlemanly, respectful, loving and enthusiastic about showing her the sights of the exciting city she had moved to. Celina had experienced stigma in her own culture due to being a divorced woman, and felt that her marriage to David restored her dreams for a good life and a family. She was committed to supporting David in caring for his child, and believes she made a genuine effort to build a relationship. When the child was staying with Celina and David, Celina would take care of the child's needs, prepare meals and do the housekeeping while David went to work. This was not a lifestyle Celina was accustomed to having been employed and independent for many years. Celina was unable to get employment while on a temporary visa and was therefore entirely financially dependent on David.

One evening, around a month after Celina arrived in Australia, David's behaviour towards her changed abruptly. It was the child's birthday and they had planned to collect the child from the mother's house and go out for dinner. Celina had prepared and wrapped presents. David refused to allow Celina to travel in the car on the basis that it would upset the child's mother. Instead, she was dropped somewhere close to a big junction on the way and was pushed out of the car by force. In the middle of an unfamiliar area, she walked down the street and stopped at a supermarket and decided to wait there as it was getting dark and she didn't know where else to go being still new to Australia. She was left for several hours until David eventually collected her. Celina found herself highly distressed, at night in unfamiliar surrounds, and confused and hurt by David's inconsiderate treatment. Not knowing what to do, she rang his parents and her own mother (all living overseas) seeking their advice and comfort. She pleaded with David's father to contact David and ask him to collect her. David's mother told her that David had a bad temper but he couldn't afford to have another marriage fail. Celina's mother advised that she must try hard to make the marriage work. When David collected Celina later that evening, he shouted abuse at her, claiming that she was trouble and had ruined the child's birthday, and that he didn't want a woman who wouldn't obey him. Once home, David left Celina in the car crying for half an hour then returned and grabbed and shook her violently. Considerably smaller than David, Celina felt scared and weak and asked him to stop; he then dragged her out of the car and pushed her away. Celina fell and hit her head on the concrete driveway resulting in a painful bump to her head and wounded right foot. David dragged her into the house where she laid crying and shaking on the floor while he had a meal. Seemingly to revive her, David began slapping Celina repeatedly on both cheeks, and then tossed a bucket of water over her face. Some hours later, Celina managed to get to her feet and make her way to their bed; however, David had gone to sleep in the child's bedroom, which Celina was shocked by so early in their time living together. In the days following, David apologised to Celina, but remained angry about her contacting the parents and sharing details of their marriage, which he believed should remain private.

Over time, David demanded that Celina take on more and more of the household duties and child caring responsibilities. David began scolding and verbally abusing Celina in the presence of the child who mimicked his father's behaviour towards her. Celina was not allowed a phone of her own; instead, David would give her his personal mobile while he was at work and he would use his office mobile to call her incessantly through the day, principally to tell her what he wanted done and to get details of the meals and snacks she was preparing for the child. When David returned home, he would check the activity and search history on his personal mobile and inspect the food in the fridge and cupboards. So demeaned by this suspicious conduct, Celina decided to document meals and activities through the day by taking digital photographs and loading them on David's Dropbox so he could inspect and verify them. David only ever gave Celina small amounts of cash to cover public transport costs to and from the child's school; otherwise, she had no access to any funds. He also accused her of secreting spare coins for her own use. They argued daily about David's demands and Celina's resistance to comply. David would often skype his parents and complain to them about Celina being a bad wife, aware that Celina was listening.

Not long after the incident on the child's birthday, David had an argument with the child's mother at a changeover occasion and, in full view of the child, tried to strangle her. The child's mother called the police who subsequently issued a protection order against David. Celina believed that he was also charged with assault and the matter would go to a hearing. At the same time Celina's relationship with David was deteriorating, David was putting pressure on Celina to provide a character reference (character evidence) for the court. He told her it was her chance to do something for him and to save the marriage. His lawyer told her that a strong reference from her as David's wife would be highly persuasive to the court. Celina made a number of attempts to write a favourable reference, but felt conflicted and wronged given David's ongoing abuse. She kept the reference to herself, unsigned, knowing that the hearing date was still some months away.

As planned, Celina's mother travelled to Australia with David after he had been on a brief visit to their home country. They were to live together in the same house, and Celina's mother was to share the child's bedroom. David however insisted that the child sleep between him and Celina while the mother stayed in the other room. Celina tried to talk with David about alternative and more comfortable sleeping arrangements, but he wasn't amenable. One night, Celina was left with so little room in the bed that she fell out and injured herself. David handed her over to her mother and went back to sleep. Celina and her mother were forced to sleep together in a very small bed. Thereafter, they spent most nights on the couches in the living room. The marital relationship soured and sexual relations ceased, yet Celina continued to make an effort to look after David's child and keep the household going despite suffering diarrhoea, headaches, muscle and back pain, and feelings of stress and depression.

Another evening (in the presence of Celina and her mother), David skyped his parents, again complaining about Celina. During the conversation, Celina tried to correct David's claims and explain her experience of his behaviour. David called her (in their first language) a prostitute and accused her of having sex with her mother because they slept together. He then wielded a coffee cup as if to throw it at her when Celina's mother physically intervened. Later, as he became increasingly intoxicated, he told them both to leave the house before he turned into an animal; he said he would refuse them food and drinks and get rid of them if they caused trouble with his child. He threatened to separate them and send Celina's mother back to her home country. When David was asleep, Celina and her mother went to a neighbour who called the police. Celina believed the police were sympathetic to her situation and could see that David was volatile and dangerous. While Celina and her mother were at the police station, David arrived and began arguing with the officers in an aggressive manner. The police returned Celina and her mother to David's home as they were unable to find emergency accommodation for them due to their not being permanent residents; again, David began arguing with the police, whereupon the police told Celina and her mother to pack their belongings and leave David's home as soon as possible. Soon after the police left, David destroyed the wedding photographs hung on the wall by smashing them in front of Celina. Celina and her mother were left totally helpless. Using the neighbour's mobile phone, Celina contacted her sister who was living interstate and sought her help. At that time, Celina destroyed the character reference she had written in relation to David's assault proceedings.

The police initiated a protection order application on Celine's behalf and, at the first mention date, secured a temporary protection order. Soon after, Celine and her mother relocated interstate to stay with the sister. A second mention date was set, however the police advised Celina that it wasn't necessary for her to appear in person. When she contacted the police after the mention, she was told that the application had been withdrawn because she had moved interstate.

Celina and her mother began living with the sister, however it was soon apparent that the sister and her family didn't have the financial resources to support them, and they were forced to leave and find alternative accommodation. Celina sought advice from a local domestic violence support organisation which she says provided them with advice and access to support when she and her mother were desperate and homeless. The service arranged refuge accommodation for them both, provided transport to the refuge and financial assistance to cover their ongoing needs, referred them to psychiatric counselling to cope with the stress and depression they were experiencing, and gave Celina advice and assistance in applying for a protection order on the basis of David's abusive and threatening behaviour. Celina and her mother also applied for and were granted the Centrelink Special Benefit soon after they moved interstate. Celina obtained a temporary protection order, however service was delayed as David's current address and whereabouts are not known. When eventually the matter was heard by the magistrate, Celina was unrepresented, whereas David had a solicitor and barrister acting for him. Feeling pressured, Celina accepted a written undertaking from David that he would not contact her, and would be of good behaviour and not commit any act of domestic violence towards her for one year. Celina and her mother sought advice from a community immigration lawyer, and have now been granted permanent residency status. They are now both housed, safe and supported, and Celina is studying. Celina is not sure of the outcome of David’s assault charge; however, she believes he pleaded guilty and was placed on a good behaviour bond.

Victim experiences - Erin

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Coercive control] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children to domestic and family violence] [Factors affecting risk] [Family consultants and expert witnesses] [Family law proceedings] [Myths and misunderstandings] [Parenting orders and impact on children] [People living in regional, rural and remote communities] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Social abuse] [Systems abuse] [Women]

Erin and Seth married and lived together for 12 years. Both are from rural farming backgrounds. They have three children who were quite young at separation. Erin has post-graduate qualifications and over some years has acquired recognised expertise. Seth did not finish high school, however has a diploma and farming-related experience. Erin had a troubled relationship with her own family through the marriage, which has continued after separation. She feels she was blamed for a poor choice in Seth and then for the marital breakdown. Erin has been excluded from the family farming business and assets but she places a strong value on family and has endeavoured to foster a relationship, especially so the children would know their grandparents, uncle, and cousins. There is also a history of antagonism by Seth's family towards Erin with the exception of one family member who has remained supportive.

Over the course of the marriage, Erin experienced negative, controlling interference from her own and Seth's families including verbal and physical abuse in the presence of the children. It became problematic to involve family in the care of the children while Erin and Seth attended to work responsibilities; consequently, they stopped doing things together so that one would be available to stay home with the children.

A significant rupture occurred in the family when Seth was involved in a serious accident making him lose confidence. Seth's own family farming business—in which he worked, and he and Erin had a part interest—was then sold. Seth struggled to adjust, and financial security from the farm sale took away the urgency to work which was not a good combination. Erin says Seth had a career crisis and he insisted that she and the children travel around with him looking for other opportunities. It was during this time that Seth began denigrating Erin, blaming her for joint financial decisions they previously made, claiming she was inept and incapable of making basic decisions. Erin believed that Seth was jealous of her achievements and humiliating her was his way of dealing with his own deficits. She also believed that throughout the marriage Seth deliberately set about to isolate her from her professional and personal networks so as to limit her capacity to progress in her own work and life. Over time, the situation became intolerable to Erin. From time to time, she would drive away from wherever they were staying to get some brief respite. Erin was aware that Seth had an arsenal of guns (he and his father are hunters), and, as Seth's behaviour became more irrational, she became increasingly worried about how he might use them.

Eventually, Seth decided to move interstate to be closer to his family and to have time to find himself. He tried to deliver Erin and the children to Erin's family, but they refused to house them on the family property. Erin and the children were forced to live with Seth in motels for a number of months before Erin organised a rental house, a quite expensive one that was the only one he would agree to. Within weeks of moving in, Seth was spending more time away than at home, and would take the family car. Erin ended up having to pay for the rental house and purchase another car. The couple separated and a year after reaching a property settlement, Erin felt she and the children were emotionally able to move to a house she bought in her own right. She hoped to give the children a sense of stability as Seth's week about contact with them was erratic, and each changeover time was an opportunity for him to put her down in front of the children. In the time following separation Seth's abusive behaviour towards Erin escalated considerably. He also took deliberate steps to recruit Erin's and his own family as participants in the abuse. In one year after separation Seth again moved interstate and chose to see the children for only limited time on school holidays.

The couple divorced and agreed on a parenting plan, through solicitors, for the care of the children: they would live with Erin and spend four nights each fortnight with Seth. Seth never followed the arrangement; he would take or leave the children as he wished, and refused to consult Erin or comply with any routine.

Seth finally got a job and permanent accommodation on the farm where he worked. The couple's sons were then involved in an accident while at the farm with Seth. The youngest suffered a head injury and Seth didn't seek suitable medical support, driving him to town instead of calling an ambulance. It wasn't as serious as feared, but the child experienced health issues and was absent from school as a result. It was clear to Erin that she hadn't been given a truthful account of the accident. It became apparent to Erin that her family were concerned about Seth's parenting, calling him irresponsible in front of the children on many occasions, and suggesting that he not have contact with them. Erin found herself having to stand up for the children's right to have both parents in their lives, resulting on further conflict with her own parents. Seeming to take advantage of this rift, Seth encouraged Erin's parents to call for a Justice Examination Order to be issued placing Erin under surveillance by police and psychologists for around a week. During his contact time, Seth began alienating the two older children from Erin. He would report to Erin that they were afraid of her and that she was violent and abusive towards them when in her care. What significantly damaged Erin's relationship with the older two children and prolonged proceedings was Seth's encouragement of the eldest child to make assault allegations against Erin. She was charged and released on bail, and the charges were subsequently dismissed. This was traumatic and humiliating for Erin.

On one occasion, Seth assaulted Erin in the children's presence and then drove off with all three children in the car. The police were called but no action was taken to return the children to Erin. As a consequence, Erin made an application to the Family Court for interim parenting orders. The first family report highlighted alienating and aligning behaviour by Seth in relation to the two older children and concluded that it was clear that Seth wanted Erin out of the children's lives. The court ordered that the three children live with Erin and have contact with Seth three weekends in every four. Counselling was ordered for all three children; however Seth later withdrew the two older children from counselling accusing the counsellor of not doing what he expected of her.

Seth subsequently breached the interim parenting orders. During this time, child safety initially removed the children from both parents and then, on application, delivered them to Seth's family pending a further interim hearing in the Family Court. Further interim parenting orders were made requiring that the children live with Seth and allowing Erin to have weekly two-hour contact visits at a safe house and periodic phone calls. Erin found these visits totally humiliating as she felt she was watched and listened to. She believes this forced the older two children further away from her because, as teenagers, they hated the space.

Erin was advised by her solicitor not to apply for a protection order as those proceedings may jeopardise or delay the proceedings in the Family court.

It was another 12 months before the parenting matters came to a final hearing in the Family Court. The second family report confirmed the alienation tactics highlighted in the first report. The judge acknowledged this conclusion and indicated that it wasn't appropriate for Seth to care for the youngest child for extended periods. There was however no broader recognition of Seth's violence and abuse. The judge did not give any credit to the allegations regarding Erin's mental ill health. Seth tried to accuse Erin of being an alcoholic.

The family report writer was the only witness in the proceedings. The court ordered that the two older children live with Seth and be free to visit Erin as they wish, and that the youngest child return to live with Erin, with fortnightly weekend contact with Seth. Erin believes that the 12 month delay gave Seth the opportunity to cause a great deal of psychological harm to the two older children in continuing his alienating tactics. Whilst an Independent Children's Lawyer was appointed, Erin observed that the ICL met with the children only once and otherwise performed no obviously useful function; she found that she had to insist that the ICL explain the orders to the two older children as she was very concerned that they believed the court had ordered that they not have contact with her.

These parenting arrangements have continued now for 10 months. Child safety found that Seth's allegations against Erin regarding her mental ill health and unfitness to care for the children were unsubstantiated. Still, Erin has no meaningful contact with her two older children. There are the occasional texts and phone calls, but they are commonly abusive towards Erin; periodically, they involve coaxing their younger sibling into disclosing information about or making demands of their mother. Changeover for the youngest child typically occurs at a service station midway between the parents' houses. Seth uses these opportunities to put down Erin, and when the two older children accompany him, they remain in the car and turn their backs to her.

Seth's allegations against Erin were never substantiated and yet post separation and throughout the course of the Family Court proceedings, Seth was able to alienate their two older children from Erin and, consequently, the youngest child. Erin has felt frustrated by the lack of communication or connection between the various courts and agencies that govern her and her children's circumstances. She remains very concerned about her relationship with her two older children, and their relationship with their younger sibling, and whether there is any prospect that they will get the help they need to positively rebuild these relationships. While the court ordered counselling, it has only occurred once for the oldest two. There is now almost no communication between the oldest two children and Erin. Erin is frustrated with the court order allowing the older children to see her as they choose, believing it denies any hope of her having a good relationship with them.

Erin is now in financial trouble. While Erin was able to purchase her own home as a result of the early property settlement reached with Seth, since then she has had to borrow money on that security to fund her legal fees in the order of $100,000. Meanwhile, she has started a consultancy business, the returns from which are predictably modest through the building phase. She has received supplementary benefits from Centrelink; however she is currently facing (what she believes are unfounded) claims that she was overpaid. At no stage was Erin entitled to legal aid, whereas Seth received legal aid funding throughout despite having significant financial support from his family. She has recently missed her daughter's birthday and is struggling to focus on her work. She feels like she needs a miracle. Financially, she lives day to day, trying to make sure she can provide well enough for her youngest child.

Victim experiences - Faith

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Breach of protection order] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Myths] [People affected by substance misuse] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Social abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Faith and Ryan were in a relationship for around 15 years, and have five children together ranging from early primary to high school age at separation. Faith also has an adult child from a previous relationship. Faith is tertiary educated and employed in a professional role. Ryan completed an apprenticeship following high school and has worked periodically during the relationship; however is currently unemployed and receiving Centrelink benefits. Ryan had a work accident some years ago and received a significant compensation payout. He continues to take medication to manage his pain. The five children live with Faith in the family home. Ryan has contact with the children about one day each week, supervised by his parents at their home.

Faith and Ryan met in a social setting and began dating. Ryan went with Faith on her first work posting away from their home town. At that stage, Faith noticed that Ryan could get angry and frustrated easily. It was when Faith was pregnant with their first child that Ryan became abusive towards her. The abuse started as name calling; he would call her a 'fat ugly cunt' and a 'loser' if he felt he wasn't getting his own way or he objected to spending money. Initially, Faith would fire back her disapproval, but over time she became so diminished by the abuse that she said and did nothing, which would enrage Ryan even more.

Faith was employed through the relationship other than when the children were very young. She and Ryan had a joint bank account that her salary was paid into. Faith realised that if she didn't pay the bills immediately, Ryan would clear out the account. She describes a constant juggle with money, making sure there was enough available for household expenses and the family's needs. When Ryan was working, he would regularly spend his pay cheque at the pub on his way home, usually on alcohol and gambling. Despite mostly working full time, Faith looked after the children's needs and took care of the house. Ryan was dismissive of the children.

As time went by Ryan's abuse became physical. He frequently spat on Faith, pulled her hair, dragged her through the house, smashed her head into the wall, and threw drinks over her, on many occasions in front of the children. During another pregnancy, Ryan strangled Faith because she had discovered he had been cheating on her; she managed to kick him away from her, but miscarried afterwards.

Faith had tried previously to end the relationship. Ryan was staying with a friend because he didn't want to be with the family; Faith was determined to stay in the house and keep the children together. At that stage, Faith's adult child was still living with them and he was regularly the target of Ryan's belittling and intimidating abuse. On one occasion, he kicked in the child's bedroom door while the child was in the room and threatened to kill him. Faith rang the police who attended the house four hours later despite her distress over the phone and her expressed fear that Ryan was going to kill the child. By the time the police arrived, Ryan had long departed. Police were hostile to Faith and told her she should be protecting the children from the violence; they didn't enter the house, inspect the damage, or advise her about protection orders.

Though Ryan wasn't living with the family, he would visit and stay from time to time. Faith put up with this in the interests of preserving the family as Ryan had threatened to get a court order to take the children if they separated. Ryan had convinced Faith that she was the cause of his behaviour and the court would see it that way too. Ryan's behaviour went through cycles: friendly and engaged followed by angry and violent. He claimed he had depression. He would kick Faith hard in the legs, or push her to the ground and kick her; she suffered extensive and painful bruising. Faith tried not to respond for fear that the violence would escalate. Ryan tried to isolate Faith from her family and friends, but they persisted in their support for her as they were extremely concerned for her wellbeing, knowing that she was struggling to make a break from the relationship. Despite their concerns Faith wouldn't and couldn't listen to their criticism of Ryan.

When Faith felt Ryan's violence and abuse had become extreme, on her sister's advice, she sought a protection order. The domestic violence support service at the court helped her prepare the application and explained the court process to her. Faith obtained a temporary protection order, but after pressure from Ryan, she failed to appear at the final hearing, and the magistrate dismissed the application.

Ryan told Faith he wanted a happy family life, and wanted them to try again to make the relationship work. Faith found Ryan beguiling when he was in this mood, and agreed to get back together. However, the physical and emotional violence started again immediately, as well as socially isolating behaviours separating Faith from her family and friends, and controlling the family finances. He also told her over the phone of his five-step plan to destroy her. The plan involved: reporting Faith to her employer and ensuring that she lost her job; taking the children away from her; causing her to lose title to the house; reporting her to police for offences she hadn't committed; and destroying her name. Faith kept going, putting up with the abuse and focusing on the children's needs. On one occasion, Faith's sister rang her and could hear Ryan's verbal abuse in the background; she was so horrified that she called the police and asked them to check on the house. When the police arrived, Ryan ranted at them blaming Faith, and then he left the house. The police questioned Faith; she told them she hadn't called them, and that this was normal behaviour for Ryan. The police explained that it was domestic violence and suggested to Faith that she get a protection order. At that stage, Faith felt so controlled by Ryan that she was incapable of recognising his behaviour as domestic violence, and says perhaps it would have been better for her if the police had taken the matter over and applied for an order on her behalf.

