[37] Even accepting the Magistrate's findings that the respondent was not likely to be violent towards the appellant in the future, his passive aggressive acts such as going to Paluma the day before she was due to arrive, refusing to hand over furniture, and handing over the wrong keys to his solicitors so when the appellant did attend Paluma, she would be unable to enter the cabin, all amount to controlling and emotionally abusive behaviour that has the potential to be repeated during the course of the property settlement. Contact is inevitable during that period.

[38] In my view the magistrate erred in finding that it was not necessary or desirable to protect the appellant from future domestic violence.

NK v Director-General, Department of Justice and Attorney-General* [2021] QCAT 270 (30 July 2021) – Queensland Civil and Administrative Tribunal

In confirming the decision of the Director-General, Department of Justice and Attorney-General on 28 February 2020 to issue NK a negative working with children notice Member Hughes observed in relation to the applicant's former partner's attempts to seek termination of a protection order made against the applicant:

[18] More alarming is evidence of controlling behaviour since the Order. In seeking to terminate the Order, NK's ex-partner said:

> I feel I contributed to the incidence (sic) occurring due to my treatment of [NK] including acting verbally abusive towards him, I believe I provoked him to become angry with me.
>
> I was pressured by my friends to take on (sic) order out against [NK]. My friends were always unhappy that I didn't have time to socialise with them when I was spending time with [NK].

> I have a really good relationship with [NK's] family; they are very supportive of me. I don't wish to ruin the relationship I have with them by having this order.

[19] I do not accept these statements as proof of their content. Rather, they are evidence of coercive control: victim self-blame and shame, social isolation and in-law pressure. Domestic violence manifests in many forms: physical, psychological, emotional and financial. They are all abhorrent and unacceptable.

Applicant SIL v Scheme Manager, Victim Assist Queensland, Department of Justice and Attorney-General [2021] QCAT 237 (13 July 2021) – Queensland Civil and Administrative Tribunal

Member Cranwell accepted that the applicant's husband had used complaints to the Queensland Police Service as a means to control the applicant:

[41] …In relation to the incidents on 27 March 2018 and 5 April 2018, Person A made complaints to the Queensland Police Service. The applicant submitted that Person A used complaints to the Queensland Police Service as a means of controlling her. I would be inclined to accept this submission, given that the there is no record of the Queensland Police Service ever having conducted an investigation in relation to either incident. The Queensland Police Service simply recorded Person A's version of events without speaking to the applicant.

Warne v The Queen [2020] SASCFC 124 (21 December 2020) – South Australian Supreme Court (Full Court)

Hughes J (Peek and Stanley JJ agreeing) noted a controlling course of conduct:

[51] The course of conduct in February 2017 was sustained and violent. The appellant caused injuries to the victim and also sought to control her with frightening and dangerous behaviour tending to place her in fear for her life and to submit. That was reinforced by the explicit threat made by the appellant to the victim whilst he directed a firearm at her at close range. There has been no expression of remorse or contrition by the appellant, or any indication of insight on his part with respect to his conduct.

[52] The February course of conduct perpetuated and escalated the earlier incidents of control exerted by violence by the appellant over the victim. This Court has recognised the need to place offending such as this within the context of the relationship and the manner by which such incidents effect control through fear. In R v Saunders [[2017] SASCFC 86 at [41]], Hinton J, with whom Peek J agreed, said:

> In R v Hamid [[2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) at [21]], Johnson J, with whom Hunt AJA and Latham J agreed, said after referring to a number of authorities dealing with sentencing in cases of domestic violence: 'These judicial statements are complemented by criminological research concerning domestic violence. An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control': J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House", Issues Paper 9, 2004, pages 6-7.

R v Saunders* [2017] SASCFC 86 (27 July 2017) – South Australia Supreme Court (Full Court)

In commenting on sentencing for domestic violence matters Hinton J observed:

[41] In R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302, at [77]–[78], Johnson J, with whom Hunt AJA and Latham J agreed, said after referring to a number of authorities dealing with sentencing in cases of domestic violence:

> These judicial statements are complemented by criminological research concerning domestic violence. An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House", Issues Paper 9, 2004, pages 6-7.

And:

[43] Intervention orders comprise one component of the Government's response to domestic violence in this State. In concluding his speech on the motion that the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Bill be a read a second time the Attorney-General said:

> In enacting these reforms, Parliament will be sending a clear message that it will not tolerate the use of violence to control or intimidate another person, particularly in a domestic setting; that it recognises and abhors the lasting psychological and emotional damage to children from exposure to such violence; that it expects perpetrators to accept full responsibility for their violent behaviour; and that the paramount consideration is always the protection and future safety of the victims of abuse and the children who are exposed to it.

[44]: It must be borne in mind that the abuse which intervention orders are intended to protect against, can take many forms. Physical violence is but one. Emotional and psychological harm is often debilitating and equally often profoundly so.

R v Ritter [2016] SASCFC 88 (16 August 2016) – South Australia Supreme Court (Full Court)

Parker J (Lovell and Nicholson JJ concurring) described the coercive control which the appellant subjected the victim to:

[17] At the time of the offending the appellant and the victim had been in a relationship for approximately two years. His behaviour towards her was violent and controlling.

[18] About one month into the relationship the appellant began verbally abusing the victim. This progressed to physical abuse occurring about twice each week. By the last year of the relationship the frequency of assaults had escalated to the point where the appellant was assaulting the victim on a daily basis. The assaults included punching, slapping, kicking, throwing items and spitting.

[19] When the victim was threatened or attacked by the appellant she would try to leave their flat, often running into nearby streets and parks and attempting to hide. The appellant would frequently chase her or track her down in order to continue his abuse.

[20] The appellant monitored the victim's movements and rarely let her leave the house without him. He also controlled her finances, regularly forcing her to withdraw money from her account for his benefit, including so that he could buy drugs and alcohol.

[21] The appellant regularly threatened that if the victim reported any abuse to the police or left the relationship he would harm her and her children. She was too frightened to leave or to report the abuse to police, friends and family.

R v Rogers [2020] SADC 72 (16 June 2020) – South Australian District Court

Tracey J noted that abusive and violent relationships give rise to behaviours that are difficult to comprehend and that should not alone be the basis for disbelieving a complainant:

[273] SE's behaviour in contacting police, making statements on some occasions and not others, withdrawing complaints, denying incidents occurred, allowing the accused back into her life and seeking variation to intervention orders, are behaviours that too commonly feature in cases involving serious domestic violence. Abusive and violent relationships give rise to behaviours that to anyone who has not had that experience, may seem simply too odd or counterintuitive to be believed.

R v Hanks [2019] SADC 139 (16 September 2019) – South Australian District Court

In her reasons for judgement Chapman J made a number of observations:

As to the complainant's fear of the accused:

[127] In cross-examination, it was suggested to the complainant the accused did not threaten her with violence in any way if she did not park in that spot. She responded, 'When you're in a domestic violence relationship it gets to the point where they don't need to threaten you. I'm terrified. He controlled absolutely everything that I did, the whole aspect of my life he controlled. I'm not going to argue against him. If he says to me 'Park there', I park there because it's either park there and risk a fine and that later or don't park there and get hit, and to me I take the easy option.'

As to the impact of the complainant's lies on her credibility:

[159] It is a serious matter for the complainant to have told those lies. I have considered the extent to which her admitted lies impact upon her credibility. Whilst I do not condone or excuse that conduct, there is a credible explanation. She was in a violent and controlling relationship with the accused. She was in fear of him. She knew that if he was angry, she was in danger of being harmed. She adopted behaviours which she believed would minimise his anger. They included not informing on him to the police and doing what she was told to do. I accept her explanation. I do not consider her admitted lies detract from her credibility.

As to the complainant's failure to mention specific incidents to police:

[176] The accused controlled her through his violence. She tried to manage her safety by doing as he said and by minimising police involvement. I do not consider the failure of the complainant to mention various matters to the police in her subsequent statements about every aspect of the course of events that day (the accused fighting with Mr Cooper; the accused punching her in the car) detracts from her credibility or reliability.

As to the complainant's decision to seek the withdrawal of charges against the accused:

[203] The fact the complainant changed her mind about pressing charges against the accused and said she was the one to hit the accused does not cause me to doubt her evidence about what happened. This assault is alleged to have occurred against the background of a violent relationship in which the accused controlled and manipulated the complainant. She was scared of him and what he might do to her if she proceeded with charges against him.

Director of Public Prosecution v Johnson [2020] TASCCA 4 (8 April 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

Wood J considered the appellant's behaviour as an attempt to control and manipulate the complainant to avoid prosecution and that the offender was aware of the danger he posed to the complainant:

[4] His moral culpability with respect to the crimes of assault and indeed, all the offences, was high. Before he committed these crimes, he knew he had reacted with violence towards the complainant in the past and he knew that he was prone to jealousy and possessiveness. In short, he knew he represented a danger to the complainant. … Subsequent to the assaults, his conduct of stalking was domineering, relentless and subsisted over days. The court orders protecting the complainant had no impact on his conduct. He then interfered with the prosecution in a way that was calculated to succeed by sending messages and letters while he was in prison. He was determined to control and manipulate the complainant to avoid prosecution.

Geason J considered Brett J's sentencing comments as to the appellant's attempts to control the victim and his own father with approval:

[29] …During that time, you constantly attempted to contact the complainant by telephoning her, and sending her text messages on numerous occasions. I have been provided with a sample of the text messages. They demonstrate an apparently obsessive persistence in seeking to bend the complainant to your will. There is a mixture of repeated threats and emotional manipulation, all of which are clearly designed to persuade the complainant to continue a relationship with you. It would seem that on occasion the complainant did engage in conversation with you about the future.

However, during this period, she also felt upset, scared and frightened and on at least one occasion, told you to leave her alone.

However, you were also persistent in your efforts to persuade [your father] to do what you wanted, and again relied on a combination of overbearing conduct and emotional manipulation. He attempted to contact the complainant, at your urging, on numerous occasions during the relevant period, although was only successful in actually making contact with her a couple of times.

Geason J considered the suffocation of the victim as a form of controlling behaviour:

[33] The fact that the respondent's conduct included suffocation has significance to the assessment of the objective seriousness of the offending. Suffocation should be treated with the same level of seriousness as is afforded strangulation or throttling. Such conduct is inherently dangerous, and capable of causing serious consequences within a very short period. It renders victims incapable of acting to protect themselves. As Estcourt J observed in DPP v Foster [2019] TASCCA 15 at [26]- [27], it is a form of dominance and control which has the potential to cause grave psychological harm, serious injury and even death.

Geason J identified the stalking as part of pattern of behaviour aimed at controlling the complainant:

[36] The stalking conduct is to be considered in the context of the earlier assaults and as part of a pattern of behaviour. It evidences the respondent's possessiveness. It was intended to engender fear in the complainant, and to make her comply with his wishes. As the learned sentencing judge noted, some of the messages demonstrated "an obsessive persistence in seeking to bend the complainant to your will.

Director of Public Prosecutions v Foster [2019] TASCCA 15 (12 September 2019) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

Estcourt J (Brett J and Marshall AJ concurring) observed the controlling nature of strangulation:

[26] Each of the identified incidents involved vicious and cowardly attacks by the respondent on a woman. Lest it be thought that grabbing the complainant by the throat and applying pressure is somehow less insidious than punching or kicking, it has been noted in an article by Heather Douglas and Robin Fitzgerald entitled "Strangulation, Domestic Violence and the Legal Response", published in the (2014) 36 (2) Sydney Law Review 231, that strangulation is a form of power and control that can have devastating psychological long-term effects on its victims in addition to a potentially fatal outcome.

Gregson v Tasmania [2018] TASCCA 14 (31 August 2018) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

In agreeing with Martin AJ, Geason J observed:

[4] Violence in relationships takes many forms. In whatever guise, whether physical or psychological, it involves the exertion of power and control over another. The victims of such violence are diminished by it, often succumbing to mental and bodily injuries that ruin their lives.

[5] It is a particularly insidious crime because it is difficult to detect. And an all too common consequence of this abuse is that its victims may be so broken or fearful that they do not report it.

[6] It follows that, in sentencing for offences of this type, general deterrence is a significant factor.

[7] The complainant is entitled to the full protection of the law, and the vindication of this Court.

Director of Public Prosecutions v Karklins [2018] TASCCA 6 (20 April 2018) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

Geason J commented on the seriousness of systems abuse achieved by emotional manipulation:

[56] The respondent's attempts to frustrate his prosecution should also be seen as particularly serious matters. They were a cynical exercise in emotional blackmail. That these offences occurred while the respondent was subject to an interim family violence order is an aggravating factor. Domestic violence typically occurs behind closed doors, making detection inherently difficult. Relationship dynamics frequently militate against a prosecution. Conduct directed at interfering with the prosecutorial process undermines the system intended to afford protection to victims of violence, making an inherently difficult process more so. When it is effective the opportunity for court intervention is foregone. Such intervention might be lifesaving. This offending should be viewed as striking at the heart of legislative attempts to provide protection to the vulnerable. It should be accepted in cases of family violence that attempts to interfere with the due administration of justice by the means of emotional manipulation of a vulnerable victim is a serious matter the consequences of which will always be severe.

And noted that the lack of express threats to achieve that end was not a mitigating factor:

[86] Finally, I note that in sentencing, the learned sentencing judge said of the respondent's attempts to dissuade the complainant from pursuing a prosecution that, "as to the steps he later took to pressure the complainant to change her story, none of his approaches contained express threats of violence or intimidation". I do not consider that that in any way mitigates the conduct. Such conduct would be aggravating, but the absence of an aggravating feature, does not serve to mitigate the seriousness of the conduct which was admitted. Nor does the observation recognise that intimidation through manipulation can occur by means other than actual threats and violence, a proposition particularly pertinent in the context of relationships.

And required denunciation:

[94] The assaults perpetrated on the complainant were serious. They resulted in her becoming unconscious on two occasions. She feared for her life, and her baby. She was threatened with death. The subsequent interference with the prosecution of this offending was perpetrated on multiple occasions, and sought to manipulate the complainant by playing upon her vulnerability. The respondent's methods were devious and require the strongest denunciation.

State of Tasmania v Matthew John Davey (Sentence) [2021] TASSC unreported (10 December 2021) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

In sentencing Brett J acknowledged the extent of the accused’s coercive and controlling behaviours towards the victim:

… I am satisfied that in your case, the evidence established the tendencies asserted by the prosecution, and that it was these tendencies which defined your approach to the relationship. In particular, I am satisfied that you engaged in a continuous and marked pattern of coercive control over the complainant. I accept the complainant's evidence that you constantly monitored her whereabouts, including by conducting or making her believe that you were conducting electronic surveillance of her communications and movements. You restricted her movements, both by demand but also from time to time by disabling or damaging her motor vehicle. You restricted and controlled her relationships with others, and demanded and expected complete loyalty from her.

You regularly utilised verbal threats and threatening conduct towards her in order to maintain this control. These included threats of burning, or the use of fire against her or her property. On a number of occasions, you made it clear to her that if she ever left you, you would find and kill her. You described to her the very specific ways that you would do this. In my view, the complainant's evidence about the extent of your controlling behaviour was vividly demonstrated by the telephone intercept and listening device recordings, and the surveillance footage, as well as the evidence of independent witnesses who saw particular events. I also accept the evidence of the complainant's mother about this issue. I found her generally to be a credible and reliable witness.

State of Tasmania v Levi Joseph David Hall (Sentence) [2021] TASSC unreported (27 September 2021) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Comments on passing sentence Pearce J:

I do not accept the submission however that this is not a serious example of the crime. It is possible to think of factors which might have made the crime even worse, for example permanent or disabling physical injuries or sexual crimes. However, over many months you exposed the complainant to a terrifying and degrading ordeal, apparently without any insight into the seriousness of your offending. You targeted her with the type of violent, abusive and controlling conduct which the community rightly condemns. You betrayed her trust and affection, took advantage of her vulnerability, blamed her for your own acts, all with the intention of making her fearful and compliant.

State of Tasmania v ARJ* (Sentence) [2021] TASSC unreported (11 March 2021) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Pearce J acknowledged that inconsistencies in the victim's accounts of the events did not detract from her credibility:

(pp2-3) Mindful of the need for care in any case in which the prosecution depends substantially on the evidence of a single witness, the complainant's account was persuasive and compelling. There were some inconsistencies in the accounts she gave over time to the attending police, to the nurse examiner at the hospital, in the statutory declaration she gave to another police officer and her evidence to the jury, but those inconsistencies do not undermine my confidence in her general truthfulness. She was faced with describing highly traumatic events on multiple occasions mostly when she was in stressful and distressing circumstances, and when the specific instances of violence she was asked to identify and detail were, I am satisfied, not the only instances of similar violence she was subjected to during the indictment period. Some confusion or mistake is not inconsistent with the truth of her account.

Baker v Barratt* [2019] TASSC 28 (4 July 2019) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Geason J cited the Magistrate's reasons for decision (which focused on the defendant's controlling behaviour including Visa threats) with approval:

[12]… The defendant appeared in his video interview to be a controlling person. He admitted that he insulted – sorry, he admitted that he insisted that he owned the two phones, which apparently the couple had between them, he insisted it was his phone, both phones were his phone, and he refused the use of the phone to his partner at will because he owned them, that's what he said. That he would threaten to contact the Immigration officer or the Immigration lawyer if he argued with his partner and gave evidence today that he did on the occasion of the 1st February. He made consistent references – numerous references, I didn't count them but well in excess of twelve references to the fact that she'd lacked respect for him and he didn't receive the respect from the complainant that he deserved. He freely admitted that he called her a cunt but denied that it was abusive and was surprised that the police thought that there was anything untoward in that language. He said that he owed – that she owed everything to him and that she was an ungrateful person. He did however support significant parts of the complainant's evidence and lots of the complainant's isn't really in dispute….

….The defendant's controlling manner, well I've referred to his own evidence, he denies he controls her, it's quite apparent to me that he does control her and he thinks that she – that she owes him something and that – in his evidence in chief – it was only when I brought up the question of love that he even mentioned it. A fiancé visa's not – this sounds more like a partnership, you keep – you do the right thing by me, you give me some financial support, you drive me around and I'll support you on a fiancé visa. Now he is controlling, he admits – he doesn't admit he's controlling but what he's admitted to is controlling behaviour and it's consistent again with her version…

Lusted v MRB [2013] TASMC 9 (19 February 2013) – Tasmanian Magistrates' Court

Magistrate Pearce admitted relationship evidence:

[60] I have also determined to admit the relationship evidence. I consider that it is relevant to removing the implausibility that might otherwise be attributed to MG's account of the assaults charged if the assaults were thought to be isolated incidents, and any implausibility associated with the way each party is said to have behaved on those particular occasions. It may be relevant in supporting an inference that the defendant wished to exercise control and domination over the complainant and so acted violently towards her. It also tends to support the prosecution contention that MG feared MRB and, for a period of time, tried to hide what was happening, did not complain to others, lied about what really happened and that she tolerated violence to preserve the relationship.

Magistrate Pearce commented on the difficulty of prosecuting family violence matters:

[68] …The nature of family violence is that it is difficult to detect and prosecute. It is frequently the case that offences are committed in private and with little or no independent corroborative evidence. Moreover, family violence offences are often characterised by reluctance on the part of the victim to assist in the prosecution of offences. That is so for a range of factors including fear and a wish to preserve relationships, even dysfunctional ones, for the sake of loyalty, affection, companionship, economic and domestic support and in the perceived interest of children. Sometimes those motivations are misguided but persist nevertheless. As a consequence of such factors victims sometimes act in a way that seems to an outside observer to be incongruous and difficult to understand, including by failing to complain about, or hiding or lying about violence directed at them. Even if victims are willing to give evidence then the success of prosecutions depends principally on credibility of the uncorroborated account of the victim, a factor often taken advantage of by perpetrators and further adding to the reluctance of victims to complain.

Dunford v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 304 (9 November 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

In relation to the charges of attempt to pervert the course of justice Beach JA observed:

[25] In relation to the objective seriousness of the applicant's offending and his moral culpability, the judge said:

> …Only five days after you were remanded into custody on these charges, and an intervention order had issued, you were on the phone to your father and your brother asking them to ask the complainant to drop the false imprisonment charge, with a view to minimising the amount of time you would spend in custody for these matters. Though neither proceeded to contact the complainant, I understand another family member did speak to her.

Baker (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 158 (9 June 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

McLeish and Osborn JJA observed:

36 Moreover, this offending involved aggravating features which distinguish it from offending of less seriousness. It took place in the context of a history of violence, manipulation and coercion against Ms Anderson and involved an attempt to pervert the course of justice in respect of his own serious offending. That serves to make the attempt itself more serious. Further, the offending had the especially unpleasant features of seeking to exploit Ms Anderson's emotional and psychological vulnerability by threatening her ability to access the ashes of her stillborn child and also threatening her dignity and right to privacy with the exposure of intimate images.

37 An attempt by a perpetrator of family violence to prevent a victim from seeking the full protection of the law and their physical and emotional safety is a very serious matter which calls for general deterrence and denunciation….

40 … Charge 8 involved repeated attempts by the applicant to conceal his wrongdoing over the previous 18 months, by means of emotional and physical threats directed at Ms Anderson. It was distinct offending that called for significant additional punishment.

Mercer (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2021] VSCA 132 (14 May 2021) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The court made the following observations relevant to coercive control at [64]-[65]:

> "In our view, the answer to the applicant's contention regarding the 'attempt to pervert' sentence is to be found in the judge's sentencing reasons. As noted earlier, her Honour said:
>
> > You attempted to persuade a victim to withdraw her allegation to police. This is reprehensible – it was motivated by your self-interest and need for control. While it was unaccompanied by threats or violence, it was protracted and repeated and it preyed upon [the complainant's] vulnerabilities. And of course it was also committed in breach of your intervention order, which was also unsuccessful in preventing you from continuing to control [her].
>
> In our view, the applicant's persistent and cynical assertion of control over the complainant, and his exploitation of her known vulnerabilities, made this case just as serious as if there had been explicit threats or actual violence. The transcripts of the calls make plain his exertion of coercive psychological pressure on her, encouraging her to think that they can 'work things out' between them and asking questions like 'Do you want me to get out or not?' The fact that the conduct about which he was asking her to lie involved his own criminal violence against her was a further aggravating feature. In our view, the applicant's moral culpability for this offence was high.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Neave JA and Kyrou AJA observed:

[54] The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and longlasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have [43] [o]ther serious financial effects.

DPP v O'Neill* [2015] VSCA 325 (2 December 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

In describing the respondent's relationship with the deceased Warren CJ, Redlich JA and Kaye JA observed:

[7] The deceased was the dominant partner in the relationship, with the respondent by and large acquiescing to the deceased's directions. Over the term of the relationship there was regular verbal conflict which intensified with time. The respondent told his psychologist how he was abused and humiliated in front of others by the deceased. Sometimes the conflicts involved verbal abuse and sometimes pushing and shoving. He also told the psychologist that the deceased was sexually demanding of him and if he declined the deceased's approaches he would call him a 'frigid bitch'. The respondent said he felt as if the deceased treated him as his own property. Despite all this, the deceased was regarded by the respondent as being loving and affectionate towards him.

Their Honours noted the sentencing judge's comments recognising the dominance and control the deceased exercised over the respondent:

[27] The personalities of both the deceased and the respondent were considered by the judge. Her Honour said this:

Mr Rattle was strong, confident and successful. He also had a dominant, controlling personality; everything had to be done his way, both personally and professionally. No doubt that was part of the key to his professional success. And, because of your own psychological make-up, you felt inadequate; it suited you to be with someone who took control and made all the decisions. But many of your mutual friends have described how Mr Rattle used to demean and belittle you in public. He frequently complained to them that you were not satisfying him sexually. In front of others, he would call you lazy, a parasite; he would threaten to send you back to where you came from. He was critical of your lack of business acumen. There were financial and business pressures on the relationship. In the work context, he treated you like the office boy, not his partner.

The Queen v Donker [2018] VSC 210 (11 May 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

Having outlined a history of controlling and violent behaviour by the deceased towards the accused at [5]-[9] and the physical violence to which the accused was subjected immediately prior to the instant offending Croucher J noted:

[72] While the law in this State does not excuse anyone – whether of uncommonly sturdy or brittle disposition – from criminal liability for otherwise unlawful actions based on provocation alone, the same law does not demand that victims of abuse of the kind and extent to which Ms Donker was subjected be super-resilient before provocation can operate in mitigation of sentence. Rather, the law attempts to strike a balance that recognizes human frailty in the face of extremely difficult circumstances, and allows that moral culpability may be reduced in such cases. This is such a case. As I say, I think it is very likely that any ordinary person, facing the circumstances which confronted Ms Donker and fixed with her history of exposure to family violence by Mr Powell, would lose self-control and act in a violent manner towards him.

DPP v Paulino (Sentence) [2017] VSC 794 (21 December 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

In sentencing the accused for murdering his wife Bell J observed:

[27] … The nature and gravity of this offending is significantly aggravated by the considerations to which I have referred, but particularly the contextual considerations, which are quite specific to the crime of murder that you committed as a man upon your estranged wife as a woman. By these I mean the threats that you made towards Teresa, the character assassination with abuse of various kinds, including promiscuity, and spurious allegations of involvement in pornography, the nuisance-calling, following and unwelcome contact, and the breach of the intervention order. These were not random measures but represented a pattern of coercive control. Teresa had a right to personal dignity and autonomy, to physical and psychological integrity and to live an independent and fulfilling life free of fear from your violence. While always being a loving mother to Daniel and Luke, she struggled heroically to realise that life, and won a lot of ground against great odds. She was trying to be a positive role model for her sons. Motivated by jealousy, hatred and rage, you first tried to defeat her and then you punished her, which led to the murder. While the murder would mean that Teresa no longer had a life to live, it was the culmination of a pattern of behaviour aimed at preventing her from living the life she chose. Such was the particular nature of the offending, which is all the more grave for it.

Lydon v Lydon [2008] WASCA 8 (8 February 2008) – Western Australia Court of Appeal

Le Miere AJA, with whom Pullin JA agreed, considered what is meant by the term ‘emotional abuse’ in determining whether the appellant had committed an act of family and domestic violence under s 6(1) of the Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA).

Le Miere AJA held that:

[49] Emotional abuse is not defined in the Act. Emotional abuse involves improper or inappropriate behaviour, verbal or non-verbal, that adversely impacts upon another person's emotional wellbeing. Emotional abuse improperly excites strong unwelcome feelings in another. Emotional abuse may involve coercion by intimidation, inducing fear, stalking, or harassment, that is words, conduct or action, usually repeated or persistent that, being directed at a specific person, annoys, alarms or causes substantial emotional distress to that person.

[50] There are two aspects to emotional abuse. The first is the adverse impact upon another person's emotional wellbeing. The second is the behaviour that causes the negative impact upon the emotional wellbeing of another.

Riddoch v Chiera [2020] WASC 114 (7 April 2020) – Western Australia Supreme Court

In holding that the Magistrate’s interruptions of counsel’s plea in mitigation did not found leave to appeal McGrath J observed:

[26] His Honour raised with counsel immediately his concerns regarding the description of the relationship as being 'toxic'. His Honour directly challenged counsel as to whether a submission was effectively being made that the victim was to blame. Counsel then positively engaged with the judicial officer, clarifying the submission. I do not accept the contention that the magistrate denied Mr Riddoch the procedural right to agitate an issue in mitigation. Mr Riddoch's counsel reframed this part of her submission, which concerned the improvements Mr Riddoch had made to his life since the offending.

Bropho v Hall* [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Western Australia Supreme Court

Mitchell J (as his Honour then was) considered the impact of the aggravating factor of an assault committed in circumstances of a domestic relationship and observed:

[16] An offence of this nature generally involves an abuse of the trust which one partner places in another, often where the victim is in a vulnerable position by reason of greater physical strength of the offender. The vulnerability of the victim is generally increased by the difficulty which she (it is usually a she) may have in extricating herself from the situation. As McLure P has noted, the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator is a hallmark of domestic violence. Recognising that common feature, it remains important for a court sentencing an offender for that kind of offence to take account of the need to protect persons in that vulnerable position, so far as the courts can do so by the imposition of a sentence, bearing a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offence, which has a deterrent effect and, in an appropriate case, removes the offender to a place where there is no opportunity to violently attack their partner.

Ahmed and Gupta* [2020] FCWA 140 (31 August 2020) – Family Court of Western Australia

Duncanson J observed:

[139] Although I have not been able to make findings as to specific incidents of family violence I am satisfied that the father's controlling behaviour of the mother amounts to family violence perpetrated by him against her. I am unsure as to the extent to which the father's cultural beliefs may have contributed to this. The mother deposed that she believed the father's expectation of bringing her to Australia was so that she could be a domestic help and be a subservient [sic] to him and his brother in the house. In contrast the father said he had been living in Australia for 16 years, Australian culture comes first and the religion is his second option …

Shelley and Dickens* [2020] FCWA 52 (3 April 2020) – Family Court of Western Australia

Tyson J observed:

[241] The father has also behaved in a controlling and coercive manner, which falls within the definition of family violence. For example, he prevented the mother talking to her family by removing the telephone from her on the yacht; he demanded the mother answer his calls when in hospital after G's birth and suggested the maternal grandmother required his permission to provide assistance with meals after G was born.

Dempsey & Brahms [2017] FCWA 59 (12 May 2017) – Family Court of Western Australia

Thakray CJ observed:

[15] Contrary to what some of his associates and family believe, I find that the father is an aggressive, controlling and manipulative man. He has a propensity to bend the truth, and appears skilled at turning accusations against him back onto the accuser. He demonstrated no insight into the way that he made the lives of the mother and her adult sons (and to a slightly lesser extent his own children) a complete misery. He is quite oblivious to the harm his violent, abusive and controlling behaviour has caused.

[111] The father has engaged in coercive, controlling and abusive behaviour toward the mother and children over many years. Apart from his physical and verbal abuse of the mother, I accept that the father has damaged every vehicle she has ever owned (sometimes when children have been in the vehicle and sometimes when they have been observing).

[112] In my view, all five of the mother's children have suffered psychological harm as a result of their exposure to the father's violence and abuse and the ongoing conflict between the mother and father. This is likely to be one of the main reasons for Child A's poor behaviour and also for Child B's nightmares and long-term self-harming, including her habit, developed very early in life, of twisting her hair until she was almost completely bald on one side of her head. It would seem the child least damaged by the father's behaviour has been Child C who has had significantly less involvement with him than the other children.

[113] I accept that the mother remained in the relationship for as long as she did because of the father's manipulative behaviour and because she considered this was the best way to keep her and the children safe. The father's manipulation has included his efforts to drive a wedge between the mother and her friends and between the mother and the children.

[114] I accept that the father has not been charged with any offences arising out of his conduct towards the mother but that is far from conclusive. As I have mentioned, the father is skilled at deflecting accusations.

Protection order

Under the National Domestic Violence Order Scheme, protection orders made in any Australian jurisdiction on or after 25 November 2017 are automatically recognised and enforceable nationally.

Protection orders made before 25 November 2017 (except Victorian protection orders and New Zealand protection orders registered in Victoria, which are recognised retrospectively) are not automatically recognised and enforceable in other jurisdictions. All jurisdictions have legislation to enable protection orders made before 25 November 2017 to become nationally recognised by being ‘declared’ as a protection order recognised under the scheme. The protected person may apply to any local court in Australia for such a declaration.

While there are differences in the nature and scope of domestic and family violence legislation across Australian States and Territories, all contain provisions for certain courts in each jurisdiction to make civil orders (usually on application by police or an individual) specifically to protect victims – or persons at risk – of domestic and family violence occurring in the context of a range of relationships, including those between current or former intimate partners.

The objects of these orders, generally, is to protect victims from future domestic and family violence. They recognise that: a range of behaviours – physical and non-physical – can constitute domestic and family violence; that most often these are patterns of behaviour occurring over time rather than one-off incidents; and that victims and other affected parties are likely to require protection over extended periods. The wording and conditions of orders vary widely within and across jurisdictions depending on the facts of the particular case and the circumstances and experiences of the parties involved.

The terms used to identify these orders also vary across jurisdictions and these terms are set out in the table below:

Jurisdiction	Relevant legislation	Commonly-issued orders
Australian Capital Territory	Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)	family violence order
New South Wales	Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)	apprehended domestic violence order
Northern Territory	Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT)	domestic violence order
Queensland	Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld)	domestic violence order
South Australia	Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)	intervention order
Tasmania	Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas)	family violence order
Victoria	Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)	family violence intervention order
Western Australia	Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA)	family violence restraining order

For convenience, this bench book uses the collective term, ‘protection order’, except where it is necessary to refer to an order issued under specific legislation, for example in the case summaries.

It is important to note that when a person in whose favour a protection order has been made makes an application for the registration of that order in another state or territory, the applicant must detail the precise nature – including the name – of the order previously made. Wording or conditions that differ from what may be considered standard in the other state or territory do not prevent registration of the order.

Parties

There is no widespread consensus among researchers, service providers and practitioners as to the most appropriate terms for identifying parties to domestic and family violence related proceedings. However, key literature assists in substantiating terminology choices.

The term ‘victim’ may be ascribed to those individuals who have experienced or are experiencing domestic and family violence. In doing so, it is acknowledged that the term has attracted considerable criticism for implying powerlessness, or failing to resonate with those who do not feel helpless, who defend themselves or who are ambivalent about their relationship to the person perpetrating the violence [Fine 1989]. Those who do not support the ‘victim’ label may express a preference for the term ‘survivor’, connoting a degree of empowerment [Fernandez 2010]. However, the term ‘survivor’ may be problematic in its implication that those individuals who do not escape domestic and family violence are somehow weak or voluntarily consented to the behaviour; and therefore the term ‘victim’ may more aptly reflect their experience [Meyersfeld 2010].

The term ‘perpetrator’ is used to describe a person who perpetrates domestic and family violence against another person with whom they are in a relevant relationship (as legislatively defined), irrespective of whether they have been charged with an offence or held criminally responsible for any behaviour.

The terms ‘victim’ and ‘perpetrator’ are the most commonly used among police and judicial officers in domestic and family violence related proceedings (for parties both alleged and proven to be a victim or a perpetrator) and, for consistency, are also used in this bench book. There is one notable exception: in any case where domestic and family violence and criminal jurisdictions intersect, the term ‘offender’ is used to identify a party who has been convicted of a criminal offence, for example, where a perpetrator’s domestic and family violence behaviours also constitute a criminal offence, or where the victim of domestic and family violence commits a criminal offence.

Parties - Key Literature

Australia

Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (Queensland Government, 2015).

This report commences with an acknowledgement that the term 'victim' is most commonly used in the public discourse, despite there being a contrary view that the term is disempowering for the subject individual and a preference is sometimes expressed for the use of the term 'survivor' (p4). The terms are then defined and ultimately the authors decide to use the terms interchangeably.

International

Ashcraft, Catherine, 'Naming Knowledge: A Language for Reconstructing Domestic Violence and System Gender Inequality' (2000) 23 Women and Language 1.

This article explores a range of communicative options available for framing domestic violence. The author examines how terminology choices have silenced certain groups of women and in some cases, left dominant representations unchallenged. Ashcraft submits that there are various problems with the use of the term 'victim' (p5) and notes research has shown that many women, even women who have suffered severe and prolonged instances of domestic and family violence resist the label. The author suggests that this is because the term suggests powerlessness and that some feel that it does not accurately describe their situations, and goes further to suggest that '[t]o require these women to accept the victim…label may remove the remaining vestiges of self-esteem and hope that have made possible their survival' (p5).

Dobash, Rebecca, and Russell Dobash, Women, Violence and Social Change (Routledge, 1992).

This book is framed as a sociological inquiry into the growth of the battered women's movements in America and Great Britain and the relationship of the movements to local and national institutions. The book opens with an overview of the nature and extent of domestic and family violence and the authors pass comment on the use of the terms 'victim' and 'survivor'. They note that '[t]he term "victim" has been used in two ways: implying a master status of individual women (i.e. she is a victim) and as a description of the experience itself

(i.e. she was the victim of a violent attack' (p30). Dobash and Dobash note that use of the term 'victim' in the first way is the one most often criticised and replaced with the term 'survivor'. They see the second use of the term as legitimate and important for describing an individual's role within the act itself.

Fernandez, Marilyn, Restorative Justice for Domestic Violence Victims: An Integrated Approach to Their Hunger for Healing (Lexington Books, 2010).

Fernandez acknowledges that there is much debate on the appropriate descriptors to be applied to those who have experienced domestic violence, and notes that the terms 'victim', 'survivor' or 'targets (of violence)' are some of the most commonly discussed (p24). The author focuses on the terms 'victim' and 'survivor' and makes some interesting observations with respect to these two descriptors. In relation to the former, Fernandez notes that although there are some who would argue that the term 'connotes victim blaming' there are many who prefer the term 'because it better captures their experiences, particularly when they were in the midst of the violence and even after' (p24). On the other hand, 'survivor' may be seen as the more empowering term, but the author counters this by submitting that the term 'minimises the trauma they have experienced' (p24). Ultimately Fernandez opts to use the terms interchangeably, and uses the term 'victim' when violence experiences are described and analysed and 'survivor' when help-seeking or rehabilitative behaviour is the focus.

Fine, Michelle, 'The Politics of Research and Activism: Violence Against Women' (1989) 3 Gender and Society 549.

The author cites her own research along with that of Susan Schechter and Lynn Phillips about self-descriptors, noting that women who have been subjected to violent behaviour often distance themselves from the label 'victim' or more precisely the term 'battered woman' (p553). It is argued that popularising such categories portray women as powerless and innocent and does not resonate with those who do not feel helpless, who defend themselves or are ambivalent about their relationship to the person inflicting the violence. The author does not, however, offer any alternative descriptors but rather suggests that it is necessary to understand the consequences for women of the political act of labelling them a 'victim' or a 'battered woman'.

Govier, Trudy and Wilhelm Verwoerd, 'How Not to Polarize "Victims" and "Perpetrators"' (2004) 16 Peace Review 371.

Although written in the context of naming parties in acts of political violence, some important comments are made in relation to the term 'victim' which can be applied to domestic and family violence. The authors submit that the 'victim' label is objectionable if 'it is interpreted as implying the person harmed is nothing but a passive part in an act in which he or she was hurt by another' and note that this interpretation has led many harmed persons to insist on the use of the term 'survivor' (p371). Govier and Wilhelm object to labelling parties on the basis that it encourages polarized thinking that is simplistic and counter-productive. It is for this reason that they do not endorse the use of the terms 'victim' and 'perpetrator' and submit that the distinction between the two as 'logically simplistic, ethically unfair, psychologically misleading and prudentially undermining' (p371). Unfortunately, the comments made in relation to the perpetrator label have little application in the context of domestic and family violence because the authors' focus in this respect is on the culpability of persons supporting the use of physical force during political violence.

Groves, Nicola, and Terry Thomas, Domestic Violence and Criminal Justice (Taylor and Francis, 2013).

This book aims to provide an up-to-date and comprehensive introduction to the subject of domestic violence and its interaction with the criminal justice system in England and Wales. The authors dedicate a chapter to naming and defining domestic violence as well as exploring its nature and extent, including the historical and political contexts of related terms. The focus of this book is the criminal justice system response to domestic and family violence and as such, individuals who are subject to the violence are referred to as 'victims' rather than 'survivors'. The authors do acknowledge that the term 'victim' has been widely critiqued but ultimately submit that it is the most accurate descriptor despite the fact that 'those who experience domestic violence are rarely passive victims' (pxi).

Meyersfeld, Bonita, Domestic Violence and International Law (Bloomsbury Publishing, 2010).

In the introductory chapter to this book, the author raises the important question of whether the term 'victim' or 'survivor' should be used when referring to a person who has experienced domestic and family violence. There are two important points made in relation to these terms respectively. The first is that the descriptor 'victim' can be seen as 'connot[ing] weakness and vulnerability' (pxxxiv). Secondly, the author submits that the term 'survivor' is 'problematic in its implied commentary on those women who either kill or are killed as a result of the abuse' and there is an implication that a person who fails to escape the violence is somehow weak or consented to the behaviour (pxxxiv). Although noting that neither term is ideal, Meyersfeld opts for the term 'victim' and occasionally uses the term 'survivor' when addressing issues that arise when domestic and family violence is no longer occurring.

Moncrieffe, Joy, 'Labelling, Power and Accountability: How and Why 'Our' Categories Matter' in Joy Moncrieffe and Rosaling Eyben (eds) The Power of Labelling: How People are Categorised and Why It Matters (Earthscan, 2007) 1.

This chapter is a good foundational resource for understanding the processes and outcomes of labelling people, and how social problems are often framed and dealt with in response to such labels. Moncrieffe explores the intense and complex politics involved in the processes of labelling, noting that the labels ascribed to individuals or sections of society can have both positive and negative effects (p2). Although the author does not address specifically the terms 'victim', 'perpetrator' or 'offender', the usefulness of this source lies in its comprehensive explanation of what is commonly referred to as 'labelling theory' through an overview of other influential sources (p6) as well as making suggestions as to how the pitfalls of labelling can be avoided. These include acknowledging the importance of and increasing awareness of the power and impact of labels and acknowledging that any one label is not going to accurately describe the experience of all individuals.

Nicholson, Paula, Domestic Violence and Psychology: A Critical Perspective (Taylor and Francis, 2010).

The purpose of the book is to present theoretical perspectives from the discipline of psychology and research on domestic and family violence to social science academic audience and community service providers. Similar to other authors who have addressed the issue of appropriate descriptors to name parties, Nicholson elects to use the words 'victim' and 'survivor' interchangeably and does so according to the circumstances in which the terms are being used. The author offers the following example: a woman in a violent relationship at the time is best described as a 'victim', whereas a woman who has left a violent relationship and has physically and emotionally lived to tell the tale is to be described as a ‘survivor’ (p30). The author also notes how the use of the word ‘survivor’ has the potential to place a burden on individuals to engage in advocacy for others, thus emphasizing how language used to refer to domestic and family violence frames the context and expectations for those involved.

Dynamics of domestic and family violence

Domestic and family violence is predominantly perpetrated by men against women in the context of intimate partner relationships. Children may be exposed to the violence in a variety of ways or may be directly victimised. While the violence may take place within a range of relationships and take many different forms—physical or non-physical, sexual and non-sexual, direct or indirect, actual or threatened—it is characterised by a pattern of abusive behaviour involving a perpetrator's exercise of control over the victim, increasingly referred to as coercive control, often for an extended period. This behaviour may occur throughout a relationship, or it may be initiated or exacerbated at times of heightened risk, for example, pregnancy, attempted or actual separation, and during court proceedings dealing with children or joint property matters.

Professionals who work with victims and perpetrators have endeavoured to explain the distinctive nature of domestic and family violence. Commonly referenced is the Duluth "Power and Control Wheel". This figurative representation identifies domestic and family violence as a cycle of violence in the form of a wheel, comprising an outer ring highlighting physical and sexual violence and an inner ring including descriptions of multiple abusive behaviours with power and control consistently at their centre. Models like this one assist understanding but are not intended to be definitive. Each case of domestic and family violence involves a unique and complex series of facts that must be considered as a whole in order to understand the victim's experience of violence, and to respond appropriately to risk of future violence and perpetrator accountability. Making assumptions about parties' motivations and behaviours, or attempting to categorise violence according to severity or parties' general circumstances may result in a misunderstanding of the dynamics of violence in a particular case and inappropriate responses to the needs of the victim and perpetrator.

Victims of domestic and family violence may sustain long-term harm to their physical, mental or emotional wellbeing. While they may obtain legal protection from future harm, it may take years of treatment and counselling to recover from the effects of the violence. Children who are affected may continue to experience violence in adulthood or they may, as adults, exhibit attitudes and behaviours that reflect their childhood experiences.

Dynamics of domestic and family violence - Key Literature

Australia

Douglas, H. Women, Intimate Partner Violence and the Law (2021; OUP).

This text explores the results of an interview study involving interviews with 65 women who had experienced domestic and family violence over three years. See chapter 3: Most women reported that the most difficult form of abuse they dealt with were forms of non-physical abuse, especially emotional abuse. Many women identified that non-physical abuse deeply impacted on their sense of self and freedom, and that it continued to affect them for years. Other forms of non-physical abuse that were also highlighted by the women included abusive tactics targeting their role as a mother, isolation within the relationship, financial abuse. The women in the study highlighted the particular impacts of non-physical forms of abuse, including isolation, financial abuse and threats about their visas, for women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds especially those women with insecure visa status.

International

National Domestic Violence Fatality Review Initiative, ABOUT NDVFRI (2016).

The National Domestic Violence Fatality Review Initiative (NDVFRI) (US resource) is a unique resource centre that is dedicated to domestic violence fatality review by the Office on Violence Against Women, a branch of the US Department of Justice. Currently, 30 States in the US have a form of domestic violence fatality review. Domestic violence fatality review requires a shift from a culture of blame to a culture of safety. The Initiative aims to provide assistance for assessing domestic violence-related deaths, with the underlying objectives of:

- Preventing domestic violence homicides and domestic violence in the future;
- Preserving battered women's safety;
- Identifying gaps in service delivery and assessing potential methods of remedying these organisational issues;
- Holding domestic violence perpetrators, as well as the agencies and organisations that come into contact with the parties, accountable;
- Providing technical assistance to States which either have implemented or have not implemented domestic violence fatality review.

The website includes a range of resources including reports, videos and webinars.

Dynamics of domestic and family violence - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Rogers [2020] SADC 72 (16 June 2020) – South Australian District Court

At [273], the Court said:

> "[The complainant's] behaviour in contacting police, making statements on some occasions and not others, withdrawing complaints, denying incidents occurred, allowing the accused back into her life and seeking variation to intervention orders, are behaviours that too commonly feature in cases involving serious domestic violence. Abusive and violent relationships give rise to behaviours that to anyone who has not had that experience, may seem simply too odd or counterintuitive to be believed."

At [279], the Court observed that:

> "…[V]ictims of domestic violence may not necessarily seek attention for the injuries inflicted upon them, and may go to extraordinary lengths to conceal signs of abuse…"

R v Brown [2015] ACTSC 65 (5 March 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Burns J at [4]-[5]: Burns J accepted the opinions and statements he quoted from clinical psychologist, Dr Michael Barry's report. Dr Barry said: 'At the time of the offence, Miss Brown had been in an emotionally and physically abusive relationship for over two years. She described a gradual deterioration in her mental health, reporting low self-worth and feeling overwhelmed, feeling that she did not "fit in anywhere" and she described a "sense of loss in the world". She reported that despite Mr Ruspandini's treatment of her, she felt that he was the only one who she could rely on.

Domestic violence and emotional abuse are behaviours used by one person in a relationship to control the other. Research into the cycle of domestic violence suggests that it is common for victims of domestic violence to blame themselves for the abuse and to experience major disruption in their self and world view.

Domestic abuse can have a serious impact on the way a person thinks and interacts with the world around them. The chronic exposure to violence, or the threat of violence, and the stress and fear resulting from this exposure, can cause not only immediate physical injury, but also mental shifts that occur as the mind attempts to process trauma or protect the body.

Domestic violence affects a person's thoughts, feeling and behaviours, and can significantly impact on mental stability. While the effects of physical abuse are obvious, the effects of emotional abuse are easier to hide and harder to repair. It is common for victims of emotional abuse to blame themselves and minimise their abuse, particularly when they are repeatedly told that it is their fault that their partner becomes angry or aggressive'.

R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J: 'An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence", Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pp 6–7' ([77]).

R v Patsan [2018] NSWCCA 129 (29 June 2018) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

At [39], Adamson J notes –

> 'While every sentence imposed must have regard to all the circumstances particular to the specific case, individualised justice does not require sentencing judges to ignore patterns of behaviour which are repeated all too frequently before them.'

Further, at [39], Adamson J notes –

> 'The experience of this Court and the statistics relied upon by the Crown indicate that domestic violence > offences not infrequently conform to the following pattern, to which the applicant's conduct in the present case conformed: a male attacks (or kills) a woman with whom he is, or has been, in an intimate relationship when she expresses a wish to leave that relationship. Typically, the male is physically stronger than the female. The male is thus generally in a position to inflict considerable harm to the female and there is no real prospect of spontaneous physical retaliation because of the disparity between their respective strengths.'

Xue v R* [2017] NSWCCA 137 (21 June 2017) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

At [53], the Court notes –

> 'The applicant's circumstances at the time of the offending and his genuine belief that the victim may have been unfaithful to him can in no way justify or ameliorate the seriousness of the offending. Regrettably, it is often the case with domestic violence that the catalyst is a genuine, albeit irrational, belief on the part of the aggressor that he, or occasionally she, has been wronged in some way by the victim. A resort to violence in such circumstances is not justified, even if the aggressor's belief turns out to be correct.'

R v Biles (No 2)* [2017] NSWSC 525 (3 May 2017) – New South Wales Supreme Court

Fagan J considered that these offences were the culmination of a course of domestic violence:

> 'The experience of courts in this State has shown that men who perpetrate violence against their female partners do not stop after one occurrence. Often they become accustomed to inflicting violence of escalating severity.' Per Fagan J at [52]

On the failure of the other women in the house to call the police:

> 'The apparent lack of a sense of urgency amongst the other women in the house … may have been due to resignation amongst them; a feeling that to some extent domestic violence is inevitable and must be endured and, perhaps, that it is a matter private to the couple, in which others should not interfere. None of that is so.' Per Fagan J at [55]

R v Gittany (No 5) [2014] NSWSC 49 (11 February 2014) – New South Wales Supreme Court

McCallum J at [40]: 'In my view, that history informs the degree of moral culpability of the offence. The arrogance and sense of entitlement with which Mr Gittany sought to control Lisa Harnum throughout their relationship deny the characterisation of his state of mind in killing her as one of complete and unexpected spontaneity. By an attritional process, he allowed possessiveness and insecurity to overwhelm the most basic respect for her right to live her life as she chose. Although I accept that the intention to kill was formed suddenly and in a state of rage, it was facilitated by a sense of ownership and a lack of any true respect for the autonomy of the woman he claimed to love'.

WJ v AT [2016] QDC 211 (19 August 2016) – District Court of Queensland

Smith DCJA quoting the explanatory notes to the 2011 Bill for the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) at [166]: 'Lastly, the Bill aims to ensure that the person who is most in need of protection is identified. This is particularly important where cross-applications are made, which is where each party to a relationship alleges domestic violence against the other and which often result in cross-orders.

During consultation, stakeholders reported a disproportionate number of cross-applications and cross-orders and expressed the concern that in many instances domestic violence orders are made against both people involved.

This is inconsistent with the notion that domestic violence is characterised by one person being subjected to an ongoing pattern of abuse by another person who is motivated by the desire to dominate and control them. Both people in a relationship cannot be a victim and perpetrator of this type of violence at the same time.

A cross-application may be used by a respondent to continue victimising the aggrieved person, to exact revenge or to gain a tactical advantage in other court proceedings.

Also, violence used in self-defence and to protect children can be misconstrued as domestic violence if a broader view of the circumstances is not taken' (His Honour's emphasis).

R v Sykes* [2017] SASCFC 59 (31 May 2017) – Supreme Court of South Australia (Full Court)

'Every person has a right to feel safe in their house and the appellant had violated the security and safety of the victim and also violated her personally. He had terrorised her for what must have been hours in her own home. In her view his behaviour appeared to have been deliberately designed to inflict the maximum amount of terror.' Per Parker J at [33]

R v Ritter* [2016] SASCFC 88 (16 August 2016) – Supreme Court of South Australia (Full Court)

Parker J at [17]-[21]: 'At the time of the offending the appellant and the victim had been in a relationship for approximately two years. His behaviour towards her was violent and controlling. About one month into the relationship the appellant began verbally abusing the victim. This progressed to physical abuse occurring about twice each week. By the last year of the relationship the frequency of assaults had escalated to the point where the appellant was assaulting the victim on a daily basis. The assaults included punching, slapping, kicking, throwing items and spitting. When the victim was threatened or attacked by the appellant she would try to leave their flat, often running into nearby streets and parks and attempting to hide. The appellant would frequently chase her or track her down in order to continue his abuse. The appellant monitored the victim's movements and rarely let her leave the house without him. He also controlled her finances, regularly forcing her to withdraw money from her account for his benefit, including so that he could buy drugs and alcohol. The appellant regularly threatened that if the victim reported any abuse to the police or left the relationship he would harm her and her children. She was too frightened to leave or to report the abuse to police, friends and family'.

Her Majesty's Attorney-General v O* [2004] TASSC 53 (9 June 2004) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Quoting the Canadian decision of R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242, 249 (as cited in Parker v R [1994] TASSC 94): ' When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape.'

Lusted v MRB* [2013] TASMC 9 (19 February 2013) – Magistrates' Court of Tasmania

Magistrate RW Pearce at [68]: 'Family violence is to be abhorred. It is a significant social problem, of concern to the community and the justice system. The parliament saw fit to enact legislation, the Family Violence Act 2004, expressly to "provide for an integrated criminal justice response to family violence which promotes the safety of people affected by family violence". The nature of family violence is that it is difficult to detect and prosecute. It is frequently the case that offences are committed in private and with little or no independent corroborative evidence. Moreover, family violence offences are often characterised by reluctance on the part of the victim to assist in the prosecution of offences. That is so for a range of factors including fear and a wish to preserve relationships, even dysfunctional ones, for the sake of loyalty, affection, companionship, economic and domestic support and in the perceived interest of children. Sometimes those motivations are misguided but persist nevertheless. As a consequence of such factors victims sometimes act in a way that seems to an outside observer to be incongruous and difficult to understand, including by failing to complain about, or hiding or lying about violence directed at them. Even if victims are willing to give evidence then the success of prosecutions depends principally on credibility of the uncorroborated account of the victim, a factor often taken advantage of by perpetrators and further adding to the reluctance of victims to complain'.

DPP v Barnes & Barnes* [2015] VSCA 293 (12 November 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

This was a Crown appeal against sentence. Redlich JA at [68]-[69*]:* 'In sentencing, the judge said this about Trevor's offending: 'I make it plain that I consider that you are the main offender in this criminal enterprise and the whole appalling saga was dictated by your immaturity and inability to control your anger in the context of your possessive and controlling behaviour of Ms Bethune, whom you had subjected to domestic violence on earlier occasions. In sentencing you, the court must denounce your conduct, give emphasis to general deterrence, and impose just punishment. A strong message needs to be sent to males in the community who are inclined to be violent towards their female partners. You do not own them. You have no right … menacingly [to] control them. If you lay a hand on them in anger, the law will not spare you punishment. Men who are bullies towards women usually have some psychological inadequacy. They need to look long and hard at themselves to try to understand why they are inclined to behave with anger and brutality, and seek professional help to overcome such inclinations.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou AJA at [53]-[54]: 'The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and longlasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

Dawes v Coyne* [2000] WASCA 134 (19 May 2000) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

Miller J at [6]: 'The learned Magistrate decided the matter after hearing submissions. He began by stating that it was a tragedy that "domestic matters of this sort get into the criminal court" and made the observation that "both parties had been causing trouble for the police who do not want to be involved in these sort of things". The learned Magistrate's observations that the matters in question were merely "domestic" and should not get into the criminal court were entirely inappropriate. Allegations of unlawful assault and breaches of [the] restraining order were matters properly the subject of a complaint and the proper place for the resolution of those complaints was in the Court of Petty Sessions. Further, the observation that both parties had been causing trouble for the police is difficult to understand from the evidence but whether it be true or not, it was wrong for the learned Magistrate to make the statement that police did not wish to be involved in matters of breach of restraining order and assault in the circumstances of this case'.

The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman* [2011] WASCA 15 (19 January 2011) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [3]: 'The hallmark of domestic or relationship related violence is the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator of the violence. The otherwise appropriate penalty should not be reduced because there is a return to the status quo that existed prior to the breakdown of the relationship which precipitated the violence. It is also circular to rely on the return to the relationship status quo as the route to rehabilitation. Moreover, the emphasis on the domestic context marginalises the actual and threatened violence inflicted by the respondent on C'.

Bropho v Hall* [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Mitchell J at [16]: 'The fact that the aggravated assault occurred in a domestic setting is a significant aggravating factor of the offence. An offence of this nature generally involves an abuse of the trust which one partner places in another, often where the victim is in a vulnerable position by reason of greater physical strength of the offender. The vulnerability of the victim is generally increased by the difficulty which she (it is usually a she) may have in extricating herself from the situation. As McLure P has noted, the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator is a hallmark of domestic violence. Recognising that common feature, it remains important for a court sentencing an offender for that kind of offence to take account of the need to protect persons in that vulnerable position, so far as the courts can do so by the imposition of a sentence, bearing a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offence, which has a deterrent effect and, in an appropriate case, removes the offender to a place where there is no opportunity to violently attack their partner' (which was approved by this court in Gillespie v The State of Western Australia [2016] WASCA 216 [48]).

Myths and misunderstandings

A victim of domestic and family violence is able to leave the abusive relationship

Many victims of domestic and family violence may be motivated to leave, however they may face a myriad of barriers, including: lack of financial resources; concerns for the welfare of children, family and pets; disability, lack of alternative, safe accommodation; inadequate formal support systems; disrupted social networks; religious and cultural beliefs preventing them from leaving; and fear of retaliation by the perpetrator. A perpetrator may also use a variety of coercive and manipulative tactics to actively prevent the victim from leaving. These barriers may be too great for a victim to ever overcome, or they may explain why a victim leaves and returns to an abusive relationship on multiple occasions before finally leaving.

The domestic and family violence will stop when the victim and perpetrator separate

A victim leaving an abusive relationship may be viewed by the perpetrator as a direct threat to the perpetrator's ability to maintain control over the victim. Research has shown that one of the most dangerous times for a victim is in the months after separation when the perpetrator may use a variety of tactics to reassert control over the victim.

Domestic and family violence involving physical violence is more serious than other controlling behaviours

Most Australian state, territory and federal legislation now recognises that domestic and family violence can be characterised by a range of non-physical abusive behaviours as well as physical violence. Indeed some studies have shown that domestic homicides are often preceded by coercive and controlling behaviour. In the past, courts have shown a tendency to focus judicial responses on separate incidents of physical violence, and the severity of that violence, without having regard to the history and dynamics of the abusive relationship. Legislative change has assisted a more developed understanding of the complex and intersecting nature of domestic and family violence behaviours, and how they may operate over time to exercise control over not only the victim's physical condition and environment but their emotional wellbeing, self esteem and sense of identity.

Domestic and family violence only affects particular groups of people

Research has consistently shown that domestic and family violence occurs in all sectors of society irrespective of race, gender, age, sexual identity, socio-economic status, location, culture or religion. However, some groups of people are more vulnerable to the experience and impacts of violence than others due to their specific circumstances or needs.

Men and women are equally victims and perpetrators of domestic and family violence

While men do experience domestic and family violence, and women can be perpetrators, research demonstrates that, predominantly, women are the victims and men are the perpetrators of this form of violence. One in six Australian women and one in twenty Australian men experience violence by their cohabiting opposite-sex partner. One in four Australian women report violence by a partner they may or may not have lived with; and two-thirds of those women experience more than one episode of abuse. In 73% of female homicide cases, the current or intimate male partner is the perpetrator/offender. Women are also more likely than men to experience emotional abuse by their partner and are more likely to experience anxiety and fear as a result.

Domestic and family violence does not include sexual assault

While sexual assault in intimate relationships is recognised by the law as a form of domestic and family violence and as a criminal offence, victims may not know or understand this, and police may minimise or fail to respond adequately to the behaviour. Casework experience suggests that many sexual assaults in intimate relationships are unreported, and often undisclosed, even where other forms of violence are reported.

Women often make false or exaggerated claims of domestic and family violence to obtain a tactical advantage in parenting proceedings

A 2015 evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments to the Commonwealth Family Law Act 1975 observes that this belief persists among some sections of the community, including some lawyers and non-legal professionals, despite the fact that false denials of true allegations are more common. Data also shows that since the amendments there has been a decrease in the percentage of mothers (who experienced domestic and family violence since separation) having a protection order.

Domestic and family violence is a relationship issue; both parties are responsible

Domestic and family violence is often minimised by perpetrators attempting to shift the blame to the victim and others. Conceptualising violence as a product of dysfunction in the intimate relationship overlooks the critical aspects of dominance and control central to the behaviours of most perpetrators towards victims.

Domestic and family violence is caused by external factors such as alcohol or drug misuse, financial pressure or a prejudicial family law system

The view that domestic and family violence derives from factors other than a perpetrator's motivations and behaviours may have the effect of diminishing a perpetrator's sense of personal responsibility. In many situations violence occurs in the absence of these factors. Similarly, there are many situations where these factors are present and violence does not occur.

- Victims of domestic and family violence are weak, passive and powerless

  Referencing or relying on victim stereotypes may potentially exclude or fail to give due consideration and fair hearing to victims whose profiles and experiences do not align with those stereotypes. For example, some victims may physically resist violence or attempt to defend themselves. Victims and their circumstances are as diverse as in the broader population.

- Mothers who experience domestic and family violence have a duty to keep the family together and to protect the children from violence

  This view potentially pits a mother's safety against her children's safety. This may manifest as: the mother tolerating the violence in the interests of preserving the family unit; or reporting the violence and risking the accusation that she has failed to adequately protect her children.

Myths and misunderstandings - Key Literature

Short References

A victim of domestic and family violence will leave the abusive relationship.

Bruton and Tyson (2017) Yamawaki et al (2012) Douglas & Walsh (2010) Wakefield & Taylor (2015) Meyer (2012) Buel (1999)

The domestic and family violence will stop when the victim and perpetrator separate.

DeKeseredy, Dragiewicz and Schwartz (2017) Wilcox (2006) Douglas & Walsh (2010)

Domestic and family violence involving physical violence is more serious than other controlling behaviours.

Hunter (2006) Murray & Powell (2009) NSW DV Death Review (2020) Ragusa (2012) Stark (2012)

Domestic and family violence only affects particular groups of people.

ALRC/NSWLRC (2010) Ragusa (2012)

Men and women are equally victims and perpetrators of domestic and family violence.

Melville & Hunter (2001) Wakefield & Taylor (2015) Murray & Powell (2009) Cox (2016)

Domestic and family violence does not include sexual assault.

ALRC/NSWLRC (2010) Lievore (2004) Cox (2016)

Women often make false or exaggerated claims of domestic and family violence to obtain a tactical advantage in parenting proceedings.

Kaspiew et al (2015) Hunter (2006) Melville & Hunter (2001) Chisholm (2009) Francia et al (2019)

Domestic and family violence is a relationship issue; both parties are responsible.

Hunter (2006) Wakefield & Taylor (2015) Yamawaki et al (2012) Wilcox (2006) Douglas (2008)

Domestic and family violence is caused by external factors such as alcohol and drug abuse, financial pressure or bias of the family law system.

Murray & Powell (2009)

Victims of domestic and family violence are weak, passive and powerless.

Goodmark (2009) Douglas (2012)

Mothers who experience domestic and family violence have a duty to keep the family together and to protect the children from violence.

Douglas & Walsh (2010) Wilcox (2006) Croucher (2014)

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, Report 114 (2010).

- This report provides a comprehensive overview of Australian law and legislation concerning family violence.
- p300-04: features of family violence including its gendered nature and occurrence across all areas of society.

- p1111-14; 1220: outlines myths and misconceptions about women, children and sexual assault, including those held by juries.

Bruton, Crystal and Danielle Tyson, 'Leaving Violent Men: A Study of Women's Experiences of Separation in Victoria, Australia' (2017) 51(3) Australian & New Zealand Journal of Criminology 339-354.

This article explores women's experiences of leaving abusive relationships and seeks to combat assumptions about the nature of such relationships through in-depth interviews with 12 women who had separated from their male intimate partners (p 5). While separation is broadly recognised as a key time for increased risk of violence towards women and their children (p 1), studies demonstrate that most people believe women are able to leave violent relationships, and do not understand why they might stay (p 2). Such views place the responsibility for ending the violence on women, but in reality, these relationships often include complex circumstances, and the 'stay/leave binary' is rarely applicable (p 2). The results indicate that women's experiences of coercive control significantly affected their decision-making in the context of separation (p 6):

- Many women feared leaving because they were aware that separation may provoke retaliatory violence, with some experiencing an escalation of abusive behaviour when they attempted to leave (p 7);
- Many women were motivated to leave the relationship in order to protect their children, especially where violence became directed towards the children (p 8);
- Women's attempts to leave their relationships were often hindered by their partner's control over their finances (p 9); and
- Women adopted strategies to manage their safety both during and following separation (pp 9-10), and many women experienced escalating violence after separation (pp 11-12).

Chisholm, Richard, Family Courts Violence Review (Commonwealth Attorney General's Department, 2009).

This report discusses the issue of false allegations or statements made by parties to proceedings in relation to family violence

Cox, Peta, Violence against women in Australia: Additional analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012 (ANROWS, 2016 Rev.ed.).

This report analyses the results of the 2012 Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey. Key sections in particular that relate to myths and misunderstandings are sections one and three, described below.

Section one: Violence experienced by women and men (from p20)

This section begins with an analysis of the prevalence of violence experienced by women and men (including specific forms of violence) and then proceeds to analyse perpetrator demographics, basic incident characteristics and key post-incident actions and impacts.

Statistical data reveals the higher prevalence of women experiencing violence perpetrated by 'opposite sex perpetrators' (pp30-33). For example, since the age of 15, 1.5million women have experienced violence by a cohabiting partner. Since the age of 15, 0.45million men have experienced violence by a cohabiting partner (p31). Almost all women who had experienced violence by a cohabiting partner reported that this violence was perpetrated by a male: 1,470,200 reported violence by a male partner. This is one in six women in Australia (16.8%). Most men who experienced violence were victimised by female partners: 427,900 had experienced violence perpetrated by a female partner. This is one in 20 men in Australia (5.1%)(p31).

Section three: Women's experiences of partner violence (from p76)

This section provides a detailed examination of the PSS data relating to women's experiences of partner violence. It presents findings such as:

- Close to 2.2 million women have experienced at least one incident of violence by a male intimate partner: this is one in four women (25.1%) (p79).
- For women who were in a relationship with their violent cohabiting partner at the time of the survey, two thirds had experienced more than one incident of abuse (154,500, 65.1%) (p82).
- Most women did not permanently leave their violent partner the first time that they separated (p 104). The most common reasons for returning to a violent partner were that the partner promised to stop assaults, threats or abuse; commitment to the relationship; and for the sake of the children (p 120).
- 81,900 women have wanted to leave their violent current (at the time of the survey) partner, but never have (p 120).

- Two out of five women experienced violence while temporarily separated from their violent former male cohabiting partner, and six out of ten of these women reported an increase in violence during the separation (p 121).
- 1 in 4 employed women who had experienced violence took time off work as a result of their most recent incident of physical assault by a male cohabitating partner (p 116).
- Women who live with their perpetrator reported feeling fear and anxiety after their most recent incident at a higher rate than women who experienced violence by an other known male (not cohabiting partner) or stranger (p 116).
- Two thirds of women had changes in routine due to fear or anxiety as a result of the violence of a former male cohabiting partner, including sleeping habits, social/leisure activities, and building or maintaining relationships (p 119).

Pages 105-107 contain flowcharts demonstrating the small numbers of physical and sexual assaults that result in court appearances. Section 4.4 (Psychological impacts, from p116) discusses the levels of fear and anxiety experienced by women following violence perpetrated by a current or former cohabiting partner.

Note: this article refers to an old release of the ABS' Personal Safety Survey, but the analysis remains useful. See Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2016.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Hayes, Alan, and Daryl Higgins (eds), Families, Policies and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

Explores conflicting expectations of mothers concerning parenting orders, child protection and family violence (p210-11).

Douglas, Heather, 'The Criminal Law's Response to Domestic Violence: What's Going On?' (2008) 30 Sydney Law Review 439.

'The Queensland data discussed in this article demonstrates that the process involved in prosecuting a criminal breach often involves a minimisation of the harm inflicted on women by perpetrators, police and magistrates, a ruthless contest about the facts and numerous court appearances before resolution. Prosecutions of breaches of protection orders often result in no conviction being recorded or in trivialising fines.'

- Minimisation of harm by police and prosecution (p447-453) – decision to charge the breach in preference to the more serious criminal offences (i.e. stalking, assault or criminal damage).
- Defendants' minimisation of harm and responsibility (p459) – defendants attempting to shift the blame to another source including via claims of provocation, intoxication or child related matters (p461).
- Where magistrates recommended relationship counselling on the basis that both parties had accepted blame for the husband's violence of the husband, violence and responsibility of perpetrator are minimised (p463).

Douglas, Heather, 'A Consideration of the Merits of Specialised Homicide Offences and Defences for Battered Women' (2012) 45 (3) Australian and New Zealand Journal of Criminology 367.

This article reviews the underlying debates relating to the 2005 Victorian offence of 'defensive homicide' and the 2010 Queensland defence titled 'killing for preservation in an abusive domestic relationship' and examines recent case law to consider the application of these two approaches and their effectiveness in light of what they were designed to achieve.

In two of the cases, the author notes that the female killers were perhaps 'benchmark' battered women. Both were smaller than their partners, white, drug-free, monogamous and without a criminal record. They suffered fierce physical abuse over many years, actively protected their children from the abuser and the killing was, apparently, the first time they had physically fought back. Both had attempted to leave the relationship and both had sought assistance from the police in the past. In both cases the abuser had harmed animals and threatened their own children with violence. In comparison, other women's cases reviewed in this article fell short of the benchmark in some way. One was Indigenous, larger than the deceased; she had drug and alcohol issues, a criminal record and had been in a series of violent relationships; and there was evidence she had fought back before. Another was intimidated and harassed by her abuser but there was limited physical assault in the relationship.

While the cases reviewed in this article demonstrate that an individual woman's experience of abuse is now a significant and relevant consideration at trial and in sentencing, the latter cases show that it remains very difficult for battered women to meet the threshold required to succeed in a claim of self-defence. While not all homicide cases where battered women kill should result in an acquittal on the basis of self-defence it may be that certain stereotypes about battered women continue to inform the choices made by prosecution authorities and juries and sometimes these stereotypes may continue to obscure structural and racial disadvantage (Stubbs and Tolmie, 2008).

Douglas, Heather, and Tamara Walsh, 'Mothers, Domestic Violence and Child Protection' (2010) 16(5) Violence Against Women 489.

This paper outlines common misunderstandings alleged about child protection workers in relation to the dynamics of domestic violence, for example:

- Domestic violence is seen as a relationship issue (p492).
- Mothers are construed as having the responsibility to care for the children, and then blamed for the domestic violence and the consequent failure to protect their children (p493-494).
- Mothers are given the 'leave ultimatum' – leave the perpetrator or lose the kids. When, "in many cases, women make an assessment that it is safer for both themselves and their children to stay in a violent situation rather than leave … research has shown that one of the most dangerous times for an abused woman is in the months after separation" (p498).

Francia, L., Millear, P., & Sharman R., 'Addressing family violence post separation – mothers and fathers' experiences from Australia' (2019) Journal of Child Custody.

Family violence has been described as the 'core business of the Family Court', and child custody decisions continue to be made on a discretionary basis in the best interests of the child. The study focuses on family violence and separated parents' experiences in the Australian family law system. By means of an analysis of (n40) interviews of separated mothers and fathers, it found that contact with the Australian family law system caused considerable anxiety and distress. Separated parents noted gendered narratives within the system, with mothers referred to as 'alienating' or 'vindictive' and fathers referred to as 'abusers' or 'perpetrators'. The majority of parents also noted that their concerns, primarily around family violence, were rarely taken seriously. When parents reported concerns for their own or their children's safety, they were either not believed or experienced lip service of their concerns without appropriate investigation. Further, separated parents found that professionals, such as child protection workers, judges, police and independent children's lawyers, lacked adequate knowledge or competence in relation to family violence. They also noted coercion by some professionals within the family law system. The article also highlights the 'devastating emotional and psychological aftermath' experienced not only by separated parents, but also their children. In summary, the authors suggest that the Australian family law system may not sufficiently meet the complex needs of families experiencing family violence.

Hunter, Rosemary, 'Narratives of Domestic Violence' (2006) 28 Sydney Law Review 733.

This paper identifies judicial knowledge and attitudes about domestic violence in the context of domestic violence protection order and family court proceedings, for example:

- Tendency to focus on incidents of physical violence, considered more compelling than other forms of abuse. The implication of this limited focus is that magistrates failed to understand why women remained fearful of the perpetrator post separation (p756-7).
- Failure to appreciate the ongoing psychological impacts of serious assault (p757).
- A belief that violence is a product of the relationship for which both are parties responsible; assumption that violence would stop post separation (p758).
- Mutual orders overlook power differentials in the abusive relationship and hence fail to ensure the applicant's safety, in turn reinforcing the respondent's power and control (p761-2).
- Tendency to minimise the violence and shift the blame (p766).
- Widespread acceptance of unsubstantiated narrative that women make false allegations of violence and apply for intervention orders to gain a tactical advantage in family law proceedings (p768).
- Widespread acceptance of cultural stereotypes of ethnic women seeking redress and protection against violence (p771).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated

Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family law and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of the practices and perspectives of family law system professionals(n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- the Court Outcomes Project (CO Project) involving:
    - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
    - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts; and
    - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Lievore, Denise, 'Prosecutorial Decisions in Adult Sexual Assault Cases: An Australian Study' (Report, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

- Study of the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in adult sexual assault cases across the Australian jurisdictions in which the primary charge was rape or the equivalent penetrative sexual assault offence.
- Relevant for myths concerning sexual violence as an element of family violence. Cases 'involving strangers and other known defendants were more likely than cases involving intimate or family relationships to proceed through the criminal justice process and to end in conviction'
- In those that proceeded, the victim was more likely to have been injured, and to have expressed non-consent either in words or through resistance; the assault was more severe in some way (for example, it involved a weapon); additional evidence was available; the defendant used force; the defendant was 'non-Caucasian'; and the defendant was a stranger.

Melville, Angela, and Rosemary Hunter, '"As Everybody Knows": Countering Myths of Gender Bias in Family Law' (2001) 10 Griffith Law Review 124.

This paper argues that empirical research does not support the claim that 'everybody knows the family law system is biased against men'. Although dated, this paper raises three common myths that remain relevant today:

- Women fabricate allegations of violence and abuse to gain a tactical advantage in family law disputes and deny father's contact to their children.
  - This study did not find evidence of this i.e. 54% of family law cases examined contained evidence of DV, of these cases, 38% of these involved cases where a protection order was not obtained, meaning it appeared women were more reluctant to take out a protection order (p128)
  - Timing of protection orders (contemporaneous with family orders) may reflect the fact that the need for protection escalates at the time of separation.
- Rates of DV against women are overrated and DV against men is silenced.
  - This claim uses the 'Conflict Tactics Scale', which records violent behaviour but does not rate or discount their relative severity or degree of injury caused.

- There is also no distinction between aggression and self-defence – focused on act of violence, not locus of power and control in overall relationship, producing a distorted view of DV.

- The system stacked against men
  - Contact orders made in 91% of cases; in cases where no contact made there were extenuating circumstances i.e. abuse, mental illness, drug and alcohol abuse.

Meyer, Silke, 'Why Women Stay: A Theoretical Examination of Rational Choice and Moral Reasoning in the Context of Intimate Partner Violence' (2012) 45(2) Australian and New Zealand Journal of Criminology 179.

'Using data from face-to-face interviews conducted with 29 women in Southeast Queensland who experienced severe forms of intimate partner violence over an extended period, this paper explores the rationale behind the (initial) decision to stay with an abusive partner.' (p179) Children and financial dependence were both salient factors in decision-making.

Murray, Suellen, and Anastacia Powell, 'What's The Problem? Australian Public Policy Constructions of Domestic and Family Violence' (2009) 15(5) Violence Against Women 532.

- Examines key Australian domestic violence policies as at November 2006 and how they represent particular values and beliefs about domestic violence.
- Discusses employing domestic violence within a gendered framework, thus recognising that domestic violence is experienced predominantly by women and perpetuated predominately by men (p539-541)
- Critics of the gendered analysis instead construct policy in terms of promotion of family harmony and family preservation. Many also suggest that domestic violence is caused by family breakdown and attribute some men's use of violence as a result of bias in the family law system (p541)
- Discusses definitions of family violence across different jurisdictions and community perceptions of what constitutes family violence (p543-547).

Noonan, Patrick, Annabel Taylor and Jackie Burke, Links between alcohol consumption and domestic and sexual violence against women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This literature review found that "there is little evidence that alcohol use is a primary cause of violence against women. The paper does, however, identify that there are clear associations, and in some cases, strong correlations between alcohol use and violence against women, including, for instance, in the severity of the violence." The relationship between alcohol and violence against women manifests in three ways:

- Alcohol use is linked with the perpetration of violence against women.
- Alcohol use is linked with women's victimisation by violence.
- Alcohol is used as a coping strategy by women who have experienced violence

NSW Domestic Violence Death Review Team, Report 2017-2019 , 2020, NSW Government.

Includes detail on deaths referred to the Coroner, drawing on both data analysis and in-depth case analyses. Useful information about how domestic violence-related homicides and suicides are recorded in NSW.

Ragusa, Angela, 'Rural Australian Women's Legal Help Seeking for Intimate Partner Violence: Women Intimate Partner Violence Victim Survivors: Perceptions of Criminal Justice Support Services' (2012) 28(4) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 685.

Study examines legal support access and experiences by intimate partner violence survivors in rural communities, drawing on 36 in-depth face-to-face interviews. Contains numerous useful excerpts from interviews with rural Australian women experiencing domestic violence, for example:

'When you're in DV, you don't have … time to get up in the morning and you wouldn't be allowed to get dressed up. We wouldn't be allowed to wear makeup and he would be asking where 'ya going, what 'ya doing, so it does, it does interfere with your whole life … there is a lot of women who work and suffer DV, but there are a lot of us who don't because we are housebound, where that's, you know, DV. We're controlled, and that's where he can control you. He can't control us out in the workforce' (p700).

Wakefield, Shellee, and Annabel Taylor, 'Judicial Education on Family Violence: State of Knowledge Paper' (State of Knowledge Paper 2, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety Landscapes, June 2015).

This research paper examines the need for judicial education in domestic and family violence, based on the overall views of Victorian and Queensland judicial officers surveyed for the study which demonstrated a lack of understanding of the dynamics of domestic violence.

Findings include:

- 74% of magistrates agreed with the statement that women use domestic violence tactics as a tactic in family law matters (p17);
- Some judicial officers subscribed to the myth that a woman could leave the relationship if she made the choice to do so (p18).

Notes other complexities of domestic violence that are relevant to judicial officers' responses including:

- The importance of understanding how the demeanour of the victims/perpetrators vary in the courtroom. For instance, perpetrators may appear calm and charming, while victims present as angry and emotional (p18);
- Being aware that 'Studies have also found that males are more likely to blame the victim for domestic violence' (p20).

International

Buel, Sarah, 'Fifty Obstacles to Leaving a.k.a. Why Abuse Victims Stay' (1999) 28(10) The Colorado Lawyer 19.

Sets out the various pressures both external and internal on victims considering or endeavouring to escape abusive relationships

DeKerseredy, Walter, Molly Dragiewicz and Martin Schwartz, Abusive endings: Separation and divorce violence against women (University of California Press, 2017).

In this American publication the authors analyse sociological research to consider why and how men abuse women during and after a separation or divorce. They define separation violence broadly, as sometimes the separation is emotional distancing rather than physically leaving a shared home. They argue that separation assault is common and show how new technologies increase women's vulnerability to separation assault. They consider the role of the Family Court in keeping women connected to abusive fathers.

Goodmark, Leigh, 'Reframing Domestic Violence Law and Policy: An Anti-Essentialist Proposal' (2009) 31 Washington University Journal of Law and Policy 39.

- Provides an in-depth analysis of the construction of a stereotypical victim of domestic violence as white, straight, middle-class, weak, passive, and powerless (pp40; 45).
- Describes Walker's model of domestic violence – the 'cycle of violence' and how it became entrenched as the benchmark against which other women's claims of DV would be tested (p42).
- Basing law and policy on theories such as Walker's is problematic as it can exclude or overlook women who do not conform to the profiles envisaged by those theories (p44).
- Critical to pay attention to the complexities of the lives of individual women rather than reductions of commonly reported domestic violence experiences with DV (p40).

Hamel, John, Perpetrator or victim? A review of the complexities of domestic violence cases, (2020) 12(2) Journal of Aggression, Conflict and Peace Research 55-62

This study reviews the research on the merits of public policy and law enforcement responses to IPV in the US using prevalence rates and dynamics of IPV. In particular, Hamel examines the issues associated with categorising individuals as either victims or perpetrators, and the failure to recognise the complexity of IPV. Laws against IPV are enforced more rigorously in the US compared with other parts of the word. However, many perpetrators are not "brought to justice", and mandatory arrest laws may result in arrests being made on limited evidence. Further, prosecutors often proceed with a prosecution even when the victim recants. Under these circumstances, determining a defendant's guilt is problematic, and the arrest and prosecution of potentially innocent individuals violates due process.

These findings may be explained by two key factors, namely, the 'gender paradigm' and the complex nature of IPV. Research indicates that IPV is a complex phenomenon, involving heterogeneous populations, varying degrees of severity and a highly imperfect, politicised judicial system response. It cannot be easily framed in binary victim/perpetrator terms. According to results from general population studies, in approximately 60% of intimate relationships where IPV occurs, the physical violence is mutual and initiated by both partners. These results, however, are not well-understood among legal professionals who tend to consider IPV through a 'gender paradigm' lens.

Stark, Evan, 'Representing Battered Women: Coercive Control and the Defense of Liberty' (Paper presented at Violence Against Women: Complex Realities and New Issues in a Changing World, Les Presses de l'Université du Québec, 21 October 2012).

- Identifies the shortcomings of domestic violence laws that respond to incident-specific violence in which abuse is defined by discrete episodes of force.
- Outlines alternative model of 'coercive control' and discusses its prevalence, features, and damaging effects.
- 'Perpetrators use control tactics to compel obedience indirectly by depriving victims of vital resources and support systems, exploiting them, dictating preferred choices and micro-managing their behavior by establishing "rules" for everyday living' (p11).

Wilcox, Paula, 'Communities, Care and Domestic Violence' (2006) 26(4) Critical Social Policy 722.

This paper explores informal community-based work as an additional strategy to tackle domestic violence and discusses a number of common misconceptions:

- The problematic widespread perception of domestic violence as discrete incidents rather than as an ongoing process, quoting Harwin and Barron: "domestic violence is not a 'one-off event' or incident but part of an ongoing pattern of controlling behaviour. Often very subtle signals can be extremely threatening: violence does not have to be overt to achieve its ends." (p724)
- 'The internalization and acceptance of mainstream, traditional explanations – for example that male perpetrators are 'bad apples', or mentally ill, or have suffered a 'cycle of violence' or that some women deserve violence owing to their own behaviour – is not uncommon' (p729)

- Common expectation that it is the woman's role to keep the family together (p731), and individually manage the care of her children (p738). Also discusses the tension experienced by women living with domestic violence between needing to self-care and at the same time not jeopardising their ability to care for their children (p738).
- Discusses the stigmatized identity and loneliness women experience after leaving an abusive partner (p732) and also the increased risk of abuse, murder and rape after separation (p734).
- 'The misleading assumption is that domestic violence occurs between two 'equal' individuals, and is often constructed as a problem of intimacy or 'relationship rivalry' (p735).

Yamawaki, Niwako, et al, 'Perceptions of Domestic Violence: The Effects of Domestic Violence Myths, Victim's Relationship with Her Abuser, and the Decision to Return to Her Abuser' (2012) 27(16) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 3195.

Analyses attitudes towards domestic violence, in particular that a woman can, if she wants, swiftly and successfully end a violent relationship by simply leaving her abuser (p3198). Although many women are motivated to leave their abusive relationships, a myriad of factors stand in their way, making the decision to return to abusers more likely, such as (pp3196-7):

- the perception that the rewards of the relationship outweigh the costs of separation;
- when she is unemployed, her combined family income is high, or when she has negative perceptions of herself;
- lack of financial resources, inadequate help from police or from other formal support systems, lack of a place to go; and
- difficulties in relocation, legal issues, sharing child custody, termination of the emotional connection with the abuser, and disrupted social networks.
- 'One of the most important factors that led women to successfully leave their abusers was the realization that they had access to resources and support from others' (p3197).

Myths and misunderstandings - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

7.1 notes that insufficient account is taken of the realities of the female experience of sexual assault and domestic violence, and discusses the statistical incidence of women as victims of domestic violence, domestic homicide and sexual assault. 7.5.2 discusses cultural and social attitudes to domestic violence.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

This Bench Book provides insight into domestic violence, in particular under the section 'Gender Equality', countering a number of myths and misunderstandings including:

- Domestic and family violence only affects particular groups of people: 'when approaching issues of family violence, stereotypes about the gender of abusers and victims should be avoided: all family members, regardless of gender/sex or age, may be affected. Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) specifically acknowledges this by identifying a 'relevant relationship' as an intimate personal relationship, a family relationship or an informal care relationship' (p.29).
- Men and women are equally victims and perpetrators of domestic and family violence: 'There is evidence that women are the most common victims of domestic violence' (p.171). 'It is significantly more common for a woman to be the victim of physical violence at the hands of a partner or another person she knows than at the hands of a stranger. This is also consistent with the profile of victims of sexual assault reported to the police; the perpetrator is likely to be known to the victim and the most commonly reported location where sexual offences occur is in a residential setting'.
- A victim of domestic and family violence is able to leave the abusive relationship: 'Members of the judiciary, court staff and legal practitioners responding to cases of domestic violence should be aware of the fact that leaving a violent relationship is often extremely difficult, on emotional and practical levels. Women may stay in violent relationships for various reasons: financial dependence, the presence of children in the relationship (and manipulation by their partner concerning this), a sense of isolation and lack of external support, and the threat of further or worse violence if the relationship is ended. Extended abuse over a period of time may cause women to enter a state of permanent fear or “learned helplessness”, which describes a developed inability to see a way out of their situation or to work out how to protect oneself in the face of random and variable violence’ (p.172).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.2.7 discusses myths about family violence and the potential for unconscious prejudice. Also see discussion about violence as a choice under 5.4.1 – men’s use of violence towards family members, and 5.6.3 – myth: violence against some women is an accepted part of some cultures.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

This Bench Book provides the following comments, countering a number of myths and misunderstandings:

- Unequal perpetration of violence: The higher prevalence of women experiencing physical assaults by current or previous partners [10.1.7]; and the differing experiences of violence by men and women [13.2 and 13.4]; see especially [13.2.1] ‘Key statistics’ exploring the statistics around the gendered nature of domestic violence; [13.2.2] ‘Impacts on women’ detailing the impacts of violence on women; [13.2.4] ‘Risk factors for women’
- Sexual assault as a form of domestic violence: ‘Where the relationship between victim and offender was stated, most sexual assault victims had some form of relationship with the offender (78%).’ [10.1.7.2]
- Women are not passive/helpless: ‘One such theory was that women who had been repeatedly victimised suffered from “learned helplessness” as a result. This prevented them from resisting violence or leaving a violent relationship. This theory proved inadequate as further research highlighted the many social, economic and cultural reasons why women do not leave relationships; what is more, it is inconsistent with the many ways in which women in such relationships attempt to leave or often act in very conscious ways to minimise the abuse directed at them and to protect their children.’ [13.7.1]
- Abuse will stop post-separation: ‘Nearly all the women (97.5%) in one study had experienced violence or abuse after separation, and many described an increase in violence immediately post-separation, although some said that it had later declined or, in a small number of instances, ceased as time passed' [13.7.1]; 'Statistically, the most dangerous time for a victim in a violent relationship is at separation or after leaving the relationship.' [13.9.4]

- Not easy to leave the relationship: 'It is not easy for a victim to leave a violent relationship — it takes considerable emotional and practical strength for an abused and frightened victim to do this, particularly if the victim is a parent and children are involved. Many who do leave or threaten to leave are coerced into returning or staying by threats or further violence from their partner. There are often insufficient support and protection structures to enable a victim to either leave or leave safely. This can be even more difficult for Aboriginal victims, victims from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, victims with disabilities and victims in rural and remote locations. Statistically, the most dangerous time for a victim in a violent relationship is at separation or after leaving the relationship.' [13.9.4]
- Section [13.1.1] notes the under-reporting of assaults against women

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Neilson addresses numerous myths throughout the Bench Book including:

- Myths about children: e.g. domestic violence does not harm children, very young children are less affected (Sections 6.2.5 and 6.2.6);
- It is easy and safe to leave a relationship (Section 4.4 Understanding & interpreting evidence of domestic violence): there are 'multiple reasons female victims of violence do not leave violent relationships. Reasons include economic necessity, traumatic bonding, loss of self-esteem, immigration status, love and or emotional dependency, lack of alternative housing, inadequate legal protection, lack of access to economic resources, protection of children, and fear' (Section 4.4.4);
- Abuse stops once separated: '[d]omestic violence does not necessarily end with separation, sometimes it gets worse' (Section 17.6.7.6); 'Contrary to popular belief, separation can increase the risk of serious forms of DV, especially for women' (Section 8.14.2);
- False allegations: '[s]purious child-abuse claims against the custodial parent are common' in cases where the perpetrator employs litigation abuse; however, generally, malicious known-to-be-false allegations of child abuse are rare (Section 7.4.23);

- Partner provoking or equally responsible for violence: minimization techniques involve claims that acts of violence were defensive, and that the abuse and violence was mutual (Supplementary Reference 3);
- Drugs and alcohol cause domestic violence: ‘experts agree that drugs and alcohol are more a rationalization than a cause’ of domestic violence; judicial responses should avoid comments that could ‘give the impression that intoxication has been accepted as a cause of the domestic violence, thus absolving the perpetrator of personal responsibility; [or] encourage false and potentially dangerous expectations among perpetrators and family members that limiting alcohol and drugs will stop the domestic violence problem’ (Section 7.2.1);
- Abuse only affects particular groups of people: while particular groups may be more vulnerable, ‘domestic violence homicide with suicide crosses all gender, age, socioeconomic, professional and cultural boundaries’ (Section 8.14.8).