It wasn't until after their fifth child was born that Faith took steps to seek protection. Ryan's violence and abuse had continued during periods of separation when Faith, having suffered a black eye, reached a point where she told him to leave and put his belongings in the front yard. Faith received legal aid funding and applied for a protection order, and Ryan responded with a cross application. The matters did not go to a hearing, and were settled by an exchange of mutual undertakings to be of good behaviour towards one another for two years. The legal aid lawyer had explained that if she breached an order, her job may be jeopardised. Faith believes she accepted this result because she wasn't ready to cut off contact with Ryan, but also felt that she was given very little advice about her legal options or their ramifications.

Following the undertakings, Faith and Ryan got back together, but soon separated for several months. Ryan would continue to drop by the house to see the children, and occasionally have sexual relations with Faith who was starting to work on getting him out of her life as she believed he was going to kill her. She described Ryan then as her 'heroin'; she couldn't stop wanting him, yet she knew he would kill her. After telling Ryan that she couldn't go on in the relationship, he convinced her to give him another chance promising her that he had changed, that he loved her and wanted to be together as a family.

It was only a matter of weeks before Ryan flared up. When they were separated and Ryan had begun a relationship with another woman, Faith booked a trip for herself, the children and her sister. When Ryan found out he became angry and verbally abusive. Faith locked herself and the children in a room and rang the police who took two or three hours to attend the house, by which time the children were asleep. Ryan had tried to get in and snapped the key in the lock; he then went to sleep downstairs. Though the police were friendly towards Faith, they did not try to speak to Ryan; rather they stood at the front door and told her to get a protection order. Ryan soon left again, however it took Faith a couple more weeks to realise that she must do something to protect herself. She describes the moment that both defined her resolve and caused her to break down: she had rung Ryan for a reason she can't recall, and he put his new girlfriend on the phone who told her that she and Ryan had had sex in Faith's bed. Not long after, Ryan rang and described to Faith how he was going to kill her: 'I'm going to smash your head through the back door—it's glass—until you're all cut up. Then I'll drag you by the hair down the stairs, put you in the ute, drive up to the Gateway Bridge, and push you onto oncoming traffic, and then I'm going to jump off the bridge.' Faith notified the police and while they flagged her number so that she would in future receive a priority response, they didn't make any attempt to charge Ryan.

Faith was so emotionally depleted and distraught that she had to take time off work to get some help while she continued caring for the children. She was able to access counselling and began learning about the cycle of violence she had endured for nearly 15 years. She realised that Ryan had manipulated her thoughts and her sense of self, and she had to retrain how to think and rebuild herself as a person.

Ryan was calling the children three times a week, and Faith was keen to get a parenting plan in place. She was referred to a solicitor through her union. She proposed supervised contact on the basis of the suicide texts she'd been receiving from Ryan and was able to show the solicitor. While a plan was agreed to it never became a consent order because the solicitor failed to have it signed and filed. Ryan never complied with contact arrangements, and his abuse towards Faith continued. One night he called Faith's parents and said, 'tell Faith she's not going to make it to Christmas', and then hung up. This was the prompt for Faith to obtain a temporary protection order; and pursue the matter through to a final hearing. Faith, self-represented, had a number of witnesses at the court ready to give evidence, however Ryan appeared without having prepared any material. The magistrate issued a final protection order against Ryan on the basis of his consent without admissions. Faith was devastated as she wanted Ryan's domestic violence exposed and proven. The order is for two years with Faith and the children named as protected parties; Ryan is prohibited from coming near the house or school.

At the time the final protection order was made, Ryan applied to the Family Court for 50/50 shared care of the children and 75% of the value of the house property. He alleged in his material that Faith was using parental alienation tactics. At the interim hearing, with a great deal of help from a friend in preparing her material, Faith was granted residence, and Ryan was allowed weekly contact one day each week supervised by his parents between specified hours. The judge prohibited Ryan from making phone contact. Ryan and Faith were then required to attend mediation in relation to property matters despite Faith providing the details of the protection order in her material. Faith also tried to explain that Ryan had failed to disclose his financial circumstances as ordered, which would include the injury compensation payment he received and did not put in their joint account. Faith had applied for sole ownership of the house arguing that she'd paid for it and all related expenses, while Ryan had made no contributions. The mediator was initially hostile and uncooperative, but as the session proceeded, attempted to identify options. Faith and Ryan returned to the court, before the judge they'd had previously, however the judge didn't appear to recall any of the details of the case, and urged them to talk and sort out their differences. The judge had also failed to read the family report, which he proceeded to read while they waited. Faith was shocked and despairing.

Faith noted that she, Ryan and the children were required to attend the court to be interviewed for the family report; they had to sit in the same waiting room as Ryan and his family before being relocated to a private area. There was no need to be present at the same time given that Ryan was interviewed first. The report recommended that Ryan complete an anger management program, undergo psychiatric assessment, not drink alcohol within 24 hours of seeing the children, and be supervised at all times with the children at his parent's house, or a contact centre. Faith explained to the judge that Ryan's parents had not adequately supervised in the past, and requested a contact centre. The judge declined stating that the family needed to be given a chance.

Faith tried to limit even email communication with Ryan. Her good friend assists with the children and contact logistics. Ryan has breached the protection order by turning up at the children's school and sending abusive emails. Faith reported the breaches to the police, but Ryan was not charged. At no time have the police indicated to Faith that criminal charges would be appropriate in relation to Ryan's repeated violence and threats. Faith believes however that the protection order has saved her life as Ryan is afraid of the police. She is beginning to feel stronger and more equipped to face the future now that she is receiving counselling support. She wants nothing to do with Ryan, and would prefer no changes to the current contact arrangements. If there is any contact with Ryan, Faith records it on her phone so she has evidence for the police and the court. The Family Court property matters have been finalised and she has been granted sole ownership of her house. Faith feels very fortunate that her workplace has been supportive throughout her long and traumatic ordeal. She is also grateful for the domestic violence court support service assistance she received, however believes that a greater effort needs to be made to keep victims and perpetrators separate in the court house. She has found the court processes frustrating and lengthy, not helped by Ryan's deliberate attempts to delay proceedings. Sometimes Ryan pays around $40 a fortnight towards support for their five children.

Victim experiences - Felicity

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Family law proceedings] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Legal representation] [People with children] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Social abuse] [Spiritual abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Felicity and Jason were in a relationship for two years, during which time they married and began living together. They separated soon after the birth of their only child who was diagnosed with Autism at a young age. Both are university educated and professionally qualified. Felicity now works part time and is studying to gain further qualifications. Jason is in highly-paid employment and is also retraining in another discipline. Their child, and Felicity's two children from a previous marriage, live with Felicity in a house she owns. Jason has one child from a previous marriage; there are shared living and care arrangements in place with the mother, Jason's first wife.

Felicity recalls when she first met Jason that he wasn't a charmer, but intelligent and engaging, quite persistent, and even somewhat deceitful in his interactions with her. She found him interesting, and welcomed a male role model/father figure for her two children who she was pleased readily clicked with his child. While her children would have alternate weekends with their father, Felicity had been mostly sole parenting for some years while working in a demanding full-time job, and she felt they needed more adult support.

Felicity and Jason clashed from the start about parenting styles; Felicity put it down to the challenges associated with blending two families. Jason would often belittle his own child in front of her children, and early in the relationship he hit Felicity's four-year old to the ground in the presence of his parents. Felicity told Jason never to touch the child again. Jason's mother, who appeared to Felicity to be overly dominant in Jason's life and their relationship, told her that she must leave Jason to discipline the children as he decided.

The mother would ring Felicity daily.

Both Felicity and Jason come from strong religious backgrounds, however Jason insisted that Felicity and her children convert to his faith in preparation for the marriage. Felicity stopped going to the church she and her close extended family attended, and was required to attend Jason's church where she felt uncomfortable and yet Jason and his family put pressure on her to participate. In his early interactions with Felicity's family, Jason was so aggressive and confrontational in his views and behaviour that he alienated Felicity from them. Soon Felicity was no longer seeing or speaking to her family despite living only houses away and the cousins being close in age and friendship. They didn't attend Felicity and Jason's wedding.

Jason's behaviour towards Felicity became more hostile and controlling. On an outing with the children, Felicity fell over in public and hurt herself; Jason laughed while others went to help her. When Jason travelled for work, as he often did, Felicity would ask Jason why he never called to talk with her and the children while he was away; Jason angrily accused her of checking up on him, and dictating when he must report to her. Jason's mother told Felicity not to put demands on him. On their wedding night, Jason complained to Felicity about every aspect of the day, he threw a drink at her, tore a necklace from her neck, and pushed her up against the wall. A wedding guest witnessed the incident and went to seek help from other guests believing that Jason was about to hit Felicity; they intervened and took Jason away and he didn't return to Felicity for a couple of days.

Further conflict arose around Jason's demands for a child; he argued that Felicity had given another man children, and he was therefore similarly entitled. Despite her hectic work schedule and both being away regularly, Felicity was pregnant within a month of marrying.

When Felicity reprimanded his child for inappropriate comments, Jason held a knife to Felicity's face. She withdrew to another room to diffuse the situation, and refused to comply when he demanded that she eat a meal with them. Jason told her she was "a piece of shit" and to "get the fuck out of my house" by the time he was back from church. At the time, Felicity's children were holidaying with their father. Felicity packed some belongings and left to stay with a girlfriend, then travelled interstate for work; she made no contact with Jason until days later she told him she needed to come home and collect more belongings. Jason lectured her about sabotaging the family by causing trouble and leaving.

Felicity had leased her own house out so it wasn't available to move back into. She tried to talk to Jason's mother about getting Jason to agree to Felicity taking over the lease on their current shared property so that when her children returned from holidays, they would be in familiar, settled surrounds; his mother refused, and told her she had to live with the situation she had caused. Jason told Felicity the relationship didn't need to end; she should have tried to reconcile and now she needed "to fix her act up". Jason then left for interstate to see friends. Felicity stayed on at the house as her children were coming home, she was pregnant, and she felt she had no other choices.

Felicity and her sister began having contact again. The sister commented to Felicity that every six weeks Jason would explode, then disappear for a week, then return in good and generous spirits, then the cycle would start over.

Around half way through Felicity's pregnancy, Jason became angry and insistent about wanting a boy. He disappeared for a few days and arrived unexpectedly at the hospital where Felicity was having a scan. When told by the radiographer they were having a boy, he said "good" and left the hospital. Another argument soon followed about the baby's name and christening arrangements. Felicity left to stay with her sister and, when she returned home, Jason threatened to shoot her (he had an unlicensed firearm), he threw her makeup and clothes out the window onto the concrete driveway, and again told her to get out of the house. Felicity managed to get to the car and drive away, then called the police, explaining the circumstances and that she was a government employee. When the police came to the house half an hour later, Jason had gone and Felicity's sister had arrived. The police did not ask for any details about Jason or the incident, they gave Felicity no information about available protections, and, before leaving, simply asked her if she'd be "right". With assistance from friends, Felicity moved all of her own and children's belongings out of the house while Jason was absent, sent boxes to friends' houses, and went to stay with her sister. This threw the family into chaos as they didn't have access to what they needed, including the children's school uniforms. Jason sent her abusive texts accusing her of ruining her children's lives, and questioning her faith and who she worships.

Felicity and Jason kept their finances separate: he provided the house, and she paid for all other expenses, unaware of his earnings or assets. Some months prior, Jason had pressured Felicity into buying a block of land together that they could develop. When it came time to settle, he claimed he had no money. Felicity solely funded the purchase despite the land being registered in joint names. At that stage, one month from giving birth, Felicity was committed to the mortgage on the land, she had tenants in her own home, and she was facing the prospect of having to pay rent on another house for herself and children.

Victim experiences - Fiona

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Breach of protection order] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Family law - property orders] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Myths] [Other criminal charges] [People affected by substance misuse] [People living in regional, rural and remote communities] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sentencing] [Sexual abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Fiona and Tony were married and lived together for 25 years. Fiona was an early teenager when they met; Tony a number of years older. Fiona had not finished high school when she became pregnant with their first child. They now have two adult children: both of whom are employed and live independently; for some time after the separation one of the children lived with Tony and was estranged from Fiona. Tony has a criminal history relating to property crime. Tony was previously employed in a trade, and operated a related business using equipment jointly owned with Fiona. The business ceased operation some years ago, and Tony hasn't worked since. Tony has been a regular illicit drug user since a teenager. On leaving school, and when the children were young, Fiona acquired vocational qualifications and was employed in a well-respected, though modestly remunerated position, which she held throughout the relationship and continues in now.

From the start of the relationship, Tony was violent and abusive towards Fiona. He would accuse Fiona of showing interest in other boys, and struck and verbally abused her as punishment. Fiona recalls over many years being routinely smacked across the nose and face, punched in the stomach, and pushed into walls; and having her hair pulled and fingers bent back. Today, Fiona has a crooked nose and fingers. Tony would repeatedly tell Fiona that: she was a "fat, ugly, dumb slut"; she should cover herself up because fat people should never be seen in public; she was no good and would never do any better than him; and he needed to take drugs to cope with her. If she didn't rub his back in bed, she was forced to sleep elsewhere. Sex occurred when Tony demanded it, and would often follow time spent in the outdoor shed where Tony watched pornography and bestiality videos alone. Fiona describes their sexual relations as non-consensual; she complied with Tony's demands to avoid the prospect of anything worse. For a long time, Fiona never alerted family, friends, or police to the habitual violence she was subjected to during the relationship. She dressed so as to cover her bruises (and because she had been made to feel so ashamed of her body); and when that wasn't possible, she gave another explanation for her injuries. She made sure that her outward demeanour did not betray her suffering; however she believes that a couple of people close to her probably knew or suspected.

Fiona says that, while the violence and abuse were a constant, it was Tony's relentless control of her—and attempts to control her—that characterised his behaviour towards her throughout the relationship, and during and after separation, to the present. If his clothes weren't folded or his lunch wasn't made, he would refuse to go to work, and Fiona would be made to call his workplace and explain his absence. If he was driving the car and had an accident or got a speeding ticket, it was Fiona's fault. If Fiona went out with friends, he would ring her repeatedly demanding to know where she was and when she'd be home. At times, he would make her come home and do a job around the house that he refused to do. At night, he would turn up the volume on the stereo so she couldn't sleep. Tony made no effort to help with child rearing, cooking, washing, cleaning, or mowing, and took no interest in the children's sporting or other activities. Fiona took care of all of these things while being employed full time. Tony was jealous of Fiona's good relationship with her work colleagues, and installed equipment in her car to record her conversations with a colleague she drove to and from work. He threatened to come to Fiona's workplace and tell people what she was 'really like'; he never did. On her birthday once, Tony deflated her car tyres.

In the early years, Tony would contribute a weekly amount to the mortgage repayments and household expenses, however over time he stopped these payments, and Fiona took on all joint financial responsibilities funding them from her wage. She never went on a holiday. When Tony stopped working, Fiona never knew what he did or where he went. She would come home from work and often find him in bed, and then he would leave the house late at night, refusing to tell her where he was going, saying he needed to get money, notwithstanding that she regularly gave him money. When their business ceased operation, Tony sold the equipment and other assets and took the money without accounting to Fiona; she believes that her share was in the order of tens of thousands of dollars. Their marital property was damaged and they received an insurance payout. Tony spent the funds without reference to Fiona, and the damage was never repaired.

While they were together, Fiona believed she had no choice other than to acquiesce to Tony's behaviour and demands, or risk further and more serious violence and abuse. She felt it was better to 'cop it' and get on with things than have situations deteriorate. The children were frequently exposed to Tony's treatment of Fiona; she feels it became somewhat normal for them, especially for her older child who often shielded the younger one.

One evening Fiona found she could no longer tolerate the violence and abuse. Tony had locked her out of the house, and she was forced to sleep at the neighbour's house. Neighbours were supportive of her, but knew little of her circumstances because she had not disclosed. One of the neighbour's family members, who she considers a friend, told her that she had to do something to address the situation. Fiona felt this was a turning point for her, giving her the strength and resolve to act. Fiona applied for a protection order, however after assurances from Tony that he had changed, she agreed to withdraw it. His behaviour immediately escalated; they separated, and continued living under the one roof. During this time, Tony would not allow her to lock her bedroom door, and she discovered that he'd set up hidden cameras in the bedroom that he monitored via equipment secretly installed underneath the house. Fiona successfully reapplied for an order, including a condition excluding him from the home. Her lawyer advised her to start keeping a record of Tony's behaviour, which she has diligently maintained since.

Initially Fiona obtained a temporary protection order (including the exclusion condition) against Tony, which was served on him, and he was aware of the conditions. In response both Tony and their adult child who lived with him at that stage brought applications for protection orders against Fiona based on, what Fiona describes as, gross, disgusting and untruthful claims; both applications were dismissed by the court.

Tony was charged and bailed on charges relating to breaking and entering the marital property, and stealing items. Fiona believes that the adult child was complicit. These charges did not go ahead.

Police advised Fiona that the final hearing of her protection order application had to be deferred so that other criminal allegations against Tony could be finalised. Those allegations related to Tony stalking Fiona based on his parking and waiting in the car near her workplace and home (neighbours and work colleagues are witnesses); following her on the roads; sending her repeated offensive texts; and tracking her on a dating website using false personas.

In the interim Fiona reported to police multiple breaches by Tony of the temporary protection order, some of which involved the behaviour already described, others involved Tony coming onto the marital property and stealing further items, and humiliating and denigrating Fiona on Facebook.

The police ultimately charged Tony with stalking. He pleaded guilty and in sentencing him the court ordered that Tony be placed on a five year restraining order. A final protection order was also made for two years.

The marital property was sold, subject to Family Court orders. Fiona moved out of the property some time ago as she was too terrified to continue living there; it is in an isolated location. Fiona has a new partner with whom she now lives. They have installed a security system on their property, and whenever she is alone, she stays inside and locks the doors. She doesn't believe Tony is aware of the property's location. She is constantly vigilant about changing the routes she takes to work and the shops, and she avoids going to places she knows Tony frequents. She knows that Tony watches her and the new partner when they are in town together. In the past, Tony threatened to cut the brake lines on her car, burn the house down, kill her and leave her body in a barrel. She suspects that Tony had previously accessed her car and installed a GPS; she is having it investigated. Fiona believes that her fears are well justified; she is also scared for her new partner's safety.

Fiona engaged a lawyer for the protection order and property matters. The legal fees have been very costly, and continue to accrue while these matters remain unresolved. Tony's vexatious cross applications and deliberate delays in agreeing to property arrangements significantly increased Fiona's legal fees. Despite Fiona's disproportionate contributions and the violence and abuse she has experienced, Fiona and Tony were each entitled to 50% of the proceeds of sale of the marital property. Fiona's share was almost entirely consumed by legal fees. Following the property orders, the Federal Circuit Court Magistrate had allowed Tony to enter the property and remove the items he was entitled to; he took the opportunity to steal other items as well. When Fiona lodged a complaint with police, they told her it was a civil matter, and they couldn't assist. While Fiona believes that her lawyer is a good person and supportive of her case, she feels that he could have fought harder in seeking the legal redress and protection she needed as a result of Tony's prolonged violence and abuse.

Fiona has often felt frustrated by her involvement with police. She describes their responses as variable: at times, alert, supportive and effective; other times, uninterested, even irritated by her repeated complaints. On one occasion when Fiona had reported a breach, they told her it would be 24 hours before officers could attend the property. She suspects that she doesn't fit the usual victim stereotype of feeble, frightened, and crying, and that police and magistrates may have regarded her differently as a consequence. Fiona has dealt with multiple police officers at a number of different police stations. She feels that with complicated matters like hers, victims/complainants should be assigned a single responsible officer who coordinates the police responses, rather than having to recount the facts and circumstances over and again. On one occasion a well-intentioned officer told Fiona she should move interstate and start a new life. Fiona feels adamant that she should not have to be the one who disrupts her life, work and relationships and is further punished for Tony's violence and abuse.

Victim experiences - Francis

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Emotional abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Myths and misunderstandings] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Francis and Mark were together for 23 years. Francis has been significantly hearing impaired since birth and wears hearing aids. She grew up in a loving but strict family environment, and met Mark when she was still a teenager, having had little experience with intimate relationships or independent living. They both completed year 10. Francis has limited TAFE qualifications and has worked periodically throughout the relationship when her child rearing responsibilities permitted; Mark ran his own one-man business for a time. For a number of years their income was derived predominantly from social security benefits. Mark has a history of misuse of alcohol and drugs, however Francis observed that he had developed ways of minimising its influence. The couple has three children at separation.

Mark began controlling and demeaning Francis early in the relationship. He became verbally abusive and aggressive when she was planning to go out with friends, he called her a "slut", and would punch the walls or doors or damage household goods. Francis says she "would pay for [her outings] for a long, long time after". While Francis had few friends and had moved away from her home city and family to be with Mark, over time she decided a night out wasn't worth the humiliation and fear. And yet these things came to characterise her experience of the relationship over many years and were made worse by a pervading feeling of insecurity due to her poor hearing. She describes crying every day, despairing at her situation.

Francis had thought often about leaving the relationship, and would at times tell Mark that she wanted it to end, however Mark would express remorse for his behaviour and plead with her to stay. Francis says her main reason for continuing in the relationship was a growing fear of what Mark may do if she were to take steps to get away. It was also the reason Francis denied the occurrence of domestic and family violence to family, friends and police for so long. Mark became more violent towards Francis once they began having children. His abuse would always build from a verbal rage to wanton household property damage that would sometimes result in physical injury to Francis. This was the repeating pattern, and for Francis the occasions were too numerous to fully recount. There were however some incidents that were so concerning to neighbours that they called the police, but Francis felt too frightened to disclose the details of the violence knowing that Mark was nearby and likely to retaliate. Instead, she made up an account to shield the reality of the violence. Francis recalls that one night she locked herself and the children in the bathroom, and Mark punched the door in and smeared blood across the wall, in a rage about having to cook dinner.

Francis told police Mark had thrown a saucepan and didn't show them the blood or damage to the bathroom; she had tried to ring Mark's parents but couldn't go ahead with the call because she was worried her voice may be too loud and Mark would hear her. Police offered Francis little or no opportunity to make a proper statement and blamed her for fighting with Mark in front of the children.

On another occasion, when the couple was out with the children, Mark and his friends tried to pressure Francis into taking drugs, which she had never done or been prone to. Mark began calling her names, and on the way home he smashed the car interior while Francis drove. Once home, Mark damaged the guard at the front of the car and punched the laundry wall so violently he broke his hand. The following day Francis told him she would leave, but he pleaded with her not to and promised a special holiday, which never happened.

Not long after, Mark was arrested on charges unrelated to violence at home, of which he was later convicted. Although he avoided imprisonment, Francis believes, to some extent this was due to a favourable reference she felt she was pressured by Mark and his lawyer to provide to the court. Due to the nature of the charges Francis changed to part-time work so she could be with the children outside school and daycare hours, and continued to put up with Mark's violence and abuse. Later, Mark was charged with another serious offence. Pending his trial, a child protection order issued requiring that Mark move out of the family home and that he have no contact with the children for several months. Mark reacted angrily to these conditions, repeatedly demanding to see the children and continuing the violence.

Following another violent incident that involved Mark hitting one of the children, Francis told Mark to leave the holiday house the family were renting and get counselling. Initially, Mark complied. Four months later, after he was acquitted, he returned to the family home at midnight without Francis's consent, attacked Francis, and tried to throw her off the upper storey of the house when their young son physically intervened. Francis threatened to call the police but Mark pursued her around the house while the youngest child became more and more distressed. By this stage, Francis could see that the two older children were profoundly affected by their long exposure to the violence. Francis also discovered that Mark had access to a gun, and he began making threats to shoot her and a police officer.

After confiding in a friend and her local doctor, Francis decided to apply for a protection order, and for Legal Aid to assist with the application. Appearing to give little weight to the long history of violence and abuse, the magistrate declined to include an exclusion order. However, after further submissions by her solicitor, Francis did manage to secure a temporary order with the minimum condition that Mark be of good behavior and not commit domestic and family violence. Francis believed this was of little or no protection to her and the children, and was terrified that service of the order would precipitate further violence by Mark.

Following advice from police, and with the assistance of a local service, Francis and the children were immediately resettled at a shelter. Multiple adjournments (at Mark's request) occurred before Francis obtained a two-year final protection order. Mark's ongoing harassment of her parents about access to the children and car resulted in Francis having to reapply for Legal Aid to seek a variation of the order to include her parents as protected parties. This process took months longer because Mark evaded service.

The current protection order prohibits Mark from having contact with the children until a Family Court order is in place stipulating the terms of any contact. At this stage, the children have told Francis they don't want to see their father. Francis has begun talking with her Legal Aid solicitor about a Family Court application. Francis acknowledges that she did not disclose the domestic and family violence to police on a number of occasions, but feels her fears and perceptions of future risk of harm were justified. She believes police did not provide her with a safe and receptive opportunity to give her account of the violence. Francis also observed the difference in attitude of the magistrate who failed to recognise the nature of Mark's violence, and the magistrate who demonstrated an understanding of her circumstances and its impacts.

Victim experiences - Gillian

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Damaging property] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children to domestic and family violence] [Family law proceedings] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with mental illness] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Gillian and Kyle were in a defacto relationship for around six years. They have two children together, both very young at separation. Gillian has a certificate qualification and has been consistently employed in her specialised area of work. Kyle has a trade qualification, however was unemployed for most of the relationship due to a chronic pain condition. Kyle is a heavy drinker and prescription drug user; and Gillian suspects he has a form of anxiety and depression, however is not aware of any diagnosis. Kyle also has a police record including offences relating to unlicensed firearms, drink driving and assaulting police. Gillian has an older child from a previous relationship who lived periodically with the father and with Gillian and Kyle. Gillian has a good relationship with the child's father.

Gillian and Kyle met through Gillian's previous partner and father of her eldest child. The relationship was on again-off again at the start. Looking back, Gillian recalls feeling a little insecure as a single mother with a young child, and confused and hurt by Kyle frequently putting her down and then apologising afterwards. Gillian made allowances for Kyle's behaviour knowing that he was finding it difficult to cope with his mother's death and had to undergo surgery. Kyle's health deteriorated and Gillian spent some weeks caring for him. He developed longer term chronic pain, and started relying on a range of prescription medications while resuming a heavy drinking habit. Gillian describes Kyle's reaction to his misuse of alcohol and medication as psychotic and terrifying. He is considerably bigger and stronger than Gillian and would, when in that state, throw heavy objects at Gillian and smash up the house.

Gillian had decided to leave Kyle when she discovered that she was pregnant with their first child. Given the pregnancy, she felt she needed to try and make the relationship work. However, Kyle's verbal and emotional abuse of Gillian worsened during the pregnancy, and after the birth, his drunken rages and throwing episodes became a regular occurrence, even when Gillian was holding the baby. Not long before Gillian gave birth to their second child, Kyle gave Gillian a solid shove in her stomach. When they were away on a holiday, Kyle became aggressive and violent when Gillian refused to give him her account access card. She had often given him money, which he'd recklessly spent; this time she wasn't prepared to lose the only money she had for family and household expenses. Kyle grabbed and held Gillian forcefully until she was screaming and a friend had to pull him off her. She was severely bruised on her arms and neck as a result.

Over time, Gillian learned to anticipate his behaviour and take preventative action to avoid being harmed. She says she got good at devising escape plans for herself and the children. Sometimes, she would sleep in the car overnight; other times, they would seek refuge at her mother's house.

Gillian lost contact with friends during her relationship with Kyle as they didn't want to be around him when he was drunk and abusive. Gillian has a close relationship with her mother who had re-partnered, however she tried to shield her mother from a lot of the trauma she was experiencing. Kyle's behaviour was revealed to some extent however at Gillian's mother's wedding where he was extremely intoxicated and became aggressive towards the groom. Gillian wanted the relationship with Kyle to be over, but didn't know how to make it happen.

In the year that Gillian gave birth to their second child, and for the first time in their relationship, Kyle found work interstate. Gillian was keen for him to earn some money and was grateful for some time apart despite having to look after three children by herself. Kyle didn't help with the children in any event, and Gillian realised when he left that life and the household were so much more functional and stable. It was when he returned home for brief visits that everything seemed to fall apart. Gillian decided during this time that she must end the relationship; she had also discovered that Kyle had started seeing a former girlfriend. Gillian packed up her gear, put it into storage and moved with the children to her mother's place. She felt she couldn't stay at the house because she knew that Kyle would return and wreck it and possibly harm her and the children.

Kyle moved elsewhere with his former girlfriend. He would harass Gillian with phone calls and text messages at all hours, up to forty each day, tormenting her with the details of his new relationship. Towards Christmas in the year of separation, Kyle told a friend he'd bought a handgun and was heading to Gillian with it; he told his sister (who passed on to Gillian) that “the bitch needs a bullet”. Gillian immediately packed up her gear again and, with the children, relocated interstate for two months as she believed Kyle was extremely dangerous.

On returning, she went to apply for a protection order, but was told by the court support workers that too much time had elapsed since the threat and she would need to wait for Kyle’s abuse to resume. Before long Kyle began driving past Gillian’s mother’s place, texting Gillian’s eldest child, and repeatedly texting and screaming down the phone at Gillian, threatening to kill them all and telling her it was a shame she hadn’t died during a recent operation. This time, Gillian proceeded with a protection order application. She was represented, with legal aid funding. Initially, she obtained a temporary order for 12 months, however it was another year before the matter could go to a hearing as Kyle sought multiple adjournments, which Gillian believed was a deliberate tactic to frustrate her and the process. On the hearing date, Kyle arrived late, by which time the Magistrate had issued a two-year protection order on the basis that he didn’t deserve to be heard if he couldn’t be bothered to arrive on time. Kyle had also cross applied for an order against Gillian; however his application was dismissed as his allegations were unsubstantiated. Kyle tried to intimidate Gillian in the courthouse and precinct on mention dates.

Gillian found the first few years post separation particularly harrowing. She had a new baby, as well the two older children, and was feeling emotionally rattled, fearful and unsafe. She reported breaches of the protection order by Kyle to the police; however she feels they never took her seriously and no charges resulted. Gillian received counselling that helped her to restore her confidence and capacity.

During the period leading up to the final protection order, Gillian tried to find ways of giving Kyle contact time with the children without compromising her safety. She was advised to arrange it away from home in a busy, public space. She would take the children to the park where they could play with Kyle. This worked for a time until Kyle’s constant verbal abuse towards her became intolerable. Gillian’s mother and new partner then took over the supervision for a while, but they too were subjected to Kyle’s abuse and threats.

With a view to applying to the Federal Circuit Court for parenting orders, Gillian arranged supervised contact through a private contact centre. Kyle didn’t respond to the proposal and went without seeing the children for many months. The parenting order application was also unduly prolonged over a two year period due to Kyle’s repeated delays and failure to comply with judicial directions (eg that he have liver function testing). There was a three-day trial. An independent children’s lawyer (ICL) was appointed. Gillian was represented, but this time without legal aid funding. She sought orders allowing supervised contact on the basis that Kyle was a chronic alcoholic and prescription drug misuser and the children were not safe in his sole care. Gillian had kept (and produced as evidence) numerous photographs of Kyle using drugs, notes written and signed by Kyle attesting to his own behaviour, and hundreds of text messages verifying her allegations. The judge issued self-executing orders requiring that if Kyle failed to complete a certain drug and alcohol course and deliver the necessary material to the ICL by a certain date, contact would be disallowed. The ICL signed off on Kyle having complied with the order and the judge accepted this, despite, in Gillian's view, Kyle not completing all the requirements originally imposed by the judge. On a further court date, Kyle was granted unsupervised contact for five hours every second weekend.

Fairly certain that a 12 hour course was unlikely to have remedied a 30 year drinking habit, Gillian took steps to ensure that the children were supervised by one of Kyle's family members whom she trusted. This is working well. Changeover now occurs at a large service station, which Gillian finds unnerving so she makes sure she has a friend to accompany her.

Gillian has sole parental responsibility for the children, and must only give Kyle notice of medical issues or a major relocation. Kyle had been paying negligible child support, and then stopped. Gillian got approval to relinquish child support on family violence grounds, while maintaining her full entitlement to the family tax benefit.

Around this time, Kyle posted a message on Facebook directed at Gillian: "I hope you die excruciatingly". She immediately went to the police and applied for a new protection order. This time the police were supportive. Gillian was not eligible for legal aid funding so appeared at the hearing self-represented, having prepared the necessary affidavit material. On this occasion, Kyle didn't appear at all, and the Magistrate issued a two-year protection order in his absence. The order includes no contact conditions together with a prohibition on emailing, social media and any other form of harassment.

Kyle previously owned the house he and Gillian lived in. Unknown to Gillian, he mortgaged the property and squandered the loan funds. Just prior to the birth of their first child, the loan was recalled and Kyle was unable to repay. Gillian's mother and new partner bought the property for the amount Kyle owed. Gillian and Kyle and the children stayed on as tenants. They were entitled to whatever equity there was upon the sale of the property. In due course the property was sold leaving only a few thousand dollars after expenses. Kyle applied to the Federal Circuit Court for a property settlement seeking a share of the equity. Gillian expended more than $10,000 in legal fees responding to Kyle's claim, and in the end the court dismissed the application on the basis that there was no property to divide.

Gillian has made sure that Kyle is unaware of her mobile and landline numbers and her address. She has told the children that they must never disclose their address to Kyle; that they are free to see him at his home, but he is never to visit theirs.

Gillian believes that it has been important for her safety to have protection orders in place against Kyle. She has become familiar with how the system works and confident to act when she needs to. She is grateful to her solicitor who was prepared to believe her story and take whatever steps necessary to ensure her protection and the wellbeing of her children. Gillian found her engagement with court processes frustrating as Kyle was permitted to repeatedly delay proceedings on spurious grounds. She found it mostly helpful to have the same judge presiding over their various matters in the Federal Circuit Court, although the time delay in the parenting proceedings meant that the judge lost touch with the facts and, in Gillian's view, made a questionable final ruling. This was in contrast to the Magistrates Court where there was a different Magistrate at every mention and facts had to be revisited each time. Gillian questions the value of the ICL in her case; very little weight was given to Kyle's violence and abuse in the context of determining the children's best interests. The judge however was focused on ensuring safety at changeover.

Gillian has spent more than six years post separation accessing the legal system to secure parenting arrangements and her own safety. It has come at great cost to her emotionally and financially. She is however getting on with rebuilding her life. She is distrustful of people, wary of any signs of violence and abuse, and finds it very difficult to contemplate an intimate relationship.

Victim experiences - Hilary

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Breach of protection order] [Children] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Parenting orders] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women] [Young people]

Hilary and Bruce were in a relationship for 17 years; they married and had three children who were primary and pre-school age, and two years of age on separation. Hilary has an adult child from a previous relationship who was pre-school age when Hilary and Bruce got together and lived with them until late teens. Hilary is tertiary qualified and has worked in a specialist professional role throughout the relationship other than during periods of maternity leave. Bruce has a trade qualification and held a well-remunerated position with a company for many years before resigning and starting his own business.

Hilary's early observation of Bruce was that he was a perfectionist regarding how work was done on their house and cars, he wanted to make the decisions about these matters and got extremely stressed when things didn't go as planned, he was eager to fix other people's problems and enjoyed their praise and gratitude. Hilary felt she understood and accommodated these traits in Bruce, along with his need for his own space and to spend regular time away with friends. When they met, both Hilary and Bruce had their own homes. In time, the properties were sold and together they bought a house on a big block with a work shed for Bruce. As a result, they were in a comfortable financial position with a small mortgage, good incomes pooled in a joint account, and relatively low outgoings.

Bruce's behaviour became concerning to Hilary when she discovered she was pregnant with their first child. Bruce was angered by the news: Hilary had conceived quickly, however Bruce had wanted it to be later, and expected to be able to control the timing. He even contacted Hilary's family members to express his displeasure. Witnessed by Hilary's child who was excited and happy about the news, Bruce came into the bedroom where Hilary was sitting on the bed, wielded two knives and threatened to hurt himself, tipped Hilary onto the floor by lifting the mattress, and punched his fist into the wall. Hilary's child was distressed and screaming and calling out to her mother that she was going to ring the police. Hilary tried to reassure the child that she would sort it out and everything would be okay. Hilary believes that this incident and many others since have been a source of trauma for the child into adulthood.

Bruce's behaviour settled down once he got used to the idea of having a child. Hilary says he was an attentive and doting father to the first child, especially when very young and Hilary returned to part-time work at Bruce's insistence. Hilary felt they had no financial pressure for her to resume working so soon, and had been looking forward to the break and spending quality time with the baby and her older child. Bruce however told Hilary that if she didn't work, he wouldn't either, and he would leave her.

When Hilary was on maternity leave following the birth of their third child, Bruce was forced to resign from his long-held position due to unresolvable clashes with work colleagues. Hilary says he became depressed and took casual jobs he didn't enjoy. He then announced to Hilary that he was going to start his own business. Their comfortable financial position had suddenly deteriorated and Hilary became stressed about earning only a part-time wage and having to find additional money to fund the business setup.

Bruce was disappointed that their second child was a girl and appeared upset and angry on the few occasions he visited the hospital. On the day Hilary was discharged from hospital, he insisted that Hilary host lunch with friends at home. Hilary was exhausted, and refused. Bruce stormed out of the house and retreated to the shed. Bruce's childish, tantrum-like behaviour escalated over time to physical violence towards Hilary. At the close of a demanding year in her job, Hilary finished work one evening hoping to get some help from Bruce around the house and with the children. Instead, he went to bed and let the children run amok. Hilary questioned him on his lack of support, and he tussled with her and kicked her hard, resulting in pain and extensive bruising to her arms and hip. The day care mother who looked after the younger children noticed the bruising and tried to counsel Hilary to see someone, however Hilary felt she wasn't ready to get help, or to even recognise the reality of Bruce's violence. On a subsequent occasion, Hilary tried to discuss with Bruce her concerns about the amount of equipment and vehicles that was accumulating in their yard. He reacted angrily and struck her on the hip with an extension cord while she was holding their youngest child.

At this stage, Hilary realised there was something seriously wrong in the relationship and let her family know. One family member identified Bruce's behaviour as domestic and family violence and urged her to take decisive action. Hilary however couldn't afford to leave the home and rent elsewhere, and she knew that Bruce would dig his heels in. Hilary moved into a family member's house with the children temporarily to seek safety and to organise counselling. She tried repeatedly to get an appointment but was unable to. Eventually she found help; her focus then was to try and understand what had gone wrong in the relationship and whether it was retrievable. She and the children then moved back into the family home and Bruce agreed to attend joint counselling. On a rare occasion when Bruce was open to discussing the relationship, when asked by Hilary why he was violent towards her, he told her that it was to discipline her. After three counselling sessions Bruce refused to continue, saying there was no point. Hilary continued, knowing that the relationship was over, but needing guidance with the separation process.

By now Bruce was no longer contributing to the joint account. He agreed to pay only the house utility bills. The mortgage repayments, direct debits and children expenses were all paid from Hilary's modest wage. Hilary was forced to ask Bruce for grocery money, which he gave out in meagre amounts after much complaint and verbal abuse, further humiliating Hilary each time. Hilary was aware that Bruce was making money from the business having seen him receive considerable amounts of cash from the sale of stock. Bruce told Hilary not to expect any more money from him, and that she needed to work more.

One evening, while they were still living together, Hilary again expressed her frustration to Bruce at his failure to help with the children. An argument ensued and Bruce punched his fist through the door. Bruce then rang the police alleging that Hilary had verbally abused him. The police arrived at the house and interviewed them separately. Hilary had not planned to get the police involved as she felt ashamed by what was going on and didn't want Bruce in any trouble, but after some probing by the police, Hilary detailed the violence and abuse she had been experiencing. They urged Hilary to apply for a protection order, and to seek a condition preventing Bruce from entering the property. Hilary obtained a temporary protection order, which only required Bruce to be of good behaviour towards her and the children. Hilary says she wanted Bruce off the property but knew that if he weren't allowed access to the shed, his behaviour would only worsen. The Magistrate commented that these matters could be dealt with at the final hearing when Bruce had an opportunity to put his case. When the temporary protection order was served on Bruce, he became extremely angry and verbally abusive towards Hilary, and told her she was mentally ill.

Due to financial constraints, Hilary attempted to put in place separation-under-the-one-roof arrangements. She notified Centrelink, relocated Bruce's belongings to a spare room in the house, and told him she would no longer be cooking, washing or providing other benefits to him. Again, he reacted angrily. On a number of occasions he rang the police complaining that the dinner leftovers had been fed to the dog. Hilary could tell that the police believed Bruce's complaints were exaggerated, yet she always felt they were supportive of her own situation.