Myths and misunderstandings - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Celia

Erin

Francis

Julia

Lisa

Sally

Sandra

Factors affecting risk

Overview

The following factors are commonly identified in academic literature, domestic violence death reviews [Death Reviews] and a range of risk assessment tools as key signifiers of risk for the escalation of domestic and family violence. It is not an exhaustive list and other resources may include additional factors. The distinguishing characteristic of domestic and family violence is that it can present in many forms and can occur within a variety of relationships and is most likely to involve a complex pattern of controlling behaviour and violence over a period of time, rather than a single incident. This is often referred to as coercive control. One study has described coercive control as the 'golden thread' running through risk identification and assessment for domestic violence [Myhill & Hohl 2019]. It is likely therefore that risk will heighten where a perpetrator increasingly engages in multiple forms of violence or abuse, or does so more frequently, intensely or severely. Judicial recognition of this is critical to understanding the ongoing and ever-changing risks of domestic and family violence unique to the circumstances of each case before the court, and the need to regularly reassess risk throughout the course of judicial proceedings [Bench guide for recognizing dangerousness in domestic violence cases]. It is also important to recognise, more broadly, that certain groups within the community as identified in this bench book may be at greater risk of experiencing domestic and family violence, and may be more vulnerable to its impacts. Some people may belong to multiple groups that have been identified as being particularly at risk of domestic and family violence.

It has become increasingly common for agencies, including police, to employ risk assessment tools in an attempt to identify victims at risk of escalation of domestic and family violence victimisation, and in particular, intimate partner homicide. Those tools are only effective if they accurately identify those victims who are at significant risk. Recent research has observed that risk assessment tools which fail to take account of the gendered nature of domestic and family violence may be ineffective [Toivonen et al 2018].

Victim fear

According to an evaluation of risk assessment tools carried out in NSW the victim's self-perception of risk of future intimate partner violence is one of the strongest predictors of future intimate partner violence [Leung &

Trimboli 2022]. A victim's intuitive sense of being in danger has been identified as a key lethality indicator present in 53.2 per cent of intimate partner violence related homicides recorded in Queensland between 2011 and 2018 [Qld Death Review 2022]. It is vital that victims are believed, regardless of how agencies assess their presentation. The Queensland Death Review and Advisory Board observed that agencies had assessed risk with a focus on the victims' presentation rather than victims' expressed concerns for their safety, and resulted in failures to refer victims to High-Risk teams for support. The Queensland Death Review and Advisory Board further observed that victims who do not fit agency understandings of the "ideal victim" may not have their fears taken seriously if they present as 'jovial' or 'happy', resulting in miscalculation of actual level of risk or potential future harm. Regardless of presentation, victim fear and help-seeking behaviours were the highest level lethality indicator observed across the period examined in the Queensland Death Review and Advisory Board Annual Report 2021-22 [Qld Death Review 2022].

Past domestic and family violence and escalation

The risk of life-threatening injury or death is reported to be higher where the past violence experienced by a victim occurred within the last year and included at least one incident where the perpetrator used or threatened to use a firearm or knife [Folkes et al 2012] or strangled or choked the victim [Glass et al 2008], or where the perpetrator made a death threat of any kind to the victim [Campbell et al 2003a], or where the frequency or severity of incidents of threatened or actual physical violence increased in the lead up to the life-threatening injury or death. Some victims however may never experience any form of actual or threatened physical violence and yet may still be at risk of death; in some reported cases, the homicide is the first incident. However, in many of these cases the homicide was preceded by coercive and controlling behaviour [NSW DV Death Review 2021]. In these cases, there may be other important signifiers of risk evident in the perpetrator's behaviour, such as: physical violence outside the intimate relationship; misuse of alcohol or drugs; intense jealousy towards the victim; or exercising a high level of prolonged control over the victim's daily activities and life [Block 2009]. Research demonstrates links between the experience of domestic and family violence and the development of mental health conditions in victims and this may place victims at risk of self-harm and suicide.

An escalation in victim experience of domestic and family violence was observed in 37 percent of intimate partner homicides recorded in Queensland between 2011 and 2018 [Qld Death Review 2022]. The presentation of victims to agencies on multiple occasions may be an indication that violence is escalating in frequency and severity, heightening risk of death and serious injury. Indicators of escalation may include:

- Victims taking further protective action, such as seeking to vary a protection order by strengthening conditions may indicate a change in circumstances or that current conditions are ineffective;
- Victim action to secure safety of children through legal processes may increase potential risk of violence.

Non-fatal strangulation

US research [Training Institute of Strangulation Prevention] indicates that women who had experienced non-fatal strangulation by the perpetrator in the last year were twice as likely to be killed as women who had not [Block 2009]. Women who had experienced non-fatal strangulation were also six times more likely to be a victim of attempted murder by their abusive partner [Glass et al 2008]. Strangulation is sometimes referred to as garrotting or choking. Strangulation has been identified as one of the behaviours that often forms part of a pattern of behaviours underpinning coercive control. A recent Western Australian study highlights the strong association between non-fatal strangulation and intimate partner sexual assault [Zilkins et al 2016].

Weapons and threats to kill

Limited Australian research in this area necessitates referencing Canadian and US sources. It is important to note that firearms are more prevalent and easier to obtain in the US than in Canada and Australia. A Canadian study found that where a firearm was present in the home, the risk of severe harm caused by weapons was heightened. This was the case even though the firearm was generally not used, and the harm was caused by another kind of weapon [Folkes et al 2012].

American research [Campbell et al 2003a] indicates that the severity of abuse related harm is significantly heightened when weapons are involved. Studies found that women whose abusers used or threatened use of a weapon were 20 times more likely to be killed (with or without a weapon) than women whose abusers did not use or threaten weapon use. A Chicago study of women subjected to lethal and non-lethal harm found that 23 per cent of abuse incidents involving a firearm had a lethal outcome. In the same study, 35 per cent of incidents involving a knife had a lethal outcome [Block 2009]. An analysis of the results from 17 studies that measured completed or attempted intimate partner homicide found that the perpetrator's direct access to guns increased the likelihood of intimate partner homicide compared to intimate partner violence by 11 times [Spencer & Stith 2020].

Separation

Victims, and their family and friends, may not always recognise domestic and family violence where there has been a prolonged history of controlling behaviours by the perpetrator and no acts of physical violence or harm. For some victims, leaving an intimate relationship will be the first time they identify an experience of domestic and family violence by their former partner, although research suggests that usually there are indications of controlling behaviours within the relationship prior to separation. Where violence has occurred during the relationship, it is common for perpetrators to continue or escalate the violence after separation in an attempt to gain or reassert control over the victim, or to punish the victim for leaving the relationship [Fleury et al 2000]. Where women leave an intimate relationship and first experience or continue to experience violence after separation, their former partner may experience an intense sense of loss of control and the violent response may be severe, life threatening or lethal [McFarlane et al 2002]. The Queensland Domestic and Family Violence Review and Advisory Board in its 2022 Annual Report noted a strong correlation between separation and homicide. Between 1 July 2016 and 30 June 2022, 50.6 per cent of Queensland victims of intimate partner homicide were known to have separated (40.5 per cent) or intended (10.1) to separate from the perpetrator [Qld Death Review 2022]. In the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015 42.1 per cent of the 38 family violence intimate partner homicide incidents in Victoria between 2011 and 2015 involved individuals who had separated, 23.7 per cent in the three months preceding their death and 15.8 per cent involved individuals with intention to separate or separation pending [Vic Systemic Review 2020].

The NSW Domestic Violence Death Review Team Annual Report 2019-2021 recorded that in 61.3 percent of all intimate partner homicides where a female was killed by a former partner, the victim and perpetrator had separated within three months of the killing and where a female was killed by a current partner in 51.1 per cent of cases one or both parties had indicated an intent to end the relationship, most often within three months of the killing, concluding that in over two thirds of intimate partner homicides involving a female victim and male offender the relationship had ended or was breaking down [NSW DV Death Review 2021]. This indicates that the period during and directly after separation may be high risk for women in relationships involving domestic and family violence. The Australian Bureau of Statistics reported that in 2019 domestic and family violence-related homicide victims accounted for over a third of the total number, and females accounted for almost two-thirds of all victims [ABS FDV-related offences 2021].

Importantly, in the context of separating parents, there is also an increased risk of harm to children's psychological and physical wellbeing due to exposure to domestic violence, history of maltreatment, parental stress, social isolation of the family, and inadequate resources and support [Jaffe et al 2014].

Pregnancy of victim

The NSW Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues found that pregnant women are 230 per cent more likely than non-pregnant women to experience domestic and family violence [NSW Social Issues Report 2012]. 47.5 per cent of the respondents in the 2016 Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Survey had experienced violence by a former partner while pregnant. For 24.1 per cent of these respondents, pregnancy was the first time they had experienced violence. Of the respondents who had experienced violence by a current partner, 18.per cent experienced the violence during pregnancy, 5.2 per cent for the first time [ABS PSS 2016]. Notably in the United States homicide is a leading cause of death during pregnancy and the postpartum period – with the majority of these homicides occurring in the home-pregnancy and the postpartum period are recognised as times of elevated risk for homicide among all females of reproductive age [Wallace et al 2021].

Misuse of alcohol or drugs by perpetrator

National death review data indicates that problematic substance abuse was a factor in over 60 per cent of homicides where a male offender killed a female victim. A quarter of male homicide offenders engaged in problematic drug and alcohol use in the lead up to or at the time of the homicide, over half engaged in problematic alcohol use at the time of the homicide (27.1 per cent used alcohol and no other drug) and one third engaged in problematic drug use in the lead up to or at the time of the homicide (8.3 per cent engaged in problematic drug use only) [ADFVDRN & ANROWS 2022]. The Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015 found that 35.3 per cent of family violence homicide offenders misused substances at the time of the fatal incident [Vic Systemic Review 2020]. The accessibility of alcohol also has a relationship to the risk of violence. Australian research indicates that rates of violence are heightened in areas where takeaway alcohol is available for purchase [Livingston 2010].

Stalking

In assessing the relative significance of risk factors for predicting lethal or near lethal harm to victims of domestic and family violence, a large sample size study across ten US cities revealed that significantly more of the women killed or nearly killed than those who were not had histories of stalking in their abusive relationships. The same study indicated that being "followed or spied on" by the abuser in the 12 months before the lethal or near lethal incident resulted in a nearly 2.5-fold risk [McFarlane et al 2002]. A later study showed that psychological abuse and stalking contributed uniquely to the prediction of severe injuries [Mechanic et al 2008]. The New South Wales Domestic Violence Death Review Team's 2021 report identified that almost a third of the 245 female intimate partner homicide victims killed by a male predominant abuser had been stalked during the relationship. In over half of the 109 cases where the relationship had ended the male predominant abuser stalked the female predominant victim after the relationship had ended [NSW DV Death Review 2021].

Coercive and controlling, jealous, obsessive behaviours by the perpetrator

Findings from the New South Wales Domestic Violence Death Review Team's 2019-2021 Report indicate a strong correlation between accounts of coercive control in relationships prior to homicide; of male homicide perpetrators identified as the predominant abuser:

- 96.7 per cent used emotional and/or psychological abuse against the female predominant victim before the homicide, including verbal denigration, threats regarding child custody, victim-blaming, gaslighting, exploiting a victim's mental illness, unfounded allegations of infidelity and threats of self-harm or suicide to control a victim.
- 15.1 per cent had an identifiable history of sexual abuse (this figure is suspected to not reflect the true prevalence of sexual abuse in these relationships);
- 59.2 per cent used social violence against the female predominant victim, including controlling the victim's contact with family and friends, abuse, threats or rudeness to the victim's friends or family, intentional relocation away from support networks, friends and family, restricting access to transport, and controlling the victim's personal appearance;
- 31.4 per cent used economic and/or financial violence against the female predominant victim, including withholding and controlling use of and access to money, scrutinising spending and unrealistic expectations for expenditure on necessities, preventing the victim from working or controlling wages and coerced debt.

- 30.6 per cent stalked the female predominant victim during the relationship and 51.4 per cent did so after the relationship had ended, including physical following, hiring someone to surveil the victim, loitering near or breaking into the victim's home or work, reading a victim's diary, using devices to track the victim's location, persistently messaging a victim's phone or social media, maintaining surveillance over the victim's phone, email or other accounts, covertly recording the victim's activities, and engaging with the victim on social media/dating sites under a false identity.

In addition, 72.7 per cent of male predominant abusers used physical violence against the female predominant victim before her death [NSW DV Death Review 2021].

Analysis of the National Death Review Network's National Minimum Dataset identified the following types of coercive and controlling behaviour exhibited by male primary domestic violence abusers who killed female domestic violence victims in its 2022 report:

- 81.6 per cent emotionally and/or psychologically abused their victim;
- 63.2 per cent socially abused their victim;
- 41.5 per cent stalked their victim;
- 27.4 per cent financially abused their victim;
- 16 per cent were identified as having sexually abused their victim (this is recognised as likely an undercount of the true incidence of sexual violence).

This was in addition to the 79.7 who used physical violence against their victim [ADFVDRN & ANROWS 2022].

A recent study which interviewed loved ones of female intimate partner homicide victims found that coercive control was present in all informant's narratives of the relationship between the victims and homicide perpetrators [AIC 2022]. The Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015 found that 78.9 per cent of domestic and family violence homicide victims were identified as having a prior history of domestic and family violence victimisation at the hands of the homicide perpetrator [Vic Systemic Review 2020].

The controlling behaviours referred to in the previous paragraphs (sometimes referred to as coercive control) may involve the perpetrator spatially confining or restraining the victim; asserting exclusive possession over the victim; monopolising the victim's skills and resources; restricting the victim's access to finances and employment; or preventing the victim from keeping in touch with social networks, escaping the abusive relationship, or seeking help and support [Bagshaw et al 2000]. The effect may be to physically and socially isolate the victim, and, over time, undermine the victim's sense of identity, independence and self worth, and place them at greater risk of further domestic and family violence.

Suicide threat by perpetrator

There is evidence to suggest a correlation between severe domestic and family violence and threat of suicide by the perpetrator [Campbell et al 2003a]. The NSW Domestic Violence Death Review Team Annual Report 2017-2019 recorded that 23 per cent of all male intimate partner perpetrators suicided after murdering their intimate partners. In the period 2000-2010 in Victoria, of the 31 homicide-suicides, 17 involved intimate partners and the Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015 found that 14 per cent of the 85 family violence homicide perpetrators suicided at the time of the incident or subsequently. The Ombudsman Western Australia reported that, in the period 2012-2015, of the 35 domestic and family violence related deaths, 8 were homicide-suicides where in all cases the male killed the female and subsequently suicided.

Step-child in the family

A number of studies have investigated the prevalence and severity of domestic and family violence against women with children fathered by someone other than the perpetrator [Campbell et al 2003a]. A recent comparative study found that women with some or all children not fathered by the perpetrator were 30 per cent more likely to experience lethal harm and 20 per cent more likely to experience at least one life-threatening violent incident than women whose children were all fathered by the perpetrator; further, these women represented 65 per cent of the homicide victims in the study [Miner et al 2012]. An earlier study found that the presence of a step-child in the family more than doubled the risk of the mother being killed [Campbell et al 2003a]. A recent Swedish study observed that the presence of any children (not just step-children) was related to a higher risk rating for imminent intimate partner violence re-victimization and warranted recommendations of more than standard levels of risk management strategies [Petersson & Thunberg 2022].

Parenting proceedings and other court proceedings

An Australian study found that domestic and family violence is a common experience among separated parents, with mothers reporting physical or emotional abuse in greater proportions than fathers. Another study reported high rates of ongoing fear and abuse associated with post-separation parenting arrangements and decision-making. A 2015 court outcomes project found that more than one third of all parenting matters filed in the then Family Court of Australia and then Federal Circuit Court of Australia raised allegations of family violence, while a study of the experiences of separated parents found that a significant proportion of mothers who had experience family violence may have difficulty corroborating it because they had not previously disclosed it to police or other agencies [Kaspiew et al 2015]. In these circumstances, a parent may use their joint parenting role or related judicial options as a means of exercising ongoing control over their former partner and may be considered as systems abuse and part of a pattern of abusive behaviours aimed at controlling the victim, sometimes referred to as coercive control. The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report found that protection orders were a feature in over 40 per cent of the 240 cases where a male intimate partner homicide offender killed a female intimate partner, demonstrating a history of police or court intervention due to domestic or family violence, and in 49 of those cases there was a current protection order in place at the time of the homicide, the vast majority naming the female victim as the protected person. Active family law proceedings were identified in only 3.8 per cent of the total 290 cases in the focused dataset, reflecting the fact that many disputes relating to separation, property division and child arrangements are settled informally. It notes that the Queensland Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Board has identified that there is no process whereby the family court system is notified of domestic violence deaths involving parties engaged with the court [ADFVDRN & ANROWS 2022].

Factors affecting risk - Key Literature

Links to all Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Documents are located at 4.2 Factors affecting risk – Death Reviews

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics, 4510.0 - Recorded Crime - Victims, Australia, 2021.

Victims of Domestic and Family Violence-Related Offences

This chapter presents experimental data about victims of selected Family and Domestic Violence (FDV) – related offences. Victims of selected offences have been determined to be FDV–related where the relationship of offender to victim, as stored on police recording systems, falls within a specified family or domestic relationship or where an FDV flag has been recorded, following a police investigation.

Key findings include:

- FDV-related homicide victims accounted for over a third of total homicide victims, and females accounted for over half of all FDV-related homicide victims.
- FDV-related assault is mostly likely to occur in the age range 25-34 years; and, across all states and territories, females are more likely than males to be victims – at least three times as likely, and up to six times more likely.
- FDV-related sexual assault accounted for over a third of total sexual assaults and there are six times as many female victims as male victims.

Australian Bureau of Statistics (2023) Personal Safety Australia 2021-2022.

This release present summary prevalence statistics from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2022 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected information from persons aged 18 years and over about the nature and extent of their experiences of physical and sexual violence, violence, emotional abuse and economic abuse by a cohabiting partner, stalking, sexual harassment and past experiences of childhood abuse and witnessing parental violence before the age of 15.

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2017).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 16, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

The survey results demonstrate that approximately one fifth of women who experienced violence by a current partner and were pregnant at some stage during the relationship experienced violence during their pregnancy. For more than one quarter of these women, pregnancy was the first time they had experienced violence. Nearly one half of women who experienced violence by a previous partner and who were pregnant during the relationship experienced violence during their pregnancy, approximately one half for the first time.

See Tables 17-18, which highlight the link between pregnancy and experiences of violence.

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2022). Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018 (2nd ed.; Research report 03/2022). ANROWS.

This report provides data findings from the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network's National Minimum Data Set on intimate partner violence ("IPV") homicides from July 2010 to June 2018. The research demonstrates the highly gendered nature of IPV and IPV homicides, the need for service providers and first responders to recognise the pattern of abusive and controlling behaviours in domestic violence relationships and that any relationship exhibiting physical or non-physical domestic violence carries a risk of lethality.

Key data findings include:

- There were 311 IPV homicides across Australian between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2018.
- More than three quarters of IPV homicides involved a male offender killing a current or former female partner (most killed a current female partner). The vast majority of those had been the primary perpetrator of IPV behaviours and the most common criminal justice outcome was a murder conviction.
- Less than one quarter of IPV homicides involved a female IPV offender killing a current or former male partner (most killed a current male partner). In the majority of these cases the female homicide offender was the also the primary IPV victim who killed her male abuser and the most common criminal justice outcome was a manslaughter conviction.
- The majority of IPV homicide offenders engaged in “problematic drug and/or alcohol use”. This may be a possible opportunity for intervention.
- Only approximately one third of all IPV homicide offenders and victims were engaged in paid employment at the time of the homicide.
- There was an overrepresentation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people as IPV homicide victims and offenders. The report considers the “complex range of interrelated factors associated with the disproportionate incidence and severity of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.
- There were four cases where children were killed together with their mother, resulting in the deaths of eight children. At least 171 children under the age of 18 who survived the homicide of one or both parents.

Key findings as to discrete characteristics present within a relationship prior to an IPV homicide included:

- Separation: Actual or intended separation was a feature in more than half of cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a female partner, and in just under half of cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male intimate partner.
- Domestic violence orders: In more than half of cases where a male IPV offender killed a female partner there was no evidence of a current or historical domestic violence order. Current or historical domestic violence orders were identified in 66.1% of cases where a female IPV offender killed a male partner.
- Domestic violence abusive behaviours: The vast majority of male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female victim were identified as the primary abuser. Only a small proportion of female IPV homicide offenders who killed a male victim were identified as the primary abuser. Half of the 6 male offenders who killed a male partner were identified as the primary abuser in the relationship.

Where a male primary abuser killed a female victim the majority used emotional and psychological abuse (81.6%) and physical abuse (79.7%). Stalking occurred in 41.5% of those cases. In a third of cases the abuser stalked the victim during the relationship and in a fifth after the relationship ended.

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, Data Report 2018 (May 2018).

This report provides data on intimate partner homicides occurring between 2010 and 2014 in Australia, and aims to inform prevention initiatives. Key data findings include:

- There were 152 intimate partner homicides which followed a history of domestic violence in Australia during the study period (p 9);
- The majority of intimate-partner homicides involved a male killing his current or former female partner (p 10);
- Actual or intended separation was present in over half of cases where men killed their female partners (p 12), but only in around 40 percent of female perpetrated homicides (p 21);
- Almost one quarter of men who killed their female partners were named in Domestic Violence Orders protecting the female victims (p 13), and one quarter of women who killed their male partners were protected by a Domestic Violence Order naming the homicide victim as the respondent (p 22);
- In most cases where a female killed her male partner, she was the primary victim of violence and killed her abuser (p 19);
- The most common outcome for men who killed their partners was a murder conviction (p 16), while the most common outcome for women was a manslaughter conviction (p 24);
- Over 20 percent of men who killed their intimate partners died by suicide (p 16);
- Almost 20 percent of men who killed their female partners (p 14), and around half of women who killed their male partners, identified as Aboriginal (p 22);

In cases where men killed their female partners and were also domestic violence abusers, most had previously used physical, emotional and/or social abuse against the victim (pp 26-8).

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare (2022) Family, domestic and sexual violence data in Australia, AIHW, Australian Government, accessed 24 January 2023.

This release brings together a range of sources to report a core set of data in an interactive format, and summarise changes in measures of family, domestic and sexual violence over time. It complements the Australian Institute of Health and Welfare's Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia report series. It contains new and updated data for crime rates for family and domestic violence and sexual assault, hospitalisation for family and domestic violence and family and domestic violence crisis payments.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia: continuing the national story 2019.

This is primarily a data report to help inform government policies and plans and to assist in the planning and delivery of violence prevention and intervention programs. It builds on AIHW's inaugural Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia 2018 report. It presents new information on vulnerable groups, such as children and young women. It examines elder abuse in the context of family, domestic and sexual violence, and includes new data on telephone and web-based support services, community attitudes, sexual harassment and stalking. It also includes the latest data on homicides, child protection, hospitals and specialist homelessness services, while noting notable data gaps on various aspects of family, domestic and sexual violence and work underway to fill the gaps and develop new data sources.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);

- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'Reshaping Responses to Domestic Violence' (Final Report, University of South Australia and Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, Commonwealth of Australia, April 2000).

This Australian research used a variety of methods including an anonymous 'phone-in' and focus groups. 102 women who were victims/survivors of domestic violence participated in the phone-in. 'Social abuse' was reported by 67 per cent of callers. Social abuse included 'systematic isolation of women from family and friends'. Techniques included perpetrators' ongoing rudeness to family and friends that gradually resulted in reluctance by family and friends to make contact due to concerns that contact would trigger abuse from the perpetrator. Other means by which women were socially isolated included moving to new towns or to the country where they knew nobody and were not allowed to go out and meet people. In some cases women were physically prevented from leaving the home and were kept 'prisoners' in their own homes' (p22-23).

Backhouse, Corina and Cherie Toivonen, National Risk Assessment Principles for domestic and family violence: Companion resource (ANROWS, 2018).

This review provides a summary of the evidence-base for the National Risk Assessment Principles for domestic and family violence developed on behalf of the Commonwealth Department of Social Services [Toivonen et al 2018]. This summary of literature highlights key aspects of the evidence-base that underpin the development and implementation of the Principles, including literature regarding: risk and safety; need and vulnerability; risk assessment and management approaches; intimate partner sexual violence and sexual assault; and multi-agency integrated service responses. It includes discussion of priority populations and the evidence that particular groups experience multiple challenges that heighten the likelihood, impact or severity of violence, as well as experiencing additional barriers to seeking and obtaining support (pp14-20).

Boxall H & Morgan A. 2021. Experiences of coercive control among Australian women. Statistical Bulletin no. 30. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Awareness of coercive control within the context of abusive intimate relationships is greater than ever before in Australia. However, there is limited research examining the different patterns and characteristics of abuse, particularly among large Australian samples.

This study examines the characteristics of violence and abuse reported by 1,023 Australian women who had recently experienced coercive control by their current or former partner. The most frequently reported behaviours were jealousy and suspicion of friends, constant insults, monitoring of movements and financial abuse. Over half of the respondents also reported experiencing physical forms of abuse (54%), including severe forms such as non-fatal strangulation (27%). One in three of these women also reported experiencing sexual violence during the survey period (30%). Women were much more likely to seek advice or support when they had also experienced physical or sexual forms of abuse.

Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. Who is most at risk of physical and sexual partner violence and coercive control during the COVID-19 pandemic?. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 618. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: In this study, data was analysed from a survey of Australian women (n=9,284) to identify women at the highest risk of physical and sexual violence and coercive control during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Logistic regression modelling identified that specific groups of women were more likely than the general population to have experienced physical and sexual violence in the past three months. These were Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women aged 18–24, women with a restrictive health condition, pregnant women and women in financial stress. Similar results were identified for coercive control, and the co-occurrence of both physical/sexual violence and coercive control.

These results show that domestic violence during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic was not evenly distributed across the Australian community, but more likely to occur among particular groups.

Boxall, Hayley and Anthony Morgan, Repeat Domestic and Family Violence among Young People Research Report No 591, February 2020, Australian Institute of Criminology.

This paper adds to what is known about family violence perpetrated by adolescents. It examines short-term reoffending patterns – including timing, prevalence, the peak period for repeat violence, and cumulative rates – as well as predictors of repeat violence, particularly those relating to prior histories of family violence or breaches of orders, given that this information is readily available to frontline responders. The paper draws on incident data from Victoria Police for almost 4,000 young people aged 12-18 involved in domestic or family violence. Approximately one in four of these young people were involved in repeat violence in the six months following an incident, with the risk peaking at around 30 days following an incident in domestic violence cases and at around three to four weeks for family violence cases. Violence was largely perpetrated against intimate partners or parents. The findings show how the violence histories of young people can be helpful for identifying who will be involved in repeat violence in the short term, and who will be involved in multiple violent incidents. Frequency of prior incidents of violence is a better predictor of future short-term reoffending than prevalence of prior violence, but they are both useful indicators of future risk.

Bricknell, S. (2023) Homicide in Australia 2020-2021 (National Homicide Monitoring Program) Sydney: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Statistical Report 42 reports: Between 1 July 2020 and 30 June 2021, there were 210 homicide incidents recorded by Australian state and territory police. In 2020–21, 36 percent (n=76) of homicide incidents were domestic homicides.

Of the 76 domestic homicides in 2020–21, half (50%, n=38) were intimate partner homicides. Intimate partner homicides comprised 18 percent of homicide incidents in Australia in 2020–21.

Another 12 homicides (6% of all homicide incidents) were filicides (where a parent killed their son or daughter), 11 (5%) were parricides (where a parent was killed by their son or daughter), four (2%) were siblicides (a brother or sister killed a sibling) and 11 (5%) were homicides of other family members or kin. (p6)

Intimate partner homicide (n=2,102) comprised 60 percent of domestic homicides and 24 percent of all homicide incidents between 1989–90 and 2020–21 (see Table A8). Threequarters (76%, n=1,589) of these were female victim intimate partner homicides and a quarter were male victim intimate partner homicides (24%, n=513).(p15) Females are significantly more likely to be killed by an intimate partner or family member (69%, n=45), mostly by their current or former intimate partner (38%, n=25). (p14)

Dearden, Jack, and Jason Payne, 'Alcohol and Homicide in Australia' (2009) 372 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

The current study builds on limited Australian research on alcohol-related homicide. It examines solved homicides recorded in the National Homicide Monitoring Program over a six year period. A key finding was that alcohol is equally likely to be implicated in intimate-partner homicides as it is in all other homicides. However, homicides involving women killing male intimate partners were far more likely to involve alcohol consumption by victim or offender or both, and that the overwhelming majority of Indigenous intimate-partner homicides were alcohol related.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Strangulation, Domestic Violence and the Legal Response' (2014) 36 Sydney Law Review 231.

This paper presents a useful literature review of recent studies about the risk of attempted strangulation to health and as a predictive factor in death or serious injury. See especially pp232-236.

Dowling C, Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. The criminal career trajectories of domestic violence offenders. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 624. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology. https://doi.org/10.52922/ti78016

Abstract: This study examines the officially recorded criminal careers of 2,076 domestic violence offenders and 9,925 non-domestic violence offenders in New South Wales in the 10 years following their first police proceeding. Group-based trajectory modelling was used to examine both domestic violence and non-domestic violence offending. Special attention is given to the degree of versatility in offending, and to the interplay of domestic violence and non-domestic violence offending trajectories. Domestic violence offending often formed part of a broader pattern of offending. While trajectories of low -frequency domestic violence and non-domestic violence offending were most common, domestic violence typically increases as non-domestic violence offences begin to decline. Importantly, there was variability in the offending profiles of domestic violence offenders. This was amplified when non-domestic violence offending was analysed, indicative of a complex array of underlying risk factors.

Dowling, Chistopher and Anthony Morgan, Predicting Repeat Domestic Violence: Improving Police Risk Assessment , (Research Report No 581, October 2019, Australian Institute of Criminology).

This study examines how accurately the Family Violence Risk Assessment Tool (FVRAT) predicts repeat domestic violence. The FVRAT is a 37-item tool used by police in the ACT to inform their responses to domestic violence. The study examines a sample of 350 unique cases of violence involving current or former intimate partners between March and December 2017 in which police used the FVRAT. Repeat domestic violence was measured based on whether a subsequent report of domestic violence was made to police within six months. The study found that the FVRAT is not a strong predictor of repeat domestic violence. However, an empirically refined version of the FVRAT consisting of 10 individually predictive items much more accurately predicts repeat domestic violence.

Dowling, Chistopher and Anthony Morgan, Is methamphetamine use associated with domestic violence? (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 563 December 2018).

Report abstract:

There is considerable evidence of the impact of methamphetamine use on violent behaviour. This paper presents findings from a review of existing research on the association between methamphetamine use and domestic violence.

Eleven studies met the criteria for inclusion. Domestic violence is common among methamphetamine users; however, methamphetamine users account for a small proportion of all domestic violence offenders.

There is evidence that methamphetamine users are more likely than non-users to perpetrate domestic violence. Importantly, methamphetamine use is frequently present along with other risk factors. This means methamphetamine use probably exacerbates an existing predisposition to violence, rather than causing violent behaviour.

Grech, Katrina, and Melissa Burgess, 'Trends and Patterns in Domestic Violence Assaults: 2001 To 2010' (Issue Paper 61, NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research, 2011).

A NSW study. 'Forty-one per cent of all incidents of domestic assault are alcohol related. This percentage varies, however, from a low of 35 per cent in the Sydney Statistical Division to a high of 62 per cent in the Far West Statistical Division. The rate of recorded domestic assault for Indigenous women is more than six times higher than for non-Indigenous women.' This study deals with a variety of risk factors in depth, with a special focus on alcohol and related geographic issues.

Hulme, Shann, Anthony Morgan and Hayley Boxall,Domestic Violence Offenders, Prior Offending and Reoffending in Australia, Research Report No 580, September 2019, Australian Institute of Criminology.

Developing effective strategies to reduce domestic violence offending requires an understanding of perpetrator characteristics, offending patterns and recidivism. This study consolidates the Australian evidence base through a systematic review of 39 quantitative studies that examined domestic violence offending and reoffending. Despite the wide range of data sources, samples and measures of violence, findings are remarkably consistent across studies. The findings further reinforce the importance of targeting male perpetrated violence, and reducing violence in Indigenous communities. Alcohol featured in a significant proportion of domestic violence incidents. Finally, the study demonstrates the importance of reducing repeat offending, particularly among prolific offenders, to reduce overall rates of violence.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family law and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of the practices and perspectives of family law system professionals(n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- the Court Outcomes Project (CO Project) involving:
    - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
    - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts; and
    - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaspiew, R., Carson, R., Rhoades, H., Qu, L., De Maio, J., Horsfall, B., & Stevens, E. (2022). Compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders: Views of professionals and judicial officers (Research report, 01/2022). ANROWS.

This report sets out the findings of one part of a four-part research program that examines compliance with and enforcement of family law parenting orders. These findings are based on two elements: the views of 343 professionals who work with separated parents who completed an online survey, and those of 11 judicial officers who exercise family law jurisdiction and participated in one-on-one interviews. The other three parts of the research program are based on data collection from family law court files involving contravention applications, an online survey of parents and carers with family law parenting orders, and an analysis of the approaches applied to contravention in three international jurisdictions. (p11)

Systemic factors include shortcomings in the identification, assessment and management of risk. (p13)

When working with parents for the development of parenting orders, it is critical that practitioners ensure that safety and risk are adequately assessed and considered in the parenting arrangements. (p14)

This evidence demonstrates that the parents who obtain family law parenting orders are a particularly complex group, with concentrated levels of risk indicators. In light of the small proportion of parenting orders that involve contravention matters…, it is important to emphasise that the contravention regime is applied to a small subset of a particularly complex group of families. (p17)

Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Parliament of New South Wales, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report No 46, 2012).

A NSW report. At paragraphs 2.25 - 2.27 (pp16-7), the Committee notes key indicators of most likely victims:

women over 18 years in a heterosexual relationship; women with children being up to three times more likely to be victims of domestic violence than women without children. From paragraph 5.25 (p101) onwards, the Committee deals with factors that exacerbate violence against women, including: “alcohol and drug use, exposure to pornography, violence in the media and exposure to violence as a child”. The Committee notes that the same factors have an impact on one’s likelihood to be a perpetrator of domestic violence. Paragraphs 9.127 - 9.147 (from p251) examine ‘unworkable apprehended domestic violence order conditions’. The committee concludes in paragraphs 9.148 - 9.156 that conditions contained in an order should be individually tailored to the situation, the protected person, and the perpetrator; thus minimising the risk of breach and further violence.

Leung, F and Trimboli, L. (2022). Improving police risk assessment of intimate partner violence. NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research.

This research aimed to develop a tool with better predictive accuracy than the NSW’s Domestic Violence Safety Assessment Tool.

The sample comprised 234,454 incidents between intimate partners recorded from January 2016 to December 2018 in the Central Referral Point (CRP) database, provided by Victim Services NSW. Four predictive models of a victim’s risk of intimate partner re-victimisation were evaluated. These were a) NRAP-all: a model with all 16 risk factors identified in the National Risk Assessment Principles (NRAP) developed by Australia’s National Research Organisation for Women’s Safety (ANROWS); b) NRAP-10: a model with only the 10 high-risk factors identified by ANROWS in the NRAP; c) SAFVR: the Static Assessment of Family Violence Recidivism (SAFVR), developed by the New Zealand Police; and d) DVSAT-8: a model with the eight items from the NSW DVSAT that are most predictive of repeat victimisation. The best performing model was further simplified, keeping only the best predictors. This simplified model was then used to predict re-victimisation.

Of the four models, only the two NRAP models had acceptable predictive performance (i.e., with an Area under the Curve (AUC) above 0.7). The model with the highest AUC was the NRAP model that combined all 16 risk factors identified by ANROWS (with an average AUC of 0.732). When tested on unseen data, its out-of-sample AUC was similar, at 0.738. The simpler NRAP-10 model performed only slightly worse with an average AUC of 0.728. Further analysis found that the best performing NRAP model could be simplified, with almost no loss in predictive performance. Of the 16 risk factors in the NRAP model, a simplified model using only the best five predictors delivered an out-of-sample AUC of 0.734.

This study demonstrates that a risk assessment instrument with a small number of variables can identify victims who are most at risk of future intimate partner violence. With an appropriately selected risk threshold to match service capacity, the simplified model could help control the volume of referrals at a desired level.

In the current study, the five variables that most strongly predicted repeat victimisation in the subsequent 12 months were: two measures of previous history of family and domestic violence; pregnancy and new birth; the victim's self-perception of risk of future violence; and misuse of drugs or excessive alcohol consumption.

Mooney, Rosemary and Deborah Byrne, Understanding the relationship between family violence and brain injury (The Brain Injury Association of Tasmania, 2016).

This report provides a summary of the key issues surrounding the complex relationship between injury and family violence in Australia. It notes that half of the people who perpetrate family violence have an existing brain injury (but not all people living with a brain injury perpetrate family violence). Research demonstrates that there is an association between brain injury and increased aggressive behaviour. Moreover, the types of abuse victims of family violence often report (being hit in the face, head and neck, being shaken, and being choked) are all risk factors for brain injury. Research has established that at least one third of women who have experienced family violence has sustained a brain injury. However, the needs of women who live with traumatic brain injury are not being met (p.1).

It notes that '[v]ictims of family violence are seldom screened for brain injury which means that the phenomenon of brain injury as a consequence of family violence is under reported; the same is true for perpetrators of family violence. Prevalence rates are therefore difficult to estimate due to under reporting, under diagnosis, and under researching of brain injury, making it an 'invisible' problem' (p.1).

It concludes that the relationship between brain injury and family violence shown in this report points to an 'urgent need for education and training across all intersecting areas in relation to implementing brain injury screening and the provision of targeted services that are appropriate and effective for people living with a brain injury' (p.2). This report makes fourteen recommendations.

Morgan, Anthony, Hayley Boxall and Rick Brown, Targeting repeat domestic violence: Assessing short term risk of reoffending (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 552 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Drawing on repeat victimisation studies, and analysing police data on domestic violence incidents, the current study examined the prevalence and correlates of short-term reoffending.

The results showed that a significant proportion of offenders reoffended in the weeks and months following a domestic violence incident. Individuals who reoffended more quickly were more likely to be involved in multiple incidents in a short period of time. Offenders with a history of domestic violence—particularly more frequent offending—and of breaching violence orders were more likely to reoffend. Most importantly, the risk of reoffending was cumulative, increasing with each subsequent incident.

The findings have important implications for police and other frontline agencies responding to domestic violence, demonstrating the importance of targeted, timely and graduated responses.

Morgan A & Boxall H 2020. Social isolation, time spent at home, financial stress and domestic violence during the COVID-19 pandemic. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 609. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

In this study data from a large online survey of Australian women is used to examine whether the increased time spent at home, social isolation and financial stress resulting from COVID-19 containment measures were associated with a higher likelihood of physical and sexual violence among women in current cohabiting relationships with and without a history of violence.

An increase in the amount of time spent at home with a partner did not in itself increase the likelihood of violence among either group. However, the probability of repeat or first-time violence was between 1.3 and 1.4 times higher for women who had less frequent contact with family and friends outside of the household during the pandemic.

While financial stress prior to the pandemic was a strong predictor of violence for both groups, the probability of first-time violence was 1.8 times higher among women who experienced an increase in financial stress. We conclude that the pandemic was associated with an increased risk of violence against women in current cohabiting relationships, most likely from a combination of economic stress and social isolation.

Myhill A, Hohl K. The "Golden Thread": Coercive Control and Risk Assessment for Domestic Violence. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. 2019; 34(21-22):4477-4497.

Abstract: Research on risk assessment for domestic violence has to date focused primarily on the predictive power of individual risk factors and the statistical validity of risk assessment tools in predicting future physical assault in sub-sets of cases dealt with by the police. This study uses data from risk assessment forms from a random sample of cases of domestic violence reported to the police. An innovative latent trait model is used to test whether a cluster of risk factors associated with coercive control is most representative of the type of abuse that comes to the attention of the police. Factors associated with a course of coercive and controlling conduct, including perpetrators' threats, controlling behavior and sexual coercion, and victims' isolation and fear, had highest item loadings and were thus the most representative of the overall construct. Sub-lethal physical violence—choking and use of weapons—was also consistent with a course of controlling conduct. Whether a physical injury was sustained during the current incident, however, was not associated consistently either with the typical pattern of abuse or with other context-specific risk factors such as separation from the perpetrator. Implications for police practice and the design of risk assessment tools are discussed. We conclude that coercive control is the "golden thread" running through risk identification and assessment for domestic violence and that risk assessment tools structured around coercive control can help police officers move beyond an "incident-by-incident" response and toward identifying the dangerous patterns of behavior that precede domestic homicide.

Noonan, Patrick, Annabel Taylor and Jackie Burke, Links between alcohol consumption and domestic and sexual violence against women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This literature review found that "there is little evidence that alcohol use is a primary cause of violence against women. The paper does, however, identify that there are clear associations, and in some cases, strong correlations between alcohol use and violence against women, including, for instance, in the severity of the violence." The relationship between alcohol and violence against women manifests in three ways:

- Alcohol use is linked with the perpetration of violence against women.
- Alcohol use is linked with women's victimisation by violence.

- Alcohol is used as a coping strategy by women who have experienced violence

Parkinson, Patrick, Judy Cashmore and Judi Single, 'Post-Separation Conflict and the Use of Family Violence Orders' (2011) 33(1) Sydney Law Review 1.

This article is based on interviews with 181 parents who had parenting disputes post-separation. Many of the disputes involve family violence orders (FVO). The research outlines the wide range of situations in which a FVO may be sought (from p11), including in relationships where there had been no history of violence over a long period. In these situations, it was difficult to assess risk pre-separation. In some cases, it was the act of applying for a FVO that led to the most severe instances of violence. The article also draws on the experiences of respondents to a FVO application. Other risk factors are also briefly identified including: pregnancy (p13); and coercive/controlling violence (p5).

Phillips, Janet, and Penny Vandenbroek, 'Domestic, Family and Sexual Violence in Australia - An Overview of the Issues' (Research Paper, Parliamentary Library, Parliament of Australia, 2014).

These include: perpetrators' substance dependency; victims' past exposure to violence (especially as a young person or child); and absence of social support (p 6). In particular, it draws on relevant Australian research to identify that the 'involvement of alcohol and drug use often lead[s] to higher levels of aggression by perpetrators' (p7). The authors also outline which groups of women may be identified as being at greatest risk (p8).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Notes that a suicide threat is considered a risk factor for lethal harm and constitutes a form of domestic and family violence where it is made for the purpose of "tormenting, intimidating or frightening the person to whom the behaviour is directed". (In particular, see p 68).

International

Block, Carolyn, 'Reducing Intimate Partner Homicide Rates: What are the Risk Factors for Death when a Woman is being Abused?' in Australian Institute of Criminology, Domestic-related Homicide: Keynote Papers from the 2008 International Conference on Homicide (Report No 104, Research and Public Policy Series, 2009) 62.

This paper summarised the most important findings of the Chicago Women's Health Risk Study (CWHRS). The CWHRS involved interviews with 705 women who screened positive for domestic violence, and was designed to inform service providers of how to identify risk factors for intimate partner homicides. CWHRS found that, while past violence is a significant risk factor (particularly where there has been a threat of use of a weapon, an attempt to strangle her, or abuse of substances (p69)), women who have not experienced a previous violent incident may still be at high-risk of death (p72). The study also found that girls as young as 11 were killed by an intimate partner (see the age breakdowns and abuse types on p81). Other important findings included: '(1) leaving as both a protective factor against but also a risk factor for death, (2) the importance of choking/attempted strangulation as a risk factor for death, (3) risk factors for an abused woman killing her abuser, and (4) the voices of women about help-seeking' (p63).

Block reports that women who had experienced a strangulation or choking attempt by the perpetrator in the last year were twice as likely to be killed as women who had not, with the CWHRS finding that:

> '12 percent of women whose partner had tried to choke or strangle them in the past year were in the homicide sample, versus six percent of abused women who had not experienced a choking incident in the past year. Clinic/hospital women who said their partner had tried to choke or strangle them in the past year were more likely (16% versus 8%) to experience a very severe or life-threatening incident on follow-up (weapon use or threat, lost consciousness, permanent injury, internal injury, head injury or attempted murder)' (p70).

Brownridge, Douglas, et al., 'The Elevated Risk for Non-Lethal Post-Separation Violence in Canada: A Comparison of Separated, Divorced, and Married Women' (2008) 23(1) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 117.

This Canadian study used a nationally representative sample (n=7,369), and made two contributions to the existing literature:

- first, compared with married women, separated women reported 9 times the prevalence of violence by their ex-husbands, and divorced women reported 4 times the prevalence of violence (pp 128-9); and
- second, the risk factors for the married, divorced and separated women were different. Sexually proprietary behaviour (for example, jealousy or possessiveness) and patriarchal dominance were significant risk factors only for married women, not for separated or divorced women (pp 129-30). In contrast, important risk factors for separated women were age and Indigenous status (p 130-1).

Thus, there may be different circumstances influencing post-separation violence and intimate partner violence.

Campbell, Jacquelyn, et al, 'Risk Factors for Femicide in Abusive Relationships: Results from a Multisite Case Control Study' (2003a) 93(7) American Journal of Public Health 1089.

This 11-city study sought to identify risk factors for femicide in abusive relationships. Proxies of 220 intimate partner femicide victims identified from police or medical examiner records were interviewed, along with 343 abused control women. Pre-incident risk factors associated with increased risk of intimate partner femicide included: perpetrator's access to a gun and previous threat with a weapon; perpetrator's stepchild in the home; and estrangement, especially from a controlling partner. Never living together and prior domestic violence arrest were associated with lowered risks. Significant incident factors included the victim having left for another partner and the perpetrator's use of a gun. Other significant bivariate-level risks included stalking, forced sex, and abuse during pregnancy.

Campbell, Jacquelyn, et al, 'Assessing Risk Factors for Intimate Partner Homicide' (2003b) 250 National Institute of Justice Journal 14.

This study examines the effectiveness of a particular risk assessment tool, the Danger Assessment Tool developed in 1985, in measuring women's risk in abusive relationships. It 'found that despite certain limitations, the tool can with some reliability identify women who may be at risk of being killed by an intimate partner' (p14). The Danger Assessment found that women whose abusers used or threatened use of a weapon were 20 times more likely to be killed, while the correlation between threatened or attempted suicide required further analysis. Other risk factors identified included: partner attempting to strangle the woman; partner violently and constantly jealous; partner controls most or all of the woman's daily activities; partner's use of alcohol and illicit drugs; and the woman ever being beaten while pregnant. Limitations of the tool include that, while the Danger Assessment process correctly assessed 83% of women who were murdered as high-risk, it also assessed 40 percent of abused women who were not killed as high-risk, demonstrating that the tool can only operate as a guide for identifying a woman's risk of death.

Charlotte Barlow and Siobhan Weare, 'Women as Co-Offenders: Pathways into Crime and Offending Motivations' (2019) 58(1) The Howard Journal of Crime and Justice 86-103.

This article examines a qualitative study in the UK which aimed to investigate co-offending women's pathways into, and motivations for engaging in, criminal behaviour. It considers not only the impact of co-offending relationships on women's criminality, but also factors which intersect with these relationships in their lives. Interviews with eight women who accessed a women's advice and support centre were conducted. Findings showed that while co-offending relationships were a central pathway into offending, this often intersected with other circumstances in the women's lives, including drug addiction, socio-economic circumstances, and 'significant life events'. Moreover, women who co-offended with female friends were more likely to acknowledge their agency than those who co-offended with intimate male partners. Findings also demonstrated the significance of understanding the complex nature of the lives co-offending women, and the decision-making process.

Emily Brignone, Anneliese Sorrentino, Christopher Roberts and Melissa Dichter, 'Suicidal ideation and behaviors among women veterans with recent exposure to intimate partner violence' (2018) 55 General Hospital Psychiatry 60-64.

Female veterans are at a disproportionately high risk for suicide and intimate partner violence (IPV) compared to female non-veterans. Suicide rates increased by 32.7% among veterans between 2005 and 2015. There is evidence that female veterans differ from non-veterans in terms of IPV-related experiences. The authors examined the US Veterans Health Administration (VHA) electronic medical records for 8427 female veterans who completed screening for past-year IPV between April 2014 and 2016. Results showed a strong connection between IPV and suicidal ideation, and self-harm behaviours among VHA female veterans.

Farzan-Kashani, Julian and Christopher Murphy, 'Anger Problems Predict Long-Term Criminal Recidivism in Partner Violent Men' (2017) 32(23) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 3541-3555

Anger problems are not only an important correlate of IPV, but may also be an important factor underlying treatment response for IPV perpetrators. Of 132 men receiving treatment services at a community-based DV agency, those with serious anger problems had more charges for general violence offences and more ongoing problems with protection orders than did those with 'normal' anger levels. Further, low anger control and high anger expression predicted general violence recidivism. The results demonstrate that new intervention approaches are necessary for partner violent men with serious anger dysregulation, as a standard cognitive-behavioural treatment program may not suffice.

Fleury, Ruth E, Cris M Sullivan & Deborah I Bybee, 'When Ending the Relationship Does not End the Violence: Women's Experiences of Violence by Former Partners' (2000) 6(12) Violence Against Women 1363.

A US study of 278 women with abusive partners leaving a women's shelter were interviewed across two years. More than one third of the women were assaulted by their former partner during the time of the study. Those who were in a relationship longer before the first incident of violence were more likely to be assaulted after the end of the relationship suggesting that the violence may have started as a means by which the perpetrator could maintain control over the victim. There was also evidence that perpetrators who were highly sexually suspicious of the victim were more likely to be violent towards the victim after separation.

Folkes, Stephanie, N, Zoe Hilton and Grant T Harris, 'Weapon Use Increases the Severity of Domestic Violence but Neither Weapon Use Nor Firearm Access Increases the Risk or Severity of Recidivism' (2012) 28(6) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1143.

A Canadian study. This reanalysis of 1,421 police reports of domestic violence by men found that 6% used a weapon during the assault and 8% had access to firearms. Firearm access was associated with assault severity, but this was mostly attributable to use of non-firearm weapons. Weapon use was associated with older age, lower education, and relationship history as well as to assault severity. Victims were most concerned about future assaults following threats and actual injuries. Although firearm access and weapon use were related to actuarial risk of domestic violence recidivism, neither predicted the occurrence or severity of recidivism. The study concluded that, consistent with previous research in the United States and Canada, firearm use in domestic violence is uncommon even among offenders with known firearm access. Weapon use is characteristic of a subgroup of offenders who commit more severe domestic violence, and seizure of weapons may be an effective intervention.

Glass, Nancy, et al, 'Non-fatal Strangulation is an Important Risk Factor for Homicide of Women' (2008) 35(3) Journal of Emergency Medicine 329.

The study examines non-fatal strangulation by an intimate partner as a risk factor for major assault, or attempted or actual homicide of women. A case control design was used to describe non-fatal strangulation among actual and attempted homicides (n=506) and abused controls (n=427). The results demonstrate non-fatal strangulation as an important risk factor for homicide of women by intimate partners, underscoring the need to screen for non-fatal strangulation when assessing abused women in emergency department settings.

Graham, Kathryn; Sharon Bernards, Sharon C. Wilsnack and Gerhard Gmel; 'Alcohol May Not Cause Partner Violence But It Seems to Make It Worse: A Cross National Comparison of the Relationship Between Alcohol and Severity of Partner Violence' (2011) 26(8) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1503.

This study assesses whether severity of physical partner aggression is associated with alcohol consumption at the time of the incident, and whether the relationship between drinking and aggression severity is the same for men and women and across different countries. National or large regional general population surveys were conducted in 13 countries as part of the GENACIS (Gender, Alcohol and Culture – an International Study) collaboration. Respondents described the most physically aggressive act done to them by a partner in the past 2 years, rated the severity of aggression on a scale of 1 to 10, and reported whether either partner had been drinking when the incident occurred. Severity ratings were significantly higher for incidents in which one or both partners had been drinking compared to incidents in which neither partner had been drinking. The relationship did not differ significantly for men and women or by country. The authors concluded that alcohol consumption may serve to potentiate violence when it occurs, and this pattern holds across a diverse set of cultures.

Jaffe, Peter, Katreena Scott, 'Risk Factors for Children in Situations of Family Violence in the Context of Separation and Divorce' (Department of Justice Canada, 2014).

This report provides a summary of the expanding literature in the field of family violence, with specific attention to factors that increase the risk of harm to children during the critical time of parental separation. The report also summarises policies and practices for intervention and prevention as identified by Canadian experts and current research reports. The review highlights the many factors that increase children's risk of harm to their psychological and physical well-being (e.g., exposure to domestic violence; history of maltreatment; parental stress; social isolation of the family; inadequate resources and support) in the context of family violence and separating parents. The authors propose a model to guide judges, lawyers and court-related professionals to consider when looking at potential harm to children based on their vulnerabilities as well as the risks that parents may present. Findings of risk can lead to court mandated interventions and safeguards in determining parental access to their children. This analysis requires consideration of barriers to required services such as language and cultural barriers as well as poverty.

Livingston, Michael, 'The Ecology of Domestic Violence: The Role of Alcohol Outlet Density' (2010) 5(1) Geospatial Health 139.

This study assesses whether alcohol outlet density is related to the incidence of domestic violence and whether this relationship is due to alcohol availability or to co-occurring economic disadvantage and social disorganisation. The study found that the density of hotels (or pubs), but not packaged liquor outlets or restaurants and bars, was significantly associated with rates of domestic violence, even controlling for socio-demographic factors. Socio-economic disadvantage was also found to be associated with domestic violence rates. The results present a mixed picture of the links between alcohol availability and domestic violence, and are suggestive of the need for more research. The study provides valuable insights into substance abuse as a risk factor for domestic violence.

Lyons, et al., Risk Factors for Child Death During an Intimate Partner Homicide: A Case-Control Study (2021) 26(4) Child Maltreatment 356-362 doi: 10.1177/1077559520983901

This research used the US National Violent Death Reporting System (NVDRS) data (2003–2017) to compare all IPH incidents with a child corollary victim (n = 227) to all IPH incidents where a child was present but not killed (n = 350). We examined risk factors for child fatality during an IPH. For each risk factor, we calculated the odds ratio for child death during the IPH, adjusting for multiple comparisons. Perpetrator history of suicidal behavior, rape of the intimate partner victim, a non-biological child of the perpetrator living in the home, and perpetrator job stressors increased odds while prior separation of the IPV victim from the perpetrator decreased the odds of a child death during an IPH incident.

McFarlane, Judith, Jacquelyn Campbell and Kathy Watson, 'Intimate Partner Stalking and Femicide: Urgent Implications for Women's Safety' (2002) 20(1-2) Behavioral Sciences and the Law 51.

Researchers conducted a case control study of 821 women in 10 U.S. cities. A sample of 437 women who were killed or nearly killed by their intimate partners was compared with a control sample of 384 abused women residing in the community. The researchers assessed the relative significance of a set of risk factors for predicting femicide (homicide of a woman by her intimate partner) or near femicide (cases that could have but did not result in death for the victim). Compared with the control group of abused women (49%), significantly more of the killed/nearly killed women had histories of stalking (79%) in their abusive relationships. Multivariate analyses indicated that being "followed or spied on" by the abuser in the 12 months before the lethal or near lethal incident resulted in a nearly 2.5-fold risk. More detailed analyses identified five threat factors (in the perpetrator's behavior towards the victim) that increased odds of femicide/attempted femicide: (a) threatened to harm children if the woman left, (b) frightened the woman with a weapon before the incident, (c) left scary notes on the woman's car before the incident, (d) threatened to kill the woman, and (e) frightened or threatened the woman's family before the incident.

McKee GB, Gill-Hopple K, Oesterle DW, Daigle LE, Gilmore AK. New Perspectives on Risk Factors for Non-fatal Strangulation and Post-assault Imaging. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. October 2020.

Abstract: Strangulation has long been associated with death in the context of sexual assault and intimate partner violence (IPV). Non-fatal strangulation (NFS) during sexual assault, which refers to strangulation or choking that does not result in death, is common and has been associated with IPV and with bodily injury; however, other factors associated with NFS are unknown. The current study examined demographic and sexual assault characteristics associated with NFS among women who received a sexual assault medical forensic exam (SAMFE). A second purpose of this study was to explore factors associated with receiving follow-up imaging orders after NFS was identified during a SAMFE. Participants (N = 882) ranged in age from 18 to 81 (M = 28.85), with the majority identifying as non-Hispanic White (70.4%) or Black/African American (23.4%). A total of 75 women (8.5%) experienced NFS during the sexual assault. Of these, only 13 (17.3%) received follow-up imaging orders for relevant scans. Results from a logistic regression analysis demonstrated that NFS was positively associated with report of anal penetration, intimate partner perpetration, non-genital injury, and weapon use during the assault. Results from chi-square analysis showed that among sexual assaults involving women who experienced NFS, those whose assaults involved weapon use were over four times more likely to receive imaging orders compared to assaults without weapon use. These findings have implications for criminal justice, and if incorporated into danger assessments, could potentially reduce fatalities linked to sexual assault and/or IPV. Additional work is needed to ensure that all assaults with NFS trigger a referral for imaging regardless of other assault characteristics.

Mechanic, Mindy B, Terri L. Weaver & Patricia A. Resick, 'Risk Factors for Physical Injury Among Help-Seeking Battered Women: An Exploration of Multiple Abuse Dimensions' (2008) 14(10) Violence Against Women 1148.

This US study assessed the nature and extent of minor and severe injuries among a help-seeking sample of battered women. It assessed the roles of physical violence, sexual coercion, psychological abuse, and stalking in predicting minor and severe injuries in battered women. Length of relationship abuse and severity of physical aggression were the most robust predictors of minor and severe physical injuries. Consistent with other research findings, psychological abuse and stalking together contributed uniquely to the prediction of severe injuries.

Messing, JT, Thomas, KA, Ward-Lasher, AL & Brewer, NQ 2021, 'A Comparison of Intimate Partner Violence Strangulation Between Same-Sex and Different-Sex Couples', Journal of Interpersonal Violence, vol. 36, no. 5/6, pp. 2887–2905.

US based study. Abstract: Strangulation is a common and dangerous form of intimate partner violence (IPV). Nonfatal strangulation is a risk factor for homicide; can lead to severe, long-term physical and mental health sequelae; and can be an effective strategy of coercion and control. To date, research has not examined strangulation within same-sex couples. The objective of this cross-sectional, observational research is to identify whether and to what extent the detection of strangulation and coercive control differs between same-sex and different-sex couples in police reports of IPV. Data (n = 2,207) were obtained from a single police department in the southwest United States (2011-2013). Bivariate analyses examined differences in victim and offender demographics, victim injury, violence, and coercive controlling behaviours between same-sex (male-male and female-female) and different-sex couples (female victim-male offender). Logistic regression was used to examine associations between strangulation, victim and offender demographics, coercive controlling behaviours, and couple configuration. Strangulation was reported significantly more often in different-sex (9.8%) than in female and male same-sex couple cases (5.2% and 5.3%, respectively; p <.05). Injury, however, was reported more frequently in same-sex than in different-sex couples (p <.05). Couple configuration (p <.05), coercive control (p <.05), and injury (p <.05) significantly predict strangulation. Findings suggest that nonfatal strangulation occurs within at least a minority of same-sex couples; it is possible that underdetection by law enforcement makes it appear less common than it actually is. Regardless of couple configuration, timely identification of strangulation and subsequent referral to medical and social service providers is essential for preventing repeated strangulation, life-threatening injury, and the long-term health effects of strangulation.

Messing, Jill Theresa, Wilson, Janet Sullivan and Jacquelyn Campbell, ' Differentiating among Attempted, Completed, and Multiple Nonfatal Strangulation in Women Experiencing Intimate Partner Violence' (2018) 28(1) Women's Health Issues 104-111.

The identification of intimate partner violence (IPV) in health care settings is difficult, and strangulation increases the risk of death among women experiencing IPV. Previous literature suggests that women rarely seek treatment and care after IPV strangulation, and those who do, may not disclose prior assaults or the cause of the injury, thus leading to misdiagnoses and inadequate treatment plans. The authors examined the prevalence and correlates of non-fatal strangulation among 1008 women survives of intimate partner violence. Trained researchers conducted semi-structured interviews with women survivors of IPV referred by police. Results showed that each strangulation was independently significantly associated with sexual violence when compared to non-strangulation. Multiple strangulation was associated with more IPV injury and risk factors for homicide, including loss of consciousness and miscarriage (see pages 107-108). The authors found that strangulation was a prevalent form of IPV and has significant health risks to women. Women's health practitioners are best placed to identify the signs and symptoms of strangulation, help women to understand the consequences and potential future fatality associated with strangulation, and direct them to appropriate resources to reduce the risk of mortality and morbidity.

Miner, Emily, et al, 'Risk of Death or Life-Threatening Injury for Women with Children Not Sired by the Abuser' (2012) 23(1) Human Nature 89.

This US study further explores the previously identified link between the presence of children sired by a woman's previous partner (step-children) and an increased risk of abuse and femicide by her current partner. The current research secured data from samples of 111 non-abused women, 111 less severely abused women, 128 more severely abused women, and 26 victims of intimate partner femicide from the Chicago Women's Health Risk Study. The study found that women who have genetic children in the household sired by a previous partner experience an increased risk of severe forms of abuse (by their current partner) compared with women whose children were all sired by their current partner. It also identified a trend of increasing representation of women with children sired by previous partners as victims of abuse as the severity of the abuse increases.

National Institute of Justice, 'How Effective Are Lethality Assessment Programs for Addressing Intimate Partner Violence?' (Office of Justice Programs, June 11 2018).

The article analyses the effectiveness of Lethality Assessment Programs (LAP) in addressing intimate partner violence (IPV). LAP was developed by the Maryland Network Against Domestic Violence in 2003 as a means for first responders to identify high-risk victims of IPV, and provide them with the tools to make decisions of self-care. As part of the program, police officers used an 11-question Lethality Screen to evaluate a victim's risk for lethal violence, and warned high-risk victims of their dangerous circumstances and offered to connect them with a social services provider. If victims agreed, they were put in contact, by phone, to a provider to receive victim advocacy services, safety planning, and referral for additional services. The researchers collected data on 700 female victims of IPV in seven police jurisdictions in Oklahoma.

Although the program did not appear to have a significant impact on reducing the incidence of IPV, it did seem to significantly reduce the severity and frequency of the violence that survivors experienced. It also appeared to increase help seeking and safety planning. Women who participated in the program were more likely to remove or hide their partner's weapons, to obtain formal services for domestic violence, to establish safety strategies with friends and family, and to obtain protection against their partner. The researchers also found that victims who received assistance through the LAP reported greater satisfaction with the police response. Consequently, LAP was described as a 'collaborative police-social service intervention with an emerging evidence base.'

The article was based on Police Departments' Use of the Lethality Assessment Program: A Quasi-Experimental Evaluation.

Patch, Michelle, Jocelyn Anderson and Jacquelyn Campbell, 'Injuries of Women Surviving Intimate Partner Strangulation and Subsequent Emergency Health Care Seeking: An Integrative Evidence Review' (2018) 44(4) Journal of Emergency Nursing 384.

This article reviewed the literature on women's injuries and their subsequent experiences in seeking health care after encountering non-fatal intimate partner strangulation (NF-IPS). Research shows that NF-IPS is higher in women than in men. Although injuries may be subtle or minimised, they may have severe health consequences. In recent years, there have been calls for nursing and other health care providers to improve practices related to strangulation screening, assessment and treatment. Overall, NF-IPS was associated with multiple negative physical (eg injuries to head/neck or neurological, vascular or respiratory systems) and psychological (eg anxiety, depression, suicidal ideation or post-traumatic stress) outcomes for women. Studies suggested that women are reluctant to seek health care after being strangled. Reasons for their reluctance include wanting a safe place first, not wanting to share personal experiences, an abuser being present in the room during the visit, and feelings of hopelessness.

Petersson, Joachim and Thunberg, Sara, (2022) Vulnerability Factors among Women Victimized by Intimate Partner Violence and the Presence of Children, 37 Journal of Family Violence 1057-1069, doi: 10.1007/s10896-021-00328-8

This study aimed to a) examine the presence of children in relation to victim vulnerability factors and assessed risk for intimate partner violence (IPV) re-victimization, and b) examine the police response, in terms of risk management, in IPV cases with and without children, respectively. Data from a sample of 1407 women who had reported IPV victimization to the Swedish police was analyzed. The material consisted of risk assessments conducted by the police using the Swedish version of the Brief Spousal Assault Form for the Evaluation of Risk (B-SAFER) checklist, as well as the recommended risk management strategies. Victim vulnerability factors that were most strongly associated with an elevated risk rating for IPV re-victimization were generally the same for both groups of victims. The presence of children was related to a higher risk rating for imminent IPV re-victimization and to recommendations of more than standard levels of risk management strategies.

Rossiter, KR. et al., 'Domestic Homicide in Immigrant and Refugee Populations: Culturally-Informed Risk and Safety Strategies' (Canadian Domestic Homicide Prevention Initiative, Domestic Homicide Brief 4, February 2018).

The purpose of this Briefing Paper is to highlight risk assessment, risk management, and safety planning for immigrant and refugee populations. The paper provides definitions of key terms, such as 'migrant', 'protected persons' and 'permanent residents'. It also identifies unique risk factors for domestic homicide, using the Immigrant Power and Control Wheel (p6). The authors highlight the importance in recognising that 'domestic violence and homicide among immigrant and refugee populations are not rooted specific in cultures, but in patriarchy' (p 5). The authors identify several factors that contribute to increased risk of domestic violence and homicide among immigrant and refugee populations (p4):

- Acculturation level
- Cultural norms and expectations
- Geographic and social isolation
- Length of residency in host country
- Loss of socioeconomic status
- Loss of culture, family structures and community leaders
- Power imbalances between partners
- Stress associated with migration
- Post-migration strain and stigma
- Strict or changing gender roles
- Traditional patriarchal beliefs

- Unresolved pre-migration trauma
- Victim/survivor immigration status

Barriers to services for immigrant and refugee women are addressed, along with the need for culturally-informed strategies for risk assessment, risk management, and safety planning. Examples of culturally-specific risk assessment tools are provided.

Spencer, Chelsea and Stith, Sandra, (2020) Risk Factors for Male Perpetration and Female Victimization of Intimate Partner Homicide: A Meta-Analysis. 21(3) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 527-540. doi: 10.1177/1524838018781101

This meta-analysis examined results from 17 studies. Primary findings from this research suggest the strongest risk factors for intimate partner homicide were the perpetrator having direct access to a gun, perpetrator's previous nonfatal strangulation, perpetrator's previous rape of the victim, perpetrator's previous threat with a weapon, the perpetrator's demonstration of controlling behaviors, and the perpetrator's previous threats to harm the victim. Implications for law enforcement personnel, medical professionals, victim advocates, mental health professionals, and other professionals who may be in contact with potential IPH perpetrators and victims are discussed.

Taylor, Gregory, The Chief Public Health Officer's Report on the State of Public Health in Canada, 2016: A Focus on Family Violence in Canada (Public Health Agency of Canada, 2016).

While focused on Canada, this report gives an overview of the factors that influence the risk of both experiencing and perpetrating family violence. Individual factors include: a history of child abuse or neglect, age, gender, traits, beliefs and behaviour, physical and mental health, substance use, and stress (p.20). Some of the family and social factors that increase the risk for family violence are poor parenting and parental attachment; intimate partner violence between parents; stress in relationships; mistreatment of older adults; social isolation and lacking social support (p.23). Community and societal factors that can influence family violence include cultural differences; social acceptability and normalisation of violence; and neighbourhoods (pp.23-25).

Vivienne, Elizabeth, 'Custody Stalking: A Mechanism of Coercively Controlling Mothers Following Separation' (2017) 25(2) Feminist Legal Studies 185-201.

This study adds to the literature in relation to post-separation violence by introducing the new concept of 'custody stalking'. Custody stalking is a parents's use of custody and/or child protection proceedings to obtain care time with children far in excess of their involvement prior to separation (p 187). Elizabeth views custody stalking as a specific pattern of coercive control, derived from the unique insights former partners have about how to torment women (p 187). The study was conducted through interviews with 12 mothers who had experienced domestic violence (p 190). The study found that custody stalking causes grief, damages psychological wellbeing and has a detrimental effect on their mothering relationships. However, the losses experienced by mothers in this study are described as 'culturally invisible' (p 187-8)

Wallace, M. et al., (2021) 'Homicide during pregnancy and the post-partum period in the United States, 218-2019'. Obstetrics & Gynecology, 138(5): 762- 769, doi: 10.1097/AOG.0000000000004567

Objective: To estimate the national pregnancy associated homicide mortality ratio, characterize pregnancy-associated homicide victims, and compare the risk of homicide in the perinatal period (pregnancy and up to 1 year postpartum) with risk among nonpregnant, nonpostpartum females aged 10–44 years.

Methods: Data from the National Center for Health Statistics 2018 and 2019 mortality files were used to identify all female decedents aged 10–44 in the United States. These data were used to estimate 2-year pregnancy-associated homicide mortality ratios (deaths/100,000 live births) for comparison with homicide mortality among nonpregnant, nonpostpartum females (deaths/100,000 population) and to mortality ratios for direct maternal causes of death. We compared characteristics and estimated homicide mortality rate ratios and 95% CIs between pregnant or postpartum and nonpregnant, nonpostpartum victims for the total population and with stratification by race and ethnicity and age.

Results: There were 3.62 homicides per 100,000 live births among females who were pregnant or within 1 year postpartum, 16% higher than homicide prevalence among nonpregnant and nonpostpartum females of reproductive age (3.12 deaths/100,000 population, P,.05). Homicide during pregnancy or within 42 days of the end of pregnancy exceeded all the leading causes of maternal mortality by more than twofold. Pregnancy was associated with a significantly elevated homicide risk in the Black population and among girls and younger women (age 10–24 years) across racial and ethnic subgroups.

Conclusion: Homicide is a leading cause of death during pregnancy and the postpartum period in the United States. Pregnancy and the postpartum period are times of elevated risk for homicide among all females of reproductive age.

Webermann, Aliya R, and Christopher M Murphy, 'Childhood Trauma and Dissociative Intimate Partner Violence' (2018) 25(2) Violence Against Women 148-166.

This article considers research investigating whether childhood abuse and neglect is a predictor of dissociative intimate partner violence among perpetrators (p 4). Experiences of childhood abuse and neglect, including exposure to domestic and family violence, is a key predictor of IPV perpetration as an adult (p 2). Key findings include:

- Around one third of the male perpetrators reported dissociative IPV (p 11);
- Childhood abuse and neglect predicted dissociative IPV flashbacks (p 8), dissociative IPV-specific blackouts (p 8), dissociative IPV-specific derealisation (p 11), and IPV-specific aggressive dissociative self-states (p 11);
- Childhood sexual abuse uniquely predicted amnesia (p 9).

The results also indicated that other potential traumas did not predict dissociative IPV, which suggests that dissociative IPV occurs more predictably where perpetrators who have experienced childhood neglect and abuse disconnect from their abusive behaviours (p 12).

White, Catherine et al., 'I thought he was going to kill me': Analysis of 204 case files of adults reporting non-fatal strangulation as part of a sexual assault over a 3 year period' (2021) 79 Journal of Forensic and Legal Medicine. doi: 10.1016/j.jflm.2021.102128

One of the aims of this study was to identify the prevalence of NFS in patients presenting to a Sexual Assault Referral Centre (in the UK for an acute forensic medical examination after a report of rape or sexual assault. Data from case files of all patients attending in a three year period, January 1, 2017 to December 31, 2019, were analysed. The case files included 204 (9.28%) NFS cases. Conclusion: The study shows that NFS in sexual assault is a gendered crime, with most victims female and most assailants male. NFS is prevalent and this prevalence increases where the alleged perpetrator is a partner or ex-partner. Many are assaulted in their own homes, homes frequently shared with children. Visible NFS injuries are not the norm yet fear of death is not uncommon. Over 1 in 6 (15.7%) reported loss of consciousness suggesting that they were victims of a near lethal assault. That 27% had previously been a victim of NFS by the same alleged perpetrator indicates that there are considerable numbers potentially living in fear and at risk. Awareness of the risk of NFS, and an enhanced response to it, is required by those looking after victims and all those in the criminal justice system.

Zilkins, R.R., Phillips, M.A., Kelly, M.C., Mukhtar, S.A., Semmens, J.B., & Smith, D.A., 'Non-fatal strangulation in sexual assault: A study of clinical and assault characteristics highlighting the role of intimate partner violence' (2016) 43 Journal of Forensic and Legal Medicine 1.

Western Australian Study. A total of 1064 women were included in the study; 79 (7.4%) alleged non-fatal strangulation during sexual assault. This study identifies and quantifies NFS risk factors in female sexual assault and highlights the strong association with intimate partner sexual assault. Notes as follows:

- 7.4% of all female sexual assault cases involved non-fatal strangulation (NFS)
- 58% of non-fatal strangulation sexual assault cases involved intimate partners
- 23% of sexual assaults by an intimate partner involved NFS
- NFS was most frequent in 30–39 year olds sexually assaulted by an intimate partner
- External physical signs of NFS were absent in 49% who gave a history of NFS.

Factors affecting risk - Death Reviews

National

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network (2018), Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: 2018, New South Wales Domestic Violence Death Review Team, Sydney.

Abstract: The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network ('the Network') was established in 2011 and represents a unique collaboration between domestic and family violence death review mechanisms across Australia. Network members have specialist expertise in domestic and family violence related issues and access to extensive information pertaining to domestic and family violence deaths. This is critical to providing a more informed, holistic understanding of the circumstances and context of a domestic and family violence related death.

In recent years, the Network has undertaken extensive work to develop a National Minimum Dataset of domestic and family violence related deaths and this report presents key findings from this specialised dataset.

This report demonstrates the breadth of information and data that is held by the Network, and its unique ability to collect and report on data in relation to domestic and family violence related deaths.

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2022), Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018 (2nd ed.; Research report 03/2022). ANROWS.

The data presented in this report provides a national picture of characteristics present in intimate partner violence homicides ("IPV") in Australia between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2018, examining the 311 reported IPV homicides across Australia.

Key findings include:

- IPV homicide is highly gendered: in the majority of cases, domestic violence is used by the man against his female partner. Less than one quarter of all cases involved a female IPV homicide offender killing a current or former male partner, and more than three quarters of all cases involved a male IPV homicide offender killing a current or former female partner (n=240, 77.2%).

- IPV homicide occurs across a broad age range (18–82) with the majority of offenders and victims born in Australia.
- IPV homicide can occur at any stage during a relationship with homicides occurring during or after short relationships, as well as after many years of protracted violence by abusers.
- There is a heightened vulnerability for women who separate or intend to separate from their partners prior to the homicide, with actual or intended separation being a feature in over half of the male-perpetrated IPV homicides. Actual (n=77, 34.4%) or intended separation (n=53, 36.1%) was a feature in more than half of cases where a male IPV offender killed a female partner (n=130, 58.0%).
- The diverse range of abusive tactics identified in this dataset, including physical, emotional, social, financial and sexual violence and stalking, suggests that any relationship that exhibits domestic violence, whether physical or non-physical, is embedded with a risk of lethality.
- Only approximately one third of all IPV homicide offenders and victims were engaged in paid employment at the time of the homicide (n=225 of 622, 36.2%).
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are overrepresented as both IPV victims and offenders, with a complex range of interrelated factors associated with the disproportionate incidence and severity of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.

The report identifies particular domestic violence abusive behaviours observed in the focused dataset:

- In the focused dataset (n=292), the vast majority of the 224 male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female victim were identified as the primary domestic violence abuser in the relationship (n=212, 94.6%). Of the 62 cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male partner, only a small proportion of women were identified as the primary abuser against the male partner they killed (n=5, 8.1%). In half of the six cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a male partner, the homicide offender was identified as the primary abuser in the relationship (n=3, 50%).
- Of the 212 cases in which a male primary domestic violence abuser killed a female victim, the majority used emotional and psychological abuse (n=173, 81.6%) and physical abuse (n=169, 79.7%) against the female partner they killed. Over half had been socially abusive (n=134, 63.2%), just over a quarter were financially abusive (n=58, 27.4%) and far fewer were known to be sexually abusive (n=34, 16.0%).

- Stalking occurred in two fifths of the 212 cases in which a male primary domestic violence abuser killed a female victim (n=88, 41.5%). In 71 cases, the domestic violence abuser stalked the victim during the relationship (33.5%) and in 44 cases the abuser stalked the victim after the relationship ended (20.8%).

It concludes:

This research demonstrates the highly gendered nature of intimate partner violence and IPV homicides, with the male party being identified as the primary domestic violence abuser in the majority of cases where a male homicide offender killed a female victim and where a female homicide offender killed a male partner. In many cases, there had been a domestic violence order naming one or both parties as in need of protection from the other at the time of, or prior to, the homicide. The vast majority of these named the female party as needing protection from her male partner. This demonstrates that in many cases the domestic violence had been reported and there had been some level of police or court intervention prior to the homicide.

With separation being a prominent feature in over half of the male-perpetrated IPV homicides against women and almost half of the female-perpetrated IPV homicides, this research also demonstrates that the period leading up to and immediately following separation involves a heightened level of risk.

Analysis of the domestic violence behaviours used by the primary domestic violence abuser demonstrates the range of physical and non-physical violence used by abusive men to dominate and control their partner. The high prevalence of emotional and psychological abuse (such as verbally denigrating, threatening, blaming or gaslighting the victim) and social abuse (such as isolating the victim from support networks and controlling her movements) demonstrates the need for services and first responders to recognise, beyond the use of physical violence, the pattern of abusive and controlling behaviours that presents in a domestic violence relationship. Further, the diverse range of abusive tactics present in this dataset, including physical, emotional, social, financial and sexual violence, and stalking, suggests that any relationship that exhibits domestic violence, whether physical or non-physical, is embedded with a risk of lethality.

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2022) Domestic and family violence lethality: Updated facts about intimate partner homicide (Fact sheet).

This fact sheet highlights important findings of the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018.

ACT

ACT data for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network is provided by the National Coronial Information System with the approval of the ACT Coroner's Court.

Australian Government (2021). National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children: Family Violence Death Review: Responsible government: Australian Capital Territory (website).

The ACT Family Violence Death Review was established through legislation in 2021.

"The intended outcome of an ACT Family Violence Death Review is to make system-wide improvements across policy, systems and services, data collection and legislation to prevent future deaths related to domestic and family violence. Risk factors identified as part of the Death Review will also inform concurrent work of the ACT Government to deliver a domestic and family violence risk assessment and management framework (see Domestic and Family Violence Risk Assessment and Management Framework)."

NSW

Coroner's Court New South Wales, Domestic violence death review (Government of New South Wales).

The Domestic Violence Death Review Team (DVDRT) was established in 2010 pursuant to the Coroners Act 2009 NSW to review deaths occurring in the context of domestic violence in New South Wales. This page details the role, function and membership of the DVDRT and provides links to the annual reports of the DVDRT to Parliament. It also provides a link to reports of the national Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network.

New South Wales Domestic Violence Death Review Team (2021). Report: 2019-2021. New South Wales Government, Sydney.

Key findings:

All Intimate Partner Homicides

- The vast majority (86.3%) of intimate partner homicides in NSW occur following an identifiable history of domestic violence.

Intimate Partner Violence Homicides

Gender

- Nearly 80% of all intimate partner violence (IPV) homicide victims were women.
- The vast majority of men who killed their female intimate partner were the predominant domestic violence abuser in the relationship (98.5%).
- The vast majority of women who killed their male intimate partner were the predominant domestic violence victim in the relationship (91.3%).
- There were no cases where a woman was identified as the predominant domestic violence abuser in the relationship.

Male predominant abuser behaviours and histories of violence:

- Emotional/psychological violence was evident in almost all cases (96.7%).
- In more than a quarter of cases there was no identifiable history of physical violence prior to the fatal assault (27.3%).
- Almost 60% of male abusers were known to have perpetrated violence against at least one prior partner, as well as the victim (58.1%).
- In 22.9% of cases there was a current enforceable ADVO at the time of the homicide.
- In 46.9% of cases there was no police contact prior to the homicide.

Homicide offender and victim characteristics:

- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples continue to be significantly overrepresented in intimate partner homicides:
  - 15.5% of female and 34.8% of male IPV homicide victims.
  - 28.3% of female and 11.2% of male IPV homicide offenders.
- Intimate partner homicide victims were most commonly living in areas with the lowest socio-economic status.
- One third of male homicide offenders engaged in alcohol (39.8%) or drug use (33%).

- More than half of male homicide offenders had a confirmed or suspected background of mental health issues (up to 51.9%).
- Over 40% of male homicide offenders had experienced significant trauma and/or adversity in their childhood (41.7%).

Relationship characteristics

- Separation was a factor in two-thirds of IPV homicides involving a male offender killing a female intimate partner (66.5%).
- From the 252 IPV homicides in the dataset there were at least 267 child survivors

NT

Northern Territory information for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network is provided by the Coroner's Office of the Northern Territory.

QLD

Queensland Coroners Court, Review of deaths from domestic and family violence (webpage, updated 1 December 2022) (Queensland Government).

The Domestic and Family Violence Death Review and Advisory Board ("the Board") was established pursuant to the Coroners Act 2003 (Qld) in response to a key recommendation of the he Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence Final Report, Not Now, Not Ever: Ending domestic and family violence in Queensland (Queensland Government).

This page details the role, function and membership of the Board and provides links to the Systemic and Annual Reports of the Board to Parliament, as well as a statistical overview of Queensland domestic and family violence data, research reports and submissions.

Domestic and Family Violence Death Review and Advisory Board (2022) Collaborative responses to risk, safety, and dangerousness: Annual Report 2021-22, Queensland Government.

The 2021-22 Queensland report highlights 6 key lethality risk indicators in intimate partner homicides between 2011 and 2018 (where recorded) as follows:

- In 53.2% the victim had an intuitive sense of fear of the perpetrator;
- In 26.1% the victim had experienced non-lethal strangulation by the perpetrator;
- In 37% there had been an escalation in violence prior to the homicide;
- In 35.95% the perpetrator had made threats to kill;
- In 15.2% there was a history of sexual violence.

In particular, the Board recommends a focus on understanding escalation of domestic violence, particularly where victims present to agencies on multiple occasions. The Board observed that further protective action taken by victims, for example, seeking to vary a protection order can indicate a change in circumstances or that current conditions are ineffective, should be interpreted as reflecting an escalation of violence. Service providers should be aware that some actions by the victim can heighten risk of harm, including taking steps to secure the safety of children through mediation and legal processes.

TAS

Tasmanian data for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network is provided by the National Coronial Information System with the approval of the Tasmanian Coroner's Court.

VIC

Coroners Court of Victoria (2020) Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths: Review of Family Violence Related Homicides: 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015, State of Victoria.

Extract: The Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths (VSRFVD) at the Coroners Court of Victoria (CCOV) is led by the State Coroner and examines the context in which family violence-related deaths occur. Through coroners' findings, comments and recommendations, the VSRFVD contributes to strengthening the response to family violence in Victoria.

To assist the work of the VSRFVD, and coroners, the CCOV captures data relating to homicides in Victoria using the Victorian Homicide Register (VHR). The VHR records every homicide reported to the CCOV and captures a range of information pertaining to the homicide victim and offender. In cases identified as family violence related homicides, further information regarding the dynamics of the relationship between the homicide victim and offender, any family violence history and risk factors are captured.

The VSRFVD 'First Report' was published in 2012 and used data relating to homicides from 1 January 2000 to 31 December 2010 to explore the factors and circumstances in which family violence homicide deaths occur. This report builds on that initial dataset, presenting data in relation to family violence homicides which occurred between 1 January 2011 and 31 December 2015.

Of the 257 homicide related deaths reported during this time period, where the coronial investigation was closed, 97 deaths were identified as family violence related deaths where coding into the VHR had been completed. Those deaths arose from 82 separate homicide incidents perpetrated by 86 homicide offenders. Data from these deaths was examined for the purposes of this report.

WA

Western Australian data for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network has been provided by the National Coronial Information System with the approval of the Western Australian Coroner's Court.

Ombudsman Western Australia, Family and Domestic Violence Fatality Review 2021 (Western Australian Government).

This is the section of the Ombudsman's 2020-21 Annual Report which relates to Family and Domestic Violence Fatality Review. It sets out the work of the Ombudsman in the area, including:

- Background;
- The role of the Ombudsman in relation to family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- The family and domestic violence fatality review process;
- Analysis of family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Patterns, trends and case studies relating to family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Issues identified in family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Recommendations;
- Timely handling of notifications and reviews;
- Major own motion investigations arising from family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Other mechanisms to prevent or reduce family and domestic violence fatalities; and
- Stakeholder liaison.

The 2020-21 Annual Report records the following issues identified from fatality review (it is important to note that issues are not identified in every family and domestic violence fatality review; and when an issue has been identified, it does not necessarily mean that the issue is related to the death):

- Not working directly with remote Aboriginal community to facilitate local solutions to family violence that are co-designed, and led, by Aboriginal people to promote safety.
- Missed opportunities to develop culturally informed safety planning and consult with Aboriginal experts.
- Not undertaking sufficient action to confirm the cultural safety of a family and domestic violence model in use across the diverse population of Aboriginal people in Western Australia.
- Missed opportunities to address family and domestic violence perpetrator accountability.
- Missed opportunities to provide perpetrator rehabilitation support.
- Missed opportunities to address family and domestic violence victim safety.
- Missed opportunity to facilitate safe accommodation.
- Missed opportunity to assess risk of harm and develop strategies to reduce or prevent family and domestic violence in the context of mental health issues and/or drug and alcohol use.
- Not undertaking sufficient family and inter-agency communication to enable effective case management and collaborative responses.
- Not adequately meeting policy and procedures of the Family and Domestic Violence Response Team.
- Not taking action consistent with legislative responsibilities of the Children and Community Services Act 2004, and associated policy, to determine whether children were in need of protection or whether action was required to safeguard child wellbeing.
- Not adequately meeting policies and procedures relating to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander child placement principle, permanency planning and cultural care planning.
- Missed opportunity to develop safety planning to reduce the risk of an escalation of family and domestic violence, when children are taken into the care of the Chief Executive Officer.
- Missed opportunity to ensure governance, monitoring and evaluation of a family and domestic violence five-year initiative were in place to achieve positive outcomes.
- Inaccurate recordkeeping.

Factors affecting risk - Other Resources

Australia

- ANROWS, Personal Safety Survey 2016 Fact Sheet (2017).

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2022) Domestic and family violence lethality: Updated facts about intimate partner homicide (Fact sheet).

This fact sheet highlights important findings of the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018.

Family Court of Australia, Family Violence Best Practice Principles, 4th edition (2016)

The Best Practice Principles are applicable in all cases involving family violence or child abuse (or the risk of either) in proceedings before courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cmth), and provide useful background information for decision makers, legal practitioners and individuals involved in these cases including an explanation of the definition of 'family violence' and 'abuse' under the Family Law Act and the different types of violence and abuse.

The Best Practice Principles recognise:

- the harmful effects of family violence and abuse on victims
- the prominence given to the issue of family violence in the Family Law Act, and
- the principles guiding the case management system for the disposition of cases involving allegations of abuse of children.

Section C deals with the interim hearing stage and introduces the 'PPP' screening tool as a useful mechanism in the assessment of risk. This screening tool analyses risk by reference to three factors: the potency (of violence), pattern (of violence and coercive control) and primary perpetrator indicators (PPP). The screening tool is not a predictive device but does give a useful framework of factors to look for when considering the risk of family violence.

Toivonen, Cherie and Corina Backhouse, National Risk Assessment Principles for domestic and family violence (ANROWS, 2018).

This resource identifies lethality/high-risk factors, including (pp 12-15):

- History of family and domestic violence;
- Separation (actual or pending);
- Intimate partner sexual violence;
- Non-lethal strangulation (or choking);
- Stalking;
- Threats to kill;
- Perpetrator's access to, or use of weapons;
- Escalation (frequency and/or severity);
- Coercive control; and
- Pregnancy and new birth.

It also identifies other risk factors, including (pp 15-16):

- Victim's self-perception of risk;
- Suicide threats and attempts;
- Court orders and parenting proceedings;
- Misuse of drugs or excessive alcohol consumption;
- Isolation and barriers to help-seeking; and
- Abuse of pets and other animals.

This resource outlines the 9 key principles for assessing risk (pp 5-11):

- Survivors' safety is the core priority of all risk assessment frameworks and tools;
- A perpetrator's current and past actions and behaviours bear significant weight in determining risk;
- A survivor's knowledge of their own risk is central to any risk assessment;
- Heightened risk and diverse needs of particular cohorts are taken into account in risk assessment and safety management;

- Risk assessment tools and safety management strategies for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples are community-led, culturally safe and acknowledge the significant impact of intergenerational trauma on communities and families;
- To ensure survivors' safety, an integrated, systemic response to risk assessment and management, whereby all relevant agencies work together, is critical;
- Risk assessment and safety management work as part of a continuum of service delivery;
- Intimate partner sexual violence must be specifically considered in all risk assessment processes; and
- All risk assessment tools and frameworks are built from evidence-based risk factors.

State and Territory Risk Assessment Tools

ACT

- The screening tool used by the Australian Federal Police (ACT Policing) is not publicly available.
- ACT Domestic and Family Violence Risk Assessment and Management Framework: Supporting an integrated domestic and family violence service system (July 2022) Community Services Directorate, 34-35: ACT Key Risk Factors.

NSW

- Department of Justice (NSW), Safer Pathways: Domestic Violence and Child Protection Guidelines (2014).

New South Wales, Domestic Violence Safety Assessment Tool and Guide (2015)

For use by non-government service providers and government agencies other than NSW Police Force. The DVSAT as primarily been designed for use in intimate partner violence situations.

Tool: https://www.facs.nsw.gov.au/__data/assets/file/0010/592948/DVSAT.pdf

Guide: https://www.facs.nsw.gov.au/__data/assets/file/0009/593064/DVSAT_guide.pdf

NT

Northern Territory Police, Family Safety Framework.

This page contains links to the Common Risk Assessment Tool, one of a number of practice guides and tools in The Northern Territory Government Domestic and Family Violence Risk Assessment and Management Framework ("RAMF").

QLD

- Queensland Police, 'Chapter 9: Domestic Violence' in Operational Procedures Manual (Issue 70, 5 June 2019), Appendix 9.1 'Domestic Violence Protective Assessment Framework'.

Queensland Government, Department of Justice and Attorney-General, DFV common risk and safety framework (webpage).

This page has links to the Queensland Government's Domestic and family violence common risk and safety framework, and a series of risk assessment and safety planning tools for integrated service responses to domestic and family violence.