Just prior to the final hearing of the protection order application, Hilary was served with Bruce's cross order application. The matter was adjourned to allow Hilary the opportunity to seek legal advice and representation. Hilary returned to the family home that day to find what she describes as a 'romantic note' from Bruce, which she interpreted as disingenuous and, once again, temporarily relocated with the children to a family member's house. Bruce resumed living at the family home, and verbally abused Hilary's adult child causing Hilary to alert police. Hilary and the children returned to the home, the family still governed by the temporary protection order requiring Bruce to be of good behaviour towards them. One of the children developed a fever and became quite unwell, and Bruce refused to help, choosing instead to watch television and send text messages on his phone. Hilary took the television remote control and phone away from Bruce hoping that this would prompt a better response; it didn't, and the following morning when Hilary was preparing to leave for work and drop the children off to day care and school she discovered that Bruce had taken her car keys. Hilary tried to look for the keys; Bruce became angry and told her to get out of his room, then grabbed and pushed her forcefully into a chair while the children were present and becoming increasingly distressed. Hilary told Bruce to stop because he was hurting her. He then rang the police and waited at the front of the property for their arrival. Hilary also called the police to report a breach of the temporary protection order. It took some hours for the police to arrive, by which time Bruce had left and Hilary gave her statement regarding the breach. Bruce was charged with the breach, and the matter was heard, but Hilary hasn't ever been advised of the outcome.

At the final hearing of the protection order application (which included Bruce's cross application), Hilary sought a variation to include an ouster order as she could no longer tolerate Bruce being on the property. Both Hilary and Bruce had legal representation. Hilary's lawyer told her beforehand that the particular Magistrate listed to hear the matter would require that Bruce be given access to the shed, so there was no point in pushing for an ouster order. Hilary reported that the Magistrate was irritated by having to deal with the matter, telling them both that while separation can be difficult they needed to sort the issues out like adults. Bruce's cross application was dismissed; and based on the Magistrate's comments in the court room, Hilary believed that Bruce was granted access to the shed between certain hours on certain days, however when the paper order issued there was no such specification.

Consequently, Bruce continued to come and go from the property as he pleased, including into the house.

Hilary knew the latter behaviour was a breach of the order but felt uncomfortable about bothering the police with repeated breach complaints. When Hilary applied for a renewal of the order, she requested a variation denying Bruce access to the house. She felt admonished by the Magistrate for not reporting the breaches, and for being so petty as to not allow Bruce to use the toilet in the house. Bruce made another cross application against Hilary, and at the same time applied for the matter to be heard at a different courthouse, claiming a potential conflict of interest as a result of Hilary's family connections. The matters were adjourned and Hilary and Bruce appeared for a mention before a different Magistrate who Hilary felt acted fairly and reasonably, in contrast to her previous experiences. The Magistrate expressed the view that Hilary and the children should stay in the house and made a further temporary order against Bruce in accordance with Hilary's application; he also made a temporary order against Hilary requiring that she be of good behaviour towards Bruce. The final hearing of both applications is pending.

When Hilary is at home with the children she tries to stay indoors and keep them distracted and settled, however when Bruce sees her, he often verbally abuses her. She has changed the locks on the house. Hilary feels intimidated by Bruce's presence on the property, and her greatest concern is that he will attempt to take the children away so as to reassert his control over her. There are currently no parenting orders in place, though they have an informal arrangement where Bruce cares for the children one day each weekend. Hilary had been loath to involve the Family Court in matters relating to the children as she feared the process would be damaging to them, however she believes now that securing orders would be in their best interests. She is also aware of the need to make an application for property orders to clarify her financial situation. Based on Bruce's business returns, a child support assessment has issued requiring Bruce to pay an annual total of $500 for the three children. Hilary otherwise wholly supports the children from her wage.

Victim experiences - Ingrid

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Breach] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Parenting orders] [People affected by substance misuse] [People from CALD backgrounds] [People with children] [People with mental illness] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Questioning witnesses] [Risk] [Sexual abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victims as (alleged) perpetrators] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Ingrid and Scott met overseas in Ingrid's home city. Scott was taking a break from a job that he said had caused him post-traumatic stress disorder and a persistent back injury, for which he received benefits and self-medicated using marijuana and medicinal painkillers. Ingrid has post-graduate qualifications and was working in a well-paid position at the time. The relationship developed quickly and Ingrid was soon pregnant.

During the pregnancy Scott resigned from his job while Ingrid continued to work. Ingrid found that she often had to ask Scott and his friends not to smoke marijuana near her. After the birth, they lived with Ingrid's mother who helped with the baby. Ingrid received part-paid maternity leave, which she used to support the family. Scott refused to make any contribution to rent or other living expenses and, when asked, would angrily yell and throw things, including a computer on one occasion. Ingrid felt fearful of these early behaviours, but didn't react, trying not to hurt Scott's pride or add to the damaging effects of his job.

Scott persuaded Ingrid to move to Australia where he grew up. He went ahead alone to prepare for the family's arrival, and Ingrid and the baby were to follow when Ingrid's visa issued, and the baby was around nine months old. Scott did very little in that time: he lived off friends, failed to look for a job and eventually sought help from his father to find accommodation. Scott then insisted on returning overseas to collect Ingrid and the baby.

Once back in Australia, Scott pressured Ingrid into paying off his credit card debt, which she was not liable for. Ingrid's maternity leave money soon ran out. Ingrid also understood that Scott had or was due to receive a significant lump-sum compensation payment from his employer for his post-traumatic stress disorder but he kept the detail from Ingrid. One day Scott fell in the kitchen, further injuring himself, resulting in his increased use of marijuana and painkillers, which Ingrid observed made him angry and depressed.

Increasingly, Scott would verbally and emotionally abuse Ingrid and damage household property. Ingrid felt isolated with a very young child, no family or friends nearby, and no car licence. Scott made frequent sexual demands of her that she found distressing and painful.

In time, Ingrid was employed again, Scott enrolled in a university course, and the child went to day care. Scott also began rehabilitation for his injury and psychologist appointments for his post-traumatic stress disorder. Ingrid felt that life had become more normal and bearable until one day Scott threw a piece of furniture around the kitchen in a rage about medical expenses that had to be paid to treat a condition Ingrid had developed. Ingrid took the child into the bedroom and locked the door. Scott never struck Ingrid or the child, but would raise his hand menacingly in anger. Scott was well over double Ingrid's weight.

When not at university, Scott spent more and more time during the day and night drinking and taking drugs with his friends while Ingrid worked and cared for the child. Without asking Ingrid, Scott invited a female friend to stay because she needed somewhere to live. Scott's drug taking made his behaviour more abusive and irrational. He would accuse Ingrid of lying about her whereabouts, and, despite her resistance, his sexual violence towards her escalated. He wrote her a letter complaining that the child was taking up too much time and that she was not paying him enough money.

Ingrid reached emotional breaking point and sought psychological help through her employer. She moved into another bedroom and they began living separately under the one roof. Scott discovered from reading Ingrid's emails that she had made a male acquaintance. He became very aggressive, repeatedly texting her (and the male friend), demanding that she leave without the child, reminding her of his weapons licence, and threatening suicide. Ingrid could not afford other accommodation and refused to leave the child in Scott's care. While she had no intention of leaving her job and uprooting the child from day care – and in any event had no funds – to return overseas, Scott had hidden her passport, which she managed to retrieve before finally leaving.

With the help of support services, Ingrid and the child were housed temporarily in a motel then moved to a shelter. Inevitably this caused upheaval with work and day care, but Ingrid was grateful for the assistance she received with visa matters and an application for a protection order. Initially acting for herself (while Scott had a lawyer), Ingrid was unable to obtain a temporary order and the matter went to trial, for which she was granted Legal Aid. Ingrid describes an intimidating courtroom experience where: during cross-examination, she was yelled at by Scott's barrister, and the Magistrate was unable to respond effectively; she was not allowed to give evidence of the sexual violence because she was told it could no longer occur due to separation; and she was told that because there was no physical violence or harm, the texting, suicide threats and reference to a weapons licence were minimised and not considered sufficiently abusive to establish domestic and family violence. The court dismissed Ingrid's application and she was denied a protection order.

Despite strict security controls, Scott was able to locate the shelter where Ingrid and the child were living. Concerned about the risk to the shelter and its other residents, and the complications associated with moving to another shelter, Ingrid decided to stay with friends. Again, Scott revealed to Ingrid an address in the vicinity. Distraught, Ingrid searched for an explanation, and then discovered Scott had sewn a GPS tracking device in the back of a doll that he'd insisted Ingrid take for the child. Ingrid went immediately to the police and gave a statement. Initially police told her she couldn't get a protection order because there was no physical violence, but she persisted and the court granted a temporary protection order. At the final hearing, Ingrid was unrepresented and Scott's lawyer offered a protection order without any admission of facts. Ingrid resisted because she knew that Scott's behaviour was abusive and he should be held responsible. The Magistrate declined to make a final decision on the basis that Family Court matters were pending; and instead extended the temporary order. While an interim parenting order was put in place for shared care, there are multiple problems regarding changeover and other arrangements and Scott flouting the order. The matter was referred to mediation, however precluded from proceeding due to risk of domestic and family violence.

Scott soon sought a cross order against Ingrid fabricating evidence of her beating and raping him, which at the final hearing she was able to resist using audio and social media records she had diligently gathered, and ultimately was granted a final protection order, however the child and others are not listed as protected parties. Before the hearing, Scott had also tried to run Ingrid over in his car. Scott continues to breach the good behaviour provision of the protection order and the terms of the parenting order. Scott has never been charged with breach, or with any criminal offences relating to the stalking and monitoring, attempting to run over Ingrid, or the false affidavit evidence.

Ingrid agreed to settle final parenting orders with Scott, avoiding a trial. Ingrid finds changeovers distressing and demeaning: Scott yells commands at her. She is concerned about how they will jointly manage ongoing parenting decisions and arrangements in the best interests of the child while she endures ongoing abuse. Scott is still unemployed and demands that Ingrid pay him child support. Ingrid would like to visit her home city with the child, but expects that Scott will take any steps to prevent them from going. They were together for only three years, and yet Ingrid feels she and the child will live with Scott's abuse and its harmful consequences for many years yet.

Victim experiences - Jane

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Family law proceedings] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Legal representation] [People with children] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Jane and Richard met at university and later married. They had two children together, and finally separated after 25 years. Both are tertiary educated, however Richard assumed the primary earner role early in the relationship and priority was given to his professional advancement. Jane supported Richard's career pursuits —which involved a number of relocations, here and overseas—and became the primary carer of their children who are in their mid to late teenage years. The children live with Jane and have limited contact with Richard who continues to live and work overseas and returns periodically. There are no Family Court parenting orders, however there are consent orders dealing with the settlement of marital property between Jane and Richard and access to children during school holidays. Jane had completed a Graduate Diploma whilst raising the children, and had been in unrelated paid employment for brief periods when the family was based in Australia. However she had not attained any significant experience or career progression as caring for the children was her main priority. Just prior to separation Jane accepted a full-time job that for the first time utilized her degree. She supports herself and the children from her modest income; and under the terms of the consent orders, Richard is discharged from any responsibility to pay child support. The property settlement entitles Jane to funds from the sale of a house property, which she intends to use to purchase a home for her and the children.

Marrying so young, Jane had little experience of relationships or what to expect. Richard always earned a high salary and from the outset took charge of their finances and purchases. As a couple they bought a number of real estate properties, which he referred to as his own, despite their being registered in Jane's name and clearly shared assets. Without the qualification and experience she'd hoped to obtain, Jane could only work in low-paid positions; and, after having children and living as expats overseas, was unable to work at all. Richard belittled Jane for her lack of financial contribution, and regularly monitored her weekly spending against the allowance he had allocated that was often insufficient for essentials. She was required to show Richard receipts for all of her expenditure. Richard could become enraged when he believed Jane had overspent or acted without his approval, and would often throw and break items precious to Jane to show his displeasure with her and to intimidate her. Early in the relationship when Jane freely expressed her opinions with Richard, he threw a coffee cup toward her head which flew out an open window and travelled 5 metres before smashing on the neighbour's brick wall. On another occasion he ripped up certificates of her achievement in music. If she went out he would call her regularly to check on her movements and who she was with. Over time Jane tried to follow his instructions so as to avoid his angry outbursts; however she found herself becoming increasingly isolated, anxious and depressed, diminished by Richard's abuse, and lacking in self-esteem. Meanwhile, she was caring for two children, for the most part by herself, and coping with the additional challenges of establishing a home and friendships, and raising a family in various overseas locations. Despite Jane's 'anything-for-peace' approach, Richard repeatedly criticised her mothering and homemaking abilities; and the children would often express concern for how she was feeling after Richard had finished his abusive rants.

Jane became distressed about how one of the children was coping and behaving and managed to get Richard's approval to spend money on therapy on the basis that it was about the child. It was during this time that Jane realised that she needed help herself, and began attending therapy sessions in secret, knowing that Richard would be outraged and refuse to pay if he found out.

Jane describes an emotionally traumatic separation that was prolonged over five years as she struggled to find ways to persuade Richard to address the problems in their relationship together. Jane felt she had to try hard to do what she could to save the marriage, but at the same time was learning to understand and deal with the fact that Richard had controlled her behavior for so many years. She decided that it was best to return to Australia, settle the children into their final years of high school, retrain, get a job and try to rebuild herself while Richard remained in his overseas position. When he visited from time to time, Jane tried to arrange couple counselling, but Richard would either get angry or disengage.

Eventually Jane felt the marriage was over and she engaged solicitors to take the necessary steps to deal with issues relating to the children and property. In the years that followed Jane spent $100,000 of her own and family funds on legal fees, an outlay that has significantly eroded her financial resources. She reports having competent and supportive advisers, however believes that they were unable to effectively deal with Richard's evasive, manipulative and dishonest conduct in relation to disclosure of income and assets, preservation of assets, child support, mediation, and settlement of consent orders. She reports that Richard would send numerous emails to her solicitors based on the assumption that her solicitors would read them and then charge her. She feels that it perhaps would have been preferable to take the matter to trial where Richard's conduct and credibility could have been assessed by a court, but concedes the merits of her legal advice that the financial and emotional cost of this option would have been prohibitive. Richard continued to humiliate Jane through this process by cutting off services and insurance, cancelling the children's school enrolments, and reneging on agreements. In particular he reneged on a signed Mediation agreement for settlement. Richard also systematically used the Child Support system to continue the emotional and financial abuse. For instance, despite several international flights and maintaining business interests and assets overseas, Richard was able to convince Child Support that he had no income. Richard has also driven onto the property Jane is renting after she asked him not to. She finds him intimidating and at one stage considered applying for a protection order against him. Jane reflects that at no point has Richard ever been held accountable or borne any consequences for his abusive behaviour.

When the consent orders were finally put before the court for approval, the judge acknowledged they were unjust and inequitable to Jane, but the reality of her situation dictated that she would be unable to afford the cost of having the multiple contested matters adjudicated on by the court. While Jane knows that she did not receive the share of the marital assets that she was entitled to, she feels fortunate that her settlement funds will be sufficient to be financially comfortable provided she continues working and spends prudently. She is finally able to work toward full registration in her chosen career, which she was unable to pursue previously.

Victim experiences - Jennifer

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Animal abuse] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Myths] [Older people] [People living in regional, rural and remote communities] [Police-initiated orders] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sentencing] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Jennifer and Frank are in their sixties and were in a relationship for five years. They have both been married previously and have adult children. Jennifer has always worked in various skilled positions, and entered retirement well self-funded, with superannuation savings and an unencumbered house property. Frank did not complete high school, however Jennifer believes he is highly intelligent with good commercial sense, and runs a seemingly successful business. Their relationship progressed quickly, and before long Frank had moved into Jennifer's house. Frank had told Jennifer that he was divorced, but she learned much later, after having contact with his first wife with whom she became friends, that Frank had lied about this. Frank ran his business in a rural town a few hours' drive from where Jennifer had been living for many years. Given the uncertain economic climate, Frank convinced Jennifer that it would be prudent to move to the town and keep a better eye on the business. Jennifer believed Frank was envisaging a 12-month plan, which she embraced as a welcome change from city life. With Frank's strong encouragement, Jennifer bought an acreage property on the outskirts of the town, funded by a mortgage using the equity in her house, with Jennifer and Frank as joint borrowers.

While Jennifer very much enjoys the rural setting and lifestyle, she describes signing the contract on the property as 'signing her death warrant'. Having moved in—along with Jennifer's two much-loved, blind and aging dogs—Frank became immediately violent. Jennifer is a confident and capable person, and thought Frank respected her for this; and yet if Frank didn't get his own way, he began damaging the flooring and woodwork, breaking things, and throwing objects across the house, including coffee cups past Jennifer's head, into the wall. One winter evening, having urged Jennifer to have a shower upstairs, Frank propped the pool gate open allowing one of her dogs to wander in and fall into the pool, leaving it to drown. At Jennifer's inconsolable distress, Frank said aggressively 'he's dead, fucking get over it'. Jennifer believes that Frank resented her self-confidence, and relished trying to 'bring her to her knees'. When they bought identical smartphones, their accounts were synchronised inadvertently, and Jennifer became aware that Frank was having relationships with other women, as she was able to read the incoming and outgoing text messages. Frank quickly arranged for the accounts to be desynchronised. The situation was intolerable to Jennifer, and she felt she had to bring an end to the relationship; with the help of her family, she managed to get Frank to move out of the house.

Frank's intimidation and abuse of Jennifer escalated on separation. Jennifer was forced to make the total monthly mortgage repayments on the property as Frank refused to contribute. Her retirement income could not sustain this substantial outlay; and soon she had no choice but to sell her city property, and apply the funds to discharge the mortgage, taxes and other outstanding expenses. Jennifer is unable to sell the acreage property due to a depressed real estate market, and even if she could, she would not have sufficient funds to buy where she had lived previously. She feels trapped and vulnerable in a small town where Frank also lives and runs his business. And yet she felt that in order to function in that environment she must adopt a cordial attitude to Frank, or life would be unbearable. Frank is a tall, extremely heavy man, with an aggressive demeanour. Initially after separating, Frank would come around to the house and offer to help with the pool and other jobs; however the situation would often deteriorate quickly and, if Jennifer didn't accede to his various demands, Frank would yell profanities at her, and take the pool equipment or the car, returning them only when he decided Jennifer was behaving properly. Frank then began stalking Jennifer by coming to the house at night, peering into and rapping on windows, and going through the garbage bins and letterbox. Jennifer became increasingly fearful of Frank's behaviour, and called the police on a number of occasions.

For the most part, Jennifer feels the police were approachable enough, but ineffective in advising her of her rights or available protections; one officer referred to an incident as 'just a domestic'. This was the case until one day Frank arrived at the house demanding that he and Jennifer resume living together; he threw a coffee cup over the balcony, and when Jennifer tried to close the automated swing door as he was storming out of the garage, he stopped the door in its tracks, buckled and broke it, and told her, 'I'll get you, you fucking bitch'. That night, once police were alerted, they took charge of the matter, and obtained a temporary protection order on Jennifer's behalf and charged Frank with intimidation and criminal damage to property.

Jennifer recalls feeling dumbfounded by their heavy-handed turnaround, and terrified of how Frank would react, most particularly towards her, given the comprehensive and damning statement she had provided the police. She also didn't realise she would end up in court.

Jennifer felt frustrated and diminished by the court process. She was cross examined by Frank's lawyer for a lengthy period, and subjected to attacks on her character and behaviour. The prosecutor did not interview Jennifer prior to the hearing, and therefore had little or no understanding of the facts and context of the matter, most importantly the history of Frank's domestic and family violence towards Jennifer. Frank behaved inappropriately in the courtroom, and the (visiting) Magistrate threatened his removal from the court room. He also gave inconsistent evidence, which on the criminal damage charge wasn't believed, and ultimately he was fined, and a conviction recorded. He was acquitted of the intimidation charge as the Magistrate found there was a lack of evidence. Jennifer believes that had she been given an opportunity to provide a full account of the facts and context to the prosecutor, this would have been conveyed to the Magistrate. When she walked out of the courthouse, Frank yelled abuse at Jennifer and told her he was going to get her. Frank has recently successfully appealed the conviction, and successfully contested the issue of a final protection order.

Frank has never paid for the damage to the garage door, and while the Magistrate said the civil matter could be dealt with at a courthouse located in another town, the legal, travel and associated costs would have been prohibitive to Jennifer. She was also unable to claim on insurance without bearing a disproportionate penalty. There is some prospect of Jennifer claiming victim compensation; however she has not felt strong enough to begin this process.

Jennifer believes that she has done all she can to secure her home with cameras, lights and locks, and yet she feels profoundly unsafe. He has continued to intimidate her from the neighbours' fence line and from the street and elsewhere in the small town. Frank has also ingratiated himself to some of her children and their partners undermining her own relationship with them in his efforts to hurt and distress her emotionally. Despite having obtained the order on her behalf in the first instance, the police have now told her there is nothing more they can do for her. At this stage, Jennifer fears for her life and future, and can see no legal recourse for her protection. She has also discovered that Frank has had similarly violent relationships with other women in the past and also that Frank has told neighbours that Jennifer is mad and unbalanced.