SA

Common Risk Assessment: Domestic Violence Risk Assessment (DVRA)

State Government of South Australia: Department of Health and Safety (2021) Family Safety Portal https://familysafetyportal.sa.gov.au/RiskAssessment/.

TAS

- Safe Homes Families Communities (Tas) (January 2021), Responding to Family and Sexual Violence: A guide for service providers and practitioners in Tasmania, Tasmanian Government.

VIC

Victorian Government (2020) MARAM Screening and Identification Practitioner Guide: Role, Responsibilities and Supporting Resources.

This resource forms part of the Victorian Government's Family violence multi-agency risk assessment and management framework.

Judicial College of Victoria (2021) Assessing Risk (webpage).

The Judicial College of Victoria has collated a collection of resources on coercive control and family violence which includes a number of risk assessment resources, which include:

Magistrate Noreen Toohey (2021) The buck stops here, Court Talk Podcast.

- Judicial College of Victoria (2021) Family violence risk factors: the intimate terrorism of family violence (Common risk factors checklist).
- Judicial College of Victoria (2021) The Victorian Family Violence Multiple-Agency Risk Assessment and Management Framework (MARAM).

WA

Department for Communities (WA), Family and domestic violence operational responses and practice resources (webpage).

This page contains links to information on domestic violence service system responses and practice resources for workers, including:

- The Western Australian Family and Domestic Violence Common Risk Assessment and Risk Management Framework (Second Edition, 20152021).
- Multi-agency Case Management (MACM) (webpage)

International

Gentile Long, J and Wilkinson, J, Stalking: effective strategies for prosecutors, Strategies in Brief, Aequitas, Issue 11, April 2012.

This American resource briefly outlines 3 strategies for successful investigation and prosecution of stalking offences:

1. Recognise the danger stalkers pose to their victims;
2. Work with experts to understand and respond to stalking; and
3. Collaborate and coordinate with other allied criminal justice professionals.

Judicial Council of California's Domestic Violence Practice and Procedure Task Force, Bench guide for recognizing dangerousness in domestic violence cases.

This US-based resource is designed for use by judicial officers in proceedings involving domestic violence. The checklist is not exhaustive but lists factors most commonly present when there is a risk of serious harm or death. These factors include the perpetrator owning a gun, the perpetrator using drugs, and the physical violence increasing in severity or frequency over the past year.

National Domestic Violence Fatality Review Initiative website.

This aim of this US based organisation is ' to provide technical assistance for the reviewing of domestic violence related deaths with the underlying objectives of preventing them in the future, preserving the safety of battered women, and holding accountable both the perpetrators of domestic violence and the multiple agencies and organizations that come into contact with the parties.' The website provides access to a range of helpful resources including video lectures from some America's most well-known experts on domestic and family violence. The focus of many of these lectures is on understanding risk.

Stalking Resource Center, National Center for Victims of Crime, AEquitas, Office on Violence Against Women, Prosecutor's Guide to Stalking, October 2015.

This American resource is intended to assist prosecutors in:

- analyzing the elements of their stalking statute(s);
- recognizing stalking in cases where it has been employed by the offender in connection with some other criminal offense;
- appreciating the strategic value of charging stalking in cases where it is related to other criminal offenses;

- determining what evidence is necessary to prove the elements of the crime and ensuring that such evidence is properly documented and preserved; and
- effectively prosecuting a stalking charge.

Training Institute of Strangulation Prevention* website (United States).

Includes information on signs and symptoms and impact of strangulation, and online training resources. A single-page downloadable fact sheet emphasises:

- 10% of women who experience intimate partner violence experience strangulation
- Strangulation is the obstruction of blood vessels and/or airflow in the neck resulting in asphyxia – loss of consciousness can occur with 5-10 seconds, death within 4-5 minutes
- 79% of women are strangled manually (with hands); 38% report losing consciousness; 13% are strangled along with sexual assault/abuse, 9% are also pregnant; 97% involve blunt force trauma
- There is a 7-fold increase in risk of homicide for victims who been previously strangled compared to those never strangled
- Often there is no external evidence of injury – only half of victims have visible injuries, and of these, only 15% could be photographed
- Strangulation can cause: physical, neurological and psychological injuries and delayed fatality

Factors affecting risk - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Angelina

Anna

Ben

Cassy

Celina

Faith

Fiona

Francis

Gillian

Hilary

Ingrid

Jennifer

Julia

Lisa

Melissa

Mira

Rosa

Sally

Sandra

Susan

Trisha

Yvonne

Death review

Overview

The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network (the Network) was established in 2011 to formalise and coordinate collaboration between death review mechanisms across Australia to share outcomes of reviews into deaths and homicides related to domestic violence where there is an identified history of abuse between the parties preceding the death [ADFVDRN & ANROWS 2022]. The Network has developed a National Minimum Dataset (NMDS) to identify key trends and patterns in intimate partner homicide with an identified history of domestic and family violence. Intimate partner homicides with no identifiable history of domestic and family violence are not included in the dataset. While most jurisdictions across Australia have formalised death review teams, the Australian Capital Territory is in the process of developing a formal death review process and Tasmania currently has no formal death review process. Several jurisdictions produce annual reports and case studies about domestic and family violence deaths which can be found on their websites [Death Reviews].

Key data findings from the NMDS (reproduced from the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety's Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018 (2022)) [ADFVDRN & ANROWS 2022] include:

Complete IPV homicide dataset (n=311)

- Between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2018, there were 311 IPV homicides across Australia.
- More than three quarters of all cases involved a male IPV homicide offender killing a current or former female partner (n=240, 77.2%). The vast majority of those male offenders had been the primary user of domestic violence behaviours against the woman they killed (n=227, 94.6%).
- Less than one quarter of all cases involved a female IPV homicide offender killing a current or former male partner (n=65, 20.9%). Even though the female partner was the homicide offender, in the majority of these cases she was also the primary domestic violence victim, who killed her male abuser (n=46, 70.8%).

- In six cases, a male IPV homicide offender killed a male partner. Of these, three homicide offenders were the primary abuser against the partner they killed; two offenders were the primary victim of abuse; and in one case both parties mutually used domestic violence against each other.
- There were no cases identified in this dataset where a female IPV homicide offender killed a female partner.
- IPV homicide occurs across a broad age range. There was an age range of 18 to 82 years for male offenders and 18 to 75 years for female homicide offenders. Homicide victims' ages ranged from 16 to 78 years for female victims and from 18 to 76 years old for male homicide victims.
- The duration of relationship between homicide offenders and victims in this dataset ranged from less than a year to 45 years. This demonstrates that IPV homicides can occur at any stage during a relationship.
- The majority of IPV homicide offenders (n=183, 60%) engaged in problematic drug and/or alcohol use. Importantly, this finding does not purport to identify problematic substance use as a causative factor for IPV homicide, but rather represents a pattern of behaviour and identifies possible sites of intervention.
- Only approximately one third of all IPV homicide offenders and victims were engaged in paid employment at the time of the homicide (n=225 of 622, 36.2%). This is significant because workplaces can offer an additional site of intervention for domestic and family violence.
- The data demonstrates an overrepresentation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people as both IPV homicide victims and offenders. While acknowledging these high rates, it is important to recognise that domestic and family violence is not a part of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultures, and there is a complex range of interrelated factors associated with the disproportionate incidence and severity of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities (discussed in the report below).

Male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female intimate partner (n=240)

- Most male IPV homicide offenders killed a current female partner (n=154, 64.2%). Fewer killed a former female partner (n=86, 35.8%).
- The majority of male IPV homicide offenders killed their current or former female partner in her home (n=151, 62.9%). In 97 of these cases (64.2%) this was a home the woman shared with the offender and in 54 cases (35.8%) this was the home the woman lived in but did not share with the offender.

- The most common criminal justice outcome for male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female victim was a murder conviction (n=121, 63.0%). Forty-four male homicide offenders suicided after the homicide (18.3%) and in the majority of these cases, they suicided within 24 hours of the homicide (n=32, 72.7% of male offenders who suicided).

Female IPV offenders who killed a male intimate partner (n=65)

- Most female IPV homicide offenders killed a current male partner (n=50, 76.9%). Fewer killed a former male partner (n=15, 23.1%).
- Over two fifths of female IPV homicide offenders killed their partner in their shared residence (n=28, 43.1%). In nine cases the homicide occurred in the male partner's home and in a further nine cases the homicide occurred in the female homicide offender's home (13.8% respectively).
- The most common criminal justice outcome for female IPV homicide offenders was a manslaughter conviction (n=40, 62.5%). One female IPV homicide offender suicided after the homicide.

IPV homicide and children

- There were four cases in which children were killed together with their mother, resulting in the deaths of eight children.
- Of the 311 IPV homicides examined in this dataset, there were at least 172 children under the age of 18 who survived the homicide involving one, or both, of their parents.

Focused IPV homicide dataset (n=292)

Domestic violence death review teams are uniquely positioned to conduct in-depth analysis and reviews so as to identify discrete characteristics present within a relationship prior to an IPV homicide. Drawing on data from those jurisdictions with a formalised death review mechanism in place, this report presents focused data findings around IPV homicide characteristics relating to separation or intention to separate, family law proceedings, domestic violence orders, and the nature of domestic violence and abusive behaviours used by the abuser prior to the homicide.

This focused subset of cases includes 224 cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a female victim; 62 cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male partner; and six cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a male partner.

Separation as a characteristic of IPV homicide

Male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female partner (n=224)

- In about a third of the cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a female victim (n=77, 34.4%) the relationship had ended prior to the homicide. In more than half of these cases, the relationship had ended within three months of the fatal episode of violence (n=44, 57.1% of separated couples).
- Of the 147 cases where the relationship was ongoing, one or both parties had expressed an intention to separate in 53 cases (36.1%). The overwhelming majority of these cases involved the female homicide victim indicating an intention to separate from the male offender who killed her (n=50, 94.3%).
- Accordingly, actual or intended separation was a feature in more than half of the cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a female partner (n=130, 58.0%).

Female IPV homicide offenders who killed a male partner (n=62)

- In just under a quarter of cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male partner the relationship had ended prior to the homicide (n=14, 22.6%). Five of these separations occurred less than three months prior to the homicide (35.7% of separated relationships).
- Of the 48 cases where the relationship was ongoing, one or both parties had indicated an intention to leave the relationship in 14 cases (29.2%). In the majority of these 14 cases, it was the female homicide offender who had indicated an intention to separate from the male partner she then killed (n=8, 57.1%).
- Accordingly, actual or intended separation was a feature in just under half of the cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male intimate partner (n=28, 45.2%).

Domestic violence orders

Male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female partner (n=224)

- Current or historical domestic violence orders were evident in 96 cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a female partner (42.9%). Accordingly, in 128 cases there was no evidence of a current or historical domestic violence order (57.1%).
- In 49 cases, a current domestic violence order was in place between the male IPV offender and female victim at the time of the homicide (21.9%). The vast majority of these orders named the female homicide victim as the person in need of protection from the male homicide offender (n=44, 89.8% of cases with a current order). In two cases (4.1%) there were cross-orders in place at the time of the homicide where both the male IPV homicide offender and the female victim were named as needing protection from the other. In three cases (6.1%) the male IPV homicide offender was named as the person in need of protection from the female partner they killed.
- Historical domestic violence orders between the male homicide offender and female victim were a feature in 67 cases (29.9%). In 53 of these cases, the female homicide victim was named as the protected person from the male offender (79.1%) and in 11 cases both parties were named as needing protection from the other (16.4%).

Female IPV homicide offenders who killed a male partner (n=62)

- Current or historical domestic violence orders were evident in 41 cases where a female homicide offender killed a male partner (66.1% of female-perpetrated IPV homicides).
- In 21 cases, a current domestic violence order was in place between the female homicide offender and the male homicide victim at the time of the homicide (33.9%). Twelve of these orders named the female homicide offender as the person in need of protection from the male homicide victim (57.1% of current orders); eight named the male homicide victim as the person in need of protection from the female homicide offender (38.1%); and one was a cross-order naming both parties as needing protection from each other (4.8%).
- Historical domestic violence orders between the female homicide offender and male homicide victim were a feature in 29 cases (46.8%). In 17 of these cases, the female homicide offender was named as the protected person from the male homicide victim (58.6%) and in 11 cases both parties were named as in need of protection from each other (37.9%).

Domestic violence abusive behaviours

- In the focused dataset (n=292), the vast majority of the 224 male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female victim were identified as the primary domestic violence abuser in the relationship (n=212, 94.6%). Of the 62 cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male partner, only a small proportion of women were identified as the primary abuser against the male partner they killed (n=5, 8.1%). In half of the six cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a male partner, the homicide offender was identified as the primary abuser in the relationship (n=3, 50%).
- Of the 212 cases in which a male primary domestic violence abuser killed a female victim, the majority used emotional and psychological abuse (n=173, 81.6%) and physical abuse (n=169, 79.7%) against the female partner they killed. Over half had been socially abusive (n=134, 63.2%), just over a quarter were financially abusive (n=58, 27.4%) and far fewer were known to be sexually abusive (n=34, 16.0%).
- Stalking occurred in two fifths of the 212 cases in which a male primary domestic violence abuser killed a female victim (n=88, 41.5%). In 71 cases, the domestic violence abuser stalked the victim during the relationship (33.5%) and in 44 cases the abuser stalked the victim after the relationship ended (20.8%).

Death review - Death Reviews

Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Documents

National

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network (2018), Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: 2018, New South Wales Domestic Violence Death Review Team, Sydney.

Abstract: The Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network ('the Network') was established in 2011 and represents a unique collaboration between domestic and family violence death review mechanisms across Australia. Network members have specialist expertise in domestic and family violence related issues and access to extensive information pertaining to domestic and family violence deaths. This is critical to providing a more informed, holistic understanding of the circumstances and context of a domestic and family violence related death.

In recent years, the Network has undertaken extensive work to develop a National Minimum Dataset of domestic and family violence related deaths and this report presents key findings from this specialised dataset.

This report demonstrates the breadth of information and data that is held by the Network, and its unique ability to collect and report on data in relation to domestic and family violence related deaths.

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2022), Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018 (2nd ed.; Research report 03/2022). ANROWS.

The data presented in this report provides a national picture of characteristics present in intimate partner violence homicides ("IPV") in Australia between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2018, examining the 311 reported IPV homicides across Australia.

Key findings include:

- IPV homicide is highly gendered: in the majority of cases, domestic violence is used by the man against his female partner. Less than one quarter of all cases involved a female IPV homicide offender killing a current or former male partner, and more than three quarters of all cases involved a male IPV homicide offender killing a current or former female partner (n=240, 77.2%).
- IPV homicide occurs across a broad age range (18–82) with the majority of offenders and victims born in Australia.
- IPV homicide can occur at any stage during a relationship with homicides occurring during or after short relationships, as well as after many years of protracted violence by abusers.
- There is a heightened vulnerability for women who separate or intend to separate from their partners prior to the homicide, with actual or intended separation being a feature in over half of the male-perpetrated IPV homicides. Actual (n=77, 34.4%) or intended separation (n=53, 36.1%) was a feature in more than half of cases where a male IPV offender killed a female partner (n=130, 58.0%).
- The diverse range of abusive tactics identified in this dataset, including physical, emotional, social, financial and sexual violence and stalking, suggests that any relationship that exhibits domestic violence, whether physical or non-physical, is embedded with a risk of lethality.
- Only approximately one third of all IPV homicide offenders and victims were engaged in paid employment at the time of the homicide (n=225 of 622, 36.2%).
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are overrepresented as both IPV victims and offenders, with a complex range of interrelated factors associated with the disproportionate incidence and severity of family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities.

The report identifies particular domestic violence abusive behaviours observed in the focused dataset:

- In the focused dataset (n=292), the vast majority of the 224 male IPV homicide offenders who killed a female victim were identified as the primary domestic violence abuser in the relationship (n=212, 94.6%). Of the 62 cases where a female IPV homicide offender killed a male partner, only a small proportion of women were identified as the primary abuser against the male partner they killed (n=5, 8.1%). In half of the six cases where a male IPV homicide offender killed a male partner, the homicide offender was identified as the primary abuser in the relationship (n=3, 50%).
- Of the 212 cases in which a male primary domestic violence abuser killed a female victim, the majority used emotional and psychological abuse (n=173, 81.6%) and physical abuse (n=169, 79.7%) against the female partner they killed. Over half had been socially abusive (n=134, 63.2%), just over a quarter were financially abusive (n=58, 27.4%) and far fewer were known to be sexually abusive (n=34, 16.0%).

- Stalking occurred in two fifths of the 212 cases in which a male primary domestic violence abuser killed a female victim (n=88, 41.5%). In 71 cases, the domestic violence abuser stalked the victim during the relationship (33.5%) and in 44 cases the abuser stalked the victim after the relationship ended (20.8%).

It concludes:

This research demonstrates the highly gendered nature of intimate partner violence and IPV homicides, with the male party being identified as the primary domestic violence abuser in the majority of cases where a male homicide offender killed a female victim and where a female homicide offender killed a male partner. In many cases, there had been a domestic violence order naming one or both parties as in need of protection from the other at the time of, or prior to, the homicide. The vast majority of these named the female party as needing protection from her male partner. This demonstrates that in many cases the domestic violence had been reported and there had been some level of police or court intervention prior to the homicide.

With separation being a prominent feature in over half of the male-perpetrated IPV homicides against women and almost half of the female-perpetrated IPV homicides, this research also demonstrates that the period leading up to and immediately following separation involves a heightened level of risk.

Analysis of the domestic violence behaviours used by the primary domestic violence abuser demonstrates the range of physical and non-physical violence used by abusive men to dominate and control their partner. The high prevalence of emotional and psychological abuse (such as verbally denigrating, threatening, blaming or gaslighting the victim) and social abuse (such as isolating the victim from support networks and controlling her movements) demonstrates the need for services and first responders to recognise, beyond the use of physical violence, the pattern of abusive and controlling behaviours that presents in a domestic violence relationship. Further, the diverse range of abusive tactics present in this dataset, including physical, emotional, social, financial and sexual violence, and stalking, suggests that any relationship that exhibits domestic violence, whether physical or non-physical, is embedded with a risk of lethality.

Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network, & Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2022) Domestic and family violence lethality: Updated facts about intimate partner homicide (Fact sheet).

This fact sheet highlights important findings of the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review

Network Data Report: Intimate partner violence homicides 2010–2018.

Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, (commenced 2022) Missing and murdered First Nations women and children. Parliament of Australia (Webpage).

This inquiry is tasked to examine issues associated with missing and murdered First N ations women and children, with particular reference to:

- the number of First Nations women and children who are missing and murdered;
- the current and historical practices, including resources, to investigating the deaths and missing person reports of First Nations women and children in each jurisdiction compared to non-First Nations women and children;
- the institutional legislation, policies and practices implemented in response to all forms of violence experienced by First Nations women and children;
- the systemic causes of all forms of violence, including sexual violence, against First Nations women and children, including underlying social, economic, cultural, institutional and historical causes contributing to the ongoing violence and particular vulnerabilities of First Nations women and children;
- the policies, practices and support services that have been effective in reducing violence and increasing safety of First Nations women and children, including self-determined strategies and initiatives;
- the identification of concrete and effective actions that can be taken to remove systemic causes of violence and to increase the safety of First Nations women and children;
- the ways in which missing and murdered First Nations women and children and their families can be honoured and commemorated; and
- any other related matters.

The website includes submissions, details of hearings and other documents including statistics requested by the Committee.

ACT

ACT data for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network is provided by the National Coronial Information System with the approval of the ACT Coroner's Court.

Australian Government (2021). National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children: Family Violence Death Review: Responsible government: Australian Capital Territory (website).

The ACT Family Violence Death Review was established through legislation in 2021.

“The intended outcome of an ACT Family Violence Death Review is to make system-wide improvements across policy, systems and services, data collection and legislation to prevent future deaths related to domestic and family violence. Risk factors identified as part of the Death Review will also inform concurrent work of the ACT Government to deliver a domestic and family violence risk assessment and management framework (see Domestic and Family Violence Risk Assessment and Management Framework).”

NSW

Coroner’s Court New South Wales, Domestic violence death review (Government of New South Wales).

The Domestic Violence Death Review Team (DVDRT) was established in 2010 pursuant to the Coroners Act 2009 NSW to review deaths occurring in the context of domestic violence in New South Wales. This page details the role, function and membership of the DVDRT and provides links to the annual reports of the DVDRT to Parliament. It also provides a link to reports of the national Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network.

NSW Domestic Violence Death Review Team (2021). Report: 2019-2021. New South Wales Government, Sydney.

Key findings:

All Intimate Partner Homicides

- The vast majority (86.3%) of intimate partner homicides in NSW occur following an identifiable history of domestic violence.

Intimate Partner Violence Homicides

Gender

- Nearly 80% of all intimate partner violence (IPV) homicide victims were women.
- The vast majority of men who killed their female intimate partner were the predominant domestic violence abuser in the relationship (98.5%).
- The vast majority of women who killed their male intimate partner were the predominant domestic violence victim in the relationship (91.3%).
- There were no cases where a woman was identified as the predominant domestic violence abuser in the relationship.

Male predominant abuser behaviours and histories of violence:

- Emotional/psychological violence was evident in almost all cases (96.7%).
- In more than a quarter of cases there was no identifiable history of physical violence prior to the fatal assault (27.3%).
- Almost 60% of male abusers were known to have perpetrated violence against at least one prior partner, as well as the victim (58.1%).
- In 22.9% of cases there was a current enforceable ADVO at the time of the homicide.
- In 46.9% of cases there was no police contact prior to the homicide.

Homicide offender and victim characteristics:

- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples continue to be significantly overrepresented in intimate partner homicides:
  - 15.5% of female and 34.8% of male IPV homicide victims.
  - 28.3% of female and 11.2% of male IPV homicide offenders.
- Intimate partner homicide victims were most commonly living in areas with the lowest socio-economic status.
- One third of male homicide offenders engaged in alcohol (39.8%) or drug use (33%).
- More than half of male homicide offenders had a confirmed or suspected background of mental health issues (up to 51.9%).
- Over 40% of male homicide offenders had experienced significant trauma and/or adversity in their childhood (41.7%).

Relationship characteristics

- Separation was a factor in two-thirds of IPV homicides involving a male offender killing a female intimate partner (66.5%).
- From the 252 IPV homicides in the dataset there were at least 267 child survivors

NT

Northern Territory information for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network is provided by the Coroner's Office of the Northern Territory.

QLD

Queensland Coroners Court, Review of deaths from domestic and family violence (Queensland Government).

The Domestic and Family Violence Death Review and Advisory Board ("the Board") was established pursuant to the Coroners Act 2003 (Qld) in response to a key recommendation of the he Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence Final Report, Not Now, Not Ever: Ending domestic and family violence in Queensland (Queensland Government).

This page details the role, function and membership of the Board and provides links to the Systemic and Annual Reports of the Board to Parliament, as well as a statistical overview of Queensland domestic and family violence data, research reports and submissions.

Domestic and Family Violence Death Review and Advisory Board (2022) Collaborative responses to risk, safety, and dangerousness: Annual Report 2021-22, Queensland Government.

The 2021-22 Queensland report highlights 6 key lethality risk indicators in intimate partner homicides between 2011 and 2018 (where recorded) as follows:

- In 53.2% the victim had an intuitive sense of fear of the perpetrator;
- In 26.1% the victim had experienced non-lethal strangulation by the perpetrator;
- In 37% there had been an escalation in violence prior to the homicide;
- In 35.95% the perpetrator had made threats to kill;
- In 15.2% there was a history of sexual violence.

In particular, the Board recommends a focus on understanding escalation of domestic violence, particularly where victims present to agencies on multiple occasions. The Board observed that further protective action taken by victims, for example, seeking to vary a protection order can indicate a change in circumstances or that current conditions are ineffective, should be interpreted as reflecting an escalation of violence. Service providers should be aware that some actions by the victim can heighten risk of harm, including taking steps to secure the safety of children through mediation and legal processes.

TAS

Tasmanian data for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network is provided by the National Coronial Information System with the approval of the Tasmanian Coroner's Court.

VIC

Coroners Court of Victoria (2020) Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths: Review of Family Violence Related Homicides: 1 January 2011 to 31 December 2015, State of Victoria.

Extract: The Victorian Systemic Review of Family Violence Deaths (VSRFVD) at the Coroners Court of Victoria (CCOV) is led by the State Coroner and examines the context in which family violence-related deaths occur. Through coroners' findings, comments and recommendations, the VSRFVD contributes to strengthening the response to family violence in Victoria.

To assist the work of the VSRFVD, and coroners, the CCOV captures data relating to homicides in Victoria using the Victorian Homicide Register (VHR). The VHR records every homicide reported to the CCOV and captures a range of information pertaining to the homicide victim and offender. In cases identified as family violence related homicides, further information regarding the dynamics of the relationship between the homicide victim and offender, any family violence history and risk factors are captured.

The VSRFVD 'First Report' was published in 2012 and used data relating to homicides from 1 January 2000 to 31 December 2010 to explore the factors and circumstances in which family violence homicide deaths occur. This report builds on that initial dataset, presenting data in relation to family violence homicides which occurred between 1 January 2011 and 31 December 2015.

Of the 257 homicide related deaths reported during this time period, where the coronial investigation was closed, 97 deaths were identified as family violence related deaths where coding into the VHR had been completed. Those deaths arose from 82 separate homicide incidents perpetrated by 86 homicide offenders. Data from these deaths was examined for the purposes of this report.

WA

Western Australian data for the Australian Domestic and Family Violence Death Review Network has been provided by the National Coronial Information System with the approval of the Western Australian Coroner's Court.

Ombudsman Western Australia, Family and Domestic Violence Fatality Review (Western Australian Government).

This is the section of the Ombudsman's 2019-20-21 Annual Report which relates to Family and Domestic Violence Fatality Review. It sets out the work of the Ombudsman in the area, including:

- Background;
- The role of the Ombudsman in relation to family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- The family and domestic violence fatality review process;
- Analysis of family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Patterns, trends and case studies relating to family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Issues identified in family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Recommendations;
- Timely handling of notifications and reviews;
- Major own motion investigations arising from family and domestic violence fatality reviews;
- Other mechanisms to prevent or reduce family and domestic violence fatalities; and
- Stakeholder liaison.

The 2020-21 Annual Report records the following issues identified from fatality review (it is important to note that issues are not identified in every family and domestic violence fatality review; and when an issue has been identified, it does not necessarily mean that the issue is related to the death):

- Not working directly with remote Aboriginal community to facilitate local solutions to family violence that are co-designed, and led, by Aboriginal people to promote safety.
- Missed opportunities to develop culturally informed safety planning and consult with Aboriginal experts.

- Not undertaking sufficient action to confirm the cultural safety of a family and domestic violence model in use across the diverse population of Aboriginal people in Western Australia.
- Missed opportunities to address family and domestic violence perpetrator accountability.
- Missed opportunities to provide perpetrator rehabilitation support.
- Missed opportunities to address family and domestic violence victim safety.
- Missed opportunity to facilitate safe accommodation.
- Missed opportunity to assess risk of harm and develop strategies to reduce or prevent family and domestic violence in the context of mental health issues and/or drug and alcohol use.
- Not undertaking sufficient family and inter-agency communication to enable effective case management and collaborative responses.
- Not adequately meeting policy and procedures of the Family and Domestic Violence Response Team.
- Not taking action consistent with legislative responsibilities of the Children and Community Services Act 2004, and associated policy, to determine whether children were in need of protection or whether action was required to safeguard child wellbeing.
- Not adequately meeting policies and procedures relating to the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander child placement principle, permanency planning and cultural care planning.
- Missed opportunity to develop safety planning to reduce the risk of an escalation of family and domestic violence, when children are taken into the care of the Chief Executive Officer.
- Missed opportunity to ensure governance, monitoring and evaluation of a family and domestic violence five-year initiative were in place to achieve positive outcomes.
- Inaccurate recordkeeping.

Typological approaches

To better understand the nature and causes of domestic and family violence, US researchers in the 1990s, concerned about the risks of accepting narrow, unitary conceptions, sought to differentiate types of violence, and groups of perpetrators and victims [Boxall et al 2015]. Early typological groupings were characterised as "situational couple violence", "intimate terrorism", "violent resistance", and "mutual violent control" [Johnson & Ferraro 2000]. In the decades since, various authors have developed and expanded on these typologies, which essentially focus on physical violence and vary according to perceptions of the presence or absence of coercive control. Michael Johnson and his colleagues have been working on understanding patterns of domestic and family violence for many years and this work has been very influential in Australia [Kelly & Johnson 2008].

Some Australian judicial officers and legal practitioners in the family law jurisdiction have shown considerable interest in the typological approach, for example in some instances typologies are referenced in best practice materials, and are relied on in decision-making. This is despite a much broader legislative approach taken in Australian jurisdictions to recognising a range of behaviours, in addition to physical violence, as constituting domestic and family violence [Wangmann 2011].

Consequently, researchers were prompted to investigate the utility of typologies in the Australian context, particularly among professionals responsible for the management of domestic and family violence matters, such as police, lawyers, service providers and treatment practitioners [Boxall et al 2015]. Respondents expressed a number of concerns about adhering to typologies in identifying abusive behaviours, including:

- Criteria are inflexible and don't satisfactorily account for anomalies or outliers;
- Criteria may be too abstract and subjective, and therefore open to challenge;
- The unique, complex and non-standard nature of specific cases, and the corresponding need for individualised responses, may be overlooked;
- It may encourage a less rigorous approach to the assessment of behaviours and associated risks;
- Static classifications are unlikely to be appropriate for behaviours and relationship dynamics that change over time;

- They felt they didn’t have the necessary skills to apply the typologies in different contexts accurately and consistently.

Instead, these professionals expressed a strong preference for basing their judgments and assessments on: experience; knowledge; best practice; information elicited using risk assessment tools and from interagency databases; observations of perpetrators’ behavioural patterns and violence histories; and direct interviews with perpetrators and victims. They did however indicate that typologies may have a complementary application in their practices, for example in: supporting existing knowledge; assisting risk assessment; better screening of families for referral to alternative dispute resolution processes and services where likely benefits are identified and safety is ensured; determining perpetrator treatment options and violence prevention strategies that address the underlying cause of violent behaviours; and continuing professional education and training [Boxall et al 2015].

Typological approaches - Key Literature

Australia

Boxall, Haley, et al, 'Domestic Violence Typologies: What Value to Practice?' 494 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

Over the last few decades, understandings of the nature and causes of domestic violence have increased in sophistication. This has been influenced by, and led to, an influx of domestic violence typologies that have attempted to identify differences between groups of offenders and victims based on factors ranging from physiological reactions to specific stimuli through to historical experiences of violence and abuse. While this research has been of undeniable conceptual and theoretical value, its applicability to the day-to-day work of domestic violence practitioners is less clear. This study represents one of the first attempts to speak directly to professionals about how domestic violence typologies inform their everyday decision-making and case practice.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Different Types Of Intimate Partner Violence: An Exploration Of The Literature' (Issue Paper 22, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, 2011).

Key points:

- The last 15 years has seen a growing body of research emphasising that not all intimate partner violence (IPV) is the same. There are key differences in terms of the presence of control, gender perpetration, severity and impact.
- Work on differentiation is diverse. It includes research exploring different types of IPV, as well as different types of male and female perpetrators of IPV.There is great interest in the potential of differentiation to assist in more appropriately targeted interventions for victims, perpetrators and any children of the relationship. In particular, in the area of family law in Australia, along with Canada and the United States, there has been some interest expressed in the potential for differentiation to provide for more nuanced responses that take account of the type of violence or perpetrator when making determinations about ongoing parenting arrangements.
- A range of important concerns and criticisms have been raised about the methodology of the various typologies, as well as concerns about their translation into practice. They suggest that there is still much more work to be done on the articulation of typologies before a useful tool can be developed to assist delineation in practice.

International

Johnson, Michael P, and Kathleen J Ferraro, 'Research on Domestic Violence in the 1990s: Making Distinctions' (2000) 62 (4) Journal of Marriage and the Family 948.

This US review of the family literature on domestic violence suggests to the authors two broad themes of the 1990s. The first, in their view, is the importance of distinctions among types or contexts of violence. Some distinctions are central to the theoretical and practical understanding of the nature of partner violence; others provide important contexts for developing more sensitive and comprehensive theories; and others may question the tendency to generalise from context to another. Second, the authors suggest that issues of control—although most visible in feminist literature that focuses on men using violence to control "their" women—also arise in other contexts, calling for more general analyses of the interplay of violence, power, and control in relationships. This article theorises four major patterns of partner violence:

- Common couple violence – not connected to a general pattern of control, not as likely to escalate over time or to involve severe violence, more likely to be mutual.
- Intimate terrorism- one tactic in a pattern of control, likely to escalate over time more likely to involve severe violence and less likely to be mutual.
- Violent resistance-perpetrated almost entirely by women, similar to understandings of self-defence.
- Mutual violent control- both husband and wife are controlling and violent – could be viewed as two intimate terrorists battling for control. Relatively rare.

In addition, the review covers literature on coping with violence, the effects on victims and their children, and the social effects of partner violence.

Kelly, Joan, and Michael Johnson, 'Differentiation Among Types of Intimate Partner Violence: Research Update and Implications for Interventions' (2008) 46 (3) Family Court Review 476.

In this article Kelly and Johnson further develop and discuss four patterns of domestic violence which they call: Coercive Controlling Violence, Violent Resistance, Situational Couple Violence, and Separation-Instigated Violence.

- Coercive controlling violence- identified by the pattern of coercive and controlling behaviours embedded within it.
- Violent resistance- self-protective violence.
- Situational couple violence- most common type of physical aggression. One or both partners appear to have poor ability to manage their conflicts and/or poor control of anger. Violence tends to be less serious and fear does not tend to be present.
- Separation-instigated violence- Separation-Instigated Violence is more likely to be perpetrated by the partner who is being left and is shocked by this. Can be severe.

Pence, Ellen and Shamita Das Dasgupta, Re-Examining 'Battering': Are All Acts of Violence Against Intimate Partners the Same? (Praxis International, 2006).

This US study conducted interviews over a 15-year period with men and women who were arrested for domestic violence and involved in court proceedings. The authors identified 5 categories of domestic violence, which are not mutually exclusive:

- Battering: the use of intimidation, coercion and violence in order to control another person or group (pp 5-9). The vast majority (95%) of men in the study were assessed to be batterers (p 15).
- Resistive/reactive violence: the use of violence to retaliate and resist domination, often in resistance to ongoing battering (pp 9-11).
- Situational violence: the use of violence to express anger, disapproval or to reach an objective. Battering is often misdiagnosed as situational violence because police and practitioners often intervene in a specific incident of abuse and do not investigate whether there is a pattern. Victims themselves may not recognise a pattern (pp 11-12).
- Pathological violence: the use of violence by individuals that suffer from mental illness or physical disorders, or abuse alcohol and drugs. It is often difficult to determine when the pathology causes the violence (pp 12-13). Four percent of men in the study committed domestic violence exclusively due to pathological reasons (p 15).
- Anti-social violence: the use of verbal or physical abuse in social settings. This violence may stem from antecedents such as childhood abuse and a lack of maturity (pp 13-14).

Typological approaches - Other Bench Books

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.2.2 discusses how some researchers have categorised different types of intimate partner violence using typologies (including the Kelly and Johnson typology) based on the role of violence in the context of the relationship, and notes that caution has been expressed by some commentators about this approach.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

See [13.7.1] 'Theories of family and domestic violence', which discusses the development of models to understand family and domestic violence. It notes the development from models understanding domestic violence as a function of mental illness or mental triggers (such as anger/stress/loss of control), to the theory of victims suffering from learned helplessness, to a family conflict model, to an understanding of the theory of Stockholm Syndrome. It notes that 'While there is no such thing as a "typical" perpetrator of domestic violence, studies reveal certain common behaviours among these men', going on to discuss the 'Power and Control Wheel' as the best tool to capture the dynamics of domestic and family violence.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

See Supplementary Reference 1: Developing research: distinguishing types of violence: '[t]his section discusses a developing body of domestic violence research that is identifying differences in forms of heterosexual male and female violence in intimate relationships'. It explores Michael Johnson's distinctions around violence, but also cautions about '[d]ifferential assessment of violence' due to the controversies around the research that has been conducted on distinctions between different types of violence. It states that '[i]t is not possible to identify scientifically, with confidence or with clarity, the boundaries between repetitive or severe 'situational violence' and coercive 'domestic violence''.

Typological approaches - Other Resources

Johnson, Michael P, 'Types of Domestic Violence: Research Evidence' (Video Lecture published online, 13 November 2012).

Johnson, Michael P,(Ph.D., University of Michigan) is Emeritus Professor of Sociology, Women's Studies, and African and African American Studies at Penn State. In this lecture he discusses his theories about typologies of violence.

Vulnerable groups

Domestic and family violence can affect any person irrespective of age, gender, socio-economic status or cultural background. It is widely acknowledged however that women are significantly more likely than men to experience domestic and family violence. However, men also experience domestic and family violence and when they do they may experience stigma and, similar to others, may face obstacles in accessing help and difficulty in having their story believed [Drijber et al 2013].

A key role of judicial responses to domestic and family violence is to assess and respond to risk and promote the safety of those at the risk of harm.

Certain groups within the community may be at greater risk of experiencing domestic and family violence, may be more vulnerable to its impacts, and may require different judicial responses to ensure that all individuals are afforded fair and equal access to justice. Some people may belong to multiple groups and, as a consequence, may experience heightened risk or vulnerability. These groups may include but are not limited to:

- Women
- People with children
- Children
- Young people
- Older people
- Pregnant people
- People with disability and impairment
- People with mental illness
- People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people
- People living in regional, rural and remote communities
- People affected by substance misuse
- People who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer +

People with poor literacy skills

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators

Vulnerable groups - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics, 4510.0 - Recorded Crime - Victims, Australia, 2021.

Victims of Domestic and Family Violence-Related Offences

This chapter presents experimental data about victims of selected Family and Domestic Violence (FDV) – related offences. Victims of selected offences have been determined to be FDV–related where the relationship of offender to victim, as stored on police recording systems, falls within a specified family or domestic relationship or where an FDV flag has been recorded, following a police investigation.

Key findings include:

- FDV-related homicide victims accounted for over a third of total homicide victims, and females accounted for over half of all FDV-related homicide victims.
- FDV-related assault is mostly likely to occur in the age range 25-34 years; and, across all states and territories, females are more likely than males to be victims – at least three times as likely, and up to six times more likely.
- FDV-related sexual assault accounted for over a third of total sexual assaults and there are six times as many female victims as male victims.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia: continuing the national story 2019.

This is primarily a data report to help inform government policies and plans and to assist in the planning and delivery of violence prevention and intervention programs. It builds on AIHW's inaugural Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia 2018 report. It presents new information on vulnerable groups, such as children and young women. It examines elder abuse in the context of family, domestic and sexual violence, and includes new data on telephone and web-based support services, community attitudes, sexual harassment and stalking. It also includes the latest data on homicides, child protection, hospitals and specialist homelessness services, while noting notable data gaps on various aspects of family, domestic and sexual violence and work underway to fill the gaps and develop new data sources.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Bagshaw, Dale, and Donna Chung, Women, Men and Domestic Violence (Department of Prime Minister and Cabinet (Cth) and University of South Australia, 2000).

Discusses research over the past two decades in Australia and notes it has shown that violence generally, and particularly domestic violence, is mainly carried out by men.(p1) While there is evidence that both men and women are abusive in domestic relationships, most data show that men are more likely than women to be violent towards their partners. It reviews the findings of research and notes that these differ greatly according to the way the research is done, but they clearly show that the nature and results of men's violence are different to that of women's violence in a number of significant ways. In particular: men's violence is more severe, and more likely to inflict severe injury; women are more likely to be killed by current or former male partners than by anyone else; and less than 10% of Australian male homicides are carried out by an intimate partner. When women do kill their male partners, there is a history of domestic violence in more than 70% of cases.' (p1)

Specifically in relation to female perpetrators of domestic violence, the authors note on p13 that 'Although there is some evidence that both men and women engage in abusive behaviour in heterosexual relationships, the nature and consequence of women's violence is not equivalent to men's violence [in a number of ways]', including severity, likelihood of being killed, and reasons for the violence.

Morgan, Anthony, Hayley Boxall and Rick Brown, Targeting repeat domestic violence: Assessing short term risk of reoffending (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 552 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Drawing on repeat victimisation studies, and analysing police data on domestic violence incidents, the current study examined the prevalence and correlates of short-term reoffending.

The results showed that a significant proportion of offenders reoffended in the weeks and months following a domestic violence incident. Individuals who reoffended more quickly were more likely to be involved in multiple incidents in a short period of time. Offenders with a history of domestic violence—particularly more frequent offending—and of breaching violence orders were more likely to reoffend. Most importantly, the risk of reoffending was cumulative, increasing with each subsequent incident.

The findings have important implications for police and other frontline agencies responding to domestic violence, demonstrating the importance of targeted, timely and graduated responses.

Salter, M., et al., A deep wound under my heart": Constructions of complex trauma and implications for women's wellbeing and safety from violence (ANROWS, 2020)

Complex trauma can be explained as "multiple, repeated forms of interpersonal victimisation and the resulting traumatic health problems and psychosocial challenges". This report aimed to (1) analyse how complex trauma experienced by women is constructed in public policy and practice at national, state and territory levels; (2) examine institutional responses to women's complex trauma in the mental health, alcohol and drugs, and sexual assault/domestic violence sectors in NSW and Queensland; (3) document how complex trauma is understood by women who have experienced it, as well as their encounters with agencies while seeking help; and (4) develop models of improved and collaborative responses to improve the wellbeing and safety of victims and their children.

Key results include:

- 'References to complex trauma in public policy are typically brief and undefined', and '[t]he lack of shared terminology and understanding of complex trauma raises questions about the adequacy of current policy frameworks to address the multiple needs of people with experiences of complex trauma and the effects that varying understandings of the long-term impact of complex trauma may have on program and service delivery'.
- Women who have experienced complex trauma often have multiple needs, but many services are funded only to deal with a particular issue or concern. Consequently, women are required to navigate multiple services and agencies so that their needs can be met.
- 'Self-harm and suicidality are particularly stigmatised in service settings', and '[w]omen with experiences of complex trauma frequently encountered sexist and disparaging views about women's mental health, encapsulated in the common stereotype of the "crazy woman"'.
- 'There is currently a lack of trauma-specialised services and professionals, and women's experiences of health care are typically segmented and uncoordinated.'
- 'Successful criminal justice outcomes for women with experiences of complex trauma are rare'. None of the women interviewed for the study stated that 'the full extent of [their] victimisation had been prosecuted in the criminal justice system'.

- ‘There is widespread concern that the impact of trauma on parenting is not being addressed in the child protection system, resulting in late and punitive interventions.’
- ‘In family law matters, women are frequently not believed or supported when reporting abuse by an ex-partner and are often worse off financially and psychologically for their contact with the legal process.’
- Best practices in service provision for people with experiences of complex trauma are set out on p. 9, and recommendations are specified on pp. 10-11.

International

Drijber, Babette, Udo Reijnders and Manon Ceelen, ‘Male Victims of Domestic Violence’ (2013) 28(2) Journal of Family Violence 173–178.

This study conducted in the Netherlands involved 372 male victims of domestic violence. The participants completed an online questionnaire. The participants reported both physical and psychological abuse. Key findings included: Less than 32% of the victims spoke to the police about the violence and only 15% of the victims officially reported it; the reason reported for failing to talk to the police or report the domestic violence were fear of not being taken seriously (49%), shame (31%), or the belief the police cannot do anything (35%); and motives not to report the domestic violence were the belief the police would not take any action (41%), fear or aggravated violence (17%), or fear of revenge (19%) (p175).

Vulnerable groups - Other Resources

ANROWS, Fast Facts: Impacts of Family, Domestic and Sexual Violence.

This resource provides a one page summary of Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

Women

‘The biggest risk factor for becoming a victim of sexual assault or domestic and family violence is being a woman.’ [National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009]

Prompted by growing academic, government and community attention to the range of complex issues associated with domestic and family violence, Australian researchers have considered the gendered nature of this form of violence. Claims that domestic and family violence is gender-equal or gender-neutral [Flood 2006] are consistently refuted by empirical research demonstrating that, while sometimes women are violent in their intimate relationships, overwhelmingly it is men who are more likely than women to be violent towards their partners [Bagshaw & Chung 2000].

The nature and consequences of men’s violence are significantly different from women’s violence, in particular: men’s violence is more severe, and is more likely to inflict serious injury, to involve the exercise of coercive control, and to cause fear [Bagshaw & Chung 2000]; women are more likely than men to experience actual or threatened physical or sexual violence or emotional abuse by a partner [ABS PSS 2016]; women experience much higher levels of violence and emotional abuse by former partners than by current partners [ABS PSS 2016]; and women are more likely to be killed by current or former male partners than by anyone else. The data also indicate that although more rare, when women do kill their male partners, there is a history of domestic violence by the male partner in more than 70% of cases [Bagshaw & Chung 2000]. Further research explains that the gendered framing of domestic and family violence recognises that this form of violence occurs within the wider context of social and economic disadvantage and inequality experienced by women in relation to men, which may mean that for some women multiple factors may intersect so as to heighten their vulnerability [Murray & Powell 2009].

Recent research and statistical analyses verify earlier studies. Seventeen per cent of Australian women and 5.5 per cent of Australian men experience physical violence by their cohabiting partner [ABS PSS 2016]. In 76% of cases where a woman is the victim of homicide, the current or intimate male partner is the perpetrator/offender [Bricknell 2023]. Women are also more likely than men to experience {{CS::3.1.4::emotional abuse}} [ABS PSS 2016] by their partner and are more likely to experience anxiety and fear as a result [ABS PSS 2016]. Where women are the perpetrators of violence against their partners, they are also likely to be the victims of violence or sexual abuse by their partners and to be acting in self-defence, or to be suffering mental or physical ill health as a consequence [Hester 2013].

In Australia, legislation, judicial bench books [Other Bench Books], and government policies [DSS 2022] have drawn on available research and recognise that while men can be victims of domestic and family violence and sexual assault [ABS PSS 2016] the overwhelming majority of these behaviours are perpetrated by men against women, and that the most significant risk factor in this context is being a woman [Diemer 2015]. These resources also recognise that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds, young women and women with physical or mental disabilities are overrepresented as victims.

Women - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics, 4510.0 - Recorded Crime - Victims, Australia, 2021.

Victims of Domestic and Family Violence-Related Offences

This chapter presents experimental data about victims of selected Family and Domestic Violence (FDV) – related offences. Victims of selected offences have been determined to be FDV–related where the relationship of offender to victim, as stored on police recording systems, falls within a specified family or domestic relationship or where an FDV flag has been recorded, following a police investigation.

Key findings include:

- FDV-related homicide victims accounted for over a third of total homicide victims, and females accounted for over half of all FDV-related homicide victims.
- FDV-related assault is mostly likely to occur in the age range 25-34 years; and, across all states and territories, females are more likely than males to be victims – at least three times as likely, and up to six times more likely.
- FDV-related sexual assault accounted for over a third of total sexual assaults and there are six times as many female victims as male victims.

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

- One in five women (18% or 1.7 million) and one in twenty men (4.7% or 428,800) experienced sexual violence (see Table 3);

- Women were nearly three times more likely to have experienced partner violence than men, with approximately one in six women (17% or 1.6 million) and one in sixteen men (6.1% or 547,600) having experienced partner violence since the age of 15 (see Table 3);
- One in six women (16% or 1.5 million) and one in seventeen men (5.9% or 528,800) experienced physical violence by a partner (see Table 3);
- Women were eight times more likely to experience sexual violence by a partner than men (5.1% or 480,200 women compared to 0.6% or 53,000 men) (see Table 3);
- One in four women (23% or 2.2 million) and one in six men (16% or 1.4 million) reported experiencing emotional abuse by a current and/or previous partner since the age of 15 (see Table 27);
- Women were more likely to experience fear or anxiety resulting from their experiences of partner violence than men (see Table 20).

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children’s experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;

- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. Violence against women: Accurate use of key statistics (ANROWS, 2018).

This 'Key Facts' sheet prevents an overview of statistics sourced primarily from research from the 2016 ABS Personal Safety Survey and Australian Institute of Criminology. It identifies for example that in Australia:

- women are significantly more likely than men to experience domestic and family violence;
- Approximately one quarter of women have experienced at least one incident of violence by an intimate partner;
- On average, one woman a week is killed by her intimate partner;
- Women are most likely to experience physical assault in their home;
- Just over 9 out of 10 women reported that their last incident of physical assault by a male was perpetrated by a man they know (most commonly a former partner);
- Just under 9 out of 10 women reported that their last incident of sexual assault was perpetrated by a man they know (most commonly a former partner); and
- Of women who have experienced violence by a current partner since the age of 15, 82% had never contacted the police.

Bagshaw, Dale, and Donna Chung, Women, Men and Domestic Violence (Department of Prime Minister and Cabinet (Cth) and University of South Australia, 2000).

Discusses research over the past two decades in Australia and notes it has shown that violence generally, and particularly domestic violence, is mainly carried out by men.(p1) While there is evidence that both men and women are abusive in domestic relationships, most data show that men are more likely than women to be violent towards their partners. It reviews the findings of research and notes that these differ greatly according to the way the research is done, but they clearly show that the nature and results of men's violence are different to that of women's violence in a number of significant ways. In particular: men's violence is more severe, and more likely to inflict severe injury; women are more likely to be killed by current or former male partners than by anyone else; and less than 10% of Australian male homicides are carried out by an intimate partner. When women do kill their male partners, there is a history of domestic violence in more than 70% of cases.' (p1)

Specifically in relation to female perpetrators of domestic violence, the authors note on p13 that 'Although there is some evidence that both men and women engage in abusive behaviour in heterosexual relationships, the nature and consequence of women's violence is not equivalent to men's violence [in a number of ways]', including severity, likelihood of being killed, and reasons for the violence.

Belknap, Joanne, and Heather Melton, 'Are Heterosexual Men Also Victims of Intimate Partner Abuse?' (Research Paper, Applied Research Forum: National Electronic Network on Violence Against Women, March 2005).

This paper presents and discusses the varied findings on women's roles as perpetrators of intimate partner abuse (IPA). The reasons for these varied findings are examined and the implications of the research finding of gender symmetry in the perpetration of IPA are discussed. This paper documents the importance of the approach taken by the researcher regarding whether IPA is found to be gendered. This overview of scientific research concludes that IPA is indeed gendered, that the perpetrators are more commonly men and the victims are more commonly women. This review also emphasises the importance of not simply examining types of abuse reported, but the consequences of the abuse.

Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. Experiences of coercive control among Australian women. Statistical Bulletin no. 30. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Awareness of coercive control within the context of abusive intimate relationships is greater than ever before in Australia. However, there is limited research examining the different patterns and characteristics of abuse, particularly among large Australian samples.

This study examines the characteristics of violence and abuse reported by 1,023 Australian women who had recently experienced coercive control by their current or former partner. The most frequently reported behaviours were jealousy and suspicion of friends, constant insults, monitoring of movements and financial abuse. Over half of the respondents also reported experiencing physical forms of abuse (54%), including severe forms such as non-fatal strangulation (27%). One in three of these women also reported experiencing sexual violence during the survey period (30%). Women were much more likely to seek advice or support when they had also experienced physical or sexual forms of abuse.

Bricknell, S. (2023) Homicide in Australia 2020-2021. (National Homicide Monitoring Program) Sydney: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Statistical Report 42 reports: Between 1 July 2020 and 30 June 2021, there were 210 homicide incidents recorded by Australian state and territory police. In 2020–21, 36 percent (n=76) of homicide incidents were domestic homicides.

Of the 76 domestic homicides in 2020–21, half (50%, n=38) were intimate partner homicides. Intimate partner homicides comprised 18 percent of homicide incidents in Australia in 2020–21.

Another 12 homicides (6% of all homicide incidents) were filicides (where a parent killed their son or daughter), 11 (5%) were parricides (where a parent was killed by their son or daughter), four (2%) were siblicides (a brother or sister killed a sibling) and 11 (5%) were homicides of other family members or kin. (p6)

Intimate partner homicide (n=2,102) comprised 60 percent of domestic homicides and 24 percent of all homicide incidents between 1989–90 and 2020–21. Threequarters (76%, n=1,589) of these were female intimate partner homicides and a quarter were male intimate partner homicides (24%, n=513). (p15) Females are significantly more likely to be killed by an intimate partner or family member (69%, n=45), mostly by their current or former intimate partner (38%, n=25). (p14). (see Table A8, p38)

Bruton, Crystal and Danielle Tyson, Leaving Violent Men: A Study of Women's Experiences of Separation in Victoria, Australia (2017) 51(3) Australian & New Zealand Journal of Criminology 339-

354.

This article explores women's experiences of leaving abusive relationships and seeks to combat assumptions about the nature of such relationships through in-depth interviews with 12 women who had separated from their male intimate partners (p 5). While separation is broadly recognised as a key time for increased risk of violence towards women and their children (p 1), studies demonstrate that most people believe women are able to leave violent relationships, and do not understand why they might stay (p 2). Such views place the responsibility for ending the violence on women, but in reality, these relationships often include complex circumstances, and the 'stay/leave binary' is rarely applicable (p 2). The results indicate that women's experiences of coercive control significantly affected their decision-making in the context of separation (p 6):

- Many women feared leaving because they were aware that separation may provoke retaliatory violence, with some experiencing an escalation of abusive behaviour when they attempted to leave (p 7);
- Many women were motivated to leave the relationship in order to protect their children, especially where violence became directed towards the children (p 8);
- Women's attempts to leave their relationships were often hindered by their partner's control over their finances (p 9); and
- Women adopted strategies to manage their safety both during and following separation (pp 9-10), and many women experienced escalating violence after separation (pp 11-12).

Coumarelos, C., Weeks, N., Bernstein, S., Roberts, N., Honey, N., Minter, K., & Carlisle, E. (2023). Attitudes matter: The 2021 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS), Findings for Australia. (Research report 02/2023). ANROWS. https://ncas.au/

The NCAS findings are drawn from interviews with a representative sample of 19,100 Australians aged 16 years or over. The NCAS findings show that 'generally been slow but statistically significant improvement in community understanding of violence against women and attitudinal rejection of gender inequality and violence against women since 2013, according to all NCAS scales' however:

- 47% of people surveyed agreed that violence against women is a problem in their own suburb or town.
- 91% of respondents agreed that violence against women is a problem in Australia.
- 41% of respondents believed that domestic violence is equally committed by both men and women.

- 34% of respondents believed that it is common for sexual assault accusations to be used as a way of getting back at men (contrary to evidence).

Day, Andrew, Sharon Casey, Adam Gerace, Candice Oster and Deb O'Kane, The forgotten victims: prisoner experience of victimisation and engagement with the criminal justice system – Research report (ANROWS, 2018).

The following summarises the key aspects of this research report:

Premise

Many women in prison have experienced intimate partner violence. As this form of violence is often intergenerational and entrenched, women in prison are widely considered to be at particular risk of ongoing victimisation following release from custody. And yet, their support needs often go unrecognised, and it is likely that a range of barriers exists that prevent ex-prisoners from accessing services.

Approach

This research documents data from interviews with and surveys of 22 women incarcerated in Adelaide Women's Prison, as well as interviews with 12 key South Australian agencies and service providers, to arrive at an understanding of help-seeking behaviour and how this might inform service responses. The analysis is positioned within a review of current help-seeking theories that highlight how a wide range of individual, socio-cultural and structural factors can complicate a woman's decision to seek help when concerned for her personal safety, noting that the circumstances and personal histories of women in prison increase the barriers to effective help-seeking when they face violence following release.

Key observations

- The interviews with the women prisoners revealed their:
  - lack of awareness of when they should seek external support
  - lack of knowledge of available services
  - pervasive sense of mistrust and under-confidence in existing services
  - sense that better approaches can be developed drawing on the strengths of women, their peers and families.

- Women's experience of formal and informal support-seeking (positive and negative) often determine how they define intimate partner violence and whether they decide to seek to change their circumstances.
- Agencies and service providers expressed a range of views about the services that should be made available to women leaving prison, and these views were commonly shared by the women prisoners interviewed. It was acknowledged by both groups that services are not always visible or accessible to the women. There was also no sense that any integrated pathway for identifying and managing risk currently exists.

Conclusions

- Need identified for all jurisdictions: to clearly identify women in prison as a particularly vulnerable group who are likely to be at elevated risk of ongoing victimisation and intimate partner violence and who face significant barriers preventing them from accessing the types of services that may help them to keep safe; and take a specialised and integrated approach in addressing their needs. Successful models of reintegration are discussed.
- Need identified for people with lived experience of incarceration to be part of the service framework (design, delivery and goverance) in the community sector.
- Need identified for services and programs to reflect an understanding of the role violence in the lives of people who seek help (ie trauma-informed care)

Limitations

This research did not make conclusions about different cohorts of women prisoners having specific needs, for example women from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultural backgrounds.

Diemer, Kristin, 'ABS Personal Safety Survey: additional analysis on relationship and sex of perpetrator' (2015).

A working paper on analysis of gender and relationship between victims and perpetrators. This paper is a work in progress with ongoing updates. The purpose of this paper is to run a parallel analysis of female and male victims of family related violence reported in the ABS PSS. [Page 11] It was found that of all adult victims of violence by a current or ex de-facto partner, 76% were women who had experienced violence by a male partner, 22% were men who had experienced violence by a female partner and 2% were women and men victimised by a same sex partner (Note: due to the way the PSS collects data, a very small number of women and men may be double-counted across same-sex and opposite sex perpetrator categories).

Flood, Michael, 'The Debate Over Men's Versus Women's Family Violence' (Paper presented at Australian Institute of Judicial Administration Family Violence Conference, Adelaide, 23-24 February, 2006).

Identifies differences between men's and women's typical patterns of victimisation, it notes that while men are often the victims of violence, they are most at risk from other men. This paper provides a concise, but comprehensive overview of the literature contributing to conflicting arguments around perpetration of domestic or family violence by men and women.

Henry, Nicola, Asher Flynn and Anastasia Powell, Image-based sexual abuse: Victims and perpetrators (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 572 March 2019).

Report abstract:

Image-based sexual abuse (IBSA) refers to the non-consensual creation, distribution or threatened distribution of nude or sexual images. This research examines the prevalence, nature and impacts of IBSA victimisation and perpetration in Australia. This form of abuse was found to be relatively common among respondents surveyed and to disproportionately affect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people with a disability, homosexual and bisexual people and young people. The nature of victimisation and perpetration was found to differ by gender, with males more likely to perpetrate IBSA, and females more likely to be victimised by a partner or ex-partner.

Loxton, Deborah et al., Intimate Partner Violence Adversely Impacts Health over 16 years and across generations: a longitudinal cohort study (2017) PLoS ONE12(6): e0178138.

This study involved 16,761 participants in the Australian Longitudinal study on Women's Health, using six waves of survey data over 16 years. It found that women who had experienced intimate partner violence (IPV) reported poorer mental and physical health throughout their lives (p5). Compared with women who had never experienced IPV, women who have experienced IPV endure poorer physical health throughout their lives (p6). Women who have experienced IPV consistently ranked approximately 5 points lower on the SF-36 scale (a measurement of quality of life out of 100). Women who experience IPV also have poorer mental health throughout their lives (p6). They rank between 5 and 10 points lower throughout their lives (p 8).

Mansour, Julia, Women Defendants to AVOS: What is their experience of the justice system? (Women's Legal Services NSW, 2014).

Women's Legal Services NSW ('WLS') undertook an exploratory study of its 2010 experience of representing women who were defendants to Apprehended Domestic Violence Order ('AVO') proceedings in order to better understand what to be a growing phenomenon. The research was limited by a number of factors and is not a random sample of all NSW cases. However the results illustrate some of the systemic issues experienced by women AVO defendants'. These results were:

- Two-thirds of women clients defending AVOs reported that they were the victims of violence in their relationships.
- 'Many of the women defending AVOs reported that when police had been called after a violent incident, they felt that their version of events had not been viewed as credible compared with the other party, due to the circumstances of their heightened stress and anxiety'.
- 'Other women reported that they believed the other party had deliberately initiated AVO proceedings as a further mechanism of controlling their behaviour, by giving them the ability to threaten them with reports to police in the future'.
- 'In the majority of cases where women were defending AVOs, the other party's complaint related to a single incident only. In several of these cases injuries to the other party could be indicative of self-defence, such as scratching or biting on the arm or hand' (page 4).

The report suggests (1) improved data collection (2) the Bureau of Crimes Statistics and Research undertake a separate project into the experience of women defendants to AVOs (3) the NSW Police strengthen policies and procedures around identifying the 'primary victim' and provide continuous training on the dynamics of family violence (4) the NSW government take into account the findings of this report in its reforms (page 4).

Murray, Suellen, and Anastasia Powell, '"What's the Problem?" Australian Public Policy Constructions of Domestic and Family Violence' (2009) 15(5) Violence Against Women 532.

Discusses the framing of domestic violence (from p539) and notes that: 'a gender-based framework of violence against women recognizes that domestic violence occurs within the wider context of social disadvantage and inequality experienced by women relative to men, which, for some women, means that their vulnerability is heightened. Women are more likely to be economically dependent than men, with women typically having the care of children. Furthermore, women are more likely than men to fear violence from their partner. Domestic violence reflects gender relations and also contributes to the construction of ideas and practices about gender, further enforcing gender relations (p539). References other research and notes that gender always intersects with age, sexuality, ethnicity, and the range of social categories (p540).

National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Background Paper to Time for Action: The National Council's Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009–2021 (2009).

- 'While both women and men can be perpetrators and/or victims of sexual assault and domestic and family violence, research shows that the overwhelming majority of violence and abuse is perpetrated by men against women' (p25).
- 'The biggest risk factor for becoming a victim of sexual assault and/or domestic and family violence is being a woman' (p26).

Salter, M., et al., A deep wound under my heart": Constructions of complex trauma and implications for women's wellbeing and safety from violence (ANROWS, 2020)

Complex trauma can be explained as "multiple, repeated forms of interpersonal victimisation and the resulting traumatic health problems and psychosocial challenges". This report aimed to (1) analyse how complex trauma experienced by women is constructed in public policy and practice at national, state and territory levels; (2) examine institutional responses to women's complex trauma in the mental health, alcohol and drugs, and sexual assault/domestic violence sectors in NSW and Queensland; (3) document how complex trauma is understood by women who have experienced it, as well as their encounters with agencies while seeking help; and (4) develop models of improved and collaborative responses to improve the wellbeing and safety of victims and their children.

Key results include:

- ‘References to complex trauma in public policy are typically brief and undefined’, and ‘[t]he lack of shared terminology and understanding of complex trauma raises questions about the adequacy of current policy frameworks to address the multiple needs of people with experiences of complex trauma and the effects that varying understandings of the long-term impact of complex trauma may have on program and service delivery’.
- Women who have experienced complex trauma often have multiple needs, but many services are funded only to deal with a particular issue or concern. Consequently, women are required to navigate multiple services and agencies so that their needs can be met.
- ‘Self-harm and suicidality are particularly stigmatised in service settings’, and ‘[w]omen with experiences of complex trauma frequently encountered sexist and disparaging views about women’s mental health, encapsulated in the common stereotype of the "crazy woman"’.
- ‘There is currently a lack of trauma-specialised services and professionals, and women’s experiences of health care are typically segmented and uncoordinated.’
- ‘Successful criminal justice outcomes for women with experiences of complex trauma are rare’. None of the women interviewed for the study stated that ‘the full extent of [their] victimisation had been prosecuted in the criminal justice system’.
- ‘There is widespread concern that the impact of trauma on parenting is not being addressed in the child protection system, resulting in late and punitive interventions.’
- ‘In family law matters, women are frequently not believed or supported when reporting abuse by an ex-partner and are often worse off financially and psychologically for their contact with the legal process.’
- Best practices in service provision for people with experiences of complex trauma are set out on p. 9, and recommendations are specified on pp. 10-11.

International

Charlotte Barlow and Siobhan Weare, ‘Women as Co-Offenders: Pathways into Crime and Offending

Motivations' (2019) 58(1) The Howard Journal of Crime and Justice 86-103.

This article examines a qualitative study in the UK which aimed to investigate co-offending women's pathways into, and motivations for engaging in, criminal behaviour. It considers not only the impact of co-offending relationships on women's criminality, but also factors which intersect with these relationships in their lives. Interviews with eight women who accessed a women's advice and support centre were conducted. Findings showed that while co-offending relationships were a central pathway into offending, this often intersected with other circumstances in the women's lives, including drug addiction, socio-economic circumstances, and 'significant life events'. Moreover, women who co-offended with female friends were more likely to acknowledge their agency than those who co-offended with intimate male partners. Findings also demonstrated the significance of understanding the complex nature of the lives co-offending women, and the decision-making process.

Dobash, Russell P, and R. Emerson Dobash, 'Women's Violence to Men in Intimate Relationships: Working on a Puzzle' (2004) 44 (3) British Journal of Criminology 324.

Abstract: 'We present quantitative and qualitative findings from 190 interviews with 95 couples in which men and women reported separately upon their own violence and upon that of their partner. Men's and women's violence are compared. The findings suggest that intimate partner violence is primarily an asymmetrical problem of men's violence to women, and women's violence does not equate to men's in terms of frequency, severity, consequences and the victim's sense of safety and wellbeing.

This article provides an overview of the debate between family violence research, and violence against women research, in relation to the symmetry of violence by men and women.

- Findings from the study establish some general patterns, including that 'First, regardless of who is reporting, it can be seen that many more men inflict every type of injury against women than do women against men' (p337), and 'Overall, the couples agree that the injuries inflicted by women upon men are less frequent and less severe' (pp338). It goes on to discuss the context of women's violence against male partners, including self-defence.

Epstein, Deborah, and Lisa A Goodman, 'Discounting Credibility: Doubting the Testimony and Dismissing the Experiences of Domestic Violence Survivors and Other Women' (2018) 167 University of Pennsylvania Law Review (forthcoming).

This article addresses the ways in which the credibility of female victims of intimate partner violence is discounted through their experiences of legal and social services (pp 3-4). The authors conclude that women's experiences are frequently discounted, which itself can have further traumatic impacts. Judges and other professionals often discount women's stories of abuse as implausible, particularly where the victims suffer from psychological trauma that may impact memory and comprehension (p 7). Women who suffer traumatic brain injuries (pp 9-11) or PTSD (pp 11-3) as a result of domestic violence are particularly susceptible to relaying inconsistent stories. The authors also find that cultural assumptions resulting in the prioritisation of physical over psychological violence causes judges and other authority figures to expect 'real' survivors to also prioritise physical harm, while in reality, victims may feel more significantly impacted by psychological abuse (pp 17-20).

Moreover, the results of the study indicate that gatekeepers often unjustly discount women's personal trustworthiness, based on perceptions of their demeanour (pp 21-5), their perceived motive (pp 25-32), and their social location (pp 32-7). Even women who are able to overcome initial scepticism often find that the systems intended to provide assistance dismiss the importance of their experiences (p 37). In spite of meaningful progress, 'the criminal justice system continues to discount important aspects of women's experiences and to trivialize some of the harmful consequences that policies focused primarily on offender accountability often impose on survivors' (p 38). Ultimately, 'the arbiters of justice and social welfare adopt and enforce legal and social policies and practices with little regard for how they perpetuate patterns of abuse' (p 1).

These experiences of minimisation often echo women's previous experiences of abuse (p 46). The impacts of this discrediting are multifaceted: the dismissal itself constitutes its own injury, which can compound the harm such women experience directly from the abuse (pp 47-50); additionally, this instinctive devaluing of women's testimony becomes an independent obstacle to attempts to obtain safety and justice (pp 50-2). The authors conclude that credibility discounting is widespread and pervasive, and requires genuine institutional reform (p 59). Particularly, actors must be aware of these internalised assumptions, and seek to engage more openly with victims (see pp 54-6).

European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, Women as victims of partner violence - Justice for victims of violent crime, Part IV (April 2019).

This report, in line with the other reports from this project, highlights the importance of recognising victims' rights. It specifically examines the experiences of women who endure partner violence – a crime that targets an individual's dignity and core rights. It presents the findings from fieldwork in 7 EU Member States, including interviews with practitioners working in criminal justice systems and 35 women victims of partner violence. Victims were asked about their experiences with support organisations, the police, public prosecutors' services and courts, and any protection mechanisms available to them against repeat victimisation. Evidence shows that women victims of partner violence lack effective protection due to the inadequacy of police responses, the shortcomings in the referral of victims to support services, the incompleteness of networks of support organisations, and the insufficiency in the implementation of court protection orders. In fact, the report found that 2 in 3 women who brought their victimisation to the attention of the police were left without any protection against repeat victimisation. The police neither arrested the offender, nor issued an emergency barring order.

Felson, Richard B, and Alison C Cares, 'Gender and the Seriousness of Assaults on Intimate Partners and Other Victims' (2005) 67(5) Journal of Marriage and Family 1182.

This study examines assaults committed by male and female intimate partners. The authors note that analyses of the Unites States National Violence Against Women and Men Survey (N =6,480) show that, in general, gender effects do not depend on the victim's relationship to the offender. Regardless of their relationship (a) men cause more injuries; (b) women suffer more injuries although their injuries tend to be less severe; (c) victims are more fearful of male offenders but only if the offenders are unarmed; and (d) men are particularly likely to precipitate assaults by other men, not their female partners. Violent husbands do assault with particularly high frequency but so do women who assault family members.'

Hester, Marianne, 'Who Does What to Whom?' (2013) 10(5) European Journal of Criminology 623.

Abstract: 'The article discusses findings from the first study in Europe to track domestic violence cases over six years through the criminal justice system and compare cases involving male and female perpetrators. Ninety-six cases involving men and women recorded by the police in England as intimate domestic violence perpetrators were tracked to provide detailed narratives and progression of cases, establishing samples with a single male or female perpetrator or where both partners were recorded as perpetrators. Domestic violence involves a pattern of abusive behaviour over time and the in-depth longitudinal approach allowed similarities and differences in violent and abusive behaviours used by men and women, as recorded by the police, to be explored. Gender differences were found relating to the nature of cases, forms of violence recorded, frequency of incidents and levels of arrest.'

- In reviewing the current literature, this paper notes that 'qualitative evidence indicates that women are rarely the initiators of violence, are more likely to be acting in self-defence, and may be using a range of behaviours to do so' (p625). It finds that 'The vast majority of men had at least two repeat incidents recorded (83% of all male perpetrators), many a lot more than that, and one man had 52 repeat incidents recorded within the six-year tracking period. In contrast, nearly two-thirds of all women recorded as perpetrators had only one incident (62%), and the highest number of repeat incidents for any woman was eight. As expected from previous literature on service samples (Johnson, 2006), these data indicate that intensity and severity of violence and abusive behaviours from the men was much more extreme. This was also reflected in the nature of the violence used.' (p628)
- The paper concludes that 'Men were the perpetrators in a much greater number of incidents; the violence used by men against female partners was much more severe than that used by women against men; violence by men was most likely to involve fear by and control of female victims; women were more likely to use weapons, often in order to protect themselves; and female perpetrators were more likely to be alcoholic, or mentally ill, although alcohol misuse by men had a greater impact on severity on outcomes' (pp634-635)

Women - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 7 deals with a range of issues specific to women. 7.1 notes that insufficient account is taken of the realities of the female experience of sexual assault and domestic violence, and discusses the statistical incidence of women as victims of domestic violence, domestic homicide and sexual assault.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

Chapter 14 of the bench book considers issues relating to gender equality. In Part III, there is a discussion of the specific challenges faced by women in the legal system. These challenges include accessing legal aid, childcare considerations, alternative dispute resolution, the intersection of gender inequality and other factors, and gender specific language (p.167 onwards). Part IV of the bench book looks at the experience of domestic violence by women. It notes that there is evidence that women are the most common victims of domestic violence and notes that it is important for lawyers to be aware of the challenges faced by female victims of family violence (p.171 onwards). Further, there is a discussion of domestic violence, the court process and legal services.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.2.3 discusses the gendered natured of family violence. 5.2.4 discusses the statistical over-representation of women as victims of family violence, particularly those from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds. 5.8 notes that women with disabilities are also particularly over-represented as victims of family violence and may have different needs from other victims. 5.2.6 discusses the impact of family violence on women. 5.3.7 discusses how the parenting ability of mothers who are victims of family violence may be affected. 5.6.3 discusses the myth that violence against women is an accepted part of some cultures. 5.4.5 notes that while men can be victims of family violence, the majority of women who use some form of violence towards their partner have been subjected to (worse) violence by that man before, or on the same occasion.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

[13.2.1] Notes a number of facts and statistics that highlight women as vulnerable to domestic violence, including the higher prevalence of women as victims, and that men and women experience family and domestic violence differently. It also notes that Indigenous women report higher levels of violence than non-Indigenous women, and that women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds report lower levels of violence but may under-report their experiences. Section [13.2.1.3] details specific characteristics of women's vulnerability to family and domestic violence, noting a number of intersecting vulnerabilities (e.g. socioeconomic status and ethnicity).

[13.2.2.2] Discusses women's particular experiences of violence, including discussion of women being more vulnerable to the health impacts of family and domestic violence.

In relation to women as perpetrators of abuse, section [13.9.4] may be relevant: 'although women's violence toward their male partners that is neither in self-defence nor in response to being abused was rare, it could still be very dangerous', and that 'Men's physical size and strength is often greater than that of their female partners, which may partly explain why men report that they do not generally live in fear of their partners'.

See also Chapter 10 Women.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Section 4.4.2: 'Being female is the single most common underlying factor associated with the likelihood of being targeted by domestic violence.'

Section 5.2.2: 'Far more is known about the impact of domestic violence on women than about the impact of domestic violence on men. This is because women are more often targeted and consequently more often studied.'

Women - Other Resources

- ANROWS, Personal Safety Survey 2016 Fact Sheet (2017).

Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services) 2022, National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2032.

The National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-2023 states:

One in 3 women has experienced physical violence since the age of 15, and one in 5 has experienced sexual violence. On average, a woman is killed by an intimate partner every 10 days. Rates of violence are even higher for certain groups, such as Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women. A woman is also more likely to experience violence at particular life stages, such as while pregnant or while separating from a relationship. In 2021, girls aged 10 to 17 made up 42% of female sexual assault victims. (Footnotes omitted, p14)

Intimate partner violence is the main preventable risk factor that contributes to illness and death in women aged 18 to 44. It is the leading driver of homelessness and incarceration for women. (footnotes omitted, p15)

Women - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Angelina

Anna

Barbara

Bianca

Carol

Cassy

Celia

Celina

Erin

Faith

Felicity

Fiona

Francis

Gillian

Hilary

Ingrid

Jane

Jennifer

Julia

Leah

Lisa

Melissa

Mira

Rosa

Sally

Sandra

Sara

Susan

Trisha

Yvonne

Women - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Laa v The Queen [2020] VSCA 136 (28 May 2020) – Victorian Court of Appeal

> [52] 'The courts have made it clear that acts of violence in a domestic setting, and in particular by men towards women, are utterly abhorrent and unacceptable. In this case, the infliction by the applicant of the assaults on Ms M, in the presence of their frightened young children, was a serious aggravating factor to the offending. It was a serious breach of his duty as a parent towards his own children. In assaulting their mother before their eyes, he set an appalling example to each of them, and in particular to his son.'

Director of Public Prosecutions v Foster [2019] TASCCA 15 (12 September 2019) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

At [29], Estcourt J held:

> 'Violent behaviour by men towards women in relationships must be condemned and discouraged. Vulnerable women, such as the complainant, are entitled to the protection of the law against brutal partners, and the community expectation is that such protection will be provided by the courts.'

Vragovic v The Queen [2007] NSWCCA 46 (27 February 2007) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Adams J at [33]:

> 'It was once thought in some circles that domestic violence was somehow less serious than criminal violence inflicted in other circumstances. I do not agree. In many cases of domestic violence a distinguishing characteristic is the notion of the offender that he (and it is almost invariably a male) is entitled to act as he did pursuant to some perverted view of the rights of a male over a female with whom he is or was intimately connected. It is this characteristic of self-justification which requires particular emphasis to be given, in cases of this kind, to the elements of general and personal deterrence'.

R v Hamid [2006] NSWCCA 302 (20 September 2006) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Johnson J at [77]:

'These judicial statements are complemented by criminological research concerning domestic violence. An adequate account of domestic violence should recognise that it typically involves the exercise of power and control over the victim, is commonly recurrent, may escalate over time, may affect a number of people beyond the primary target (including children, other family members and supporters of the victim) and that it contributes to the subordination of women; domestic violence typically involves the violation of trust by someone with whom the victim shares, or has shared, an intimate relationship; the offender may no longer need to resort to violence in order to instil fear and control: J Stubbs, "Restorative Justice, Domestic Violence and Family Violence", Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, Issues Paper 9, 2004, pages 6-7'.

R v AKB [2018] NSWSC 1628 (2 November 2018) – New South Wales Supreme Court

At [28], Davies J stated –

'It needs to be made quite clear that marriage or a similar relationship gives no right to one party to control the other…As the cases which come before this Court so often demonstrate, those murders and other acts of violence occur because the woman will not bend her will to the man. That is what happened here. The Court must by the sentences imposed in these cases denounce such behaviour, because women should be able to feel safe and free from that control.'

R v Ellis [2018] QCA 70 (17 April 2018) – Queensland Court of Appeal

Justice Philippides said at [26]:

Although the offending concerned a single episode, it involved the protracted perpetration of violence of a callous and brutal nature calculated to inflict physical and mental torture. The violence was inflicted in > the complainant's house where she was entitled to be safe and protected and in the context of the applicant's irrational jealousy after the complainant ended their relationship. In addition the conviction for domestic violence offences was required to be treated by the Court as an aggravating factor.

B, JL v Police [2017] SASC 9 (10 February 2017) – Supreme Court of South Australia

Stanley J emphasised that the appellant had a history of domestic violence and highlighted the need for general deterrence at [19]:

> Offences of violence by men against women are all too prevalent. All too often they result in harm but the deterrence of those offences will not be adequately achieved unless all offences of violence, whether they cause harm or not, are properly addressed.

R v Wilkinson [2008] SASC 172 (4 July 2008) – Supreme Court of South Australia

Gray J at [29]: 'Domestic violence is predominantly directed by men toward women. The community expects the law to protect women, to protect the weak from the strong, and to protect the vulnerable from the oppressor. These are factors that have led the courts to treat crimes involving domestic violence as grave crimes. Parliament has enacted laws designed to provide protection to those subjected to domestic violence. Parliament has recognised that crimes involving violence and assault may be aggravated by a domestic situation'.

R v Lennon [2003] SASC 337 (2 October 2003) – Supreme Court of South Australia

Doyle CJ at [12]: 'The court has said consistently that it must do what it can to protect women from violence by men. This applies just as much to violence within a domestic relationship as it does to violence in other situations. In cases like this the community expects, and protection of women requires, that the court should impose a sentence that is likely to deter the individual offender and to deter other potential offenders. The fact that the violence occurs on the spur of the moment is a relevant factor, but this is often true in the case of domestic violence. The impulsive nature of such offences is often offset by the fact that, as here, there is a pattern of violence within the particular relationship, or on the part of the particular offender. Mr Lennon's record makes it clear that he has not yet learned that violence towards women cannot be accepted'.

Gregson v Tasmania [2018] TASCCA 14 (31 August 2018) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal Appeal

At [37], the Court held –

> 'Women in domestic circumstances are particularly vulnerable to the abuse of power and breach of trust by violence male partners (Director of Public Prosecutions v Karklins [2018] TASCCA 6 per Geason J, at [54]–[60]). Women who become victims in these circumstances, and other potential victims in the community, are entitled to such protection as the law is able to provide through the imposition of sentences that will act as both a personal and general deterrent.'

Her Majesty's Attorney-General v O [2004] TASSC 53 (9 June 2004) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Slicer J at [18] cited: 'R v Brown (1992) 73 CCC (3d) 242 at 249: 'When a man assaults his wife or other female partner, his violence toward her can be accurately characterised as a breach of the position of trust which he occupies. It is an aggravating factor. Men who assault their wives are abusing the power and control which they so often have over the women with whom they live. The vulnerability of many such women is increased by the financial and emotional situation in which they find themselves, which makes it difficult for them to escape'.

Saxton v R [2017] VSCA 357 (5 December 2017) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The applicant was sentenced to 7 months' imprisonment for 5 assault charges committed against his wife. Justices Santamaria and Coghlan JJA stated that the offending was 'serious' and stemmed from an 'abusive relationship between the applicant and the victim, who was vulnerable and frightened of the applicant' ([29]). The Court quotes Kalala v The Queen [2017] VSCA 223 discussing the scourge of domestic violence:

> The trial courts of this State are imposing sentences for family violence offences with increasing frequency. This Court has repeatedly emphasised the need to condemn family violence, in line with community expectations. In Filiz v The Queen [2014] VSCA 212 [23], the Court acknowledged the > ‘shameful truth’ that family violence is a leading cause of illness, disability and death among Victorian women aged between 15 and 44.

Portelli v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 159 (22 June 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The Court at [29]-[30]: ‘The sentencing judge described the attack on C as ‘extremely vicious and intolerably abhorrent’. It was clear, his Honour said, that C was terrified: ‘You made her believe she was going to die. To ask you, her attacker, to comfort her after your attack because she thought she was going to die reveals how frightening the experience must have been for her. Yet she was in her home in the presence of an intimate partner and entitled to feel safe and secure. She was doing no more than going about her ordinary life. I do not think that she trusted you; rather, she was in fear of your confrontations when denied what you wanted. Undoubtedly, your vicious attack will be an ongoing nightmare for her. It is clear that the community is intolerant of violent behaviour in such circumstances and expects the courts to send a strong message that behaviour of this kind is totally unacceptable. Women in domestic situations are entitled to feel safe from the violently abusive behaviour of their ex-partners. This circumstance is a significant aggravating feature’ [emphasis added by the Court].

‘We respectfully agree. What his Honour said accords with recent statements of this Court on the subject of violent attacks by men on their current or former domestic partners’ (see Filiz v The Queen; Pasinis v The Queen; Director of Public Prosecutions v Meyers).

Filiz v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 212 (11 September 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Redlich JA at [21]-[23]: ‘It is a shameful truth that family violence is a leading cause of illness, disability and death among Victorian women aged between 15 and 44. It is also sadly true that there are a great number of women who live in real and justified fear of the men who are, or were, their intimate partners. In such circumstances, the submission that the complainant’s level of fear when being attacked by her ex-partner was less than it might have been if she had been attacked by a stranger should be rejected’.

Director of Public Prosecutions v Paulino* (Sentence) [2017] VSC 794 (21 December 2017) – Supreme Court of Victoria

Justice Bell explained that formal equality has been reached for men and women as victims of crimes. However, substantive equality requires recognition of the 'specificity and subjectivity of women's experience of family violence, which is much greater and different to men's, and the violation of their particular rights as women ([22]). His Honour further stated at [21]:

> It is now increasingly recognised by police and the courts that family violence as a crime has a gender dimension because women are vastly overrepresented as victims and profoundly affected in particular ways that are not typical of men. Ensuring respect for their human rights not just as persons but as women is at stake. This is a more informed way of understanding the causes and consequences, as well as the fundamental nature, of the criminal wrong as it is perpetrated upon women by men (citing Kalala v The Queen [2017] VSCA 223 (30 August 2017) [3(iii)])

Bropho v Hall* [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Mitchell J at [16]: 'The fact that the aggravated assault occurred in a domestic setting is a significant aggravating factor of the offence. An offence of this nature generally involves an abuse of the trust which one partner places in another, often where the victim is in a vulnerable position by reason of greater physical strength of the offender. The vulnerability of the victim is generally increased by the difficulty which she (it is usually a she) may have in extricating herself from the situation. As McLure P has noted [in The State of Western Australia v Cheeseman], the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator is a hallmark of domestic violence. Recognising that common feature, it remains important for a court sentencing an offender for that kind of offence to take account of the need to protect persons in that vulnerable position, so far as the courts can do so by the imposition of a sentence, bearing a proper relationship to the overall criminality of the offence, which has a deterrent effect and, in an appropriate case, removes the offender to a place where there is no opportunity to violently attack their partner' (which was approved by the court in Gillespie v The State of Western Australia [48]).

R v Rappel* [2017] ACTSC 38 (24 February 2017) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

'For many years now, the courts of this country have spoken of the need to protect members of the community, and particularly women, from domestic violence, and the need for courts to take seriously offences of domestic violence. If these statements are to have meaning, if the protection offered by the [Domestic Violence and Protection Orders Act 2008 (ACT)] is to have significance, it is incumbent on courts to recognise the heinousness of offences of violence committed in retribution for a member of the community invoking the protection provided by the Act.' Per Burns J at [131]

Director of Public Prosecutions (Victoria) v Turner [2017] VSC 358 (23 June 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

Bell J at [13]: "Such is the great contemporary ugliness of domestic violence as revealed by the facts of this case. By reason of these and so many other dreadful consequences, this court treats crimes of domestic violence, especially those involving homicide, very seriously. As King J has said in several cases and specifically so in R v Mulhall, 'the law will do all it can to protect women from violent domestic partners'. Therefore, the court condemns domestic violence in the strongest possible terms and stresses in this case, as it has in many others, that specific and general deterrence are the most important sentencing considerations."

People with children

Where domestic and family violence occurs in families with children, the victim is most likely to be the perpetrator's female intimate partner and the mother of the children. A perpetrator in these circumstances is also highly likely to directly abuse the children or otherwise expose them to violence. These children are also victims of domestic and family violence.

There are particular vulnerabilities a perpetrator may seek to exploit in exercising control over the victim and children. They may relate to the victim's sense of their parenting role, their relationship with the children, and their responsibility to promote the children's wellbeing and protect them from harm, while also trying to cope with the dangerous and debilitating effects of the violence. These factors, together with poor mental health and social conditions that may be related to the domestic and family violence, may impact on a victim's capacity to parent effectively [Hooker et al 2016].

Where the victim is the mother of the child, a perpetrator's use of the victim's mothering role as a means of committing domestic and family violence may begin prior to pregnancy, or may continue or escalate during and after the pregnancy. A perpetrator may, for example, control or prevent contraception leading to unwanted pregnancy, or coerce the victim into pregnancy so as to prevent her from working or studying or to otherwise exercise control over her; or the perpetrator may perceive that the pregnancy occurred sooner than intended, or suspect that he is not the father.

A perpetrator may use a range of tactics to undermine or destroy the relationship between mother and child [Hooker et al 2016]. Depending on the child's age, the perpetrator may deliberately abuse the victim in front of the child so as to induce fear in the child or a sense that their mother is weak and unable to protect herself. The perpetrator may discredit the victim's mothering skills by accusing her of being a bad mother, or he may coach and recruit the child in the perpetration of the violence, or isolate the victim and children from family, friends and other sources of support and care. Over time these corrosive and manipulative behaviours may increasingly restrict and control all aspects of the everyday lives of victims and their children, including their sense of reality and their capacity to act competently and assertively; and may ultimately impair their physical, emotional and mental health and wellbeing.

A victim responsible for the care of children may delay leaving the abusive relationship, or may leave and return on multiple occasions before finally leaving, for fear that the act of leaving may prompt an escalation of the domestic and family violence. [Moe 2009] A victim's sense of duty to protect children from further harm may directly influence these decisions [Meyer 2010].

Research demonstrates that separation coincides with an increased risk of threatened and actual violence as a perpetrator may respond to a perceived loss of control over the victim with amplified efforts to reassert control [Jaffe & Crooks 2005]. Importantly, in the context of separating parents, there is also an increased risk of harm to children's psychological and physical wellbeing due to exposure to domestic and family violence, history of maltreatment, parental stress, social isolation, and inadequate resources and support [Jaffe et al 2014].

Other factors that may influence a victim's decision to remain in the abusive relationship include lack of independent financial resources; lack of child care options, other than the perpetrator; overcrowded or inadequate shelter accommodation ill equipped for the needs of her children or animals; fear that parenting orders may put the children at further risk of harm by the perpetrator; fear that the perpetrator will avoid child support obligations; or fear of isolation, poverty and homelessness [Chung et al 2000]. These factors may in turn serve to increase the level of control the perpetrator exerts over the victim and children [Moe 2009].

A mother, for example, who is a victim of domestic and family violence must constantly reassess the risk of harm to herself and her children and the associated need to protect from further harm. If she does not leave the abusive relationship, she may fear having her children removed from her care by the child protection agency for failing to protect them from violence [Humphreys 2007]. If she does leave, and endeavour to remove herself and her children from ongoing violence, she may fear being penalised by the court for not demonstrating a willingness to facilitate a relationship between the children and their abusive father [Bagshaw et al 2011]. A victim in these circumstances is unlikely to resolve this tension in the best interests of her children without a high level of support that ensures the safety and wellbeing of herself and her children, her capacity to keep mothering, and the proper exercise of her legal rights. And yet research shows that victims who have experienced prolonged and severe domestic and family violence may, in seeking help, also experience stigmatising and victim-blaming social attitudes from formal and informal sources of support that convey a message that the victim is responsible for their own suffering, for example, by remaining in the abusive relationship [Meyer 2015]. This experience may be aggravated by an approach taken by the child protection agency that focuses on the victim's failure to protect rather than the perpetrator's culpability for the violence [Humphreys 2007].

Where a victim feels she has no other choice but to remove herself and her children from the abusive relationship, she may have to contend with the financial, housing, employment, social and parenting challenges already mentioned while also experiencing ongoing domestic and family violence from the perpetrator. For example, the perpetrator may engage in more insidious forms of emotional or psychological abuse using digital technologies or social media; or the perpetrator may follow, harass or monitor the victim at work or in the local community, or seek to coerce the victim into arrangements for the care and parenting of the children, or withdraw child support, or use contact handover occasions to humiliate and degrade the victim in front of the children [Kaye et al 2003]. Prior to separation the victim may act as a buffer to prevent or deflect abuse away from the children; however, on separation, the children may spend time alone with the perpetrator placing them at greater risk of harm. Victims report that these behaviours can be as dangerous and debilitating as those experienced during the abusive relationship.