Victim experiences - Julia

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Emotional abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Myths and misunderstandings] [Parenting orders] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Social abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Julia and Adam were in a relationship for three years, during which time they had a child who was just under 12 months old at separation. They both completed secondary education and apprenticeships in different fields. Julia was employed until the child was born and is now the primary carer and in receipt of a Centrelink sole parent pension. Julia and the child live with Julia's mother. Adam is employed and required to travel often as part of his work. They have an informal arrangement where Adam has supervised contact in a public location with the child (and Julia present) for a couple of hours one day a week, or as his work permits; Julia has been happy to accommodate his changing schedule. However when Adam threatened to apply for residence of the child, Julia began investigating Family Law orders. Adam is a frequent user of cannabis, and suffers from memory loss, depression and mood disorders as a result of a brain injury he received several years ago in a car accident. While Julia doesn't believe Adam would do anything intentionally to harm the child, she has observed that his attention span is limited, he forgets to watch the child, he smokes in the child's presence and leaves dangerous items within reach. Julia is also concerned about the unhealthy influence of Adam's family. Julia is consulting her doctor about the anxiety she is experiencing from her abusive relationship with Adam.

Since Adam's brain injury, his mother has held power of attorney over all of his affairs and otherwise dominated his recovery, rehabilitation and decision making. Julia believes that this loss of control over his life led Adam to assert control over Julia. She was also made to feel responsible for Adam's emotional care, even though she felt that the brain injury was used as a ready excuse for Adam's abusive and dysfunctional behaviour. He objected to her working in a male-dominated industry, she wasn't allowed to continue dancing, and restricted her from spending time with her family and friends. He threatened to turn up at Julia's workplace and make a scene so she would lose her job. During her pregnancy, they moved into and renovated a house Adam had inherited from his deceased father. Adam would dictate who could visit and when. At least every second week, and increasingly so through the pregnancy and after the child was born, Adam would rage out of control, and throw Julia's belongings out the front of the house and tell her to leave. By this stage, Julia had discovered that Adam also had a serious drug problem, and became very concerned about the potential effects on a newborn. Once Julia stopped work to have the baby, Adam would regularly tell her that he was the only one working, and she needed to shut up and do as she was told. Julia would respond by saying that she was entitled to her own opinion regardless of whether agreed, but realised that there were times that this would produce an explosive reaction in Adam involving his screaming in her face and standing on her feet so she was unable to move. Adam gave Julia money only to buy groceries and nappies, and refused to pay for new clothes for Julia who had lost a considerable amount of weight due to stress. They had a joint account, but Adam would withdraw any available money denying Julia access to funds; he would mostly spend the money on cannabis. Julia's mother would often pay for items Julia and the child needed. Adam also insisted that Julia not take contraception as he wanted another child; Julia was forced to comply, but did not want to subject another child to Adam's violence.

The control exercised by Adam's mother extended to their relationship. They were unable to pay bills without her approval and, soon after the birth, Julia was forced to put the baby on formula milk so Adam's mother could have the baby for overnight stays. Adam first hit Julia when she was holding their six-week-old baby. Yelling, dragging Julia through the house and throwing her out the front of the house became the norm in the relationship. Julia would regularly have bruising that she tried to conceal from friends, or she would simply not go out to avoid the embarrassment of having to explain her circumstances and justify staying with Adam so that the child had the care of both parents. Julia believes Adam was oblivious to the consequences to her and the baby; he would become so blind with anger that there were no boundaries to his violence. Adam's mother often witnessed Adam's violence and made no attempt to stop him. Julia regularly felt her own life was in danger, however always left the house to stay with her own mother if she believed the child was at risk. Julia has noticed that the child is now fearful around men, and cries at the sound of a deep voice.

Julia attempted to leave Adam on a number of occasions, however Adam threatened that the court would punish her for taking the child away from him. Julia's greatest fear is losing the child. As he'd done previously, when Julia indicated that she would like to return to work, Adam threatened to sabotage her chances. While Adam didn't harm Julia's two cats, he did threaten not to allow her to take them if she left. Julia felt she could no longer deal with Adam's manipulation so, for her own preservation, acquiesced to his behaviour and didn't bother pursuing any of her own interests. Julia's mother was concerned for her wellbeing and tried to talk to Adam, which resulted in a terrifying road rage incident. Adam repeatedly tried to exclude Julia's mother from their lives.

On one occasion following Adam's violence, Julia rang the police from her mother's house. She was very reluctant to send the police to interview Adam as he had always told her that if she involved the police, he would say that she was the perpetrator, and would make sure she lost care of the child. Julia reports that the police were reasonably supportive; they gave her information about available counselling, and suggested she move in with her mum and keep away from Adam. They did not however encourage her to seek a protection order as they indicated that it may jeopardise her relationship with the child. At the time, Julia was confused by this approach and, in hindsight is dismayed, as she believes that a protection order would likely have prevented more violence and suffering.

Julia did leave the relationship and took the child to live with her mother. While Adam's physical violence stopped, his abuse continued in the form of threats in text and voice messages including that he would send people to get her, that he would take the child, and that she deserved to be put in the gutter and kicked in the back of the head. Julia found these threats particularly frightening as she was often at home alone at night with the child while her mother worked night shifts. Again, she contacted police with the detail of Adam's behaviour and they urged her to attend the station and have a protection order taken out. When she arrived, with the text and voice messages on her phone, she was told Adam's threats weren't sufficient to justify an order or to charge him with any offence such as stalking, and she would have to make an application for a protection order on her own behalf at the court. Julia felt embarrassed and distressed when she left the station, believing they thought she was simply trying to get attention. Julia then rang a police information line as she needed advice on the application process, and remarkably they told her to try another police station. When she did this, the police were more interested in Adam's involvement with illicit drugs than the immediate threat of Adam's violence and referred her to the court to obtain a protection order.

Julia downloaded the relevant forms and sought assistance from the court's domestic violence support service. She appeared before a magistrate and obtained a temporary protection order against Adam. Julia felt that the magistrate had read her file carefully, took her circumstances seriously, and reassured her that she was doing the right thing for the right reasons. It was explained to Julia that she would be notified of a return date once Adam had been served; she was also aware that service may be delayed given Adam's frequent absences for work.

Julia is also preparing a Family Court consent order application proposing that she have residence of the child and Adam have contact on similar terms to the current informal arrangements.

Adam has Julia's mobile number so he can make contact in relation to arrangements for the child; however he is not aware of where Julia and the child live. Adam's abusive behaviour continues in texts and phone calls when he unreasonably demands to see the child at short notice and Julia doesn't comply. His anger escalates quickly, his language is profane and threats of violence continue. Julia has blocked Adam on Facebook, but believes that he posts on his own Facebook page long tirades accusing Julia of preventing him from seeing the child, and as a consequence she has been verbally attacked online by his followers.

Julia feels her life is starting to get back to normal now that she is dealing with the domestic violence and parenting matters, and she and the child are living away from Adam and in a safe and supportive environment with her mother. She is seeing friends again who she was cut off from when she was with Adam; Adam would either disallow visits or make them feel uncomfortable when they did visit. Many of Julia's belongings including furniture were damaged from Adam throwing them into the yard, so when it came time for her to move to her mother's house, she was left with very little. While Julia's experience of the court support service is very positive, she remains concerned that the police disbelieve her, and she is therefore unlikely to seek their help in the future. Julia is keeping copies/recordings of all text and voicemail messages from Adam, and she has applied for legal aid to fund legal representation for the protection order hearing. Adam has transferred his accounts and assets to his mother and told Julia that she won't get a cent. Julia has applied for a child support assessment.

Victim experiences - Leah

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Dowry related abuse] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children to domestic and family violence] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Parenting orders] [People from CALD backgrounds] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Social abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Leah and Ethan were both born overseas, share a country of origin, and speak English as a second language. They are both tertiary educated. While they didn't know one another, their respective families decided they were a good match and so they married. In a sense, it was an arranged marriage; Leah says she proceeded with it out of respect for her parents, and was too young to have any idea of what marriage involved. Sometime before the marriage, Ethan had come to Australia on a student visa and was later granted permanent residency. Once married, Leah travelled to Australia on a tourist visa and was later also granted permanent residency. Leah and Ethan were in a relationship for five years, however continued to live, separated under the one roof, for a further five years. They have two children, the older born overseas, the younger born in Australia.

Leah and Ethan married overseas according to certain traditions and customs. These influences had not been strong in Leah's upbringing, so she found the experience strange and unfamiliar. She recalls being derided publicly by Ethan's family about dowry and other issues. Following the wedding there were numerous events and ceremonies over many days. Ethan made no contact with Leah during that time until he approached Leah's father to advise that he couldn't look after Leah for a while as he needed to sort out visa problems.

Eventually Leah and Ethan travelled to Australia. They lived in a motel until they found a house to rent. Leah felt insecure, nervous and isolated. Ethan left for work each morning, and told Leah to lock the house and not go out. Ethan did not give Leah any money; rather, he would take her to the shops to buy the groceries and he would pay. Leah had no experience of cooking or cleaning or running a household; if she were in her home country, she would have received a great deal of help and support from her family. Leah tried to learn about housekeeping on the internet. Ethan monitored her internet usage, and kept the passwords. Ethan wouldn't buy a vacuum cleaner and made Leah pick up dirt with her hands. He was angry often, complaining that the house wasn't clean and Leah was a burden. Leah was rarely allowed to call her parents, and when she did, the call had to be on speaker. Ethan bullied Leah about being a vegetarian, and told her they couldn't have a relationship if she didn't eat meat. As a result Leah began to eat meat, but when she ate meat Ethan would call her a 'pig' and ridicule the way she ate.

On one occasion, Ethan went on a work trip which was meant to be for two days, but he didn't return for ten days. He left Leah with no money or phone access. Leah had only enough packet noodles to eat once a day. She was terrified of being alone for that period; she stayed up all night in front of the television and tried to sleep during the day.

Leah and Ethan travelled overseas for a month when Leah was in the early stages of her first pregnancy; it was a work trip for Ethan. Leah was unwell with morning sickness and unable to leave the hotel room. Ethan would not allow her to order food claiming it was too expensive. She went for days without food, was exhausted, and lost a significant amount of weight. Leah then went back to her home country to stay with her parents for the balance of the pregnancy and the birth. They were extremely worried about her health, but were unaware at that stage of how Ethan was treating her.

After the birth, Leah and the baby returned to Australia to live with Ethan in a house he had purchased. Leah describes herself as a slave throughout the relationship. Ethan called her from work multiple times a day to check she had showered, cleaned the house and done the other chores he required. He stipulated who Leah could and could not have contact with, and what she was able to wear, insisting that Australian dress was not appropriate. Leah did however become more assertive regarding matters affecting the child's wellbeing. Ethan refused to spend money on a pram, car seat and other usual baby items, and resisted when Leah asked for money to buy baby food and other essentials. Ethan would verbally abuse Leah in the shopping centre and, when home, would push her, pull her hair and grab her around the throat. Ethan would also rape Leah regularly despite her cries for him to stop. On one occasion he dragged her by the hair and violently raped her while the youngest child was sleeping alongside the bed. Leah never wanted Ethan to come near her; she had no contraception, nor any understanding of it. Leah rarely left the house, and even within the house, she stayed mostly in one corner of her bedroom near the television, going to the kitchen only when required to cook. She never went to the upper level of the house.

Leah's parents visited for a few months during and after Leah's second pregnancy. Leah told Ethan that she needed the help and her parents would pay for most things. The parents were shocked to witness first hand Ethan's treatment of Leah. Her father was distressed by what he felt he had allowed happen to his daughter and suffered a long period of depression.

Despite the debilitating effects of Ethan's violence and abuse, Leah looked for opportunities to become less dependent on him. She studied and gained a further degree, got a job, opened her own bank account, and paid for the groceries from her own money. Ethan objected to Leah's new independence and suspected she may be planning to leave. He stopped work so he could be at home to monitor her. He hid recording devices and sensors around the house. Leah confronted Ethan, asking him to explain his behaviour, and then turned off or broke the devices.

Over time, Leah did gather the courage to leave. She knew she had to be careful as Ethan was likely to become angry and violent and would try to stop her. Leah sought advice from a community legal service about applying for a protection order. Whenever Ethan was out, she began shifting her belongings to the neighbour's house. She organised alternative private accommodation and, while her parents were still visiting, in a single day, got their help to move in and look after the children so she could attend the Magistrates Court. The legal service had prepared the necessary documents and a solicitor met her at the court ready to apply for a temporary protection order. When Ethan discovered Leah and the children had left, he called and messaged her repeatedly, threatening to report her to the Federal Police. Ethan agreed to a one year protection order. He also had Leah put on an immigration watch list to prevent her from leaving the country with the children.

Ethan organised mediation to make contact arrangements. Leah felt that Ethan manipulated the mediator, and that the mediator did not listen to her requests or concerns, including that she did not want to be in the same room as Ethan during the process, despite the mediator being aware of the protection order. Leah was not happy with the outcome allowing Ethan contact for 11 nights across 28 days, but she agreed nevertheless. Ethan rarely complied with the contact arrangements. Leah instructed a lawyer and a hearing date was set in the Federal Circuit Court to deal with property matters. Meanwhile, Ethan continued to message Leah about getting back together. Leah ignored his pleas, but was concerned that he would use the children to continue controlling her.

Leah says the protection order was effective as Ethan's harassment by text stopped and she was otherwise free from any form of contact with him. Leah did not seek to apply for another order on its expiration as she believed she would need to engage a lawyer, which she couldn't afford. Leah remains frustrated and concerned by Ethan's care of the children; in particular, the younger child does not want to spend time with Ethan. The older child, a mature and independent teenager, moves freely between the two houses. Ethan is unreliable and rarely confirms arrangements with Leah. The older child tends to be the liaison and buffer between them.

Property matters have now been settled by consent. Ethan was reprimanded by the Federal Circuit Court judge for his failure to disclose his financial position. While Leah was represented by a lawyer, she felt she must settle as she did not have the resources to fund the matter to a trial. Ethan is required to sell the house they lived in, and the profit along with superannuation is to be shared equally. Leah received a much smaller sum than she expected from the sale of the family home and most of it will be spent on the considerable debts and expenses she has to discharge including legal fees.

Leah experienced years of physical, sexual, financial, emotional and social abuse. The abuse was seriously detrimental to her sleep and health. Now that she has left the relationship and taken steps to protect herself, she feels safer however, she believes Ethan is spying on her and that he has made contact with her neighbours. She also believes that Ethan tries to control her through the children. Leah has had to retrain as her previous employment was beginning to cause health problems. She cares for herself and the children on a part-time wage and minimal welfare while she is studying. Ethan pays no child support. Leah is determined to improve her circumstances and build a good life for her children. She believes that because of insufficient funds she was unable to achieve fair results through the justice process. She has immense praise and gratitude for the assistance she received from the community legal service and social workers.

Victim experiences - Leyla

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Cultural and spiritual abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Family Court order] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Forced marriage] [People from CALD backgrounds] [People with mental illness] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Social abuse]

Leyla is 15 years old.

Leyla moved to Australia from Iraq when she was 12 years old. Leyla lives with her parents, siblings and uncle.

Leyla's mother told Leyla that arrangements had been made for her to marry an older cousin in Iraq. In preparation for the marriage, Leyla's family travelled to Iraq and paid a dowry. Leyla's parents told Leyla that after the end of the next school term, she would no longer be going to school. Leyla's older brother told Leyla she didn't need to go to school now because soon she would be married. Her new role would be to look after her husband and their home.

Leyla did not want to get married. Leyla wanted to keep going to school. She likes school. For Leyla, it feels very important to her that she finishes her education.

Leyla told her mother that she did not want to get married. In response, Leyla's mother told Leyla that she was bringing shame on her family. Leyla's mother slapped Leyla in the face and pushed her, causing her to hit her head against the wall. Leyla's mother took away her mobile.

Leyla told her teacher about her family's plans to force her into marriage. Her teacher made a report to the child protection agency, who contacted the Australian Federal Police.

Leyla left home with the assistance of the Australian Federal Police. Leyla now lives in youth supported accommodation.

Once Leyla left home, she also disclosed that her uncle had been sexually inappropriate towards her, including exposing himself to her. This allegation was investigated by police and child protection.

The Australian Federal Police referred Leyla to Legal Aid. With the representation of Legal Aid, Leyla made an application to the Family Law Court for orders placing Leyla's name on the Family Law Watch List and restraining her family from removing her from Australia or from forcing her into marriage.

Leyla's family have made ongoing threats to Leyla. Leyla's brother sent Leyla a message over Facebook saying "If you don't come home soon, then Dad will have you killed". With the assistance of Legal Aid, Leyla reported this behaviour to the police. Police applied for a protection order to protect Leyla.

Living in supported accommodation, Leyla feels very isolated from her religion, culture, family and friends. Leyla has struggled with her mental health; and at times, has felt suicidal.

Victim experiences - Lisa

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Animal abuse] [Breach of protection order] [Children] [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Legal representation] [Myths and misunderstandings] [Parenting orders] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Social abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Lisa and Sean were in a relationship for four years, and had a child together who was aged around two years at separation. Also living with them was Lisa's primary school aged child from a previous relationship. Both of these children have disabilities and special needs. Lisa has adult children too; they have families of their own and live independently. Sean was still married to someone else when he and Lisa met through work. Lisa did not complete high school; however she has spent some years studying to gain qualifications that will enhance her employment prospects. Sean qualified in a trade and has held a well-remunerated position for at least as long as Lisa has known him. Sean has an illicit drug habit and misuses alcohol.

When Lisa and Sean moved in together, Sean wanted Lisa to stop work and be a stay-at-home mum. This was unfamiliar to Lisa as she had always worked to support herself and her children through years of mostly single parenting. Initially, she was thrilled by Sean's generosity and the prospect that they could establish a happy, stable family life together without the pressure of her having to earn money. Over time however, Lisa realised that this was Sean's way of asserting his control over her. Details also emerged about Sean that she hadn't previously been aware of, in particular his history of serious drug use and ongoing use. In the first year of their relationship, Sean expected Lisa to support him through the difficulties he was experiencing in divorcing his wife and then with the illness of a close family member. Despite also having to study and care for a child with disabilities, Sean insisted that Lisa's focus be on him. This was an intense time for Lisa; she miscarried, and then later successfully conceived.

During Lisa's pregnancy, Sean's behaviour towards Lisa became violent and abusive, and his drug use increased. He objected to Lisa making contact with her former work colleagues (especially males), and monitored her Facebook activity. The reception on Lisa's phone network was so poor that Lisa was mostly unable to call friends. Sean, on the other hand, was in regular phone and Facebook contact with female friends, one of whom sent him provocative photos of herself. When Lisa suggested this was inappropriate, Sean got angry and told her she was jealous and paranoid. When Sean was coming down from a drug bender, he would anger easily, and shout at and belittle Lisa's other child. This infuriated Lisa and she tried to stand her ground with him; Sean told her she wasn't allowed to shout. On one occasion, Sean returned home, smashed his phone in front of Lisa, and then flung a heavy jacket and zipper across her pregnant stomach resulting in bleeding and long-term injury to the child. She spent over a week in hospital and was distressed knowing that her other child was in Sean's care while he and friends had long sessions of alcohol and drug taking.

After their child was born, they moved to an isolated regional town so that Sean could take up a higher-paid position. Lisa only had access to the Centrelink family allowance payments to buy groceries, clothes and other household expenses. Sean made the mortgage repayments on the house and spent the balance of his wage as he wished. When Lisa asked him to supplement the family benefit payments, which were insufficient to cover the family's needs, he would become aggressive and argumentative. Lisa was blamed for living costs and anything else that Sean refused to take responsibility for, including falling asleep at the wheel while driving, with Lisa and the children as passengers. Lisa has an 'inside' dog that she and her other child remain very close to. Sean made the dog live outside with his own dog, which inevitably resulted in fights. Sean told Lisa she needed to put her dog down; she resisted and kept the dog.

Sean made no effort to help with the care of the children, the dogs or the home. Lisa attended to all of these things even when their child was an infant and awake through the night with feeding and teething troubles. Early one morning, Lisa asked for help with the baby; Sean told her she was lazy, and went back to Facebooking his friends. Again, Lisa was exasperated by his response and kicked a large, empty water bottle along the floor towards him. Sean grabbed and threw her against the wall, dislocating and disfiguring her shoulder. While Tina screamed in pain, Sean yelled abuse at her for an hour before driving her to the hospital. He then apologised profusely, begging that Lisa not pursue charges. The hospital gave Lisa the name of a local domestic and family violence service, and referred them both to joint counselling, which they attended briefly. Sean refused a recommendation to attend all male counselling.