A 2015 evaluation [Kaspiew et al Synthesis 2015] of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments to the Commonwealth Family Law Act 1975 found that issues giving rise to safety concerns were relevant for up to one in five of the separated parents surveyed. The safety concerns associated with ongoing contact with the other parent mostly involved violent or dangerous behaviour, emotional abuse, substance misuse or mental health issues. An earlier analysis [Bagshaw et al 2011] of the effect of family violence on post-separation parenting arrangements for groups of parents and children who separated after the 1995 and after the 2006 amendments to the Act recorded that nearly half of the children reported feeling "not at all safe" with one of their parents, and nearly three times more of these children reported this feeling when with their fathers than with their mothers. It also observed that women and children were far more likely than men to be victims of severe abuse, intimidation and threats, giving rise to fear and intimidation.

People with children - Key Literature

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

Approximately 50% of women 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a current partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, almost 70% of women who had children in their care when they 'experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, approximately 60% of men 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. See Tables 17-18 for further detail.

Around one quarter of male and female victims who experienced emotional abuse had the abuser threaten to take their child/children away from them, and around one quarter of female victims and 40% of male victims had the abuser lie to their children with the intent of turning their children against them (see Table 28).

Bagshaw, Dale, et al, 'The Effect of Family Violence on Post-Separation Parenting Arrangements: The Experiences and Views of Children and Adults from Families who Separated Post-1995 and Post-2006' (2011) 86 Family Matters 49.

This article reports on the findings from the analysis of data from two national online surveys (one for adults and one for children), which collected quantitative data and also allowed for qualitative comments about family violence and its impact on parenting and parenting arrangements. The study included adults and children who had separated after 1995 and after the introduction of the Family Law (Shared Parental Responsibility) Amendment Act (Cth) in 2006. The researchers gained the views of a total of 1,153 adults (90%) and children (10%). Some key findings:

- For most adult respondents, family violence posed problems in relation to decisions about their parenting arrangements that had to be dealt with after separation and within the family law socio-legal service system.

- In the adult sample, there were clear gender differences in the reported motives for, experiences of and responses to violence.
- Women and children were far more likely than men to be victims of severe abuse, intimidation and threats, giving rise to fear and intimidation.
- The most frequent complaint that men and women had about all of the services that they accessed post-2006, with the exception of domestic violence services, was the disbelief or disregard perceived by victims when they reported family violence, and a consequent lack of assistance that ranged from the violence and associated problems being ignored, to their being labelled as "alienating" parents, to being offered unsuitable parenting proposals (with a sense of coercion about them), to actual further harm. There were many reports, in particular from mothers, of inappropriate parenting arrangements that seriously compromised their children's safety, including arrangements that exposed children to serious psychological, emotional, sexual and physical abuse - mainly from a parent, but also from a step-parent or relative.
- Nearly half of the children reported feeling "not at all safe" with one of their parents; nearly three times more of these children reported feeling "not at all safe" when with their fathers than when with their mothers.
- Many respondents who accessed services post-2006 said they did not disclose violence to the court for fear that if their allegations were unproven they would be viewed as an "unfriendly parent" and the children they were trying to protect would be exposed to the perpetrator for longer periods.

Chung, Donna, Rosemary Kennedy and Bev O'Brien, Home Safe Home: The Link between Domestic and Family Violence and Women's Homelessness (Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, 2000).

The research drew on consultations with 161 stakeholders (in domestic violence and homelessness services, police, courts and other relevant services) and interviews with 52 women. The study examines the trauma experienced by families in Australia when they are forced to leave their homes due to violence. The study found that many women leave their homes with their children to escape violence and when they do, they face significant social disadvantage (p46).

Douglas, H. Women, Intimate Partner Violence and the Law (2021; OUP).

This text explores the results of an interview study involving interviews with 65 women who had experienced domestic and family violence over three years. See chapter 3: Most women reported that the most difficult form of abuse they dealt with were forms of non-physical abuse, especially emotional abuse. Many women identified that non-physical abuse deeply impacted on their sense of self and freedom, and that it continued to affect them for years. Other forms of non-physical abuse that were also highlighted by the women included abusive tactics targeting their role as a mother, isolation within the relationship, financial abuse. The women in the study highlighted the particular impacts of non-physical forms of abuse, including isolation, financial abuse and threats about their visas, for women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds especially those women with insecure visa status.

Hooker, Leesa, Rae Kaspiew, and Angela Taft, Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed methods insights into impact and support needs: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

This comprehensive state of knowledge paper is the first of a three part mixed-methods research project addressing parenting and abuse tactics. This paper presents the current state of knowledge on parenting in the context of DFV by examining the following four research questions:

- What is the prevalence of DFV among parents?
- How does DFV impact on parenting capacity?
- What are the methods and behaviours that perpetrators use to disrupt the mother---child relationship?
- What interventions exist to strengthen and support a positive and healthy mother--child relationship?

This review identifies that DFV may impact negatively on women and children and the parenting capacity of both perpetrators and victims is affected. Altered mother--child relationships may occur due to deliberate undermining of the mother's parenting, and children are often used by perpetrators as tools to abuse mothers and exert control and coercion (p 2).

The report points out that violence does not end when couples separate. It specifically identifies the legal system as a tool of abuse used by perpetrators, and that poor understanding by legal professionals can heighten the risks for women and children (p 2).

Although there is limited information on the parenting style of abusive fathers, abusive men as fathers have been characterised by researchers and victims as authoritarian, under-involved, self-centred and manipulative. These men also engage in high levels of substance abuse. Children exposed to partner violence in the home by their father/stepfather are at heightened risk of child maltreatment including child sexual abuse (p 2).

The report suggests that supportive care includes improved understanding and collaboration between child protection, family law, and domestic violence advocacy services (p 2).

The report also identified issues with forced contact through court:

- Shared parenting can leave mothers and children exposed to continuing abuse (p 26).
- Post-separation matters, including negotiation of property, parenting and child support can be used by abusive ex-partners to maintain power and control (p 27).
- Women feel pressured by lawyers to agree to co-parenting arrangements even though children's safety may be at risk, or make decisions in an environment of fear, pragmatic concern, and family ideology (e.g. perpetrators playing on guilt about "breaking up" the family) (p 28).
- Awareness amongst court staff in screening for family violence and safety concerns still remains problematic, despite legal and policy reform (p 28).

Humphreys, Catherine, 'Domestic Violence and Child Protection: Challenging Directions for Practice' (Issues Paper 13, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2007).

This review of literature explains that issues specific to domestic violence need to be addressed if there is to be effective intervention for children affected by domestic violence. It identifies that women often fear having their children removed from their care because of domestic violence (p6). It considers how the protection of abused mothers may be linked to the protection of children (p7). It considers the child protection focus on women as mothers and their 'failure to protect' their children from abuse rather than on addressing the perpetrator's violence (p8). It notes that sometimes the abusive father is missing from child protection assessments (p8). This paper notes that domestic violence is now one of the most common reasons for a notification to statutory child protection services. It identifies inconsistencies between family law and child protection approaches (p9).

Humphreys, Cathy and Monica Campo, Fathers who use violence: Options for safe practice where there is ongoing contact with children (CFCA Paper No. 43 – June 2017, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

The following summarises the key aspects of this paper:

Background

This paper responds to a challenge that has continued to frustrate workers attempting to intervene to support women and children living with domestic and family violence (DFV) – that the DFV intervention system (in the specialist women's DFV sector and statutory child protection) is structured around women and their children separating from men who use violence. However, many women and children may not be in a position to separate from their abusive and violent partners, and some women and children's wellbeing and safety may not be enhanced by separation.

Inquiry

The paper explored these questions by conducting a review of existing literature:

- What is the practice or evidence base for working with families where the perpetrator remains in the home?
- Are there safe ways to work with women and children living with a perpetrator of DFV, or for women and children who still have significant contact with a perpetrator post-separation?
- In particular, whether there are strategies for working with fathers who use violence, that engage and address the issues for children, women and men who are continuing to live with DFV.

Observations

This review demonstrates that there is a paucity of evidence for effective approaches for responding to DFV in families where the perpetrator remains in the home or in regular contact with women and children. There are, however, a number of practices developing in these areas: nurse home visits; restorative justice approaches; couple counselling; statutory child protection investigations; and interventions with vulnerable families/whole of family approaches. All urge caution and all recommend a priority on training workers, and only ever bringing men and women together under certain circumstances and with strict caveats. This is necessary if work is to be effective and not inadvertently escalate danger and/or collude with the power and controlling tactics of the perpetrator of violence.

Conclusions

There is some experimentation with interventions in these complex family situations, and some early signs of success. The challenges of working with the diverse nature of fathers who use violence are significant. Nevertheless, this may prove to be an important practice development for future DFV intervention.

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Court Outcomes Project' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

The 2012 amendments to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cmth) 'were intended to support increased disclosure of concerns about family violence and child abuse, and to support changed approaches to making parenting arrangements where these issues are pertinent to ensuring safer parenting arrangements for children.

The Court Outcomes Project examined the effects of these 2012 reforms on court filings, patterns in court-based parenting matters and the judicial interpretation of key legislative provisions introduced by the amendments' (p vii).

The report contains numerous statistical comparisons of the situation pre- and post-reform. It identified that allegations of family violence or child abuse have been raised more frequently since the 2012 reforms. This increase in disclosure of family violence and child abuse was a key intent of the reforms. The presumption of equal shared parental responsibility is not applicable where concerns about family violence or child abuse exist (p xii). Therefore, a decrease in the number of orders for equal shared parental responsibility in the context of family violence or child abuse is consistent with the aim of the 2012 reforms.

A detailed overview of the prevalence of family violence allegations in family court proceedings after the amendments is provided from p 43. 36% of cases after the 2012 amendments involved allegations of family violence, compared with 26% pre-reform. The prevalence of allegations of both physical and emotional abuse also increased after the reforms, but this was more marked for physical violence.

The proportion of allegations made against both parents also increased (p 43). Other statistical interpretations of this data, such as the prevalence of family violence allegations after the reforms according to the way the matters were resolved (p 45) are provided.

An overview of factual issues raised (particularly how factual issues changed following the reforms) is provided from p 46. It is noted that issues such as substance abuse and mental ill health are 'not uncommon' for parents who use family law services (p 47).

Parental capacity is discussed in section 4.5 (p 89).

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Evaluation of the 2012 Family Violence Amendments' (Synthesis Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

Building on findings of the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2012, the Longitudinal Study of Separated Families, and the 2009 AIFS Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms, this report examines the impacts of changes to the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) in the area of family law and has three parts:

- Responding to Family Violence - a survey of family law practices and experiences which primarily involved online surveys of the practices and perspectives of family law system professionals(n=653)
- the Experiences of Separated Parents Study (ESPS), which comprised two cross-sectional quantitative surveys - the Survey of Recently Separated Parents [SRSP] 2012 (n=6,119) and the Survey of Recently Separated Parents 2014 (n=6,079) providing pre-reform and post-reform data on parents' experiences of separation and the family law system; and
- the Court Outcomes Project (CO Project) involving:
    - Court Files Study: an examination of quantitative data from 1,892 family law court files providing insight into patterns in orders made by judicial determination and consent made in the Family Court of Australia, the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia, including in relation to parental responsibility and parenting time (pre-reform: n=895; post reform n=997);
    - an examination of patterns in courts filings based on administrative data from the three family law courts; and
    - an analysis of published judgments applying to the 2012 family violence amendments.

One of the 'Key messages' from the report is that parents who use family law systems tend to be those affected by complex issues including family violence, mental ill-health, substance abuse and safety concerns for themselves and/or their children. This is discussed in detail in chapter 2. In particular, it was found that each cohort of separated parents studied had similar patterns of family violence (p 10). Around two-thirds of separated parents indicated that they had a history of emotional abuse or physical violence prior to or during separation and this continued for a slightly lower proportion after separation (p 10). It noted the 'prevalence of physical violence diminished after separation, as did the prevalence of emotional abuse, though to a much less significant extent' (p 10). The exposure of children to family violence for each cohort of separated parents is discussed at p 14. Chapter 4 sets out the evaluation findings on whether the 2012 family violence amendments had supported increased disclosure of family violence and child abuse concerns to family law system professionals, the screening and assessment practices and responses to disclosures of family violence and/or child safety concerns.

Kaye, Miranda, Julie Stubbs and Julia Tolmie, 'Negotiating Child Residence and Contact Arrangements Against a Background of Domestic Violence' (Research Report, Families, Law and Social Policy Research Unit, University of Sydney, 2003).

This report details findings based on interviews with 40 women negotiating contact arrangements with an ex-partner who had abused them and a further 22 interviews with professionals such as lawyers, counsellors, refuge workers and court assistance scheme workers, who had involvement with the development or implementation of contact arrangements. A majority of women (97.5%) had experienced significant levels of violence and abuse since separating from their partner. For many, this abuse occurred in the context of contact handovers. Women also cited occasions when it seemed that contact was used as a further opportunity to harass or annoy them. They expressed concern about children witnessing incidents of violence against them and circumstances where children themselves had been roughly handled during handover. 70.9% of women found it very difficult to disclose domestic violence to professionals they came in contact with, at least initially. Other women, especially Indigenous women, were reluctant to report the abuse for fear that statutory child protection authorities could take their children away from them.

McCorriston, Priscilla, 'Safety Planning with Women and Children: Challenges for Practitioners in a Pro-Contact Climate' (2012) 47 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse Newsletter 3.

Excellent overview in Australian context of factors that heighten women with children's vulnerability following separation including: continued violence during contact and handover, inhibiting protection (i.e. women who act to protect themselves and their children may be subject to punitive orders being made against them), reduced capacity to escape, increased risk of poverty and homelessness, and legal bullying (using court processes to harass a party through process or in court examination).

Meyer, Silke,'Responding to Intimate Partner Violence and Victimisation: Effective Options for Help-seeking' (2010) 389 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

The current analysis is based on data drawn from the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS) conducted by the Australian Institute of Criminology (AIC) in 2002–03. The IVAWS was a national survey, based on a random community sample of over 6,600 women living in Australia at the time of data collection. Women between the ages of 18 and 69 years were interviewed by telephone and a sub-sample of formal and/or informal help-seekers (N=1,562) was identified (p2). The presence of children was also identified as a predictor of formal help-seeking (eg. law enforcement and specialised victim services). Children's observations of violent incidents significantly increased victims' likelihood of seeking formal support (p4).

Meyer, Silke, 'Still Blaming the Victim of Intimate Partner Violence? Women's Narratives of Victim Desistance and Redemption when Seeking Support' (2015) Theoretical Criminology 1.

This article presents a theoretical examination of victims' (N = 28) experiences when trying to rebuild a victimization-free identity after having experienced multiple years of severe intimate partner violence (IPV). Narratives reveal experiences of victim-blaming attitudes when seeking help from informal and general formal support sources, which suggest that victims of IPV do not meet the criteria of the 'ideal', innocent victim worthy of ongoing formal and informal support. Drawing on various criminological theories and theories relating to social stigma and construction of the 'ideal victim', the study finds that victims often feel they have to redeem themselves as worthy of empathy in order to access ongoing support.

Meyer, S, Reeves, E, Fitz-Gibbon, K. The intergenerational transmission of family violence: Mothers' perceptions of children's experiences and use of violence in the home. Child & Family Social Work. 2021; 1– 9.

Abstract: Intimate partner violence (IPV) on average affects one in four women, with the majority of victim survivors identifying as mothers in national survey data. Children experiencing parental IPV are now equally understood as victims. Extensive research documents the short- and long-term impacts of children's experiences of IPV on their safety and wellbeing. More recently, research has started to examine adolescent children's use of violence in the home as adolescent family violence (AFV). Contributing to this emerging body of research, we draw on narrative interview data from mothers who participated in a larger study on IPV, help-seeking and the perceived impact on children to better understand how mothers make sense of children's use of violence in the home. Mothers identified an emergence of AFV in male children with childhood experiences of adult IPV. Although mothers' experiences of adult and adolescent violence highlight their dual victimisation, mothers frame their abusive children as victims rather than perpetrators. Implications for future research, policy and trauma-informed practice are discussed.

Meyer S, Stambe R-M. Mothering in the Context of Violence: Indigenous and Non-Indigenous Mothers' Experiences in Regional Settings in Australia. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. November 2020.

Abstract: Domestic and family violence (DFV) disproportionately affects women and children in Australia and globally. On average, one in three women experiences DFV during adulthood and the majority of these women identify as mothers. The prevalence of DFV is higher for Indigenous women and their experiences disproportionately range at the more severe end of physical abuse. For women affected by DFV, mothering during and post this type of victimization is complicated by strategic entrapment, undermining of the mother–child relationship, and threats of harm directed at children and mothers. While a substantial body of literature has examined the experiences of mothers affected by DFV more broadly, research on the experiences of Indigenous mothers affected by DFV remains scarce. Research evidence is further limited when trying to understand the specific constraints experienced by mothers affected by DFV in regional settings. This article examines the experiences of Indigenous and non-Indigenous mothers affected by DFV in regional Queensland, Australia. Data derived from 17 qualitative face-to-face interviews are used to explore the lived experiences of these mothers. Findings identify the immediate and long-term effects of DFV on mothers and children, including similarities and differences in women's experiences of mothering in the context of DFV, experiences of entrapment in an abusive relationship, experiences of post-separation abuse, strategies used to mitigate its impact on children, and surviving as a female-headed single-parent household in regional settings. While mothers in this study shared a number of similar experiences, regionality, the risk of cultural disconnectedness, and socio-structural marginalization disproportionately affected Indigenous mothers in this study. Findings raise key implications for supporting mothers and children's safety and recovery, access to safe and sustainable housing in regional towns, and the empowerment of Indigenous women to overcome the lasting effects of colonization and disproportionate experiences of disadvantage.

Moe, Angela, 'Battered Women, Children, and the End of Abusive Relationships' (2009) 24(3) Journal of Women and Social Work 244.

This article, written by a US based researcher, focuses on the role of children in women's decisions to leave abusive partners. It discusses arriving at the decision, the logistics involved in leaving and planning for the future, and it presents policy and advocacy-based recommendations that are aimed at addressing the social welfare of women and children. Especially at pp245-6 this article summarises numerous factors related to children, particularly that 'concern for their children causes women to delay leaving their abusers', and finding temporary housing and poverty/homelessness can impact on women with children's particular vulnerabilities (i.e. 'a woman's risk of homelessness increases with the number of dependent children under her care').

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous ‘no contact’ conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims’ safety and wellbeing.

International

Clements, K., et al., (2022) The Use of Children as a Tactic of Intimate Partner Violence and its Relationship to Survivors’ Mental Health. Journal of Family Violence, 37: 1049-1055.

Abstract: Although prior research has established that intimate partner violence (IPV) often leads to increased depression, anxiety and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), little is known about how often abusive partners and ex-partners use survivors’ children as an abuse tactic, nor whether this form of IPV also is detrimental to survivors’ mental health. The current study interviewed 299 unstably housed survivors of intimate partner violence shortly after they sought services from a domestic violence agency. All participants were parents of minor children. In-person interviews asked about abuse experienced in the prior six months, including the ways children were used as a form of IPV. Participants were also asked about their current depression, anxiety, and symptoms of PTSD. As hypothesized, the majority of parents reported their abusive partners and ex-partners had used their children as a form of IPV to control and hurt them. Further, after controlling for other forms of IPV, use of the children significantly predicted both increased anxiety and greater number of PTSD symptoms. Results show the importance of focusing on the use of children as a common and injurious form of abuse used against survivors of intimate partner violence (IPV).

Holt, Amanda, ‘Adolescent-to-Parent Abuse as a Form of “Domestic Violence”: A Conceptual Review’ (2016) 17(5) Trauma, Violence, & Abuse 490-499.

This article discusses adolescent-to-parent abuse (APA), varied forms of abusive behaviour perpetrated by a child toward a parent (p 490). Mothers are more likely to be victims of APA than fathers (p 490), and correlations have been identified between APA and abusive behaviours within a young person's dating relationships (p 491). As a distinct form of abuse, it is not necessarily appropriate to approach APA within a traditional domestic violence framework (p 496). Responding to APA raises issues separate from youth crime and domestic and family violence more broadly:

- Parental responsibility orders are inappropriate in cases where the burdened parent is a victim of the perpetrator's APA, as such orders may cause revictimisation (p 492).
- Attitudes that place responsibility or blame on the victim parent must be avoided, as they may lead to victim blaming in cases of APA (p 493).
- The gendered focus on these issues should be reduced in APA cases, in order to properly engage with the child-parent abuse dynamic (p 495).

Jaffe, Peter, Katreena Scott, 'Risk Factors for Children in Situations of Family Violence in the Context of Separation and Divorce' (Department of Justice Canada, 2014).

This report provides a summary of the expanding literature in the field of family violence, with specific attention to factors that increase the risk of harm to children during the critical time of parental separation. The report also summarises policies and practices for intervention and prevention as identified by Canadian experts and current research reports. The review highlights the many factors that increase children's risk of harm to their psychological and physical well-being (e.g., exposure to domestic violence; history of maltreatment; parental stress; social isolation of the family; inadequate resources and support) in the context of family violence and separating parents. The authors propose a model to guide judges, lawyers and court-related professionals to consider when looking at potential harm to children based on their vulnerabilities as well as the risks that parents may present. Findings of risk can lead to court mandated interventions and safeguards in determining parental access to their children. This analysis requires consideration of barriers to required services such as language and cultural barriers as well as poverty.

Jaffe, Peter, and Claire Crooks, Understanding Women's Experiences Parenting in the Context of Domestic Violence (Violence Against Women Online Resources, 2005).

This Canadian paper is easily navigated by internal links. It reviews the literature and identifies and discusses seven central themes that highlight the intersection between domestic violence and parenting. These issues are:

- Women's parenting may be affected by the experience of violence.
- Professionals struggle to differentiate conflict from violence.
- Abused women often face continuing risks from their partner after separation.
- Many children are negatively affected by exposure to domestic violence.
- [Why] Domestic violence is highly relevant to the determination of child custody.
- Family courts, lawyers and court-related services often overlook the significance of domestic violence.
- Abused women often experience difficulty accessing appropriate legal and mental health service for themselves and their children.

Simon Lapierre et al., 'Difficult but Close Relationships: Children's Perspectives on Relationships With Their Mothers in the Context of Domestic Violence' (2018) 24(9) Violence Against Women 1023-1038.

Despite a recent focus in the literature on mother-child relationships, there is a limited understanding of children's perspectives on their relationships with their mothers. This article reports the findings from a participative and qualitative study involving Canadian children who experienced domestic violence, and focuses on their perspectives on their relationships with their mothers under those circumstances. 46 individual interviews were conducted with children to gather their experiences. Results showed that women's and children's victimisations are inextricably linked. Notwithstanding the negative effects of domestic violence on mother-child relationships, the participants' mothers played a significant role in their children's lives and had close relationships with them. Communication was also found to be an important element in mother-child relationships. However, several participants stated that the communication with their mothers was limited whilst they lived with the domestic violence perpetrator. As the participants experienced domestic violence alongside their mothers, the results also revealed a dynamic of mutual protectiveness. Overall, the findings emphasised the need for policies and practices that support mother-child relationships in the context of domestic violence, as well as programs that support mother-child relationships or facilitate mother-child communication.

People with children - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

7.7 discusses practical considerations relevant to women's experience of court processes, including the fact that many women are the main carers of children and other relatives, and the lack of child care facilities in courts may need to be taken into account when considering hearing dates and times.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

It is noted that access to justice for women and men with children may be hindered by the lack of availability of appropriate childcare facilities (p.167).

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Identifies the potential for gender bias in court proceedings if the child care role is not taken into account [10.4.4.7]. In relation to child care commitments and court proceedings:

- Given the lack of childcare facilities in courts and respite care generally, you may need to take these factors into account when considering the start and finish times on any particular day, the dates of hearings, adjournment dates, and the need for adjournments or breaks — for example, to allow a witness or juror to check that any necessary care arrangements are in place.
- Note that a woman may need adjournments to breastfeed her child or to express milk.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Section 13.5: Social context: when parents flee from domestic violence explores the particular issues parents may face, such as decisions whether to take children with them, and implications for legal proceedings around custody as a consequence. Also see Section 13.10.1: Assessing child safety and best interests in domestic violence context, and footnote 179, which states that ‘[i]n a family context, concerned targeted parents may remain or return to abusive homes in order to serve as a buffer between the abuser and the children, particularly in jurisdictions where abusers are regularly awarded unsupervised access or even custody of children’.

People with children - Other Resources

Domestic Abuse Intervention Programs, Using Children Post-Separation Power and Control Wheel (Factsheet, 2013).

This resource highlights the ways in which perpetrators may use children in post-separation situations to further abusive behaviours.

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, The impact of family violence on children (Fact sheet).

This fact sheet provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

People with children - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Leah

Lisa

Melissa

Mira

Sally

Sandra

Sara

Susan

Trisha

People with children - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Pasa v Bell [2014] ACTSC 303 (30 October 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Murrell CJ at [16]: ‘When considering the sentencing purposes set out in s 7 of the Sentencing Act, including general and personal deterrence, a sentencing court is entitled to consider the fact that an offence involved domestic violence, and that the violence has occurred at the victim’s home. An offence involving domestic violence is one that involves abuse of a partner, former partner or other family member (using the term “family” in the broadest sense). Frequently, such offences occur in the home, where the inhibitions of an offender may be lowered, the impact on the victim may be heightened (as she or he is made to feel that a formerly safe place has been violated) and the occurrence of the offence is more readily concealed. Further, where a domestic violence offence occurs in the victim’s home, it is often associated with secondary abuse to other family members’.

R v In [2001] ACTSC 102 (2 November 2001) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Crispin J at [24]-[25]: ‘In my view the offences which the prisoner committed were too serious to be dealt with in that manner. His wife was confined for an extended period and, whether he now remembers it or not, he behaved in a manner which was clearly calculated to terrify her. He plainly made no attempt to conceal his identity, yet put tape over her eyes. It is difficult to imagine any explanation for that conduct other than that it was calculated to cause fear. Even if he did not intended to carry them out, it is obvious that his threats to kill the children were also made for that purpose. Furthermore, his conduct in turning on the tap in the kitchen, going to his daughter's bedroom and saying in a voice loud enough for his wife to hear "Now take this darling, I know tastes awful, doesn't it" amounted, in my view, to an exercise in sadistic cruelty. A tape recording of his wife's telephone call to obtain an ambulance was admitted in evidence. It records what one might have expected, a mother almost incoherent with fear that her children may have been poisoned’.

Connelly v Tasmania [2015] TASCCA (29 June 2015) – Court of Criminal Appeal of Tasmania

The appellant attempted to kill his two children to spite his wife. Wood J at [23]: ‘The "nature of the crimes" encompasses a number of considerations: the appellant's moral culpability, the gravity of his criminal conduct, and the consequences of his crimes. The comments of the learned sentencing judge, set out in the reasons of Estcourt J, provide details of these matters and it is not necessary that I set them out here. However, I mention the following to demonstrate all that the expression captures in this instance. The appellant's moral culpability involved deliberative acts to kill his two young children, his determined efforts to carry out his decision, and extended to his vindictive motive to inflict maximum anguish and emotional trauma upon his wife. The gravity of the conduct captures that he almost succeeded in carrying out his purpose, that it was the "worst possible kind of abuse of trust", and the vulnerability of his victims. The severe, life-threatening injuries he caused to his sons fall within the nature of the crimes, as do as the victims' permanent scarring, prolonged hospitalisation and extensive surgical intervention. So, too, their "extraordinarily traumatic experience", the degree of emotional suffering and physical pain they have endured and difficulties they will continue to experience for the duration of their lives, as well as the risks to their psychological wellbeing. The nature of the crimes includes the emotional torment and harm the appellant in fact caused his wife, not just his intention to do so. It also includes the risk of grave harm to which others were exposed in endeavouring to save the lives of the victims. The nature of the crimes also captures the broader harm that is inevitably caused to the community when crimes such as these are committed’.

Children

When domestic and family violence occurs between adults in families with children, those children are exposed to that violence. A significant number of Australian children are exposed to violence perpetrated most often against their mother by their father or their mother's current or former male partner [Richards 2011]; much higher rates of exposure occur among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities [Flood & Fergus 2008]. According to the 2016 Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, approximately 50% of women 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a current partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, almost 70% of women who had children in their care when they 'experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence' [ABS PSS 2016]. Children do not however need to see or hear the domestic and family violence to be exposed to it.

Childhood exposure to domestic and family violence may be direct or indirect, with either form having the potential to cause significant harm.

Examples include [Richards 2011]:

- Assault prior to birth
- Attempting to stop the violence or defend a parent
- Being threatened, harmed or abused by the perpetrator, for example: being used as a weapon or hostage; being blamed for the violence
- Being forced to watch or participate in the violence, or spy on a parent.
- Witnessing the violence
- Witnessing a parent's physical injuries
- Being neglected as a consequence of a parent's injuries
- Sleeping during the violence, or overhearing the violence from another room and taking measures to avoid being affected, for example: turning up the volume; sleeping with pillows over the ears; leaving the house and walking the streets
- Witnessing damage and destruction to furniture, toys and other family belongings

- Witnessing harm to family pets, or becoming aware that a pet has been given away, harmed or killed
- Experiencing the aftermath of the violence, for example: having to seek emergency assistance; witnessing a parent being interviewed or arrested by police; attending to a parent's injuries; having to interact with the perpetrator; knowing a parent may be stalked; coping with their own trauma, distress and injuries; assuming the care of family members; missing school; being removed home and community because they are not safe; being isolated from family and friends.
- Being forced into poverty or homelessness as a consequence of the perpetrator's economic abuse
- Growing up in an environment of stress without stability or security, and without appropriate adult role models.

A perpetrator may also use a range of tactics to undermine or destroy the relationship between mother and child [Hooker et al 2016]. Depending on the child's age, the perpetrator may deliberately abuse the victim in front of the child so as to induce fear in the child or a sense that their mother is weak and unable to protect herself. The perpetrator may discredit the victim's mothering skills by accusing her of being a bad mother, or he may coach and recruit the child in the perpetration of the violence, or isolate the victim and children from family, friends and other sources of support and care. Over time these corrosive and manipulative behaviours may increasingly restrict and control all aspects of the everyday lives of victims and their children, including their sense of reality and their capacity to act competently and assertively; and may ultimately impair their physical, emotional and mental health and wellbeing.

Different children in the same family may give dramatically different statements and testimony as a consequence of different experiences, for example one child may be the targeted child, another may be the protected child [Hooker et al 2016].

It should be noted too that notwithstanding the extent of exposure to domestic and family violence a child may be reluctant to disclose their experiences or feelings for fear of not being believed or making the situation worse, or because they have been groomed or coerced not to disclose [Hart 2004]. The prevalence of exposure may also cause the child to perceive violence as normal and disclosure as unnecessary.

Parents and caregivers who perpetrate domestic and family violence are far more likely than other parents and caregivers to also perpetrate direct forms of child abuse and engage in negative parenting practices. The affected children in their care are also more likely to experience multiple additional adversities such as exposure to other forms of physical, sexual and emotional violence and abuse in the home, at school, and in the community [Finkelhor et al 2009]. A child's exposure to domestic and family violence at any age may result in a range of poor psychological, behavioural and physical outcomes including depression, anxiety, trauma symptoms, increased aggression, antisocial behaviour, temperament and mood problems, impaired cognitive functioning, learning and schooling difficulties, low self-esteem, pervasive fear, peer conflict, loneliness, increased likelihood of alcohol or substance misuse, and vulnerability to unemployment and homelessness. It is also possible that domestic and family violence-exposed children may as adults exhibit attitudes and behaviours that reflect their childhood experiences [Sety 2011].

Children - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

Approximately 50% of women 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a current partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, almost 70% of women who had children in their care when they 'experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. Further, approximately 60% of men 'who had children in their care when they experienced violence by a previous partner reported that the children had seen or heard the violence'. See Tables 17-18 for further detail.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and

- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Bromfield, Leah, et al, 'Issues for the Safety and Wellbeing of Children in Families with Multiple and Complex Problems: The Co-Occurrence of Domestic Violence, Parental Substance Misuse and Mental Health Problems' (National Child Protection Clearinghouse Issues Paper No 33, Australian Institute of Family Studies, December 2010).

This literature review cites statistics from a US study, the statistics were collected from household census data from over 20,000 households (G. Fox and M. Benson 'Violent men, bad dads? Fathering profiles of men involved in intimate partner violence.' In R. Day & M. Lamb (Eds.), Conceptualizing and measuring father involvement. (Mahwah, New Jersey: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates Publishers, 2004)):

- 37% of children were accidentally hurt during domestic violence;
- 26% of children were intentionally hurt during domestic violence;
- 49% of mothers were hurt protecting children;
- 47% of perpetrators used the child as pawn to hurt mothers;
- 39% of perpetrators hurt mothers as punishment for children's acts;
- 23% of perpetrators blamed mothers for perpetrators' own excessive punishment of children.

Brown, Thea, Samantha Bricknell, Willow Bryant, Samantha Lyneham, Danielle Tyson and Paula Fernandez Arias, Filicide offenders (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 568 February 2019).

Report abstract:

Filicide is the killing of a child by a parent or parent equivalent. Between 2000–01 and 2011–12, there were 238 incidents of filicide in Australia involving the death of 284 children. This paper examines the characteristics of custodial parents, non-custodial parents and step-parents charged with the murder or manslaughter of their children.

Offender circumstances and characteristics differed according to the offender's gender and custodial relationship with the victim. As filicide is difficult to predict, intervention strategies should focus on families with multiple risk factors and address the needs of parents as well as those of children at risk.

Commissioner for Children and Young People, Children and Young People's Unique Experiences of Family Violence (Commissioner for Children and Young People, Tasmania, 2016).

This report provides a number of findings on children and young people's unique experience of family violence. It notes that effects of family violence on children and young people can have a detrimental effect on their development, as well as their physical and mental wellbeing. Their experience is a form of 'complex trauma' – 'which describes both children's exposure to multiple, chronic and prolonged developmentally adverse traumatic events, and the substantial long-term impact of this exposure'. Further, '[m]any children and young people who have experienced FV display high levels of self-efficacy and resilience; it should not be assumed that their potential to succeed is lessened compared to those who haven't experienced FV or that they will grow up to be perpetrators themselves'. There is a need to improve the ways information is gathered on children's experiences (p.4) and to understand their specific needs (p.5).

eSafety 2020, Children and technology-facilitated abuse in domestic and family violence situations: Full report.

Abstract: This world-first research explores the role technology plays in children's exposure to family and domestic violence. It shows the impacts of technology-facilitated abuse and highlights the range of strategies used for protection and intervention.

The research is based on a survey of over 500 professionals who work with domestic and family violence cases, as well as focus groups with domestic violence specialist staff and interviews with young people, mothers and perpetrators.

Key findings include:

- Over one quarter (27%) of domestic violence cases involve technology-facilitated abuse of children.
- Of cases involving children, the most common forms of technology-facilitated abuse they experienced are:
  - monitoring and stalking – 45%
  - threats and intimidation – 38%
  - blocking communication – 33%.
- This abuse typically involves everyday technologies such as mobile phones (79% of cases), texting (75%) and Facebook (59%).
- It causes real harm, negatively impacting children's mental health (67% of cases), their relationship with the non-abusive parent (59%) and their everyday activities (59%).

The research highlights options for future action such as education, hands-on technology support, screening tools for professionals and extending phone replacement programs to older children.

Flood, Michael, and Lara Fergus, An Assault on Our Future: The Impact of Violence on Young People and Their Relationships (Report, The White Ribbon Foundation, 2008).

Reporting statistics drawn from the National Crime Prevention Survey (2001) this paper reports that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander young people were significantly more likely to have witnessed physical domestic violence against their mother or step-mother than other young people (42%, compared to 23% for all respondents) (p11).

Hart, Amanda, 'Children Exposed to Domestic Violence: Undifferentiated Needs in Australian Family Law' (2004) 18 Australian Journal of Family Law 170.

This article points out that children may find it difficult to disclose violence because of a fear of not being believed and the possibility of making the situation worse. The article notes that children need to be included in determinations of what is in their best interests (p174).

Hooker, Leesa, Rae Kaspiew, and Angela Taft, Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed methods insights into impact and support needs: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

This comprehensive state of knowledge paper is the first of a three part mixed-methods research project addressing parenting and abuse tactics. This paper presents the current state of knowledge on parenting in the context of DFV by examining the following four research questions:

- What is the prevalence of DFV among parents?
- How does DFV impact on parenting capacity?
- What are the methods and behaviours that perpetrators use to disrupt the mother---child relationship?
- What interventions exist to strengthen and support a positive and healthy mother--child relationship?

This review identifies that DFV may impact negatively on women and children and the parenting capacity of both perpetrators and victims is affected. Altered mother--child relationships may occur due to deliberate undermining of the mother's parenting, and children are often used by perpetrators as tools to abuse mothers and exert control and coercion (p 2).

The report points out that violence does not end when couples separate. It specifically identifies the legal system as a tool of abuse used by perpetrators, and that poor understanding by legal professionals can heighten the risks for women and children (p 2).

Although there is limited information on the parenting style of abusive fathers, abusive men as fathers have been characterised by researchers and victims as authoritarian, under-involved, self-centred and manipulative. These men also engage in high levels of substance abuse. Children exposed to partner violence in the home by their father/stepfather are at heightened risk of child maltreatment including child sexual abuse (p 2).

The report suggests that supportive care includes improved understanding and collaboration between child protection, family law, and domestic violence advocacy services (p 2).

The report also identified issues with forced contact through court:

- Shared parenting can leave mothers and children exposed to continuing abuse (p 26).
- Post-separation matters, including negotiation of property, parenting and child support can be used by abusive ex-partners to maintain power and control (p 27).
- Women feel pressured by lawyers to agree to co-parenting arrangements even though children's safety may be at risk, or make decisions in an environment of fear, pragmatic concern, and family ideology (e.g. perpetrators playing on guilt about "breaking up" the family) (p 28).
- Awareness amongst court staff in screening for family violence and safety concerns still remains problematic, despite legal and policy reform (p 28).

Humphreys, Catherine, 'Domestic Violence and Child Protection: Challenging Directions for Practice' (Issues Paper 13, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2007).

This paper presents a discussion about the relationship between domestic and family violence and the child protection response. It identifies that children from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) and Indigenous backgrounds are at particular risk of experiencing domestic violence.

Meyer, S, Reeves, E, Fitz-Gibbon, K. The intergenerational transmission of family violence: Mothers' perceptions of children's experiences and use of violence in the home. Child & Family Social Work. 2021; 1– 9.

Abstract: Intimate partner violence (IPV) on average affects one in four women, with the majority of victim survivors identifying as mothers in national survey data. Children experiencing parental IPV are now equally understood as victims. Extensive research documents the short- and long-term impacts of children's experiences of IPV on their safety and wellbeing. More recently, research has started to examine adolescent children's use of violence in the home as adolescent family violence (AFV). Contributing to this emerging body of research, we draw on narrative interview data from mothers who participated in a larger study on IPV, help-seeking and the perceived impact on children to better understand how mothers make sense of children's use of violence in the home. Mothers identified an emergence of AFV in male children with childhood experiences of adult IPV. Although mothers' experiences of adult and adolescent violence highlight their dual victimisation, mothers frame their abusive children as victims rather than perpetrators. Implications for future research, policy and trauma-informed practice are discussed.

Meyer S, Stambe R-M. Mothering in the Context of Violence: Indigenous and Non-Indigenous Mothers' Experiences in Regional Settings in Australia. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. November 2020.

Abstract: Domestic and family violence (DFV) disproportionately affects women and children in Australia and globally. On average, one in three women experiences DFV during adulthood and the majority of these women identify as mothers. The prevalence of DFV is higher for Indigenous women and their experiences disproportionately range at the more severe end of physical abuse. For women affected by DFV, mothering during and post this type of victimization is complicated by strategic entrapment, undermining of the mother–child relationship, and threats of harm directed at children and mothers. While a substantial body of literature has examined the experiences of mothers affected by DFV more broadly, research on the experiences of Indigenous mothers affected by DFV remains scarce. Research evidence is further limited when trying to understand the specific constraints experienced by mothers affected by DFV in regional settings. This article examines the experiences of Indigenous and non-Indigenous mothers affected by DFV in regional Queensland, Australia. Data derived from 17 qualitative face-to-face interviews are used to explore the lived experiences of these mothers. Findings identify the immediate and long-term effects of DFV on mothers and children, including similarities and differences in women's experiences of mothering in the context of DFV, experiences of entrapment in an abusive relationship, experiences of post-separation abuse, strategies used to mitigate its impact on children, and surviving as a female-headed single-parent household in regional settings. While mothers in this study shared a number of similar experiences, regionality, the risk of cultural disconnectedness, and socio-structural marginalization disproportionately affected Indigenous mothers in this study. Findings raise key implications for supporting mothers and children's safety and recovery, access to safe and sustainable housing in regional towns, and the empowerment of Indigenous women to overcome the lasting effects of colonization and disproportionate experiences of disadvantage.

Powell, Anastasia and Suellen Murray, 'Children and Domestic Violence: Constructing a Policy Problem in Australia and New Zealand' (2008) 17(4) Social and Legal Studies 453.

This article discusses the relationship between domestic violence responses, child protection responses and family law responses, where a child witnesses or experiences domestic violence. It identifies that (p467):

'Where domestic violence responses, child protection responses and family law responses collide, a mother may simultaneously be constructed as being responsible for protecting her children from the influence of an ex-partner's violence, in need of support and protection herself, and responsible for facilitating the other parent's contact with children.'

'Similarly, children may be simultaneously constructed as primary 'victims' in need of protection from exposure to parental violence, as secondary victims who can be protected from exposure to a father's violence by supporting/protecting the mother, or as 'witnesses' of parental conflict who will benefit most from equal contact with both parents. Domestic violence itself is understood differently throughout these contested discourses…'

Richards, Kelly 'Children's Exposure to Domestic Violence in Australia' (2011) 419 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

This paper presents a helpful overview of relevant literature. It identifies that children who live in homes characterised by violence between parents, or directed at one parent by another, have been called the 'silent', 'forgotten', 'unintended', 'invisible' and/or 'secondary' victims of domestic violence.

It summarises the research that demonstrates that witnessing domestic and family violence can involve a broad range of incidents, including the child:

- hearing the violence;
- being used as a physical weapon;
- being forced to watch or participate in assaults;
- being forced to spy on a parent;
- being informed that they are to blame for the violence because of their behaviour;
- being used as a hostage;

- defending a parent against the violence; and/or
- intervening to stop the violence.

It summarises research on the impact of domestic and family violence on children in the aftermath of violence including:

- having to telephone for emergency assistance;
- seeing a parent's injuries after the violence and having to assist in 'patching up' a parent;
- having their own injuries and/or trauma to cope with;
- dealing with a parent who alternates between violence and a caring role;
- seeing the parents being arrested; and
- having to leave home with a parent and/or dislocation from family, friends and school.

Sety, Megan, 'The Impact of Domestic Violence on Children: A Literature Review' (Report, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 1 August 2011).

This review identifies that:

- Children experience serious emotional, psychological, social, behavioural and developmental consequences as a result of experiencing violence.
- Infants and young children are especially at risk.
- Perpetrators often attack or undermine the mother-child relationship and use children in committing violence, such as threats to harm the children.
- Children continue to be at risk from the effects of violence during and after parents' separation.
- Children experience significant risks in shared parenting arrangements when the arrangement involves substantial shared time with the violent parent.
- The evidence shows that false allegations of domestic violence and child abuse are rare. There is, however, evidence to suggest that perpetrators often deny or minimise their use of violence.

International

Edleson, Jeffrey L, 'Children's Witnessing of Adult Domestic Violence' (1999) 14(8) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 839.

In this foundational article, the author reviews 31 research articles published since 1989. As a result of the review, the author attempts to 'expand common definitions of how children witness adult domestic violence by showing how children not only see violence but also hear it occurring, are used as part of it, and experience the its aftermath' (p16). A variety of behavioural, emotional, and cognitive-functioning problems among children found to be associated with exposure to domestic violence. The author identifies factors that appear to moderate the impact of witnessing violence (eg whether the child was also abused, child gender and age and time since last exposure to violence).

Finkelhor, David, et al, 'Children's Exposure to Violence: A Comprehensive National Survey' (2009) (Oct) Juvenile Justice Bulletin 1.

This Bulletin discusses the National Survey of Children's Exposure to Violence, the first comprehensive nationwide US survey of the incidence and prevalence of children's exposure to violence Conducted between January and May 2008, it measured the past-year and lifetime exposure to violence for children age 17 and younger across several major categories: conventional crime, child maltreatment, victimization by peers and siblings, sexual victimization, witnessing and indirect victimization (including exposure to community violence and family violence), school violence and threats, and Internet victimization.

The study found (inter alia) that children who were exposed to one type of violence, both within the past year and over their lifetimes, were at far greater risk of experiencing other types of violence. For example, a child who was physically assaulted in the past year would be five times as likely to also have been sexually victimized and more than four times as likely also to have been maltreated during that period. Similarly, a child who was physically assaulted during his or her lifetime would be more than six times as likely to have been sexually victimized and more than five times as likely to have been maltreated during his or her lifetime.

Jane E M Callaghan et al, 'Beyond "Witnessing": Children's Experiences of Coercive Control in Domestic Violence and Abuse' (2015) Journal of Interpersonal Violence (online).

This article investigates children's experiences with domestic and family violence (DFV), through interviews with 21 children who have been victims of DFV (p 7). The results indicate that children are aware of patterns of coercive control, and the impacts of such abuse (pp 10-3). Such experiences result in an increased sense of constraint, which children may develop specific strategies to cope with (pp 14-6).

Significantly, the article raises children's direct agency in coping with, and responding to, DFV, highlighting the inaccuracy of treating children as merely passive witnesses (pp 17-20). Accordingly, the authors recommend that professional responses to DFV better recognise children's agency, moving beyond perceptions of them as passive witnesses, and tailor strategies for children as direct victims (pp 22, 23-4).

Jofre-Bonet, Mireia, Melcior Rossello-Roig, Victoria Serra-Sastre, The Blow of Domestic Violence on Children's Health Outcomes (City University London, London School of Economics, 2016).

This study examines the effect of domestic violence on children's health outcomes. Drawing results from the UK Millennium Cohort Study, the authors found that 'there was a strong negative externality of household violence on children's health outcomes'. Children living in a household where there was domestic violence appeared to be between 55% and 61% less likely to have their health rated as Excellent'. This paper 'not only sheds light on the negative impact of domestic violence on children's health but provides a robust quantification of this effect'.

Katz, E (2016) Beyond the Physical Incident Model: How Children Living with Domestic Violence are Harmed By and Resist Regimes of Coercive Control, Child Abuse Review Vol. 25, 46-59.

Abstract: This article begins to build knowledge of how non-violent coercive controlling behaviours can be central to children's experiences of domestic violence. It considers how children can be harmed by, and resist, coercive controlling tactics perpetrated by their father/father-figure against their mother. Already, we know much about how women/mothers experience non-physical forms of domestic violence, including psychological/emotional/verbal and financial abuse, isolation, and monitoring of their activities. However, this knowledge has not yet reached most children and domestic violence research, which tends to focus on children's exposure to physical violence. In this qualitative study, 30 participants from the UK, 15 mothers and 15 of their children (most aged 10-14) who had separated from domestic violence perpetrators, participated in semi-structured interviews. All participants were living in the community. Using the 'Framework' approach to thematically analyse the data, findings indicated that perpetrators'/fathers' coercive control often prevented children from spending time with mothers and grandparents, visiting other children's houses, and engaging in extra-curricular activities. These non-violent behaviours from perpetrators/fathers placed children in isolated, disempowering and constrained worlds which could hamper children's resilience and development and contribute to emotional/behavioural problems. Implications for practice and the need to empower children in these circumstances are discussed.

Katz, E, Nikupeteri, A & Laitinen, M 2020, 'When Coercive Control Continues to Harm Children: Post-Separation Fathering, Stalking and Domestic Violence', CHILD ABUSE REVIEW, vol. 29, no. 4.

Abstract: This article highlights how domestic violence perpetrators can use coercive control against their children after their ex-partner has separated from them. It provides insights into how children experience coercive control post-separation by drawing from two data sets: one from the UK and one from Finland. The data comprised narratives of 29 children and young people aged from 4 to 21 years old. Three overarching themes arose from the data: 1) dangerous fathering that made children frightened and unsafe; 2) 'admirable' fathering, where fathers/father figures appeared as 'caring', 'concerned', 'indulgent' and/or 'vulnerable-victims'; and 3) omnipresent fathering that continually constrained children's lives. Dangerous fathering made children's lives frightening, constrained and unpredictable. Admirable fathering was found to be a powerful tool of control when combined with dangerous fathering, because admirable fathering increased father-child emotional bonds and could make children want to see/live with their fathers, whilst dangerous fathering simultaneously made them fearful of him. Admirable fathering was typically aimed at professionals and wider communities, and could occur alongside fathers/father figures stalking, harassing and/or attacking ex-partners and children when they were not in the public eye. Perpetrators aimed to portray themselves as 'caring', 'concerned', 'indulgent' and/or 'vulnerable-victim' fathers, and to make their ex-partners seem like perpetrators or deficient mothers. Perpetrators disguised their use of coercive control tactics as 'admirable' behaviour. With respect to omnipresent fathering, children were fearful that their father/father figure could appear at any time to attack, harass, manipulate, upset or kidnap them or their mothers. This behaviour led to some children continuously monitoring their surroundings as a protective strategy. Fathers/father figures were able to maintain some degree of control, domination and emotional power over children even when they were not physically present. The article suggests that robust measures are necessary to prevent coercive control perpetrating fathers/father figures from using father-child relationships to continue exerting coercive control on children and ex-partners.

Lux, G & S Gll, Identifying Coercive Control in Canadian Family Law: A Required Analysis in Determining the Best Interests of the Child. (2021)59 (4) Family Court Review 810-827 doi: 10.1111/fcre.12540

Amendments to the Canadian Divorce Act have required that family violence, specifically coercive controlling behaviour, be considered when making best interest determinations for children. This paper (1) outlines how this concealed, patterned, and harmful behaviour presents in family law disputes and (2) sets out considerations for parenting arrangements. It identifies the perils of subjective impressions as well as where the legal system and its interventions may be vulnerable to misuse. Children in families where coercive control is occurring are at risk of harm. The article concludes that the lack of intentional analysis of coercive control does not serve the best interests of the child.

Lyons, et al., Risk Factors for Child Death During an Intimate Partner Homicide: A Case-Control Study (2021) 26(4) Child Maltreatment 356-362 doi: 10.1177/1077559520983901

This research used the US National Violent Death Reporting System (NVDRS) data (2003–2017) to compare all IPH incidents with a child corollary victim (n = 227) to all IPH incidents where a child was present but not killed (n = 350). We examined risk factors for child fatality during an IPH. For each risk factor, we calculated the odds ratio for child death during the IPH, adjusting for multiple comparisons. Perpetrator history of suicidal behavior, rape of the intimate partner victim, a non-biological child of the perpetrator living in the home, and perpetrator job stressors increased odds while prior separation of the IPV victim from the perpetrator decreased the odds of a child death during an IPH incident.

Children - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 6 discusses a range of issues affecting children and young people and their experience of court processes.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

Chapter 13 of the bench book highlights the specific vulnerabilities of and challenges faced by children in the legal system. It first discusses matters of child development, highlighting that children are to be treated less harshly because of their youth. The bench book then turns to consider the various ways in which children interact with court processes and briefly canvasses the ways in which these issues have been dealt with by legislative measures.

At pp.151-153, the bench book looks at the issue of child development and immaturity noting that: ‘It is well recognised today that childhood and adolescence are key developmental phases, and that early experiences can affect that development. Parenting, including parental absence, plays a fundamental role in how children come to perceive themselves, as well as the world around them and how they interact with it. This includes matters such as the understanding of right and wrong, impulse control, and the taking of responsibility for one’s actions’. The bench book provides a discussion of the science regarding children’s development before stating, ‘where children are neglected or abused (particularly if severely or for prolonged periods), they are likely to progress into in a chronic state of fear and to respond accordingly. Such hyper arousal is to the detriment of other functions and also tends to mean these children struggle to comprehend any later attempts at nurturing and kindness’.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

1.1 notes that causing a child to hear, witness or be exposed to family violence amounts to family violence.

5.3 discusses in detail the impact of family violence on children. 2.5.1 discusses specific procedural protections in court proceedings relevant to children.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Chapter 5 provides detailed information about children giving evidence and their compellability in various proceedings including Family Law proceedings and restraining order proceedings. It includes information about communication issues including level and style of language.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Chapter 6: Children: Impact of Domestic violence & Evidence of children details the issues associated with children's experiences of domestic violence. Most relevant are the sections relating to myths about children, and Section 6.3: Listening for evidence of child harm by age which looks at the variety of harms children are vulnerable to. It goes on to discuss '[d]esigning agreements and orders to limit child harm' in Section 6.4, and also analyses issues with evidence, and court procedures in relation to children testifying.

Also see Supplementary Reference 2: Children and Domestic Violence' which further discusses the varying levels of exposure of children witnessing domestic violence, and understanding the impact of domestic violence on children.

Children - Other Resources

Australian legal definitions: when is a child in need of protection? (CFCA Resource Sheet – July 2019, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

This CFCA resource sheet is a single reference guide for practitioners and researchers on legal definitions of 'a child is in need of protection', as set out in civil child protection legislation in each Australian jurisdiction.

Echo Parenting & Education, The Impact of Trauma (2017).

This fact sheet explains the lasting impacts of childhood trauma on victims. Examples of impacts include loss of safety, loss of trust and re-enactment of the trauma.

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, The impact of family violence on children (Fact sheet).

This fact sheet provides information about the effects of family violence on children and parenting behaviours, the protective factors for children, and risks to children on separation. It also provides contact details for help and advice organisations.

Children - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Anna

Bianca

Erin

Felicity

Francis

Gillian

Hilary

Jane

Julia

Leyla

Lisa

Sandra

Susan

Children - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

In the Marriage of JG and BG (1994) 122 FLR 209; (1994) FLC 92-515; (1994) 18 Fam LR 255 (30 September 1994) – Family Court of Australia

Chisholm J at [260]-[262]: 'The authorities, then, require the court to make a judgment about the relevance of family violence to the welfare of the children. In what circumstances is family violence relevant to children's welfare? Its relevance may be more obvious in some situations than in others. Where the violence is directed at the children themselves, it is obviously and directly relevant to their welfare. Section 64(1)(va), quoted above, expressly requires the court have regard to the need to protect the child from abuse and ill treatment. Similarly, when the violence is committed in the presence of children, it will obviously have the potential to frighten and distress them.

I do not think it can be said as a matter of law that other forms of family violence are incapable of being relevant to the welfare of the children. Violence occurring between household members, even though occurring away from the children, may have the potential to cause them distress and harm, for example where it affects the parenting of the custodial parent. Similarly, threats of violence may have an impact on the welfare of children. The nature and extent of such harm must of course be assessed in the light of the evidence and findings in each case. In some cases, the court may be assisted by expert evidence on the impact of violence on the children. Violence may take many forms and have a quite different significance in different cases. It might be, for example, a single outburst, out of character, caused by a stressful situation, for which the violent persons feels immediately regretful and apologetic. It might be the result of mental instability or disease. It might stem from a person's inability to control his or her temper. It might represent a deliberate pattern of conduct through which the violent person exercises a position of dominance and power over the other. It might be associated with a particular situation, and be unlikely to be repeated in different situations, or it might be a recurrent pattern of behaviour occurring in many situations. The violent person may deny the violence, or seek to justify it, or alternatively might accept responsibility for it and be willing to take appropriate measures to prevent it happening again.

These and many other aspects of violence may be highly relevant to the court in its task of attempting to determine the relevance of the violence to the children's welfare. The court's ability to make this determination will of course depend on the evidence available to it. Violence associated with a pattern of dominance, for example, may be particularly serious. For children to grow up in a climate of a potentially violent and dominating relationship between their parents seems to me to be an unacceptable model of family relationships, and would be very likely to create a situation of stress and fear that may well be damaging over a period. It is quite wrong, in my opinion, to assume that violence can be relevant only if it is directed at the children or takes place in their presence. It is equally wrong to assume that violent behaviour will necessarily be repeated, or to assume too readily that it will harm children, or to give it excessive importance; it is of course only one factor relevant to the assessment of what the child's welfare requires, and it will be more important in some cases than in others'.

R v Rogers [2014] ACTSC 124 (1 April 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Penfold J at [7]: 'The offences were all serious examples of the relevant offences. Both assaults were at the higher end of the spectrum of assaults appropriate for a charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm, especially given the extended period over which the assaults took place and the fear of more serious assaults that seems to have been present throughout. The presence of KN's son, and his fear and distress at the events he witnessed, seriously aggravated the second assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The unlawful confinement offence must have been especially terrifying to the victim. All the offences were further aggravated by the breach of trust that is in my view inherent in most if not all domestic violence offences, especially those that occur in the privacy of a home shared by the victim and the perpetrator, a circumstance which of itself – that is the sharing of the home – seems to me to establish a mutual relationship of trust'.

Elson v Ayton [2010] ACTSC 70 (15 July 2010) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [70]: 'It is clear that the courts have a duty to express the community's particular interest in denouncing family violence especially by appropriately severe sentences where it is aggravated by being committed in the presence of children. Where this occurs, it not only increases the humiliation and sense of powerlessness of the victim, but it is also likely to cause real psychological damage to the children and risks creating offenders of the children themselves. The courts must show that this is unacceptable and to be condemned as such'.

R v AKB [2018] NSWSC 1628 (2 November 2018) – New South Wales Supreme Court

At [25], Davies J stated –

> The murder was seriously aggravated by having been carried out in the presence of the two children of the offender and the deceased, and in circumstances where the offender actively prevented WB from trying to save his mother. It was aggravated by having been committed at the deceased's home where she was entitled to feel safe. It involved gratuitous cruelty inasmuch as the deceased was burnt to death whilst being prevented from escaping from the fire.

Allen v Kerr [2009] TASSC 10 (25 February 2009) – Supreme Court of Tasmania

Porter J at [13]: 'There were two young children present at the time of the attack. It is not clear, but presumably they were in the vehicle with the complainant. In any event, it was not disputed that they were present throughout the incident. One was about 8 years old, the other about 1 year old. The Family Violence Act, s13, reflects the common law, but it is of some significance that Parliament has seen fit to expressly recognise the presence of children as an aggravating factor in the case of family violence offences. The reasons that the presence of children is an aggravating factor of some significance are largely self-evident. Violence witnessed by children in the domestic environment not only is distressing (usually the victim is a parent or someone in the place of a parent), but it also serves to desensitise impressionable minds to violence, and to encourage the notion that resort to violence is acceptable'.

El Tahir v The Queen [2011] VSCA 46 (4 March 2011) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Mandie JA at [23]: 'In my opinion the sentence was not manifestly excessive and, indeed, properly reflected the gravity of the offence after taking into account all mitigatory factors including the plea of guilty. The Court rightly treated with the utmost seriousness the appellant's knife attack on his defenceless wife in the presence of their children and in circumstances which included the invasion of her home in breach of a court order. Further, the relative brevity of the non-parole period might be thought to properly and adequately take into account the personal circumstances of the appellant'.

Bropho v Hall* [2015] WASC 50 (9 February 2015) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Mitchell J at [18]: The second circumstance of aggravation was that children were present when the offence was committed. ‘The facts of this case illustrate a tragic cycle of violence with which the courts are depressingly familiar. A person exposed to domestic violence in his early life goes on as an adult to perpetrate the violence to which he was exposed as a child, damaging members of his community in the same way he was damaged as a child. For that reason, the fact that the appellant's offence was committed in the presence of children was a significant aggravating factor’.

Young people

Young people's dating or intimate relationships may involve domestic and family violence in the form of physical violence by both male and female partners. However, young women [ABS PSS 2016] are more likely than young men in these circumstances to be physically injured or frightened by the violence, and the physical, mental and emotional harm experienced by young women is likely to be more serious and damaging [Flood & Fergus 2008]. Compared with the overall prevalence of violence against women, young women are the most likely to have experienced violence (around one in ten), and sexual harassment (around three in five) in the last 12 months [ABS PSS 2016]. Australian women aged 18 to 24 years experience higher rates of physical and sexual violence by their partners or former partners than older women; and, within that group, those aged 20 to 24 years experience the highest rate of homicide victimisation [Mouzos & Makkai 2004]. US research [Peters et al 2002] supports the observation that young women are at greatest risk of victimisation, indicating that the age bracket begins at 15 years. It also observes that young men (aged 16 – 24 years) are at greatest risk for perpetration, however men's age is not the sole determinant as the young women victims at highest risk are those in relationships with perpetrators who are somewhat older.

Young people's vulnerability to physical violence in dating or intimate relationships may be heightened by strong peer norms that encourage traditional gender roles and relations; inexperience; age difference in relationships; and a lack of access to specialised services for young people experiencing abuse. An American study [Peacock & Rothman 2001] of adolescent male perpetrators reveals a profile of individuals who have been victims of child abuse or exposed to domestic and family violence, who have experienced substance misuse, or have been influenced by negative attitudes towards women and the pressure to comply with peer norms.

Research also suggests that young people may be less likely to understand the complex aspects of violence and abuse in relationships, or the range or seriousness of the behaviours that it may involve. While reported intergenerational influences are not consistent or definitive, they draw attention to vulnerabilities to perpetration and victimisation in young people who grow up in homes where they are exposed to domestic and family violence [Indermaur 2001].

It is acknowledged by researchers in this context that technology in young people's lives may facilitate or increase their exposure to sexual abuse and other forms of domestic and family violence. For example, devices such as computers and smart phones may be used by the perpetrator in conjunction with platforms such as social networking sites and text messages to record sexual assaults, to make threats to distribute images or videos of the victim, or to distribute images or videos without the victim's consent [Bluett-Boyd et al 2013].

Young people - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

Women aged 18-24 were the most likely to have experienced violence, with approximately 12% of these women experiencing violence in the 12 months prior to the survey (see Table 6).

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia: continuing the national story 2019 (Report, 2019).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;

- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Bluett-Boyd, Nicole, Bianca Fileborn, Antonia Quadara and Sharnee Moore, 'The Role of Emerging Technologies in Experiences of Sexual Violence. A New Legal Frontier?' (Research Report No 23, Australian Institute of Family Studies, February 2013).

This research study investigates how communication technologies facilitate sexual violence against young people and what challenges this presents for the Victorian criminal justice system. Based on interviews with young people and professionals working with young people, it examines the effects of technology on the lives of young people, the interface between emerging communication technologies and experiences of sexual violence, and the factors that enable or hinder appropriate legal responses. Communication technologies such as online social networking sites and mobile phones are considered, and their use in identifying and grooming potential victims, blackmail and intimation, sexting, harassment, and pornography.

Boxall, Hayley and Anthony Morgan, Repeat Domestic and Family Violence among Young People Research Report No 591, February 2020, Australian Institute of Criminology.

This paper adds to what is known about family violence perpetrated by adolescents. It examines short-term reoffending patterns – including timing, prevalence, the peak period for repeat violence, and cumulative rates – as well as predictors of repeat violence, particularly those relating to prior histories of family violence or breaches of orders, given that this information is readily available to frontline responders. The paper draws on incident data from Victoria Police for almost 4,000 young people aged 12-18 involved in domestic or family violence. Approximately one in four of these young people were involved in repeat violence in the six months following an incident, with the risk peaking at around 30 days following an incident in domestic violence cases and at around three to four weeks for family violence cases. Violence was largely perpetrated against intimate partners or parents. The findings show how the violence histories of young people can be helpful for identifying who will be involved in repeat violence in the short term, and who will be involved in multiple violent incidents. Frequency of prior incidents of violence is a better predictor of future short-term reoffending than prevalence of prior violence, but they are both useful indicators of future risk.

Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. Who is most at risk of physical and sexual partner violence and coercive control during the COVID-19 pandemic?. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 618. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: In this study, data was analysed from a survey of Australian women (n=9,284) to identify women at the highest risk of physical and sexual violence and coercive control during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Logistic regression modelling identified that specific groups of women were more likely than the general population to have experienced physical and sexual violence in the past three months. These were Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women aged 18–24, women with a restrictive health condition, pregnant women and women in financial stress. Similar results were identified for coercive control, and the co-occurrence of both physical/sexual violence and coercive control.

These results show that domestic violence during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic was not evenly distributed across the Australian community, but more likely to occur among particular groups.

Boxall H et al. 2020. Responding to adolescent family violence: Findings from an impact evaluation. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 601. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Despite growing recognition of the prevalence of and harms associated with adolescent family violence, our knowledge of how best to respond remains underdeveloped.

This paper describes the findings from the outcome evaluation of the Adolescent Family Violence Program. The results show that the program had a positive impact on young people and their families, leading to improved parenting capacity and parent–adolescent attachment. However, there was mixed evidence of its impact on the prevalence, frequency and severity of violent behaviours.

The evaluation reaffirms the importance of dedicated responses for young people who use family violence, and the potential benefits, and limits, of community-based programs.

Campbell, Elena, Jessica Richter, Jo Howard and Helen Cockburn, The PIPA Project: Positive Interventions for Perpetrators of Adolescent Violence in the Home (AVITH) Research Report No 4, March 2020, ANROWS.

The 2016 Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence found that adolescent family violence was poorly identified and had no considered systemic response. To help address this gap in knowledge, this report investigates the initial legal responses that adolescents and their families receive when they first come to the attention of the legal system. It compares legal and service sector interventions across three jurisdictions at very different stages of legislative, policy and definitional development – Victoria, Western Australia and Tasmania – focusing on awareness of adolescent family violence amongst practitioners and whether and how a legal response was provided. It also examines the characteristics of this form of violence and the impact of responses on families, using data from Victoria Legal Aid regarding 905 adolescents involved in either civil protection order matters or protection order breach matters. The study found that, across all three jurisdictions, current legal responses may not be addressing the objective of reducing risk to families and indeed may be deterring families from reporting.

Cox, Peta, 'Violence against women in Australia: Additional analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012' (Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety Horizons, 2016 Rev.ed.).

Section three: Women's experiences of partner violence (from p76)

- 'Section three of this report provides a detailed examination of the PSS data relating to women's experiences of partner violence. One in six women reported violence by a partner they had lived with (cohabiting partner) and one in four reported violence by a partner they may or may not have lived with (i.e. a combined total for cohabiting partner and boyfriend/girlfriend/date)'.

- Young women (most of whom did not co-habit with their partner) were at a statistically significant increased risk of male intimate partner violence (33,500, 3.1%).

Note: this article refers to an old release of the ABS' Personal Safety Survey, but the analysis remains useful. See Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2016.

Flood, Michael, and Lara Fergus, An Assault on Our Future: The Impact of Violence on Young People and Their Relationships (Report, The White Ribbon Foundation, 2008).

This report examines how violence against women specifically affects children and young people. It looks at the nature of violence they experience in their homes and their own relationships. Part 2 of this report focuses on 'Dating and relationship violence among young people'. At pp17-18 the authors draw on ABS statistics, the Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health and the National Crime Prevention Survey (2001) and reports:

- 12 per cent of women aged 18–24 years experienced at least one incident of violence in the last 12 months, compared to 6.5 per cent of women aged 35–44 years and 1.7 per cent of women aged 55 years and over.
- Among young women aged 18–23, 12 percent report that they have been in a violent relationship with a partner or spouse.
- 14 per cent of young women said a boyfriend had tried to force them to have sex, and 6 per cent said a boyfriend had physically forced them to have sex.

The authors note that inexperience, age differences in relationships and lack of access to services compound the problem of young women's vulnerability to violence in relationships (p24-28).

Relevant to the risk of perpetration of violence, the authors note that 'Young people's vulnerability to violence in relationships is heightened by strong peer norms, inexperience, age differences in relationships, and lack of access to services. Among young people, attitudes towards intimate partner violence are worst among younger males.' (p3). Also see 'Part Three: The causes of violence against girls and young women' (from p24), noting study findings such as 'In the survey of 12-20 year-olds above, boys aged 12 to 14 showed higher support for violence-supportive attitudes than older males (National Crime Prevention 2001: 75-95). Other Australian studies report similar results. In a Melbourne study for example, secondary school students had poorer attitudes towards rape victims and towards women than university students (Xenos and Smith 2001).' (p24). It goes on to discuss reasons for these findings, such as peer cultures and developmental shifts in attitudes in young men.

Grech, Katrina, and Melissa Burgess, 'Trends and Patterns in Domestic Violence Assaults: 2001 To 2010' (Issue Paper 61, NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics and Research, 2011).

Abstract: 'Descriptive analyses were conducted on all incidents of domestic assault recorded by NSW Police between 2001 and 2010. Factors associated with reporting of offences to police were examined using the Australian Bureau of Statistics, Crime Victimisation Survey 2008-2009.

Findings include that: males are more likely than females to be the offenders in both domestic (82.1% vs. 17.9%) and non-domestic assault (75.6% vs. 24.4%); and over 50 per cent of offenders were males between the ages of 18 and 39. (p7)

Indermaur, David, 'Young Australians and Domestic Violence' (2001) 196 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

This is a foundational article in Australia; many subsequent reports refer to this research. This paper draws on survey data collected from 5,000 Australians aged 12-20 years from all states and territories in Australia. 55.5 per cent of respondents report having been aware of male to female domestic violence occurring at some time. Almost 70 per cent of the young people surveyed had had a boyfriend or girlfriend at some stage and about one in three of these young people (both males and females) reported incidents in their personal relationships that could be defined as "physical violence"' (p4). The research found that young people growing up in homes where there has been couple violence (both male and female carers perpetrating and being victimised by domestic violence) were more likely to be victims of relationship violence and perpetrators of violence in their intimate relationships. For example they were twice as likely to have been forced to have sex and four times as likely to have admitted forcing their partner to have sex (p4).

Morgan, Anthony, and Hannah Chadwick, 'Key Issues in Domestic Violence' (Summary Paper No 7, Australian Institute of Criminology, December 2009).

This paper reviews relevant literature. It notes that young people's vulnerability to intimate partner violence is increased by sexist and traditional gender role attitudes, peer culture, inexperience and attitudes supportive of violence that can be shaped by the media, pornography and early exposure to aggressive behaviour by parents or role models (p6).

Specific to perpetration by young people, the paper notes that 'Negative attitudes towards women are different across cultural groups and are influenced by culturally-specific norms and social relationships. However they are more commonly expressed among adolescent males than older males' (p6).

Mouzos, Jenny, and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey, and provided information on their experiences of physical and sexual violence including childhood violence. Quoting from ABS statistics the authors note that: 'in terms of sexual assault specifically most victims of sexual assault are women aged 18 to 24 years (46%) and unmarried (80%)' (p28). The paper notes that age has been found to be the strongest predictor of risk, and prior research shows that younger women are victimised disproportionately to older women (p28). Also, the authors report that younger women experienced higher rates of violence by their current partners (between 3 and 7% for the 18-24 years age group), compared to older women (between 2 and 3% for women aged between 45 and 54 years) – see Table 10 (p57).

In relation to perpetration of violence, the paper also reports that 'Research suggests that violence in intimate relationships is related more to the characteristics of the male than the characteristics of the woman (Piispa 2000). Levels of violence according to the age of the male partners follow a similar pattern, with a higher proportion of males in the younger age group being violent towards their intimate partners' (p56).

International

Dardis, Christina M et al, 'An Examination of the Factors Related to Dating Violence Perpetration Among Young Men and Women and Associated Theoretical Explanations: A Review of the Literature'

(2015) 16(2) Trauma Violence and Abuse 136.

Although focused on sex differences in the perpetration of dating violence, this paper discusses risk factors for dating violence in the context that while 'Previous research suggests that although there are some similarities between young adult DV and marital IPV, there are also important differences' (p139). It gives a thorough overview of the findings of literature in this area, and discusses numerous variables that may contribute to dating violence perpetration among young people such as historical, personal, interpersonal, and contextual variables.

Peacock, Dean and Emily Rothman, 'Working with Young Men Who Batter: Current Strategies and New Directions' (Violence Against Women National Online Resource Center, 2001).

This paper provides an overview of teen dating violence and juvenile batterer intervention programmes. The authors note that the profile of the adolescent male perpetrator of dating violence is similar to that of other juvenile offenders in the criminal justice system, with experiences of child abuse and having witnessed domestic violence, substance use, sexist attitudes and peer compliance. The intervention programmes are implemented as alternatives or complements to incarceration, and intend to rehabilitate and re-educate the young person.

Peters, Jay, Todd K Shackleford and David M Buss, 'Understanding Domestic Violence against Women: Using Evolutionary Psychology to Extend the Feminist Functional Analysis' (2002) 17(2) Violence and Victims 255.

This research tests the hypothesis posed by Wilson & Daly (1993) that one goal of male-perpetrated domestic violence is control over female sexuality, including the deterrence of infidelity. According to this hypothesis, domestic violence varies with women's reproductive value or expected future reproduction, declining steeply as women age. The study sample comprised 3,969 cases of male-perpetrated partner abuse reported to a single police precinct in a large urban area over a 14-year period. Results showed that (1) rates of domestic violence against women decrease as they age; (2) younger men are at greatest risk for perpetrating domestic violence; (3) younger, reproductive age women incur nearly 10 times the risk of domestic violence as do older, post-reproductive age women; & (4) the greater risk of domestic violence incurred by reproductive age women is not attributable solely to mateship to younger, more violent men.

In its findings, this paper notes that, ‘An alternative explanation for the steady decrease in violence against women as they age is that young women tend to be mated to young men and young men are the most violent age-sex subset of the population. Men aged 16 to 24 years, for example, commit the majority of violent acts, including homicide (Wilson & Daly, 1985). The decrease in violence toward women as women age therefore may be attributable to the aging of men and not attributable to the aging of women.’ (p258) However, the authors also note that this hypothesis is not entirely supported by the data: while the youngest men are at greatest risk for perpetrating domestic violence, ‘[t]he victimization rate for the youngest women (15-24 years) —women at greatest risk for domestic violence—is highest for women mated to men two age categories older. Thus, the elevated risk of domestic violence for the youngest women cannot be attributed solely to mateship to younger, more violent men’ (p259).

Young people - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 6 discusses a range of issues affecting children and young people and their experience of court processes.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

This bench books cites ABS statistics stating that 'Women aged 25–34 years had the highest rate of partner violence (2.8%), compared with women aged 55 years and over (0.5%) who experienced the lowest rate' at [10.1.7]. Section [13.3.4] 'Impact on children' provides information on impacts on young children through to young adulthood, including the typical short- and long-term responses children and young people may have.

Specifically in relation to young people, section [13.3.3] 'Risk factors for children' notes: 'Young people growing up in homes where there has been couple violence (both male and female carers perpetrating and being victimised by domestic violence) were more likely to be victims of violence and perpetrators of violence in their own relationships. For example, they were twice as likely to have been forced to have sex and four times as likely to have admitted forcing their partner to have sex. Overall, the best predictor of perpetration (and victimisation) of violence in young people's relationships was found to be witnessing certain types of male to female violence in the home'.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Section 6.3.7: Youth responses: adolescents highlights the range of responses adolescents may have to being exposed to domestic violence, and the bench book also touches on inter-generational transmission of domestic violence in Section 6.3.9.

In a different context, young age of the targeted adult is also identified as a lethality risk factor in Section 8.8.3.

Young people - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Anna

Hilary

Young people - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Bell [2005] ACTSC 123 (1 December 2005) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Higgins CJ at [30]: Domestic violence, 'is a pernicious and evil phenomenon not only because of the immediate trauma to the victim. Its evil influence spreads to children as well. It is no coincidence that, in my experience, young offenders, more often than not, present with a family history of domestic violence. It used to be regarded as a family matter, to be kept private. Victims would be made to feel humiliated, and ashamed to complain; in truth it is entirely the criminal conduct of the perpetrator which is at fault. It is entirely in the public interest that such conduct be exposed and deterred'.

R v Wilkinson [2008] SASC 172 (4 July 2008) – Supreme Court of South Australia

The accused was 27 and the complainant was 17. Gray J at [27]: 'The causes of domestic violence are multiple. It has been recognised that relevant contributing factors include immaturity, mental illness, abnormal personality disorders, inhibition through drug abuse, poor anger management and lack of counselling and support.'

Older people

The most commonly used definition of elder abuse is the one recognised by the World Health Organisation (WHO): 'A single or repeated act, or lack of appropriate action, occurring within any relationship where there is an expectation of trust which causes harm of distress to an older person' [World Health Organisation, 2020]. Australian research suggests that elder abuse is best used as an umbrella term. There are different types of abuse and mistreatment of older people, with different types of abuse sometimes happening simultaneously or changing over time. Abuse may be financial, physical, psychological, social and/or sexual, as well as neglect [Joosten et al 2017].

Evidence about prevalence in Australia is lacking, though based on international indications, it is likely that between 2% and 10% of older Australians experience elder abuse in any given year, with the prevalence of neglect possibly higher. The available evidence suggests that most elder abuse is intra-familial and intergenerational. Financial abuse appears to be the most common form of abuse experienced by elderly people. Psychological abuse appears to frequently co-occur with financial abuse, sometimes involving patterns of behaviour analogous to grooming in the sexual abuse abuse context [Kaspiew et al AIFS Family Matters 2016].

Abuse of older people includes [Bagshaw et al 2009]:

- Financial abuse such as misuse of property or money; undue influence over decisions about wills, powers of attorney, property or money; theft; forced or refused entry into a nursing home; financial dependence and exploitation; threats to not see grandchildren unless financial arrangements are agreed to.
- Psychological abuse may include humiliation, insults, intimidation, excessive control, or being treated like a child
- Neglect may include 'passive neglect' where older people are left alone, isolated, or forgotten; or 'active neglect' where older people are denied the support and care necessary for daily living
- Social abuse may include a failure to provide support and care, or social isolation, for example denying access to the telephone, not permitting visitors or making visitors feel unwelcome or fearful
- Physical abuse may include being hit, sexually assaulted, burned or physically restrained, or having aids and equipment removed such as walking sticks or spectacles

- Medical abuse may include the inappropriate use of constraints, the mal-administration of medications and prescriptions [SA Dept of Health 2014], or the denial of medical consultation.

While elder abuse is often intergenerational, it can be perpetrated by any family member of the older person or other relationships of trust [Joosten et al 2017]. Intimate partner violence that occurs in later life is sometimes a continuation of abuse from a partner or spouse in a long-term relationship, or may occur within a new relationship [Roberto 2016]. As partners age, changing roles within the relationship and changing forms of dependency within the relationship can be a factor in abuse [Joosten et al 2017]. US research [Roberto et al 2013] indicates that, as people age and stressors such as ill health increase, gendered approaches to caregiving may become more entrenched, resulting in men being more likely to control or coerce their female partners, for example forcing her to shower or restraining her while he mows the lawn. Elder abuse is an acknowledged form of family violence, but research notes both similarities and differences to intimate partner violence [Joosten et al 2017]. See table below:

Similarities	Differences
Largely occurs within families	More often intergenerational than spousal
Power imbalance	Not only family, can include other persons in positions of trust
Reluctance to report Fear of consequences to self and perpetrator Fear of loss of relationship Lack of options	More dynamic power imbalance across the lifecourse
Sense of responsibility of person being abused	Not always driven by need to control
Many of the same risk factors	Financial most common
Negative stereotypes and discrimination against group involved	Often includes neglect

Research suggests that the existence of conflict within a family, including complex long-term problems and poor communication, can increase the likelihood of abuse of older people. Mistreatment of older people can take place as families negotiate wider family conflict, changing roles, changing care needs and financial pressures.

Like family violence, women are over-represented as victims of elder abuse, but older men also experience mistreatment and abuse [Joosten et al 2017]. Further risk factors include: ageism; dependency; family dynamics and living arrangements; an adult child in difficulty (such as marital breakdown, business failure, mental heath issues or addictions); a strong sense of entitlement felt by adult children in relation to the older person's assets; gender; financial or economic hardship; low financial literacy; carer stress; dementia, or cognitive or communication impairments; social isolation; substance misuse; Aboriginality; and mental or psychological ill health [SA Dept of Health 2014].

Submissions and case studies presented to the Australian Law Reform Commission's inquiry into elder abuse described a range of situations where family conflict, family breakdown and domestic and family violence can be a factor in abuse of the older person. These include:

- Disputes concerning family agreements, where an older person transfers property to a trusted person in exchange for ongoing care, support and housing. Agreements are often oral in nature. Lack of documentation means there can be serious consequences for the older person, including homelessness and loss of all proceeds, if the promise of ongoing care and housing is withdrawn due to family conflict and relationship breakdown.
- Instances where adult children experiencing domestic violence (either the victim or perpetrator) move in with their parents, where ongoing behaviours and stresses related to domestic violence, impact on the safety of the older person [ALRC Report 2017].

Older people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds appear particularly vulnerable to financial abuse and exploitation due to their likely dependency on others—often children and other family members—for help with translation and interpretation and management of financial matters [Zannettino et al 2014]. There may also be cultural expectations about how an older person is cared for in a family that increase their vulnerability, for example the eldest son may be bound by cultural practices to house or care for an aged mother, and yet he may also be abusive.

Older people may also face a range of barriers to reporting domestic and family violence, thus compounding their vulnerability. Some of these barriers include: diminished cognitive capacity; mental, physical or sensory disability; restricted mobility; lack of awareness of what constitutes abuse; lack of knowledge of their rights or resources; social isolation or fear of alienation; the need to preserve a relationship; dependency; stigma and shame; poor literacy and language skills; religious, cultural or generational beliefs and practices; fear of reprisal; and perceived or actual lack of options or access to services [Bagshaw et al 2009]; and not wishing to tell authorities about abuse as they subscribe to generational beliefs about family violence as a private matter [Vic Royal Commission into FV, 2016].

Older people - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission, Elder Abuse – A National Legal Response, Report No 131 (2017).

This report provides a comprehensive analysis of elder abuse in Australia. It defines elder abuse broadly as an act or omission occurring within a relationship 'where there is an expectation of trust, which causes harm or distress to an older person' (p 19). Elder abuse may include physical abuse, psychological abuse, financial abuse, sexual abuse, and neglect (p 19).

Those who have 'significant disability; poor physical health; mental disorders, such as depression; low income or socioeconomic status; cognitive impairment; and social isolation' and those who live alone with the perpetrator and are older than 74 years, are particularly vulnerable, and women are more at risk than men (p 20). Risk factors for perpetrators of elder abuse include depression, substance abuse, and financial and emotional dependence (p 20). While elder abuse may be inflicted by paid carer and other people known to the victim, it is often perpetrated by a family member, and therefore often also constitutes family or domestic violence (p 20).

The current criminal justice response is discussed in Chapter 13 (from p 363). The report concludes that current provisions adequately address elder abuse, without the addition of new offences. However, the report does consider other ways in which the criminal justice response may be improved, through improved police responses (p 370), and assisting 'vulnerable witnesses' (p 373)

Bagshaw, Dale, Sarah Wendt and Lana Zannettino, 'Preventing the Abuse of Older People by their Family Members' (Stakeholder Paper 7, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2009).

This paper provides a thorough overview of literature and issues in this area. For example it identifies that older people face barriers reporting abuse including: diminished cognitive capacity; mental or physical disability; restricted mobility; lack of awareness of what constitutes abuse; lack of knowledge of their rights or resources; social isolation or fear of alienation; the need to preserve a relationship; dependency; stigma and shame; literacy and language barriers; religious, generational and cultural barriers; fear of reprisal; and perceived or actual lack of options or access to services.

The authors note that definitions of elder abuse are diverse (p 3). Physical abuse can include being hit, sexually assaulted, burned or physically restrained; psychological abuse can include humiliation, insults, fear, or being treated like a child; neglect can include 'passive neglect', which refers to older people being left alone, isolated, or forgotten, and 'active neglect', which is the withholding of items that are necessary for daily living; medical abuse can include the inappropriate use of constraints and withholding or careless administration of drugs; social abuse can involve a failure to provide human services and involuntary social isolation; financial abuse can include misuse of property or money, theft, forced entry into a nursing home, financial dependence and exploitation. Australian researchers have found that the most common form of abuse in this context is financial abuse.

Australian research has found the most common perpetrators are the older person's adult daughter or son (p 3).

This report discusses the gendered nature of the abuse of older people (pp 5-6): women tend to live longer, are less likely to have access to superannuation, they may fall in the gap between the domestic violence sector and the ageing sector. Domestic violence against older people is often 'spouse abuse grown old', following the typical pattern in which perpetrators were overwhelmingly male.

Dean, Adam, Elder abuse: Key issues and emerging evidence (CFCA Paper No. 51 – June 2019, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

Elder abuse is a multifaceted and often hidden form of abuse. There is currently no national data on the prevalence of elder abuse in Australia. Based on international studies, it is estimated that between 2% and 14% of older people in high- or middle-income countries experience elder abuse every year. The term 'elder abuse' covers a range of harmful behaviours, including physical, emotional, sexual and financial abuse and neglect.

This paper provides an overview of elder abuse in Australia. It discusses key issues involved in how elder abuse is defined and examines its prevalence, impact and associated risk factors, with a focus on implications of recent research for policy and practice. The Appendix contains a useful table setting out risk factors associated with different forms of abuse.

Department of Health (SA), Strategy to Safeguard the Rights of Older South Australians 2014–2021 (2014).

Identifies various forms of elder abuse but also adds 'Substance (or chemical) abuse' which is any misuse of drugs, alcohol, medications and prescriptions, including the withholding of medication and over-medication. Notes that between 2007 and 2012, the most common reported forms of elder abuse were psychological and financial, often occurring at the same time, and carried out by people who are most trusted by the victim (p 15). Identifies a series of risk factors that can make older people more vulnerable to experiencing abuse (pp 18-20), including: ageism; dependency; family dynamics and living arrangements; gender; financial/economic hardship; carer stress; dementia or cognitive impairments; social isolation; substance abuse; older people from culturally and linguistically diverse communities; Aboriginal Elders; those with mental health or psychological conditions.

Fileborn, Bianca, 'Sexual assault and justice for older women' [2016] Trauma, violence and abuse 1.

This article provides a review of literature on the sexual assault of older women—including an exploration of the specific features and emotional and physical impacts of older women's experiences. The literature review indicates there is evidence to suggest that existing research underestimates the extent of this issue. Older women face particular barriers to disclosure and accessing the justice system, resulting in their experiences remaining hidden. Many of these barriers also contribute toward older women's experiences being ignored, dismissed, or downplayed by potential bystanders. These barriers are explored in depth in this article and include cultural context, ageism, cognitive and health impairments, and living in a residential care setting.

Kaspiew, Rae, Rachel Carson and Helen Rhoades, 'Elder abuse: Understanding issues, frameworks and responses' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2016).

- 'This report provides a broad analysis of the issues raised by elder abuse in the Australian context. Elder abuse—which involves the physical, emotional, sexual or financial abuse or neglect of an older person by another person in a position of trust—presents a range of complex challenges for the Australian community … Fundamentally a human rights issue, responses to the management and prevention of elder abuse sit within a range of complex policy and practice structures across different levels of government, and various justice system frameworks within the private sector and across non-government organisations'. The report notes that in this way the management of elder abuse has similar features to family and domestic violence, sexual assault and child protection, and that calls have been for the introduction of a comprehensive, national approach to elder abuse.

- 'The report first considers definitional issues in relation to elder abuse and what is known about prevalence and incidence, risk and protective factors and the dynamics surrounding disclosure and reporting. It then sets out some evidence on the demographic and socio-economic features of the Australian community that are relevant to understanding social dynamics that may influence elder abuse. Section 6 outlines some of the features of the systemic structures that intersect with elder abuse and section 7 considers prevention. Section 8 discusses international approaches'.
- Definition of elder abuse from Australian Network for the Prevention of Elder Abuse in 1999: 'any act occurring within a relationship where there is an implication of trust, which results in harm to an older person. Abuse may be physical, sexual, financial, psychological, social and/or neglect' (p.2). Risk factors include cognitive impairment or other disability, social isolation and traumatic life events (pp.7-9). The report also examines in detail available research relating to particular types of elder abuse namely financial abuse, and sexual abuse (pp.10-11).

Kaspiew, Rae, Rachel Carson and Helen Rhoades, 'Elder abuse in Australia' [2016] (98) Family Matters 64.

'This article provides an overview of the prevalence and nature of elder abuse in Australia. Topics include: What is elder abuse?; The prevalence and dynamics of elder abuse; Risk factors and consequences; Particular types of elder abuse; and Disclosure and reporting. Prevention opportunities and frameworks are also considered'.

Lacey, Wendy, 'Neglectful to the Point of Cruelty? Elder Abuse and the Rights of Older Persons in Australia' (2014) 36 Sydney Law Review 99.

This article reports on available data that indicates between two and five per cent of Australians over the age of 65 have experienced abuse, that up to 80 per cent of perpetrators are family members of the victims (the large majority being their children), that financial and psychological abuse are the most common forms of abuse, and that women are twice as likely to be victims of abuse' (p 100). This article presents and discusses three case studies. The article also identifies that the most vulnerable age for abuse is between the ages of 75 and 85 and women are twice as likely to be abused as men.

Melanie Joosten, Freda Vrantsidis and Briony Dow, 'Understanding Elder Abuse: A Scoping Study' (University of Melbourne and National Ageing Research Institute, June 2017).

This report conducts a detailed discussion of elder abuse, focussing on abuse that occurs within families. The large range of definitions of elder abuse may have a significant impact on prevalence estimates (p 11). Victims of elder abuse suffer significant negative consequences, including 'decreased quality of life, morbidity and mortality … depression, anxiety, fear, feelings of unworthiness and other psychological stress, substance addiction and suicide' (p 11). Within families, elder abuse often occurs across generations, with the victim often a parent, and the perpetrator often an adult child, and like other forms of family violence, women are over-represented as victims (p 11). Elder abuse is likely to go unreported (p 11-12).

While conceptualisations of elder abuse have traditionally focussed on older people as dependent (p 13), the report argues that responses to elder abuse must consider 'the behaviour and motivations of the perpetrator, the complexities of the relationship between the older person and the perpetrator, and the influence of the society and systems within which they operate' (p 13). This discussion must include the intersections between elder abuse and other issues (p 14), such as family violence and conflict (pp 14-6), caring for the elderly (pp 16-7), gender and sexuality (pp 17-8), and cultural diversity (pp 18-9). It is argued that the best approach to engage with this multifaceted issue is an applied ecological approach, which 'considers the risk factors of the individual, the perpetrator, their mutual relationship, and their respective positions within community and society' (from p 19). The report also provides a summary of risk factors for perpetrators (p 23), and reviews useful interventions, including approaches that focus on the older person, on the perpetrator, and on family relationships (from p 26).