It was six months before Lisa was given an appointment for surgery to correct her serious shoulder injury. Meanwhile, she endured significant pain, and Sean subjected her to further violence. A particularly frightening incident involved Sean lifting Lisa up and throwing her through a door frame. She managed to head butt him and knock out two of his front teeth. She later suffered another miscarriage and prolonged bleeding. When it came time for Lisa's surgery, a family member came to help out. This angered Sean too. When they left, Lisa was exhausted, managing her post-operative pain with medication, looking after the baby and older child, and sleeping on the couch to avoid confrontation with Sean. One evening, he demanded that Lisa have sex with him—as he always had—and, for the first time, she refused. He followed her around the house obsessively, and when in the baby's room, punched his fist through the wall beside her head. The next morning, Sean left for work as if nothing had happened. Lisa packed up the children and her belongings, contacted the local domestic and family violence service and organised a Centrelink support payment, and drove to another state. Lisa arranged for her other child to stay with the child's father with whom she has a healthy and constructive relationship; and Lisa and the baby went into temporary crisis accommodation until she could get set up in a rental house. She asked Sean to send money to assist as she knew he had extra cash.

Lisa had settled the children into their new home when Sean arrived wanting to see them, and seeking a reconciliation. Lisa agreed on the basis that they live in a city location. They moved into Sean's former marital home (of which he was now the sole owner under Family Court orders) and resumed an intimate relationship. Lisa insisted on a lease in the event that things did not work out with Sean. She paid the rent and utilities bills, and Sean made the mortgage repayments. Before long, Lisa experienced further serious health problems, and required extended hospital treatment. Sean refused to take leave from work to care for the children, so she was forced to take them with her to the hospital. At this point, Lisa told Sean to leave the home as she'd had enough. She asserted her rights as lessee of the property. Periods of making up and breaking up followed, however they continued sexual relations.

Sean's lawyers served an eviction notice on Lisa claiming that the property was to be sold. She vacated, and Sean moved back in; he had no intention of selling the property. Sean would often stay over at Lisa's new address, and she agreed to informal and regular overnight contact arrangements. When she refused further sexual relations, and soon after her hospital treatment, Sean made an application for 50/50 shared residence of their child, notwithstanding the child's very young age and special needs. Lisa applied for a protection order against Sean, but he persuaded her to withdraw it before service claiming that he would otherwise lose his job.

Over the following twelve months, the windows in Lisa's house and car were repeatedly smashed, and her house was broken into on multiple occasions. She is certain that Sean and his friends were the offenders. Sean also parked out the front of the house from time to time in different vehicles, and publicly abused and demeaned her on Facebook. On police advice, Lisa obtained a temporary protection order against Sean. Sean also made a cross application falsely alleging that Lisa misused alcohol during her pregnancy causing long-term harm to their child. Both applications were heard together: Lisa was granted a 12 month protection order; and Sean's application was dismissed. Lisa reported a breach of the temporary order involving Sean and others throwing rocks through her car windscreen and into her house near sleeping children. Police told her they were busy, and a photographer would attend in 24 hours. The current order allows Sean to ring the children at certain hours over the weekend. He is often stoned or drunk when he calls, and Lisa can never predict whether he'll be cooperative or aggressive.

Family Court parenting and property proceedings resulted in Sean having fortnightly access; there were two family reports prepared but the findings were not followed by the court. Lisa suspects that the protection order hearing was deferred pending the outcome of the Family Court matters, which were scheduled for a later time. Sean was told by the judge at the interim hearing that he would not succeed on his shared residence application; he persisted regardless.

Sean was legally represented, Lisa was not. She has been unable to access Legal Aid, and continues to do her best to manage these legal matters herself, with considerable difficulty. Lisa is however appreciative of the understanding and practical help she has received from local community legal services, domestic and family violence services, and court support. Lisa is still concerned for her own safety and the safety of her younger child. She believes that Sean is incapable of taking proper care of the child who often returns home after contact visits with cuts, bruises and rashes. Lisa felt frustrated and intimidated by the delays in the resolution of the protection order and parenting and property matters, and Sean's contribution to that delay.

Victim experiences - Melissa

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people] [Breach] [Damaging property] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Myths] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sentencing] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Melissa and Ben were in a relationship for 17 years and had five children together, aged from toddler to early teens at separation. Melissa identifies as Indigenous. She has post-secondary qualifications and has been employed in a professional role for many years, apart from when the children were very young. Ben has always earned a high income from his trade job when not serving jail sentences for various convictions. Their combined income enabled, for the most part, comfortable material living circumstances. Melissa describes Ben as having been both generous and irresponsible with money. Their relationship was characterised by Ben's regular absences for work; and a number of periods of separation due to Ben's violence towards Melissa or his imprisonment as a consequence.

Early in the relationship, when they were living together, Ben began calling Melissa offensive and demeaning names, hitting and spitting on her, and forcing her to have unwanted sex; during some of these occasions, he would also be using illicit drugs. After three months, Melissa moved out and lived with family, returning briefly one evening with a (non-intimate) male friend who Ben assaulted. Ben was charged with and convicted of assault, and the police obtained a protection order on Melissa's behalf. Over many years Melissa had a number of protection orders.

Having spent a considerable period away from Ben, Melissa reinitiated contact as she wanted to have a child. Ben's violence towards Melissa escalated during her first pregnancy, as did his drug use. He would hit Melissa in the head, try to strangle her, and threaten her with knives. While Melissa knew these were breaches of the protection order, she was too afraid to contact police as Ben would smash the phone and hold his hand over her mouth when she screamed.

Melissa left Ben again after the birth of their first child. When the child was three weeks old, Ben came to Melissa's residence, took the child out of her arms, and bashed her badly. A witness alerted police and Ben was charged with and convicted of assault. On another occasion, when Melissa and the child were not home, Ben broke into the residence and viciously damaged and wrecked her furniture and appliances, and sliced her mattress. He also kicked in the door of her friend's house and smashed household items. Ben went to jail for these offences, and Melissa moved elsewhere with the child.

Melissa was a single mother, working part-time and studying, and didn't see Ben for two years. During his jail term, Ben wrote to Melissa threatening to 'get her' on his release. Melissa took the letter to police, and believes that Ben's jail term was extended as a result, however she is not sure whether it was treated as a breach or parole matter; the police didn't advise her.

When Ben was out of jail, Melissa contacted him to ask if he wanted to see the child; she also wanted a second child. She says she'd felt lonely and longing for love, and Ben responded positively and warmly. However, soon after they resumed living together, and Melissa became pregnant, Ben's sexual violence started again. There were times when Melissa ran up the street naked and hid at a neighbour's house to escape Ben's force. He also continued the abusive name-calling, and told Melissa he hoped she got cancer and her body was maimed.

After the birth of their second child, the child safety services were briefly interested in the family's welfare. Melissa believes it was likely the police who alerted them to Ben's violence. Aware of the risk of the children being removed by child safety, Melissa stopped reporting the violence and abuse, notwithstanding its increasing severity and danger. Ben had once pushed her down the stairs while still pregnant and she'd sustained extensive blood loss from her injuries. On another occasion, he raped her while menstruating; and police arrived after being alerted by a neighbour. Police took a statement from Melissa and questioned her as to why she was still living with Ben. They expressed irritation that they'd been through this multiple times before with her, yet offered her no referral to support services. Melissa was shocked and distressed when she learned that child safety had visited the school and daycare to question her children without first speaking with her.

This pattern of violent and abusive behaviour—and police and child safety responses—continued for years.

When Melissa was pregnant with their fifth child, Ben came home in the early hours of one morning, in the aftermath of an intense drug bender, and began sexually assaulting Melissa. She physically attacked him, terrified of how he would react, fled the house carrying her own injuries. A family member returned to take care of the children and call the police. Melissa made a statement to police, and advised child safety of the incident. She and the children went to stay temporarily with a family member before returning to the home where Ben had stayed on. Child safety visited on a number of occasions, but never suggested the children would be removed. Melissa felt that they were more interested in hygiene than safety, and because she kept an immaculately clean and tidy house, they didn't appear concerned. The police did not charge Ben with breach of the protection order.

After the birth of their fifth child, Melissa left hospital early so that Ben could depart for his regular work stint away. On her return home, Ben spat in her face. Melissa says this was the point at which she snapped. She decided she would no longer tolerate Ben's behaviour, and rang the police. Ben left the house for an extended period, during which Melissa understands he got into trouble with his job and the law.

Ben continued working and contributing to the mortgage and family living expenses. Melissa was on leave from work following the birth of their fifth child. Given their combined incomes, she had never been on welfare benefits; however she became increasingly concerned about the violence and volatility in the family and applied for Centrelink assistance to protect herself and the children. She was also worried about how the children had been affected by their long-term exposure to Ben's violence and abuse, and sought counselling from a local service, which she found very supportive and helpful.

Ben returned after nearly twelve months. Melissa believed it was an attempt to reconcile, which she briefly and regrettably allowed. She was also aware that Ben was due to go to jail again, and could appreciate that he wanted to see the children. Melissa has Family Court residence orders for the first child, and no orders in relation to the remaining children. They have never lived with Ben other than when he and Melissa were residing together, and Ben never sought contact during his many absences from the family. Melissa is now considering the merits of seeking orders for her other four children.

Melissa believes the periods of separation imposed by Ben's terms of imprisonment and working away from home probably gave her the time she needed to recover from the acute impacts of Ben's violence and abuse, and to get on and work and care for the children. However, these circumstances also prolonged the violence and abuse over 17 years. Melissa says it is unlikely that Ben would reform if required to undertake behaviour change courses as part of his sentencing.

Reflecting on her involvement with the court system, Melissa believes that domestic and family violence isn't treated with the seriousness it deserves, that perpetrators can avoid service or attendance and matters have to be constantly adjourned, and that penalties are often fines or 'a slap on wrist'. Ben would taunt her that 'DV was just a piece of paper', and recklessly breached his protection orders on countless occasions. As to police and child safety, Melissa feels she received very little constructive support, and at times felt that she and the children were treated as a burden and frustration to these systems.

Victim experiences - Mira

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [People from CALD backgrounds] [People with children] [Risk] [Women]

Mira and Thomas met overseas through their work. Mira was born overseas, with English as her second language; and Thomas is an Australian citizen. They married and had their two children overseas. From Mira's perspective they were together for approximately fifteen years, however Mira says that Thomas is likely to believe that they are still together. Mira now lives in Australia with the children who are in high school. Mira arrived in Australia on a spousal visa and is now on a bridging visa, awaiting the issue of a spousal visa. Early in the relationship Mira stopped working to enable Thomas to pursue his career, which then required significant relocations to other countries so he could upgrade his qualifications; and has always involved Thomas travelling regularly and being away from home for lengthy periods.

Thomas's controlling and obsessive behaviours were apparent to Mira from the outset. He repeatedly pressured her to go out with him; and despite her telling him that she needed time following the end of a previous serious relationship, he persisted. Thomas would regularly send Mira gifts and deposit money into her account. She told him she did not want these inducements and he must stop. Undeterred, and knowing how important Mira's faith and traditions are to her and her family, Thomas announced to Mira that he had converted to her religion. Mira was shocked by Thomas's preoccupation with her, and urged him to back off. He told her he would kill himself if she didn't marry him and sat in the cemetery for hours brooding. Mira felt worn down by Thomas's fanatical efforts to win her over and yet was impressed by his religious conversion. Eventually she felt obliged to marry him, and hoped that over time she may grow to love him.

Mira committed to helping Thomas advance in his career and to raising their two children, however their relationship was constantly fraught. Starting with their wedding, Thomas insisted on organising their shared life as he wanted it, and demanded Mira's support for his obsession with extreme sports training and competitions. Events and holidays were meticulously planned without consultation with Mira. She and the children were expected to comply and if Mira expressed an objection she was bullied and intimidated, and on one occasion Thomas strangled her in front of his friend who was staying in their home. Thomas controlled the couple's finances and required Mira to account for her spending and produce receipts. Thomas would then be away from the family for weeks at a time, with no contact, and Mira was left to parent alone. It was during these extended breaks that Mira felt she must tell Thomas that she was unable to continue in the relationship and that it was best they divorce. Whenever she tried to raise the issue with Thomas, he became angry and morose, and would lock himself in a room threatening to kill himself and accusing Mira of bringing harm to the family. On two separate occasions, Thomas wielded a knife at Mira, again threatening to kill himself. Mira was terrified of what he may do, including harming her and the children. The first time, acting on the advice of Thomas's family, Mira rang the local domestic violence support service, and they arranged accommodation for her and the children until Mira knew Thomas had left the country. The second time, they relocated to a friend's house.

After living in various overseas locations for a number of years, Mira decided that it was in the children's best interests to settle in Australia. They have been here for a few years, and in Mira's mind, the relationship with Thomas is over, though she believes that he does not want it to formally end so as to avoid any adverse financial consequences to himself. Thomas stalked Mira and the children whenever he returned to Australia. She has told him not to come near the house, but he now harasses Mira's family by telephone. They jointly own two house properties, in Australia and overseas. Mira knows that if she were to apply for a protection order or to seek property orders in the Family Court, Thomas would be enraged and she could not predict what he might do. She fears he would become uncontrollable and be arrested. Thomas currently pays for the children's education and living expenses; she would rather defer addressing her own legal issues than risk losing his financial support, though she remains fearful of him. Mira does what she can to encourage the children's relationship with Thomas despite his minimal genuine interest or involvement in their lives. Mira is aware that for as long as these matters are unresolved, she and the children will continue to experience Thomas's obsessive control over them.

Victim experiences - Rosa

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Cultural abuse] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Interpreters] [People from CALD backgrounds] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Social abuse] [Women]

Rosa and Ken were both born overseas, and have completed tertiary education. English is Rosa's second language and she requires the assistance of an interpreter for other than basic communications. Ken is in highly-paid professional employment. They first made contact through an internet dating website, and then met in Europe for a holiday. The relationship developed quickly: Rosa arranged a tourist visa for Ken to stay for a few months with Rosa in her home country where they married and Rosa became pregnant. Ken's work then took them to another country where they settled briefly—together with Rosa's high-school aged child from a previous marriage—and their baby was born. Less than a year later, they all moved to Australia, again for Ken's work. Ken came on a temporary work visa with Rosa (as his wife) and the children as dependents. They separated only two months after arriving in Australia, when the infant was aged six months. Rosa advised Australian Immigration of the separation and related circumstances, and was granted a visa extension. While Rosa was in full-time work in her home country, she has not been employed since her departure.

Rosa explains that she noticed problems with Ken's behaviour during his first work posting (prior to coming to Australia). Ken began getting angry and upset, they argued often, and on one occasion he smashed a computer. He told Rosa that if she didn't trust him, the relationship was over. Once a week he would tell her she had to go back to her home country. After their arguments, Ken would tell Rosa he cared for and looked out for her. Yet during her pregnancy, Ken forced Rosa to do various activities that were not comfortable for her. Rosa was reluctant to disrupt her older child's schooling and opposed the move; it proceeded nonetheless, and the child experienced considerable educational difficulties as a result. Meanwhile, Rosa was having great difficulty learning English as the course Ken made her attend was at too high a level. Once the baby was born, Rosa believes that Ken misled her about citizenship matters so that the child could be granted citizenship of Ken's home country.

When the family relocated to Australia, Ken began calling Rosa demeaning names, he told her she was stupid, and insisted that she learn and speak English rather than her native language. Again, he regularly told her she had to go back to her home country, but that she must leave the baby in Australia. He said he didn't want Rosa, only their child. Ken often used the child's citizenship as a threat to Rosa, asserting that there was no point in her seeking help from police because she had no legal rights in relation to the child. Their first month in Australia was spent in a motel while they waited for their belongings to be shipped. They then moved into an apartment, and Ken soon departed interstate for work. Unexpectedly one evening he arrived home, giving Rosa a fright. He told Rosa he was missing the baby. Rosa says, without thinking, she handed Ken the baby and they went out into the garden while she continued cooking. When dinner was served, Rosa and her older child realised that Ken had left the apartment with the baby. Rosa contacted Ken on his mobile; he told her he wanted a divorce, he was posting her a document, he had paid a year's rent on the apartment, he would pay her a minimal amount per week, and he was taking the child. Rosa called the police immediately. The police attended and stayed for approximately 20 minutes and tried to reassure Rosa as she was very nervous, upset and concerned because she was still breastfeeding the baby. They told her the child would be okay and could have a bottle. She did not find them helpful and later called the police again. Different officers attended and told Rosa the father had not stolen the child, and the child would be okay with him. Rosa became increasingly distressed, and rang the police a third time, and throughout the following day and night, pleading with them to find the child. She also tried to track Ken down without success.

Eventually, three days later, a police officer advised Rosa to go the Family Court and seek an order authorising that a PACE alert be put on the child's passport, which meant the child was placed on the airport watch list. A duty lawyer assisted Rosa; it was discovered that Ken had already filed an application for divorce and residence of the child. He alleged in his affidavit material that Rosa wasn't feeding the child and she tied the child down. Later, when the child was returned to Rosa, both child safety and a psychologist interviewed her and provided reports that found Ken's allegations were unsubstantiated.

Rosa was granted legal aid to fund legal representation in the child proceedings. Rosa was seeking residence. Rosa saw the child for the first time one and a half months after Ken had taken the child from the apartment; initially she had supervised contact, which had been delayed due to problems locating an interpreter. After a number of Family Court appearances, the child was returned to Rosa's full-time care and Ken was granted weekly unsupervised contact. Both parents were prohibited from taking the child out of the country and Ken was prohibited from entering the apartment.

With the assistance of a local support service, Rosa obtained a one year protection order; Ken is required to be of good behaviour. Rosa represented herself as she was not entitled to legal aid on that application. She is entirely financially dependent on Ken as she is unable to receive Centrelink benefits and cannot find appropriate work given her limited English and childcare responsibilities. Rosa would have to text Ken weekly to ask for money to cover her living expenses. In response, Ken would repeatedly taunt Rosa by threatening to cancel her visa and take the child. Rosa also discovered that Ken had hired a private detective to follow and watch her.

Australian Immigration contacted Rosa after receiving notice of the divorce querying her intentions. She has sought advice from a community legal service about her visa status, and the implications of her older child turning 18. A student visa for the older child is an option; however a course of study would require funds that Rosa does not have access to.

Ken regularly breaches the contact orders, returning the child to Rosa late. Rosa attempted to photograph his arrival on her phone and he became verbally abusive. Further, in breach of the protection order, Ken bangs noisily on the door to Rosa's apartment demanding that she open the door and give him the child. On one occasion, the child was sleeping, and Rosa told him to wait until the child was awake. Ken persisted and Rosa rang the police. During his angry outbursts, Ken often slaps himself in the face and pushes himself against railings; he also asks Rosa to hit him. Rosa believes he may have a mental illness. Rosa feels frightened by Ken's behaviour, and continues to feel highly vulnerable given her financial dependence on him. She is not sure if Ken's work visa will be renewed. If his visa is not renewed the family will have to leave Australia, most likely to different countries. This is very distressing for Rosa as she fears she may be separated from her youngest child.

Victim experiences - Sally

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Emotional abuse] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Myths and misunderstandings] [Parenting orders] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sexual abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Sally and Carl were in a relationship for around fifteen months, though they never lived together. They both have children from other relationships. Sally has an intellectual disability that affects her comprehension, communication and general coping skills, and she takes medication to help her manage anxiety and stress. She never received a diagnosis for her disability but has difficulty reading and writing, concentrating and remembering things. Sally has however completed secondary schooling and was employed prior to having children. Sally and the father of her children have a good and workable relationship as parents, and have Family Court consent orders that accommodate their circumstances and capabilities, and ensure that their children's best interests are served. Sally says that the children more often live with their father than with her, and she feels that this is best for them. Carl has, over the years, experienced problems with his mental health, misuse of alcohol, anger and self harming. He has been employed in unskilled jobs briefly, from time to time.

From early in the relationship, Sally recalls Carl wanting to control when and how often they saw one another. While Sally was pleased to have found companionship in Carl, she also values her privacy and being able to live in her own home. Carl would insist that she travel at night to see him, which she found frightening as she would have to use public transport. When she refused, Carl would become angry and repeatedly call and text her (often tens to hundreds of times in a single day), or arrive at her home unannounced. Carl would press Sally to take and send to him (via smart phone) highly personal photos of herself, which, sometimes, she did, and Carl would then threaten to share the photos publicly with others if Sally didn't comply with his demands.

Carl also appeared jealous of Sally's relationship with her former partner and father of her children, complaining to Sally whenever he was present at her home caring for the children.

Carl's behaviour worsened and became more violent and intimidating to Sally when he was drinking alcohol. There were two occasions a couple of months apart where Carl injured Sally badly around her head, face and chest by pulling her hair and throwing her against walls and cupboards, resulting in her admission to hospital. On the first occasion, a social worker spoke to Sally at the hospital about her options, and the police were alerted. At that stage, Sally was not prepared to apply for a protection order as she felt she could cope with the situation, and she still wanted to make her relationship with Carl work. On the second occasion, as well as severely bashing Sally, Carl stole money from her purse, and demanded that she participate in sexual acts, which she refused. Sally telephoned the police who, on the strength of her complaint and her injuries as evidenced by the hospital records, initiated a protection order application on her behalf.

A temporary order was granted by the court, however Carl made service difficult and contested the order, resulting in Sally having to obtain Legal Aid assistance and return to the court on three occasions before a final order was granted requiring Carl to be of good behaviour towards Sally for a period of six months. Carl was at all times unrepresented. Sally's lawyer had initially tried to pressure her into an exchange of mutual undertakings with Carl where they would both agree not to be violent towards the other, however Sally was not satisfied with this option, and the final order (as granted) was offered by way of compromise. Sally felt that six months wasn't long enough, and that she needed protection for two years. She was however happy with the "good behaviour" condition as she still wanted ongoing contact with Carl.

Following the protection order, Carl did at times, though less often, text and ring Sally repeatedly, however he no longer made physical contact. Sally changed her phone number more than once, but would forget and would call or text Carl using her new number resulting in Carl learning of her new contact details. While the protection order has expired, Sally feels very safe and settled now, having received financial help from Victim Assist to change the locks on her home and attend regular counselling. She no longer has any contact with Carl.

Through this process, Sally has had a positive experience with police and support services; however she feels that the Legal Aid lawyer could have better represented her needs. Sally is often confused about the nature, effect and origin of the various orders that have affected, or continue to affect, her and her children, and she will need ongoing support to ensure that she understands and her interests are protected.

Victim experiences - Sandra

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Animal abuse] [Breach of protection order] [Children] [Coercive control] [Emotional abuse] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Myths and misunderstandings] [People affected by substance misuse] [People with children] [People with disability and impairment] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sexual abuse] [Systems abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Sandra and Gary lived in a defacto relationship for some six years, though not continuously due to Gary's violence towards Sandra. They have two children together, both boys, aged approximately three and one on separation; the younger boy has a serious genetic disability with limited life expectancy. Sandra had previously been in an abusive relationship, and suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of a physical assault by a stranger. She completed secondary education and is employed in a sales position. Gary is on a disability support pension, earns little or no additional income, and has an alcohol and drug dependency. Gary has had protection orders made against him in two different states as a result of his perpetration of domestic and family violence in two separate prior relationships.

Gary's violence towards Sandra began around six months into their relationship. He would strike out at her physically, splitting her lip; emotionally abuse her, diminishing her self-esteem; and be forceful in his sexual demands, which Sandra would strongly resist rather than acquiesce to. Sandra has a horse she has cared for and been emotionally attached to for many years. Gary would threaten to shoot the horse, or slit the horse's throat; he also threatened to kill Sandra's parents. The violence continued after their first child was born when, for example, Gary karate kicked Sandra in the leg while she was holding the young child. Both Sandra and the child were hospitalised, and Child Safety formally intervened and arranged for their temporary safe accommodation. Sandra has not ever fully recovered from her leg injury, which requires expensive surgery.

Sandra confided in close friends about the violence she was experiencing and her concerns about bringing up children in that environment. Whilst she was alert to their advice to leave the relationship, she also believed that doing so was likely to escalate Gary's violence. Sandra sought counselling during the relationship, intentionally without Gary's knowledge, to develop strategies to cope with the violence. Sandra had attempted on numerous occasions over the years to leave the relationship and relocate to areas a considerable distance away from Gary to ensure her own and her children's safety. On the birth of the second child, Sandra and the first child moved into a refuge while the newborn was being treated in intensive care at a nearby hospital for his disability related problems and before relocating the three of them to another city. On each occasion, Gary would track down Sandra and the children and seek to re-enter their lives. Focused on acting in the best interests of the children, Sandra would allow Gary to return provided he could be a responsible father towards the boys, not get into trouble with alcohol or drugs, not be violent, and not attempt an intimate relationship with Sandra.

However Gary's violence and dysfunctional behaviour continued. Sandra reported the violence to police in a range of locations, and obtained protection orders either on her own behalf or police-initiated. Following instances of attempted strangulation, stalking and telephone harassment Gary was convicted of breaches of these protection orders, resulting in brief periods of incarceration in the local watch house and suspended sentences. Gary was never charged with criminal assault or stalking.

When Sandra and the children finally left, she obtained a temporary protection order against Gary stipulating email contact only between them, as well as Family Court parenting orders stipulating that Sandra have residence of the children and Gary have contact with the first child every second weekend, and the second child for 8 hours of every second weekend. Gary paid Sandra negligible child support; Sandra was supporting the children almost entirely from her own resources. Sandra had been concerned about Gary's veiled threats not to return the older child to her, when this in fact transpired and the child remained with Gary for 28 days without attending school for eight of those days. Sandra qualified for Legal Aid and, after some delay, succeeded in child recovery proceedings against Gary. Whilst Sandra believed that Child Safety was diligent in its conduct of their part of the proceedings, she expressed frustration that police did not intervene immediately due to a belief that they have no powers in Family Court matters.

Subsequently, Gary sought a variation of the Family Court parenting orders to alter changeover from a supervised contact centre to parent-managed arrangements. In time, Sandra agreed, hoping that this would help the children feel more normal and relaxed about moving between parents; she also acknowledged that the contact centre was expensive and involved lengthy car trips, which weren't good for the children. During these negotiations, Gary succeeded in securing repeated adjournments of the final protection order hearing on the basis that the Family Court orders ought be finalised first. Once finalised, on an occasion when she felt too intimidated by Gary to be present for the changeover, Sandra asked a male friend to be there on her behalf; he was intoxicated and an altercation ensued with Gary and his new partner. Soon after, the final protection order hearing took place, and while Sandra obtained a two-year order against Gary, with the children named as protected parties, Gary applied for and obtained an identical order (commonly referred to as a cross order or mirror order) against Sandra.

Sandra reported that on the many occasions she'd had contact with police, she experienced understanding and supportive officers who were focused on ensuring that she and her children remained safe. There was only one occasion she recalled when an officer doubted the veracity of her account that Gary had arrived angry and intoxicated at her home at midnight while she and the children were asleep then escaped without trace; and queried why she hadn't taken photographs of Gary trying to enter the house. Sandra also believed that her experiences of the legal and court processes were generally positive, and despite not having perpetrated violence against Gary, she felt safer overall for having the final protection order, and confident that she would never be in breach of the order against her.

Victim experiences - Sara

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Breach] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Engaging interpreters and translators] [Exposing children] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Parenting orders] [People from CALD backgrounds] [People with children] [People with poor literacy skills] [Protection orders] [Women]

Sara and Victor were born and married overseas, and had a child together before coming to Australia, initially on refugee visas. It was a 12-year relationship that ended around a year after their resettlement, when their child was in primary school, and they'd been granted permanent residency. Sara worked as a qualified professional overseas and plans to study in Australia to have her qualifications recognised here. However, she must first study to improve her English proficiency as she currently needs an interpreter for other than basic communications. Sara believes that Victor was not educated beyond primary school. Neither has worked in Australia, however both have commenced studies.

Before their move to Australia, Sara was supporting the family financially and running the household while Victor refused to contribute his welfare benefits (received while in their country of origin). Victor became suspicious and jealous of Sara and the child's interactions with Sara's work colleagues and friends. Sara felt that Victor would improve once they came to Australia, however the situation worsened. When Sara was at home, Victor would lock the house and watch her from the outside; and when she went out, he would follow her. When Victor began hurting their child with household objects, Sara feared for his and her own safety, and took steps to end the relationship. Victor would send members of the local cultural community to which the family belonged around to their house. They would tell her that Victor felt sad and rejected, which she found very distressing given Victor's behaviour towards her and the child.

After a couple of attempts, Sara and the child left the house, and, with the help of local support services, they relocated and Sara was given advice about her legal options. She obtained the necessary forms from police.

The police were not willing to assist Sara to obtain a protection order and she was not successful in obtaining legal aid. Despite this, with the assistance of a local non-legal support agency she represented herself and successfully applied to the Magistrates' Court for a protection order against Victor with the child named as a protected party (after a series of adjournments over three months). Victor has not attempted to follow or make any contact with Sara since, and she has been careful to ensure that her address is not disclosed to anyone who may be in contact with Victor. Sara received Legal Aid and interpreter assistance to apply to the Family Court for child residence and contact orders, which she obtained following a mediation process. Victor is only allowed restricted weekly telephone contact with their child, however he does this less and less often.

Sara struggles financially as she is unable to work until she completes her studies, and a significant portion of her welfare benefits is spent on private rent as she is currently not able to access public housing. She reports however that Centrelink and the local support services have been very helpful. While, importantly, Sara feels that she and the child are safe, she also feels very isolated and somewhat concerned about the conduct of some members of the local cultural community who she believes continue to convey misleading messages to Victor on her behalf without her consent.

Victim experiences - Susan

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Children] [Coercive control] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children to domestic and family violence] [Family law proceedings] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Legal representation and self-represented litigants] [Parenting orders and impact on children] [People with children] [People with mental illness] [Physical violence and harm] [Pregnant women] [Protection orders - breach] [Protection orders - management of application proceedings] [Protection orders - undertakings] [Risk] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Susan and Neil were in a relationship for three years and had a child born in the year they separated. Susan is university educated, professionally qualified and has always been in well-remunerated employment apart from during leave following the birth of the child. Neil did not complete high school, however trained in a trade and earns a modest salary. Neil has a history of intermittent drug and alcohol misuse, and when younger attempted suicide on a couple of occasions during periods of depression. After separation, Susan consulted a psychiatrist to deal with the anxiety she experienced as a result of the abusive relationship, and took medication for a time until she felt it was affecting her capacity to function properly; she was also concerned that she may be prejudiced in the Family Court if her Medicare records revealed that she was taking a medication that was indicated for bipolar disorder (but prescribed to Susan for anxiety).

Susan and Neil casually dated for a brief time some years before living together when Neil was going through a difficult divorce. Neil became resentful and obsessive about Susan dating other men after the brief relationship ended. They eventually got back together and Neil quickly moved in with Susan at a property she owned. While the first six months of their relationship were happy and without incident, in the remaining two and a half years tension and conflict grew between Susan and Neil, there were periods of separation and reconciliation, and Neil's behaviour became abusive. Susan's income was considerably higher than Neil's and, while she did not highlight the point and was happy to make a greater contribution to joint expenses, Neil would accuse Susan of belittling and humiliating him for his limited earning capacity. Increasingly he became frustrated and angry, and would lash out at Susan. Neil is more than a foot taller than Susan; and is athletic and strong. On one occasion, when loading a large and heavy metal crate in the car, he threw it so as to hit Susan who was standing nearby. She was knocked off her feet, her thick-lens glasses cracked and the impact caused a black eye and bruised lip. On another occasion, Neil grabbed Susan around the neck and held her down on the bed.

When Susan became pregnant, she found intercourse painful and preferred to avoid it. Neil began seeking sexual satisfaction elsewhere. While Neil was away visiting his parents, Susan discovered videos of Neil's sexual encounters with multiple other women (as well as herself) on his computer. When Susan confronted Neil on the phone, he was enraged that she'd invaded his privacy. Susan then discovered that Neil was having an affair with one of these women. Neil returned to try to salvage the relationship and Susan allowed him back as she didn't want to raise the child alone. Soon after, Susan discovered on Neil's phone that he was contacting a former girlfriend on Facebook. Susan left Neil a week before the baby was born and went to stay with her parents; however they told her she must return and try and make the relationship work. Neil made her apologise and taunted her about having no interest in her welfare.

For three months following the birth, Neil's behaviour settled down and they both focussed on adjusting to being new parents though Neil had little to do with the day-to-day care of the infant. Neil came up with a business idea that involved selling internet-based camera systems to away-from-home workers. Susan funded the establishment costs as Neil didn't have the resources himself, however the enterprise did not succeed and ended in financial loss. Neil set up a remotely-controlled camera system in the home, and monitored Susan's movements in every room, including when she was showering and breastfeeding. She repeatedly asked him to disable the system, and at one stage feared it had been hacked. She recalls one occasion, as she walked out of the bathroom, the camera moved to follow her.

Six months after the birth of their child, Neil told Susan that he would marry her only if she agreed to go to a swingers club with him; she refused and told him the relationship was over. Susan left and returned to her parent's house for a couple of days when Neil's parents became involved. Eventually he told Susan that he 'could live with it' if she did not wish to go to a swingers club and the relationship continued for one more month.

Neil was known for his outbursts of road rage. He would throw heavy objects out of his van while driving, with reckless disregard for the consequences. He was required to attend a police interview about an incident where he allegedly smashed another car with a crow bar. When Susan told his parents, again he was enraged that she breached his privacy. This came shortly after yet another fight about Neil's infidelity; it was the tipping point for Susan and she decided to leave Neil for good. Their child was seven months old at the time.

Susan went home with the intention of retrieving some of her personal possessions. Neil should have been at work but she found him in the backyard shed drinking and playing computer games. Susan packed a bag and gathered her personal documents and, with the baby, went to stay with her parents. Susan never returned to Neil. He stayed on in the property for a time and changed all the locks even though the property belonged to Susan's family and he had not sought permission to do so.

Susan engaged a lawyer immediately and put in place contact arrangements. The child lived with Susan, and Neil had contact for certain hours three times each week under Susan's supervision. Neil would at times run away with the child in the pram, which made Susan feel anxious and concerned about the child's safety. Susan was also keen to get the joint financial matters settled with Neil. She had contributed significantly by way of income, property and parenting, and proposed a cash payment that she felt reflected Neil's contribution. Neil, acting for himself, approached her one day (when Susan attended the home they had shared to supervise contact) and made an irrational counter offer seeking far in excess of his share. He also demanded that she sell all her properties, leave her job and live with him at a place of his choosing. Susan described Neil's behaviour as menacing and intimidating, and she was concerned about what he may do next. In the following days, Neil badgered Susan repeatedly by text about his proposal. When Susan rejected his offer, Neil verbally and offensively abused her and threatened blackmail with sex videos. She told him she would go to the police if he continued; he took no notice, and his texts became more threatening. In time, Neil accepted the cash sum originally offered by Susan.

Susan kept copies of all of Neil's texts and applied for a protection order against Neil. She was granted a temporary order; however the magistrate refused to name the child on the order. The police delayed in serving the order on Neil and, as a result, Susan was unable to have him charged with an almost immediate breach. This was the first of numerous encounters with police over an extended period where Susan felt her circumstances were not taken seriously nor responded to appropriately. Once served, Neil made a cross application and obtained a reciprocal temporary order against Susan. The final order hearing was conducted over two days; Susan was represented by a solicitor and barrister, Neil was self represented. Susan found the experience of being cross-examined by Neil harrowing and upsetting, and she became quite emotional in the process. She accepts that the magistrate had a duty to ensure Neil was given full opportunity to put his case. While Neil's application was dismissed and a final order granted in Susan's favour, it took some months for the magistrate to hand down the judgment; the matter had apparently been overlooked. Susan was not awarded costs even though the magistrate recognised that Neil's application had no substance and was a case of 'tit-for-tat'. The delay resulted in interim Family Court parenting orders being made before the final protection order issued. Contact was ordered to continue three times each week as previously, however Susan would be required to come into contact with Neil at handovers contrary to the conditions of the protection order.

Following the hearing, Neil actively and regularly flouted the protection order. A neighbour witnessed Neil entering the property which he had once lived in with Susan and where she still had many belongings stored. He was subsequently charged with breaching her Temporary Protection Order. Neil would leave notes and photos for her in the child's bag after contact visits; they were principally designed to rattle Susan, occasionally under the false guise of concern for the child's welfare. On one occasion, Susan made an audio recording of Neil urging her to read a letter he'd written her while acknowledging that he wasn't legally able to. When she refused, he told her things would end badly. On another occasion, Neil left his go-pro camera in the child's bag with footage of him telling the child that Susan had tried to kill Neil. Susan made multiple breach complaints to the police notifying them that she was fearful Neil would kill her; however she was ignored.

A significant breach of the protection order occurred at handover one evening. Handover took place at a public venue frequented by families and most of what ensued was captured on CCTV footage and Neil's own go-pro footage. Neil alleged that Susan's car wasn't safe to drive and refused to hand over the child, slapping Susan's hands away as she reached out for the child. Susan called the police for assistance; they suggested she sign a one-off waiver of the protection order to allow Neil to drive the child to her home, and took the matter no further. Susan was unable to get legal advice at that hour of night, so remained in the car park unable to reverse and leave as Neil was standing behind her car. Neil then sat on the bonnet of the car while Susan was locked inside breastfeeding the child; he filmed her, called out insults and accused her of being unsafe with the child. Susan rang a family member and arranged for them to collect the child; she then tried a different police station. The police arrived, however refused to take a statement claiming it was a Family Court matter. Later, when police viewed the CCTV footage, they said Neil had simply deflected not assaulted her, and his actions didn't constitute a breach of the order. Susan felt aggrieved by the police treatment of her, and with the assistance of a domestic violence support service, lodged a formal complaint, which was never addressed.

In preparation for a further interim hearing in the Family Court, a family report was prepared. Susan had obtained the CCTV footage of the incidents already described and past medical records evidencing Neil's mental instability and suicide attempts. Recommendations were made regarding contact in Susan's favour. On the day prior to the hearing, handover occurred. Neil had read the report. He approached Susan and told her he would get her. Susan went immediately to the police station to make a breach complaint. They took a statement after initially resisting, but said her claims were unsubstantiated as she had no recording of the interaction. Susan's lawyer, on the other hand, had cautioned her against using recording devices as the Family Court did not regard the practice favourably. Susan tried to submit this fresh evidence at the hearing, however it was not accepted by the Court and the matter was adjourned for some months. Neil continued to refuse any order which excused Susan from being present at handover stating he did not have the financial means to pay for an independent third party.

Susan (with representation) applied for a variation of the protection order to secure better protection at handover. Neil, for the first time, was represented. Susan's barrister was concerned that if the matter proceeded to a hearing, Susan may say something in cross-examination that may prejudice the parenting proceedings. Consequently, Susan accepted an undertaking from Neil that he wouldn't communicate with her during handover or otherwise except in an emergency. Susan agreed to communicate in writing with Neil via a website specifically designed for separated parents. Neil continues to send abusive text messages and emails to Susan. At another handover occasion, he opened the car door while Susan was driving out of the carpark; she had to stop suddenly while he retrieved a piece of paper from the child's bag. Again, she reported the incident to the police and requested fingerprinting; they wouldn't take a statement and told her to come back later, they also told her that fingerprinting would be of no value.

Susan travelled overseas with her son (with Neil's consent and the Family Court's knowledge) to visit her sister. Knowing Susan was overseas with the child and unable to attend the mention, Neil made an application for the protection order to be dismissed. He later withdrew the application.

Further interim parenting orders issued allowing a transition to overnight contact for one night during the week, and daytime contact on the weekend. Susan made an urgent application to the Family Court for further changes after another incident where Neil, with a female friend, approached Susan in a supermarket and told her he was 'gonna get her' while she was holding their child. Neil's contact time changed to three nights every second weekend, with collection and drop-off at day care. At considerable relief to Susan, handover involving contact with Neil was no longer necessary.

The final Family Court hearing is pending. Susan is assisting her lawyer in gathering records to evidence Neil's parenting deficits and mental ill health. Susan is seeking sole parental responsibility and would be prepared to accept 4-5 nights contact each fortnight. Susan is concerned that Neil not having representation will adversely affect the outcome; however her lawyer is confident that his motives and behaviours will be exposed in cross-examination.

Susan estimates having spent more than $200,000 on legal costs; she has had to sell one of her properties to finance the litigation, and will need to mortgage her other property to fund the final Family Court proceedings. Susan believes that it has been very important for her to be legally advised and represented throughout, though she attends mention dates in the Magistrates Court personally to avoid additional costs. Susan and the child continue to live with her parents for protection and to recover financially. Susan has re-partnered but continues to be fearful of Neil and believes he is capable of killing her. She dreads having to reapply for a protection order on the expiration of the current order given the lack of support she has received from the police. Susan believes the police have failed in their duty to respond to Neil's multiple breaches, despite Susan's concerted and consistent efforts to provide comprehensive statements and supporting evidence where possible. Neil's abusive behaviour and Susan's need for protection continue three years after separation.