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence (Volume 5, 2016).

The Report discusses family violence in the context of older people in Volume 5, Chapter 27. The report states that, in some ways, "family violence experienced by older people is no different to that experienced by younger people". However, there are unique characteristics that warrant a tailored response. For example,

"while women are over-represented as victims in prevalence data, the proportion of older men who experience family violence is higher than for younger men. Older people can also be at particular risk of economic or financial abuse. The perpetrator is often the victim's son or daughter." (p 67). See pp 68-70 for detailed data in relation to the prevalence of elder abuse. See pp 71-73 for submissions on the impact of violence on older people. The report also discusses the response of the justice system (p 76), barriers for older persons to report abuse (pp 80-81) and the benefits of restorative justice in this context (p 81).

Zannettino, Lana, Dale Bagshaw and Sarah Wendt 'The Role of Emotional Vulnerability and Abuse in the Financial Exploitation of older People From Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Communities in Australia' (2014) 27(1) Journal of Elder Abuse and Neglect 74.

This article considers the particular vulnerability of older people from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) communities to domestic violence. In particular the authors note that the literature suggests that older people from CALD communities are particularly vulnerable to financial abuse and exploitation due to their dependency on others for translation, financial transactions, and services' (p 75). As CALD groups tend to rely on their children to help them manage money (p 78) this also increases their vulnerability to abuse (p 78).

International

Bows, Hannah and Nicole Westmarland, 'Rape of Older People in the United Kingdom: Challenging the 'Real-Rape' Stereotype' (2017) 57 British Journal of Criminology 1-17.

While advances have been made in understanding sexual violence broadly, this article addresses the gap in knowledge regarding older victims of rape and sexual violence (p 5). In order to do so, the researchers used freedom of information requests to obtain data from 45 police forces relating to 655 cases (p 6). The findings challenge dominant real-rape stereotypes, which involve a 'white, young victim who is attacked at night by a stranger who is motivated by sexual gratification' (p 3), and can lead to older victims of sexual violence being ignored or disbelieved (pp 3-4). Key findings include:

- The 'overall number of reported offences involving an older victim was low when compared with younger age groups' (p 6);
- Consistent with existing knowledge on younger groups, most victims were female, and most perpetrators were male (pp 7-8);

- Perpetrators of sexual violence against older people were likely to be younger than their victims, with the majority under 60 years of age (p 8);
- Most perpetrators were known to the victim, with around 20% being a partner or husband (p 9); and
- Most of the assaults occurred in the victim's home (p 9).

Byard RW, Casper's sign in the elderly. (2021) 61 (4) Medicine, Science and the Law 3099-312 doi: 10.1177/00258024211015096

Casper's sign refers to the absence of external signs of trauma despite severe and often lethal internal injuries. It occurs because the elasticity and resilience of the skin results in it moving rather than sustaining injuries. Given the known increase in skin and soft-tissue fragility in the elderly, the author performed a review of autopsy reports that showed that Casper's sign can be present in elders who had died of trauma such as car crashes. Thus, in the scenario of possible elder abuse, the absence of external injury in the elderly may be no reflection of the force of the impact or the degree of resultant skeletal and/or internal organ disruption.

Fraga Dominguez S, Storey JE, Glorney E. Help-Seeking Behavior in Victims of Elder Abuse: A Systematic Review. (2021) 22 (3) Trauma Violence Abuse 466-480 doi: 10.1177/1524838019860616

Elder abuse victims face multiple barriers when seeking help. Barriers include fear of consequences for self and the perpetrator, individual feelings and external circumstances, knowledge about services, family barriers, the characteristics of their social networks, the perception of the abuse, and cultural, generational, or religious barriers. Some elder abuse victims only seek help when the abuse is perceived as unbearable or they fear for their safety. When elder abuse victims seek help, they do so from a variety of formal and informal sources.

Laura Mosqueda, Theresa Sivers-Teixeira and Stacey Hirst, 'Recognizing Elder Mistreatment: A Guide for Courts' (2017) 53(2) Court Review: The Journal of the American Judges Association 54-61.

This article considers the elements of elder abuse, and how increased knowledge can enhance legal responses (p 54).

- Older people may be prone to bruising and other injuries, which can mask abusive behaviours (pp 55-6), and frailty, which can make them more vulnerable to abuse, and less able to recover from illness and trauma (p 58).
- Many older people require medications, which may be used as a tool of control, through overuse, underuse, and misuse (p 58).
- Older people are often viewed as asexual, which has resulted in sexual abuse among older people being 'one of the least acknowledged, detected, and reported forms of elder abuse' (p 60).
- Older people often experience decreased 'visual and auditory acuity', which can contribute to their vulnerability (p 57). Special measures should be taken in the courtroom to help older people engage with proceedings, such as providing additional light and magnification, reading things aloud, and speaking loudly and clearly (p 57).
- It can be difficult to assess an older person's cognitive ability and decision-making capacity while respecting their autonomy, and judges should therefore be aware of how cognition and capacity may impact an older person's decisions (pp 59-60).
- Judges should be aware of the complexity and multi-faceted nature of elder abuse, and draw on a range of experts with particular knowledge of the aging process, to fully understand the circumstances (p 61)

Roberto, Karen, 'The complexities of elder abuse' (2016) 71(4) American Psychologist 302-311.

This article summarises current understandings of elder abuse, 'including what constitutes elder abuse, risk factors for elder abuse, perpetrators of elder abuse, and outcomes of elder abuse' (p 302). Research indicates that at least 10% of older adults in the United States experience elder abuse, and researchers 'consistently assert that a dramatic discrepancy exists between the actual prevalence of elder abuse and the number of elder abuse cases' known to authorities and service providers (p 302). While there 'is no consensus on the definition of elder abuse', most definitions recognise five types of abuse: physical abuse, sexual abuse, psychological and emotional abuse, financial abuse, and neglect (p 303). A range of interacting factors may contribute to a person's vulnerability to elder abuse, including 'age, gender, race, ethnicity, living arrangements, cultural beliefs and values, as well as physical and cognitive impairments, social isolation, and loneliness' (p 303). The article considers these risk factors in detail. Victims of elder abuse 'typically know their perpetrators, who are usually family members' (p 305). 'Elder abuse, in all its forms, has a profound impact on the health and psychological well-being of late-life victims. Although some markers of elder abuse are instantly obvious, such as injuries ranging from bruises and sprains, to broken bones and lost teeth, to severe brain trauma, older victims often experience numerous adverse health effects that may not be immediately evident and persist long after the abuse has stopped' (p 306).

Roberto, Karen A, Brandy Renea McCann and Nancy Brossoie, 'Intimate Partner Violence in Late Life: An Analysis of National News Reports' (2013) 25(3) Journal of Elder Abuse and Neglect 230.

The authors identified the types of intimate partner violence (IPV) among elders reported most frequently in national newspapers and examined how the abuse was conceptualized by reporters. They found that most reported cases involved murder, with men as perpetrators and women as victims. Caregiving stress and health problems were frequently cited as contributing factors in the cases.

In relation to older perpetrators of intimate partner violence, see especially:

- p233 discusses older men and women's gendered approaches to caregiving in later life, noting that older men 'tended to prioritize the job of caregiving over their wives' feelings'
- '[M]en sometimes "enforced compliance" (p522), such as using force or coercion to get their wives to take a shower, or "active restraint" (p522), such as one man buckling his wife into their car to prevent her from wandering while he mowed the lawn' (p233)
- findings suggest that as stressors increase for older people (eg multiple health problems), gendered behaviours may amplify, particularly in older men who may seek to take control of problematic situations, resulting in instances of IPV (p233).

Swanson Ernst, Joy and Tina Maschi, 'Trauma-informed care and elder abuse: a synergistic alliance' (2018) 30(5) Journal of Elder Abuse & Neglect 354-367.

This article provides a comprehensive analysis of elder abuse - a problem in which one or more traumatic or stressful life experience directly affect older adults, their families and communities. The article demonstrates how knowledge about the causes, consequences and responses to elder abuse can be integrated with the principles of trauma-informed care to improve agency and community responses to preventing or intervening with elder abuse and neglect. To address the ongoing problems with detection and treatment of elder abuse, the authors believe that integrating trauma and elder abuse informed care in organisational services and policies would address many of these concerns. The authors briefly review current knowledge about the causes and consequences of life course trauma and elder abuse (pages 2-4). They then detail the principles and practices of trauma-informed care and how it can form a synergistic alliance with the prevention and intervention efforts across the life course.

World Health Organisation, Elder Abuse (WHO, 2020).

This website contains links to fact-sheets, relevant publications and data published by the World Health Organisation (WHO) in relation to elder abuse. The information on the front page of the site states: ‘Elder abuse can be defined as "a single, or repeated act, or lack of appropriate action, occurring within any relationship where there is an expectation of trust which causes harm or distress to an older person". Elder abuse can take various forms such as financial, physical, psychological and sexual. It can also be the result of intentional or unintentional neglect.’

‘Based on available evidence, WHO estimates that 15.7% of people 60 years and older are subjected to abuse. These prevalence rates are likely to be underestimates as many cases of elder abuse are not reported. Globally the numbers of people affected are predicted to increase as many countries are experiencing rapidly ageing populations.’

Older people - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 11 discusses a range of issues affecting older people and their experience of court processes.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.10 discusses in detail older people's experiences of family violence, and some of the barriers they face when reporting abuse.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 6 focusses on 'Older people'. In particular 6.2.3 considers elder abuse. It identifies the prevalence of elder abuse as between 3%-10%. It identifies financial abuse as the most common form of abuse with women being 2.5 times more likely than men to experience elder abuse. The main perpetrators of elder abuse were adult children, a spouse or partner or other relatives. In around 75% of reported incidents of elder abuse older men and women were estimated to have a decision-making disability and nearly half of them had a significant physical disability. Physical and intellectual disabilities that become more common as people age are discussed.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Although Neilson's bench book refers to elder abuse frequently throughout footnotes in this bench book, there is little substantive discussion on it.

Older people - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Barbara

Brenda

Jennifer

Older people - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Kiril (A Pseudonym) v The Queen* [2019] VSCA 133 (14 June 2019) – Victorian Court of Appeal

[48] The victim of the applicant's offending was elderly and frail and – at least at some point once she had returned from the nursing home to live with him – incapable of adequately caring for herself. Her pitiable condition at the time of death – weighing a mere 34 kilograms and covered in sores – is distressing, and the source of a deal of pathos. She was in that condition because of the applicant's callous disregard for her welfare, suffering her to live in squalor without any semblance of proper care. The respondent's description of the applicant's treatment of his mother as cruel, heatless and inhumane is entirely apt. It was, I consider, very serious and protracted offending.

[53] By his plea, the applicant admitted that, by his conduct, he recklessly endangered his 83 year old mother's life. That means that the applicant admitted he foresaw that his conduct placed her at an appreciable risk of death, and yet he continued to neglect her. For my part, I consider that conduct to be truly reprehensible.

R v Eimerl* [2015] ACTSC 72 (12 March 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

The 23 year old offender forcibly confined his mother, verbally abused her and damaged property. Burns J at [17]: 'I take into account that this is a family violence matter. That is relevant because the only reason that you were able to commit this offence was because of the relationship of trust that existed between you and the victim. If you had not been a family member who was loved and trusted by your victim you would not have had the opportunity to commit this offence. I also note that the offence occurred in the victim's own home, where she should have been entitled to feel safe'.

Saddler v Pavicic* [2011] ACTSC 199 (9 December 2011) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Burns J at [12]: 'It is clear that this was a domestic violence offence. The complainant in the matter was the respondent's mother. Documents from the Canberra Hospital which were tendered in the proceedings before the learned Magistrate suggest that she was born on 21 June 1949, meaning that she was 60 years old at the time of this offence. The respondent was apparently 31 years old. It is now well settled that offences of domestic violence must be treated seriously, and frequently display aggravating features not present in offences occurring outside a domestic relationship. The only reason the respondent was in a position to commit the offence on his mother was because of that relationship. As such, the offence involved a serious breach of the trust reposed in the respondent as a son by his mother. Additionally, the age of the complainant was an aggravating circumstance attending the commission of the offence'.

Pregnant people

Pregnancy has been shown to increase and escalate a person's risk and experience of domestic and family violence by their intimate partner [Walsh 2008]. The Australian Bureau of Statistics 2016 Personal Safety Survey [ABS PSS 2016] estimated that approximately one fifth of women who experienced violence from a current partner, and who were pregnant at some point in the relationship, experienced violence during their pregnancy. Further, approximately one half of women who experienced violence by a previous partner, and who were pregnant during the relationship, experienced violence during their pregnancy [ABS PSS 2016]. Homicide by an intimate partner is the principal cause of injury-induced death among pregnant women [Burch & Gallop 2004].

Escalation of physical violence or other forms of controlling behaviours during pregnancy may arise from the perpetrator's jealousy of the pregnancy or child, or the extra attention their partner may experience from family, friends and health care and support service providers. The perpetrator may also perceive the pregnancy as symbolic of their partner's independence and may use violence to reassert their control.

Research shows that unplanned or unwanted pregnancy is more common among women experiencing domestic and family violence [Williams et al 2008]. The perpetrator may have forced or coerced the woman into pregnancy through, for example, emotional manipulation, contraception sabotage or forced unprotected sex [Moore et al 2010]. The perpetrator may have intended the pregnancy to prevent the woman from working or studying, or to otherwise exercise control over her. Alternatively the perpetrator may refuse to accept the pregnancy, and accuse his partner of infidelity. Women who are concerned that the violence may continue during and after pregnancy and believe that having a child may make leaving the relationship more difficult, may seek to terminate their pregnancy [Chibber et al 2014].

Pregnancy and infancy also create greater dependence for women on their partners physically, emotionally and financially, increasing their vulnerability to domestic and family violence. Some women in abusive relationships may also believe that the pregnancy will make their partner more sympathetic and less likely to abuse [Burch & Gallop 2004], even though research does not support this.

People who are at particular risk of domestic and family violence during pregnancy are those who are: young; single, separated, divorced or in a defacto relationship; of low income and socioeconomic status; unemployed and; with lower levels of education.

Experiences of domestic and family violence during pregnancy may seriously and adversely affect the health of the pregnant person and foetus. Physiological responses caused by stress, as well as physical injury from violence, may include urinary tract and kidney infections, high blood pressure, mental health disorders, premature birth or miscarriage, low birth weight, and foetal injury or death [WHO 2021]. Long-term poor health and ongoing vulnerability due to the perpetrator's domestic and family violence may present serious risks to the safety, health and wellbeing of children of the relationship [Taft 2002].

Pregnant people - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS). The survey collected detailed information from men and women about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety. The survey estimated that approximately one fifth of women who experienced violence from a current partner, and who were pregnant at some point in the relationship, experienced violence during their pregnancy. Further, approximately one half of women who experienced violence by a previous partner, and who were pregnant during the relationship, experienced violence during their pregnancy. See Tables 17-18, which highlight the link between pregnancy and experiences of violence.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. Who is most at risk of physical and sexual partner violence and coercive control during the COVID-19 pandemic?. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 618. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: In this study, data was analysed from a survey of Australian women (n=9,284) to identify women at the highest risk of physical and sexual violence and coercive control during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Logistic regression modelling identified that specific groups of women were more likely than the general population to have experienced physical and sexual violence in the past three months. These were Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women aged 18–24, women with a restrictive health condition, pregnant women and women in financial stress. Similar results were identified for coercive control, and the co-occurrence of both physical/sexual violence and coercive control.

These results show that domestic violence during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic was not evenly distributed across the Australian community, but more likely to occur among particular groups.

Campo, Monica, Domestic and family violence in pregnancy and early parenthood: Overview and emerging interventions (CFCA Practitioner Resources, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This practitioner resource contains information on risk factors for domestic and family violence for young women and women in pregnancy and early parenthood. It contains the following key points:

- Women are at an increased risk of experiencing violence from an intimate partner during pregnancy.
- If domestic and family violence already exists, it is likely to increase in severity during pregnancy.
- Young women, aged 18–24 years, are more likely to experience domestic and family violence during pregnancy.
- Unintended pregnancy is often an outcome of an existing abusive relationship.
- Poor birth outcomes (such as low birth weight, premature birth) and post-natal depression are associated with domestic and family violence during pregnancy.

The long-term effects of exposure to domestic and family violence in utero are emerging.

Meuleners, Lynn B, et al, 'Maternal and Foetal Outcomes among Pregnant Women Hospitalised due to Interpersonal Violence: A Population Based Study in Western Australia, 2002-2008' (2011) 11 BMC Pregnancy and Childbirth 70.

A total of 468 pregnant women were hospitalised in Western Australia for an incident of interpersonal violence during the study period, and 3,744 randomly selected pregnant women were included as the comparison group. The majority of violent events were perpetrated by the pregnant women's partner or spouse. Pregnant Indigenous women were over-represented accounting for 67% of all hospitalisations due to violence and their risk of experiencing adverse maternal outcomes was significantly increased compared to non-Indigenous women. Pregnant women hospitalised for an incident of interpersonal violence sustained almost double the risk for adverse maternal complications than the non-exposed group. The overall risk for adverse foetal complications for pregnant women exposed to violence was increased two-fold.

Ogbo, Felix Akpojene, John Eastwood, Alexandra Hendry, Bin Jalaludin, Kingsley E Agho, Bryanne Barnett and Andrew Page, 'Determinants of Antenatal Depression and Postnatal Depression in Australia' (2018) 18(49) BMC Psychiatry (online).

This article considers the causes of antenatal and postnatal depression in Australia. The results of the study indicate that a history of intimate partner violence, both physical and psychological, is associated with depressive symptoms (p 3). Further, IPV was one of the 'strongest risk factors for antenatal depressive symptoms' (p 5).

Taft, Angela, 'Violence in Pregnancy and After Childbirth' (Issues Paper No 6, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearing House, 2002).

While this Australian issues paper is directed to health practitioners it provides a helpful literature review of violence against women during pregnancy. It focusses primarily on Australian publications. This overview of the literature notes that severe violence may be inflicted during pregnancy and that patterns of violence may change in pregnancy. Some studies report escalation or commencement of violence during pregnancy, others point to decreased violence during pregnancy.

Walsh, Deborah, 'The Hidden Experience of Violence During Pregnancy: A Study of 400 Pregnant Australian Women' (2008) 14(1) Australian Journal of Primary Health.

This study recruited and interviewed 400 women from the Royal Women's Hospital Antenatal clinic in Melbourne, measuring indicators of physical and psychological abuse. It found that 20% of participants reported experiencing violence during their pregnancy (p101), and 6% reported violence increasing during their pregnancy, although most women reported violence and abuse remained the same throughout the pregnancy.

International

Burch, Rebecca, and Gordon Gallup, 'Pregnancy as a Stimulus for Domestic Violence' (2004) 19(4) Journal of Family Violence 243.

In this study 258 men who were attending a domestic violence prevention and treatment program were interviewed about the history of domestic abuse. For those men in the study who admitted abusing their current partner when she became pregnant, the frequency and severity of abuse increased. Eight men admitted they abused a previous partner while she was pregnant and, similarly, frequency and severity of abuse increased towards a pregnant previous partner (p245). Sixty-eight men in this study refused to answer questions in relation to abuse during pregnancy. The data were analysed to determine the relationship between female reproductive status and violent incidents. Both the frequency and severity of male initiated violence against women were twice as high when they were pregnant.

Carrie Purcell et al., 'Women's experiences of more than one termination of pregnancy within two years: a mixed-methods study' (2017) 124 BJOG 1983-1992.

The fact that some women undergo more than one termination of pregnancy (TOP) is often perceived as a concern for TOP provision, policy and research in the UK and internationally. Using a mixed-method design, this study examined the characteristics and experiences of women in Scotland who sought more than one TOP within two years. Results identified key differences between women seeking more than one TOP within two years and those reporting no previous TOP, or previous TOP beyond the preceding two years. Women seeking more than one TOP within two years experienced issues relating to contraception, intimate partner violence (IPV), life aspirations and socio-economic disadvantage. These challenges and vulnerabilities were underpinned by gender and socio-economic inequalities.

Chibber, Karuna et al, 'The Role of Intimate Partners in Women's Reasons for Seeking Abortion' (2014) 24(1) Women's Health Issues e131.

Using baseline data from the Turnaway Study, a longitudinal study among women (n = 954) seeking abortion at 30 U.S. facilities between 2008 and 2010, this study reports findings that 8 per cent of women reported abusive partners as the reason for seeking an abortion, due to concerns the abuse would continue after childbirth (thus effecting the child) and that having a child would inhibit the women leaving the relationship (p e134). Some women also referred to being pressured to get an abortion, and others, being forced to become pregnant. The article goes on to note on p e136 however, that only a small percentage of women 'identified having abusive partners as a reason for seeking abortion. Importantly, those identifying abusive partners as a reason for seeking abortion did not describe their partner as threatening or physically hurting them as a way of forcing them to have an abortion. Instead, their descriptions suggest that the women independently decided to seek abortions, perceiving this as their best option to end abusive relationships'.

Cliffe, Charlotte, Maddalena Miele and Steven Reid, 'Homicide in pregnant and postpartum women worldwide: a review of the literature' (2019) 40(2) Journal of Public Health Policy 80-216

This study reviewed the international literature on maternal homicide, and found that pregnancy-associated homicide is an important contributor to maternal mortality, with rates comparable to suicide. Women murdered during the perinatal period constitute a highly vulnerable group as they are younger, unmarried and more likely to be from minority ethnic groups. Reported worldwide rates of maternal homicide range from 0.97 to 10.6 per 100,000 live births. Rates are highest in the US in comparison to other jurisdictions. Evidence suggests that women who are pregnant may have an increased risk of being a victim of homicide, compared to non-pregnant women. Studies reporting homicide in other jurisdictions do not report as consistently high numbers in the perinatal period, which may be because a lack of data and reliance on national reporting systems which differ significantly by country in method and accuracy.

Moore, Ann M, Lori Frohwirth and Elizabeth Miller, 'Male Reproductive Control of Women Who Have Experienced Intimate Partner Violence in the United States' (2010) 70 Social Science and Medicine 1737.

This article provides a concise overview of the literature, establishing a variety of reproductively coercive behaviours men may engage in, pre-, during, and post-pregnancy. The article goes on to discuss findings from interviews with 71 women aged 18-49, who reported a history of IPV. Findings include that 53 respondents (74%) experienced male reproductive control, including 'pregnancy-promoting behaviours' (e.g. sabotaging contraception, forced sex), abuse during the pregnancy, and attempts to influence the pregnancy outcome.

Nesari M., Olson J.K., Vandermeer B., Slater L., Olson D.M., 'Does a maternal history of abuse before pregnancy affect pregnancy outcomes? A systematic review with meta-analysis' (2018) 18(1) BMC Pregnancy and Childbirth 404.

The study aims to examine the connection between maternal histories of abuse before pregnancy and the risk of pre-term delivery and low birth weight. An analysis of 16 articles demonstrated that women who were abused prior to pregnancy have an increased risk of pre-term birth and low birth weight, with the highest level of risk associated with victims of childhood abuse. The authors suggest that possible explanations for these findings include: 1) cumulative life stress; 2) associated high risk behaviors including smoking, drug or alcohol abuse; 3) decreased family support; and 4) decreased prenatal care. The authors suggest that greater care should be taken to identify maternal history of abuse before pregnancy, and to use this information to inform risk assessment for adverse pregnancy outcomes.

Roberts, Sarah CM, et al, 'Risk of Violence from the Man Involved in the Pregnancy After Receiving or Being Denied an Abortion' (2014) 12 BMC Medicine 144.

Using data from the Turnaway Study, a longitudinal study among women seeking abortion at 30 U.S. facilities between 2008 and 2010, this study explored whether the risk of intimate partner violence decreased after having an abortion. It found that: 'Among women seeking abortion, having an abortion was associated with a reduction over time in physical violence from the MIP [man involved in the pregnancy], while carrying the pregnancy to term was not. Terminating an unwanted pregnancy may allow women to avoid physical violence from the MIP, while having a baby from an unwanted pregnancy appears to result in sustained physical violence over time' (p148).

Vivienne, Elizabeth, 'Custody Stalking: A Mechanism of Coercively Controlling Mothers Following Separation' (2017) 25(2) Feminist Legal Studies 185-201.

This study adds to the literature in relation to post-separation violence by introducing the new concept of 'custody stalking'. Custody stalking is a parents's use of custody and/or child protection proceedings to obtain care time with children far in excess of their involvement prior to separation (p 187). Elizabeth views custody stalking as a specific pattern of coercive control, derived from the unique insights former partners have about how to torment women (p 187). The study was conducted through interviews with 12 mothers who had experienced domestic violence (p 190). The study found that custody stalking causes grief, damages psychological wellbeing and has a detrimental effect on their mothering relationships. However, the losses experienced by mothers in this study are described as 'culturally invisible' (p 187-8)

Wallace, M. et al., (2021) 'Homicide during pregnancy and the post-partum period in the United States, 218-2019'. Obstetrics & Gynecology, 138(5): 762- 769, doi: 10.1097/AOG.0000000000004567

Objective: To estimate the national pregnancy associated homicide mortality ratio, characterize pregnancy-associated homicide victims, and compare the risk of homicide in the perinatal period (pregnancy and up to 1 year postpartum) with risk among nonpregnant, nonpostpartum females aged 10–44 years.

Methods: Data from the National Center for Health Statistics 2018 and 2019 mortality files were used to identify all female decedents aged 10–44 in the United States. These data were used to estimate 2-year pregnancy-associated homicide mortality ratios (deaths/100,000 live births) for comparison with homicide mortality among nonpregnant, nonpostpartum females (deaths/100,000 population) and to mortality ratios for direct maternal causes of death. We compared characteristics and estimated homicide mortality rate ratios and 95% CIs between pregnant or postpartum and nonpregnant, nonpostpartum victims for the total population and with stratification by race and ethnicity and age.

Results: There were 3.62 homicides per 100,000 live births among females who were pregnant or within 1 year postpartum, 16% higher than homicide prevalence among nonpregnant and nonpostpartum females of reproductive age (3.12 deaths/100,000 population, P,.05). Homicide during pregnancy or within 42 days of the end of pregnancy exceeded all the leading causes of maternal mortality by more than twofold. Pregnancy was associated with a significantly elevated homicide risk in the Black population and among girls and younger women (age 10–24 years) across racial and ethnic subgroups.

Conclusion: Homicide is a leading cause of death during pregnancy and the postpartum period in the United States. Pregnancy and the postpartum period are times of elevated risk for homicide among all females of reproductive age.

Williams, Corrine M, Ulla Larsen and Laura A McCloskey, 'Intimate Partner Violence and Women's Contraceptive Use' (2008) 14(12) Violence Against Women 1382.

This article provides a very relevant review of the literature in this area, including studies establishing an association between intimate partner violence, unintended pregnancies, and abortions (pp1382-1385). In doing so, the article provides an overview of some of the behaviours women's abusive partners engage in, such as forcing or preventing women from having children, refusing to use contraception, and women not having control over the timing of sexual intercourse (p1384). It goes on to explore contraceptive use by 225 abused and nonabused women, finding that 'Women experiencing physical and emotional abuse were more likely to report not using their preferred method of contraception in the past 12 months compared with nonabused women (OR = 1.9; 95% CI = 1.0 to 3.7)' [abstract].

World Health Organisation (WHO), Fact sheet: Violence against women, 9 March 2021.

This fact sheet, based on data collected by the WHO, states that intimate partner violence and sexual violence can lead to unintended pregnancies, induced abortions, gynaecological problems, and sexually transmitted infections. WHO studies confirm that women who have experienced partner violence are twice as likely to have an abortion as compared to women who have not experienced partner violence. This fact sheet notes that intimate partner violence in pregnancy also increases the likelihood of miscarriage, stillbirth, pre-term delivery and low birth weight babies.

Pregnant people - Other Bench Books

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book has material on what the protection orders require in terms of, e.g. protecting the unborn child if the woman is pregnant when the order is made (Chapter 9.8), but does not discuss any social context.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Violence during pregnancy is identified as heightening victims' risks of experiencing domestic violence, and as increasingly the likelihood of a lethal outcome (Section 8.14.2). Further, Section 6.3.3 discusses potential impacts of domestic violence on pregnancy/birth, though this is focused on the harm caused to the foetus.

Also see Supplementary Chapter 2's section 'Domestic Violence and the Fetus', which notes '[p]hysical abuse during pregnancy has sometimes been identified as a risk factor for femicide'. It goes on to discuss the vulnerability of children due to having been exposed to domestic violence during pregnancy: 'As Cunningham and Baker point out … research documenting long-term psychological damage to children connected to domestic violence during pregnancy been rather limited, although low birth weight and associated problems were reported regularly. However a considerably larger body of research examining the impact of witnessing violence on children from birth onwards, together with emerging neurological research on brain development, strongly suggests the potential for such harm. Indeed it is now reasonably well accepted that pre- and perinatal stress reactions of the mother to abuse and violence in the home can affect the development of the child. Certainly there is consensus among all domestic violence, early child-care, child-protection, medical, and mental-health experts that safety measures and economic resources ought to be directed to protecting pregnant women from domestic violence with its collateral adversities.'

Pregnant people - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Pregnant people - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Ahmu v The Queen; DPP v Ahmu [2014] NSWCCA 312 (15 December 2014) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Adams J at [62]: 'The judge noted that, at the time of the offences, the complainant was eight weeks pregnant, which added to the objective seriousness of the offences, committed in the context of an ongoing, relatively violent domestic relationship'.

Hiron v The Queen [2007] NSWCCA 336 (7 December 2007) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Price J at [35]: 'The applicant's offending was compendiously summarised by the Judge as follows. 'The offences, or some of them, involved the actual use of a weapon, namely a tyre lever. The offences involved gratuitous cruelty, punching and kicking his domestic partner 23 weeks pregnant, and threatening her. The offences were committed while the prisoner was on conditional liberty, that is on parole. He abused a position of trust as a partner of the victim and father of their child and expected child. The victim was vulnerable in the sense that she was a pregnant female of much smaller build totally under the domination of the prisoner'.

Police v Dolan [2010] SASC 341 (9 December 2010) – Supreme Court of South Australia

Gray J at [18]: 'I consider that the Magistrate failed to have sufficient regard to the fact that this was an act of domestic violence to a young pregnant woman. The fact that the defendant was angry did not justify or excuse in any way the violence perpetrated. He struck his young female partner in circumstances which put her health, and that of the child that she was carrying, in jeopardy. His victim was entitled to be treated with patience and respect, not the physical abuse that she received. I consider that the Magistrate was in error in failing to have proper regard to this factor. Although the defendant was not charged with an aggravated assault on the basis of his domestic relationship, this was still a relevant factor to be considered'.

Byrnes v The Queen* [2015] VSCA 341 (10 December 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kaye JA at [22]-[23]: 'The applicant's offending had a number of very serious characteristics. As the respondent has pointed out, it was premeditated, and the applicant had clearly prepared for it. The victim was vulnerable. She was carrying the applicant's baby. The applicant took advantage of his greater strength, and the fact that he had a weapon, to overwhelm her. The threat to abort the baby was, as the judge correctly said, a 'most ugly' aspect of the false imprisonment. The whole experience, to which the applicant subjected her, must have been extraordinarily terrifying. She was justifiably in grave fear for her own life and that of her baby. While the imprisonment did not extend for hours or days, it lasted for over one hour, during the whole of which the applicant terrorised his victim.

'In those circumstances, the offending by the applicant, comprising charge 1, called for a stern sentence. In such a case, involving wanton domestic violence, general deterrence, specific deterrence, and denunciation were important considerations. While the judge accepted that the applicant's psychological condition moderated the weight to be given to those considerations, nevertheless, they rightly remained important factors in the determination of the applicant's sentence'.

Morgan v Kazandzis* [2010] WASC 377 (10 December 2010) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

EM Heenan J at [69]: 'The victim of the assaults was particularly vulnerable, being in a prior relationship with the appellant and being pregnant at the time of both assaults'.

People with disability and impairment

Predominantly women with disability and impairment are significantly more likely than other women to experience domestic and family violence; and the violence is more likely to be serious, experienced differently, and extend for longer periods of time [Frawlet et al 2015]. Australian research identifies a range of factors that contribute to this vulnerability and a victim's capacity to seek the assistance they need. These factors relate to the nature of the victim's disability or impairment, the extent to which the victim is dependent on the perpetrator, and general community attitudes and approaches to people with disability and impairment.

A person may experience disability or impairment as physical, sensory, or cognitive impairment [NSWLRC 2012], or a complex intersection of some or all of these conditions. When also a victim of domestic and family violence, they may not be aware of or understand their legal rights and protections, or they may be prevented from accessing support services where the physical environment does not accommodate their needs. Support workers may not have the skills to assist the victim to communicate effectively, or support service information may not be offered in a format that the victim can use or at a location the victim can access. People with disability or impairment may also have a low level of literacy or may be illiterate.

Victims with disability or impairment who require support from, or depend on, their partner, the perpetrator, for their daily needs and care may be especially vulnerable to domestic and family violence. [George & Harris 2014] For example, the perpetrator may deny or restrict the victim's access to their transport or mobility aid, medication or other means of disability support; or fail to help the victim on or off the toilet, or to adequately wash or nourish the victim. The perpetrator may injure, threaten to injure or immobilise an assistance animal that the victim is reliant on for independence; or interfere with the victim's reproductive health and choices by imposing measures to control menstruation, force infertility or terminate pregnancy. The perpetrator may also, through physically and emotionally isolating behaviours and threats, act as a gatekeeper to the victim's attempts to disclose the violence and seek assistance from support services. People with disability or impairment may be more likely to delay seeking help or reporting violence for fear of losing the perpetrator's support [Harpur & Douglas 2015].

While the research is limited, there is evidence indicating that where, in a previously non-violent relationship, one partner develops a disability through, for example, brain injury or Multiple Sclerosis, there is a risk that the other partner may begin to demonstrate domestic and family violence behaviours towards them [Bagshaw et al 2000].

General community attitudes and approaches to people with disability and impairment may impact on how a victim experiences domestic and family violence. Stereotypical notions of, for example, a woman with disability or impairment as either not having sexual feelings or being hypersexual, incapable of sustaining relationships, or unable to control herself may result in the woman's actual circumstances and needs being overlooked, or the woman being blamed for the violence. Reportedly, when disclosing their experiences of violence, women with disability or impairment are less likely to be believed, and when giving evidence in court, their competency, reliability and credibility are more likely to be questioned or given less weight [Dimopoulos & Fenge 2013]. Their fear of prejudicial assessment or discrimination may cause women with disability or impairment to be less likely to access support services or engage with police or judicial processes.

Perpetrators of domestic and family violence may also experience disability or impairment, which may affect the nature and severity of the violence, how it is experienced by the victim, and the appropriate judicial responses. A US study revealed a high level of learning disabilities and mental ill health among perpetrators compared with other offenders [Stewart & Power 2014].

People with disability and impairment - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women aged 18 years and over about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

'Women with a disability or long-term health condition were more likely to have experienced violence than women without a disability or long-term health condition. In 2016, an estimated 5.9% (172,800) of women with a disability or long-term health condition experienced violence in the 12 months prior to the survey, compared to 4.3% (274,400) of those with no disability or long-term health condition.

The proportion of men who experienced violence in the 12 months prior to the survey was similar for men with a disability or long-term health condition (5.6% or 158,100) and men without a disability or long-term health condition (6.2% or 383,200)' (see Tables 6-7).

Australian Bureau of Statistics 2021. Disability and Violence - In Focus: Crime and Justice Statistics. April 2021. Canberra: Australian Bureau of Statistics.

Extract: The 2016 PSS found that living with disability or a long-term health condition raised the likelihood of experiencing various types of violence for women but not for men. These include physical violence by any perpetrator, violence by a cohabiting partner (physical and/or sexual), emotional abuse by a cohabiting partner, sexual harassment by any perpetrator, and stalking by any perpetrator.

The difference was greatest for violence by a cohabiting partner (physical and/or sexual), where women with disability were twice as likely to experience violence by a cohabiting partner as women without disability.

The rate of sexual violence was similar for women with and without disability or a long-term health condition.

For men, disability or a long-term health condition raised the risk of experiencing stalking only (2.5% compared with 1.4%).

The type and severity of disability were also found to impact on the likelihood of victimisation. Both women and men with intellectual/psychological disability were more likely than those with physical disability to experience violence (physical and/or sexual) and emotional abuse by a cohabiting partner, however the difference was more pronounced for women.

The PSS also found that women living with intellectual/psychological disability were more likely to experience cohabiting partner violence (physical and/or sexual) compared with women living with physical disability.

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children's experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;

- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Bagshaw, Dale et al, Reshaping Responses to Domestic Violence (Final Report, University of South Australia, April 2000).

Researchers reviewed Australian and overseas domestic violence literature, and then conducted a phone-in and focus groups to assess the needs of women, men and young people who have been involved in domestic violence situations. This required analysis of the primary data collected and consideration of prevention strategies used in Australia and overseas (p8).

- In relation to perpetrators of domestic violence: 'Two participants had been in relationships that became violent after their partners had experienced medical traumas – in one case a head injury and another, heart surgery. For both participants their relationships had been positive until that point and their commitment to the relationship was sustained by the hope that things would improve or 'get back to normal'. The positive aspects of their relationships were never restored.
- The authors suggest that when partners have a disability or medical condition, women may be under greater pressure to remain in the abusive relationship. [1.20] They recommend that further research be undertaken to identify the special needs of victims and/or perpetrators with a disability. (p44)
- P29 also identifies perpetrators' disabilities, such as multiple sclerosis and brain injuries being used as explanations for perpetrators' behaviours by callers in the study.

Boxall H & Morgan A 2021. Who is most at risk of physical and sexual partner violence and coercive control during the COVID-19 pandemic?. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 618. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: In this study, data was analysed from a survey of Australian women (n=9,284) to identify women at the highest risk of physical and sexual violence and coercive control during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Logistic regression modelling identified that specific groups of women were more likely than the general population to have experienced physical and sexual violence in the past three months. These were Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, women aged 18–24, women with a restrictive health condition, pregnant women and women in financial stress. Similar results were identified for coercive control, and the co-occurrence of both physical/sexual violence and coercive control.

These results show that domestic violence during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic was not evenly distributed across the Australian community, but more likely to occur among particular groups.

Boxall H, Morgan A & Brown R 2021. Experiences of domestic violence among women with restrictive long-term health conditions: Report for the Royal Commission into Violence, Abuse, Neglect and Exploitation of People with Disability. Statistical Report no. 32. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

This report was prepared for the Royal Commission into Violence, Abuse, Neglect and Exploitation of People with Disability. It describes the domestic violence experiences of women with restrictive long-term health conditions during the initial stages of the COVID-19 pandemic, using survey data collected in May 2020 from over 8,000 Australian women who were in a current relationship.

After controlling for a number of other factors associated with domestic violence such as age, Indigenous status and education level, women with a restrictive long-term health condition were more likely than women without such health conditions to have experienced physical or sexual partner violence and/or coercive control in the three months prior to the survey. Women with restrictive long-term health conditions were also more likely to report experiencing the onset or escalation of domestic violence in the past three months. The risk of domestic violence was even higher among women with intersecting risk factors for domestic violence: Indigenous women, women from non-English-speaking backgrounds, and women under financial stress.

Brain Injury Australia, 'The Prevalence of Acquired Brain Injury among Victims and Perpetrators of Family Violence' (April 2018).

This resource provides detailed analysis of the prevalence of acquired brain injuries among both victims and perpetrators of family violence. For both victims and perpetrators, brain injury impacts capacity to recover, change and safeguard future wellbeing. This study utilises data obtained from Victorian hospitals between 2006 and 2016 (p 25). Family violence is a significant cause of brain injury, with around 40 percent of victims having sustained a brain injury (pp 29). Moreover, brain injury was associated with 14 of the 17 family violence-related deaths in the study period (p 29). There is also evidence to suggest that rates of brain injury among perpetrators of family violence are disproportionately high, indicating that having suffered a brain injury is a risk factor for future perpetration of family violence (p 19). Finally, the study highlights that the available data is likely to represent the 'tip of the iceberg', with many injuries going unreported or undiagnosed, emphasising the need for additional research in this area (pp 34-5).

Darshini Ayton, Elizabeth Pritchard and Tess Tsindos, 'Acquired Brain Injury in the Context of Family Violence: A Systematic Scoping Review of Incidence, Prevalence, and Contributing Factors' (2019) Trauma, Violence & Abuse 1-15.

Acquired brain injury (ABI) is regarded as the forerunner to, or result of, family violence. ABI is an umbrella term for conditions such as traumatic brain injury (TBI), stroke, aneurysm, brain tumour or vestibular dysfunction. In particular, TBIs are associated with reduced cognitive and physical functioning, negative psychological responses (such as depression and post-traumatic stress disorder), and even death. Family violence may be perpetrated by someone who has previously suffered a TBI and/or the victim may sustain a TBI from violence. Although studies have considered TBIs and family violence separately, there is limited evidence assessing the nexus between these two phenomena. This article presents a systematic review of current literature regarding incidence, prevalence and contributing factors of brain injury within a family violence context. Results showed that the factors contributing to brain injury within the family violence context had multifactorial causation and varied significantly across the studied populations. A number of biological, behavioural, structural, social and environmental factors were identified as negatively affecting the incidence and prevalence of brain injury and family violence. Biological factors that contributed to being a victim of family violence included age and gender of parent/baby. The social factor of previous child abuse was correlated with ongoing abuse later in life, but is yet to be fully explored. Environmental factors, such as hostile living environments and exposure to natural disasters, also have not been thoroughly investigated in relation to IPV or TBI, but are linked to an increase in parental stress and contributed to greater levels of child maltreatment. One limitation of the review was that the underreporting of family violence may have affected the accuracy and generalisability of incidence and prevalence statistics.

Dimopoulos, Georgina, and Elanor Fenge, Voices Against Violence: Paper 3, A Review of the Legislative Protections Available to Women with Disabilities who have Experienced Violence in Victoria (Women With Disabilities Victoria, Office of the Public Advocate and Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria, 2013).

This paper identifies that women with disabilities are at a significantly greater risk of sexual assault than women without disabilities and identifies a number of barriers to justice (p 14):

- Inadequate education and barriers to access of information resulting in a woman's lack of knowledge or awareness that a sexual offence has been committed against her.
- Communication difficulties that impede the woman's ability to disclose sexual assault and articulate particulars.
- A greater dependence on others for her basic needs, care and support.
- A woman's care provider or family member acting as a 'gatekeeper' to disclosure, information and assistance.
- Power imbalances in the relationship between the woman and the perpetrator, who may be an intimate partner, family member or care provider.
- Physical and social isolation, which prevent a woman from accessing support services.

This paper considers evidentiary issues for women with disabilities in family violence and sexual offence proceedings (pp. 119-130).

Dowse, Leanne, Karen Soldatic, Jo Spangaro, and Georgia van Toorn, 'Mind the gap: the extent of violence against women with disabilities in Australia' (2016) 51(3) Australian Journal of Social Issues 341.

Identifies that further analysis of the 2012 Personal Safety Survey data indicates that among women with disabilities aged under 50, 62 per cent have experienced violence since the age of 15, and women with disabilities had experienced three times the rate of sexual violence in the past 12 months compared to those without disabilities. These ?ndings still do not represent the full extent of violence against women with disabilities, since the Personal Safety Survey samples only women who reside in private dwellings and excludes those living in disability care settings. (p.341).

Dyson, Sue, Patsie Frawley and Sally Robinson, "Whatever it takes": Access for women with disabilities to domestic and family violence services: Final report (ANROWS, 2017).

The report highlights that accessibility includes how services think about disability (attitudinal factors) and how information about services is made available (p 3). The report states that "[e]nsuring physical access is important, but service accessibility needs to be understood and promoted, so that women with disabilities know services exist that can help them, and that they will be received, acknowledged, and heard by tertiary response services. Good practice principles for accessibility suggest that services must be approachable, acceptable, affordable, available, and appropriate" (p 43).

Frawley, Patsie, Sue Dyson, Sally Robinson and Jen Dixon, What Does It Take? Developing Informed and Effective Tertiary Responses to Violence and Abuse of Women and Girls with Disabilities in Australia: State of Knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This literature review examines the scope, nature and incidence of violence and abuse experienced by women and young women with disabilities. It includes relevant statistics. It identifies that 'women and young women with disabilities experience all forms of violence and abuse as other women experience. However, women with disabilities experience violence and abuse, including sexual abuse, at significantly higher rates than women who do not have disabilities' (p 5).

George, Amanda, and Bridget Harris, Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria (Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University, 2014).

This research reports that women with disabilities who experience family violence face additional barriers including dependency on those who provide support, limited private finances, limited access to suitable transport, social isolation and limited support services that are responsive to their needs and these barriers are compounded in a rural setting. This paper also reports on fears held by women with disability that their children will be removed from their care (pp 139-140).

Harpur, Paul, and Heather Douglas, 'Disability and Domestic Violence: Protecting Survivors' Human Rights' (2015) 23 (3) Griffith Law Review 405.

This paper reviews the literature in relation to domestic violence, the legal system and disability. It considers how disability domestic violence may be manifested eg pp 408-411 identifies that those victims who require support from their partners for daily tasks can be especially vulnerable to abuse (e.g. leaving a person who requires assistance off the toilet on the toilet for hours). Victims who rely on mobility aids, medication or medical technologies are especially vulnerable to partners who restrict access. It notes that people with disabilities have significantly different relationships with their pets when pets are service animals (e.g. guide dogs for blind and deaf people) – perpetrators who threaten or harm pets can have an extremely disabling impact upon a survivor with a disability; threatening to injure or immobilise a service animal is particularly distressing for a person who relies on that animal for their independence.

Henry, Nicola, Asher Flynn and Anastasia Powell, Image-based sexual abuse: Victims and perpetrators (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 572 March 2019).

Report abstract:

Image-based sexual abuse (IBSA) refers to the non-consensual creation, distribution or threatened distribution of nude or sexual images. This research examines the prevalence, nature and impacts of IBSA victimisation and perpetration in Australia. This form of abuse was found to be relatively common among respondents surveyed and to disproportionately affect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people with a disability, homosexual and bisexual people and young people. The nature of victimisation and perpetration was found to differ by gender, with males more likely to perpetrate IBSA, and females more likely to be victimised by a partner or ex-partner.

Maher, JaneMaree, et al., Women, disability and violence: Barriers to accessing justice—Final Report (ANROWS, 2018).

Women with disability face additional barriers related to acknowledging and disclosing violence that must be addressed before fundamental steps, including escaping or planning to escape a violent situation, can be considered (p 33).

The report identified current critical barriers to justice (pp 29-32), including:

- Normalisation of violence within service systems and society more generally (this was identified in interviews as the most difficult barrier to overcome, see p 37);
- Victim-blaming and disbelieving reports (police responses as questioning credibility; or an unwillingness to investigate);
- Lack of awareness of disability in the criminal justice system (that is, a failure to recognise disability, provide reasonable adjustments, adequately investigate, or recognise the abuse as violence);
- Limited resources in the community legal sector (including lack of accessible services);
- Limited access to, and knowledge of, legal rights; and
- Fear of reprisal.

Mitra-Kahn, Trishima, Carolyn Newbigin and Sophie Hardefeldt, Invisible women, invisible violence: Understanding and improving data on the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault for diverse groups of women: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

This paper establishes the state of knowledge about the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault against women from diverse groups, including women with disabilities. It explains that women with disabilities are more likely, across their lifetime, to experience violence from multiple perpetrators compared to women without disabilities, and when violence does occur, it is likely to be more frequent, severe, and to continue for a longer duration (p 26). Research shows that women with disabilities experience specific forms of violence, such as a perpetrator in a carer role taking advantage of their dependency; restriction or withholding of aids or medication; withholding of essential assistance; financial abuse; and involuntary sterilisation and/or termination of pregnancy (p 26). Access to support services and justice responses can be limited by social and physical environmental barriers, as well as lack of appropriate educational resources on rights and seeking assistance (pp 26-27). Being disbelieved is a further and fundamental barrier for women with disabilities. Access to justice can be hindered by, for example, women being assessed as legally incapable to give evidence, being unable to access communication aids or interpreters, and having perpetrators of serious crimes against them going unprosecuted (p 27).

New South Wales Law Reform Commission, People with Cognitive and Mental Health Impairments in the Criminal Justice System: Diversion, Report 135 (2012).

Although focused on criminal justice this report provides a useful definition of cognitive impairment (pp 135-137). It defines cognitive impairment as an ongoing impairment in comprehension, reason, adaptive functioning, judgment, learning or memory that is the result of any damage to, dysfunction, developmental delay or deterioration of the brain or mind. It may arise from but is not limited to intellectual disability, borderline intellectual functioning, dementias, acquired brain injury, drug or alcohol related brain damage and autism spectrum disorders.

Office of Public Advocate (Queensland) Systems Advocacy, Submission to the Australian Human Rights Commission, The Investigation into Access to Justice in the Criminal Justice System for People with Disability, August 2013.

While not specific to DV, this submission canvasses the Queensland-specific legal processes around people with disabilities in the criminal justice system, and the considerations that need to be taken into account.

See especially:

- '2.1 Defendants' (from pp2-3) drawing on statistics of intellectual disability and literacy levels in Queensland prisoners;
- '4.3 The Court Process' (pp8-12) discussing evidence-in-chief and cross-examination considerations that need to be made for defendants with disabilities. This section also discusses identifying and communicating with people with intellectual disability or impaired decision-making (p10);
- '4.4 Court Diversions' (pp12-14) discussing specialist mental health and diversion programs for judicial officers to consider.

People with Disability Australia (PWDA) and Domestic Violence NSW (DVNSW), Women with Disability and Domestic and Family Violence: A Guide for Policy and Practice (Toolkit, 8 March 2015).

This guide reports that 19% of Australian women have a disability. Drawing on available research the authors identify that Australian women with disability are 37.3% more at risk of domestic and family violence. In NSW, over 43% of women experiencing personal violence have disability or long-term illness, meaning that they experience violence at twice the rate of other women (p1).

The report defines disability: 'Disability is now usually understood using the social model of disability, which emphasises that disability results from disabling environmental and social barriers (p1). Physical, attitudinal and communication barriers reduce the opportunities afforded to people with impairments, resulting in unequal access, exclusion and/or discrimination. The social model of disability highlights that it is a shared responsibility to ensure equality of access for all by addressing barriers to inclusion and full participation for people with disability'.

Barriers to seeking assistance include (pp4-5):

- Unawareness of services available to them; Information not being available in correct formats (Easy English, Auslan, braille etc).
- Inappropriate or inadequate education of their rights, or of the criminal nature of domestic and family violence.
- Women with disability are frequently not believed upon disclosing their experiences of violence and abuse.
- Inappropriate responses to disclosure resulting from social myths about people with disability (e.g. people with disability are innocent, do not have sexual feelings, are incapable of sustaining relationships; or are 'hypersexual', lack the ability to control themselves) – these myths shift blame from perpetrator to the person being abused.
- Discriminatory stereotypes.
- Fear of losing custody of children to abusive partner or family member (women with disability do disproportionately have children removed from their care).
- Crisis accommodation may be inaccessible or unable to provide women with disability with enough personal support.

- Women with disability may be reliant on their abuser for daily, personal care.
- Fear of being institutionalised.
- Women with disability may be physically segregated in residential institutions due to discrimination and prejudice, removing support networks and isolating them physically or socially.

The report discusses the major access issues to Family Violence Services (and these have relevance to courts) (pp 6-10):

- Inaccessible information and communication (information not available in alternative formats, not distributed in locations frequented by women with disability, may not acknowledge complex difficulties faced by women with disability).
- Physical inaccessibility (not just wheelchair users - women with physical, visual, hearing impairments and/or mental illness face various barriers in environments that do not accommodate their presence)
- Organisational attitudes and experience (attitudes of service staff, managers and governance bodies; stereotypes and myths)
- Perceived discrimination (belief that family violence services and refuges are unsafe, unapproachable and inaccessible; fear of discrimination).

Women With Disabilities Australia, Stop The Violence: Facts & Figures (2013).

This factsheet on women and girls in Australia with disability includes statistics from a number of national studies including ABS. For example:

- Women with disabilities make up 20% of the population of women in Australia (nearly 2 million women).
- Only 16% of all women with disabilities are likely to have any secondary education compared to 28% of men with disabilities.
- 51% of women with disabilities earn less than $200 per week compared to 36% of men with a disability.
- Men with disabilities are twice as likely to be in paid employment as women with disabilities.
- Women with disability were 37.3% more likely than women without disability to report experiencing some form of intimate partner violence.
- 19.7% of women with disability reported a history of unwanted sex compared to 8.2% of women without disability.

International

Amanda St Ivany, Susan Kools, Phyllis Sharps and Linda Bullock, 'Extreme Control and Instability: Insight Into Head Injury From Intimate Partner Violence' (2018) 14(4) Journal of Forensic Nursing 198-205.

Head injuries and intimate partner violence (IPV) are underreported due to the unwillingness of victims to seek medical care after suffering a head injury, or to report an incident of IPV to authorities. Other barriers to understanding the prevalence of IPV-induced head injury include a lack of specific screening tools, as well as difficulties with classification and diagnosis of mild traumatic brain injury (TBI) when women do seek medical assistance. This study reports on 21 interviews from nine (US) women who self-reported passing out from a blow to the head. None of the women received medical care for their head trauma. A main reason for why the women did not receive medical care for their head injury was because the abusers made unwanted sexual advances immediately after the head injury in order to assert dominance and instil fear. Abusers exhibited characteristics of extreme control and manipulation. Further, the women in the study reported living with instability from not having control over basic needs (such as housing), cycles of incarceration, drug and alcohol use and fear of being separated from their children. A further element of instability was the varied police response they received when they did report incidents of IPV. This also often placed them at a higher risk for violence and retaliation from their abusers.

Kastello, Jennifer et. al., 'Predictors of Depression Symptoms Among Low-Income Women Exposed to Perinatal Intimate Partner Violence' (2016) 52(6) Community Mental Health Journal 683-90.

This US study assessed 239 low-income pregnant women for their risk of depression. It found that women experiencing severe psychological intimate partner violence (IPV) were 3.16 times more likely to have a high risk for depression compared to women experiencing severe physical or sexual IPV (p 686).

McCarthy, M., Bates, C., Triantafyllopoulou, P., et. al., '"Put bluntly, they are targeted by the worst creeps society has to offer": Police and professionals' views and actions relating to domestic violence and women with intellectual disabilities' (2019) 32(1) Journal of Applied Research in Intellectual Disabilities 71-81.

An online survey of police, and health and social care professionals (total n717) across the UK was conducted to investigate their attitudes, experiences and responses towards the domestic violence experienced by women with intellectual disabilities. Results showed that half of the respondents had direct experience of working with an intellectually disabled woman who had also suffered from domestic violence. Professionals were more likely than police to view women with intellectual disabilities as being particularly vulnerable. The majority of professionals and police believed that women with intellectual disabilities were deliberately targeted by abusive men. The authors conclude that further training of police, and health and social care professionals is required in this area.

Michelle S Ballan et al, 'Intimate Partner Violence Among Help-Seeking Deaf Women: An Empirical Study' (2017) 23(13) Violence Against Women 1585-1600.

Deaf women experience heightened rates of intimate partner violence compared to hearing women, but there is limited research on the experiences of this community (pp 1586-7). In service provision, the particular communication needs of deaf survivors must be accommodated, through providing consistent access to ASL interpreters, and facilitating access to the victim's preferred interpreter wherever possible (p 1596).

Nemeth, Julianna et al., Provider Perceptions and Domestic Violence (DV) Survivor Experiences of Traumatic and Anoxic-Hypoxic Brain Injury: Implications for DV Advocacy Service Provision, (2019) 28(6) Journal of Aggression, Maltreatment & Trauma 744-63

This study sought to 1) characterise provider knowledge, experience and perception of the impact of brain injury (BI) on the experiences of DV survivors within services, and 2) document DV survivors' experiences with abuse exposures that can lead to traumatic or anoxic-hypoxic brain injury along with their perception of how programs address brain injury (p 747). The authors examined data on BI and strangulation collected from five domestic violence advocacy organisations: 11 focus groups were conducted with service providers and interview administered surveys were completed with survivors. Results show a discrepancy between providers' perception of the potential impact of BI on survivors' ability to access services, and the pervasive exposure to incidents of head trauma and strangulation that could cause brain injury among the population.

Over 81% of survivors reported having been hit in the head or been made to have their head hit another object at least once, and over 83% of survivors reported being strangled.

Shah, Sonali, Lito Tsitsou and Sarah Woodin, 'Hidden Voices: Disabled Women's Experiences of Violence and Support Over the Life Course' (2016) 22(10) Violence Against Women 1189-1210.

Fifteen disabled women were interviewed about their life stories. The UK based study notes that "disabled women are significantly more likely to experience violence compared with their nondisabled contemporaries, at the hands of different perpetrators, including paid and unpaid carers, and in various ways, including those specific to their impairment" (p 1206).

Barriers to support for disabled women include, but are not limited to (p 1193):

- an inability to physically access services;
- an inability to access public materials;
- the lack of accessible alternative accommodation such as refuges;
- social stereotypes that assume that disabled people are asexual, tragic or burdens to society;
- legal professionals' poor understanding of disability and impairment-specific abuse;
- fear of children being taken away by authorities if violence is disclosed; and
- fear of disbelief if violence is disclosed.

Stewart, Lynn A and Jenelle Power, 'Profile and Programming Needs of Federal Offenders with Histories of Intimate Partner Violence' (2014) 29(15) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 2723.

This study presents data on male perpetrators of domestic violence (DV) in the Correctional Service of Canada (CSC) using two samples: (a) a snapshot of all male offenders who had been assessed for DV (n = 15,166) and (b) a cumulative sample of male offenders from 2002-2010 who had been assessed as moderate or high risk for further DV (n = 4,261). DV offenders were compared to a cohort sample of non-DV offenders (n = 4,261). Findings included that DV offenders had higher risk and criminogenic need ratings, and 50% more learning disabilities (18.4%) and mental health problems (15%), and more extensive criminal histories than those without DV histories. Aboriginal DV offenders had high levels of alcohol dependence, suggesting a need for substance abuse treatment as part of DV programming.

The Disabilities Trust, Making the Link: Female Offending and Brain Injury (2018).

This study focuses on brain injury in female offenders – one of the most vulnerable individuals in the criminal justice system. Female prisoners are twice as likely as male prisoners to experience anxiety and depression, incidences of self-harm, and domestic violence and abuse. In addition, a number of female prisoners may suffer undiagnosed brain injuries, which cause cognitive, behavioural and emotional problems, such as loss of memory, concentration, confusion and increased aggression. From 2016-2018, the Disabilities Trust introduced a Brain Injury Linkworker (BIL) service at HMP/YOI Drake Hall (a female prison in the UK) which provided specialist support to women with a history of brain injury. During the delivery of the BIL service, the study also found that there were 196 reports of brain injuries from severe blows to the head. 96% of female offenders reported experiencing domestic abuse, 62% reported to sustaining a traumatic brain injury (TBI) due to domestic violence, and 33% reported to sustaining their first brain injury prior to committing their first offence.

People with disability and impairment - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 5 discusses a range of issues affecting people with disabilities and their experience of court processes.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

In relation to perpetrators, see Chapters 5.1.1 ‘What if a respondent has impaired capacity?’ and 11.1 ‘Explanation of proposed order to the respondent’.

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

Chapter 11 focuses on people with disabilities. It overviews the issues that may be faced by people with disability, and identifies the different types of disabilities and practical considerations. Although the bench book does not provide a specific discussion of the intersection of domestic violence and people with disabilities, it does relevantly suggest a number of key elements a judge may need to consider when a person with a disability goes to court. For example: (p.122).

- such persons may need more time than is common with persons without disability;
- the stress of coming to court may exacerbate their symptoms;
- making any special arrangements in advance will save time and embarrassment at the trial;
- the person with a disability may not be able to hear, read or be understood whilst in court, or to fully comprehend what is taking place; and
- some ailments may make it impossible to attend court at all.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

Section 5.8 - People with disabilities (cognitive, physical or mental health), provides detailed information on disability and domestic violence, including prevalence of family violence against people with disabilities, disability as a risk factor, particular forms of family violence and barriers to reporting it. It also discusses 'court craft' in relation to people with disabilities and contact information for services.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Chapter 4 focuses on people with disabilities. It overviews the issues that may be faced by people with a disability, and identifies the different types of disabilities and practical considerations.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Chapter 21: Mental and Physical Disability comprehensively discusses mental disability, including information on enhanced risks for persons with a disability; prevalence and reporting of domestic violence in disability contexts; forms of domestic violence and court options to enhance assessment of domestic violence in disability cases. It also provides a very detailed section on process issues around domestic violence in a disability context.

People with disability and impairment - Other Resources

Australia

- ANROWS, Personal Safety Survey 2016 Fact Sheet (2017).

International

VAWnet, Understanding the Intersection: TBI and DV (United States) (2019).

VAWnet is an online network, operated by the National Resource Center on Domestic Violence, which focuses on violence against women and other forms of gender-based violence. It is a comprehensive and readily-accessible source of information for anti-violence advocates, human service professionals, educators, and others who wish to eliminate domestic and sexual violence. In particular, various resources (including fact sheets and reports) on the intersection between traumatic brain injury (TBI) and domestic violence are available for download. For example, some resources provide information about brain injury and its possible implications for domestic violence survivors, while others focus on the early detection of TBI among domestic violence survivors. A screening tool for TBI adapted by domestic violence service providers, as well as training materials, are also included. The website also directs readers to resources which highlight the need to consider the possibility of a TBI in safety planning. Fact sheets and handouts aim to provide advice on how to identify existing injuries, where victims of domestic violence who have sustained brain injuries can find appropriate help, and how to prevent future injury.

People with disability and impairment - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Anna

Barbara

Francis

Julia

Lisa

Sally

Sandra

People with disability and impairment - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Gray v Burt [2005] ACTSC 93 (23 September 2005) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Bennett J at [9]-[10]: 'Ms Keys also raises as a matter that the Magistrate should have taken into account and in Ms Keys' view did not; the rights of the respondent. In particular she refers to the Disability Services Act 1991(ACT), which provides for the fact that persons with disabilities have the same basic rights as other members of Australian society and gives particulars of those rights. I would have thought that such a concept did not need an Act to support it and should have been taken into consideration in any event.

'I note that the Magistrate specifically referred to the expressed wishes of the respondent to continue the relationship with the appellant. His Honour specifically referred to her right to have a physical relationship if she so desired. However, his Honour concluded that the risk to the respondent resulting from such a relationship was such that he was unable to be satisfied that the order preventing such a relationship was no longer necessary for her protection. I repeat that there was unchallenged evidence before the Magistrate that it was the physical relationship between the parties that caused the respondent to suffer three separate fractures of her legs'.

R v Grech [1999] NSWCCA 268 (6 September 1999) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Carruthers AJ at [33]-[34]: 'The relationship between a person in authority and an intellectually disabled person can be a sensitive one and involves, to use a well-known phrase of George Bernard Shaw, "fatal propinquity". It is a situation in which strong emotional relationships are quite capable of developing between carer and intellectually disabled person, whether they are of the same gender or not. It is essential, therefore, that persons in authority exercise the utmost care to avoid such situations developing, and immediately there are indications of such a situation arising, the obligation is on the person in authority to remove himself or herself from the relationship or, at the very least, immediately to seek expert counselling.

'Neither of these courses was adopted in the subject case and, intolerably, the relationship developed into one of a continuing and prolonged violation of the provisions of s 66F(2). The applicant knew not only that he was in breach of his position of trust, but that he was in breach of the criminal law, and he was also aware that the complainant had previously been the victim of sexual exploitation and as a consequence a prior carer was serving a lengthy custodial sentence. The fact that the relationship may have developed, as the applicant contends, into a mutual loving relationship could fairly be described as an aggravating feature of the case rather than a mitigating factor'.

At [37]: 'For sentencing purposes the deterrent element necessarily looms very large with regard to s 66F(2) offences. It is the mark of a civilised society that those who are incapable fully of protecting their own interests, should be protected from exploitation by those in whom society vests the responsibility of caring for them. Carers who breach this trust must expect condign punishment. The instant case was one of a gross and prolonged breach of trust deserving of condign punishment'.

DPP v Maxfield* [2015] VSCA 95 (12 May 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

The defendant had stabbed her partner. The Court at [36]-[37]: 'Ms Maxfield's intellectual disability was of particular relevance to the sentencing exercise. As the High Court pointed out in Muldrock, a person who suffers from a mild intellectual disability is unlikely to be a proper vehicle for general deterrence. Moreover, 'the lack of capacity to reason, as an ordinary person might, as to the wrongfulness of the conduct will, in most cases, substantially lessen the offender's moral culpability for the offence. The retributive effect and denunciatory aspect of a sentence that is appropriate to a person of ordinary capacity will often be inappropriate to the situation of a mentally retarded offender and to the needs of the community' (Muldrock v The Queen)'.

Earl v The Queen* [2008] VSCA 162 (25 August 2008) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Nettle JA at [23]: 'Despite the limited nature and extent of the attack, and the injuries which it was shown to have caused, it was serious for the reasons given by the judge. The victim was a person with limited cognitive impairment and to that extent she was vulnerable and in need of care and support. As the applicant's wife, she was entitled to his love and protection and, instead of affording her that, he assaulted her in their home. As such, the offence involved a gross breach of trust in the place where the victim was most entitled to feel safe. General deterrence is of real importance in cases of domestic violence, especially in cases where victims are particularly vulnerable. And because of the applicant's prior convictions, aged as they were, it was apparent that there was a need for some measure of specific deterrence'.

People with mental illness

Research demonstrates clear causal links between the experience of domestic and family violence and the development of mental health conditions in victims [Holden et al 2013].

Understanding [Braaf & Meyering 2013] the potential difficulties, barriers and disadvantages victims suffering from mental illness may face in proceedings in domestic and family violence-related matters may assist judicial officers in assessing and responding to the safety needs of the victim and any children or other people at risk; the treatment and support needs of the victim; and the victim's capacity and willingness to participate in the proceedings and to otherwise assert their legal rights and protections.

For example, there is a reported hesitancy to diagnose women victims as mentally ill due to concerns that the stigma of "being crazy" may be used to rationalise the domestic and family violence they experience, resulting in possible victim blaming and revictimisation [May et al 2003]. Further, a woman medicated or receiving treatment for a mental condition caused or aggravated by violence may be reluctant to exercise her rights to protect herself and her children from further violence for fear that the perpetrator may use her mental illness to seek to deny her child residence or contact [Humphreys & Thiara 2003].

Domestic and family violence may directly affect a victim's mental disposition and cognition, and confer a vulnerability to psychiatric consequences,by engendering feelings of fear, hopelessness and low self-esteem. The most common psychiatric disorders diagnosed in women victims are: depression, dysthymia (a chronic form of depression), post-traumatic stress disorder, bipolar disorder, personality disorder, psychoses, phobias, suicidal ideation, psychoactive drug dependence, anxiety, sleep and eating disorders. The incidence, severity and co-morbidity of these conditions tend to correlate with the type, extent and duration of the violence [VicHealth 2004]. It has been shown, for example, that harassing behaviours and emotional and verbal abuse are significant individual predictors of post-traumatic stress symptoms among women victims [Mechanic et al 2008].

Victims who have experienced abuse as children are particularly vulnerable to the impacts of cumulative trauma and re-victimisation in adulthood and thus are at higher risk of subsequent psychiatric morbidity [Hegarty et al 2004]. This may be particularly prevalent for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people where, across several generations, family members may have recurring experiences of various forms of violence and related trauma that remain unacknowledged or unresolved [Purdie et al 2010]. Pre-existing mental ill health can also influence a victim's vulnerability to abuse as it renders the victim more susceptible to unsafe environments and abusive relationships [Holden et al 2013].

Victims who have been exposed to multiple, recurrent and prolonged forms of abuse may also experience chronic stress, distress and impairment, both psychological and physical, and a diminished capacity to cope with day to day living putting them at risk of secondary stressors such as unemployment, lack of material resources, social isolation, and poverty.

Perpetrators of domestic and family violence may also experience mental illness, which may affect the nature and severity of the violence, how it is experienced by the victim, and the appropriate judicial responses [Cerulli et al 2004]. US research indicates a need for further investigation of the relationship between childhood trauma, emotional regulation impairment and domestic and family violence [Siegel 2013], and the already demonstrated association between general anxiety disorder, panic disorder, social phobia and alcohol and drug misuse and the perpetration of domestic and family violence [Shorey et al 2012].

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016] may have the experience of seeing spirits or hearing ancestral voices, and may therefore be at risk of being misdiagnosed or mislabelled as mentally ill when they are not in fact ill. Fear of misdiagnosis or mislabelling may be a strong barrier to help-seeking for victims and perpetrators in this context [MHFAA, ATSI Mental Health First Aid Guidelines 2008].

People with mental illness - Key Literature

Australia

Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. Violence against women and mental health- Research Synthesis (ANROWS Insights, 04/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

This paper provides a synthesis of evidence on violence against women and mental health, examining the way that mental health intersects with trauma, complex trauma, disability, coercive control, access to justice and parenting. This paper is not intended to be a comprehensive literature review—it focuses on ANROWS research and other research, while also drawing on recent grey literature for further supporting evidence. Some of the key issues identified include:

- For women experiencing violence, mental health problems can overlap with trauma, complex trauma and disability, making simple diagnoses and treatment difficult.
- Mental ill health can be a compounding factor, a barrier, an outcome and a tool used by perpetrators of violence against women.
- Access to justice can be impacted at the intersection of mental health and violence against women, because the criminal justice system is not designed to accommodate trauma.
- The co-occurrence of violence against women and mental health concerns can have parenting impacts, damaging the mother–child relationship and impacting the child's mental health.

Braaf, Rochelle, and Isobelle Barrett Meyering, 'Domestic Violence and Mental Health' (Fast Facts 10, Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2013).

This two-page overview reviews literature on the relationship between mental health, domestic violence and sexual abuse. Referencing relevant studies and reports it identifies key issues including higher rates of: depression, post-traumatic stress disorder, anxiety, alcohol abuse, non- prescription drug use and a tendency towards suicide for those who have experienced domestic violence and sexual assault.

Douglas, Heather, 'Domestic and Family Violence, Mental Health and Well-Being, and Legal Engagement' (2017) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law (online).

This article draws from interviews with a group of diverse women who have engaged with the legal system after experiencing domestic and family violence (DFV). The study sought to investigate how women's experiences of legal processes 'affected their mental health and well-being' (p 1). Almost all the women experienced some type of mental health issue directly attributable to DFV (p 5). Many women engaged preventative measures prior to attending court, including pre-court counselling, contacting mental health practitioners, and taking prescribed medication (p 2). Other women self-medicated and avoided seeking help fearing that proof of mental health concerns may lead to negative court outcomes (p 2). Many women highlighted attending court (pp 5-6), having to face the perpetrator in court (pp 6-8), and giving evidence (pp 8-9) as negatively affecting their mental health (p 10). A number of suggestions are made for improving women's experiences in court, including:

- minimising the frequency with which victims are required to attend court (p 10);
- allowing women to give evidence remotely (p 10);
- minimising contact between the victim and abuser, through ensuring there are safe waiting spaces (p 10), and staggering attendance and departure times of the parties (p 11);
- providing effective training to court personnel regarding the dynamics of DFV (p 11); and
- ensuring cross-examination, and legal proceedings in general, are not misused by the abuser (p 11).

Hegarty, Kelsey, et al, 'Association between Depression and Abuse by Partners of Women Attending General Practice: Descriptive, Cross Sectional Survey' (2004) 328(7440) The BMJ 621.

This article reports on a survey of female patients within a general practice setting in Australia, which sought to investigate the connection between depression and physical, emotional, and sexual abuse of women by partners or former partners. The researchers surveyed1257 female patients of 30 general practitioners in Victoria between August and December 2000. The authors found that 18.0% of women were scored as currently probably depressed and 24% as having experienced some type of abuse in the past 12 months, while 37% had ever experienced some form of abuse while in an adult intimate relationship. Of women who were probably depressed, more were likely to have experienced some form of abuse as a child and also were more likely to have experienced partner abuse.

Holden, Libby, et al, 'Mental Health: Findings from the Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health' (Final Report, Women's Health Australia, May 2013).

This report draws on data from The Australian Longitudinal Study on Women's Health (examining data on about 5,766 Australian women). See pp76-83. Key finding from this examination include:

- 'Women in their 20s and 30s who report Intimate Partner Violence (IPV) experience a subsequent decrease in mental health.
- Women in their 20s and 30s who report IPV experience poorer mental health prior to IPV, suggesting an inter-connected relationship; that is, IPV affects mental health status and likewise mental health affects IPV.
- An analysis of data from women in the mid-aged cohort (born 1946-51) found that after the cessation of IPV, women experience an improvement in mental health. However, even after 12 years, their mental health is significantly poorer than that of women who have never lived with IPV' (at 83).

Loxton, Deborah, Margot Schofield and Rafat Hussain, 'Psychological Health in Midlife Among Women Who Have Ever Lived With a Violent Partner or Spouse' (2006) 21(8) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1092.

This study examines the psychological health correlates of domestic violence in a large random sample of mid-aged Australian women (N = 11,310, age 47 to 52 years). The research investigated the associations between domestic violence and depression, anxiety, and psychological wellbeing, and adjusted for demographic variables (marital status, income management, area). Results indicate increased odds of having experienced domestic violence for those who had: ever experienced a diagnosis of depression, anxiety, or an 'other' psychiatric disorder; recent symptoms of depression and anxiety; used psychoactive medication for depression or anxiety in the 4 weeks prior to the survey; and who reported current depression. Current psychological well-being had an inverse association with a history of domestic violence, that is, as psychological well-being decreased, the odds of having ever experienced domestic violence increased. The results indicate that a history of domestic violence is associated with decreased psychological well-being in mid-aged Australian women.

Ogbo, Felix Akpojene, John Eastwood, Alexandra Hendry, Bin Jalaludin, Kingsley E Agho, Bryanne Barnett and Andrew Page, 'Determinants of Antenatal Depression and Postnatal Depression in Australia' (2018) 18(49) BMC Psychiatry (online).

This article considers the causes of antenatal and postnatal depression in Australia. The results of the study indicate that a history of intimate partner violence, both physical and psychological, is associated with depressive symptoms (p 3). Further, IPV was one of the 'strongest risk factors for antenatal depressive symptoms' (p 5).

Purdie Nola, Pat Dudgeon and Roz Walker, eds. Working together: Aboriginal and Torres Strait islander mental health and Well-being Principles and Practice, 2nd edition (2014, Telethon Kids).

This book includes chapters on a wide range of issues associated with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander mental health. The editors identify that the purpose of the book is to provide an appropriate resource for a range of health professionals who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander health workers, counsellors, and other staff of Indigenous health services. Chapter 1 'Australian Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Mental Health: An Overview' by Robert Parker provides a good summary of relevant issues, see especially from p5-7. See also chapter 10 'Trauma, Transgenerational Transfer and Effects on Community Well-being' by Judy Atkinson et al.

Roberts, Gwenneth, et al, 'How Does Domestic Violence Affect Women's Mental Health?' (1998) 28(1) Women and Health 117.

This study compares the mental health of women who reported domestic violence and those who reported no domestic violence in their lifetime. Women between the ages 16 and 74 years (n = 358), who attended the emergency department of a major public hospital in Australia, were the subjects of this study. The results of the study showed that women who had experienced domestic violence had experienced more ill-effects to their mental health than women who had never experienced violence (including PTSD, phobias, depression, dysthymia, anxiety, somatisation, harmful alcohol consumption and drug dependence.)

VicHealth, The Health Costs of Violence: Measuring the Burden of Disease Caused by Intimate Partner Violence: A Summary of Findings (2004).

This report is focussed on health outcomes associated with intimate partner violence. This paper presents a helpful review of relevant literature about the relationship between poor mental health and the experience of violence. It notes that previous literature has found that (at 20):

- 'Shock, fear and feeling numb are common psychological responses to intimate partner violence. However, the mental health effects persist long after a violent episode.
- Middle-aged women are significantly more likely to experience anxiety and depression.
- The effects of violence can persist for many years. Women who have experienced violence in the past have lower rates of mental health problems than women reporting current intimate partner violence, but significantly higher rates than those who have never experienced this type of violence.
- Women reporting intimate partner violence are more likely to use medication for depression and anxiety.
- Some other psychiatric disorders (namely phobias, somatisation and dissociative disorders) are more common in women reporting intimate partner violence than those not affected.' (references omitted).

Drawing on existing studies this report identifies mental health outcomes associated with intimate partner violence: attempted suicide, self-harming behaviours, depression, anxiety, eating disorders, traumatic and post-traumatic stress symptoms and other psychiatric disorders such as phobias and dissociative and somatisation disorder (involving the physical expression of psychological symptoms) (p21).

International

Agenda Alliance and the VISION Consortium (2023) Underexamined and Underreported: Suicidality and intimate partner violence: Connecting two major public Health Concerns.

Drawing on existing data (2014 Adult Psychiatric Morbidity Survey- based on large household sample of 7,000 adults 16+) This UK based report identifies:

- Suicide and intimate partner violence (IPV) are each recognised as major public health concerns; however, the links between them have been critically under-examined.
- This briefing establishes the relationship between IPV and suicidality (suicidal thoughts and suicide attempts) and self harm, setting out the ways in which women are disproportionately impacted and at greater risk of IP related suicidality.

- Women who have experienced IPV are three times more likely than women who have not experienced IPV to have made a suicide attempt in the past year.
- Women who have experienced sexual IPV are seven times more likely than those who had not experienced sexual IPV to have attempted suicide in the past year.
- Furthermore, intersecting identities and experiences associated with systemic disadvantages, including poverty, disability, and ethnicity, exacerbate risks of both suicidality and IPV

Cerulli, Catherine, Kenneth R Conner and Robert Weisman, 'Bridging Healthcare, Police, and Court Responses to Intimate Partner Violence Perpetrated by Individuals with Severe and Persistent Mental Illness' (2004) 75(2) Psychiatric Quarterly 139.

This US study explores the appropriateness of criminal justice responses to dealing with perpetrators of intimate partner violence (IPV) who suffer from severe and persistent mental illness. It is suggested that a singular legal response may miss the opportunity for detection and assertive treatment of the illness so as to promote safety and reduce the likelihood of violence. It is also suggested that perpetrators in this group may have difficulty comprehending court procedures. This article discusses the potential for a more flexible approach to IPV through interdisciplinary coordination and training of police, judges, attorneys, legal advocates, mental health professionals and substance abuse providers.

Although New York-specific, the section 'Court response to IPV' (from p145) is very relevant, discussing the need to for judges to consider mental health in the context of issuing protection orders, as 'the effectiveness of a protection order may be reduced with mentally ill offenders, particularly those receiving inadequate treatment (due to gaps in the system or noncompliance). Alternative responses to violations of protection orders, including an assessment of comprehension of the order, referrals for psychiatric care for those not in treatment (or enriched care for those that are), and innovations that serve to coordinate and formalize the efforts of psychiatric/social and legal systems should also be considered' (p145).

Cimino, A., Yi, G., Patch, M., et. al., 'The Effect of Intimate Partner Violence and Probable Traumatic Brain Injury on Mental Health Outcomes for Black Women' (2019) Journal of Aggression, Maltreatment

& Trauma (online first).

Severe intimate partner violence (IPV) can result in traumatic brain injury (TBI), cognitive impairment, and mental health disorders, such as depression and PTSD. The purpose of this study is to examine the relationship between IPV, injuries associated with TBI (a loss of consciousness from a blow to the head and/or strangulation), and their effect on mental health disorders among Black women, who experience higher rates of IPV and greater mental health burden than White and Latina women. The study examined data on 95 Black women with a history of abuse, such as IPV, forced sex, and childhood maltreatment. Results showed that approximately one-third of women had probable TBI. 38% were hit on the head, 38% were strangled to unconsciousness, and 25% were strangled and hit on the head. A significant percentage of abused Black women who sustained probable TBI injuries were found to have a greater chance of experiencing comorbid PTSD and depression. These results highlight a need for healthcare professionals to assess women who lost unconsciousness due to IPV for TBI, and allow referrals to IPV interventions and mental health treatment.

Emily Brignone, Anneliese Sorrentino, Christopher Roberts and Melissa Dichter, 'Suicidal ideation and behaviors among women veterans with recent exposure to intimate partner violence' (2018) 55 General Hospital Psychiatry 60-64.

Female veterans are at a disproportionately high risk for suicide and intimate partner violence (IPV) compared to female non-veterans. Suicide rates increased by 32.7% among veterans between 2005 and 2015. There is evidence that female veterans differ from non-veterans in terms of IPV-related experiences. The authors examined the US Veterans Health Administration (VHA) electronic medical records for 8427 female veterans who completed screening for past-year IPV between April 2014 and 2016. Results showed a strong connection between IPV and suicidal ideation, and self-harm behaviours among VHA female veterans.

Farzan-Kashani, Julian and Christopher Murphy, 'Anger Problems Predict Long-Term Criminal Recidivism in Partner Violent Men' (2017) 32(23) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 3541-3555

Anger problems are not only an important correlate of IPV, but may also be an important factor underlying treatment response for IPV perpetrators. Of 132 men receiving treatment services at a community-based DV agency, those with serious anger problems had more charges for general violence offences and more ongoing problems with protection orders than did those with 'normal' anger levels. Further, low anger control and high anger expression predicted general violence recidivism. The results demonstrate that new intervention approaches are necessary for partner violent men with serious anger dysregulation, as a standard cognitive-behavioural treatment program may not suffice.

Humphreys, Cathy, and Ravi Thiara, 'Mental Health and Domestic Violence: "I Call It Symptoms of Abuse"' (2003) 33 British Journal of Social Work 209-226.

A UK research project based in Women's Aid outreach services shows a direct link between women's experiences of domestic violence and heightened rates of depression, trauma symptoms, and self-harm. The study also shows that women's experiences of mental health services were often negative due to some unhelpful practices within the medical model of mental health, including: lack of recognition of trauma or provision of trauma services; a focus on the woman's mental health rather than the actions of the abuser and her experiences of abuse; victim blaming; offering medication rather than counselling support; labelling the woman with mental health problems, and thereby enabling adverse consequences in child contact and child protection.

Laura A Szalacha et al, 'Mental Health, Sexual Identity, and Interpersonal Violence: Findings from the Australian Longitudinal Women's Health Study' (2017) 17(94) BMC Women's Health (online).

This study investigates the linkages between interpersonal violence, mental health, and sexual identity (pp 2-3). The results indicate that:

- Compared to exclusively heterosexual women, mainly heterosexual and bisexual women were significantly more likely to report physical, sexual, and emotional abuse (p 4);
- Mainly heterosexual and lesbian women were more likely to report severe physical abuse (p 4);
- Mainly heterosexual women were more than three times as likely to have been in a violent relationship in the past three years (p 4);
- All sexual minorities were two to three times as likely to have experienced harassment (p 4);
- Bisexual women reported significantly higher levels of depression and scored lower on mental health than did exclusively heterosexual women (pp 6, 7);

- Interpersonal violence strongly predicted poorer mental health for lesbian and bisexual women (p 6);
- Mental health indicators were similar for exclusively heterosexual and sexual minority women who did not report interpersonal violence (pp 6, 7);
- Experiencing multiple types of interpersonal violence was the strongest predictor of stress, anxiety and depression (p 6).

Interpersonal violence is a significant contributor to mental health disparities for women, particularly for those belonging to sexual minorities (pp 7-8).

May, Barbara A, et al, 'Are Abused Women Mentally Ill?'(2003) 41(2) Journal of Psychosocial Nursing & Mental Health Services 21-29.

This study attempted to profile the psychological distress symptoms of community-based abused women who were participating in a larger intervention study and compare them to normative samples using the same measure (Derogatis Brief Symptom Inventory (BSI)) to better understand the effects of intimate partner violence on their mental health. The study sample (N = 50) experienced complex trauma and various psychological manifestations consistent with [cited] literature on victims/survivors of intimate partner violence; contrary to the researchers' implicit assumption, they profiled more like the psychiatric adult female outpatients than the adult female nonpatients.

The authors note that studies have shown a hesitancy to diagnose abused women as mentally ill because the stigma of "being crazy" tends to be used to rationalize their situations, resulting in victim blaming and revictimization. They observe also that these studies may have minimized the likelihood of self-disclosure or help-seeking, and explained health care providers' reluctance to consider this diagnosis.

'In the community of health care providers for abused women, there is a strong need to refrain from "pathologizing" or labeling victims/survivors of abuse as mentally ill. However, the BSI findings in this study do indicate symptomatology in this nonclinical, community-based sample of abused women is very high in all dimensions and in the global indexes, which suggests serious mental distress.

Abused women are fearful of being labeled as "sick" and further stigmatized by the situations for which they actively seek answers…However, mental illness, regardless of origin, must be diagnosed so it can be treated properly…Health care providers then must educate the abused women about possible benefits of diagnosis using a "social contextual advocacy-based model" … However, it is important to remember that for many women in abusive situations a diagnosis of mental illness can work against them in a court case. In particular, when children are involved, this diagnosis may be detrimental, and the women may lose custody of their children because of it.' (pp 25-27)

Mechanic, Mindy, Terri L Weaver and Patricia A Resick, 'Mental Health Consequences of Intimate Partner Abuse: A Multidimensional Assessment of Four Different Forms of Abuse' (2008) 14(6) Violence Against Women 634.

This article explores the independent contributions of physical violence, sexual coercion, psychological abuse, and stalking on symptoms of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression among a sample of 413 severely battered, help-seeking women. The authors test the unique effects of psychological abuse and stalking on mental health outcomes, after controlling for physical violence, injuries, and sexual coercion. The research finds, among other things, that 'harassing behaviours and emotional and verbal abuse both emerged as significant individual predictors in the full model, suggesting their unique contribution to post-traumatic stress symptoms among battered women.'(p649)

Siegel, Judith P, 'An Expanded Approach to Batterer Intervention Programs Incorporating Neuroscience Research' (2013) 14(4) Trauma, Violence and Abuse 295.

This article reviews findings of neurobiological research that have informed the treatment of disorders that are strongly represented among perpetrators of intimate violence, such as addiction, posttraumatic stress disorder, mood, anxiety, and personality disorders. The author argues for an expanded perspective and approach that recognize the relationships among childhood trauma, emotional regulation impairment, and intimate partner violence.

Shorey, Ryan C et al, 'The Prevalence of Mental Health Problems in Men Arrested for Domestic Violence' (2012) 27(8) Journal of Family Violence 741.

This US study examines self-reported psychopathology among men arrested for domestic violence (N = 308). Results replicated past research showing high rates of PTSD and depression. In addition, the prevalence of generalized anxiety disorder, panic disorder, social phobia, and alcohol and drug disorders were very high. All types of mental health problems were positively associated with aggression perpetration. The authors acknowledge the need for further research investigating the mechanisms responsible for this association. (p746)

People with mental illness - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

[5.2.2.6] outlines some psychiatric disabilities (although they are not specifically considered in the context of domestic and family abuse).

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

- Although this bench book does not discuss the relationship between domestic violence and psychiatric disabilities, the section on witnesses with psychiatric disabilities may be relevant where a person appears as a witness (eg. an alleged victim/or perpetrator of domestic violence) before the court.
- Specifically the bench book notes (pp125-126): 'Witnesses with psychiatric disabilities may find the court environment especially stressful. At hearings, it must be recognised that a witness with a psychiatric disability may find it difficult to concentrate and remember. There may also be communication barriers, for example, if the person is easily distracted, distressed, anxious, frightened, manic, delusional or aggressive. Certain adjustments may be necessary for witnesses with psychiatric disabilities. For example:'
    - there may be a need to repeat information;
    - it may be necessary to rephrase questions;
    - there may be a need to provide regular breaks because of short concentration spans;
    - the witness should be afforded adequate familiarisation with the court room;
    - practitioners should provide appropriate amounts of time in their estimates for trial to accommodate necessary adjustments; and
    - particularly vulnerable witnesses may benefit from the application of s 21A of the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.2.6 notes the mental health effects of family violence. 4.1.4 notes that whether a family violence offender suffers from a mental impairment is relevant to determining whether to refuse bail.

WA

Western Australia Department of Justice, Equal Justice Bench Book, Family and Domestic Violence (updated September 2022).

Mental illness is not specifically considered in the context of domestic and family abuse; see especially 'Impacts on women' (13.2.2), which references the VicHealth Study referenced above and lists some of the wide-ranging effects of intimate partner violence on women's mental health.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Chapter 21: Mental and Physical Disability comprehensively discusses mental disability, including information on enhanced risks for persons with a disability; prevalence and reporting of domestic violence in disability contexts; forms of domestic violence and court options to enhance assessment of domestic violence in disability cases. It also provides a very detailed section on process issues around domestic violence in a disability context.

Reference is also made throughout the bench book to mental health, including:

- 'Domestic violence can produce scientifically verifiable mental health reactions, including post-traumatic stress, depression, anxiety and panic disorder, hypervigilance as well as a host of short- and long-term physical medical conditions' (Section 5.2.2);
- In relation to perpetrators and mental illness, Section 7.2.4: Mental illness rationalization discusses mental illness as a risk factor for both the victim's and children's safety. However, it emphasises that mental illness should not be considered a cause of domestic violence, but rather an aggravating factor. It also cautions against the use of neuroscience research in court to explain domestic violence perpetration.

People with mental illness - Other Resources

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity Website.

The Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity is an advisory body formed to assist Australian courts, judicial officers and administrators to positively respond to the diverse needs of the judiciary, including the particular issues that arise in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. This website includes a number of useful resources and links.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Experience of the Courts (2016).

See p6: 'this report is a summary of consultations undertaken by the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity. As such, the views expressed in the document are those of stakeholders who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait women. The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;
- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

At p7: 'Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women had trouble communicating in the language of the justice system, adversely impacting on their ability to deal with police, engage with support services including legal representatives, and communicate with court staff and judicial officers.'

Law Society Northern Territory, Indigenous Protocols for Lawyers (second edition, 2015).

This handbook is written for lawyers and identifies and discusses six protocols to assist lawyers in communicating with their clients. See p5 which sets out the six protocols. The remaining part of the document discusses these protocols in depth.

Protocol 1:	Assess whether an interpreter is needed before proceeding to take instructions.
Protocol 2:	Engage the services of a registered, accredited interpreter through the Aboriginal Interpreter Service.
Protocol 3:	Explain your role to the client.
Protocol 4:	Explain the relevant legal or court process to the client prior to taking instructions.
Protocol 5:	Use 'plain English' to the greatest extent possible.
Protocol 6:	Assess whether your client has a hearing or other impairment that may affect their ability to understand

Mental Health First Aid Australia, Cultural Considerations & Communication Techniques: Guidelines for providing Mental Health First Aid to an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander Person. Melbourne: Mental Health First Aid Australia and beyondblue, the national depression initiative (2008).

These guidelines describe how members of the public should provide first aid to an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander person who may be developing a mental illness or experiencing a mental health crisis. The role of the first aider is to assist the person until appropriate professional help is received or the crisis resolves. These guidelines are designed to accompany the series Guidelines for Providing Mental Health First Aid to an Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander Person. The guidelines are based on the expert opinions of Aboriginal clinicians from across Australia, who have extensive knowledge of, and experience in, mental health.

People with mental illness - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Brenda

Carol

Gillian

Ingrid

Leyla

Susan

People with mental illness - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Bell [2005] ACTSC 123 (1 December 2005) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Higgins CJ at [31]: 'I appreciate that personality disorders may often underlie the criminal behaviour of men who beat women. Alcohol or other substance abuse may sometimes be a triggering factor. Nevertheless, they must take responsibility for their actions and be seen to have done so. The offence is often hidden, so general deterrence is a factor that is quite prominent. So also is specific deterrence. No offender engaging in this kind of behaviour, nor their victims, should feel that it is to be treated lightly. Rather, it must be made the subject of condign punishment. That is not to say, of course, that any mitigatory factors or prospects for rehabilitation will be disregarded'.

R v In [2001] ACTSC 102 (2 November 2001) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Crispin J at [19]: 'The extent of his psychological condition is relevant to the issue of general deterrence but, in my view, the need to protect former spouses or partners from conduct of this nature cannot be so easily dismissed. Many people no doubt experience great stress upon the break-up of their marriages or other close relationships and in some cases they may suffer from symptoms of an underlying psychological illness or even become psychologically ill for the first time. One may and should respond with sympathy. However, when a person commits serious criminal acts against a former spouse or partner the court must take into account the need to deter other people from similar conduct. The risk of serious injury and, as in this case, grave emotional trauma may be at least as serious when the offender is psychologically ill. Accordingly, the need for deterrence should be given due recognition, though the weight which should be given to that factor will vary according to the circumstances of the case, and the actual sentences must be determined by reference to all relevant factors referred to in s 429A of the Crimes Act 1900'.

Pasinis v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 97 (22 May 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Kyrou JA at [54]: 'The effects of family violence are now well documented. They are not confined to physical injury. Victims often feel responsible for the violence and ashamed that they were not able to prevent the perpetrator from offending. As occurred in this case, it is common for victims to deny or conceal that their partners have assaulted them until the violence becomes unbearable. This phenomenon was reflected in the behaviour of D, which is described at [5] and [8] to [10] above. Victims who have been dominated, controlled and beaten by their partners over a significant period experience serious and long-lasting psychological trauma. As in the present case, the physical effects of the violence and its erosion of the victim's confidence can also affect their ability to participate in paid work and have other serious financial effects'.

R v Margolis* [2021] VSC 341 (15 June 2021) – Victorian Supreme Court

As to aggravating factors, Beale J observed:

> [16] The prosecution submitted that there were a number of aggravating circumstances to your offending. First, you kept pursuing Ms Vang, who was much smaller than you, from room to room in your house, even though you realised you were losing control and posed a danger to her. Second, the killing was an instance of domestic violence: you and Ms Vang were living together in an intimate relationship, albeit one of short duration. Third, you killed her, intending to kill her. Fourth, you sent false messages to Ms Vang's sisters and left her body on the floor for an extended time.
>
> [17] The fact that this killing was an instance of domestic violence is certainly a circumstance of aggravation, as is the fact, established by your suicide note, that you actually intended to kill. As for the other matters, I consider that your thought processes were so clouded by your mental health problems (which I discuss below) that it would be inappropriate to treat them as circumstances of aggravation.

As to Verdins principles, Beale J stated:

> [54] Dr Zimmerman found that you have a borderline personality disorder and long-term PTSD. Associate Professor Carroll found that you have a severe personality disorder and long-term PTSD, both conditions commencing in your teens and likely to be permanent.
>
> [55] I accept the findings of Associate Professor Carroll that you have a severe personality disorder and long-term PTSD. Neither diagnosis was disputed by the prosecution. I find that your mental health problems enliven principles 1, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the well-known case of R v Verdins. In other words, your moral culpability is somewhat reduced by your mental health issues, which I find contributed causally to the commission of the offence. Because of your entrenched mental health issues, you are not an appropriate medium for giving full effect to general and specific deterrence. Although it seems you are currently feeling well supported by the prison mental health services, it is also likely that the substantial prison term which I must impose on you will exacerbate your mental health issues and make jail harder for you than for prisoners who do not have such issues.

People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds

The Australian Bureau of Statistics conducted a study of the prevalence of violence in 2016. It shows that women are predominantly the victims of physical and sexual violence and emotional abuse perpetrated by a current or former male partner, however this study did not collect data regarding the ethnicity or origin of the survey participants [ABS PSS 2016].

Women from culturally and linguistically diverse ("CALD") backgrounds may be particularly vulnerable to domestic and family violence. They may have their origins in a range of countries and ethnicities. They may primarily speak a language or multiple languages other than English. They may hold religious or cultural beliefs about gender roles and behaviours, particularly within marriage, that are inconsistent with speaking out about violence perpetrated against them and their children or with seeking legal redress. They may have come from circumstances of war or civil unrest where they have personally experienced violence, rape or sexual assault without redress or any expectation of redress [Zannettino 2013]. These factors, and the range of other cultural, linguistic, economic, and social factors associated with resettlement in a new country, heighten the challenges and barriers for CALD women who experience domestic and family violence, especially when they engage with the legal system to secure the protection of themselves and their children, and to seek legal redress [Allimantet & Ostapiej 2011].

Australian research in recent years reveals the depth and severity of the problems CALD women face. There is no single factor that puts CALD women at a greater risk of both experiencing abuse and being less able to seek redress for it. Rather, a raft of factors may intersect, each compounding the other. Overall, CALD women report similar forms of domestic and family violence to other women. However, the impact of violence is exacerbated by the stressors of the migration experience generally, and the constraints of visa status, which may increase women's dependency on perpetrators for economic security and residency rights. Perpetrators in these circumstances are able to use misinformation about women's visa status and threats of deportation and the removal of children as further means of control. For these reasons, CALD women tend to endure domestic and family violence for prolonged periods before seeking help and, as a consequence, risk negative physical and mental health effects. CALD women are also highly motivated to resolve domestic and family violence without ending relationships and breaking up families, for a range of reasons including immigration concerns and family and community pressures [Vaughan et al 2015].

For example, a woman with only temporary immigration status may not be eligible to work, may have no access to income support, health care or other public benefits, and may be legally, economically and socially dependent on her abusive partner. This forced dependency is likely to intensify if the woman has poor English literacy, is caring for children, is isolated from family and social support networks, or faces threats from her abusive partner that she and her children will be deported if they leave the abusive relationship [Allimant & Anne 2008]. These vulnerabilities are aggravated if the woman also experiences discrimination, disability, physical or mental illness, lack of education and other barriers to her wellbeing.

Whilst the Commonwealth Migration Regulations 1994, in the case of certain visas, exempt a woman from having to stay in an abusive relationship for two years before being eligible to apply for permanent residency, there are complex processes and evidentiary requirements that must be satisfied [Gray et al 2014]. A CALD woman who fears deportation or visa cancellation [JCCD, Path to Justice (CALD) 2016] may also fear engaging with the police or other authorities, and may remain in the abusive relationship rather than suffer the stress and anxiety of seeking legal redress [Taylor & Putt 2007].

In addition to the issues specific to immigration status, CALD women may for cultural or religious reasons [JCCD, Path to Justice (CALD) 2016] be reluctant to seek help for the domestic and family violence. They may feel shame in speaking openly about the violence. They may be unaware of their legal rights and unable to access linguistically appropriate information. They may be unwilling to disclose their circumstances to interpreters and counsellors who may sometimes be inadequately trained. Interpreters for particular dialects may not be available, and in small communities, the woman may know the interpreter and she may fear a lack of privacy and confidentiality. If counselled to leave the abusive relationship, CALD women may feel unable to face the cultural repercussions, which may include being ostracised from their family and community [George & Harris 2014].

The range of compounding factors may substantially delay a CALD woman from seeking help from legal or health services or the police, which may over time increase the risk of serious harm or death to the woman and her children. In the event that a CALD woman does report domestic and family violence, these factors may present as significant obstacles in her engagement with service providers and with police, legal and judicial processes. For example, as a result of experiences in her country of origin she may be mistrustful of authority and may need additional support in engaging openly and constructively with these processes [JCCD, Path to Justice (CALD) 2016]. Furthermore, access to appropriate interpreters at a cost the woman can afford is likely to be critical to her fair treatment and hearing [Cavallaro 2010].

Research indicates that whilst cultural origin is not a predictor of a capacity for violence [Mederos 2004], the perpetration of domestic and family violence in the CALD context should be considered having regard to surrounding circumstances and factors, including: the impact of protracted stays in refugee camps and related experiences of high levels of tension and violence [Pittaway & Eckert 2013]; the effects of isolation, unemployment, trauma, alienation and cultural change; and cultural communities' expectations of conformity with cultural norms and traditional gender roles [Rees & Pease 2006].

People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds - Key Literature

Australia

Allimant, Annabelle, and Stephanie Anne, 'No Room… Homelessness and the Experiences of Women of Non-English Speaking Backgrounds' (Paper presented at 5th National Homelessness Conference, Adelaide, 21st-23rd May 2008).

This paper examines service responses to women from non-English speaking backgrounds (NESB) who have experienced domestic and family violence. NESB women are likely to be accompanied by children and abusers may misinform them that they will be deported without their children if they leave the relationship (see pp5, 8, 9).

Allimant, Annabelle, and Beata Ostapiej-Piatkowski, 'Supporting Women from CALD Backgrounds Who are Victim/Survivors of Sexual Violence: Challenges and Opportunities for Practitioners' (Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Wrap No 9, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2011).

This publication identifies specific personal barriers for women from CALD backgrounds: failure to recognise sexual violence; physical and emotional isolation; cultural barriers such as spiritual beliefs, rituals, traditions and world-views; fears about breaches of confidentiality; residency status; and access to income support. Additionally, it notes systematic barriers for women from CALD backgrounds: language barriers; lack of informed understanding; racism and discrimination. The paper identifies particular issues for those from countries where the laws or culture do not recognise a woman's right of control over her body.

AMES Australia and Department of Social Services (Cth), Violence against women in CALD communities: Understandings and actions to prevent violence against women in CALD communities (AMES Australia and Department of Social Services (Cth), 2016).

This report focuses on preventing violence against women in CALD communities. It summarises the outcomes of a project focusing on the primary prevention of violence against women in CALD communities.

Factors contributing to violence in CALD communities include: unequal and disrespectful relationships between men and women, and rigidly stereotyped gender roles and identities; factors that support the learning of violent behaviour and permit violence to occur with impunity; and factors that intersect or interact with gender inequality to shape particular patterns of violence or increase the risk of violence occurring (e.g. poverty) (p.8). Specific factors relevant to understanding violence against women in CALD communities are summarised in Table 1 (pp.9-10).

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

The most recent large-scale prevalence study in Australia is the 2016 Personal Safety Survey showing that since the age of 15, one in six Australian women reported experiencing physical or sexual violence from a current or former partner, and one in four Australian women reported experiencing emotional abuse by a current or former partner. While age, gender and frequency of experiences were taken into account in this data, no information is sourced on the ethnic identities of participants and no information is provided around the number of participants who were born overseas.

Cavallaro, Lisa, 'I Lived in Fear because I Knew Nothing': Barriers to the Justice System Faced by CALD Women Experiencing Family Violence (InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Victoria Law Foundation, 2010).

This qualitative research identifies that CALD women face barriers in accessing the justice system and in going through the justice and support systems. It suggests that CALD women are less likely to report violence in the first place, and, in cases when they do report, they are often quickly discouraged from progressing further with their complaints and may disengage prematurely from support. Discusses obstacles faced throughout the legal process, including language difficulties, intimidating court processes, prejudicial attitudes and inadequate support from services.

Department of Social Services, Hearing her voice: report from the kitchen table conversations with culturally and linguistically diverse women on violence against women and their children 2015, Commonwealth of Australia (Department of Social Services).

Drawing on 29 ‘kitchen conversations’ with women from 4 different ethnic groups, this report focuses on 11 interrelated issues and themes which were identified as specific to CALD women and communities:

1. Understanding Australia’s laws, rights and cultural norms and new arrivals.
2. Gaining familiarity with and knowledge of support services.
3. Enhancing the availability and accessibility of support services.
4. Resolving immigration status and eligibility for support services and payments.
5. Reducing women’s isolation and promoting community participation.
6. Recognising cultural beliefs and norms about gender and marriage.
7. Building the capacity of community and religious leaders.
8. Raising professional standards in interpreting and translation.
9. Improving police interventions.
10. Engaging and educating CALD men to inspire behaviour change.
11. Recognising the intersectionality of issues for CALD women.

Dimopoulos, Maria, ‘Implementing Legal Empowerment Strategies to Prevent Domestic Violence in New and Emerging Communities’ (Issues Paper 20, Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2010).

This paper identifies issues faced by new migrants, including language issues, economic difficulties, housing barriers, unemployment and cultural difficulties (p5). It emphasises lack of fluency and literacy in English as barriers to accessing justice for recent migrants and notes limited awareness of family and domestic violence laws. With respect to perpetration of domestic violence, see ‘Role of culture/application to Australian law’ (p14-16), which disputes the applicability of a ‘cultural defence’ - and ‘Challenging stereotypes about violence in communities’, specifically in the context of Muslim communities.

Douglas, H. Women, Intimate Partner Violence and the Law (2021; OUP).

This text explores the results of an interview study involving interviews with 65 women who had experienced domestic and family violence over three years. See chapter 3: Most women reported that the most difficult form of abuse they dealt with were forms of non-physical abuse, especially emotional abuse. Many women identified that non-physical abuse deeply impacted on their sense of self and freedom, and that it continued to affect them for years. Other forms of non-physical abuse that were also highlighted by the women included abusive tactics targeting their role as a mother, isolation within the relationship, financial abuse. The women in the study highlighted the particular impacts of non-physical forms of abuse, including isolation, financial abuse and threats about their visas, for women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds especially those women with insecure visa status.

El-Murr, Alissar, Intimate partner violence in Australian refugee communities (CFCA Paper No. 50 – December 2018, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

This paper looks at what is currently known about intimate partner violence in Australian refugee communities, including the forms of IPV most commonly experienced; contributing factors, such as traumatic pre-arrival experience and acculturation stress; and the barriers women from refugee backgounds face in reporting IPV and seeking help.

The paper also looks at what service providers can do to ensure appropriate support is available to this client group. The three services (organisations of importance to refugee communities in Queensland, Western Australia and Victoria) consulted for this paper had developed response strategies to engage and support women from refugee backgrounds, and these provided real-life case studies of promising service practice. The range of responses is underpinned by principles of trauma-informed care.

Fisher, C. et al. (2020). Best practice principles for interventions with domestic and family violence perpetrators from refugee backgrounds (2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

This Western Australian project involved: literature review; in-depth interviews with 20 men and 20 women from refugee backgrounds, including men who had perpetrated and women who had experienced domestic and family violence (countries of birth were Burma, Afghanistan, Sudan, Iraq and Iran); and two focus groups with service providers working in men's behaviour change programs, women's services, women's health, refugee services and domestic and family violence services.

It developed a set of best practice principles for interventions with men from refugee backgrounds who use domestic and family violence.

Flood, Michael, 'Engaging Men From Diverse Backgrounds In Preventing Men's Violence Against Women' (Paper presented at Stand Up! National Conference on Eliminating All Forms of Violence Against CALD Women, Canberra, ACT, 29-30 April 2013).

In this paper, the author explores intersections of gender, difference, and violence against women, focusing on men from diverse backgrounds. Relevantly, the author discusses the ways in which men from different social locations do not benefit from patriarchy equally, and that 'Particular groups of men may be both oppressed and oppressing, e.g. in oppressive relations with women' (p3). He goes on to discusses how 'Experiences of immigration and resettlement shape men's experiences of violence' (p7), and how to engage CaLD men in the prevention of violence (from p8).

George, Amanda, and Bridget Harris, Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria (Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University, 2014).

This report considers domestic and family violence faced by women and children in Victoria living in regional and remote areas, with a specific focus on CALD women. It notes that CALD women face additional barriers and have diverse needs, but often have more limited access to appropriate services, particularly in regional and rural areas' (p 39). The report discusses the various barriers facing CALD women, including limited knowledge of the available services and supports, fear of experiencing cultural insensitivity and racism, fear or insecurity in the presence of police, or lack of awareness of social, legal and financial rights and their immigration status (pp 51-55).

Gray, Lauren, Patricial Easteal and Lorana Bartels 'Immigrant Women and Family Violence: Will the New Exceptions Help or Hinder Victims?' (2014) 39(3) Alternative Law Journal 167.

This article reviews the relationship between domestic violence and immigration law.

Henry, N, Vasil, S, Flynn, A, Kellard, K & Mortreux, C 2021, 'Technology-Facilitated Domestic Violence Against Immigrant and Refugee Women: A Qualitative Study', Journal of interpersonal violence, p. 8862605211001465.

Abstract: Digital technologies are increasingly being used as tools for the perpetration of domestic violence. Little empirical research to date has explored the nature and impacts of technology-facilitated domestic violence (TFDV), and even less attention has been paid to the experiences of immigrant and refugee women. This article examines the nature and impacts of TFDV as experienced by immigrant and refugee women. Drawing on interviews with 29 victim-survivors and 20 stakeholders, we argue that although immigrant and refugee women may experience TFDV in similar ways to non-immigrant and refugee women, they face unique challenges, such as language barriers, cultural bias from support services, lack of financial resources, lack of trust in state institutions, and additional challenges with justice and migration systems. Immigrant and refugee women also face multiple structural layers of oppression and social inequality. Accordingly, we argue that a multifaceted approach is required to address TFDV that includes culturally sensitive and specific law reform, education, and training.

Ibrahim, N. (2022) Experiences of abused Muslim women with the Australian criminal justice system. 37 (3-4) Journal of Interpersonal Violence NP2360-NP2386. doi: 10.1177/0886260520935487

The article provides a literature review of Muslim women's experiences with the Australian justice system (ACJS). It then reports on 10 in-depth interviews conducted by the author with Muslim women who had experienced IPV to identify the barriers for women in contacting the police for help for the violence experienced. The findings of the study indicate that barriers faced by the interviewees are clustered into victim/survivor related, family, community, and systemic related barriers (pNP2376). At an individual level, the reasons why abused Muslim women did not access the CJS were related to fear, lacking self-confidence, language barriers, financial dependence, and lack of knowledge about the CJS which is consistent with previous research (pNP2377). Often abused Muslim women who were isolated as migrants especially if they did not have any extended family in Australia, found it difficult to access the ACJS (pNP2377). At the community level findings indicated that culturally prescribed roles, community pressure, social stigma, fear of negative stereotyping of the community, and uncertainty of faith understandings of IPV deters abused Muslim women from seeking the ACJS for assistance (pNP2378). At the system level issues of distrust, cultural and religious sensitivity and lack of knowledge of rights were relevant (pNP2379).

Mitra-Kahn, Trishima, Carolyn Newbigin and Sophie Hardefeldt, Invisible women, invisible violence: Understanding and improving data on the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault for diverse groups of women: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

This paper establishes the state of knowledge about the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault against women from diverse groups, including women with disabilities. It highlights the way that, for women with disability, access to support services and justice responses can be limited by social and physical environmental barriers, as well as a lack of appropriate educational resources on rights and seeking assistance (pp 26-27). Being disbelieved is a further and fundamental barrier for women with disabilities. Access to justice can be hindered by, for example, women being assessed as legally incapable to give evidence, being unable to access communication aids or interpreters, and having perpetrators of serious crimes against them going unprosecuted (p 27).

Pittaway, Eileen, and Rebecca Eckert, 'Domestic Violence, Refugees and Prior Experiences of Sexual Violence: Factors Affecting Therapeutic and Support Service Provision' in Zannettino, Lana, et al (eds), Improving Responses to Refugees with Backgrounds of Multiple Trauma: Pointers for Practitioners in Domestic and Family Violence, Sexual Assault and Settlement Services (Practice Monograph 1, Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2013).

Discusses the need for support service providers to understand the pre-arrival experiences of refugees, which is characterised by high levels of violence. Notes a need for cultural sensitivity, and knowledge about increased vulnerability of refugee women as a result of past trauma, anxiety, guilt and shame about family and friends left behind (esp. p 11). In relation to perpetration of domestic violence, pp11-12 may be of relevance, noting that while the gendered nature of domestic violence transcends culture, 'For many refugees who come to Australia from protracted refugee situations, their cultural heritage is also complicated by an overlay of 'refugee culture', built up over years in refugee sites in countries of asylum' which protects traditional norms of family and community.

Rees, Susan and Bob Pease, Refugee Settlement, Safety and Wellbeing: Exploring Domestic and Family Violence in Refugee Communities (VicHealth, 2006).

This paper, part of the Violence Against Women Community Attitudes Project, explores a variety of aspects of domestic and family violence in refugee communities. It explores the application of intersectionality to both understanding and responding to men's violence against women from p18, emphasizing that 'Intervention strategies against domestic and family violence in refugee communities need to both ensure that they don't reinforce cultural values that tolerate violence against women and simultaneously be mindful of not undermining cultural differences that can promote wellbeing and enhance settlement' (p3). Pp4-5 summarise the key findings of the report on the interrelation between men and women refugees' settlement experiences and patriarchy, including the effects of isolation, unemployment, trauma and alienation, gender roles and cultural change on domestic and family violence experiences and perpetration.

Segrave, Marie 'Temporary Migration and Family Violence: An analysis of victimisation, vulnerability and support' (Monash University, 2017)

The paper discusses the importance of temporary migration status in the context of family violence. Uncertainty of migration status creates leverage for violence and control, and also impacts victims' access to support and services. The project aimed to comprehensively review family violence cases, managed by InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, that involve women victims-survivors of family violence whose migration status was temporary at the time of their initial contact with the organisation. This report draws on the analysis of 300 client case files from InTouch that were closed over 2015-16. The findings provide the foundation for various interventions and improved responses for this group of women, and points to other critical issues that extend beyond temporary migration, such as the overlap of family violence and forms of coercion and abuse that are akin to Commonwealth slavery and trafficking offences. Further, the report proposes recommendations on how to ensure that migration status does not affect responses to family violence and how to support victims of family violence who seek assistance.

Segrave, M and Pfitzner, N (2020) Family violence and temporary visa holders during COVID-19, Monash University.

Abstract: This study captures the immediate needs, contexts and circumstances of 100 women who held temporary visas and sought the support of in Touch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence due to their experience of family or domestic violence during the first lockdown phase (from the declaration of a State of Emergency across Victoria on 16 March to 31 May 2020).

The report found that the impact of COVID 19 intensified the impact of the exclusion of temporary visa holders experiencing family violence from safety and support mechanisms. The report makes a number of recommendations for reform of migration and protection order legislation and service and support (see pp8-9).

There is also a technical report of the findings of this study: Segrave, Marie; Wickes, Rebecca; Keel, Chloe (2021): Migrant and Refugee Women in Australia: The safety and security study, Technical Report. Monash University. Report. The Technical Report offers a detailed account of the design and survey approach utilised for the 2020 Migrant and Refugee Women's Safety and Security Study, undertaken in partnership by Monash University and Harmony Alliance. This report is designed to sit alongside the findings in the major report, but provided technical details about the survey for future research use.

Taylor, Natalie, and Judy Putt, 'Adult Sexual Violence in Indigenous and Culturally and Linguistically Diverse Communities in Australia' (2007) 345 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

This paper reports on findings from a study investigating sexual violence and people from CALD backgrounds. The paper reports on a focus group of 268 CALD women (pp 2-3): many of the women stated that they believed rape could not occur within marriage since the marriage contract implied consent; sexual violence is not discussed among members of such communities, especially when occurring within marriage; and there were varying levels of awareness about sexual violence being a crime in Australia. Interviewed support workers identified a number of factors which seemed to increase the risks of sexual violence towards CALD women: lack of family ties in Australia, pregnancy and social isolation; lack of permanent residency and fear of deportation if she does not cooperate with her partner; poor police and legal responses to requests for assistance; lack of awareness of rights; sense of obligation to stay; cultural traditions of male dominance; little community knowledge of the rights of victims/survivors of sexual violence; socioeconomic disadvantage due to unemployment, poverty etc. and cultural stereotypes

Tayton, Sarah, et al, 'Groups and Communities at Risk of Domestic and Family Violence: A Review and Evaluation of Domestic and Family Violence Prevention and Early Intervention Services Focusing on At-Risk Groups and Communities' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014).

This report sets out the findings of research into domestic and family violence (DFV) prevention initiatives focused on groups and communities identified as being at greater risk of experiencing DFV and/or having difficulty accessing support services. It finds that CALD women are particularly likely to lack information or be financially marginalised compared to other women (p 24). It notes that the CALD community is significantly diverse, including 'refugees and asylum seekers, newly arrived migrants on temporary or permanent visas, people from well-established communities and international students' (p 26). It identifies that cultural issues and immigration intensify complexities associated with Domestic and Family Violence in the form of compounding factors including: isolation from established family and social support networks; language barriers; a lack of knowledge about legal rights and financial support services; fear of deportation or visa cancellation; high dependence on partners; lack of employment or occupational skills; "traditional" ideas about the role of women; cultural stigma; fear and/or distrust of the police; limited availability of culturally appropriate services (p 27).

Of some relevance to responding to perpetration of domestic and family violence in CALD communities, section 6.3 'CALD Women' (from p50) discusses effective prevention practices in CALD communities generally. While aimed at community-level initiatives, it notes some relevant considerations that may need to be made, such as the need to educate men and communities 'as a whole' (p51), and briefly highlights 'The complexity of dealing with the impact of trauma for both victims and offenders, particularly in relation to refugees: "Perpetrators have also been victims."(Roundtable participant, NSW).' (p52)

Ussher, J. et al. Crossing the line: Lived experience of sexual violence among trans women from Culturally and Linguistically Diverse backgrounds in Australia (2020) Sydney: ANROWS

The key findings of this study are that:

- There are positive implications for trans women's overall health and wellbeing when trans women feel included and accepted;
- Trans women of colour from CALD backgrounds, as well as women who identify as lesbian, bisexual or queer, may experience additional prejudice and discrimination due to the intersection of gender, sexuality, social class, race and religion;

- Support in gender transitioning, through facilitation of access to hormone therapy, reduces the risk of transphobic violence; and
- CALD trans women's experiences of gender-based sexual violence are comparable with those of non-CALD trans women and cisgender women, however trans women also experience transphobic violence.

The study's recommendations are to:

- Conduct further awareness-raising and education for healthcare providers, legislators, police and policymakers, as well as the general public, in relation to transgender experience and gender transitioning;
- Challenge societal attitudes which support, condone or trivialise sexual violence against women, including violence against trans women; and
- Ensure policy and practice documents and clinical guidelines use language that is inclusive of gender and sexuality diversity when discussing sexual violence against women.

Vaughan, Cathy, et al, 'Promoting Community-Led Responses to Violence against Immigrant and Refugee Women in Metropolitan and Regional Australia: The Aspire Project' (State of Knowledge Paper 7, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety Landscapes, October 2015).

This state of knowledge paper examines a broad range of national and international research to present the current knowledge about family violence against immigrant and refugee women. While the paper identifies critical evidence on the topic, it acknowledges that much of the available literature has methodological issues, including incomplete and inconclusive prevalence data; small sample sizes; and conceptualising family violence in ways that are not recognised by immigrant and refugee communities.

The paper finds:

- Overall immigrant and refugee women report similar forms of family violence as women from non-immigrant backgrounds, however there are some differences in the types of violence experienced and the structural contexts where it takes place.

- The constraints produced by immigration policies are of significant concern, where women depend on perpetrators for economic security and residency rights.
- Many immigrant and refugee women are motivated to resolve family violence without ending relationships and breaking up families, for reasons including immigration concerns and family and community pressures.
- There is scant evidence that the increase in criminal justice responses to family violence, such as "mandatory arrest" and "pro-prosecution" approaches, are helpful for immigrant women, and may deter them from seeking assistance in crisis situations.
- In relation to perpetration of domestic violence by men from CALD backgrounds, 'Engaging men and boys (p41) is of most relevance, exploring effective prevention strategies and engagement.

Vaughan, Cathy, et al., Promoting community-led responses to violence against immigrant and refugee women in metropolitan and regional Australia. The ASPIRE Project—Research report (ANROWS, 2016).

This research reports on interviews (n46, n33 in Victoria and n13 in Tasmania) conducted with immigrant and refugee women who had experienced family violence, 46 interviews with a total of 57 key informants (three small group interviews took place) from a range of services, and workshops.

Key findings included:

- Experience of immigration (in particular, visa class), shaped women's experiences of violence (pp 25-32): this included reinforcing dependency on the abuser, or visa restrictions limiting access to employment, social security, housing, health care, child care, and eduction. It also included experiences pre-arrival to Australia, including trauma and violence.
- There were a range of social, religious, and personal values that contributed to normalising violence (for example, the dominance of men), however, participants did not attribute violence to the cultural context, and in some circumstances, family and community members were important avenues of support (pp 32-37).
- Service providers described under-resourcing as limiting capacity to meet the intensive support needs of immigrant and refugee women; this was particularly exacerbated in regional areas (pp 39-40).

- Women reported violence perpetrated by their male partners but also in some cases by extended family. This included physical, sexual, emotional, psychological, and financial abuse, as well as religious abuse, reproductive control, social isolation, and immigration-related violence (pp 46-52).
- Problems with communication with services and in court were commonly reported, including unprofessional and dangerous interpreter behaviour. This was worsened with limited availability of interpreters in regional areas. Interpreters also reported challenges such as vocabulary limitations and taboos, feeling a sense of responsibility for the client's safety, and vicarious trauma (pp 66-70; see also pp 64-71).
- Assistance was most commonly sought at a point of crisis, although many women made multiple attempts to address the perpetrator's behaviour before this point, including disclosures that had led to inadequate responses (pp 55-62).
- While women reported mostly positive experiences with services, there was still reported difficulties in accessing the services, and some women felt pressured to make important life-changing decisions quickly, while negotiating communication barriers, and while holding limited information about their rights and options (pp 72-74).
- Some women had positive experiences with police, but many reported feeling dismissed, disbelieved, blamed, and discriminated against (pp 74-77).

Specifically in relation to court processes, the report found that:

- The most commonly reported positive experience in court was the support provided by a court support worker. Women without court support described feeling isolated and unsafe, not understanding court processes or procedures, and not receiving information about family violence or legal services (p 77).
- Women reported being abused by perpetrators through the family law system, and through cross-applications for protective orders (pp 77-78).

Vidal, Laura, Opportunities to Respond to Forced Marriage within Australia's Domestic and Family Violence Framework, Issues Paper, 2019, Good Shepherd.

Currently in Australia, responses to the practice of forced marriage are heavily embedded within a criminal justice framework. This paper considers whether there are opportunities to prevent and respond to forced marriage within existing and more holistic domestic and family violence laws and policies instead. It discusses the relationship between forced marriage and family violence, the drivers and impacts of forced marriage, the gendered nature of family violence and forced marriage, policy and legislative responses, general trends in legislative responses, existing intervention orders, and the proposed forced marriage protection order scheme. A table noting where forced marriage is recognised within current Commonwealth and state and territory legislation is included as an appendix.

Zannettino, Lana, 'Refugees, Sexual and Domestic Violence and Prior Experiences of Trauma: Introduction and Context' in Zannettino, Lana, et al (eds), Improving Responses to Refugees with Backgrounds of Multiple Trauma: Pointers for Practitioners in Domestic and Family Violence, Sexual Assault and Settlement Services (Practice Monograph 1, Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2013).

This research identifies that within the refugee context, several compounding issues are identified as being relevant in the domestic abuse context, including heightened gender inequality resulting from external pressures that lead to more extreme cultural practices concerning women and girls than in the traditional society; and men's traditional identities and roles being threatened by their experience of trauma and persecution, and time they spend in refugee camps, which they suggest results in an increase in violent behaviour. This can also be exacerbated by symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder and other psychological problems (esp. p 7). Furthermore, in understanding the perpetration and experience of violence by refugees, the authors emphasise the need to understand the intersectionality of gender oppression with other factors such as race, ethnicity, sexuality and class, and that 'This means that strategies for violence prevention need to acknowledge culturally-specific factors in particular communities rather than attributing blame to a particular culture for violence' (p8).

International

Alsinai A, Reygers M, DiMascolo L, Kafka J, Rowhani-Rahbar A, Adhia A, Bowen D, Shanahan S, Dalve K, Ellyson AM. Use of immigration status for coercive control in domestic violence protection orders. Front Sociol. 2023 Apr 28;8:1146102. doi: 10.3389/fsoc.2023.1146102. PMID: 37188152; PMCID: PMC10175620.

Abstract: In the context of domestic violence (DV), immigration-related circumstances can be exploited by an abuser to coerce and manipulate their partner. Using an intersectional structural framework, we examine how social structures overlaid with immigration-specific experiences operate to further enhance opportunities for abuse against immigrant women. We conducted a textual analysis to identify how socially constructed systems interact with a victim-survivor's immigration status to introduce more tools for abusers to engage in coercive control and/or acts of violence in a random sample of petitioners (i.e., victim-survivors) who were granted a Domestic Violence Protection Order (DVPO) in King County, WA (n = 3,579) from 2014-2016 and 2018-2020. We hand-reviewed textual petitioner narratives and identified n = 39 cases that discussed immigration-related circumstances and related acts of violence and coercion. These narratives included threats to contact authorities to interfere with an ongoing immigration process, deportation threats, and threats that would separate families. In many cases, petitioners indicated that immigration-related threats prevented them from leaving the violent partner, seeking help, or reporting the abuse. We also found mention of barriers for victims to receive protection and gain autonomy from further abuse including a lack of familiarity with US protections and laws, and restrictions on authorizations to work. These findings demonstrate that structurally created immigration-specific circumstances provide opportunities for threats and retaliation against victim-survivors by abusers and create barriers to seeking help initially. Policy should respond to anticipate these threats in the immigrant community and engage early responders (e.g., healthcare providers, law enforcement) to support victim-survivors from immigrant communities.

Cimino, A., Yi, G., Patch, M., et. al., 'The Effect of Intimate Partner Violence and Probable Traumatic Brain Injury on Mental Health Outcomes for Black Women' (2019) Journal of Aggression, Maltreatment & Trauma (online first).

Severe intimate partner violence (IPV) can result in traumatic brain injury (TBI), cognitive impairment, and mental health disorders, such as depression and PTSD. The purpose of this study is to examine the relationship between IPV, injuries associated with TBI (a loss of consciousness from a blow to the head and/or strangulation), and their effect on mental health disorders among Black women, who experience higher rates of IPV and greater mental health burden than White and Latina women. The study examined data on 95 Black women with a history of abuse, such as IPV, forced sex, and childhood maltreatment. Results showed that approximately one-third of women had probable TBI. 38% were hit on the head, 38% were strangled to unconsciousness, and 25% were strangled and hit on the head. A significant percentage of abused Black women who sustained probable TBI injuries were found to have a greater chance of experiencing comorbid PTSD and depression. These results highlight a need for healthcare professionals to assess women who lost unconsciousness due to IPV for TBI, and allow referrals to IPV interventions and mental health treatment.

Mederos, Fernando, Accountability and Connection with Abusive Men: A New Child Protection Response to Increasing Family Safety (Family Violence Prevention Fund (US), 2004).

Although directed at child protection workers, 'Chapter 2 highlights some of the racial, cultural and socio-economic factors that will be relevant to working with perpetrators of violence and attempts to deconstruct some of the myths surrounding the nature of violence in non-Caucasian communities.' The chapter notes that, 'In each culture, there are values, traditions and practices that facilitate abusive and coercive relationships, and there are also values, traditions and practices that support and promote functional and respectful relationships' (p11). It also highlights that 'Culturally-based explanations or excuses for violent behavior should not be used as primary indicators of dangerousness or of capacity to change, since cultural origin is not a predictor of capacity for violence' (p11).

Rossiter, KR. et al., 'Domestic Homicide in Immigrant and Refugee Populations: Culturally-Informed Risk and Safety Strategies' (Canadian Domestic Homicide Prevention Initiative, Domestic Homicide Brief 4, February 2018).

The purpose of this Briefing Paper is to highlight risk assessment, risk management, and safety planning for immigrant and refugee populations. The paper provides definitions of key terms, such as 'migrant', 'protected persons' and 'permanent residents'. It also identifies unique risk factors for domestic homicide, using the Immigrant Power and Control Wheel (p6). The authors highlight the importance in recognising that 'domestic violence and homicide among immigrant and refugee populations are not rooted specific in cultures, but in patriarchy' (p 5). The authors identify several factors that contribute to increased risk of domestic violence and homicide among immigrant and refugee populations (p4):

- Acculturation level
- Cultural norms and expectations
- Geographic and social isolation
- Length of residency in host country

- Loss of socioeconomic status
- Loss of culture, family structures and community leaders
- Power imbalances between partners
- Stress associated with migration
- Post-migration strain and stigma
- Strict or changing gender roles
- Traditional patriarchal beliefs
- Unresolved pre-migration trauma
- Victim/survivor immigration status

Barriers to services for immigrant and refugee women are addressed, along with the need for culturally-informed strategies for risk assessment, risk management, and safety planning. Examples of culturally-specific risk assessment tools are provided.

Tabibi, J., Ahmad, S., Baker, L., and Lalonde, D., 'Intimate Partner Violence Against Immigrant and Refugee Women' (Learning Network, Issue 26, Ontario: Centre for Research & Education on Violence Against Women & Children, 2018).

This paper provides a summary of the particular issues associated with intimate partner violence (IPV) against immigrant and refugee women. It examines the types of IPV, considers the risk factors and vulnerabilities concerning IPV, highlights the barriers victims face when seeking safety and accessing services and support, and shares recommendations for successful violence prevention initiatives. Immigrant and refugee women who experience IPV encounter many obstacles to disclosing and reporting abuse, and accessing support services and legal processes. Obstacles include economic exclusion, fear of deportation, discrimination and racism within the service delivery system, lack of coordinated services, geographic, social and cultural isolation, and a lack of culturally and linguistically appropriate services. Recommendations for the support of victims and for implementing meaningful prevention initiatives for immigrant and refugee communities may be found on pages 9-11.

People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 3 discusses a range of issues affecting people from CALD backgrounds and their experience of court processes.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

Although this bench book does not discuss the relationship between having a culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) background and domestic violence, Chapter 2 on 'Ethnic, Religious, Spiritual and Linguistic Diversity' and Chapter 3 'Religions in Queensland' include Queensland population statistics in relation to birth country, language and religion. Additionally, Chapter 6 provides a discussion of effective communication in court proceedings and, most relevantly, Parts II and III provide information about working with interpreters. The bench book notes: 'Ensuring people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds are able to comprehend and be understood in court proceedings is fundamental in achieving justice according to law' (p.41).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.6 discusses how people from CALD backgrounds may experience family violence and issues that may affect their experience of applying for an intervention order.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

The section on 'Culturally and linguistically diverse people' (ch7) includes Western Australian population statistics in relation to birth country, language and religion. It briefly considers cultural norms and differences and considers the use of interpreters in court. See also ‘Points to consider in relation to particular groups of women’ (ch 10.4.4): Some issues particular to women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds may include:

- more limitations on access to independent income;
- unfamiliarity with English and limited access to interpreters, which may reduce access to information and support services; and
- increased levels of social isolation.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Chapter 22: Minority/Immigration Status in domestic violence cases specifically discusses domestic violence in these contexts. See especially Section 22.2.4: Forms of Domestic Violence: Minority & Immigration Status, which provides a comprehensive overview of different types of behaviour that may specifically affect women from these groups. Also see Section 22.2.5: Potential responses to forms of domestic violence associated with minority and immigration status. Issues around language and translation are also raised in this chapter, but this discussion is more directed towards Canadian processes and access to these services. The bench book goes on to provide detailed discussion on immigration status and family law, and issues with residence status.

People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds - Other Resources

Family Court of Australia, Family Violence Best Practice Principles, 4th edition (2016).

The Best Practice Principles are applicable in all cases involving family violence or child abuse (or the risk of either) in proceedings before courts exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act 1975 (Cmth), and provide useful background information for decision makers, legal practitioners and individuals involved in these cases.

[Extract]

In particular, the Principles note that the dynamics of family violence and abuse are informed by the diverse cultural context in which it occurs and by the experience of people from different ethnicities, backgrounds and language groups. It is important to recognise that the concept of 'culture' is not fixed and immutable. Attempting to ascribe certain characteristics to particular cultural groups may lead to erroneous generalisations based on racial or ethnic identification. Making assumptions or generalisations about racial, ethnic or religious groups ignores the intersection between, for example, culture and socio-economic status, age, disability, sexual orientation, place of residence, immigration status and homelessness. Nevertheless, insofar as broad statements can be made about violence and culturally and linguistically diverse communities, research has tended to suggest that cultural values and immigration status increases the complexities normally associated with family violence and abuse.

Women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds are generally less likely to report cases of family violence. The factors that may influence this can include:

- being excluded from their community
- the limited availability of appropriate translator/interpreter services and access to support services
- limited support networks
- reluctance to confide in others
- lack of awareness about the law
- continued abuse from immediate family
- cultural and/or religious shame, and

- religious beliefs about divorce.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, Cultural Diversity Within the Judicial Context: Existing Court Resources (2016).

This paper consolidates the outcomes and findings of a scoping study conducted by Maria Dimopoulos, managing director of MariaD Consultants. The study was commissioned by the Migration Council Australia on behalf of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Migrant and Refugee Women's Experience of the Courts (A report for the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity), (2016).

See the Executive Summary (p6-9) which makes a number of recommendations. It also identifies and discusses key pre-court barriers:

- Lack of knowledge of legal rights;
- Lack of financial independence;
- The importance of integrated support services;
- Poor police responses;
- The impact of pre-arrival experiences and traumatic backgrounds;
- Community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- Uncertainty about immigration status and fear of deportation; and
- The cost of engagement with the legal system.

Identifies communication barriers: Working with interpreters:

- Lack of clarity about who is responsible for engaging an interpreter;
- Failure to assess the need for an interpreter, or incorrectly assessing need;
- The skill of interpreters being engaged;
- Lack of awareness amongst judicial officers and lawyers about how to work with interpreters;
- Engaging interpreters who are inappropriate in the circumstances; and

- Unethical and poor professional conduct by interpreters.

Identifies barriers to full participation in attending court:

- The intimidating process of arriving at court;
- Safety while waiting at court;
- Lack of understanding of court processes;
- Difficulty understanding forms, charges, orders or judgments;
- Courtroom dynamics;
- The impact of attitudes and actions of judicial officers;
- The need for judicial officers to receive cultural competency training;
- Lack of availability of men's behaviour change programs; and
- Abuse of court processes by perpetrators.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity Website.

The Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity is an advisory body formed to assist Australian courts, judicial officers and administrators to positively respond to the diverse needs of the judiciary, including the particular issues that arise in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. This website includes a number of useful resources and links.

Non-inquest findings into the death of Rinabel Tiglao Blackmore, Coroners Court of Queensland (Cairns), 4 April 2019.

The following is a summary of the key facts relating to the domestic violence related death of Ms Blackmore and the key findings of Northern Coroner, Nerida Wilson. There are other matters raised in the Coroner's findings relating to police responses that are not covered in this summary.

Key facts:

Ms Blackmore migrated to Australia from the Philippines in 1991; English was not her first language. After separating from her husband (with whom she had three sons) in 2014, she moved from Brisbane to Middlemount in central Queensland to continue a relationship with Mr Dickson that had commenced prior to the separation from her husband. Ms Blackmore was concerned that her family would not approve of her living with a man she was not married to, so she was secretive about her relationship with Mr Dickson, her living arrangements and whereabouts. Ms Blackmore's reluctance to tell her family about the new relationship was a source of consternation for Mr Dickson and was allegedly the trigger for two separate (although causally connected) episodes of domestic violence in the 48 hours prior to her death.

Ms Blackmore spent the 2014 Christmas period in Brisbane whilst Mr Dickson visited friends in Bundaberg. During their time apart, Mr Dickson exhibited controlling and jealous behaviours. He demanded that Ms Blackmore take photos of the people she was with so that he could satisfy himself that she wasn't cheating on him. Mr Dickson sent messages to Ms Blackmore's male friends from her mobile phone, impersonating her, and asking when they were free to have sex again, in an attempt to 'catch her out' for alleged infidelity.

On 28 December 2014, Ms Blackmore travelled from Brisbane to Bundaberg to meet and stay overnight with Mr Dickson at a local motel. An argument ensued in the motel room, with Mr Dickson asking Ms Blackmore why he was her "dirty little secret", and then pushing and grabbing her on the shoulders. They then both went to the motel's front office where the manager witnessed Mr Dickson and Ms Blackmore in a tug of war over a handbag, Ms Blackmore saying she wanted to break up, and Mr Dickson becoming more agitated as he tried to convince Ms Blackmore to get into the car with him. Ms Blackmore whispered to the manager to call the police. When Mr Dickson went outside to sit in his car, Ms Blackmore told the manager that he (Mr Dickson) had earlier put his hands around her neck, that she was frightened for her life, and that if the manager didn't get the police he (Mr Dickson) would kill her.

The police attended the motel, took statements from the parties, and told Mr Dickson that they would be applying for a protection order on Ms Blackmore's behalf. The police supervised the return of personal effects to Ms Blackmore and the exchange of their respective mobile phones. Ms Blackmore told the police she intended to catch a train to Rockhampton. Mr Dickson then left the motel, as did the police. Not long after however, Mr Dickson returned to the motel and Ms Blackmore told the manager that Mr Dickson had taken $400 from her bag. The manager became concerned for Ms Blackmore's safety and assisted her to be collected by a friend.

The Application for a Protection Order prepared by the police included grounds that it was necessary and desirable to protect the aggrieved due to the respondent's violent nature and history and the aggrieved's level of fear towards the respondent.

Ms Blackmore asked a friend to drive her to Middlemount so she could collect her property and passport from Mr Dickson's unit. They arrived in the early hours of 30 December 2014. Before the friend left Ms Blackmore, they agreed on a code in case Ms Blackmore was in trouble and the police should be called.

Mr Dickson told police that when he arrived at his unit around lunchtime on 30 December 2014, Ms Blackmore was waiting for him so she could retrieve her possessions. He said he and Ms Blackmore had sex on two occasions, they fell asleep, and then argued. He admitted to grabbing Ms Blackmore around the collar bone or shoulder, shaking and squeezing her, resulting in red marks on her shoulders and around her neck. He also admitted to making contact with her lip causing it to bleed. Mr Blackmore claimed that Ms Blackmore was screaming at him to stop, while also crying and saying that she loved him and didn't want to leave him.

Mr Dickson told police that late in the evening of 30 December 2014 he and Ms Blackmore decided to drive to Brisbane in his vehicle. He said initially Ms Blackmore sat in the rear while Mr Dickson drove as she appeared to be searching for something in one of her bags. A later examination of the vehicle revealed that Mr Dickson had taken possession of Ms Blackmore's mobile phone and had put it in the driver's door well. Mr Dickson said Ms Blackmore subsequently climbed over to the front passenger seat, complaining of motion sickness; then another argument ensued involving Mr Dickson screaming verbal abuse at Ms Blackmore. Mr Dickson denied using any physical violence against Ms Blackmore while they were in the vehicle. Mr Dickson told police he was driving the vehicle at around 100km per hour when Ms Blackmore suddenly opened the door and exited the vehicle. Mr Dickson told police he then took steps to locate Ms Blackmore, keep her alive, contact emergency services and assist in her transfer to hospital.

Ms Blackmore's head injuries resulted in her death on 2 January 2015. There were no alcohol or drugs detected in her system.

Mr Dickson pleaded guilty to (the alternative charge of) manslaughter of Ms Blackmore, and served time. See para 135 on pages 15-16 for the Judge's sentencing remarks.

Key findings by the Coroner:

- Ms Blackmore's death occurred at separation and during a period of prolonged violence perpetrated by her intimate partner. She died within 40 hours of her first and only report of domestic violence to police. In the 40 hours preceding her exit from the vehicle, Ms Blackmore had been subjected to several causally connected episodes of verbal abuse and significant physical violence by Mr Dickson.

- Ms Blackmore's actions were a desperate act of self-preservation. The Coroner found that it is more probable than not that Ms Blackmore exited the vehicle to escape the terror of the events unfolding inside whilst in fear for her life.
- Ms Blackmore was all the more vulnerable by virtue of the fact she was a Filipino woman, English was not her first language, and she resided in Middlemount (a remote and isolated location). Her physical isolation was compounded by her isolation from family, including her children. Her support network and resources were extremely limited.

The Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights, Muslim Women and Family Violence: A guide for changing the way we work with Muslim women experiencing family violence. (2011) The Australian Muslim Women's Centre for Human Rights.

This guide was developed primarily for Muslim and non-Muslim professionals and community leaders in the community welfare, government and legal sectors. The guide is structured into three sections. The first section (from p11) looks at Muslim women, their communities and what we know about family violence and Muslim women in Australia. The second section (from p22) explores multiculturalism and issues of practice. The third and final section (from p36) looks at how Islamic texts have been interpreted in relation to the treatment of women, as well as Muslim women's interpretation of Islamic texts. This includes an examination of religious literature that has proven important to Muslim women's work on preventing violence.

People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Angelina

Celina

Ingrid

Leah

Leyla

Mira

Rosa

Sara

Trisha

Yvonne

People from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Ramzi & Moussa [2022] FedCFamC2F 1473 (4 November 2022) – Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Division 2)

Backhouse J observed at [202]:

…There are some specific individual characteristics in this matter that lead me to place less weight on inconsistent versions of events given by the mother. English was not the mother's first language. She was poorly educated. She spoke through an interpreter. I cannot be satisfied she would have understood how domestic and family violence is defined in Australia.

Hossen v Hughes [2014] ACTSC 101 (21 May 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

The appellant was from Bangladesh and slapped his wife in the presence of their daughter. Penfold J at [30]: '[I]t seems clear that [Mr Hossen] was inexperienced in the ways of Australian courts. Furthermore, English was not his first language, and an interpreter had been provided for him. In fact, Mr Hossen seemed to have a reasonably adequate command of English; this is suggested by the transcript, which identifies what Mr Hossen said in English and what he said through the interpreter (although it is not clear whether, before replying in English to his Honour's questions, Mr Hossen had the questions translated by the interpreter). On the other hand, even people who are fluent in English can have difficulties dealing with legal English and its jargon'.

Penfold J quoted from the sentencing magistrate's remarks at [33]: 'Now, I note that the cultural differences may be in play here, but I don't accept them on the base that you've been here for two years, you've acknowledged in your own statement to me today that you understand what you did was wrong, and the – what you did attracts certainly from – as you've heard from the prosecution in this matter, from the Supreme Court of the ACT in the authority referred to me of Elson v Ayton, is that the courts have no tolerance, or very limited tolerance, for people who engage in domestic violence, and certainly in the presence of children'.

R v Saedam [2015] ACTSC 85 (1 April 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [10]: ‘The note [from workers at a women’s refuge where the complainant stayed] showed that considerable care and assistance was readily provided to the complainant by the workers at the refuge, a vital part of the community's response to the serious problem of domestic violence, especially to vulnerable women, such as the complainant, with difficulties in her immigration status, language and cultural challenges’.

At [58]-[60]: ‘Submissions were made that matters relating to immigration may be used to put further pressure on the complainant. Those are relevant and important matters. What those pressures are designed to do was not identified. I can speculate about what they could be, but that is not appropriate for me to do. They need to be specified clearly so that the risks suggested to flow from such intimidation or interference are clear.’

‘The matters to which my attention was drawn were the sponsorship of the complainant, enabling her to remain in Australia, and the current proposal that Mr Saedam sponsor her family to come to Australia. While I cannot discount that, indirectly, Mr Saedam may refuse to continue with his sponsorship of the complainant, she has, as I understand it, some protection with the immigration system as a result of the allegations of domestic violence by her.’

Messiha v Plaucs [2012] WASC 63 (24 February 2012) – Western Australia Supreme Court

Hall J at [33]-[35]: ‘The appellant has sought to rely upon an affidavit of the victim filed on the appeal, which was admitted without objection from the respondent. In that affidavit the appellant's wife states that the imprisonment of the appellant has caused her and her children extreme hardship. In particular, she says that the mortgage on the family home is in arrears and that there is some prospect that the mortgagee bank will sell it. She says that if the appellant is released and obtains work, she hopes that the arrears could be paid. There is, of course, no certainty that he would get work. It must also be noted that the appellant had lost his job before being imprisoned and debts had already accrued at that time. The appellant's wife also says that she has visited the appellant and that he has apologised to her and expressed remorse. She also says that she has health issues and finds it difficult to cope with the children without the appellant's assistance. It should be noted that the appellant and his wife are migrants and that she has no wider family of her own in Australia.

'The weight to be given to the impact of sentences on family members of an offender is usually not great. The consequences of imprisonment are the responsibility of the offender. Offenders cannot expect leniency because their just punishment impacts on others. Furthermore, the wishes of victims of domestic violence for reconciliation has to be seen in context. As McLure P said in State of Western Australia v Cheeseman [2011] WASCA 15: 'The hallmark of domestic or relationship related violence is the readiness of many victims to return to, or remain in, a relationship with the perpetrator of the violence'.

'Thus, whilst I accept that impact on the family may be taken into account in some cases, it is not a matter that should have been given great weight in this case. There is certainly nothing unusual about the impact that would have justified the magistrate lowering the sentence below that which would otherwise be appropriate'.

NAS v QPS* [2017] QDC 173 (21 June 2017) – Queensland District Court

In relation to the appellant's cultural background, Reid DCJ stated (at [6]):

> 'The duty lawyer submitted that the appellant's cultural upbringing perceived acts of domestic violence to be the norm in Papua New Guinea and not something that is unacceptable, as it is in Australia. Indeed, he said that when he was growing up the appellant was often exposed to violence against women as a means to end arguments. He was also often struck by his father. It was submitted that the disagreement between himself and the complainant which ended in him striking her, was not an uncommon response where he was from.

However, Reid DCJ did not place any weight on this submission in sentencing.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women are at greater risk of all forms of violence and related death than other Australian women. In 2014-15: the hospitalisation rates for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women who experienced non-fatal domestic and family violence-related assaults were 32 times the rate for non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander females [JCCD, Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016]. In that year, the hospitalisation rates for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander men who experienced non-fatal domestic and family violence-related assaults were 23 times the rate for non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander males. These hospitalisation rates increased considerably with remoteness [Productivity Commission 2016]. For example, for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women in some remote areas, the rate was 53 times higher than for other women [DPM&C Closing the Gap 2018].

Due to social and cultural influences unique to the lives of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people including gender-specific cultural roles and protocols, and experiences of colonisation, dispossession, assimilation, racism and the Stolen Generations [JCCD, Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016], the broader understanding of domestic and family violence applied in other Australian contexts may not fully reflect the experience of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people [Blagg et al 2015]. An understanding of kinship structures and community histories, particularly in remote communities, may be important where the victim and perpetrator are from different groups and there is a risk of conflict between families or retaliation by the perpetrator's family. Some communities continue to practise traditional Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander laws and these may have strict cultural protocols.

The Wiyi Yani U Thangani First Nations Women's Safety Policy Forum identifies that: 'Research highlights the impacts of colonisation and trauma in an historical sense, as an ongoing intergenerational process, and as perpetuating and causing contemporary issues and cycles of harm. Dispossession of land, separation of families and communities, ongoing marginalisation from racism and discrimination and in particular the forcible removal of children, are historic traumas and continue through current structures. They are deeply linked with the experiences of family violence, serving both as a cause and effect of intergenerational trauma and violent behaviours' [Wiyi Yani U Thangani 2022].

The extended notion of family and kin in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander culture may broaden the scope of relationships affected by or vulnerable to domestic and family violence, which may in turn mean that the abusive behaviours manifest differently in some respects from those in non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander relationships. For example, the abuse may take the form of bullying, shaming, social exclusion, "demand sharing" or "humbugging" (demanding money or food) or "jealousing up" (a person jealous of their partner's associations with others may deliberately provoke a violent response from their partner [Blagg et al 2015]). Particularly in this context, both men and women may engage in aggressive behaviours, and be both perpetrators and victims of domestic and family violence. Perpetration rates for men are seven times that of non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander men; and for women, the rate is ten times that of non-Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women [Grech & Burgess 2011]. For Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women, there is a strong correlation between exposure to violence and their own offending: most who perpetrate domestic and family violence are also victims of physical or sexual violence within their family and kin relationships, as adults, or previously as children [Bartels 2012].

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women may not report or seek help for the domestic and family violence they experience so as to avoid damaging consequences for themselves, their children and family members [Langton et al 2020]. They may fear retribution from the perpetrator or the perpetrator's family; they may fear the child protection agency will remove their children [JCCD, Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016]; they may distrust or fear the police, criminal justice system and mainstream services where they themselves have a record of violence or offending; they may fear the perpetrator will be jailed or that he will die in custody; or they may fear gossiping and shaming by members of the local community [Willis 2011]. Some Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women with children, feeling a duty to keep the family together, may prefer that the violence stops to leaving the perpetrator whom they may continue to feel empathy for and committed to.

A number of other factors may compound the vulnerability of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women to the experiences and impacts of domestic and family violence. They include: geographical remoteness and isolation, overcrowded housing, low incomes, limited access to transport, lack of shelters that cater specifically for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women and children, lack of English literacy and limited availability of interpreters in particular Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander languages [JCCD, Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016], lack of other support services and related delays in response, more ready access to firearms, higher rates of gambling and alcohol consumption, the practical difficulties in compliance with protection orders in small communities, and the intergenerational continuance of violence [Blagg et al 2015]. Recent reports have identified extremely high levels of unmet legal need amongst Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women [JCCD, Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016]. These factors may intersect with the systemic disadvantage, inequality and discrimination, and feelings of shame and hopelessness experienced by some Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women resulting in significant challenges and barriers to those women when seeking support and legal redress for domestic and family violence.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Indigenous Community Safety, 2021.

This report states that 'factors that lead to unsafe situations include long-term social disadvantage and the ongoing impact of past dispossession and forced child-removal policies, which result in intergenerational trauma and breakdowns of traditional parenting, culture and kinship practices.'

Over the period of 2006–07 to 2018–19, there was a 63% increase in the rate of family violence-related assaults for Indigenous Australians (based on age-standardised rates), or an increase from 1,902 to 3,319 hospitalisations (see Figure 2).

Between July 2018 and June 2019, there were 30 homicide victims who were Indigenous. The offender was an intimate partner or other family member for 15 of these victims (54% of the 28 victims whose offender had been identified).

Bartels, Lorana, 'Violent offending by and against indigenous women', (2012) 8(1) Indigenous Law Bulletin 119-122.

This paper considers the issue of Indigenous women and violence—both the violence they perpetrate and the violence they experience. Indigenous women experience violent and sexual victimisation at much higher rates, and more seriously, than non-Indigenous women, and much of this is likely to be in a domestic context. Most Indigenous women who also offend are themselves victims, and the nexus between offending and victimisation must therefore be considered. For example, the authors quote the Australian Institute of Criminology's national homicide monitoring program, which indicates that: Indigenous women are 14 times more likely than non-Indigenous women to commit homicide; Indigenous women accounted for 28 per cent of Indigenous homicide offenders, and in 93% of cases the offender and victim were in a domestic or family relationship; and it is likely in many of these cases the women were responding to violence against themselves.

Blagg, H et al., Understanding the role of law and culture in Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander communities in responding to and preventing family violence (2020) Sydney: ANROWS

The project explored the roles Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Law and Culture play in prevention, intervention and healing in family violence and how they can be supported using a strengths-based approach. It was grounded in an understanding shaped by the impact of colonisation and took place in six communities which retain strong connections to Law and Culture.

It found that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Law and Culture are features of everyday life in many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, although the mainstream legal system and forms of governance undermine their practice. Responses to family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities should move away from the mainstream legal system and be grounded in Law and Culture, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander dispute resolution processes. Healing (including addressing trauma and restoring wellbeing) is fundamental to addressing family violence. Participants recommended interventions that worked at the family, rather than individual, level.

Recommendations include: a greater focus on prevention, healing and diversion from the criminal legal system; involvement of men and women in the design and implementation of local family violence strategies; acknowledging the link between violence and issues that stem from colonisation such as alcohol misuse and intergenerational trauma, rather than focusing solely on gender inequality and male power increases the effectiveness of policy and service responses; and an improved understanding within mainstream systems and services of the nature of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander family obligations and interconnections.

Blagg, Harry, Emma Williams, Eileen Cummings, Vickie Hovane, Michael Torres and Jaren Nangala Woodley, Innovative Models in Addressing Violence Against Indigenous Women: Final Report (ANROWS, 2018).

This comprehensive report responds to the deficiency in knowledge relating to Indigenous women's experiences of violence, and highlights the importance of Indigenous women's voices in informing innovative responses to violence against Indigenous women (p 9). It is recognised that Indigenous culture and knowledge necessitate specially tailored responses to family violence (pp 9, 19). Further, the report highlights the complex context of oppression within which violence against Indigenous women occurs, and the importance of investing in Indigenous women's organisations (pp 53, 56-8).

The report also confronts problematic elements in mainstream approaches to family violence in the context of Indigenous culture (see p 59). Key findings include:

- Many Indigenous victims view mainstream systems as alien and estranging (p 26);
- The law does not distinguish between coercive control and other forms of aggression, particularly fights, which are a prominent form of conflict in Indigenous communities (pp 24, 26);
- The approach to domestic violence as an exceptional form of harm prevents understanding from other sites of Indigenous crisis response, such as suicide, mental health, substance abuse, and intergenerational trauma (pp 26, 34, 58);
- Criminal justice interventions do not adequately reflect layers of violence within Indigenous communities (p 58);
- Indigenous communities seek a greater focus on prevention of the whole spectrum of aggressive behaviours (p 58); and
- Poor housing conditions exacerbate violence and increase vulnerability (p 58).

Finally, the report highlights a number of considerations and strategies for future practice in this area:

- Intervention and prevention in cases of family violence should be underpinned by a focus on social and emotional wellbeing (pp 61-2);
- Courts should adopt innovative practices, such as 'one family/one judge' initiatives, consideration of intergenerational trauma, and appropriately adapted triage processes focussing on comprehensive screening (p 62);
- Locally, there should be a focus on communication between relevant parties, including magistrates, court user groups, and Indigenous community leaders (p 63); and
- To the greatest possible extent, Indigenous leaders should be at the centre of intervention processes (p 63).

Blagg, Harry, Nicole Bluett-Boyd and Emma Williams, Innovative Models in Addressing Violence Against Indigenous Women: State of Knowledge Paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This review outlines current knowledge on responses to violence against Indigenous women in Australia. The review points out that Indigenous women must continually balance reporting violence to the police with the potential consequences for themselves and other family members that may result from approaching the police (p 13).

Further barriers to disclosure for Indigenous women can stem from geographical remoteness, and include for example (p 8):

- Communication difficulties, including telephone access and access to transport;
- lack of Indigenous specific shelters;
- heightened concerns of confidentiality due to the small community size (and limited service providers);
- lack of services;
- the dominance of patriarchal ideologies and colonial mentalities amongst police in rural and remote locations;
- the relative conservatism of rural towns, where family violence may be seen as a “private matter”; and
- the risk of experiencing racism when engaging with services.

The review identified further common themes, such as:

- a reluctance to report because of fear of the police, the perpetrator, or the perpetrator’s kin;
- fear of “payback: by the offender’s family if he is jailed;
- concerns the offender may become “a death in custody”;
- reluctance to become involved with non-Indigenous justice systems, which are seen by many as an instrument of dispossession; and
- fears that children may be removed.

Cunneen, Chris, ‘Alternative and Improved Responses to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland Indigenous Communities’ (Research Report, Department of Communities (QLD), 2010).

The aims of the research were to: determine what data are available about the use of domestic violence orders by Indigenous clients; determine whether domestic violence orders are an adequate and effective legal mechanism to respond to violence against Indigenous clients, particularly in rural and remote areas; and make recommendations. The evaluation utilised a combination of legal research, qualitative interviews and quantitative analysis. This report provides a comprehensive overview of specific issues facing Indigenous women in the context of domestic violence, and identifies a variety of barriers for Indigenous women to reporting violence and accessing protection including family and kinship issues, removal of children, and lack of community support and services (p97-110). Particular issues with access to services include lack of cultural sensitivity, failure to provide appropriate and accurate advice, lack of access to ATSI legal services, and lack of appropriate services for remote communities (p25-26). The author concludes that it is possible to identify and summarise the major issues (arising from the literature) as knowledge and decision making; cultural issues; community issues; police, legal system and associated services; geographic isolation; concerns about consequences and outcomes, and broader contextual issues of colonisation, dispossession and Indigenous law' (see p26-32).

In relation to perpetration of domestic and family violence, section 3.2.1 'Protection orders and Indigenous respondents' (from p60) is relevant. Table 3.7 on p70 shows that 'Differences in police responses to Indigenous offenders are statistically significant, with Indigenous offenders more likely to be processed by way of arrest than non-Indigenous offenders. Conversely, Indigenous offenders are less likely to be given a notice to appear in court or not proceeded against'. Chapter Five 'Court Responses' (from p83) is also especially relevant for Indigenous offenders.

Day, Andrew, Robin Jones, Martin Nakata and Dennis McDermott, 'Indigenous Family Violence: An Attempt to Understand the Problems and Inform Appropriate and Effective Responses to Criminal Justice System Intervention' (2012) 19(1) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 104-117.

Abstract: 'Whilst high levels of concern about the prevalence of family violence within Indigenous communities have long been expressed, progress in the development of evidence-based intervention programs for known perpetrators has been slow. This review of the literature aims to provide a resource for practitioners who work in this area, and a framework from within which culturally specific violence prevention programs can be developed and delivered. It is suggested that effective responses to Indigenous family violence need to be informed by culturally informed models of violence, and that significant work is needed to develop interventions that successfully manage the risk of perpetrators of family violence committing further offences.'

- This article provides an overview/summary of the main issues, including discussion of 'Patterns and Trends in Indigenous Violence', 'Frameworks for Understanding Indigenous Violence' and 'Connections between Intergenerational Trauma, Anger, and Indigenous Men's Violence' (e.g. inherited grief and trauma, dispossession, economic exclusion, loss of traditional Aboriginal roles and statuses etc), before analysing 'Implications for practice'.

Department of Prime Minister and Cabinet, Closing the Gap: Prime Minister's Report 2018.

In Chapter 7, the report looks at building safety in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. It notes that, 'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are significantly more likely than the wider community to be hospitalised as a consequence of family violence. In 2014-15, the hospitalisation rate for family violence-related assaults for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander females was 32 times the rate for non-Indigenous females, and for Indigenous males the rate was 23 times the rate for non-Indigenous males (Steering Committee for the Review of Government Service Provision 2016b, p. 4.98)' (p 120).

Grech, Katrina and Melissa Burgess, 'Trends and Patterns in Domestic Violence Assaults: 2001 to 2010' (2011) 61 Crimes and Justice Statistics 1.

Descriptive analyses were conducted on all incidents of domestic assault recorded by NSW Police between 2001 and 2010. Factors associated with reporting of offences to police were examined using the Australian Bureau of Statistics, Crime Victimisation Survey 2008-2009. Results included: The overrepresentation of Indigenous Australians as both victims and offenders of domestic assault has not changed over the last decade. Less than half of all respondents who had been the victim of a domestic assault in the previous 12 months reported the incident to the police. Older victims, those who were married and victims of assaults that did not involve weapons or serious injury were less likely to report to police. Conclusions: While the incidence of domestic assault has been stable across the last 10 years, it continues to be problematic at certain times, in certain places and particularly in some Indigenous communities.

'When considering perpetrators of domestic assault, both Indigenous males and females have offending rates higher than non-Indigenous persons. Indigenous male offending is more than seven times higher than non-Indigenous male offending (2,760 per 100,000 population compared to 365 per 100, 000). Indigenous females are recorded as perpetrators of domestic assault at 10 times the rate of non-Indigenous women (753 and 73 per 100,000 for Indigenous and non-Indigenous women, respectively; Figure 13).' (p8)

Langton, M., et al (2020) Improving family violence legal and support services for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander* women. Research Report, ANROWS.

Working collaboratively with elders, this report identifies priorities for reducing and preventing violence against, and improving services for, Aboriginal women in the Victorian and New South Wales towns of Mildura, Albury and Wodonga. A total of 97 participants, including Aboriginal victims and service providers, took part in this study across both field sites. We conducted 27 individual interviews and held 22 focus groups (with a total of 70 participants). There were 31 participants in Mildura, 61 in Albury–Wodonga and five in other locations.

The participants highlighted that there was reluctance to report family violence to authorities (eg police etc) because of:

- the real and immediate threat of homelessness, as there was often a financial reliance on their violent partner to provide financial support to the household, and the fear of isolation from family and community; and
- a dominant fear of losing their children. (p15)

For many women, fear of a lack of privacy in Aboriginal organisations was a barrier to accessing their services. (p16)

Meyer S, Stambe R-M. Mothering in the Context of Violence: Indigenous and Non-Indigenous Mothers' Experiences in Regional Settings in Australia. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. (2022) 37 (9-10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence NP7958–NP7983, doi.org/10.1177/0886260520975818.

Abstract: Domestic and family violence (DFV) disproportionately affects women and children in Australia and globally. On average, one in three women experiences DFV during adulthood and the majority of these women identify as mothers. The prevalence of DFV is higher for Indigenous women and their experiences disproportionately range at the more severe end of physical abuse. For women affected by DFV, mothering during and post this type of victimization is complicated by strategic entrapment, undermining of the mother–child relationship, and threats of harm directed at children and mothers. While a substantial body of literature has examined the experiences of mothers affected by DFV more broadly, research on the experiences of Indigenous mothers affected by DFV remains scarce. Research evidence is further limited when trying to understand the specific constraints experienced by mothers affected by DFV in regional settings. This article examines the experiences of Indigenous and non-Indigenous mothers affected by DFV in regional Queensland, Australia. Data derived from 17 qualitative face-to-face interviews are used to explore the lived experiences of these mothers. Findings identify the immediate and long-term effects of DFV on mothers and children, including similarities and differences in women's experiences of mothering in the context of DFV, experiences of entrapment in an abusive relationship, experiences of post-separation abuse, strategies used to mitigate its impact on children, and surviving as a female-headed single-parent household in regional settings. While mothers in this study shared a number of similar experiences, regionality, the risk of cultural disconnectedness, and socio-structural marginalization disproportionately affected Indigenous mothers in this study. Findings raise key implications for supporting mothers and children's safety and recovery, access to safe and sustainable housing in regional towns, and the empowerment of Indigenous women to overcome the lasting effects of colonization and disproportionate experiences of disadvantage.

Mitra-Kahn, Trishima, Carolyn Newbigin and Sophie Hardefeldt, Invisible women, invisible violence: Understanding and improving data on the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault for diverse groups of women: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

This paper reviews the literature about the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault against women from diverse groups, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women (pp 19-21). It highlights intersections of disadvantage and marginalisation and stresses that these intersections are not adequately captured by existing survey instruments in Australia. It emphasises the importance of understanding family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities within the context of colonisation and continued cultural dispossession, discrimination, and oppression. Intergenerational trauma is also key to this understanding. Research suggests that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women experience some types of violence more frequently than non-Indigenous women, including bi-directional violence, negative behaviours between extended family members, and lateral violence.

Putt, Judy, Robyn Holder and Cath O'Leary, Advocacy for safety and empowerment: Good practice and innovative approaches with Aboriginal women experiencing family and domestic violence in remote and regional Australia—Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This project aimed to address a lack of evidence on the way in which specialist domestic and family violence (DFV) services work with and for Aboriginal women as clients/survivors, workers, board and community members.

A key finding is the identification by women (and mainly Aboriginal women) of what they value from services and as outcomes of contact at times of crisis (p 4):

- Active and careful listening;
- Clear and non-judgemental communication;
- Immediate and practical help; and
- Assertive advocacy on behalf of women with other organisations and people in the community.

A number of practice guides including for advocacy, safety planning, and measuring outcomes are available at the project link above.

Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, (commenced 2022) Missing and murdered First Nations women and children. Parliament of Australia (Webpage).

This inquiry is tasked to examine issues associated with missing and murdered First Nations women and children, with particular reference to:

- the number of First Nations women and children who are missing and murdered;
- the current and historical practices, including resources, to investigating the deaths and missing person reports of First Nations women and children in each jurisdiction compared to non-First Nations women and children;
- the institutional legislation, policies and practices implemented in response to all forms of violence experienced by First Nations women and children;
- the systemic causes of all forms of violence, including sexual violence, against First Nations women and children, including underlying social, economic, cultural, institutional and historical causes contributing to the ongoing violence and particular vulnerabilities of First Nations women and children;
- the policies, practices and support services that have been effective in reducing violence and increasing safety of First Nations women and children, including self-determined strategies and initiatives;

- the identification of concrete and effective actions that can be taken to remove systemic causes of violence and to increase the safety of First Nations women and children;
- the ways in which missing and murdered First Nations women and children and their families can be honoured and commemorated; and
- any other related matters.

The website includes submissions, details of hearings and other documents including statistics requested by the Committee.

Soldatic, K. et al., (2023). Indigenous LGBTIQSB+ People's Experience of Family violence in Australia. Journal of Family Violence, online first, https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-023-00539-1

Based on 16 interviews with Indigenous LGBTIQSB + people in the state of New South Wales, Australia. This article explores the social and emotional wellbeing of Indigenous LGBTIQSB + young people living in New South Wales. The findings 'demonstrate the intersectional nature of family violence highlighting the fact that Indigenous LGBTIQSB+ young people are integral parts of extended kinship networks, families and communities and are deeply impacted by any acts of family violence.'

Note LGBTIQSB+ : Lesbian, gay, Bisexual, trans, Intersex, Queer, Sistergirl, Brotherboy, Plus.

The article concludes:

Participants' stories spoke of family and community violence that focused on intimidation, bullying and threats of violence. These kinds of behaviours were at times aimed at making the young person feel uncomfortable, to feel unwanted, invisible, excluded and even to force them to change their 'lifestyles' or at least shape their behaviours so that their gender and sexuality diversity were kept hidden. Even though participants spoke about how they successfully negotiated these events, LGBTIQ + phobic and racist behaviours also caused feelings of isolation, distress, a feeling of invisibility, lack of worth and exclusion.

LGBTIQSB + young people reported significant amounts of violence from communities, some related to their gen- der and sexuality diversity and other behaviours related to perceptions about their Indigeneity. LGBTIQSB+-phobia in Indigenous families and communities was reported more within extended families, older generations and rural or remote communities. Negative interactions and attitudes from Indigenous families and communities are significant given the importance of culture, family, and community for Indigenous people. These are still central to young Indigenous LGBTIQSB + lives with participants speaking about the heart break of not being able to go home to Country to visit grandparents and Elders in rural and remote communities. (p11).

Steering Committee for the Review of Government Service Provision, Overcoming Indigenous Disadvantage Key Indicators 2016 – Report (Productivity Commission, 2016).

In 4.12, 'Family and community violence,' the Productivity Commission looks at the impact of family violence on the health and welfare of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. Some of the key statistics provided are:

- In 2014-15, around one in five (21.8 per cent) Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander adults reported experiencing physical or threatened violence, similar to 2002 and 2008. After adjusting for differences in population age structures, this was 2.5 times the rate for non-Indigenous Australians;
- In 2014-15, hospitalisation rates for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander family violence-related assaults were 530 females per 100 000 female population and 191 males per 100 000 male population. After adjusting for differences in population age structures, this was 32 times the rate for non-Indigenous females and 23 times the rate for non-Indigenous males (p.4.98)
- Hospitalisations for assaults increased with remoteness — from 156.5 per 100 000 population in major cities to 1044.4 per 100 000 population in remote areas for non-fatal family violence-related assaults and 390.8 per 100 000 population in major cities to 2013.6 per 100 000 population in remote areas for total assaults (tables 4A.12.15 and 4A.12.23). Data on non-fatal hospitalisations for assaults by jurisdiction, sex and relationship of victim to offender, and by remoteness are in tables 4A.12.16–24.

The report notes that a multitude of interrelated factors that contribute to the occurrence of family and community violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander populations, including: the trauma attributable to colonisation and dispossession; the breakdown of traditional culture and kinship practices; the removal of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children from their families; experiences of violence, including childhood experience of violence and abuse; low education and income levels and high unemployment levels, welfare dependency; poor and overcrowded housing conditions; poor physical and mental health; and high levels of alcohol misuse and illicit drug use (p.4.100).

Webster, Kim, A preventable burden: Measuring and addressing the prevalence and health impacts of intimate partner violence in Australian women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2016).

An estimated three in five Indigenous women have experienced physical or sexual violence by an intimate partner since the age of 15 (p 4). Page four of this short resource explains that intimate partner violence contributes an estimated 10.9% to the burden of disease for Indigenous women aged 18-44 years, which is more than any other risk factor (including alcohol use, overweight/obesity, or tobacco use). Close to two-thirds (63.7%) of the burden of homicide and violence among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women is due to intimate partner violence.

Wendt, Sarah, Donna Chung, Alison Elder, Antonia Hendrick and Angela Hartwig, Seeking help for domestic and family violence: Exploring regional, rural, and remote women's coping experiences – Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This resource is a short summary of a qualitative study examined the experiences of women seeking help for domestic and family violence who live in regional, rural, and remote areas in Australia. The research drew on interviews with 23 women and interviews / focus groups involving 37 managers and practitioners (see Seeking help for domestic violence: Exploring rural women's coping experiences: Final report for the full report). Many of the key findings relate to the experience of Aboriginal women, for example, Aboriginal women's dignity and pride being associated with being able to keep their children safe and rely on families (p 3);Aboriginal women using temporary stays at refuges as a way of staying safe (p 3); and social isolation as a result from fleeing partners for safety reasons, causing Aboriginal women to be away from their family and homes (p 7).

Willis, Matthew, 'Non-Disclosure of Violence in Australian Indigenous Communities' (2011) 405 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

This article reviews the literature to consider the factors specific to Indigenous Australians that influence individual decisions to disclose violence. The paper suggests that some people may fear negative consequences from reporting: escalation, breach of confidence, reprisals (both from the perpetrator and in the wider Indigenous community, and stigmatisation/ostracism from community), and distrust of police and the justice and government systems. Shame and lack of awareness of services are also identified as factors. In particular the author notes the reluctance to disclose in 'small, interconnected and isolated communities where anonymity cannot be maintained' (p4).

Wilson, Mandy, et al, 'Violence in the Lives of Incarcerated Aboriginal Mothers in Western Australia' [2017] January-March SAGE Open 1.

'Drawing on in-depth interviews with incarcerated Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander mothers in Western Australia, we report on the women's use of violence in their relationships with others. Results reinforce that Aboriginal women are overwhelmingly victims of violence; however, many women report also using violence, primarily as a strategy to deal with their own high levels of victimization. The "normalization" of violence in their lives and communities places them at high risk of arrest and incarceration. This is compounded by a widespread distrust of the criminal justice system and associated agencies, and a lack of options for community support' (p.1).

Wiyi Yani U Thangani (Women's Voices) First Nations Women's Safety Policy Forum Outcomes Report (2022) Australian Human Rights Commission.

The Wiyi Yani U Thangani First Nations Women's Safety Policy Forum (the Forum) was held virtually on 12 September 2022. It brought over 150 participants together including First Nations community members, practitioners, researchers, specialist experts and government participants to consider how to address the root causes and drivers of violence, as the government prepares to deliver on its commitment to develop a standalone National Plan to End Violence against First Nations Women and Children.

The report recognizes a number of intersecting factors that increase Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women's vulnerability to violence. For example there is evidence that 70-90% of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women in prison have experienced violence, almost 90% of Aboriginal children in out of home care are there because of family violence and First Nations children are imprisoned at 26 times the rate of non-Aboriginal children (p.13). 49% of Indigenous Australians are employed (cf 75% of other Australian) and 30% of First Nations womn care for someone in need (p14).

This project has developed 'ways of working' with First Nations people which include: co-design and collaborate; strength-based approach, deep listening, a commitment to self-awareness and reflection, rebalance power, be intersectional, think in context and relationships, be informed by women's law and culture, be visionary and sustainable and take a healing informed approach. (p19-20).

How violence should be understood:

Research highlights the impacts of colonisation and trauma in a historical sense, as an ongoing intergenerational process, and as perpetuating and causing contemporary issues and cycles of harm. Dispossession of land, separation of families and communities, ongoing marginalisation from racism and discrimination and in particular the forcible removal of children, are historic traumas and continue through current structures. They are deeply linked with the experiences of family violence, serving both as a cause and effect of intergenerational trauma and violent behaviours. (p26)

Policing and the criminal justice system are part of the problem in First Nations family violence matters. Specifically, family violence can be perpetuated by poor and discriminatory system responses to First Nations people experiencing family violence, for example by police, child protection agencies and mainstream services. (p30)

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 2 discusses a range of issues affecting Aboriginal people and their experience of court processes.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

- Chapter 7 provides demographic information about Indigenous people in Queensland. Chapter 8 considers culture and kinship. Chapter 9, Indigenous language and communication, provides helpful information in relation to interpreters and giving evidence. See also Chapter 10, Indigenous people and the criminal justice system.
- Most relevantly for this bench book, Part III of Chapter 10 looks at particular difficulties for Aboriginal women including Aboriginal women as victims of violence. It notes: 'There is a high incidence of domestic and family violence against Aboriginal women, particularly in remote communities. Common effects of long-term violence include low self-esteem and feelings of fear and shame. For Aboriginal women, these effects are compounded by other cultural factors, such as the nature of women's business, community pressure, and mistrust of police and the criminal justice system' (p.109).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

The section 5.7 – Indigenous People 'discusses indigenous people's experiences of family violence, the prevalence of family violence within indigenous communities, and some of the barriers to indigenous people reporting family violence and accessing support services'. It provides information on the legislative context around Indigenous people and domestic violence; the prevalence of, and factors contributing to, family violence in Indigenous communities; barriers to reporting and accessing services; and information on assistance and services.

WA

Fryer-Smith, Stephanie, Aboriginal Bench Book for Western Australian Courts (Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration, 2nd ed, 2008).

This bench book provides demographic information about Aboriginal people in Western Australia. It provides information about local customs, traditions and language. In particular see Section 8.4.1 domestic violence as an aggravating feature of sentencing; and Section 7.5 Evidence which includes information about vulnerable witnesses, female witnesses and gender-restricted evidence.

In relation to perpetrators, Chapters Six and Seven provide comprehensive information on specific considerations that may need to be taken into account for Aboriginal people in Western Australian courts.

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

See chapter 11 Aboriginal people for information on demographic and other helpful information. See also: 10.4.4 Points to consider in relation to particular groups of women:

There are several issues that particularly affect Aboriginal women:

- Be sensitive towards issues of sexuality. It may be a taboo subject and may connote “shame”.
- Some women may hide physical injuries due to feelings of shame.
- There may be community repercussions from the legal process for the woman, her family and children.
- Be aware that leaving a violent relationship is especially problematic for Aboriginal women as they also may fear reprisal from extended family members.
- Do not make the assumption that all Aboriginal people will necessarily want access to Aboriginal services.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Chapter 20 discusses Indigenous peoples and domestic violence in the Canadian context, though there are some parallels in terms of historic systemic oppression and dispossession. The bench book highlights that a one size fits all approach is not sufficient, and that historical 'harm to culture … has created social conditions conducive to high levels of domestic violence in some Indigenous communities'. See particularly Sections 20.3.1 and 20.3.2, which highlight that Indigenous victims of domestic violence are often wary of turning to authorities, and outline cultural barriers to disclosure. See also Section 20.7 which provides guidance for assessing domestic violence in an Indigenous context.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Other Resources

[Former] Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Reconciliation Action Plan 2019 – 2021.

"This RAP provides a platform to introduce practical measures to promote reconciliation, and addresses some of the barriers faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. It also prioritises establishing relationships with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and community leaders, agencies servicing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, legal services and other stakeholders, in order to assist Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples to access the Court."

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity Website.

The Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity is an advisory body formed to assist Australian courts, judicial officers and administrators to positively respond to the diverse needs of the judiciary, including the particular issues that arise in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. This website includes a number of useful resources and links.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Experience of the Courts (2016).

See p6: 'this report is a summary of consultations undertaken by the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity. As such, the views expressed in the document are those of stakeholders who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait women. The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;
- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;

- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Indigenous women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

At p7: 'Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women had trouble communicating in the language of the justice system, adversely impacting on their ability to deal with police, engage with support services including legal representatives, and communicate with court staff and judicial officers.'

Law Society Northern Territory, Indigenous Protocols for Lawyers (second edition, 2015).

This handbook is written for lawyers and identifies and discusses six protocols to assist lawyers in communicating with their clients. See p5 which sets out the six protocols. The remaining part of the document discusses these protocols in depth.

Protocol 1:	Assess whether an interpreter is needed before proceeding to take instructions.
Protocol 2:	Engage the services of a registered, accredited interpreter through the Aboriginal Interpreter Service.
Protocol 3:	Explain your role to the client.
Protocol 4:	Explain the relevant legal or court process to the client prior to taking instructions.
Protocol 5:	Use 'plain English' to the greatest extent possible.
Protocol 6:	Assess whether your client has a hearing or other impairment that may affect their ability to understand

James Cook University, website, Indigenous Legal Needs Project, 2015.

This website was produced as part of an Australian Research Council funded research project that aims to identify and analyse the legal needs of Indigenous communities in non-criminal legal areas such as discrimination, consumer matters, credit and debt, child protection, education, employment, health, housing and wills and estates. The website includes reports and papers, bibliographies on relevant topics, useful videos and some legal resources.

Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, Missing and murdered First Nations women and children Parliament of Australia (commenced 2022).

This inquiry is tasked to examine issues associated with missing and murdered First Nations women and children, with particular reference to:

1. the number of First Nations women and children who are missing and murdered;
2. the current and historical practices, including resources, to investigating the deaths and missing person reports of First Nations women and children in each jurisdiction compared to non-First Nations women and children;
3. the institutional legislation, policies and practices implemented in response to all forms of violence experienced by First Nations women and children;
4. the systemic causes of all forms of violence, including sexual violence, against First Nations women and children, including underlying social, economic, cultural, institutional and historical causes contributing to the ongoing violence and particular vulnerabilities of First Nations women and children;
5. the policies, practices and support services that have been effective in reducing violence and increasing safety of First Nations women and children, including self-determined strategies and initiatives;
6. the identification of concrete and effective actions that can be taken to remove systemic causes of violence and to increase the safety of First Nations women and children;
7. the ways in which missing and murdered First Nations women and children and their families can be honoured and commemorated; and
8. any other related matters.

The website includes submissions, details of hearings and other documents including statistics requested by the Committee.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Cassy

Melissa

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Attorney-General (SA) v Pennington [2019] SASC 180 (25 October 2019) – South Australian Supreme Court

At [45], the Court noted:

'Traditional western psychological therapy is better equipped than therapy from traditional healers to address some of the respondent's specific issues that might lead to reoffending such as control of aggression, anger and avoiding alcohol.'

Munda v Western Australia [2013] HCA 38 (2 October 2013) – High Court of Australia

The majority at [53]: 'Mitigating factors must be given appropriate weight, but they must not be allowed "to lead to the imposition of a penalty which is disproportionate to the gravity of the instant offence." It would be contrary to the principle stated by Brennan J in Neal to accept that Aboriginal offending is to be viewed systemically as less serious than offending by persons of other ethnicities. To accept that Aboriginal offenders are in general less responsible for their actions than other persons would be to deny Aboriginal people their full measure of human dignity. It would be quite inconsistent with the statement of principle in Neal to act upon a kind of racial stereotyping which diminishes the dignity of individual offenders by consigning them, by reason of their race and place of residence, to a category of persons who are less capable than others of decent behaviour. Further, it would be wrong to accept that a victim of violence by an Aboriginal offender is somehow less in need, or deserving, of such protection and vindication as the criminal law can provide'.

At [55]: 'A consideration with a very powerful claim on the sentencing discretion in this case is the need to recognise that the appellant, by his violent conduct, took a human life, and, indeed, the life of his de facto spouse. A just sentence must accord due recognition to the human dignity of the victim of domestic violence and the legitimate interest of the general community in the denunciation and punishment of a brutal, alcoholfuelled destruction of a woman by her partner. A failure on the part of the state to mete out a just punishment of violent offending may be seen as a failure by the state to vindicate the human dignity of the victim; and to impose a lesser punishment by reason of the identity of the victim is to create a group of second-class citizens, a state of affairs entirely at odds with the fundamental idea of equality before the law'.

Reid v Smith [2014] ACTSC 349 (21 October 2014) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Penfold ACJ at [24]: In Bugmy v The Queen, the High Court said at [37],[41],[44],[44]: 'An Aboriginal offender's deprived background may mitigate the sentence that would otherwise be appropriate for the offence in the same way that the deprived background of a non-Aboriginal offender may mitigate that offender's sentence… the appellant's submission that courts should take judicial notice of the systemic background of deprivation of Aboriginal offenders cannot be accepted. It, too, is antithetical to individualised justice. Aboriginal Australians as a group are subject to social and economic disadvantage measured across a range of indices, but to recognise this is to say nothing about a particular Aboriginal offender. In any case in which it is sought to rely on an offender's background of deprivation in mitigation of sentence, it is necessary to point to material tending to establish that background… An offender's childhood exposure to extreme violence and alcohol abuse may explain the offender's recourse to violence when frustrated such that the offender's moral culpability for the inability to control that impulse may be substantially reduced. However, the inability to control the violent response to frustration may increase the importance of protecting the community from the offender'.