Victim experiences - Trisha

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Family law parenting order] [Following, harassing and monitoring] [Interpreters] [Legal representation] [People from CALD backgrounds] [People with children] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Social abuse] [Women]

Trisha was born overseas and English is not her first language. Initially, Trisha required an interpreter for other than basic conversational English, however over time her skills and understanding have improved somewhat. Trisha and Jarrod met over the internet, made contact with each other a number of times overseas, and subsequently married in Australia. Trisha came to Australia on a prospective marriage visa and, when married, was issued a temporary spousal visa. Trisha completed high school and was previously in unskilled employment. Jarrod was born in Australia and completed a trade following high school. Jarrod has two children from a previous marriage: an adult who lives independently, and a younger teenager who came to live with Trisha and Jarrod, together with Jarrod's mother. Trisha and Jarrod have a young child who was aged two at the time the four-year relationship broke down.

Jarrod was in employment and told Trisha that he was happy to support her while she studied English and looked after the household. Trisha noticed early in the relationship that Jarrod's behaviour was secretive and suspicious. He told her not to disclose their living circumstances to Centrelink, and often asked Trisha what her plans were. He also helped her apply for permanent residency, but insisted when completing the forms that they not fully disclose their financial position. Jarrod held a joint bank account with his mother and household and living expenses were also incurred jointly. Trisha was excluded from these arrangements and felt unable to open Jarrod's mail because it was also addressed to his mother. Over time, this became more concerning to Trisha and caused arguments between the couple.

Jarrod became increasingly abusive towards Trisha through the relationship, yelling and swearing at her, refusing to give her money, not allowing her to make phone calls, demanding that he know her whereabouts.

Jarrod's children and mother made Trisha feel unwelcome in the family. Trisha recalls reading a text from the teenaged child on Jarrod's phone making insulting personal comments about Trisha and her culture. On discovering that Trisha was pregnant the teenaged child became angry towards Trisha, damaged her personal belongings, burned her clothes and pushed her down the stairs. Jarrod and Trisha lived in the car for five days, all the while Jarrod repeatedly urging her to go back to her home country because he couldn't manage the teenager's reactions. Trisha agreed to go, but felt resentful, questioning why she was being made to leave.

Trisha returned to Australia after six weeks in her home country. Jarrod told her he was lonely, so she resumed living with the family and the child was born. Jarrod's abuse continued. Having not allowed Trisha a phone, Jarrod was aware that Trisha's laptop was her only means of communicating with her own family. On one occasion, Jarrod grabbed the laptop from Trisha and she ran after him to retrieve it. Jarrod held Trisha's throat hard in one hand and grabbed her shirt with his other hand and pushed her backwards. Trisha fell and hit her head on the floor; she felt dizzy, and when trying to get up from the floor, Jarrod spat on her face and pointed with his finger at her chest calling her a "fucking Asian" and accusing her of coming to Australia to get money from the government.

Trisha decided that she could not live with Jarrod's domestic and family violence any longer. She contacted her friend who called the police for her. Concerned for Trisha's safety, the police told her to go to her friend's house so they could interview her. Trisha was extremely distressed; she showed the police the broken laptop and marks on her neck, and gave a statement. Trisha can't explain what happened next, but became aware that the police obtained a protection order on her behalf against Jarrod. She has the paper order in her possession, but isn't certain of the conditions as it was not translated in her first language. She believes the duration of the order is two years.

While Trisha was not required to attend court for the protection order hearing, to make arrangements regarding parental care and responsibility for their child, she and Jarrod had to attend phone mediation and then, failing agreement, the court. The Family Court made an order, effective until the child reaches pre-school age, that (among a number of other conditions) the child would reside each week with Trisha for four nights and with Jarrod for three nights. Trisha received legal aid representation and interpreter support for part of this process, however given her limited understanding of English and the legal system, Trisha feels that she didn't have enough time to consider the family report, and was pressured into consenting to the orders without being satisfied they were in the child's best interests and not knowing what her rights would be as the child gets older.

Trisha believes the protection order has been important in reducing her fear of Jarrod, and her concerns about him harming the child. She says however that Jarrod does not respect her as a mother; and she continues to worry about the child being in the presence of Jarrod's children both of whom are drug users and have police records. She also believes that Jarrod does not share her expectations for high standards of education for the child, and is worried about having to return to the court before the child reaches pre-school age to make fresh arrangements for the child's care and responsibility. Trisha and Jarrod have been unable to reach a property settlement; Jarrod asserts without grounds that Trisha should pay off all his debts. Trisha receives a Centrelink single-parent benefit, which she is doing her best to spend carefully so she can save for the child's future. She is concerned however that, despite her phoning Centrelink to advise of the care arrangements (as set out in the Family Court order), she is receiving too much money and may be forced to repay. At times, Trisha has felt so overwhelmed by these anxieties that she has had suicidal thoughts. Counselling offered through a local domestic and family violence service has helped and supported her through these very difficult times.

Trisha is now a permanent resident; she has a driver's licence, and has purchased a car with her modest savings. Her English has improved considerably, and she has commenced studies so that in time she can secure stable and rewarding employment. While Jarrod is no longer a direct physical threat to Trisha and contact changeovers occur without problems, he continues to send her abusive texts, and his mother and children stalk her periodically.

Victim experiences - Yvonne

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

The key words align with the contents covered in the National Domestic and Family Violence Bench Book.

Key words: [Coercive control] [Cultural and spiritual abuse] [Damaging property] [Economic abuse] [Emotional and psychological abuse] [Exposing children] [Legal representation] [Myths] [Parenting orders] [People from CALD backgrounds] [Physical violence and harm] [Protection orders] [Risk] [Sexual and reproductive abuse] [Social abuse] [Victim experiences of court processes] [Women]

Yvonne and Emir were in a relationship for around 13 years, and had four children together. Emir was born overseas; he did not complete high school, he is multi-lingual, English being a language acquired later in life, and he has periodically run small businesses. Yvonne was born in Australia, is university educated and runs her own business. They met in Emir's home country when Yvonne was in the early years of her professional training. Within a year, they married and had their first child, and decided to resettle in Australia, Emir on a spousal visa. The children now live with Yvonne and her new partner in a home they own. The youngest child has contact with Emir pursuant to Family Court orders. The three older children have declined any contact.

When Yvonne first knew Emir he was gentle and quiet, but also strongly committed to his faith and spiritual beliefs. He followed a rigorous daily worship practice, and over the years required that the children strictly comply. In the early years Yvonne found Emir's faith and dedication captivating, and was happy to participate even though she never felt like she really belonged. When they moved to Australia, Emir was drawn to a philosophy that aligned with his beliefs, and began attending places of worship. Soon he became very involved in his new-found faith community, following their ascetic lifestyle regimes, and volunteering. Meanwhile, Yvonne had three more children over six years; and worked full-time when she wasn't caring for young children. Emir was opposed to contraception as he believed it was unnatural, and he refused to have a vasectomy as he felt it would diminish his masculinity. Rather ironically, it was the women from the faith community who urged Yvonne to consider contraception; she did so and never disclosed to Emir because she knew he would vehemently object.

Yvonne describes feeling a great deal of tension around multiple issues that Emir had strong views about and that Yvonne was unable to discuss with him without heightening the risk of conflict and his expression of hatred towards her. Emir exercised a high level of control over the daily lives of Yvonne and the children. The children were made to do hours of prayers in the mornings and evenings, which made them late for school and behind with their homework. Emir would dictate how prayers should be performed, and then often change the rules without explanation. If the children did it incorrectly, Emir would hit them across the face, or swing them around on one arm. While Yvonne experienced some physical violence, she says the children were frequent victims and subjected to the constant threat of more severe harm.

When Yvonne was heavily pregnant with their second child, Emir had insisted that she attend worship with him. They had to travel by train; Yvonne was tired and asked him whether it was necessary for her go. Emir became angry and pushed her towards the train line. Yvonne was terrified and walked kilometres to a family member's house and stayed overnight. On another occasion, soon after Yvonne was home following the birth of their youngest child, a friend called to offer to look after the other children to give Yvonne and Emir a break. Emir declined, and Yvonne questioned him. He slapped her across the face twice while she was holding the baby, and told her never to question his authority especially in front of the children.

Increasingly, she felt unable to communicate with Emir about any difficult issue, so she shut down completely. Yvonne became even more isolated as a result of Emir excluding Yvonne's family from the home as they didn't adhere to the rules of his faith. Emir did not allow the children to attend an important family wedding despite Yvonne being a bridesmaid. Yvonne says she felt constantly strained and under pressure; she didn't have any friends other than a small number in the faith community, nor did she believe she should.

Yvonne and Emir had separate bank accounts, but shared resources, although Emir would accumulate cash amounts from Centrelink payments or odd jobs and hide them from Yvonne. Finances were always tight for the family; Emir reprimanded Yvonne for even modest spending despite the fact that he earned little or no money and Yvonne was the consistent wage earner. Yet, Emir insisted on family trips overseas which were related to faith, these were expensive and required many months of saving to afford. Yvonne found these trips distressing with young children, and especially when pregnant, as the living standards were poor and public spaces generally unsafe. An incident that was particularly disturbing to Yvonne and the children occurred while they were on one of these trips. Emir believed that his younger relative had infringed a sacred ritual, and punished the child by burning an imprint deep in his hand. Family looked on, horrified. Since then, when Emir believed his own children to be disobedient, he would threaten similar punishment. The level of fear experienced by Yvonne and the children grew in increments over time; eventually Yvonne believed she would be killed. Her sister had expressed the feeling to her that she would arrive one day and they would all be dead.

Yvonne had tried to leave the relationship twice before final separation when she arranged for a family member to call a friend in the faith community and pass on a message to Emir that she and the children were leaving. Shelter accommodation was organised through a local domestic violence support service. From there, Yvonne worked with a lawyer to obtain a protection order and with a psychologist to try to identify and understand her experiences over the past many years. Yvonne received critical support from the shelter and these professionals. On the first mention date, Emir appeared with his lawyer and supporters from the faith community. He denied any domestic violence but consented to a two-year protection order without admissions. Yvonne's lawyer guided her through the process and ensured that she felt safe in the court and protected from any direct approaches from Emir or his lawyer. Yvonne felt the order was important to have because she was fearful of how Emir would react to her taking the children away.

Again, with the assistance of her lawyer, Yvonne participated in mediation with Emir over the telephone in an effort to make arrangements for the children. This process failed as Emir denied all of the circumstances surrounding the breakdown of the relationship. Ultimately, Yvonne made an application to the Family Court. A separate representative was appointed for the children, and a psychologist was consulted to ascertain the children's wishes. The three older children, who were then aged in their early to mid-teens, made it clear that they did not want to see their father. Orders were made by the court granting Yvonne residence; and Emir, contact only with the youngest child once a fortnight at a supervised contact centre, gradually moving to overnight contact. Yvonne was required to email Emir to keep him generally updated about the children, and to facilitate email contact between the children and him. There was to be no phone contact. Yvonne believes that the psychologist could identify serious risks in Emir's behaviour, particularly towards the children, justifying a highly protective approach to contact conditions.

Three years elapsed between separation and the Family Court orders. After the shelter, Yvonne and the children stayed in various forms of accommodation, and sought the help of multiple services for financial, legal and emotional support. Once the orders were settled, Yvonne and the children moved further away, necessitating a change in handover arrangements for the youngest child who, by that stage, was having overnight contact with Emir. On one occasion, Emir's relative contacted Yvonne telling her that Emir and the youngest child had been crying together for hours. Yvonne knew this was out of character for the youngest child and became very concerned when the handover time passed at the agreed location. Emir returned the child late to a different location very close to their new home resulting in one of the children becoming extremely anxious about what Emir might do and needing significant counselling help in the aftermath. Yvonne observes how profoundly affected the three older children are by Emir's prolonged abuse.

Yvonne is seeking further assistance from her lawyer to have the original contact orders reinstated as she believes the overnight contact is potentially detrimental to the youngest child. Meanwhile, the child is not having contact with Emir. Yvonne believes they have a good relationship, and Emir considers the child to be his favourite.

Property matters remain unresolved. The couple have land and money in Emir's home country, but Yvonne has insufficient resources to take the necessary legal steps to facilitate a settlement of joint assets. She has received legal aid funding for past applications, but no longer qualifies, and has limited capacity to personally fund further actions. Yvonne is in a new relationship now, which she feels is going well, however she is cautious and on alert for any signs of the abuse she was subjected to for many years. She and her partner are building a business together, and caring for Yvonne's four children. Yvonne feels she and the children are through the worst of their ordeal, though she believes there is always a risk that Emir will snap.

Acknowledgements

Project Leader	Senior Writer & Researcher	Website Designer
Professor Heather Douglas Melbourne Law School The University of Melbourne	Kate Chapple 2015-17, 2019 Hannah Ehler 2020-23	Stephen Meadowcroft 2015-19, 2021-23 Dean Wilson 2020

Funding Partners
The Attorney-General's Department, (Commonwealth) co-funds this Bench Book with states and territories.	Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration, in particular Professor Greg Reinhardt and Alison MacDonald

Research Assistants (2015–2023)
Hannah Anderson	Isabelle Keen	Emily Rudz
Lyndal Bubke	Sarah Kendall	Louise Scarce
Marissa Carroll	Deylan Kilic-Aidani	Dr Gabrielle Simm
Samara Cassar	Rebekkah Markey-Towler	Madeleine Skeen
Jessica Downing-Ide	Ciara Lavender	India Taylor
Emma Fell	Elissa Morcombe	Kate Thomas
Renita Fernadez	Jennifer Ngo	Daniel Trigger
Freya Hallahan	Manasa Pappu	Juliet Walker
Sophie Hondros	Sophie Philip	Gareth Ward
Balawyn Jones	Imogen Reithmuller	Jasmine Zamprogno

Advisory Committee (2015–2017)

- Assistant Commissioner Lammers, Australian Federal Police, ACT.
- Victor Martin and Megan Sparke, ACT Justice and Community Safety Directorate
- Station Sergeant Joanne Cameron, ACT Police
- Caroline Poulton, Legal Policy Officer to Victims of Crime Commissioner, ACT
- Meredith Day Deputy Chief Executive Officer Department of the Attorney-General and Justice, Northern Territory
- Dr Rae Kaspiew, Dr Rachel Carson and Kelly Hand Australian Institute of Family Studies.
- Dr Heather Nancarrow and Dr Mayet Costello, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS)
- Yasmin Gunn - Queensland Courts /Queensland Department of Justice and Attorney-General.
- Sgt Sherril Handley, Victoria Police (Prosecutions Division, Legal Services Department)
- Mandy Angus, Victoria Department of Justice and Regulation Attorney Generals Department, Victoria, Senior Legal Policy Officer, Criminal Law Policy Criminal Justice Division
- Detective Sergeant Rebecca Davis, Safe Families Coordination Unit, Tasmania Police
- Susannah O'Reilly, Domestic Violence Specialist Solicitor, Legal Aid NSW
- Matthew Weatherson, Judicial College of Victoria, Victoria
- Nathan Goetz, Department of Justice and Regulation
- Lisa Eldridge, Magistrates' Court of Victoria
- Megan Andison, Magistrates' Court of Victoria
- Jennifer Hoffman, Commissioner for Victims of Crime Western Australia
- Detective Inspector Sue Young Western Australian Police
- Wendy Kayler-Thomson, Chair of Family Law Section of Law Council of Australia

Judicial Reference Group (2015-2019)

- Family Court of Australia: Justice Hilary Hannam
- Federal Circuit Court of Australia: Judge Joe Harman
- Northern Territory: Local Court Chief Judge Elizabeth Morris
- Local Court Judge Sarah McNamara
- NSW: Deputy Chief Magistrate Jane Mottley
- Queensland: Deputy Chief Magistrate Leanne O'Shea
- South Australia: Magistrate Jay McGrath, Magistrate Lynette Duncan
- Tasmania: Magistrate Simon Brown
- Victoria: Ms Cathy Lamble, Former Magistrate of Victoria, Magistrate Francis Zemljak
- Western Australia: Magistrate Deen Potter

AIJA Advisory Committee for Consultation Project (2021-2022)

AIHA's expertise on the NDFVBB has been informed by the AIJA's Advisory Committee for Consultation Project (2021-2022), which included:

- Justice Murray Aldridge, Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, Division 1
- Justice Judy Ryan, Family Court of Australia (ret.)
- Justice Helen Wood, Supreme Court of Tasmania
- Magistrate Pauline Spencer, Magistrates Court of Victoria

Thanks also to all judicial officer and stakeholder confidential contributors to the research informing the NDFVBB coercive control report.

The development of materials benefits from the ongoing input of a wide range of people, as necessary. Particular thanks to date to:

- Australian Institute of Family Studies (AIFS)
- Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS)
- Associate Professor Lee Aitken, formerly The University of Queensland
- Matilda Alexander
- Lara Anstie, Clairs Keeley, Perth
- Kerryne Barwick
- Susan Beattie, Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Unit, Qld Dept of Justice and Attorney-General
- Laura Berta, Dept of Attorney-General and Justice, NT
- Lauren Boyer, Administrative Appeals Tribunal of Australia
- Associate Professor Bridget Harris, Monash University
- Sarah Holloway
- Louise Hunter, Lander & Rogers, Melbourne
- Judge Eugene Hyman, Former judge Superior Court of Santa Clara County
- Immigrant Women's Support Service
- Rhona James-French
- His Honour Marshall Irwin, Former Judge of the District Court of Queensland.
- Sue Lloyd
- Yasmin Kennedy
- Andrix Lim, formerly Judicial College of Victoria
- Angela Lynch, AM, Former
- Dr Leonie Tanzcer, University College London
- Jane Reynolds, Family Court of Australia & Federal Circuit Court of Australia
- Anne Marie Rice
- Greta Robenstone, University of Melbourne
- Nicola Ross
- Margie Rowe, Family Violence Team Leader, Legal Aid ACT
- Associate Professor Michael Salter, University of New South Wales
- Magistrate Colin Strofield, formerly at the Specialist Domestic and Family Violence Court, Southport, Qld
- Associate Professor Leonie Tanczer, UCL

- Dr Jacoba Brasch QC
- Deputy Magistrate Felicity Broughton (Magistrates Court Victoria)
- The Honourable Diana Bryant AO QC, Former Chief Justice of the Family Court of Australia
- Anna Butler
- Deborah Byrne, Brain Injury Association of Tasmania
- Grazia Catalano
- Caxton Legal Service
- David Ceccon
- Margaret Chandler
- Catherine Clemow, SA Magistrates Court Associate
- Jordan Cotter, Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Unit, Qld Dept of Justice and Attorney-General
- Associate Professor Molly Dragiewicz, Griffith University
- Jessica Evans, Special Advisor, WA Attorney-General
- Federal Circuit Court of Australia
- Dr Caitlin Goss, The University of Queensland
- Professor David Hamer, University of Sydney
- President and CEO, Womens' Legal Service Queensland
- Maryanne May
- The Honourable Michelle May AM, Former Judge of the Family Court of Australia
- Kathryn McMillan QC
- Dana McMullen, Legal Aid New South Wales
- Principal Registrar David Monaghan, Family Court of Western Australia
- Paul Monsour
- Kate Morrison, former Associate to The Honourable Justice Peter Murphy
- Dr Heather Nancarrow, former CEO Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS).
- Dr Linda Neilson
- James O'Hara, Former Associate to Justice S. Hall, Supreme Court WA
- Lisa O'Neill
- Queensland Accessing Interpreters Working Group
- Zoe Rathus AM Griffith University
- Chloe Rattray, Lander & Rogers, Melbourne
- Associate Professor Stella Tarrant, University of Western Australia
- Annabel Taylor
- David Tedhams, Senior Research Manager, Judicial College of Victoria
- Former Chief Judge Family Court of Western Australia, Stephen Thackray
- Madeleine Thompson, SA Magistrates Court Associate
- Rodney Vlais
- Megan Ward, Family Violence Judicial Support Officer, Magistrates' Court of Victoria
- Matthew Weatherson, Judicial Information Advisor, Judicial College of Victoria
- Michelle Weaver, Magistrates Court Service, Qld Dept of Justice and Attorney-General
- Yvonne Whittaker-Rush
- Agata Wierzbowski
- Women's Law Centre Western Australia
- Women's Legal Services Australia
- Women's Legal Service (Brisbane)

Victim experiences

Most of the victim experiences were prepared with assistance from an Australian Research Council Future Fellowship [Heather Douglas: FT 140100796]. We thank those who participated for their willingness to share their stories. The remaining victim experiences are based on case studies provided by Caxton Legal Service and Legal Aid (NSW).