At [27]: '[W]hile the decision in Bugmy is certainly relevant to the sentencing of aboriginal offenders, it is also relevant in clarifying that a claim of failure to give adequate weight to particular considerations arising in such a sentencing is not a useful appeal ground. While it might have been an error on the Magistrate's part if she had entirely disregarded Mr Reid's somewhat troubled background, her Honour instead made specific mention of it. The fact that she did not as a result grant as much leniency to Mr Reid as he apparently hoped for does not establish a specific error of the kind alleged'.

Drew v R [2016] NSWCCA 310 (16 December 2016) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

At [84], N Adams J held –

> '…A Court may not aggravate an offence by taking judicial notice of the fact that some Aboriginal women might be less likely to complain of domestic violence because of a culture of silence and ostracism in their communities. Whether or not the victim in each case is in such a class of vulnerable victims will always be a matter that must be proved beyond reasonable doubt based on the evidence in that case.'

At [88], her Honour states –

> 'It is notorious that offences committed within the context of domestic violence are under-reported and that such under-reporting is not confined to Indigenous communities.'

At [89], her Honour states –

> 'High rates of non-disclosure by Indigenous victims of domestic violence have been attributed, among other things, to the potential for stigma and ostracism from family and community members. Indigenous victims may also, for historical and pragmatic reasons, fear contact with police and the courts or regard the authorities as unable to help them'

Emitja v The Queen [2016] NTCCA 4 (21 October 2016) – Northern Territory Court of Criminal Appeal

Grant CJ and Kelly J quoted from Amagula v White (unreported, Northern Territory Supreme Court, 7 January 1998): 'The courts must do what they can to see that the pervasive violence against women in Aboriginal communities is reduced. There is a fairly widespread belief that it is acceptable for men to bash their wives in some circumstances; this belief must be erased'.

Their Honours continued at [32]-[34]: 'As this Court has repeatedly observed before and since that statement was made, such conduct must be dealt with in a manner which reflects the serious nature of the offending and its corrosive effect on well-being in Aboriginal communities'.

While 'some Aboriginal communities have an unusually high incidence of serious crimes of violence and that the courts are powerless to alleviate the dysfunction and deprivation which underlies that violence. Aboriginal women and children living in those communities 'are entitled to equality of treatment in the law's responses to offences against them'. The protection which the law affords includes the imposition of sentences which include a component designed to deter other members of the community from committing crimes of that nature'.

There are also practical societal reasons to consider personal and general deterrence. As in The Queen v Haji-Noor: 'The offender's crime against Mr Ellis was committed in a domestic context. Domestic violence is a leading contributor to death, disability and illness in the community. Such violence affects the whole community. Medical and hospital treatment for the victims of domestic violence is extremely costly and imposes a considerable strain on the health system and those who work in it'.

R v Stevenson [2015] NTSC – Sentencing Remarks 21353266 (Kelly J) (14 September 2015) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

Kelly J: 'Taking away somebody's life is one of the most serious crimes anyone can commit. I have to give you a sentence that says just how much the court and the whole community disapproves of violent crimes like this and that will discourage other men from doing the same thing. Drunken violence is far too common in our community. It is particularly common, unfortunately, in Aboriginal communities and vulnerable Aboriginal women, vulnerable people of all kind, deserve the fullest protection that the law can give them'.

R v Chong; ex parte Attorney-General of Queensland [2008] QCA 22 (22 February 2008) – Queensland Court of Appeal

The offender had stabbed her mother. Atkinson J at [36]: 'The fact that the respondent is an Indigenous woman living on Mornington Island is relevant to the question of the effect on her family. Her imprisonment will necessarily mean her removal to the mainland far away from her children and particularly the baby and thus any practical means of maintaining personal contact to them through visits or maintaining breastfeeding of the baby'.

While the Court noted that the effect on an offender's children can only be one relevant circumstance in determining sentence, the Court considered that exceptional circumstances were present. The respondent was a breastfeeding mother. Imprisonment would necessitate moving to the mainland, which would remove any practical means of maintaining the breastfeeding of the baby and personal contact with her other children. Her Honour quoted various secondary sources which discuss the substantial effect of incarceration on families, particularly on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander families (see at [37]-[42]).

R v Bell & Anor; ex parte Attorney-General (Qld) [1994] QCA 220 (20 June 1994) – Queensland Court of Appeal

The appellant was an Aboriginal man. Fitzgerald P: 'It was right for [the sentencing judge] to have regard to the respondent's disadvantages and open to him, as a result, to sentence the respondent as leniently as the circumstances of his offence admitted. However, such disadvantages do not justify or excuse violence against women or, to take another example, abuse of children. Women and children who live in deprived communities or circumstances should not also be deprived of the law's protection. A proposition that such offences should not be adequately penalised because of disadvantages experienced by a group of which an offender is a member is not one which is acceptable to the general community or one which we would expect to be accepted by the particular community of which an offender and complainant are members'.

R v Kina [1993] QCA 480 (29 November 1993) – Court of Appeal Queensland

Fitzgerald P and Davis JA: 'In this matter, there were, insufficiently recognised, a number of complex factors interacting which presented exceptional difficulties of communication between her legal representatives and the appellant because of: (i) her aboriginality; (ii) the battered woman syndrome; and (iii) the shameful (to her) nature of the events which characterised her relationship with the deceased. These cultural, psychological and personal factors bore upon the adequacy of the advice and legal representation which the appellant received and effectively denied her satisfactory representation or the capacity to make informed decisions on the basis of proper advice'.

Wongawol v The State of Western Australia [2011] WASCA 222 (17 October 2011) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [39]: 'This is a case where the protection of the community in which the appellant lives and both personal and general deterrence are very weighty sentencing considerations. The incidence of alcohol and drug fuelled violence within Aboriginal communities is distressingly high. A new generation of children are scarred. The cycle continues'.

People living in regional, rural and remote communities

People living in regional, rural or remote communities may be at greater risk of experiencing domestic and family violence [Henstridge et al 2007], may be more vulnerable to its impacts, and may face additional barriers to accessing help due to a range of geographic, economic, cultural and social factors more likely to be present in smaller communities than in larger towns and cities [Wendt et al 2015].

Successive Australian research identifies some of the common factors as [Bagshaw et al 2000]:

- Physical and social isolation
- The close, conservative nature of Australian rural and farming communities, in particular, perceived lack of confidentiality, privacy and anonymity in small communities where news travels quickly through informal networks
- Ready access to firearms and other weapons
- Greater likelihood of victim or perpetrator having a pre-existing relationship with local police, emergency services or other service providers
- Limited or lack of local services, professionals and trained workers to assist victims, children and perpetrators including 24 hour on-call police response, safe and culturally appropriate crisis accommodation, intervention and behaviour remediation programs
- Distance from critical services and limited public transport options
- A sense of shame in extended family and community members knowing about the abuse and the abusive relationship
- Economic and structural decline of some Australian regional, rural and remote communities, and an inadequate social security safety net
- Heightened financial and emotional stress within families due to the effects of drought, fire, flood or poor trading markets. [George & Harris 2014]

These factors vary in degree and combination for each community and for each of the individuals and circumstances involved. A number of these factors may also contribute to the nature and severity of the domestic and family violence, and the extent to which perpetrator programs commonly used in urban areas may be inappropriate in regional, rural or remote communities [Jamieson & Wendt 2008]. Research indicates that vulnerability to perpetration in these communities may be due to higher rates of substance misuse and unemployment, lower education levels, and poorer mental and physical health outcomes due to lack of or limited access to essential services [Edwards 2015].

As in urban areas, women are overrepresented as victims of domestic and family violence. Research suggests that the prevalence of more conservative and traditional views, norms and gender roles in smaller communities and family farming enterprises may contribute to victims being more vulnerable to the controlling behaviours of their intimate partners, and less likely to seek help and recourse for the violence they experience. For example, a victim who has principally performed domestic and nurturing roles within the family while the intimate partner, the perpetrator, has run the family business and become a prominent member of the local community, may lack any financial independence or the skills necessary for paid employment. A victim in these circumstances may be reluctant to disclose the violence or to leave the abusive relationship due to a fear of losing privacy and pride, a perceived pressure related to community expectations of self-reliance and resilience, or a fear of further violence [Wendt et al 2015]. Where financial and property arrangements are seemingly too complex to unravel, the victim may fear poverty and homelessness, or may perceive that the need to preserve the family name and inheritance outweighs a personal need for safety and wellbeing [George & Harris 2014].

Where victims do manage to leave the abusive relationship and find alternative accommodation, but are not able to leave the local community, research reports that victims continue to feel a heightened sense of fear and anxiety knowing that they remain highly visible to the perpetrator and vulnerable to their abusive behaviours [George & Harris 2014].

People from culturally and linguistically diverse groups may experience compounded isolation through extreme lack of specialised services, for example interpreters [NSW Office for Women's Policy 2008]. Similarly, the effects of rurality and remoteness [Cunneen 2010] may compound vulnerabilities experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

People living in regional, rural and remote communities - Key Literature

Australia

Bagshaw, Dale, et al, 'Reshaping Responses to Domestic Violence' (Final Report, University of South Australia and Partnerships Against Domestic Violence, Commonwealth of Australia, April 2000).

This Australian research used a variety of methods including an anonymous 'phone-in' and focus groups. 102 women who were victims/survivors of domestic violence participated in the phone-in, 27 callers were from rural areas. This report provides an overview of literature (pp86-87). Rural callers identified extreme isolation, entrapment and alienation, financial dependency, and safety issues as factors heightening vulnerability; additional barriers to disclosing abuse and limited access to resources were noted (pp86-89). Specific to perpetrators of domestic violence from rural areas, pp86 and 89 note that similar issues need to be considered as for victims, including confidentiality, privacy, limitations on certain interventions, and lack of availability of some services.

Campo, Monica and Sarah Tayton, Domestic and family violence in regional, rural and remote communities: An overview of key issues (Child Family Community Australia, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2015).

This paper provides a brief overview for understanding the issues unique to domestic and family violence in regional, rural and remote communities. The key messages are that:

- 'Women in regional, rural and remote areas are more likely than women in urban areas to experience domestic and family violence'.
- 'Women living in regional, rural and remote areas who experience domestic and family violence face specific issues related to their geographical location and the cultural and social characteristics of living in small communities' (p.1). Social norms and structures in rural communities include rural masculinity, self-reliance and privacy, lack of perpetrator accountability, and complex geographical issues (pp.3-4). Geographical issues include isolation, gun ownership and natural disasters (p.5).
- 'There is a common view in rural communities that 'family problems' such as domestic and family violence are not talked about, which serves to silence women's experience of domestic and family violence and deter them from disclosing violence and abuse'.

- ‘Fear of stigma, shame, community gossip, and a lack of perpetrator accountability deter women from seeking help’.
- ‘A lack of privacy due to the high likelihood that police, health professionals and domestic and family violence workers know both the victim and perpetrator can inhibit women’s willingness to use local services’.
- ‘Women who do seek help find difficulty in accessing services due to geographical isolation, lack of transportation options and not having access to their own income’ (p.1).

Cunneen, Chris, ‘Alternative and Improved Responses to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland Indigenous Communities’ (Research Report, Department of Communities (QLD), 2010).

This report addresses the issue of whether the legal system is responding adequately to domestic and family violence against Indigenous people in Queensland. The research utilised a combination of legal research, qualitative interviews and quantitative analysis. This report provides a comprehensive overview of specific issues facing Indigenous women in the context of domestic violence, and identifies a variety of barriers for Indigenous women to reporting violence and accessing protection including family and kinship issues, removal of children, and lack of community support and services (Chapter 6, from p97). Compounding effects of rurality and remoteness are referred to throughout the report.

In relation to perpetrators of domestic and family violence, p27 notes issues around lack of alternative accommodation for either party, while p127 notes that fulfilling the responsibility to explain protection orders to the respondent may be more difficult in rural and remote areas where the respondent is less likely to be present in court, less likely to have access to services to assist with understanding the order, and more likely to experience language problems.

George, Amanda, and Bridget Harris, Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria (Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University, 2014).

This research combines the findings of two studies undertaken by the Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice (CRRLJ) and explores the experiences of and outcomes for women and children survivors of family violence in regional and rural Victoria, examining their contact with and perceptions of government agencies (including the Victorian magistrates' courts). From p46-51 the authors identify and discuss barriers facing survivors in regional and rural Victoria from seeking assistance. Barriers include geographic isolation, social isolation and their high visibility in their community. Access to services is particularly difficult for women from culturally and linguistically diverse women (p51). It notes the prevalence of guns and firearms increased women's vulnerability (p55). Limited alternative/crisis accommodation is identified (p57). Reduced access to legal services (p59) and complex financial arrangements (eg family farm) (p60). Some of these difficulties maybe faced by Indigenous women who live in remote communities, and additionally Indigenous people may face strong family pressures (p49).

Henstridge, John, et al, 'Analysis of the 2005 Personal Safety Survey' (Analysis Report, Data Analysis Australia, June 2007).

Prevalence rates of all types of violence, towards both women and men, were higher in major urban areas, followed by outer regional and remote areas. The lowest prevalence rates were in inner regional areas (p11).

Jamieson, Shirley, and Sarah Wendt, 'Exploring Men's Perpetrator Programs in Small Rural Communities' (2008) 18(1) Rural Society 39.

This research reports on a study conducted in a small rural community in South Australia in 2006. The key findings of the research were that concerns about anonymity and community attitudes, which condoned male control of female partners, would prevent men from using behaviour change programs in small rural communities, and therefore impact on their viability. The article also notes that perpetrator programs in rural communities may have been designed for metropolitan areas, thus inappropriate for men in rural towns (p40). It also points to the fact that 'Many of the factors which may exacerbate men's use of violence are not unique to rural men. However, the isolation, beliefs about rural masculinity which encourage stoicism and repressed emotions, and limited access to, and use of, medical and health facilities all indicate that rural men require different assistance to men from urban areas to understand and address their use of violence' (p42).

Meyer S, Stambe R-M. Mothering in the Context of Violence: Indigenous and Non-Indigenous Mothers' Experiences in Regional Settings in Australia. Journal of Interpersonal Violence. November 2020.

Abstract: Domestic and family violence (DFV) disproportionately affects women and children in Australia and globally. On average, one in three women experiences DFV during adulthood and the majority of these women identify as mothers. The prevalence of DFV is higher for Indigenous women and their experiences disproportionately range at the more severe end of physical abuse. For women affected by DFV, mothering during and post this type of victimization is complicated by strategic entrapment, undermining of the mother–child relationship, and threats of harm directed at children and mothers. While a substantial body of literature has examined the experiences of mothers affected by DFV more broadly, research on the experiences of Indigenous mothers affected by DFV remains scarce. Research evidence is further limited when trying to understand the specific constraints experienced by mothers affected by DFV in regional settings. This article examines the experiences of Indigenous and non-Indigenous mothers affected by DFV in regional Queensland, Australia. Data derived from 17 qualitative face-to-face interviews are used to explore the lived experiences of these mothers. Findings identify the immediate and long-term effects of DFV on mothers and children, including similarities and differences in women's experiences of mothering in the context of DFV, experiences of entrapment in an abusive relationship, experiences of post-separation abuse, strategies used to mitigate its impact on children, and surviving as a female-headed single-parent household in regional settings. While mothers in this study shared a number of similar experiences, regionality, the risk of cultural disconnectedness, and socio-structural marginalization disproportionately affected Indigenous mothers in this study. Findings raise key implications for supporting mothers and children's safety and recovery, access to safe and sustainable housing in regional towns, and the empowerment of Indigenous women to overcome the lasting effects of colonization and disproportionate experiences of disadvantage.

Office for Women's Policy (NSW), 'Discussion Paper on NSW Domestic and Family Violence Strategic Framework'(Department of Premier and Cabinet, 2008).

This policy paper reviews relevant literature. At p10 it is noted that women living with domestic and family violence in rural or regional areas 'experience social and physical isolation due to geographical location, transport difficulties, and unreliable or unavailable telephone services… [Their isolation], the limited availability of legal services, such as police, legal aid, and advocacy support, and domestic violence services, such as long term counselling and refuge accommodation, mean that accessing help can be challenging. In addition, when services are available they are often not used because of a variety of reasons including concerns over confidentiality.'

Wendt, Sarah, 'Constructions of Local Culture and Impacts on Domestic Violence in an Australian Rural Community' (2009) 25(2) Journal of Rural Studies 175.

The study described in this paper explored local culture in a South Australian rural community and how it affected women's experiences of, and men's perpetration of, domestic violence. It found several local cultural discourses that influenced the issue, including self-reliance, pride, privacy, belonging and closeness, family, and Christianity. The power and influence of these discourses made it difficult to name and challenge domestic violence. This paper emphasises that rural women are not a homogenous group.

Relevant to perpetrators, it also notes that 'studies have found that victims and perpetrators needs are not being met due to a lack of coordination amongst services, confusion amongst service providers of who was doing what, and lack of understanding by workers of the complexities of violence and abuse' (p176).

Wendt, Sarah, Donna Chung, Alison Elder, Antonia Hendrick and Angela Hartwig, Seeking help for domestic and family violence: Exploring regional, rural, and remote women's coping experiences—Final report (ANROWS, 2017).

This qualitative study examined the experiences of women seeking help for domestic and family violence who live in regional, rural, and remote areas in Australia. The research drew on interviews with 23 women and interviews / focus groups involving 37 managers and practitioners. Key findings of the report are summarised on pages 4 and 5 and include:

- When they felt they could not cope alone, women experiencing violence mostly tried to seek informal help (family, friends, acquaintances);
- Experiences of shame and embarrassment impacted help-seeking, and continued for many during the process of recovery and rebuilding;
- Women's descriptions of social isolation were focused on having limited social networks and supports and social resources;
- Despite efforts to cope alone or using informal networks, all the women in the study experienced intervention by police; and
- Having access to emergency specialist accommodation was crucial to give a safe space and an entry-point to support.

Wendt, Sarah, Donna Chung, Alison Elder, Lia Bryant, Seeking help for domestic violence: Exploring rural women's coping experiences: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This report presents 'the research and literature that examines the effects of social and geographic isolation on the ability of women to disclose, report, seek help, and receive appropriate interventions following domestic and family violence and sexual assault' (p.2). Part I examines the extent of domestic and family violence in rural and remote Australia and shows that there are high reported rates of domestic and family violence in such areas (p.1).

Part II looks at the nature and experience of domestic and family violence in socially and geographically isolated areas. The report notes that 'women experience unique structural and cultural barriers that impact on their ability to disclose, report, seek help and receive appropriate services following domestic and family violence and sexual assault. Women living in socially and geographically isolated places often cope with domestic and family violence by themselves for long periods of time. Informal support plays a vital role in women's decisions to seek formal help. Coping and help-seeking is particularly complex and nuanced for different groups of women, particularly Indigenous women, because of the impacts of colonisation and dispossession. This report outlines contextual factors that influence domestic and family violence in regional communities such as living in farming, mining, sea-change/treechange communities as well as those experiencing environmental disasters and poverty' (p.1).

Part III of the report provides an overview of the challenges and possibilities relating to service provision in social and geographically isolated places. It notes that there is limited research on help-seeking activities of regional, rural and remote Australian women when dealing with domestic and family violence and sexual assault. It notes social and geographic isolation are key factors to consider in service provision and understanding coping and help-seeking for regional, rural and remote communities.

Social isolation (close-knit communities, ideas about gender roles) – can shape women's feelings of embarrassment and wanting to remain silent, or not seeking assistance because they want to cope on their own. Geographic isolation consists ofphysical barriers e.g. long distances to travel and difficulties accessing services (p.1).

International

Edwards, Katie M, 'Intimate Partner Violence and the Rural-Urban-Suburban Divide: Myth or Reality? A Critical Review of the Literature' (2015) 16(3) Trauma, Violence and Abuse 359.

The author presents a review of the published empirical and theoretical literature to date on similarities and differences in intimate partner violence (IPV) in rural locales compared to urban and suburban locales. A review of 63 studies indicates that (1) the rates of IPV are generally similar across rural, urban, and suburban locales, although some groups of rural women (e.g., multiracial and separated/divorced) may be at increased risk for IPV compared to similar groups of urban women, and rates of intimate partner homicide may be higher in rural locales than urban and suburban locales; (2) IPV perpetrator and victim characteristics in rural locales are generally similar to IPV perpetrator and victim characteristics in other locales with the exception of some demographic characteristics that can generally be accounted for by broader rural–urban–suburban demographic differences; (3) IPV perpetrators in rural locales, compared with perpetrators in urban locales, may perpetrate more chronic and severe IPV, which could be due to the higher rates of substance abuse and unemployment documented among rural perpetrators; (4) IPV victims in rural locales may have worse psychosocial and physical health outcomes due to the lack of availability, accessibility, and quality of IPV services; and (5) attitudes about IPV vary to some extent across locales, with individuals in rural locales generally supporting less governmental involvement in IPV issues than in urban locales.

- Literature on perpetrators and risk factors for IPV perpetration in rural communities is reviewed on pp363-364, determining that there are not major differences between rural and urban perpetrators for the most part, though some studies have found rural perpetrators were more likely to engage in some forms of abuse (such as harming pets), violate protective orders and commit more severe IPV, while also being more likely to have lower employment and educational attainment.

Sudderth, Lori, 'An Uneasy Alliance: Law Enforcement and Domestic Violence Victim Advocates in a Rural Area' (2006) 1(4) Feminist Criminology 329.

The 'Background' section of this article (p330-335) is relevant. Drawing on available international literature, it highlights issues for rural victims of domestic violence including restricted services (including emergency response), restricted public transportation, isolation, officers knowing the perpetrators, the operation of traditional gender expectations (resulting in financial dependence, primary child care responsibility), less anonymity and more limited law enforcement.

People living in regional, rural and remote communities - Other Bench Books

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.11 discusses the particular vulnerabilities faced by victims, unique patterns of family violence perpetrated, distinctive drivers of family violence, and unique barriers faced by victims in terms of reporting and accessing necessary services and assistance, which result from geographical location in which family violence is experienced.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 9 focuses on 'Regional and remote WA'. [9.4.7] 'Family violence and sexual assault matters' discusses the particular issues people in those areas face, including limited victim and offender programs, police officers knowing the parties involved, isolation, accessibility of firearms; and it identifies that Aboriginal and CALD people experience compounded isolation (language and cultural barriers; lack of interpreter services).

Specific to perpetrators in regional and remote areas, the section also identify points to consider around the fact that accommodation for men is limited, and that 'high levels of alcohol consumption and other drugs may exacerbate violent outbursts'. It goes on to note more general considerations for offenders in regional communities, such as lack of availability of certain penalties.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Section 8.8.3 recognises rurality as a risk factor.

People living in regional, rural and remote communities - Other Resources

Non-inquest findings into the death of Rinabel Tiglao Blackmore, Coroners Court of Queensland (Cairns), 4 April 2019.

The following is a summary of the key facts relating to the domestic violence related death of Ms Blackmore and the key findings of Northern Coroner, Nerida Wilson. There are other matters raised in the Coroner's findings relating to police responses that are not covered in this summary.

Key facts:

Ms Blackmore migrated to Australia from the Philippines in 1991; English was not her first language. After separating from her husband (with whom she had three sons) in 2014, she moved from Brisbane to Middlemount in central Queensland to continue a relationship with Mr Dickson that had commenced prior to the separation from her husband. Ms Blackmore was concerned that her family would not approve of her living with a man she was not married to, so she was secretive about her relationship with Mr Dickson, her living arrangements and whereabouts. Ms Blackmore's reluctance to tell her family about the new relationship was a source of consternation for Mr Dickson and was allegedly the trigger for two separate (although causally connected) episodes of domestic violence in the 48 hours prior to her death.

Ms Blackmore spent the 2014 Christmas period in Brisbane whilst Mr Dickson visited friends in Bundaberg. During their time apart, Mr Dickson exhibited controlling and jealous behaviours. He demanded that Ms Blackmore take photos of the people she was with so that he could satisfy himself that she wasn't cheating on him. Mr Dickson sent messages to Ms Blackmore's male friends from her mobile phone, impersonating her, and asking when they were free to have sex again, in an attempt to 'catch her out' for alleged infidelity.

On 28 December 2014, Ms Blackmore travelled from Brisbane to Bundaberg to meet and stay overnight with Mr Dickson at a local motel. An argument ensued in the motel room, with Mr Dickson asking Ms Blackmore why he was her "dirty little secret", and then pushing and grabbing her on the shoulders. They then both went to the motel's front office where the manager witnessed Mr Dickson and Ms Blackmore in a tug of war over a handbag, Ms Blackmore saying she wanted to break up, and Mr Dickson becoming more agitated as he tried to convince Ms Blackmore to get into the car with him. Ms Blackmore whispered to the manager to call the police. When Mr Dickson went outside to sit in his car, Ms Blackmore told the manager that he (Mr Dickson) had earlier put his hands around her neck, that she was frightened for her life, and that if the manager didn't get the police he (Mr Dickson) would kill her.

The police attended the motel, took statements from the parties, and told Mr Dickson that they would be applying for a protection order on Ms Blackmore's behalf. The police supervised the return of personal effects to Ms Blackmore and the exchange of their respective mobile phones. Ms Blackmore told the police she intended to catch a train to Rockhampton. Mr Dickson then left the motel, as did the police. Not long after however, Mr Dickson returned to the motel and Ms Blackmore told the manager that Mr Dickson had taken $400 from her bag. The manager became concerned for Ms Blackmore's safety and assisted her to be collected by a friend.

The Application for a Protection Order prepared by the police included grounds that it was necessary and desirable to protect the aggrieved due to the respondent's violent nature and history and the aggrieved's level of fear towards the respondent.

Ms Blackmore asked a friend to drive her to Middlemount so she could collect her property and passport from Mr Dickson's unit. They arrived in the early hours of 30 December 2014. Before the friend left Ms Blackmore, they agreed on a code in case Ms Blackmore was in trouble and the police should be called.

Mr Dickson told police that when he arrived at his unit around lunchtime on 30 December 2014, Ms Blackmore was waiting for him so she could retrieve her possessions. He said he and Ms Blackmore had sex on two occasions, they fell asleep, and then argued. He admitted to grabbing Ms Blackmore around the collar bone or shoulder, shaking and squeezing her, resulting in red marks on her shoulders and around her neck. He also admitted to making contact with her lip causing it to bleed. Mr Blackmore claimed that Ms Blackmore was screaming at him to stop, while also crying and saying that she loved him and didn't want to leave him.

Mr Dickson told police that late in the evening of 30 December 2014 he and Ms Blackmore decided to drive to Brisbane in his vehicle. He said initially Ms Blackmore sat in the rear while Mr Dickson drove as she appeared to be searching for something in one of her bags. A later examination of the vehicle revealed that Mr Dickson had taken possession of Ms Blackmore's mobile phone and had put it in the driver's door well. Mr Dickson said Ms Blackmore subsequently climbed over to the front passenger seat, complaining of motion sickness; then another argument ensued involving Mr Dickson screaming verbal abuse at Ms Blackmore. Mr Dickson denied using any physical violence against Ms Blackmore while they were in the vehicle. Mr Dickson told police he was driving the vehicle at around 100km per hour when Ms Blackmore suddenly opened the door and exited the vehicle. Mr Dickson told police he then took steps to locate Ms Blackmore, keep her alive, contact emergency services and assist in her transfer to hospital.

Ms Blackmore's head injuries resulted in her death on 2 January 2015. There were no alcohol or drugs detected in her system.

Mr Dickson pleaded guilty to (the alternative charge of) manslaughter of Ms Blackmore, and served time. See para 135 on pages 15-16 for the Judge's sentencing remarks.

Key findings by the Coroner:

- Ms Blackmore's death occurred at separation and during a period of prolonged violence perpetrated by her intimate partner. She died within 40 hours of her first and only report of domestic violence to police. In the 40 hours preceding her exit from the vehicle, Ms Blackmore had been subjected to several causally connected episodes of verbal abuse and significant physical violence by Mr Dickson.
- Ms Blackmore's actions were a desperate act of self-preservation. The Coroner found that it is more probable than not that Ms Blackmore exited the vehicle to escape the terror of the events unfolding inside whilst in fear for her life.
- Ms Blackmore was all the more vulnerable by virtue of the fact she was a Filipino woman, English was not her first language, and she resided in Middlemount (a remote and isolated location). Her physical isolation was compounded by her isolation from family, including her children. Her support network and resources were extremely limited.

People living in regional, rural and remote communities - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Bianca

Erin

Fiona

Jennifer

People living in regional, rural and remote communities - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

DPP v Darcy-Shillingsworth [2017] NSWCCA 224 (13 September 2017) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Per Fagan J at [104]

‘The violence to the respondent's female partner was perpetrated in a remote community at least a hundred kilometres from the nearest permanent police presence. It was a serious aspect of count 3 that this assault, constituted by punching Ms Stanton in the face, pulling her from the car and knocking her to the ground with another blow, took place in the presence of her father. He had attended to try to stop the attack. Although police could not be summoned quickly enough to provide the immediate physical protection which his daughter's situation evidently required, Mr Stanton did not escalate the violence or take the law into his own hands. He warned that he was calling the police. This ought to have caused the respondent to come to his senses and draw back from his cowardly attack. Instead… he commenced to beat Mr Stanton himself. Grievous bodily harm resulted. As the jury found, the respondent foresaw this as a possible outcome of his actions.’

Morgan v Kazandzis [2010] WASC 377 (10 December 2010) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

EM Heenan J at [72]: ‘His violent conduct towards the victim on 27 September 2008 had been repeated less than five weeks later and she was in obvious fear of him. The fear must have been recognised as being well justified because of the actions taken by the police in evacuating her by air from Oombulgurri immediately after each episode. She was much younger than the appellant, had been in a relationship with him and was pregnant. Violent treatment of women in this fashion cannot be tolerated anywhere in the State, but it is of particular importance that in isolated communities such as Oombulgurri that the punishment of an offender who commits such offences in a short space of time should be such as to demonstrate to all members of the community that that conduct is unlawful and that effective punishment will be imposed in order to deter the general community from the use of violence. Specific deterrence of the individual offender was, in this case, also a necessary and essential ingredient of the sentence. For these reasons, I do not consider that any error has been demonstrated by the learned magistrate in deciding upon immediate sentences of imprisonment rather than suspending one or both of them'.

Lutley v Jacques* [2010] WASC 78 (28 April 2010) – Supreme Court of Western Australia

Simmonds J at [80]-[81]: 'Counsel for the respondent also pressed on me that the offences occurred in the remote Pilbara region, which counsel said had the second highest rates of violence against women in the state. Also, she pointed out that there were data showing that remote areas have about five times the rate of domestic violence than capital cities'.

'I accept without deciding that I can take judicial notice of these matters, and that I should regard them as going to the prevalence of offences of domestic violence to which the Restraining Orders Act is part of the legal response. On the relevance of the prevalence of offending of a particular type, see Yates v The State of Western Australia [2008] WASCA 144 [55] (Steytler P), [94] (McLure JA). I also accept without deciding that sentences for the same offending committed in different parts of the state may be affected by differences in the prevalence of that offence in those parts of those magnitudes. However, I note that counsel was unable to refer me to authority for that last approach'.

People affected by substance misuse

Misuse of alcohol or other drugs by perpetrators or victims of domestic and family violence may indicate an increased risk in the frequency and severity of the violence or a heightened vulnerability to the experience or impact of the violence [Laslett 2015].

Research demonstrates that a perpetrator with alcohol or other drug misuse problems is more likely to abuse the victim more frequently; more likely to sexually assault or physically injure the victim; and more likely to be physically violent outside the home [Mouzos & Makkai 2004].

A significant development however has been the recognition that, while alcohol or other drugs may be associated with the perpetration of domestic and family violence, their misuse is unlikely to be the direct cause. Rather, the strongest risk factors for violence are perpetrator behaviours including generally high levels of aggression, exerting dominance and control over their intimate partners and believing they are entitled to do so [Mouzos & Makkai 2004], and holding negative or sexist attitudes towards women. [Renzetti et al 2015] A perpetrator's misuse of alcohol or other drugs in this context is likely to be an aggravating factor: the more dangerous the misuse, the higher the probability the violence will be more frequent and more severe, and the physical and emotional harm to the victim more serious.

Depression, anxiety, attempted suicide and post-traumatic stress disorder are among the frequently reported effects of domestic and family violence on victims. A victim may misuse alcohol or other drugs to medicate the physical and emotional pain caused by the violence and to cope with the ongoing violence. Some perpetrators may use the victim's condition to rationalise and escalate the violence and further exploit the victim's vulnerability. A further known risk is that a victim is more likely to have an intimate partner who also misuses alcohol or other drugs, an aggravating factor already identified.

People affected by substance misuse - Key Literature

Australia

Dowling, Chistopher and Anthony Morgan, Is Methamphetamine Use Associated with Domestic Violence?, Research Report No 563, December 2018, Australian Institute of Criminology.

There is considerable evidence of the impact of methamphetamine (often known as ‘ice’, ‘speed’, MDMA or ‘ecstasy’) use on violent behaviour. This paper presents findings from a review of existing research on the association between methamphetamine use and domestic violence. Eleven studies met the criteria for inclusion. Results of the research showed that domestic violence is common among methamphetamine users; however, methamphetamine users account for a small proportion of all domestic violence offenders. There is evidence that methamphetamine users are more likely than non-users to perpetrate domestic violence. Importantly, methamphetamine use is frequently present along with other risk factors. This means methamphetamine use probably exacerbates an existing predisposition to violence, rather than causing violent behaviour.

Laslett, Anne-Marie, et al., The Hidden Harm: Alcohol’s Impact on Children and Families (Foundation for Alcohol Research and Education, 2015).

This research paper presents a helpful overview of the literature. It also draws on two national surveys of alcohol’s harm to others, service system data and qualitative interviews with families conducted in 2008. Twelve per cent of carers reported that their children were verbally abused, left in an unsupervised or unsafe situation, physically hurt or exposed to domestic violence because of others’ drinking (p10). The paper identifies high numbers of incidents of alcohol-related domestic violence (p12). It notes that based on analyses of victimisation data from the 2005 Australian Personal Safety Survey, it was estimated that alcohol contributed to 50 per cent of all partner violence, and 73 per cent of physical assaults by a partner (p15). This review of the literature concludes that alcohol emerges as a consistent risk factor in the perpetration of domestic violence; there is a consistent relationship between alcohol use and increased severity of partner aggression and studies show women experience a heightened risk of partner violence on days that men have been drinking (p16). It also identifies that alcohol related harm may be prevented by changing the drinking of the drinker, protecting those affected and/or insulating contact between them (p103).

Mayshak, Richelle et al, Alcohol/Drug-Involved Family Violence in Australia (ADIVA) – Research Bulletin, Research Bulletin No 7, June 2018, Australian Institute of Criminology.

Family and domestic violence is a significant health and social issue. Alcohol and drugs are two risk factors found to contribute to family and domestic violence. This project sought to investigate the relationship between alcohol and other drug use and family violence, key demographic and environmental factors, differences between cases with and without alcohol and other drug involvement, and the major trends in family violence.

Morgan, Anthony and Alex Gannoni, Methamphetamine dependence and domestic violence among police detainees, Trends & Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice No. 588, Australian Institute of Criminology, February 2020, 12(2) Journal of Aggression, Conflict and Peace Research 55-62.

This study explores the relationship between methamphetamine dependence and domestic violence among male police detainees interviewed as part of the Drug Use Monitoring in Australia program. Detainees who were dependent on methamphetamines (61%) were significantly more likely to report recent violence towards a current or former intimate partner than those who had used methamphetamines but were not dependent (37%). There was also a significant association between cannabis dependence and self-reported domestic violence. Further, detainees expressing attitudes minimising the impact of violence were also more likely to self-report domestic violence. Overall, the results show the importance of integrated responses that address the co-occurrence of substance use disorders and domestic violence, and the risk factors underpinning these harmful behaviours.

Mouzos, Jenny, and Toni Makkai, 'Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS)' (Research and Public Policy Series No 56, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey, and provided information on their experiences of physical and sexual violence including childhood violence. It identifies research that demonstrates a correlation between alcohol use and violence and research that has found that abusive males with alcohol or drug problems inflict violence against their partners more frequently, are more apt to inflict serious injuries, are more likely to be sexually assaultive, and are more likely to be violent outside the home than abusers without a history of substance abuse (p58). This paper also identifies that recent research has found that male controlling behaviours over female partners made 'a more important statistical contribution to predictions about violence than did alcohol, age, type of relationship, or class variables' (p58). However study results indicate that the strongest risk factors for intimate partner physical violence are associated with the 'male's behaviour — his drinking habits, general levels of aggression, and his controlling behaviour.' (p61)

Mouzos, Jenny, and Lance Smith, 'Partner Violence Among a Sample of Police Detainees' (2007) 337 Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice 1.

Using data from the Drug Use Monitoring in Australia (DUMA) program, this paper explores involvement in intimate partner violence, and provides first-time results from face-to-face interviews with a group of 1,597 police detainees. The study found that the levels of intimate partner violence are much higher among this group (49%) than is found from general population surveys. More than two-thirds of the detainees who were involved in partner violence reported being both a victim and a perpetrator in the past 12 months. Detainees who were classified as drug dependent were twice as likely as non-drug dependent detainees to be involved in intimate partner violence. None of the individual drugs was found to be significantly associated with intimate partner violence, suggesting that the level of illicit drug use (dependency), rather than the type of illicit drug, is a greater predictor of involvement in intimate partner violence. Alcohol dependency was also found to be a significant risk marker for involvement in partner violence (p5).

Noonan, P., A. Taylor and J. Burke, Links between alcohol consumption and domestic and sexual violence against women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This literature review found that "there is little evidence that alcohol use is a primary cause of violence against women. The paper does, however, identify that there are clear associations, and in some cases, strong correlations between alcohol use and violence against women, including, for instance, in the severity of the violence." The relationship between alcohol and violence against women manifests in three ways:

- Alcohol use is linked with the perpetration of violence against women.
- Alcohol use is linked with women's victimisation by violence.
- Alcohol is used as a coping strategy by women who have experienced violence

Qadara, Antonia, Mary Stathopoulos and Rebecca Jenkinson, 'Establishing the Connection [Between Alcohol and Other Drug Use and Sexual Victimisation]' (State of Knowledge Paper 6, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety Landscapes, July 2015).

This literature review draws upon Australian national surveys to consider the prevalence of sexual abuse and its association with substance abuse (p9). For example in one ABS study it was reported that among women who reported one type of gender-based violence, over 23% of victims also reported experiencing a substance use disorder. Where women had experienced more than three types of gender-based violence, 47% of them had also experienced a substance use disorder over their lifetime (p9).

International

Bennett, Larry and Patricia Bland, Substance Abuse and Intimate Partner Violence (National Online Resource Center on Violence Against Women, 2008).

This review of the literature identifies that substance abuse and intimate partner violence often have many causes and their apparent correlation applies to only a sub-group of batterers and victims. For some men who batter, substance abuse increases the frequency or severity of their violence. For other men, substance abuse and intimate partner violence are separate issues whose apparently high rate of co-occurrence may stem from shared pre-conditions such as antisocial personality or from a belief that when they get drunk or high, they are going to be violent. Finally, for some men, both substance abuse and intimate partner violence may be manifestations of an underlying need for power and control related to gender-based distortions and insecurities.

Gilchrist et al., 'The interplay between substance use and intimate partner violence perpetration: A meta-ethnography' (2019) 65 International Journal of Drug Policy 8.

The authors reviewed qualitative studies between 1995 and 2016 to determine how substance use features in survivors' and perpetrators' accounts of intimate partner violence (IPV) perpetration. Results showed the emergence of six core themes, five of which related to the complex nexus between substance use and IPV perpetration in the context of intoxication, withdrawal and addiction, impact on relationship, and broader dynamics of power and control and psychological vulnerabilities. The other theme related to survivors' agency and resistance to IPV perpetration.

Although survivors were more likely to see intoxication and withdrawal as part of a pattern of abusive behaviour, perpetrators described a causal link between intoxication and discrete incidents of IPV perpetration. The likelihood of violence was increased by feelings of frustration caused by withdrawals from alcohol or illicit drugs, and/or a failure or partner refusal to procure money for drugs. Survivors were more likely than perpetrators to identify abuse in relation to the impact of substance use on their relationship and dynamics of power and control. The authors recommend the need for tailored integrated interventions that address the complex intersection between substance use and IPV perpetration, in the context of social, psychological and environmental factors. Interventions should also focus on how perpetrators describe their own and, where relevant, their partner's substance use.

Mehr, J. et al., (2023) Intimate partner violence, substance use, and health comorbidies among women: A narrative review. Frontiers in Psychology, 13: 1028375.

Abstract: Exposure to intimate partner violence (IPV), including physical, sexual, and psychological violence, aggression, and/or stalking, impacts overall health and can have lasting mental and physical health consequences. Substance misuse is common among individuals exposed to IPV, and IPV-exposed women (IPV-EW) are at-risk for transitioning from substance misuse to substance use disorder (SUD) and demonstrate greater SUD symptom severity; this too can have lasting mental and physical health consequences. Moreover, brain injury is highly prevalent in IPV-EW and is also associated with risk of substance misuse and SUD. Substance misuse, mental health diagnoses, and brain injury, which are highly comorbid, can increase risk of revictimization.

This paper provides a helpful literature of the connections between intimate partner violence, substance abuse and other health issues.

National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health, Understanding Research on Intimate Partner Violence and Substance Use (2008).

This research highlights key findings on the relationship between intimate partner violence (IPV) and substance misuse. These findings are:

1. 'IPV survivors are more likely to use or become dependent on substances, compared to people who have not experienced IPV'.
2. 'There are high rates of IPV among people receiving substance use disorder treatment services'.
3. 'Mental health conditions, including post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and depression, may mediate the relationship between IPV and substance use'.

The fact sheet concludes that this research does not provide sufficient information on factors that may help explain why IPV and substance use co-exist (p.5).

Renzetti, Claire M, Kellie R Lynch and C Nathan DeWall, 'Ambivalent Sexism, Alcohol Use, and Intimate Partner Violence Perpetration' (2015) 33(2) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 183-210

Abstract: 'Research on risk factors for men's perpetration of intimate partner violence (IPV) has shown a high correlation with problem alcohol use. Additional studies, however, indicate that the alcohol–IPV link is neither simple nor necessarily direct and that a range of factors may moderate this relationship. Using a national, community-based sample of 255 men, the present study examined the moderating effects of ambivalent sexism (i.e., hostile and benevolent sexism) on the relationship between alcohol use and IPV perpetration. The findings show that both greater alcohol consumption and high hostile sexism are positively associated with IPV perpetration, and that hostile sexism moderates the alcohol–IPV relationship for perpetration of physical IPV, but not for psychological IPV. Moreover, high levels of alcohol consumption have a greater impact on physical IPV perpetration for men low in hostile sexism than for men high in hostile sexism, lending support to the multiple threshold model of the alcohol–IPV link. Implications of the findings for prevention, intervention, and future research are discussed.'

- The introduction includes a comprehensive literature review of the most recent studies' findings on the correlation between alcohol use and domestic intimate partner violence, including: 'Bennett and Bland (2008) caution, however, that the relationship between alcohol use and IPV is neither simple nor necessarily direct. As they point out, most heavy drinkers do not perpetrate IPV, which suggests that IPV perpetration is influenced by additional factors that may interact with alcohol use' (p3). See especially 'The Alcohol-IPV Link' (pp3-6) which provides a great discussion of the various explanations and complex understandings of the relationship between alcohol-use and intimate partner violence perpetration.

- 'Our findings, in fact, showed that the men in our sample who consumed alcohol more frequently and in higher quantities as measured by three items from the NIAAA COGA Study reported more psychological and physical IPV perpetration. These results are consistent with the findings of previous studies that have investigated the relationship between level of alcohol consumption and IPV perpetration' (p18)
- 'As Foran and O'Leary (2008a) have pointed out, for individuals who are already at high risk of IPV perpetration without consuming alcohol—that is, in this case, men who are high in hostile sexism—heavy drinking and intoxication may contribute relatively little additional risk. However, heavy alcohol use may facilitate physical IPV perpetration among men who score low in hostile sexism by serving as a disinhibitor to the open expression of hostility toward women (Swim et al., 1995) as well as by contributing to cognitive distortions of their partner's behavior and motives' (p20)

Rivera, E. A., Heather Phillips, Carole Warshaw, Eleanor Lyon, Patricia J. Bland, and Orapen Kaewken, 'The relationship between intimate partner violence and substance use: An Applied Research Paper' (Report: National Center on Domestic Violence, Trauma & Mental Health, 2015).

This applied research paper provides an overview of recent studies on the relationship between substance use and experiencing intimate partner violence (IPV), including the prevalence of co-existing substance use and IPV. While there is some evidence suggesting a relationship between experiencing IPV and substance use, solely focusing on IPV and substance use may be misleading in its simplicity. Given that, this paper describes factors that may mediate the relationship between substance use and IPV, as well as caveats and cautions for interpreting this body of research.

People affected by substance misuse - Other Bench Books

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.2 notes that situational factors such as alcohol or drug abuse, while not a direct cause, may increase the risk of family violence. It also notes that alcohol and/or drug abuse is a contributing factor to both perpetrating and experiencing family violence. 5.7.4 discusses this specifically in the context of Indigenous people. 5.4.1 notes that family violence is a choice that men make, and it cannot be excused by factors such as alcohol.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

In considering family violence and sexual assault matters, section [9.4.7] directs judicial officers to consider that 'High levels of alcohol consumption and other drugs may exacerbate violent outbursts.' (p[9.4.9]).

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Section 5.4.4: What about victims who misuse alcohol or drugs? discusses how to interpret evidence of victims misusing alcohol or drugs and how to respond to that evidence. Consideration of whether the misuse is actually evidence of harm resulting from domestic violence is important, and guidance is provided as to how to assess that evidence.

Also see:

- Section 7.2.1: Alcohol and drug rationalization, which states that: '[w]hile heightened risk of domestic violence and of attendant bodily injury is associated with perpetrators' heavy alcohol consumption and drug use, and alcohol or drugs are often blamed for domestic violence, experts agree that drugs and alcohol are more a rationalization than a cause';
- Section 7.4.10: When the perpetrator claims the targeted parent misuses alcohol or drugs;
- Supplementary Reference 3: Perpetrator Rationalizations.

People affected by substance misuse - Other Resources

Office of the Assistant Secretary for Planning and Evaluation and the Family and Youth Services Bureau, Division of Family Violence Prevention and Services U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, October 2020 Understanding Substance Use Coercion as a Barrier to Economic Stability for Survivors of Intimate Partner Violence: Policy Implications**.

This policy brief "seeks to further the limited research, policy, and practice on substance use coercion and to increase awareness about this issue among relevant stakeholders."

Extract:

WHAT IS SUBSTANCE USE COERCION?

Substance use coercion occurs when perpetrators of intimate partner violence undermine and control their partners through substance-use related tactics and actively keep them from meeting treatment and recovery goals.

WHAT ARE EXAMPLES OF SUBSTANCE USE COERCION?

Substance use coercion can take many forms. For example, an abuser may:

- Force, initiate, or pressure their partner to use substances.
- Sabotage their partner's recovery efforts by deliberately keeping substances around their home.
- Refuse to provide their partner with childcare or transportation needed to participate in substance use treatment.

HOW COMMON IS SUBSTANCE USE COERCION?

A survey of National Domestic Violence Hotline callers who had experienced domestic violence revealed that 43 percent of respondents had experienced at least one of three types of substance use coercion:

- Had a partner pressure or force them to use substances;
- Had a partner threaten to report their substance use to the authorities to keep them from getting something they wanted or needed; and/or
- Were afraid to call the police because a partner said they would not be believed or they would be arrested based on substance use.

People affected by substance misuse - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Anna

Cassy

Faith

Fiona

Francis

Gillian

Ingrid

Julia

Lisa

Melissa

Sally

Sandra

People affected by substance misuse - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Loulanting [2015] ACTSC 172 (23 June 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [1]: 'There is no doubt that the addiction to drugs creates significant problems for the community, as well as for the user and his or her family. When the drug is methylamphetamine, or ice, the violence that it also generates can create further problems, particularly if there are stressed family situations leading to family violence. When mental health issues are added to the situation, it creates great complexity in trying to deal with the multiple issues that arise'.

R v Bell [2005] ACTSC 123 (1 December 2005) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Higgins CJ at [31]: 'I appreciate that personality disorders may often underlie the criminal behaviour of men who beat women. Alcohol or other substance abuse may sometimes be a triggering factor. Nevertheless, they must take responsibility for their actions and be seen to have done so. The offence is often hidden, so general deterrence is a factor that is quite prominent. So also is specific deterrence. No offender engaging in this kind of behaviour, nor their victims, should feel that it is to be treated lightly. Rather, it must be made the subject of condign punishment. That is not to say, of course, that any mitigatory factors or prospects for rehabilitation will be disregarded'.

Price v Tasmania [2016] TASCCA 22 (6 December 2016) – Court of Criminal Appeal Tasmania

Estcourt J noted generally at [39] that: '[I]n the present case the learned sentencing judge was correct to observe that domestic or family violence is particularly unacceptable because of its insidious nature, the difficulty in detection and the impact on the victim, broad family units, and the wider community. As His Honour commented, the issue is of much community concern, and excessive alcohol consumption and argumentativeness on the part of a victim provide no excuses whatsoever. This crime against s 170 of the Code is a very serious example of domestic violence, made all the more egregious by the fact that the immediate aftermath of the complainant being set alight was witnessed by her youngest daughter'.

Hopkins v The Queen [2015] VSCA 174 (19 June 2015) – Victorian Court of Appeal

Redlich JA at [42]: 'The evidence demonstrates that the applicant's conduct was to be explained as done in a drug-fuelled rage. Though affected by his drug consumption, it was very clear that the applicant understood precisely what he was doing. The submission cannot be sustained that his drug consumption in some way reduced his moral culpability. The regrettable fact is that this Court sees only too often the results of drug-induced violence that explains the infliction of horrific injuries. Absent circumstances in which an offender has no forewarning that the consumption of drugs may so affect him, the consumption of drugs does not constitute a mitigating circumstance. Counsel for the applicant accepted that was so. There being no medical evidence that the applicant otherwise suffered from a mental disorder, the finding of the sentencing judge is, in our view, unimpeachable'.

Director of Public Prosecutions (Victoria) v Turner [2017] VSC 358 (23 June 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

Bell J at [24]: "I do not accept that alcohol or substance abuse is the only or even the main explanation for your crimes. The manner and circumstances in which you killed Ms Cay were the product of uncontrolled anger, aggression and rage … I would refer to what King J said in R v Mulhall, which applies equally to your case:

> Women are entitled to have domestic relationships with people that do not result in their death simply because their partner loses their temper or has too much to drink or a combination of [drugs] and alcohol reduces their inhibitions. It is inexcusable"

Rosewood v The State of Western Australia [2014] WASCA 21 (29 January 2014) – Supreme Court of Western Australia (Court of Appeal)

McLure P at [15]: 'The fact that the appellant was heavily intoxicated at the time is not mitigatory. The sentencing objectives of personal and general deterrence weigh heavily in relation to acts of domestic violence that are committed when drunk or sober'.

People who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer +

LGBTIQ+ (or lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer + [Campo & Smart 2017]) encompasses people whose sexual orientation, gender identity or sex differ from heterosexual or male-female sex and gender norms. As in the broader community, the identities and experiences of people in these communities are enormously diverse and influenced by factors such as age, ethnicity, migration experience, geographical location, disability, and socio-economic status. There is however a disproportionate number of LGBTIQ+ people who experience poorer health than other groups in the Australian community, in particular mental ill health and suicide, which may be due to their fear of or actual discrimination, 'outing', violence, abuse, or exclusion. Research also identifies a greater prevalence of other risk factors for LGBTIQ+ people including more harmful and frequent use of alcohol and other drugs, homelessness and poverty, disengagement from schooling, and chronic health disorders [Rosenstriech 2013].

Of the research that has been conducted over recent years findings suggest that the incidence of this form of violence in LGBTIQ+ communities is similar to that experienced in the broader community, though specific data for transgender and intersex people is lacking [Cochrane 2017].Other findings suggest possible differences and vulnerabilities particular to LGBTIQ+ people in their experience of domestic and family violence [Ansara 2015], including:

- There is likely to be a higher proportion of men as victims and women as perpetrators than in the general population
- Heterosexual stereotypes about men and women may result in false assumptions that, for example, lesbian women are not capable of physical violence, or gay men are not masculine [Campo & Tayton 2015]
- While all forms of violence may be experienced, there may be some differences in the perpetrator's behaviours, for example, threatening to out or actually outing the victim in terms of their sexuality or HIV status, withholding hormone treatments, preventing participation in LGBTIQ+ events, name calling, ridicule and public humiliation [ACON 2004]
- Parents, siblings and other family members may also be perpetrators of violence, especially towards young LGBTIQ+ people

- LGBTIQ+ people may be less likely to identify the behaviour they experience as violence, and they may be less likely to report the behaviour or seek the help they need for fear of ostracism and discrimination; a negative response from the police and courts; escalating the violence; being 'outed'; being disbelieved or blamed; or due to personal feelings of shame or embarrassment or a need to protect the perpetrator or the relationship
- Lesbian abusers may seek to access women's shelters or support groups already accessed by their partner in order to continue perpetrating violence against their partner [Campo & Tayton 2015]
- Mainstream services, including refuges and court assistance and counselling, may not be well developed to understand and meet the complex and diverse needs of LGBTIQ+ victims and perpetrators [Cochrane 2017] and appropriate services may be unavailable.

People who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer + - Key Literature

Australia

AIDS Council of New South Wales (ACON), Tales from Another Closet: Personal Stories of Domestic Violence in Same-sex Relationships (2004).

This is a compilation of personal stories outlining the experiences of domestic violence in same sex relationships.

Ansara, Y. Gavriel, 'A Multidimensional and Inclusive Understanding of Gender-Based Family and Interpersonal Violence: Findings from the National LGBTI Health Alliance 2014 Investigation' (2015) 2 Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety Footprints 14.

In July and August 2014, the National LGBTI Health Alliance undertook a national consultation on the direct needs and concerns of LGBTI populations who had experienced violence in their family and interpersonal relationships. Consultees reported (among other things):

- Concerns about violent/homophobic family members were identified (p 15).
- Intersex people may be afraid to seek medical treatment due to their physical distinctions (p 15).
- Difficulty accessing 'women-only' and 'men-only' shelters (p 16).
- People with non-binary genders reported being threatened with loss of custody due to their genders (p 16).
- Women and men of trans experience reported being ridiculed and misgendered by police when reporting experiences of family and interpersonal violence (p 16).
- Lesbian women and gay men described how stereotypes about butch and femme gender presentation were used to deny appropriate help in response to intimate partner violence (p 16).
- Bisexual people of all genders described the invisibility and stigma they experienced when trying to report violence against them (p 16).
- People with intersex variations described having been coerced by medical professionals and biological relatives into unwanted 'normalising' medical interventions that caused irreversible damage. (p 16);

- Gay men, lesbian women, and bisexual people in mixed orientation marriages (i.e. marriages between a gay, lesbian, and bisexual person and a heterosexual person) reported being threatened by their spouses with ‘outing’ and loss of child custody (p 16).

Australian Institute of Health and Welfare, Family, domestic and sexual violence in Australia (Report, 2018).

This report usefully compiles and summarises current statistics on family violence, domestic violence and sexual violence from multiple sources. Its key points are:

- women are at greater risk of family, domestic and sexual violence;
- some groups of women are more vulnerable to all three types of violence (in particular, women who are Indigenous, young, pregnant, separating from a partner or experiencing financial hardship and women with disability);
- children are often exposed to the violence;
- the three types of violence are leading causes of homelessness and adverse health consequences for women and create significant financial cost; and
- family violence is worse for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people.

The report also identifies important gaps in the current research on family, domestic and sexual violence. No or limited data is available on:

- children’s experiences, including attitudes, prevalence, severity, frequency, impacts and outcomes of these forms of violence;
- specific at-risk population groups, including Indigenous Australians, people with disability, and lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) people, including those in same-sex relationships;
- the effect of known risk factors, such as socioeconomic status, employment, income and geographical location;
- services and responses that victims and perpetrators receive, including specialist services, mainstream services and police and justice responses;
- pathways, impacts and outcomes for victims and perpetrators; and
- the evaluation of programs and interventions.

Callan A, Corbally M, McElvaney R. A Scoping Review of Intimate Partner Violence as It Relates to the Experiences of Gay and Bisexual Men. Trauma Violence Abuse. 2021 Apr;22(2):233-248. PMID: 33205700

"Across studies, gay and bisexual men were observed to experience IPV similarly to heterosexual couples involving psychological, physical, and sexual violence. However…distinctive features of violence included sexual orientation outing, unprotected sexual intercourse, homophobia, internalized homophobia, and difficulties accessing minority men-focused services."

Campo, Monica and Sarah Tayton, 'Intimate Partner Violence in Lesbain, Gay, Bisexual, Trans, Intersex and Queer Communities' (Child Family Community Australia Practitioner Resource, December 2015).

This article discusses intimate partner violence in LGBTIQ relationships, and the ways in which the predominant focus on heteronormative understandings of abuse have resulted in under acknowledgement and misunderstandings of violence in LGBTIQ communities. Considerations relevant to perpetrators are discussed on p4, including the ways in which stereotypes about both men and women inhibit recognition of intimate partner violence in LGBTIQ relationships – i.e. 'In lesbian relationships involving physical violence, for instance, there may be the assumption that women are incapable of exerting physical power over other women. Similarly, stereotypes about gay men not being "masculine" might result in views that they are not capable of violence'. It emphasizes, as a result, the importance of identifying the perpetrator, particularly in the context of specific behaviours perpetrators in LGBTIQ relationships may engage in, such as presenting at victims as shelters (p5).

Cochrane, Brandy, 'Family Violence and the LGBTIQ Community' (Research Paper, Monash University, 2017).

This paper examines the LGBTIQ community's experiences of domestic and family violence (DFV). Generally, the LGBTIQ community experiences DFV at a similar, or slightly higher, rate compared to heterosexual people. However, lesbian women were more likely than gay men to report having been in an abusive relationship, and young LGBTIQ people are more likely to experience violence in their relationships than their heterosexual peers. There are also unique pressures that may affect LGBTIQ people in a DFV context:

- threats to 'out' a person;
- the use of gender to belittle the victim;
- homophobia experienced when accessing support services;
- fear that acknowledgement of DFV will contribute to homophobia;
- A lack of support from family;
- homelessness;
- an increased risk of HIV;
- loss of custody of children;
- viewing same-sex relationships through heterosexual stereotypes, which may prevent effective service provision; and
- mistrust of the police by LGBTIQ people.

Stereotypes and misconceptions about the LGBTIQ community and DFV can lead to issues and poor outcomes within the legal system, which highlights the need for greater awareness and understanding of these circumstances among legal professionals.

Constable, Annaliese, et al, One Size Does Not Fit All: Gap Analysis of NSW Domestic Violence Support Services in Relation to Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex Communities' Needs (AIDS Council of New South Wales (ACON), 2011).

This research paper reports on the results of a study drawing on 65 service providers' responses to a survey and interviews with 9 community members who were interviewed about their experiences of service provision resulting from domestic violence in a same sex relationship. It reports that negative experiences included being referred for sexual reorientation instead of domestic violence support, the lack of appropriate accommodation and other support services for men, and having to deal with the prejudices of mainstream service providers regarding men seeking support in relation to same sex domestic violence.

Fileborn, Bianca, 'Sexual Violence and Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Trans, Intersex, and Queer Communities' (Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Resource Sheet, Australian Institute of Family Studies, March 2012).

This paper provides a review of current research into sexual violence in LGBTIQ communities. It provides definitions of 'biological sex' and 'gender identity'. There is a section on intimate partner violence (pp5-6). Research suggests that rates of intimate partner violence in LGBTIQ are similar to those in heterosexual communities. Notably, research suggests that in cases of intimate partner sexual abuse, the abusive partner may exploit broader issues around homophobia and heterosexism as a mechanism to prevent the victim/survivor from disclosing the abuse.

Henry, Nicola, Asher Flynn and Anastasia Powell, Image-based sexual abuse: Victims and perpetrators (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 572 March 2019).

Report abstract:

Image-based sexual abuse (IBSA) refers to the non-consensual creation, distribution or threatened distribution of nude or sexual images. This research examines the prevalence, nature and impacts of IBSA victimisation and perpetration in Australia. This form of abuse was found to be relatively common among respondents surveyed and to disproportionately affect Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, people with a disability, homosexual and bisexual people and young people. The nature of victimisation and perpetration was found to differ by gender, with males more likely to perpetrate IBSA, and females more likely to be victimised by a partner or ex-partner.

Mitra-Kahn, Trishima, Carolyn Newbigin and Sophie Hardefeldt, Invisible women, invisible violence: Understanding and improving data on the experiences of domestic and family violence and sexual assault for diverse groups of women: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2016).

In relation to lesbian, gay, bi-sexual, transgender, intersex and queer women, the paper provides an overview of the existing research at pp.27-30. Key findings include that, '[t]here is limited data on the prevalence of domestic and family violence and sexual assault for lesbian, gay, bi-sexual, transgender/trans*, intersex and queer (LGBTIQ) women in Australia. Similarly, there is very little quantitative or qualitative research on domestic and family violence and sexual assault for LGBTIQ women in Australia or internationally. Of the studies analysed, a consistent finding is that LGBTIQ victims-survivors of domestic violence rarely seek support, information or advice on the abuse and violence they experienced and report struggling with identifying that what they were experiencing was domestic violence' (p.30).

Rosenstriech, Gabi, LGBTI People Mental Health and Suicide (National LGBTI Health Alliance, 2nd revised ed, 2013).

This report is focused on mental ill-health and suicidality in LGBTI communities. It is noted that there is an elevated risk of mental ill-health and suicidality in these communities due to discrimination and exclusion (p4).

Soldatic, K. et al., (2023). Indigenous LGBTIQSB+ People's Experience of Family violence in Australia. Journal of Family Violence, online first, doi: 10.1007/s10896-023-00539-1

Based on 16 interviews with Indigenous LGBTIQSB+ people in the state of New South Wales, Australia. This article explores the social and emotional wellbeing of Indigenous LGBTIQSB+ young people living in New South Wales. The findings 'demonstrate the intersectional nature of family violence highlighting the fact that Indigenous LGBTIQSB+ young people are integral parts of extended kinship networks, families and communities and are deeply impacted by any acts of family violence.'

Note LGBTIQSB+: Lesbian, gay, Bisexual, trans, Intersex, Queer, Sistergirl, Brotherboy, Plus.

The article concludes:

> Participants' stories spoke of family and community violence that focused on intimidation, bullying and threats of violence. These kinds of behaviours were at times aimed at making the young person feel uncomfortable, to feel unwanted, invisible, excluded and even to force them to change their 'lifestyles' or at least shape their behaviours so that their gender and sexuality diversity were kept hidden. Even though participants spoke about how they successfully negotiated these events, LGBTIQ + phobic and racist behaviours also caused feelings of isolation, distress, a feeling of invisibility, lack of worth and exclusion.
>
> LGBTIQSB + young people reported significant amounts of violence from communities, some related to their gen- der and sexuality diversity and other behaviours related to perceptions about their Indigeneity. LGBTIQSB+-phobia in Indigenous families and communities was reported more within extended families, older generations and rural or remote communities. Negative interactions and attitudes from Indigenous families and communities are significant given the importance of culture, family, and community for Indigenous people. These are still central to young Indigenous LGBTIQSB + lives with participants speaking about the heart break of not being able to go home to Country to visit grandparents and Elders in rural and remote communities. (p11).

Szalacha, Laura A et al, 'Mental Health, Sexual Identity, and Interpersonal Violence: Findings from the Australian Longitudinal Women's Health Study' (2017) 17(94) BMC Women's Health (online).

This study investigates the linkages between interpersonal violence, mental health, and sexual identity (pp 2-3). The results indicate that:

- Compared to exclusively heterosexual women, mainly heterosexual and bisexual women were significantly more likely to report physical, sexual, and emotional abuse (p 4);
- Mainly heterosexual and lesbian women were more likely to report severe physical abuse (p 4);
- Mainly heterosexual women were more than three times as likely to have been in a violent relationship in the past three years (p 4);
- All sexual minorities were two to three times as likely to have experienced harassment (p 4);
- Bisexual women reported significantly higher levels of depression and scored lower on mental health than did exclusively heterosexual women (pp 6, 7);
- Interpersonal violence strongly predicted poorer mental health for lesbian and bisexual women (p 6);
- Mental health indicators were similar for exclusively heterosexual and sexual minority women who did not report interpersonal violence (pp 6, 7);
- Experiencing multiple types of interpersonal violence was the strongest predictor of stress, anxiety and depression (p 6).

Interpersonal violence is a significant contributor to mental health disparities for women, particularly for those belonging to sexual minorities (pp 7-8).

Ussher, J. et al. Crossing the line: Lived experience of sexual violence among trans women from Culturally and Linguistically Diverse backgrounds in Australia (2020) Sydney: ANROWS

The key findings of this study are that:

- There are positive implications for trans women's overall health and wellbeing when trans women feel included and accepted;
- Trans women of colour from CALD backgrounds, as well as women who identify as lesbian, bisexual or queer, may experience additional prejudice and discrimination due to the intersection of gender, sexuality, social class, race and religion;
- Support in gender transitioning, through facilitation of access to hormone therapy, reduces the risk of transphobic violence; and
- CALD trans women's experiences of gender-based sexual violence are comparable with those of non-CALD trans women and cisgender women, however trans women also experience transphobic violence.

The study's recommendations are to:

- Conduct further awareness-raising and education for healthcare providers, legislators, police and policymakers, as well as the general public, in relation to transgender experience and gender transitioning;
- Challenge societal attitudes which support, condone or trivialise sexual violence against women, including violence against trans women; and
- Ensure policy and practice documents and clinical guidelines use language that is inclusive of gender and sexuality diversity when discussing sexual violence against women.

International

Donovan, Catherine and Rebecca Barnes, 'Help-Seeking among Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and/or Transgender Victims/Survivors of Domestic Violence and Abuse: The Impacts of Cisgendered Heteronormativity and Invisibility' (2019) 56(4) Journal of Sociology 554-570 doi: 10.1177/1440783319882088

Despite growing research into domestic violence and abuse in lesbian, gay, bisexual and/or trans ('LGBT') people's relationships, LGBT people remain largely invisible in domestic violence and abuse policy and practice. Research evidence indicates that they primarily seek help from privatised sources such as counsellors/therapists and friends. The gap in knowledge about LGBT victims/survivors' help-seeking reflects and reinforces the success of neoliberal trends in privatising social problems by promoting self-care and individual responsibility. Using qualitative data from a mixed-methods UK study, this article offers an ecological analysis of LGBT victims/survivors' help-seeking decisions and barriers, demonstrating how cisgendered heteronormativity and LGBT invisibility permeate help-seeking at individual, interpersonal and socio-cultural levels. The conclusion argues for LGBT domestic violence and abuse to be recognised as a social problem rather than a private trouble. Recommendations are offered for necessary steps towards better recognising and supporting LGBT victims/survivors.

Henry RS, Perrin PB, Coston BM, Calton JM. Intimate Partner Violence and Mental Health Among Transgender/Gender Nonconforming Adults. J Interpers Violence. 2021 Apr; 36(7-8):3374-3399.

Abstract: There is significant evidence to suggest that intimate partner violence (IPV) is associated with mental health problems including anxiety and depression. However, this research has almost exclusively been conducted through heteronormative and cisgender lenses. The current study is an exploratory, quantitative analysis of the relationship between experiences of IPV and mental health among transgender/gender nonconforming (TGNC) adults. A national sample of 78 TGNC individuals completed a survey online measuring participants' experiences with IPV and depression, anxiety, and satisfaction with life. Of the sample, 72% reported at least one form of IPV victimization in their lifetime: 32% reported experiencing sexual IPV, 71% psychological IPV, 42% physical IPV, and 29% IPV assault with injury. All four types of IPV were positively associated with anxiety, and all but physical abuse was significantly associated with depression. None of the four types of IPV was associated with satisfaction with life. In a canonical correlation, IPV victimization and mental health had 31% overlapping variance, a large-sized effect. Sexual IPV and anxiety were the highest loading variables, suggesting that TGNC individuals who have experienced sexual IPV specifically tended to have higher levels of anxiety. These findings support previous qualitative, small-sample studies suggesting that IPV is a pervasive problem in the TGNC community. TGNC individuals who have experienced IPV may be at increased risk for mental health problems, and therefore, IPV history may trigger appropriate mental health screenings and referrals for this population in health care settings.

Jackson, A. et al., (2022) Prevalence and correlates of Violence experienced by Trans women. Journal of Women's Health, 31 (5), 648-655, doi: 10.1089/jwh.2021.0559

This research measured the prevalence and correlates of intimate partner, physical, and sexual violence experienced by trans women. A National HIV Behavioral Surveillance (NHBS) Study of 201 trans women was conducted in San Francisco from July 2019 to February 2020. Among 201 trans women interviewed, 26.9% were currently homeless. In the past year, 59.7% had been homeless, 34.3% changed housing, 60.7% had a housing situation other than renting or owning. Experiences of violence were common: 36.8% experienced any form of violence, including sexual (16.9%), intimate partner (14.9%), and other physical (25.4%) in the past year. Experiences of violence were significantly associated with multiple measures of housing insecurity. Younger age, being misgendered, and substance use were also associated with experiences of violence.

King, K. et al., Transgender Individuals and Psychological Intimate Partner Violence: a National Study (2022) 37 Journal of Family Violence 289-300 doi: 10.1007/s10896-020-00219-4

This American study examined associations among Intimate Partner Violence (IPV), demographics, sex work, and substance use in a national sample of transgender individuals. National data from the 2015 Transgender Survey (n = 27,715) was analyzed. Results indicated that nearly half (48.3%) of transgender individuals had experienced IPV in their lifetime. Lifetime IPV differed significantly based on demographics, sex work and substance use. Individuals at highest risk for lifetime IPV were those who self-identified as a trans man, were 25–64 years old, were Native American/Alaskan Native or Middle-Eastern/North African, had some college or less, had an annual income of $1–$24,999, had been part of a religious/spiritual community, had engaged in sex work and had used substances.

Messing, JT, Thomas, KA, Ward-Lasher, AL & Brewer, NQ 2021, 'A Comparison of Intimate Partner Violence Strangulation Between Same-Sex and Different-Sex Couples', Journal of Interpersonal Violence, vol. 36, no. 5/6, pp. 2887–2905.

US based study. Abstract: Strangulation is a common and dangerous form of intimate partner violence (IPV). Nonfatal strangulation is a risk factor for homicide; can lead to severe, long-term physical and mental health sequelae; and can be an effective strategy of coercion and control. To date, research has not examined strangulation within same-sex couples. The objective of this cross-sectional, observational research is to identify whether and to what extent the detection of strangulation and coercive control differs between same-sex and different-sex couples in police reports of IPV. Data (n = 2,207) were obtained from a single police department in the southwest United States (2011-2013). Bivariate analyses examined differences in victim and offender demographics, victim injury, violence, and coercive controlling behaviours between same-sex (male-male and female-female) and different-sex couples (female victim-male offender). Logistic regression was used to examine associations between strangulation, victim and offender demographics, coercive controlling behaviours, and couple configuration. Strangulation was reported significantly more often in different-sex (9.8%) than in female and male same-sex couple cases (5.2% and 5.3%, respectively; p <.05). Injury, however, was reported more frequently in same-sex than in different-sex couples (p <.05). Couple configuration (p <.05), coercive control (p <.05), and injury (p <.05) significantly predict strangulation. Findings suggest that nonfatal strangulation occurs within at least a minority of same-sex couples; it is possible that underdetection by law enforcement makes it appear less common than it actually is. Regardless of couple configuration, timely identification of strangulation and subsequent referral to medical and social service providers is essential for preventing repeated strangulation, life-threatening injury, and the long-term health effects of strangulation.

Sarah M. Peitzmeier et al. “Intimate Partner Violence in Transgender Populations: Systematic Review and Meta-analysis of Prevalence and Correlates”, American Journal of Public Health 110, no. 9 (September 1, 2020): pp. e1-e14.

Abstract:

Authors’ Conclusions: Transgender individuals experience a dramatically higher prevalence of IPV victimization compared with cisgender individuals, regardless of sex assigned at birth. IPV prevalence estimates are comparably high for assigned-male-sex-at-birth and assigned-female-sex-at-birth transgender individuals, and for binary and nonbinary transgender individuals, though more research is needed.

Public Health Implications: Evidence-based interventions are urgently needed to prevent and address IPV in this high-risk population with unique needs. Lack of legal protections against discrimination in employment, housing, and social services likely foster vulnerability to IPV. Transgender individuals should be explicitly included in US Preventive Services Task Force recommendations promoting IPV screening in primary care settings. Interventions at the policy level as well as the interpersonal and individual level are urgently needed to address epidemic levels of IPV in this marginalized, high-risk population.

Rollè, Luca, Giardina, Giulia, Caldarera, Angela, Gerino, Eva, and Piera Brustia, 'When Intimate Partner Violence Meets Same Sex Couples: A Review of Same Sex Intimate Partner Violence' (2018) 9 Frontiers in Psychology 1-13.

The paper conducts a literature review on intimate partner violence (IPV) occurring in same sex couples. The authors aimed to provide an overview of the psychological literature on lesbian, gay and bisexual (LGB) IPV (specifically focusing on interventions for both victims and perpetrators), and to propose recommendations for future directions in research for LGB-oriented psychological and community services in relation to IPV. Despite the long-standing perception that IPV is an issue exclusive to heterosexual relationships, many studies have found the existence of IPV among lesbian and gay couples. Whilst there are similarities between heterosexual and LGB IPV, there are unique features specific to LGB IPV. Such features mainly relate to identification and treatment of LGB IPV in the community and to the importance of considering the role of sexual minority stressors. The authors found that there were minimal studies that address LGB individuals involved in IPV due to the silence that has existed around violence in the LGB community. The authors identify and review the principal themes discussed in the published studies, and conclude that it is important to create a free and open forum to discuss this issue, both by LGB and heterosexual people. Interventions for LGB IPV victims and perpetrators should be included in an integrate and complete treatment plan that should be adapted to the specific situation.

Woodyatt, Cory and Rob Stephenson, 'Emotional intimate partner violence experienced by men in same-sex relationships' (2016) 18(10) Culture, Health and Sexuality 1137-1149.

This US study is the first to examine the types, antecedents and experiences of emotional intimate partner violence ('IPV') that occur between male partners (p 1145). The study conducted 10 focus group discussions with gay and bisexual men (n = 64 participants) (p 1140). The study found that gay and bisexual men perceive emotional IPV to be commonplace and the 'most threatening form of intimate partner violence' (p 1144-6). The participants identified the most common antecedents to be jealousy, power differentials, and internalised homophobia (p 1143). The descriptions of emotional IPV in male-male relationships is similar to male-female relationships, but some coercive behaviours manifest differently (p 1145). For example, threatening to disclose a partner's sexual identity was identified as an example of emotional violence and coercive control (p 1145).

People who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer + - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 8 discusses a range of issues affecting lesbians, gay men and bisexuals and their experience of court processes. Section 9 discusses a range of issues affecting gender diverse people and people born with diverse sex characteristics, and their experience of court processes.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

Chapter 15 provides a discussion of sexuality and gender identity. It includes a discussion of issues of discrimination and legal recognition of relationships. In Part III, there is a brief overview of domestic violence in gay and lesbian relationships (pp.189-190). It notes that: ‘As with any other relationship, people in same-sex relationships can be victims of domestic violence. Indeed, the problem of domestic violence may be exacerbated in such relationships due to reduced understanding of the problem in the wider community and the limited availability of specialised support services. Many of the reasons for victims of domestic violence not leaving abusive relationships canvassed in the previous Chapter remain relevant here’.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.9 discusses the nature and prevalence of family violence within same-sex relationships, as well as some of the barriers gay, lesbian, bisexual transsexual, transgender and inter-sex people experience when reporting same-sex partner abuse.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2022).

Chapter 12A provides a discussion of ‘Diverse sexuality: lesbian, gay and bisexual people and people with other diverse sexualities’. It includes relevant statistics, legal recognition (of relationship and age of consent) and explanations of terminology. At 12A.2 common misconceptions are overviewed. At 12A.5 practical matters are dealt with, including appropriate mode of address, gender reference etc.

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Being in a same sex relationship is acknowledged to be a risk factor for experiencing domestic violence (Sections 4.2, 8.8.3), which may require ‘special screening and assessment protocols’ (Section 18.2.3.4.1). Further, Section 19.9.2 recognises that ‘[r]esearch on domestic violence in gay, lesbian, bi-sexual intimate relationships is voluminous, growing and evolving. At the moment there are unsettled controversies in this research. While many argue and present data demonstrating that the dynamics of domestic violence are essentially the same in all intimate relationships, others argue that the power dynamics are somewhat different when intimate partners are of the same or altered sex. Most important in terms of the legal system, however, is understanding how domestic violators may use a targeted person's sexual orientation to isolate, to manipulate, to intimidate and threaten, to restrict access to services. It is important to appreciate the extra effort and courage required to leave these relationships. Disclosure of partnership status can lead to yet more social isolation. Family and community support may be lacking; furthermore many of the domestic violence support services have been designed with heterosexual couples in mind.’

People who are lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, intersex and queer + - Other Resources

Campo, Monica and Jessica Smart, 'LGBTIQ+ Communities: Glossary of Common Terms' (CFCA Resource Sheet, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2017).

This glossary is designed to help service providers create a safe environment for LGBTIQ+ people. The glossary deals with the following terms about bodies, gender and gender identities, sexual orientations, and social attitudes and issues

Bodies, gender and gender identities

- Sex: determined by biological characteristics. Sex is assigned male or female at birth. However, some people are born intersex, or their sex may change over time.
- Intersex: people who have biological characteristics different from conventional understandings of males or females. They may identify as a man, woman, or non-binary.
- Gender: determined by social circumstances. People are expected to behave as masculine or feminine, depending on their sex. However, some do not fit into these rigid norms.
- Gender identity: one's sense of self as a man or a woman, masculine or feminine, or in between. Some people move between or outside of the gender binary.
- Gender binary: classification of gender into men or women, based on biological sex.
- Transgender/Trans/Gender diverse: people whose assigned sex at birth does not match internal gender identity. Trans people may or may not change dress, legal status or medical treatment. They may adopt different pronouns – see misgendering below.
- Cisgender/cis: people's whose assigned sex at birth corresponds to their gender identity.
- Gender questioning: people who are unsure which gender they belong to.
- Sistergirl/Brotherboy: terms for transgender people within some ATSI communities. Sistergirls are Indigenous women who were classified male at birth. Brotherboys are Indigenous people who live as males.

Sexual orientations

Note that these categories are not exhaustive.

- Lesbian: identifies as a woman and is attracted to other people who identify as women. Using the language ‘identifying as a woman’, rather than ‘woman’, is designed to include trans people, who may not biologically be women.
- Gay: identifies as a man and is attracted to other people who identify as men.
- Bisexual: attracted to both men and women.
- Pansexual: attracted to any person, regardless of gender identity.
- Asexual: does not experience sexual attraction. May experience romantic attraction.
- Heterosexual: attracted to the opposite gender.
- Queer: describes full range of LGBTIQ+ identities. Once a derogatory term, has now been reclaimed.

Social attitudes/issues

- Homophobia/biphobia: negative beliefs, prejudices and stereotypes about people who are not heterosexual.
- Transphobia: negative beliefs, prejudices and stereotypes about people who are transgender and gender diverse.
- Heterosexism: privileging heterosexuality and cisgendered identity over other identities.
- Heteronormativity: belief that heterosexual relationships are the only normal relationships.
- Homonormativity: privileging certain people within the queer community (usually cisgendered, white, gay men) over other identities.
- Cisnormativity: assuming that everyone is cisgendered and that all people will continue to identify with the gender they were assigned at birth.
- Misgendering: describing a person using language that does not match their gender identity. This can be harmful to trans people. It is best to ask what words the person would like to use.

Victorian pride centre. (Website 2023).

Assists LGBTIQ+ clients across Victoria with legal issues including discrimination, unfair dismissal, change of name/gender, Centrelink and NDIS appeals, criminal law, family violence and evictions.

Inner City Legal Centre (Kings Cross, NSW), Safe Relationships Project – Domestic Violence Court Assistance.

The aim of the Safe Relationships Project (SRP) is to provide men and women who are experiencing domestic violence in same sex relationships with support, advocacy, referral and information.

The Safe Relationships Project can assist clients in accessing legal representation and to apply for Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders (ADVO) or Apprehended Personal Violence Orders (APVO) to help put an end to the violence they are experiencing.

This is available to ensure that a person's right to safety is protected through the legal process no matter what their sexual orientation is.

- Queer without Fear - domestic and family violence in lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) relationships.

International

New Zealand

Hohou Te Rongo Kahukura - Outing Violence, 'Power and control wheel for rainbow relationships' (2017)

The power and control wheel for rainbow relationships, adapted from the Duluth model, describes the kinds of violence which 'rainbow' community members experience inside Rainbow relationships. A Rainbow relationship is defined as any relationship where at least one person identifies under the sex, sexuality and general diversity umbrellas. Power and control is at the core of the wheel, and is surrounded by various different behaviours utilised by abusive partners to maintain power and control. This includes use of: children; intimidation, coercion and threats; economic abuse; isolation; internalised homophobia, biphobia or transphobia; denying, minimising and blaming; emotional abuse; and white, cis and other privilege.

People with poor literacy skills

New migrants and refugees may experience language and literacy barriers when they are unable to access information in the manner and form they need to feel informed and confident to seek help or legal redress for domestic and family violence. Also, research demonstrates that literacy levels among adult Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people are significantly lower than those for other Australians [Eady et al 2010]. People with a low level of education, poor literacy in their first language, or cognitive disability may also experience these barriers. A victim in these circumstances may delay taking any action and may, over time, become more vulnerable to further violence.

There is a range of challenges service providers face in ensuring that clients with poor literacy and language skills are, and feel, properly supported in their engagement with police and court processes, and in securing their housing, financial and other needs. Some of these challenges may include:

- Accessing and engaging interpreters who are trained in the client's particular language or dialect, independent of the parties involved, gender appropriate, and sensitive to the complex issues related to domestic and family abuse [WLS NSW 2007]
- Translating legal and specialised terms into a language where those terms have no equivalent usage
- Providing critical information in oral, visual and pictorial formats where the client's literacy is not sufficient to comprehend a written translation [Allimant & Ostapiej-Piatkowski 2011]
- Cautioning against the use of the client's children, friends or partners as interpreters
- Ensuring the client's confidentiality and privacy
- Offering interpreting and translation services that are affordable and able to deliver on time according to court schedules
- Providing additional resources to assist clients with practicalities requiring literacy and language skills, for example understanding and completing court and government agency forms, directives and orders.

People with poor literacy skills - Key Literature

Australia

Allimant, Annabelle, and Beata Ostapiej-Piatkowski, 'Supporting Women from CALD Backgrounds Who are Victim/Survivors of Sexual Violence: Challenges and Opportunities for Practitioners' (Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault Wrap No 9, Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2011).

This review of the literature is primarily aimed at support workers who work with people from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) backgrounds. Importantly the review notes that service providers should be aware that: 'In relation to written information, it is recommended that services are mindful that: literacy levels of many women from CALD backgrounds are limited in both English and their own language' (p12).

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), (2013) Programme for the International Assessment of Adult Competencies, Australia: Statistics about the competencies of Australians in the domains of literacy, numeracy and problem solving skills in technology-rich environments.

"For literacy and numeracy, proficiency scores have been grouped into six skill levels with Below Level 1 being the lowest level and Level 5 the highest……

Around 3.7% (620,000) of Australians aged 15 to 74 years had literacy skills at Below Level 1, a further 10% (1.7 million) at Level 1, 30% (5.0 million) at Level 2, 38% (6.3 million) at Level 3, 14% (2.4 million) at Level 4, and 1.2% (200,000) at Level 5."

In the ABS article titled "Young women lag behind young men on numeracy skills, but perform well on literacy" released 9/10/2013 referring to the data collected in this survey ABS Director Myles Burleigh observed: "The higher the level, the better your skills, so Level 2 represents higher skill levels than Level 1, and so on. Level 3 or above for literacy and numeracy represents relatively advanced skills."

Dimopoulos, Maria, 'Implementing Legal Empowerment Strategies to Prevent Domestic Violence in New and Emerging Communities' (Issues Paper 20, Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2010).

This comprehensive literature review examines CALD communities in Australia and occurrences of Domestic and Family Violence within CALD communities. The paper emphasises the lack of fluency and literacy in English as barriers to accessing justice for recent migrants and notes limited awareness of family and domestic violence laws. The researcher also identifies lack of literacy, including in the immigrant's mother tongue (p6); and notes that where there are low levels of literacy, translation of written legal information is not enough (p7). The author also notes that oral traditions in some communities may guide how communication takes place (p7).

Eady, Michelle, Anthony Herrington, and Caroline Jones, 'Literacy Practitioners' Perspectives on Adult Learning Needs and Technology Approaches in Indigenous Communities' (2010) 50 (2) Australian Journal of Adult Learning 260-286.

Current reports of literacy rates in Australia indicate an ongoing gap in literacy skills between Indigenous and non-Indigenous Australian adults, at a time when the literacy demands of work and life are increasing. There are many perspectives on what are the literacy needs of Indigenous adults, from the perspectives of community members themselves to the relatively under researched perspective of literacy practitioners. This paper provides the insights, experiences and recommendations from adult literacy practitioners who work with adult Indigenous learners in communities across Australia.

The results of recent rounds of the Program for International Student Assessment (PISA) point out the continuing over-representation of Indigenous 15 year olds among Australian 15 year olds with the lowest literacy levels. The PISA data also point to the importance of taking into account socioeconomic status and home location in understanding educational attainment among young Indigenous adults in Australia. As noted by Masters (2007) in his analysis of the 2006 PISA results, "approximately 40 per cent of Indigenous students, 26 per cent of students living in remote parts of Australia and 23 per cent of students from the lowest socioeconomic quartile are considered by the OECD to be 'at risk'."

The gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous adults in Australia, in educational attainment and in literacy, is lived out within contexts that lack appropriate employment and training opportunities for many Indigenous people.

Women's Legal Services NSW, A Long Way to Equal, An Update of Quarter Way to Equal: A Report on Barriers to Access to Legal Services for Migrant Women (July 2007).

The report considers barriers faced by migrant and refugee women in accessing legal services. The report draws on information collected in focus groups: 5 focus groups involving 60 migrant and refugee women; and consultations with 9 community legal service representatives and 12 migrant service providers. The research showed serious and systemic issues with regard to access to interpreters, especially female interpreters and especially for emerging communities. The report identified that the low levels of literacy among migrant and refugee women in their first language features consistently as a barrier to accessing information about the Australian legal system and where to gain legal assistance (p32). This means that even where there is written material available in the person's language the person still may be unable to read it.

People with poor literacy skills - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 1 notes that 15% of the NSW population whose first language is English have very poor literacy skills. Section 5 notes that approx 17-18% of Australians aged 15-74 have very poor English prose and document literacy skills, and for those with English as a second language it is 34%.The section also notes that although not generally counted as a disability by people with disabilities, poor literacy skills are dealt with in Section 5 as they can often be managed using some of the communication skills techniques listed in 5.4.3. Section 10.1 notes that some of the difficulties that may be faced by self-represented parties include their inability to fully understand legal language and the complexities of relevant legislation and case law.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

Chapter 12 on Self-represented Litigants notes that: ‘Access to electronic information still depends on an SRL’s knowledge of the existence of these sources and capacity to utilise them effectively. Some SRLs who are vulnerable or disadvantaged may lack the resources, knowledge or skills necessary both to locate and use a computer to obtain such information, or systems may not be set up to enable them to do so. These people may include older persons, people with low levels of formal education and literacy, people living in some institutions (including prisons) and people with sensory disabilities’ (p.137).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.6.4 notes that language and literacy issues, a lack of knowledge of Australian law and available services, and poor interpreting services are among a range of barriers inhibiting the ability of people from CALD backgrounds to access the family violence system.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Notes at [8.3.4] “The adversarial system is particularly difficult for people for whom English is a second language, who do not speak English or who have poor or minimal literacy skills. This can be exacerbated if litigants are also unrepresented.”

People with poor literacy skills - Other Resources

Communication barriers and family violence: Fact sheet (ANROWS 2016)

This fact sheet summarises the ASPIRE Project findings about the impact of communication barriers on women's experiences of family violence.

[Former] Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Reconciliation Action Plan 2019 – 2021.

"This RAP provides a platform to introduce practical measures to promote reconciliation, and addresses some of the barriers faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. It also prioritises establishing relationships with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and community leaders, agencies servicing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, legal services and other stakeholders, in order to assist Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples to access the Court."

Interpreters and family violence: Fact Sheet (ANROWS 2016)

This fact sheet summarises the ASPIRE Project findings about the impact of interpreting issues on women's experiences of family violence.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Migrant and Refugee Women's Experience of the Courts (A report for the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity), (2015).

See the Executive Summary (p6-9) which makes a number of recommendations.

Identifies communication barriers: Working with interpreters:

- Lack of clarity about who is responsible for engaging an interpreter;
- Failure to assess the need for an interpreter, or incorrectly assessing need;
- The skill of interpreters being engaged;
- Lack of awareness amongst judicial officers and lawyers about how to work with interpreters;
- Engaging interpreters who are inappropriate in the circumstances; and

- Unethical and poor professional conduct by interpreters.

Law Society Northern Territory, Indigenous Protocols for Lawyers (second edition, 2015).

This handbook is written for lawyers and identifies and discusses six protocols to assist lawyers in communicating with their clients. See p5 which sets out the six protocols. The remaining part of the document discusses these protocols in depth.

Protocol 1:	Assess whether an interpreter is needed before proceeding to take instructions.
Protocol 2:	Engage the services of a registered, accredited interpreter through the Aboriginal Interpreter Service.
Protocol 3:	Explain your role to the client.
Protocol 4:	Explain the relevant legal or court process to the client prior to taking instructions.
Protocol 5:	Use 'plain English' to the greatest extent possible.
Protocol 6:	Assess whether your client has a hearing or other impairment that may affect their ability to understand

National Accreditation Authority for Translators and Interpreters, 'Certification Tests'.

Summarises the various levels of NAATI accreditation, including what the accreditation enables interpreters and translators to do.

Department of Immigration and Border Protection, 'Working with TIS National Interpreters'.

This webpage has some general tips on how to make interpreting as effective as possible (including who to address, what language to use).

Australian Institute of Interpreters and Translators (AUSIT) Code of Ethics (November 2012).

Sets the standards for ethical conduct of interpreters and translators in Australia and New Zealand.

People with poor literacy skills - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Sara

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators

Adult victims of domestic and family violence (primary victims) may be accused of perpetrating domestic and family violence or (other) criminal or unlawful acts, and misidentified by the criminal justice system as the primary aggressor. Primary victims of domestic and family violence may: [Transforming legal understandings of intimate partner violence: Final report]

(This is not an exhaustive list)

- offend because their abusive partner has demanded that they do so;
- offend in response to a dangerous situation (for example sudden and unexpected homelessness) that has arisen as a result of violence perpetrated against them;
- use physical violence to resist violence and/or defend themselves and/or their children;
- use retaliatory aggression after experiencing a build-up of abusive behaviours;
- assist or encourage their violent partner or family member to offend because it may be unsafe for them to do otherwise;
- claim Work and Income support that they are not entitled to because they are coerced to do so, or in order to pay for rent and food when their abusive partner refuses to financially support them and their children and/or undermines their own capacity to provide that support; [Domestic violence, social security and the couple rule]
- commit neonaticide, kill or harm their children whilst in a state of extreme trauma or dissociation as a result of their experience as a victim of domestic and family violence;
- know that their partner is also abusing their children but be unable to stop them from doing so;
- be impeded in their ability to parent because they are suffering from trauma or other mental health issues as a result of their partner's violence;
- offend in order to spend time in prison as a break from the violence;
- be named as the respondent or cross-applicant in protection order proceedings; [Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW]
- behave in a manner perceived as obstructive by family courts and/or breach family court orders in an attempt to keep their children safe from a violent former partner;

- appear agitated or uncooperative with first responders based on prior negative experiences, whereas perpetrators may present as calmer, more cooperative and more convincing, often in a deliberate attempt to persuade others that they are not abusive.
- breach sentence conditions for offending (for example, shoplifting) because of their circumstances and experience as a victim of domestic and family violence, sometimes with the consequence that these are escalated to higher-tariff sentences;
- be spuriously reported for child abuse or domestic abuse because of systems abuse.

In understanding a primary victim's presentation, behaviour and constraints, it may be appropriate for the decision-maker to consider:

- the abuser's pattern of coercive and controlling behaviour, the true nature of which may appear benign to others;
- the realistic safety options available to the primary victim; and
- the broader structural inequalities that limit available options for the primary victim.

This combination of factors is sometimes referred to as 'social entrapment'. [Transforming legal understandings of intimate partner violence: Final report]

The impact of trauma on victims of abuse may also influence presentation and behaviour of a primary victim. [FCA 2013]

In some cases it may be useful and appropriate to hear expert evidence about these factors.

Some primary victims may not be able to safety separate from an abusive partner given the level of risk and/or resources available to them.

Some concepts like "Battered Woman Syndrome" do not take into account the safety options available to the primary victim or the structural inequalities faced.

Decision-makers may perceive primary perpetrators of domestic and family violence as victims when only the immediate circumstances of alleged domestic and family violence or (other) offending are considered.

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators - Key Literature

Australia

Bartels, Lorana, Violent offending by and against Indigenous women. (2012) 8(1) Indigenous Law Bulletin 19-22.

The author examines the relationship between violent offending by Indigenous women and their victimisation, observing that most Indigenous women who violently offend are themselves victims of violence. Indigenous women violent offenders are also overrepresented in prison populations to a greater extent compared with the general female prisoner population and also to a greater extent than the Indigenous male violent offender prisoner population is compared with the general male prisoner population. Greater study of the relationship between Indigenous women's victimisation and violent offending is recommended.

Boxall, Hayley, Christopher Dowling and Anthony Morgan, Female perpetrated domestic violence: Prevalence of self-defensive and retaliatory violence. Trends and Issues No. 584, January 2020, Australian Institute of Criminology.

This article examined the prevalence of self-defensive and retaliatory violence in incidents where women were identified as persons of interest (POIs) in investigated domestic violence reports. As compared to male POIs female POIs were more likely to be historically recorded victims of violence by a domestic partner. Half of reported female domestic violence episodes involved violent resistance. 20% of episodes were directly preceded by a tipping point involving abusive actions or intimidation by their male partner. 33% had previously been the victim of their current male partner based on police data. Indigenous women were more likely to have engaged in violent resistance than non-Indigenous women and also more likely than non-Indigenous women to still be in a relationship with the reported victim, while those continuing relationships were often unstable.

Domestic and Family Violence Death Review and Advisory Board, 2019–20 Annual Report (2020) Queensland Government, Brisbane.

Extract: Domestic and family violence death review processes are a key component of a robust service system response to domestic and family violence. They function for the purposes of learning from such tragedies and aim to improve systems, services and practices in the hopes of preventing future deaths from occurring. Accordingly, the Board is established under section 91A of the Coroners Act 2003 to:

- identify preventative measures to reduce the likelihood of domestic and family violence deaths in Queensland;
- increase recognition of the impact of, and circumstances surrounding, domestic and family violence and gain a greater understanding of the context in which these types of deaths occur; and
- make recommendations to the Attorney-General for implementation by government and non-government entities to prevent or reduce the likelihood of domestic and family violence deaths.

During the 2019-20 reporting period, the Board completed in-depth systemic reviews into five cases involving seven deaths. Based on its discussion of these cases, the Board released two systemic reports of the intimate partner homicides of ‘Jack’ and ‘George’.

In both cases the female victim of domestic and family violence killed her male intimate partner in the context of domestic and family violence perpetrated primarily by the deceased. The Board decided to release its findings in these cases due to the compelling themes identified upon its review. Both cases highlight the impact of cumulative trauma and victimisation experienced by women that can persist throughout their life course and the issues experienced by women who may not present as the ‘ideal victim’, a concept that is explored further in Chapter 3.

In addition, the Board identified a need for services to improve their understanding of the patterns of behaviour used by perpetrators of domestic and family violence to avoid detection and accountability for their violence. These findings are not new and have been consistently been made by the Board in prior Annual Reports. In this year of operation, the Board sought to extend and reflect upon its prior findings and recommendations as it remains clear that more needs to be done.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, ‘Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications For Domestic Violence Protection Orders’ (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article reviews cross-applications and orders in Queensland’s courts (2008-2010). It identifies concerns around the misuse of DVPOs for vindictive, strategic or tactical reasons (pp58; 60-62). Tactics include cross-orders being used to pressure the other party to mutually withdraw their application (p86).

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, The domestic violence protection order system as entry to the criminal justice system for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people. (2018) 7 (3) International Journal for Crime, Justice And Social Democracy 41-57.

The authors examine Queensland court administrative records in relation to domestic violence protection orders. Their analysis concludes that a disproportionate number of ATSI people are named on DVOs (as both aggrieved and respondent) and subsequently charged with contravention of a DVO, compared to non-Indigenous people. ATSI women are overrepresented in these charges compared to non-Indigenous women and 69 per cent of women who were sentenced to serve a period of imprisonment for a contravention of a DVO in the 2013-2014 year were ATSI women (while only 3.3 per cent of the Qld population were ATSI women).

They argue that the political commitment to strong responses to DFV has resulted in increased sentences for breaches of a DVO which disproportionately impacts ATSI women. Studies have shown ATSI women may be more likely than other victims of DFV to use physical violence and fight back in response to DFV. This makes it more likely police will make applications for DVOs against ATSI women and in turn more likely they will be charged with contravention of a DVO. They reference literature that finds a formulaic police response fails to consider circumstances of coercive control and other factors that influence patterns of violence and victimisation and this may contribute to high incarceration rates for ATSI women. The higher rate of applications and cross-applications for DVOs by police where ATSI people are the respondents also contribute.

Douglas, H., McGlade, H., Tarrant, S., & Tolmie, J. (2020). Facts seen and unseen: improving justice responses by using a social entrapment lens for cases involving abused women (as offenders or victims). Current Issues in Criminal Justice.

Abstract: This article explores two recent cases. The first, where a woman from a culturally and linguistically diverse background (Rinnabel Blackmore) was killed by her abusive partner and the second, where an Aboriginal woman (Jody Gore) killed her abusive partner. In both cases, we consider the implications of using a social entrapment lens, which focuses on coercive control, the limits of the family violence safety response and the role of structural intersectionality to understand the form of violence the woman faced before being killed by her abuser or killing her abuser. We show how a social entrapment framework can reveal relevant facts and improve understanding of the dynamics of violence and might have led to different actions and decisions by the agencies and individuals responding to the violence in these cases.

Douglas, H., Tarrant, S. and Tolmie, J. (2021) Social entrapment evidence: understanding its role in self-defence cases involving intimate partner violence. UNSW Law Journal Vol 44 (1).

This article considers what evidence juries need to help them apply the defence of self-defence where a woman claims she has killed an abusive partner to save her own life. Drawing on recent research and cases we argue that expert evidence admitted in these types of cases generally fails to provide evidence about the nature of abuse, the limitations in the systemic safety responses and the structural inequality that abused women routinely face. Evidence of the reality of the woman's safety options, including access to, and the realistic support offered by, services such as police, housing, childcare, safety planning and financial support should be presented. In essence, juries need evidence about what has been called social entrapment so they can understand how women's safety options are deeply intertwined with their degree of danger and therefore with the question of whether their response (of killing their abuser) was necessary based on reasonable grounds. We consider the types of evidence that may be important in helping juries understand the concept and particular circumstances of social entrapment, including the role of experts in this context.

Jillard, Alicia and Julia Mansour, Women victims of violence defending intervention orders. (2014) 39(4) Alternative Law Journal 235-240.

This article summarises the findings of the Women's Legal Service (WLS) "Women Defendants Report" which examined the increase in WLS clients defending NSW ADVO proceedings and criminal charges of domestic violence offences instructing that they are the victims of violence in their relationship and that the person seeking protection is the perpetrator. The report analysed all relevant 2010 WLS client cases. It found that 2/3 of women clients defending ADVOs instructed that they were the primary victim of violence in their relationship with the person seeking protection and a significant number said they were the primary victim of the incident that prompted the ADVO application. 1/5 had an existing final ADVO against the person seeking protection and the clear majority of ADVO applications against women were made by police. Many reported they felt police perceived them as lacking credibility due to their state of stress and anxiety when police were called. A number believed the person seeking protection initiated proceedings as a form of legal abuse or means to control their future behaviour with threats of reports to police. Nearly all final orders against women were either made by consent or following an uncontested hearing and women reported a reluctance to face the other party in court.

The article also considers the potential consequences of other proposed amendments to streamline the grant of provisional ADVOs and information sharing consequences for vulnerable women where incorrect information is relied upon.

Meyer, S, Reeves, E, Fitz-Gibbon, K. The intergenerational transmission of family violence: Mothers' perceptions of children's experiences and use of violence in the home. Child & Family Social Work. 2021; 1– 9.

Abstract: Intimate partner violence (IPV) on average affects one in four women, with the majority of victim survivors identifying as mothers in national survey data. Children experiencing parental IPV are now equally understood as victims. Extensive research documents the short- and long-term impacts of children's experiences of IPV on their safety and wellbeing. More recently, research has started to examine adolescent children's use of violence in the home as adolescent family violence (AFV). Contributing to this emerging body of research, we draw on narrative interview data from mothers who participated in a larger study on IPV, help-seeking and the perceived impact on children to better understand how mothers make sense of children's use of violence in the home. Mothers identified an emergence of AFV in male children with childhood experiences of adult IPV. Although mothers' experiences of adult and adolescent violence highlight their dual victimisation, mothers frame their abusive children as victims rather than perpetrators. Implications for future research, policy and trauma-informed practice are discussed.

Nancarrow, Heather (2019) Unintended Consequences of domestic violence law: Gendered consequences and racialised realities. Palgrave, Cham.

See especially chapter 7 which focusses on the gendered and racialised power in the law. It seeks to explain how and why laws designed to stop men’s violence against women resulted in increased criminalisation of women, particularly Indigenous women. It posits three parts to the explanation: 1. Formal equality in the law embeds gender and racialised power relationships. 2. The formulaic implementation of the law reinforces these relationships to the detriment of women – in particular Indigenous women. 3. Feminist advocates had not envisioned (or had ignored) a complex set of meanings and motivations for violence in couple relations. (pp 187-207).

Nancarrow, H., Thomas, K., Ringland, V., & Modini, T. (2020). Accurately identifying the "person most in need of protection" in domestic and family violence law (Research report, 23/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Abstract: This in-house project was conducted by ANROWS. It aimed to support the effective identification of the "person most in need of protection" in cases where there is some ambiguity about who perpetrated domestic violence and abuse.

The research responded to a recommendation of the Queensland Domestic Violence Death Review and Advisory Board in its 2016-17 Annual Report. The Advisory Board reported that in just under half (44.4%) of all cases of female deaths subject to the review, the woman had been identified as a respondent to a domestic and family violence (DFV) protection order on at least one occasion. Further, in nearly all of the DFV-related deaths of Aboriginal people, the deceased had been recorded as both respondent and aggrieved prior to their death (p. 82). The Board's report recommended research to identify how best to respond to the person most in need of protection where there are mutual allegations of violence and abuse (Recommendation 16).

Responding to that recommendation, the research used a mixed methods approach. This included a national analysis of statistical data (domestic violence order applications, police-issued orders and related criminal charges) and a national desktop review of existing legislative and police requirements and guidance on identifying the DFV victim or perpetrator. The project also involved an in-depth case study of Queensland as a state that has already incorporated the concept of the person most in need of protection into legislation.

The final report emphasises the need for improved guidance for police on identifying patterns of coercive control, and guidance for magistrates on how and when they can dismiss inappropriate applications and/or orders. It recommends clarifying processes of decision-making and accountability between police and the courts as a way of addressing the current ambiguity surrounding responsibility for the determination of the person most in need of protection.

No to Violence (NTV). (2019) Discussion paper: Predominant aggressor identification and victim misidentification, (Melbourne, No to Violence).

This paper provides a discussion of misidentification of victims of intimate partner violence as perpetrators. It defines misidentification 'as falsely assessing victims of IPV as perpetrators by members of the justice system' (p6). The discussion identifies a number of factors that contribute to misidentification including police perspectives (p11), assumptions about the perfect victims (p12), and stereotypes about perpetrators (p13).

Reeves, E. 'I'm Not at All Protected and I Think Other Women Should Know That, That They're Not Protected Either': Victim–Survivors' Experiences of 'Misidentification' in Victoria's Family Violence System. (2021) 10 (4) International Journal for Crime, Justice and Social Democracy 39-51.

This article explores the impacts of misidentification on the lives of women victim–survivors of family violence in Victoria (Australia. Using data from interviews with 32 system stakeholders and survey responses from 11 women who have experienced misidentification in Victoria, this study explores misidentification within the family violence intervention order system. It demonstrates that being misidentified as a predominant aggressor on a family violence intervention order can have a significant impact on women's lives and their access to safety, highlighting the need for improved policing and court responses to the issue beyond existing reforms.

Reeves, Ellen, Family violence, protection orders and systems abuse: views of legal practitioners. (2019) 32 Current Issues in Criminal Justice 91-110.

This article drew on interviews with lawyers who represent women defendants to family violence intervention orders (FVIO) applications to examine the use of FVIOs by perpetrators of domestic violence to "play the system" and use them as a tool to further their abuse of their partners. The author spoke to 8 female lawyers who represent women respondents to FVIO applications and reports their observations drawn from their experience. The article concludes that greater awareness of systems abuse by all stakeholders may reduce the inconsistency of legal responses to victim misidentification.

Observations included that victim distress could be used by perpetrators to support their claims, and that victims presenting as angry and victims who have mental health or substance misuse issues can have their credibility questioned by police. CALD women were seen as particularly vulnerable to having their agency and narrative taken by the perpetrator as their partners often had better English language skills which could be used to frame the woman as perpetrator, and may even be called upon to translate for police. One lawyer noted that where court personnel and police had received domestic violence training they observed fewer incidences of misidentification that where inadequate training had been provided. A number felt prosecutors were inadequately empowered to change their decisions to support FVIO applications were systems abuse was identified or suspected.

Where 2/3 of FVIO applications are made by police factors leading to perpetrator misidentification include poor police understanding of domestic violence, erroneous beliefs that women provoke their partner, are able to leave at any time, a single incident of violence is a one-off, not indicative of a systematic pattern of control and abuse and a failure to identify emotional abuse, vexatious applications and non-physical family violence. Time constraints and lack of legal aid meant it was difficult to encourage women to contest applications for FVIOs and it was observed that the grant of interim FVIOs could often negatively impact family law outcomes for women, especially where respondents were rendered homeless quickly establishing the "status quo" for contact with and residence of children.

Sheehy, Elizabeth, Julie Stubbs and Julia Tolmie, 'Securing just outcomes for battered women charged with homicide: Analysing defence lawyering in R v Falls' (2014) 38(2) *Melbourne University Law Review*666

This article documents strategies that may support successful defences of abused women seeking to rely on a defence of self-defence with specific reference to R v Falls, in which a battered woman charged with murder in 'non-confrontational circumstances' was acquitted on the basis of self-defence.

Sleep, Lyndal (2019) Domestic violence, social security and the couple rule ANROWS

This project considered the use of the couple rule by Centrelink to determine the eligibility of applicants to social security payments tying abused women's access to social security payments to the income and assets of their perpetrator. It uses reports of domestic violence as evidence of a committed relationship.

This project detailed the dynamic between domestic violence, social security payment, and the couple rule. It examined the pre-existing data set of Administrative Appeal Tribunal decisions of couple rule matters and compared this to decisions made in New Zealand (where domestic violence is interpreted as evidence of no relationship).

Tarrant, S., et al Women who kill abusive partners: Understandings of intimate partner violence in the context of self-defence. Key findings and future directions (ANROWS 2019)

A summary of the research contained in Tarrant, Stella, Julia Tolmie and George Giudice, Transforming legal understandings of intimate partner violence: Final report (ANROWS, 2019).

Tarrant, Stella, Julia Tolmie and George Giudice, Transforming legal understandings of intimate partner violence: Final report (ANROWS, 2019).

The report examines homicide trials in which self-defence is raised by women who have killed an abusive intimate partner. It explores how legal professionals and experts understand intimate partner violence (IPV). These understandings influence which facts are selected and presented as relevant to understanding a case, the language used to frame those facts, and the conclusions drawn from them. The report outlines and applies a "social entrapment framework" analysis. A social entrapment framework recognises, in line with current research, that the victim's ability to resist abuse is constrained by the abuser's behaviour, her available safety options, and broader structural inequities in her life. Using a social entrapment framework requires analysis at three levels:

- documenting the full suite of coercive and controlling behaviours employed by the abuser, including the strategic and responsive dimensions of this behaviour (and the isolation and fear that this creates for the victim);
- examining the responses of family, community and agencies to the abuse; and
- examining the manner in which any structural inequities experienced by the victim supported the abuser's use of violence (including thwarting her attempts to resist the abuse).

Voce, Isabella and Samantha Bricknall (2020). Female perpetrated intimate partner homicide: Indigenous and non-Indigenous offenders. Statistical Report No. 20. Australian Institute of Criminology

The report is a statistical analysis of female perpetrated intimate partner homicide (IPH) in Australia aiming to identify the personal, contextual and situational factors that contribute to IPH offending and whether these factors differ between indigenous and non-indigenous IPH offenders. It finds that most female IPH perpetrators are in established relationships with their victim, half characterised by a history of domestic violence. 67% of Indigenous female IPH perpetrators are in abusive relationships and 61% of perpetrators' partners had violent criminal histories. The authors suggest that future studies consider offender access to and engagement with formal support services and whether this decreases the likelihood of violence towards intimate partners.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33 University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article reviews cross-applications and orders in NSW courts (2002-2003). The article argues that the use of cross-applications is a form of harassment or a bargaining tool (from p967). The article draws on interviews with women and professionals who suggest cross-applications are 'a possible extension of the violence and abuse itself' and identify that 'the use of the law against victims of domestic violence is rarely depicted as part of their continuing experience of violence, yet it is seen that way by victims and clearly evidences a type of act that is directed at exerting control (or reasserting control)' (p968).

Wangmann, J, Laing, L & Stubbs, J 2020, 'Exploring Gender Differences in Domestic Violence Reported to the NSW Police Force', Current Issues in Criminal Justice, vol. 32, no. 3, pp. 255–276.

Abstract: Whether men and women are equally violent in their intimate relationships has animated considerable debate in the scholarly literature, and increasingly, in policy and law reform processes. This debate about the gendered nature of domestic violence (DV) has re-intensified over the past decade with police data from various countries documenting an increase in women identified as DV offenders. While there has been considerable research exploring the increase in women DV offenders overseas (particularly in the USA) there has been little research in Australia. This article seeks to fill some of these gaps. It reports on a NSW study which explored differences between women and men identified as 'persons of interest' in an incident reported to police in 2010, and then over time (2006–2012) to see whether that person was the predominant victim or offender. This article focuses on cases in which the police intended to take legal action arising from the 2010 incident; this is important, as one would anticipate greater similarity between men's and women's use of violence in cases warranting the attention of the law. The article highlights the limitations of an incident focus when examining a patterned form of behaviour such as DV.

'Findings from this study indicate the importance of contextual factors in understanding the identification of women as POIs in DV cases. Whilst the woman may have used violence in the presenting incident (and violence requiring the attention of the law), this is less likely (compared to male offenders) to be her dominant position within the relationship when examined over time' at 273.

International

Ali, Parveen and Julie McGarry (2016) 'Classifications of Domestic Violence and Abuse', in Parveen Ali and Julie McGarry, eds. Domestic Violence in Health Contexts: A Guide for Healthcare Professions Springer, 35-49

This guide identifies three types of women perpetrators: (1) women who use violence in self-defence; (2) women who abuse and exert power and control in a mutually abusive relationship; and (3) women who are the primary perpetrator of the violence.

Swan and Snow's Typology

Research involved 108 DVA perpetrator women and "explored women's experience of victimisation and perpetration of DVA" (43). The study identified three subtypes of women: victims (women were violent, but their partners were much more abusive); abused aggressors (women were more abusive than their partners); and mixed relationships (women were either more physically abusive than their partners but their partners were more coercive, or, women were less physically abusive but more coercive). 43% of women fell within the victims category; 12% in abused aggressors; and 50% in mixed relationships.

Miller and Meloy's Typology

Research involved 108 DVA perpetrator women and "explored women's experience of victimisation and perpetration of DVA" (43). The study identified three subtypes of women: victims (women were violent, but their partners were much more abusive); abused aggressors (women were more abusive than their partners); and mixed relationships (women were either more physically abusive than their partners but their partners were more coercive, or, women were less physically abusive but more coercive). 43% of women fell within the victims category; 12% in abused aggressors; and 50% in mixed relationships.

Miller and Meloy's Typology

Study of 95 female offenders attending treatment programs. The study identified three types of violence: generalised violent behaviour; frustration response; and defensive behaviour. 30% of women fell within the frustration response category, meaning their abusive behaviour was in response to abuse by their partner. The study noted that while the women used force in an attempted to stop the abuse, their violence did not "change their partner's abusive behaviour or the power dynamics in their relationship" (44). 65% of women fell within the self-defence category.

Bachman, Ronet and Dianne Carmody, Fighting fire with fire: The effects of victim resistance in intimate versus stranger perpetrated assaults against females. (1994) 9 Journal of Family Violence 317-331.

This article explores the extent to which victim resistance, either physical or verbal/passive, during an assault differentially produced injury between intimate and stranger perpetrated assaults. It relied on the responses of 647 women who reported intimate partner violence and 257 women who reported being assaulted by a stranger to the National Crime Victimisation Survey (US) between 1987-1990.

Review of Existing Literature

The study was particularly influenced by 1980s research suggesting that the more likely husbands perceived it was that their wife would hit them back, the more likely they were to abuse.

Results:

78% of victims of IPV reported using some form of self-protection. Only 52% of these women believed their efforts helped, while 19% believed self-protection made the situation worse. The results in Table II revealed that an IPV victim's use of self-protection actually increased the probability of injury: "[T]he odds of sustaining injury from intimate assaults increased by a factor of 1.7 if the victim used any physical self-protection measure. Further, the odds of the victim sustaining injury almost doubled (a factor of 1.978) if she responded to her assaulter verbally (e.g, pleading or arguing)." (327). The study noted that while the probability of a victim of IPV sustaining an injury increases if she tries to self-protect, the extent to which female victims of intimate assaults needed medical care did not. The researchers provided that this may be because the women "fear retaliation from their abuser for seeking public assistance with their injuries or they may suffer embarrassment and shame as the result of their victimisation." (329).

Barlow, Charlotte and Siobhan Weare, 'Women as Co-Offenders: Pathways into Crime and Offending Motivations' (2019) 58(1) The Howard Journal of Crime and Justice 86-103.

This article examines a qualitative study in the UK which aimed to investigate co-offending women's pathways into, and motivations for engaging in, criminal behaviour. It considers not only the impact of co-offending relationships on women's criminality, but also factors which intersect with these relationships in their lives. Interviews with eight women who accessed a women's advice and support centre were conducted. Findings showed that while co-offending relationships were a central pathway into offending, this often intersected with other circumstances in the women's lives, including drug addiction, socio-economic circumstances, and 'significant life events'. Moreover, women who co-offended with female friends were more likely to acknowledge their agency than those who co-offended with intimate male partners. Findings also demonstrated the significance of understanding the complex nature of the lives co-offending women, and the decision-making process.

Coker, Donna and Ahjane Macquoid 'Why Opposing Hyper-Incarceration Should Be Central to the Work of the Anti-Domestic Violence Movement' (2015) 5 University of Miami Race and Social Justice Law Review 585.

The authors argue that the hyper-incarceration observed in the United States has increased the risk of domestic violence in vulnerable populations. They observe that incarceration rates of women have increased 80% since the late 1970s and that poor women of colour are particularly vulnerable to incarceration. A significant number of those women are in prison as a result of attempts to escape, survive or ameliorate their violent victimisation, particularly at the hands of their abusive domestic partners. They identify that the limitations of the defence of duress, limits to reduction in sentences on the basis of coercion and the broad application of conspiracy law have all contributed to long sentences for women who are coerced to offend by abusive partners or who play minor roles in drug crimes largely perpetrated by their abusive partner. Patterns of racist imagery in public and political discourse have contributed to withdrawal of investment in vulnerable communities, diminishment of the welfare state and to increases in incarceration rates, all leading to increasing disadvantage to poor women of colour.

Durfee, Alesha and Leigh Goodmark, Is there a protection order to prison pipeline? Gendered dimensions of cross-petitions. (2019) Journal of Aggression, Maltreatment & Trauma, 1–20.

This article examines cross-filings for protection orders. It analyses 313 cross-filings (cross-applications) for protection orders, comparing them to 1,004 single-filings. It finds that cross-filings are a gendered phenomenon, with men more likely to be involved in cross-filings than women, and men less likely than women to report the types of abuse that qualifies for an order. Cross-filings may be an example of abusers leveraging the legal system to extend control over victim/survivors, rendering victim/survivors ineligible for resources and making them vulnerable to arrest and other forms of state control.

Fanslow, Janet, Pauline Gulliver, Robyn Dixon and Irene Ayallo Hitting back: Women's use of physical violence against violent male partners, in the context of a violent episode. (2015) 30(17) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 2963–2979.

This article explores women's use of physical violence in the context of experiencing intimate partner violence (IPV). Data were drawn from the New Zealand Violence Against Women Study, a cross-sectional household survey. Of the 843 women who had experienced physical violence perpetrated by an intimate partner, 64% reported fighting back at least once or twice whereas 36% never fought back. Analyses showed that women's use of violence more than once or twice was associated with experience of severe IPV, IPV that had "a lot of effect" on their mental health, and with children being present when the woman was being physically abused.

Women's use of physical violence only once or twice was associated with both partners having alcohol problems and both having been exposed to violence as a child. Of the women who fought back, 66% reported that this did not result in the violence stopping.

Goodmark, Leigh, When Is a Battered Woman Not a Battered Woman? When She Fights Back (2008) 20 Yale Journal of Law and Feminism 75-129

This article looks at the conflicting narratives of victims of domestic violence who ask the civil justice system for assistance. It first discusses the importance of narrative in the construction of identity, both in constituting one's self and in determining how that self is presented to the world. It then juxtaposes the prevailing narrative of the domestic violence victim-the passive, middle-class white woman-against the narratives of women who fight back. The Article argues that victims of violence are encouraged to tailor their stories as closely as possible to the prevailing narrative to persuade the legal system of their need for protection, and presents the consequences both for victims and for their advocates in constructing narratives that deny women the right to defend themselves.

Hester, Marianne Portrayal of Women as Intimate Partner Domestic Violence Perpetrators (2012) 18(9) Violence Against Women 1067–1082.

The study followed 128 cases of IPV over the course of six years with the aim of exploring the portrayal of women as perpetrators of IPV in police records. More specifically, the study looked at the extent to which women are characterised as what may be termed ‘batterers’, their identification as primary aggressors, and shifts in positioning from female victim to female perpetrator (1069). Of the 128 participants, 32 of the women were the sole perpetrators of IPV while in a further 32 cases women were ‘dual’ perpetrators. The data used in the study was collected from "a comprehensive computer-based system for recording and linking domestic violence incidents across police districts" (1071).

Results:

The research found that the behaviours exhibited by female perpetrators did not fit within the ‘batterer’ description normally attached to male perpetrators as females rarely acted with the intention to control their partner. The research also found that "women were 3 times more likely than men to be arrested when they were identified as a primary aggressor in a particular incident, and the police appeared more ready to arrest women: (1075). Furthermore, women were arrested for a wider range of offences than male perpetrators, particularly as their use of weapons for self-defence was often overlooked or dismissed due to the focus of English police on individual incidents rather than viewing the woman's actions within a history of victimisation. There was some evidence, however, to suggest that police officers were beginning to move away from this 'individual incident' approach at the advice of the Association of Chief Police Officers and instead "taking a gender-sensitive approach to determining the primary aggressor" in situations with dual perpetrators (1076). This involved officers looking at any pattern of incidents over time. The researchers thus noted that an understanding of gender dynamics was essential to police being able to accurately identify the primary aggressor and enabled them to contextualise any retaliatory violence by a female victim and thus allowing officers to ensure the women's safety (1079-80).

The study also found that male victims were often able to use their 'gendered position of power' to ensure their own safety, diffusing the situation by escaping the vicinity of their violent partner and/or removing weapons or imposing restraints.

Larance, Lisa, Leigh Goodmark, Susan Miller and Shamita Dasgupta, Understanding and Addressing Women's Use of Force in Intimate Relationships: A Retrospective. (2019) 25(1) Violence Against Women 56–80.

The article explores the use of force in intimate relationships by women in marginalised communities, the law's response to this use of force, and the development of and best practices in gender-responsive programming to respond to women's use of force in their intimate heterosexual relationships.

Black Battered Women The study noted that black women were disproportionately affected by IPV. More specifically, "the Bureau of Justice Statistics found that Black women experience IPV at a rate 35% higher than that of White women and about 2.5 times the rate of women of other races". It was also noted that black women were less likely to report IPV due to fears of discrimination, distrust of police and negative stereotyping" with these fears considerably narrowing the help available to them (59).

South Asian Immigrant Battered Women Fear of racism, cultural restrictions and family pressures often prevent South Asian battered women from seeking help and disclosing details of their abuse. The women are also hindered by the belief of South Asian communities "that no good can come of engaging with the police and the legal system in family matters" (61) and by fear that their abusive husband might withdraw their immigration sponsorship. When the women do manage to seek help, language barriers force police to turn to the abuser to gather information. This creates further issues as the abusers use the opportunity to their advantage by either omitting their violence entirely or exaggerating their partners.

Legal Response to Women's Use of Force In 1994, mandatory arrest laws were introduced in America to meet the demands of early anti-violence movements. While the laws deterred recidivism in some states, it either had no impact or contributed to violence against women in others. Female arrests rates rose significantly, particularly in marginalised communities as law enforcements focussed on "gender neutrality in policing IPV' and lacked "sensitivity to the cultural contexts and individual barriers that move many women to resist abuse with force" (63).

Programming for Women Who Use Force "The programs and their curricula share the goal of providing gender-responsive advocacy, support, and intervention while reducing and eradicating IPV" (69).

Larance et al., 'Understanding and Addressing Women's Use of Force in Intimate Relationships: A Retrospective' (2019) 25(1) Violence Against Women 56–80.

This article surveys the evolving US-based understanding of women's use of force in intimate heterosexual relationships and explores the common characteristics of women who use force. Most women who use force in intimate relationships have been victimised by their male partners; however the notion of a woman retaliating against her abusive partner is at odds with prevailing stereotypes applied to women subjected to abuse. Through an intersectional lens, the authors also consider the experiences of women in marginalised communities, for example, South Asian immigrant battered women. Further, the article examines how the legal response to intimate partner violence has affected women who used force and how that response has evolved to address women's use of force. To conclude, the article identifies the challenges in effectively responding to women's use of force.

Larance, Lisa and Susan Miller, In Her Own Words: Women Describe Their Use of Force Resulting in Court-Ordered Intervention. (2017) 23(12) Violence Against Women 1536–1559.

The article examines use of force by 208 women as well as their consequent arrest and court-ordered participation in anti-violence intervention programming. The data used was collected from two separate intervention programs over a period of six months and eventually sorted into nine categories: aggressive use of force (n2) – use of force without a history of abuse; anticipatory (n8) – using force as a result of historical substantive harm causing the women to believe she will soon be abused; both use force (n1); self-defence (n61); asserting dignity (n79) – defined as "women seeking autonomy by using non-self-defensive force" (pg 1547); edgework (n4); false accusations (n32) – "partner embellishing events from the incident to leverage law enforcement against her" (1549); partner self-inflicts injuries (n4); and horizontal hostility (n17 women) – when a woman uses force against a third party.

The substantial number of women within the ‘Asserting Dignity’ category "brings attention to the critical importance of understanding context" (1551). Experiences of women who fell within the ‘Horizonal Hostility’ category indicate that a "closer look must always be taken to better understand who orchestrated the events that led to the presenting incident" (1552). The large number of women falling within the ‘Self-Defence’ category suggests that "the only difference between a women’s court order to intervention and encouragement for her to seek voluntary survivor support services may be the extent of the responding officer’s investigation" (1551). The study also found that Women were more likely to admit to the use of violence and/or detail their actions in full than men. "This contributes to the likelihood that they will be arrested instead or in addition to the men who have abused them" (1540).

Li, Simiao, Ani Levick, Adelaide Eichman, and Judy Chang, Women’s Perspectives on the Context of Violence and Role of Police in Their Intimate Partner Violence Arrest Experiences. (2015) 30(3) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 400–419.

Researchers conducted 18 semi-structured qualitative interviews with women who were court-ordered to attend IPV education groups with the aim of investigating the women’s experiences with violence and arrest.

The women’s use of violence could be divided into four categories: (1) self-defence (typically an isolated occurrence in direct response to an immediate physical threat); (2) driven to violence (had chronically experienced verbal and physical violence from their partners); (3) proving a point (violence was a messaged they wished to convey to others, particularly the abusers); and (4) protecting others (406). These categories align with those from existing research. The study also supports previous findings regarding motivations for violence (e.g., social, historical, institutional, and individual variables) however did not find coercion to be a motivator (414).

Participants who called police themselves were generally seeking help and protection while when the women's partners called police it was it was often to avoid their own arrest or minimise their abuse. The study noted that, to counter this, "police should made aware of the possibility that male partners may falsely portray themselves as victims or even use calls to the police as methods of controlling or manipulating their victims" (415).

Most women reported negative arrest experiences. While some officers allowed them to explain the situation, others arrested the women "based on a literal interpretation of the mandatory arrest law" and demonstrated a very limited understanding of the situation's context and the use of self-defence (411). Furthermore, "where injuries were used to determine which party would be arrested, the women's injuries were often unnoticed or did not appear until later" (412-13).

Miller, Susan & Michelle Meloy (2006) Women's Use of Force: Voices of Women Arrested for Domestic Violence. Violence Against Women, 12(1), 89–115.

The article 'explores the perceptions and experiences of arrested women enrolled in three domestic violence treatment programs in one state'. Researchers observed the participation of 95 women in these programs for a period of six months through watching the tape-recorded group sessions and reading their transcripts. Analysis revealed three violence different categories of violent behaviour which led to participants' arrest:

'generalised violent behaviour': (5% of women) the use of violence in many circumstances, not just in intimate relationships. These women did not have the control or power over their targets; experiences of participants they used violence in response to an immediate incident rather than form part of a history of victimisation and violence.

'frustration response (or 'end of her rope') behaviour' (30% of women). These women often had histories of domestic abuse in their backgrounds…and reacted violently when nothing else seemed to stop his behaviour' (100/12). The violent behaviour of the women in this category 'did nothing to change the abuse and power dynamics of their relationships' (101).

'defensive behaviour': (65% of women). 'Women who exhibited defensive behaviour were trying to get away during a violent incident or were trying to leave to avoid violence when they knew they partners was about to become violent' (102). The participants were often unable to escape their partners during these situations or acted in protection of a child.

Women in all three categories took responsibility for their violent behaviour during the treatment sessions. The study noted this to be a primary difference between female and male perpetrators as research on male batterer treatment groups has typically found men to minimise and deny their violent behaviour (105). By accepting this responsibility and being willing to actively participant in the treatment, the women felt more empowered and better able to deal with the frustrations and issues in their lives (105).

Nouri, Shevan (2015). Critiquing the defence of compulsion as it applies to women in abusive relationships. Auckland University Law Review, 12(1), 21, 168–192.

Examines the cases of women who commit offences under threat of harm from their abusive partners. Considers the New Zealand defence of compulsion and whether it provides an adequate defence for victims of family violence. Argues the defence is too narrowly framed to adequately provide a defence for victims who offend at their abusive partner.

Sheehy, Elizabeth 'Expert Evidence on coercive control in support of self-defence: The trial of Theresa Craig' (2018) 18 (1) Criminology & Criminal Justice 100

This article examines defence evidence led in the first Canadian case where an attempt was made to use coercive control expert evidence to support a defence of self-defence by an abused woman who killed her abuser. Evan Stark, an academic in social work, gave evidence of the nature of coercive control.

Skubak, Marie and Emily Wright, Intimate Partner Violence and the Victim-Offender overlap. (20130 51(1) Journal of Research in Crime and Delinquency 29-55.

This article examines the prevalence and correlates of intimate partner violence (IPV) victimization and offending, as well as the overlap of these experiences. Data from wave 4 of the National (US) Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health were analysed to examine IPV among 5,114 adults ages 24 to 33. Approximately 20% of respondents reported some IPV involvement in the past year, one-third of whom reported victimization and perpetration. The victim-offender overlap was observed for males and females across various measures of IPV. Bivariate correlations suggest victimization and perpetration have common correlates. Multivariate analysis, however, reveals considerable differences once we distinguish between victims, offenders, and victim-offenders and control for other variables. Perpetrators and victim-perpetrators were more likely to live with a non-spouse partner; feel isolated; display negative temperaments; and report substance use problems. "Victims only" were more likely to live with children and have lower household incomes.

Tolmie, Julia, Rachel Smith, Jacqueline Short, Denise Wilson and Julie Sach, Social entrapment: A realistic understanding of the criminal offending of primary victims of intimate partner violence (2018) 2 New Zealand Law Review, 181-217

This article argues that understanding intimate partner violence as a form of social entrapment can assist the application of the law to victims of intimate partner violence who are also offenders. By way of example it considers self-defence to homicide where the primary victim kills their abuser and the prosecution of mothers who are victims for neglectful parenting. Note the appendix to this article by the New Zealand Death Review Committee which proposes an evidential approach to the defence of victims of intimate partner violence who are also offenders.

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 7.6 considers women and the criminal law and includes a section on (7.6.1) on female offenders.

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators - Other Resources

International

Freyd, J et al., What is DARVO? Website: https://dynamic.uoregon.edu/jjf/defineDARVO.html.

DARVO refers to a reaction perpetrators of wrong doing, particularly sexual offenders, may display in response to being held accountable for their behaviour. DARVO stands for "Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender." The perpetrator or offender may Deny the behaviour, Attack the individual doing the confronting, and Reverse the roles of Victim and Offender such that the perpetrator assumes the victim role and turns the true victim -- or the whistle blower -- into an alleged offender. This occurs, for instance, when an actually guilty perpetrator assumes the role of "falsely accused" and attacks the accuser's credibility and blames the accuser of being the perpetrator of a false accusation. This website includes links to empirical research about the concept and discussions about its impact on victims and others. It also includes podcasts and other materials.

Osthoff, Sue and Jane Sadusky, A Toolkit for Systems Advocacy on Behalf of Victims of Battering Charged with Crimes. 2016, National Clearinghouse for the Defense of Battered Women.

This toolkit provides ideas, strategies, and techniques for addressing the needs and challenges related to making victims of battering charged with crimes visible and central in a community's response to battering. Includes resources, references, as advocacy organization survey, and a data collection workbook

New Zealand Family Violence Death Review Committee, Appendix to article titled 'Social Entrapment: A Realistic Understanding of the Criminal Offending of Primary Victims of Intimate Partner Violence', 22 Aug 2018

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Service Administration, Essential Components of Trauma-Informed Judicial Practice (2013).

This paper provides information, specific strategies, and resources that many treatment court judges have found beneficial (in US). It provides a list of communication and court management strategies to help reduce the traumatic experiences often associated with going to court.

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Celia

Ingrid

Victims as (alleged) perpetrators - Cases

State of NSW v Monteiro (Final) [2020] NSWSC 881 (8 July 2020) – New South Wales Supreme Court

The defendant made a false report to police in an apparent attempt to pre-empt the complainant's report:

> [12] By Christmas 2007 the defendant agreed to move out of the parties' shared accommodation but he did not have the financial means for this and still resided with the victim up to the date of the offence. From Christmas Day 2007 until 2 January 2008 the victim stayed with her family in Goulburn. She invited the defendant to attend their flat when she returned, for him to hand over his keys. She arrived back at the flat with her parents and the defendant was there. After the parents had left the defendant rushed at the victim, pushed his hand against her face to force her into the bedroom, slapped her about the face, forced her onto the bed and pulled her clothes off. He continued to push and slap her face and when she screamed he threatened to suffocate her with a pillow. He had penile-vaginal intercourse with her, briefly and violently, against her resistance. He then rolled off her and "carried on as if nothing had happened", according to Norrish DCJ.
>
> [13] This offence occurred in about the middle of the day or early in the afternoon. The defendant remained with the victim for the rest of the day and overnight. Next morning he followed her as she made her way to work and engaged in running verbal altercations. She arrived at her workplace in a distressed state with visible injuries to her face. She subsequently attended Paddington police station where it transpired that the defendant had earlier made a false report that he had been assaulted by the victim and that she had threatened to invent a charge of rape. This was apparently an attempt to pre-empt the victim.

R v Blockey [2021] QCA 77 (21 April 2021) – Queensland Court of Appeal

The Court (Sofronoff P and McMurdo JA and Boddice J) noted the sentencing judge's remarks, including the relevance of the applicant's history as a repeated victim of domestic violence in sentencing:

> [8] The sentencing Judge accepted that the applicant's plea of guilty was a timely plea; that the deceased had been killed in anger; that the applicant had a past history of alcohol abuse and illicit substance abuse; and that the applicant's adult relationships had been largely with partners who abused alcohol and illicit substances, many of whom subjected the applicant to domestic abuse.

[9] The sentencing Judge accepted that, having regard to the applicant's history of having sustained repeated serial domestic violence, there was an increased likelihood of the applicant reacting aggressively when threatened or assaulted by a domestic partner.

[10] The sentencing Judge found that the applicant stabbed the deceased after he had pursued her into her home, with a degree of aggressive intent, and after he had, at some stage, punched or slapped the applicant causing a bruise and some bleeding. Further, the applicant, at one point, had yelled for the deceased to "get out".

[11] The sentencing Judge found that: "The fact that you were such a victim of domestic violence as well as a perpetrator of domestic violence is, to my mind, sufficient to enable me to reach the conclusion that it is not reasonable in the present circumstances to treat the fact that your offending was a domestic violence offence as an aggravating feature."

R v Wallace [2015] QCA 62 (21 April 2015) – Queensland Court of Appeal

McMurdo P, (with whom Gotterson JA and Douglas J agreed) noted that lawyers acting for clients charged with criminal offences who claim to be the victim of domestic violence should take such claims very seriously to determine the relevance to their client's alleged offending. They should then put such evidence before the primary court either as a defence, or in sentence mitigation.

See in particular the following remarks of McMurdo P at [37] -

'… The further evidence led in this application established that at the time of the offending the applicant was in an abusive, exploitive relationship which impaired her capacity to realise the full repercussions of her fraudulent behaviour and her ability to formulate a mature response to her financial and personal difficulties as she continued to take more and more money from the nursing home in the impossible hope that she would eventually repay it. As Dr Schramm (a psychiatrist) explained, she was not acting completely rationally. She was exhibiting behavioural disturbances following her prolonged and significant physical and emotional abuse, commonly known as "battered persons syndrome." This took her offending behaviour out of the worst category of fraudulent offending in which the sentencing judge placed it. The further evidence raises the possibility that some other sentence than that imposed may be warranted; if so, its exclusion would result in a miscarriage of justice.'

R v MacKenzie* [2000] QCA 324 (11 August 2000) – Queensland Court of Appeal

McMurdo P observed that a grave history of abuse contributed to (as a psychologist who interviewed the applicant woman put it at [21]), 'ineffective problem solving behaviour and a perception by [the applicant] of the narrowing of her options over time. A perception of narrowed options can often result in decisions made by the abused woman that from the outside look like poor judgment.' The history of abuse by the victim towards the applicant was an additional mitigating factor which partly explains how her behaviour came about.

Director of Public Prosecutions (Vic) v Walker* [2018] VSC 83 (28 March 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

Taylor J: [48] "Family violence is insidious. It need not find expression in physical violence to be described as grave or create a mindset in its victims of fear and helplessness. That mindset arises from all forms of violence experienced by victims and is not triggered only at the time of a physical assault."

Fair hearing and safety

Due to the complex nature of domestic and family violence matters, it may be necessary for judicial officers in their conduct of related proceedings to consider and respond to a range of factors to ensure that parties are afforded fair and equal access to justice and those at risk of harm are protected. In order to properly respond to domestic and family violence judicial officers will often need information presented to them, not just about individual incidents of violence, but also about the history and pattern of violence in the relationship. Judicial officers should actively consider the power of the court to regulate its own proceedings.

There is a developing understanding among judicial officers in Australia that domestic and family violence rarely involves a single incident or a series of discrete incidents of physical violence. Rather, it manifests as a complex pattern of violent and abusive behaviours through which a perpetrator exercises control over the victim, often for extended periods, sometimes referred to as coercive control. The facts of a particular matter and the circumstances of the affected parties are likely to have a direct and substantial bearing on the manner in which a judicial officer discharges their obligations in the conduct of proceedings and the protection of parties.

For some victims their engagement with law enforcement agencies and the courts may exacerbate or prolong the trauma they have experienced as a result of the domestic and family violence. For example, absence of legal representation, lack of interpreter services, giving oral evidence, being cross examined, being present in the court room or court precinct with the perpetrator, or having to repeatedly return to court for mentions, adjournments and hearings may contribute to a victim's revictimisation or secondary abuse through the court system. Judicial officers should ensure, where practically possible and resources permit, that these factors and their adverse consequences are addressed.

It is critical that parties feel that they have been properly informed of their rights and what to expect in the court process and that they have been taken seriously and given due opportunity to be heard.

For victims, it is critical that their safety and protection are assured and that they are in control of their participation in the proceedings and of choices affecting their lives beyond the court room. In facilitating these outcomes, a judicial officer may need to take into account a victim's individual vulnerabilities, and their specific experience of domestic and family violence or its impacts.

For perpetrators (or offenders), Australian research indicates the possible adverse effects of a lack of understanding of court processes, the terms of orders, and the consequences for breaches of orders. These effects may include a perception by the perpetrator (or offender) that the process is unfair or unjust [Chung et al 2014], or that the order has no real force [CIJ 2015]. This suggests that efforts by judicial officers to address these perceptions may produce more positive outcomes. Australian research indicates the value of judicial officers looking at and directly speaking to perpetrators/offenders [Mack & Anieu 2011]. US research emphasises the importance of the interaction between judicial officers and perpetrators/offenders, and that a process of shared respect may be a key factor in compliance [Petrucci 2002]. The Canadian Domestic Violence Bench Book also highlights a range of behaviours and perceptions that are common among many domestic and family violence perpetrators, and points out that when judicial officers keep in mind these behaviour patterns when listening to evidence, perpetrators have fewer opportunities to mislead [Neilson 2020].

Fair hearing and safety - Key Literature

Australia

Chung, Donna, Damien Green, Gary Smith and Nicole Leggatt, 'Breaching Safety: Improving the Effectiveness of Violence Restraining Orders for Victims of Family and Domestic Violence' (Report: The Women's Council for Domestic and Family Violence Services, 2014).

This Western Australian (WA) study aimed to gain an understanding of men's perspectives and experiences about being charged with breaching a protection order; their understandings of why the protection order was issued and the events that led to them being charged with breach; and to identify policy and service delivery measures to promote safety for victims.

Ten men were recruited from a WA men's behaviour change program to participate in a semi-structured, individual interview. The interviews were complemented with a focus group of service providers in the men's and women's domestic violence services, Family Violence Court, Family Court, Legal Aid and the Department for Child Protection and Family Support.

The findings were broadly grouped into three categories:

1. The men minimised their use of violence and externalised responsibility to 'the relationship' and/or their partner. They diminished or minimised the role and purpose of protection orders, commenting that they are 'just a piece of paper' and 'anyone can get one'. Most men agreed that protection orders were important for 'those that really need it' however they did not see their partners as being in need of protection describing them as being unreasonable or over-reacting. The men's deflections and minimisations about their violence including breaches of protection orders were reinforced (and strengthened) through, what they perceived to be, violence supportive responses by police or service providers, for example when breaches did not result in police investigation or charges. A pronounced theme throughout all aspects of the interviews was the participants' lack of empathy or regard for the safety and wellbeing of their current or former partners.
2. Men's perception that protection order processes were unfair or unjust. In particular, the men exhibited a lack of understanding about how their violence towards their intimate partner, children and family could result in restrictions to their contact with their children and/or exclusion from their property. The perception of unfairness was exacerbated by a lack of understanding about the process for obtaining a police order or violence restraining order (VRO) including the grounds in which an order can be made, court processes, the conditions an order can impose and penalties of a breach.

3. Participants explained their breaches in three ways: 1) they were responsible for the breach and related consequences; 2) they claimed their partner was responsible for the breach e.g., initiating or 'agreeing' to contact; and 3) they described themselves as 'accidental breachers' i.e. the breach occurred because the protected person and respondent were 'accidentally' in the same physical location.

Centre for Innovative Justice, 'Opportunities for Early Intervention: Bringing perpetrators of family violence into view' (Report: RMIT, 2015).

The aim of this Australian report is to identify opportunities for the police, civil and criminal justice and court systems to develop early intervention strategies that are likely to encourage perpetrator engagement with justice processes; understanding of and accountability for their violent behaviours; and behavioural reform through program participation and other interventions.

One of the criticisms of the current civil responses include (at p 21):

- Respondents do not always understand the legal basis of the order, or the terms with which they are expected to comply. A recent WA study found that many respondents questioned the validity of the court's role, not understanding its power to issue an order despite the fact that the police had not laid charges. Some believed that 'anybody could get one of those' and felt that the orders were 'just a piece of paper', while others inadvertently breached the order repeatedly simply because they did not understand its terms. The latter was also nominated by practitioners in the Northern Territory as a particular problem for perpetrators in remote communities, to the extent that courts often preferred to impose limited conditions…

Mack, Kathy and Anieu, Sharyn Roach, 'Opportunities for New Approaches to Judging in a Conventional Context: Attitudes, Skills and Practices' (2011) 37(1) Monash University Law Review 187.

In Australia, magistrates and their courts have undertaken steps to make the disposition of cases more appropriate and more sensitive to the varied needs of defendants. One development is more engaged approaches to judging, which entails direct judicial interaction with court users, requiring judicial communication skills and perhaps greater emotional capacities such as empathy. Careful analysis of empirical evidence of judicial attitudes and practices in court identifies important links between conventional judging values, skills and actions and some elements of the newer forms of judging. This research identifies magistrates' commitment to core judicial values such as impartiality, their views about skills and practices associated with more engaged judging, such as listening and empathy and their orientation to the social value of their work. The article then examines in-court behaviours, including the demeanours magistrates display towards defendants and the circumstances in which they look at and speak directly to defendants (at pp 206-28). The findings suggest apparent tensions between legitimacy based on a conventional judicial role in an adversary process and the legitimacy of more engaged, active judging. This research finds ways in which values and practices of less-adversarial judging can be incorporated within a relatively conventional understanding and performance of the judicial role.

International

Burke, Kevin and Steve Leben, 'Procedural Fairness: A Key Ingredient to Public Satisfaction' (2007) 44 Court Review: The Journal of the American Judges Association 4-25.

This paper discusses the role of judges in addressing public dissatisfaction with the judiciary by giving effect to the key elements of procedural fairness, in particular, voice, neutrality, respectful treatment and engendering trust in authority. Procedural fairness is a value that Americans expect and demand from the judicial system. The purpose of the paper is to address research on the American court system, and to identify and promote changes that will improve the daily work of the courts and judges.

Guzik, Keith, Arresting Abuse: Mandatory Legal Interventions, Power, and Intimate Abusers, (Northern Illinois University Press, 2009).

US research into the practice in many jurisdictions of enhancing the criminal prosecution of domestic abuse cases by adopting mandatory arrest policies for the police and no-drop policies for the prosecution. The author reports that many abusers subjected to the force of these policies feel they are being unfairly treated, and for behaviour they believe is justifiable. Denials, minimisations, excuses and justifications were common among the abuser narratives, as well as claims of self-defence and other disclaimers of responsibility, claiming they were responding to a genuine threat to his person or to his traditional masculine identity.

National Center for State Courts, Court Guide to Effective Collaboration on Elder Abuse (2012).

This Guide provides a comprehensive discussion on elder abuse, discusses the prevalence of the incidence of elder abuse and describes the court settings and the types of legal actions that may be used to address elder abuse. Note issues about assessing cognitive, physical and other conditions that may be relevant to an older person's needs; crafting appropriate remedies; maximising access and participation of older person (p6). See also the Judicial Benchcard associated with this resource.

Petrucci, Carrie J., 'Respect as a Component in the Judge-Defendant Interaction in a Specialized Domestic Violence Court that Utilizes Therapeutic Jurisprudence' (2002) 38(2) Criminal Law Bulletin 263.

A US study. Abstract: Specialized courts and therapeutic jurisprudence both share an emphasis on the judge-defendant interaction. What a judge says, how he or she says it, and how defendants respond, may prove to be a key factor affecting outcomes within the specialized court process. Research has yet to carefully describe this judge-defendant interaction. Using participant observation, transcripts of judicial monitoring sessions, and judge and defendant interviews, this article analyzes one judge's use of therapeutic jurisprudence in judicial monitoring sessions in a specialized domestic violence court. The findings highlight seven key areas that describe progress report hearings: general characteristics, the process, general content, specific content, the judicial role and approach, defendants' perceptions of the judge, and the demeanor of the judge and the defendant. Taken together, these components exhibit a relationship depicted by a process of shared respect between the judge and defendant that may be a key factor in defendant compliance.

Fair hearing and safety - Other Bench Books

Canada

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

In Section 7.3.2, Neilson suggests that judicial officers can be alert to behaviours and perceptions that are characteristic of many domestic and family violence perpetrators, as demonstrated by the evidence adduced and displayed by the perpetrator in the courtroom context. Neilson states that when judges keep in mind these common behaviour patterns when listening to evidence, perpetrators have fewer opportunities to mislead. Perpetrator traits include:

- Good public behaviour and character evidence;
- Control;
- Entitlement or the belief that one has special rights and privileges with accompanying responsibilities;
- Lack of empathy for the feelings, views and value of their partner;
- Possessiveness including high levels of jealousy and monitoring of their partner;
- Manipulation;
- Denial or minimisation of their own violence;
- Projection of responsibility, including claiming their violence was in self-defence, a product of their partner's bad behaviour, or mutual; or that their partner is overly sensitive or mentally ill or unstable.

A more detailed discussion of the social characteristics and behaviours of perpetrators can be found in Supplementary Reference 3: Perpetrators: Perpetrator Characteristics; Perpetrator Litigation Tactics.

Fair hearing and safety - Other Resources

LawAccess NSW, Representing Yourself – Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs

- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

No to Violence (2021) Tips for engaging men on their use of family violence (fact sheet) Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria.

This resource gives five tips for engaging men on their use of family violence:

1. Safety – do not engage in a way likely to increase risk to the safety of vicitms;
2. Identify invitations by men to collude in their behaviour - when responding to a man's attempts to minimise, excuse or justify their use of violence, it is important to encourage them to re-evaluate their behaviour and self-exploration;
3. Open the conversation - being curious and asking questions can help put his behaviour on the table;
4. Experience of ex/partners and kids - encourage empathy for how his partner/kids are experiencing his behaviour, rather than his intentions or identity; and
5. Change and support - identifying what a desirable future looks like can help reflection around what needs to change.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Fair hearing and safety - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Hurst v R* [2017] NSWCCA 114 (31 May 2017) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

At [132], the Court states –

> 'It is, of course, not unusual with offences of this kind for there to be a considerable delay between the occurrence of the offence and complaint being made. That is a distinctive feature of domestic violence scenarios. Given the psychological considerations which may well have been in play, delay of this kind should not in any way be held against the victim. It is in fact a direct product of the nature of the offending itself and in that sense, it would be incongruous if an offender could gain a benefit from such delay.'

R v Ahmed* [2019] NSWSC 55 (8 February 2019) – New South Wales Supreme Court

In refusing to allow a judge-alone trial: at [28]-[30], Schmidt J states –

> 'Sadly, all too many killings which juries have been called on to deal with at trials involve the violent deaths of women caused by their husbands or partners, requiring those juries to consider confronting evidence, including photographs of the kind which may need to be tendered in this case. It is also not unusual in such cases for juries to have to consider evidence about an alleged offender's mental state, in determining whether the Crown has established its case.'
>
> 'But the infliction of violence in domestic circumstances is not confined to members of our community who are of particular racial origin or religion. Ours is a community comprised of people who have not only been born here, but who have come from every corner of the world and who adhere to many different religions, or none at all.'
>
> 'That there has long been real community interest and concern about deaths which involve domestic violence is understandable and well known. That is nowadays not only reflected in considerable media coverage, when alleged offenders are apprehended and charged, but also in resulting discussion on social media, which unsurprisingly is commonplace…'

Impact on consent and disclosure

A victim's experiences of and vulnerabilities to domestic and family violence may affect their capacity to voluntarily consent [Stubbs 2007] to or willingness to disclose [Mouzos & Makkai 2004] the violent behaviours, or other matters resulting from their relationship with the perpetrator, for example matters arising in relation to a protection order [Wangmann 2012], a breach [Douglas 2008] of a protection order, a parenting order [Kaspiew et al 2009], other legal remedies or proceedings [Hunter 1999], financial dealings [Cameron 2014] and immigration processes.

The table below highlights some of the contexts or reasons that may affect a victim's consent and disclosure having regard to vulnerabilities commonly experienced by victims of domestic and family violence and more particular vulnerabilities relating to the violent behaviour or the victim's circumstances. In some cases, these contexts or reasons may intersect; in other words, a victim may not disclose certain behaviours or matters for the same reasons they have been coerced into consenting to them.

It may be appropriate for judicial officers in domestic and family violence related proceedings to inquire as to the contexts or reasons affecting the victim's consent or disclosure in a particular case where the evidence before the court does not sufficiently address or explain these issues.

Vulnerabilities – common	Possible contexts or reasons for:
	Consent	Non-disclosure
History/pattern of domestic and family violence	• Capacity to voluntarily consent compromised over time due to physical, mental or emotional impacts of coercive and controlling behaviours [Stubbs 2007]	• Coercive and controlling behaviours not recognised as domestic and family violence - seen as normal part of relationship • Violence not seen as sufficiently serious to warrant disclosure [Meyer 2010]
Relationship with perpetrator	• Perceived need to preserve ongoing relationship with perpetrator • Fear of further/escalation of violence • Economic dependence on perpetrator, fear of poverty and homelessness	• Perceived need to preserve ongoing relationship with perpetrator • Perceived need to protect perpetrator • Fear of perpetrator retaliation, further/escalation of violence • Economic and social dependence on perpetrator, fear of poverty and homelessness [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]

Self perception	Sense of self-worth and entitlement to volunteer/withdraw consent diminished over time by coercive and controlling behaviours	Fear of others' judgment – feelings of shame, humiliation, embarrassment about being in violent relationship or being disbelieved [Evans & Feder 2016]
Presence of children	Concern for children's safety and wellbeing Perceived need to keep the family together Perceived need to preserve relationship between children and perpetrator	Concern for children's safety and wellbeing Perceived need to keep the family together Perceived need to preserve relationship between children and perpetrator [Evans & Feder 2016]
Understanding/prior experience of legal and judicial processes	Lack of awareness of domestic and family violence related laws Lack of awareness of legal rights and available advice and support services Consent to orders compelled by expense and stress of ongoing proceedings and continuing opportunities for systems abuse by perpetrator	Lack of awareness of domestic and family violence related laws Lack of awareness of legal rights and available advice and support services Feeling that concerns won't be believed or taken seriously Feeling of lack of control over process and outcomes Fear of criminal justice consequences for perpetrator Fear of child protection agency intervention, having children removed Fear of 'hostile parent' claim in parenting proceedings [Kirkwood 2007] – being accused of alienating children from perpetrator [Kaye et al 2003]
Vulnerabilities – particular	Possible contexts or reasons for:
	Consent	Non-disclosure
Sexual violence	Violence is forced or unwanted – involuntary consent Past consensual relations [Carline & Easteal 2014] between victim and perpetrator and victim difficulties in proving no consent [Logan et al 2015] Facilitated by alcohol or drugs [Cox 2016]	Lack of awareness of criminality of violence Fear of losing relationship Feelings of shame, self-blame and failure Fear of perpetrator retaliation, further/escalation of violence

	• Perceived need to comply with perpetrator's sexual demands to keep the peace, minimise the violence already experienced, and avoid further/escalation of violence [Heenan 2004]	• Fear of rejection by family and friends • Fear of health and reproductive consequences • Fear of adverse police or judicial responses [Heenan 2004] [Lievore 2003]
Economic abuse	• Consent to financial dealings is demanded, forced or fraudulently obtained [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010] • Emotional manipulation inferring secrecy or lack of trust if refusal to comply with demands [Hand et al 2009] • Fear of further/escalation of violence	• Fear of being legally/criminally implicated in fraud or other wrongdoing • Fear of economic loss/insecurity • Fear of perpetrator retaliation, further/escalation of violence
People from vulnerable groups	• Exploitation of diminished capacity to voluntarily consent due to exacerbating circumstances or physical, mental or emotional disability, impairment or illness • Cultural/community expectations and practices	• Heightened physical, geographical or social isolation • Practical difficulties in accessing advice and support services • Advice and support services not properly equipped to address victim's specific circumstances/needs • Past negative experiences of legal and judicial processes eg people with disability [Jennings 2003] • Victim has offending/criminal record • Fear of other legal consequences eg visa cancellation, deportation • Cultural/community expectations and practices eg Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander [Willis 2011], culturally and linguistically diverse, remote and rural [Wendt et al 2015], LGBTIQ [Calton et al 2015]

Impact on consent and disclosure - Key Literature

Impact on Consent

Australia

Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS), Personal Safety, Australia, 2016, ABS cat no. 4906.0 (2016).

This release presents information from the Australian Bureau of Statistics' (ABS) 2016 Personal Safety Survey (PSS).

The survey collected detailed information from men and women aged 18 years and over about their experiences of violence since the age of 18, as well as experiences of current and previous partner violence, stalking, physical and sexual abuse and harassment, abuse before the age of 15, and general feelings of safety.

'Approximately half of all women who experienced physical assault by a male perceived alcohol or another substance to be a contributing factor to the most recent incident (49% or 519,700)' (see Table 8), while '[j]ust under two-thirds of men who experienced physical assault by a male perceived alcohol or another substance to be a contributing factor to the most recent incident (61% or 804,000)' (see Table 9).

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, Report 114 (2010).

See p592 onwards which discusses 'Economic and emotional abuse offences', including recognition of fraud, and coercion of victims to claim social security payments in the context of domestic and family violence. Chapter 25 deals with sexual offences, including consent specifically (from p1147). Section [25.114] (p1156) Notes that 'stakeholders emphasised that the issue of consent in the context of family violence and intimate relationships is complex; and that complexity is magnified where there is a history of violence and coerced 'consent'. The disjunction between the criminal justice system's focus on isolated incidents, as opposed to a pattern or history of family violence, was identified as a particular challenge in proving lack of consent.'

Section [25.118] (p1157) observes that stakeholders also suggested that the circumstances vitiating consent should be expanded to include:

- economic abuse;
- where consent is purported to be given by persons with a cognitive impairment to sexual activity with a carer;
- fear of force or fear of harm of any type; threats to harm animals; and
- threats to damage property.'

Australian Law Reform Commission, 'Family Violence and Commonwealth Laws – Improving Legal Frameworks' (ALRC Report 117, 2012).

See p72- discusses the contrast between autonomy and paternalism, particularly in the context of safety concerns. This section draws on particular examples of how paternalistic approaches can disempower people who are subject to abuse.

See chapter 6 'Social Security – Relationships' in relation to consent in financial contexts, discussing difficulties that arise in relation to determining a person is a member of a couple, for the purposes of s4(3) of the Social Security Act (from p151). Concerns are raised from pp152 that 'economic abuse may obviate consent to the 'significant pooling of financial resources'' (p153), and further, that people may be unable to leave a relationship due to violence. 'The Commonwealth Ombudsman noted anecdotal instances when Centrelink has determined that a customer is a member of a couple, even where it appears the 'relationship' may have only continued as a result of duress or financial abuse' (p153), while concerns were also raised that' information about family violence—such as police reports—has been used to demonstrate the existence of a couple relationship, rather than finding that one did not exist' (p154).

Bagshaw, Dale et al, 'Family Violence and Family Law in Australia The Experiences and Views of Children and Adults from Families who Separated Post-1995 and Post-2006' (Monash University for the Australian Attorney-General's Department, 2010), vol 1.

This research was conducted to examine the impact of family violence, which had occurred before, during and or after parental relationship breakdown, on post-separation decision making and arrangements as viewed by children and parents both pre and post 2006 changes to family law. The report is based on data collected via an online survey of 931 adults; an online children survey of 65 children; phone-in interviews with 105 parents and phone-back interviews with 33 parents. Some of the key findings for the context of consent include:

At pp 6-7: '[t]he other group most affected was the post-2006 group. They reported being coerced by the combined pressure from legal advisors and family dispute resolution practitioners to agree to arrangements that were unsafe or inadequate for their children, including shared parenting, overnight or unsupervised contact, or any contact'.

'Some of the female respondents reported that they had felt powerless at separation and still felt this way, although this was the smallest group. These respondents felt particularly powerless over sharing care of the children and finances and felt they had been pressured into agreements that were unfair. For example, as one respondent said: 'the power he held over me during the relationship continued afterwards in regard to parenting arrangements and finances'. She was bluffed into thinking she must agree to the equal time, although this was prior to the 2006 legislation. Another respondent just said: 'I made decisions based on my fear of him'' (p50).

'Just under 19% of those who did not access formal services indicated that they made that choice because family violence perpetrated against them made use of the services dangerous or impossible, that is, that victims were bullied into agreements outside the formal system or that the victims rejected formal services because they would provide further avenues for abuse (such as through family dispute resolution)' (p64). Some 'women noted that they were threatened with violence and with court action if they did not agree to arrangements for children' (p79).

Cameron, Prue, 'Relationship Problems and Money: Women Talk about Financial Abuse' (Research Report, Wire Women's Information, 2014).

This research draws on interviews, focus groups and surveys involving more than 200 women. The behaviours associated with economic abuse are explored from p11, noting the difference between controlling behaviours (e.g. preventing access to money or financial independence) and exploitative behaviours (e.g. being intimidated into assuming responsibility for debts and expenses). It notes that 15% of women in the study reported their partner used their name to take out loans or borrow credit (p12).

Camilleri, Owen, Tanya Corrie and Shorna Moore, Restoring Financial Safety: Legal Responses to Economic Abuse (Good Shepherd and Wyndham Legal Service, 2015).

'This project sought to explore and respond to the legal challenges to restoring survivors' financial safety after their experiences of economic abuse. The researchers examined the legal cases of 25 people who had taken out intervention orders through Wyndham Legal Service. All of the participants were women who were being abused by a man. The authors summarise findings, including that 'debt was a common way of abusers controlling their partners' including by forcing women to assume debts or pay for utility debt (jointly accumulated or accrued in his name) p13.

Carline, Anna and Patricia Easteal, Shades of Grey – Domestic and Sexual Violence Against Women (Routledge, 2014).

Partner rape is discussed from p208, including discussion of consent from p212. The authors comment that 'unsurprisingly' in a partner context, proving that the woman did not consent (a physical element) or an absence of consent that the defendant knew of, but chose to ignore (the fault element) is difficult, because of the history of consensual sexual intercourse (p212).

Cox, Peta, Sexual assault and domestic violence in the context of co-occurrence and re-victimisation: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This literature review examines the intersection between sexual assault and domestic violence. In relation to consent, the paper highlights that the ability to provide consent for sexual activity may be compromised when it is occurring within the context of the perpetration of intimate partner violence (IPV). This is because the perpetration of IPV creates a climate of ongoing fear or control (p 29). Additionally, for sexual violence perpetrated by intimate partners, demonstrating lack of consent is complicated because sexual violence may have been perpetrated in a context where consensual relations may have taken place before and/or after the assault, and in the context of established patterns of sexual behaviours that do not include verbalised consent (p 29).

Understandings of consent in established relationships affect how intimate partner sexual violence is framed both by victims as well as third parties. See pages 47-48 for a discussion of the way social norms affect what is understood as “real rape” (non-consensual sexual activity). Importantly, research has found that intimate partner sexual violence is viewed by the community as both less serious and more justifiable than sexual assault by a stranger or acquaintance (p 47). Indeed, the greater the familiarity between the victim/survivor and perpetrator, the greater likelihood that reports will be considered a lie or misinterpretation (p 47).

IPSV victims/survivors themselves often face difficulty in recognising sexual violence as violence, assault or rape (p 26). Similarly, research shows that younger women rarely identify sexually coercive behaviours by boyfriends as sexual assault, and tend to excuse sexually violent behaviour by saying that their own behaviour justified the assault or by pointing to extenuating circumstances (p 48). This again points to the strength of commonly held perceptions of what “counts” as consensual or non-consensual sexual activity.

Cox, Peta, Violence against women in Australia: Additional analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012 (ANROWS, 2016 Rev.ed.).

This report provides substantial additional analysis of the data produced through the Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2012. In relation to consent, p36 notes that for female victims, ‘in over 900,000 incidents, alcohol or other drugs were believed to contribute to the most recent physical assault by a male. This is over half the incidents of physical assault of a female by a male (53.4%). In a similar percentage of cases alcohol or other drugs were believed to contribute to the most recent sexual assault by a male (474,600, 55.7%); and Physical threat by a male (351,700, 50%). Whether alcohol or drugs ‘contributed to the incident’ was defined to mean ‘whether they were under the influence of alcohol or other substances; whether alcohol or drugs were added to their drink without their consent; and whether they believed the perpetrator was under the influence of alcohol or drugs’ (p36). However, the author also highlighted that ‘of all incidents of sexual assault where women indicated that alcohol and other drugs contributed to the incident, it was mostly the perpetrator’s use that was assessed as being a contributing factor’ (p61). (Note: this article refers to a previous release of the ABS’ Personal Safety Survey, but the analysis remains useful. See Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2016 for most recent release.)

Consumer Utilities Advocacy Centre, Helping Not Hindering: Uncovering Domestic Violence and Utility Debt (CUAC, 2014).

This report from Consumer Utilities Advocacy Centre (CUAC) Victoria assesses the legal and operational framework that currently applies to the payment of utility bills in the context of domestic violence, specifically where domestic abuse leads to a breakdown of a household, and victims are at a point of crisis. The report discusses economic abuse specifically in the context of utilities and notes a range of common problem scenarios from p10-12 including that women frequently are not aware of the utility bills and associated debts until after the abuser leaves the household (p11). Also see 'Consent' (from p33), discussing issues around obtaining the abusive partner's consent when attempting to resolve issues of joint accounts for utilities in domestic violence situations.

Douglas, Heather, 'The Criminal Law's Response to Domestic Violence: What's Going On?' (2008) 30 Sydney Law Review 439.

This article reports on a study of breach of protection order charges in Queensland, in this context it also discusses reasons why, in many cases, victims try to prevent prosecutions of criminal charges or refuse to assist as prosecution witnesses. Reasons include fear of increased violence, perception that assisting prosecutions may break up the family unit and the stress of the court process (p453-457). At p454, it is noted 'both individual judges and research have also recognised that the cyclical and complicated nature of domestic violence relationships often leads victims to seek to withdraw charges or understate the harm of particular conduct during periods of calm in the relationship'.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This study examines cross-applications and resulting orders in two Queensland magistrates' courts. It explores the context in which cross-applications are made and the outcomes in such cases. Consent to mutual cross-orders by victims is discussed on pp61-62, where the authors note concerns that cross-orders are often consented to 'to avoid violent reactions from the perpetrator, expedite the process, and cooperate with busy lawyers and magistrates and, in some cases, police' (p61).

Field, Rachael 'FDR and Victims of Family Violence: Ensuring a Safe Process and Outcomes' (2010) 21 Australian Dispute Resolution Journal 185.

This article discusses the range of issues that arise for victims of family violence in family dispute resolution that can make it a dangerous and unsafe process for them unless appropriate precautions are taken. See especially 'Concerns for victims of family violence in mediation' (from p189-191), identifying the fact that women's self-determination is undermined in mediation where family violence is present. For example: 'It is problematic to assume that the fear a victim experiences (because of the history of violence) can be addressed through basic process interventions such as giving him or her a fair opportunity to speak, or asking the perpetrator to stop interrupting. The reality is that these interventions, whilst appropriate and positive in supporting constructive negotiations in most other matters, cannot reverse what might be years of violent domination, coercion and control.' (p191)

Hand, Tammy, Donna Chung and Margaret Peters, The Use of Information and Communication Technologies to Coerce and Control in Domestic Violence and Following Separation (Stakeholder Paper 6) (2009, Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse, University of New South Wales).

This Stakeholder paper considers the issue of how victims 'consent' to have their phones and funds monitored by perpetrators through various means of technology. The authors note: 'the checking [of phones] may be undertaken covertly, or overtly by demand; where a woman hesitates to 'volunteer' the phone for checking, the notion of 'trust in relationships' is employed to undermine the woman's decision. In this situation, a woman is often told that she 'must have something to hide'; that is, that she cannot be trusted. The woman is not viewed as having any right to privacy. This has the effect of making her the 'difficult one' in the couple. This form of coercive control over a women causes anxiety and can promote a woman's self-blame that she is not more accommodating in the relationship' (p4). The authors note that perpetrators may use physical violence against their current or former partners to force them to disclose their email passwords, so that they can monitor email communications (p6). Some perpetrators gain 'consensual' access to internet banking to view spending and sometimes to tamper with accounts (p6). See p6 'perpetrators may use physical violence against their current or former partners to pressure them to disclose their email passwords, so that they can monitor email communications.'

Hardesty, Jennifer L and Lawrence H Ganong, 'How Women Make Custody Decisions and Manage Co-parenting with Abusive Former Husbands' (2006) 23(4) Journal of Social and Personal Relationships 543.

This study examines the processes by which women make custody decisions and manage co-parenting after divorce with abusive former husbands. Nineteen women who left abusive husbands were interviewed. The study identifies that fears, pragmatic concerns, and family ideology pushed many women toward child agreements that continued their involvement with former husbands after divorce. Men who were controlling during marriage were very involved with children post-divorce and continued to exert control over mothers. As a result, women managed conflict, set boundaries, and resisted control in the context of ongoing fear (see p558).

Heenan, Melanie, 'Just 'Keeping The Peace': A Reluctance to Respond to Male Partner Sexual Violence' (2004) 1 Issues 1 (Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault).

This Issues Paper identifies the relative silence about male partner sexual violence by women who have experienced it and by service providers. It examines some of these concerns through identifying and discussing five key areas including the law and legal treatment of the issue and the difficulties women face in recognising or naming their experience of sexual violence by a male partner as rape. For example the authors point that in cases where a male partner is charged with rape defence lawyers may attribute the 'falsity' of charges to her wanting a favourable property settlement; to secure custody of children, to continue an affair unobstructed; or as revenge (p7).

In relation to women's reluctance to name partner sexual assault the authors posit a number of reasons based on research including: fears of retaliation, of being rejected or blamed by family members and friends; their fears of reporting to police, of revealing the details of what has remained secret; of having to reflect on the humiliation and degradation they have endured ; fear of the loss of the relationship itself- having shared a life, children, a house, friendships; sense of shame they feel at having failed in their perceived duty as a wife, or in their failure to have made the relationship with their partner work (p15).

Note also the discussion of different levels of coercion in relation to male sexual behaviour including: cultural expectations of women to fulfil their "wifely duties" or the pressure to provide sexual services to their husbands regardless of their own desires; a degree of emotional manipulation that comes with women feeling obliged to have sex after their partners have threatened to seek sexual satisfaction elsewhere, or more simply, to keep the peace; the use or threat of force women described ranged from being held down, being subjected to degrading, humiliating or painful sexual acts, to being raped in the context of other physical violence and battering(p9).

Hunter, Rosemary, 'Having Her Day in Court? Violence, Legal Remedies and Consent' in Jan Breckenridge and Lesley Laing (eds), Challenging Silence: Innovative Responses to Sexual and Domestic Violence (Allen & Unwin, 1999) 61.

This book chapter is relevant for the discussion of the pros and cons for concluding legal proceedings by consent. Hunter observes consent can bring matters to a quicker and much less costly conclusion. Consent in family court matters does provide the litigant with some control over the outcome, rather than relying on an 'unpredictable judicial decision-maker'. Hunter points out that family law litigants have no option to walk away they must either reach agreement of have one imposed upon them. In protection order cases there are advantages to consent- the applicant gets the order. Consent also saves trauma in having to relates experiences to the court in front of an abuser and a courtroom full of strangers. A consent order may result in the abuser being less aggressive and therefore she may be safer (see p65-66).

Kaspiew, Rae et al, 'Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms' (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

See Chapter 9: 'Legal system professionals regularly made the point that women felt pressured to agree to outcomes in family law negotiations that they didn't feel were in their children's interests. While this was said to be happening frequently, particular concerns were expressed about the nature of the agreements reached in two different situations. The first concerned cases where there had been a history of family violence.

Also see '15.1.2 Consent orders' (from p337), noting that 'The tensions in this area are succinctly summarised in this comment by a legal practitioner about the choice litigants face in deciding whether or not to settle: "Most of them settle by consent and you've got a real tension because those that settle by consent feel as if they've been bullied into it, get a settlement because they can't afford it and they want to get it over and done with. Those that run the full trial feel as though they got shafted anyway because they didn't get heard properly. So either way they feel as though they've lost". In reflecting on their practices concerning consent orders, a common observation among registrars and judicial officers was the limited supervisory role courts have in the context of a system that encourages parties to reach agreement by themselves.'

Kaye, M et al., Compromised 'consent' in Australian Family Law Proceedings. (2021) 35(1) International Journal of Law Policy and the Family 1-25, doi: 10.1093/lawfam/ebab033

Drawing on data from a large study that explored the experiences of self-represented litigants (SRLs) in Australian family law proceedings involving allegations about family violence, this article examines the pressures experienced by female SRLs, who are victims of family violence, to consent to orders. These pressures include judicial pressure, lawyers' practices, fear of their former partner, and the financial and emotional costs of litigation. These pressures are significant and can impede the extent to which these agreements can be viewed as consensual. Participants reported that these significant and intersecting pressures resulted in them 'agreeing' to orders that they saw as unsafe, or financial orders that were less than they were entitled to. Whilst these orders are subject to judicial scrutiny; this study raises questions about the quality and utility of resultant consent orders.

Kaye, Miranda, Julie Stubbs and Julia Tolmie, 'Domestic Violence and Child Contact Arrangements' (2003) 17 Australian Journal of Family Law 93.

This article outlines the results of an Australian study examining the experiences of 40 women who negotiated and facilitated child contact arrangements with an ex-partner who has abused them. Results are supplemented by findings from interviews with 22 individuals and representatives of bodies professionally involved in the process of facilitating the development or implementation of child contact arrangements. See especially from pp9-11, discussing the concerns some interview participants had about whether agreements made by women were genuine or in the women's and their children's best interests. The study found that 'Among those with concerns about unsafe outcomes, women who had consent orders and those with privately negotiated agreements gave similar reasons for having agreed to the arrangements. These included the fact that it was easier to give in to an uncooperative and abusive co-parent, or that they believed that the children had a right to see their father and they hoped that if they gave him what he wanted he would be easier to deal with. However, several women with consent orders also cited factors associated with the dispute resolution process as having shaped their decision. For example: they thought they were legally obliged to agree; they felt under pressure from their former partner and/or the counsellor to agree; and/or they thought the arrangements were standard' (p11)

Lievore, Denise, 'No Longer Silent: A Study of Women's Help-Seeking Decisions and Service Responses to Sexual Assault' (Report, Australian Institute of Criminology, June 2005).

Semi-structured interviews were conducted with 36 female victim/survivors of adult sexual assault; consultations were conducted with 65 individuals representing services across Australia and fifty-five staff at fourteen sexual assault services across Australia were consulted about their experiences of collaborating with criminal justice and forensic medical personnel. Case studies on p74 provide an insight into sexual coercion/lack of consent in the context of intimate partner violence, including:

Tanya: 'From the beginning of their relationship her husband pressured her to engage in "sex" when she did not want to and in unwanted sexual acts. She gave in to his demands to keep him happy, but says "it wasn't dutiful sex; it was more than that. I had no control over my own body. … Tanya did not report the sexual assault to police because she did not identify her experience as sexual assault until her doctor named it'; and Dianne: 'Dianne met her husband when she was 15 and married when she was 18; she did not realise she could refuse consent and thought that if she pleased him he would love her for herself'.

Based on this research the author reports that 'women who are sexually assaulted by intimate partners may feel more powerless than those sexually assaulted by strangers, while women who are physically and sexually assaulted by their partners may experience pronounced physical and psychological effects that are specific to intimate partner sexual assault' (p76). The author notes 'women who are raped in marriage feel violated even if they don't have the words for their experience. It's part of a continuum, but how do you name it? Women are being called frigid; there's so-called persuasion; giving in to keep the peace; or men demanding sex as "reconciliation", after giving their wives a bashing, so that women submit to avoid retaliation, but it would look like consent in a court of law' (p105).

Politoff, Violeta, et al. Young Australians' attitudes to violence against women and gender equality. Findings from the 2017 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS).

In 2017, ANROWS administered the National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (2017 NCAS), a survey aiming to help understand attitudes toward violence against women, what influences those attitudes, and if there have been changes to those attitudes over time. Two of the key studied attitudes were "disregarding the need to gain consent for sexual activity", and "mistrusting women's reports of violence".

This report focuses particularly on the attitudes of young people, given higher prevalence and particular impacts of violence on young women (p 5). Overall, across the measured themes, young people's attitudes were least favourable on the theme "mistrusting women's reports of violence". Some of the key findings relating to consent were:

- One in seven respondents believed that "many allegations of sexual assault made by women are false".
- Nearly one in eight respondents did not agree or were not aware that it is a criminal offence for a man to have sex with his wife without her consent.
- Nearly a third of young men believed that "a lot of times, women who say they were raped had led the man on and then had regrets".
- More than one in four respondents believed that if a woman sends a nude image to her partner, she is partly to blame if he shares it without her consent.
- One in eight respondents believed that women mean "yes" when they say "no".

The link includes short videos on Understanding consent: Findings from the 2017 NCAS Youth report.

Stubbs, Julie, 'Beyond Apology? Domestic Violence and Critical Questions for Restorative Justice' (2007) 7(2) Criminology & Criminal Justice 169.

This paper explores key issues that remain under-developed in the restorative justice literature from a feminist perspective, taking domestic violence as a focus. The authors point out that the virtues claimed for restorative justice include its emotional engagement with crime and the opportunities afforded to participants by its discursive character, yet these issues are rarely explored from a perspective that is attentive to gendered or other asymmetrical forms of social relations. Central to this analysis are questions of victims' interests and safety, expectations about the victim's role and the appeal to apology and forgiveness in much of the restorative justice literature. It is argued that the challenge of taking gendered harms seriously may require an approach that differs from common restorative justice practices such as the development of hybrid models that draw from both conventional criminal justice and restorative justice. At p180 – 'We need to move beyond polarized debates that characterize women as either free agents empowered through choice or as too victimized to act in their own interests and to recognize agency as constrained by material circumstances and cultural narratives and practices.'

Wangmann, Jane, 'Incidents v Context: How Does the NSW Protection Order System Understand Intimate Partner Violence?' (2012) 34 Sydney Law Review 695.

This article considers the protection order system in NSW. At p714-716 the article explores the emphasis on settlement in protection order proceedings, noting that the notion of consent in protection order proceedings is problematic. See p715 'While there are a range of benefits associated with the ability to consent to a protection order without the necessity of a contested hearing, there are also a range of disadvantages, for example, such a regime assumes that the parties are equal in their negotiations, that there are no other factors, such as intimidation and threats, that influence the willingness to consent, and it fails to provide a public forum in which the woman's story is affirmed and the man's actions are clearly denounced'.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33 University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article examines the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in NSW. The article looks at the ways in which perpetrators use cross-applications for protection orders as a way to continue their abuse. The author notes that cross-applications 'are not only a mechanism through which a person may raise counter allegations about violence (and hence a data source to compare men's and women's allegations); they are also a legal mechanism that appears to be used by some men as a tactic or 'bargaining tool' to bring about a particular resolution- ideally mutual withdrawal. The research identifies that 45.5 per cent of cross applications in the court file sample resulted in mutual withdrawal; 28.6 per cent resulted in mutual orders; 18.2 per cent resulted in the woman being granted an order and not the man; and the remaining 7.8 per cent being were resolved by mutual dismissal' (at p967).

Webster, Kim, Diemer, K., Honey, N., Mannix, S., Mickle, J., Morgan, J., … Ward, A, Australians' attitudes to violence against women and gender equality. Findings from the 2017 National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (NCAS) (ANROWS, 2018).

In 2017, ANROWS administered the National Community Attitudes towards Violence against Women Survey (2017 NCAS), a survey aiming to help understand attitudes toward violence against women, what influences those attitudes, and if there have been changes to those attitudes over time. One of the key studied themes is attitudes toward consent for sexual activity.

The 2017 NCAS shows the pervasiveness of concerning attitudes toward consent, such as (pp 11-12):

- 31 percent of respondents agreed that "a lot of times", women who say they were raped had "led the man on and then had regrets";
- 42 percent agreed that sexual assault accusations are commonly used to get back at a man;
- 23 percent agreed that women find it flattering to be pursued, even if they are not interested;
- 12 percent still agree that women "often" say no when they mean yes;
- 28 percent believed that when a man is very sexually aroused, he may not realise that a women doesn't want to have sex;
- 33 percent agreed that rape results from men not being able to control their need for sex; and
- 19 percent still do not agree that rape in marriage is a crime (p 6).

The 2017 NCAS also investigated whether or not Australians would justify non-consensual sex in different circumstances. The survey found that few Australians believed a man would be justified if he tried to have sex with a woman he was kissing after she had pushed him away. However, the proportion of Australians justifying the behaviour was greater in the scenario in which the woman had taken the man into the bedroom and started kissing him before pushing him away (p 13).

The findings show that a concerning number of Australians are unclear about what constitutes consent, and the line between consensual sex and coercion. The report states that “gendered power dynamics, expectations and stereotypes related to sexuality influence how consent is understood and negotiated” (for example, men as aggressive and women as submissive) (p 13).

International

Basile, Kathleen C, ‘Rape by Acquiescence: The Ways in Which Women “Give In” to Unwanted Sex with their Husbands’ (1999) 5(9) Violence Against Women 1036.

In this article, the author examines women's processes of acquiescence to unwanted sex in marriage. Analyses of 41 interviews with (USA based) women who have experienced some form of unwanted sex in a marital or long-term intimate relationship. Notably 21 women described severe coercion (including verbal bullying, physical force and/ or threats of force) (p1045). The author uncovers five types of acquiescence to unwanted sex and discusses the conditions under which women adopt a given type. Types of acquiescence (from p1045): unwanted turns to wanted; it’s my duty; easier not to argue; ‘[d]on’t know what might happen if I don’t’ (p1049), and ‘[k]now what will happen if I don’t’ (p1049). The latter two types especially draw on coercive and controlling behaviours in the relationships to explain women’s acquiescence to sex.

Cara Person, Kathryn Moracco, Christine Agnew-Brune and J. Michael Bowling, ‘“I Don’t Know That I’ve Ever Felt Like I Got the Full Story”: A Qualitative Study of Courtroom Interactions Between Judges and Litigants in Domestic Violence Protective Order Cases’ (2018) 24(12) Violence Against Women 1474-1496.

Intimate partner violence (IPV) is a widespread, ongoing and complex social problem. One in three women in the US has been exposed to IPV, and many seek domestic violence protective orders (DVPOs). The authors conducted DVPO hearing observations and phone interviews with District Court judges in North Carolina (US) to examine how courtroom interactions and information available to judges may influence DVPO decisions. The study provides insight into the varied engagement levels and demeanours of judges, the potential influence on litigant behaviour and judges’ use of perceptions of credibility and evidence when making decisions in DVPO cases. The courtroom observations and interviews both suggested that the information available to help judges make decisions in many DVPO cases may be insufficient as the information presented in the case file is often incomplete. Plaintiffs may not provide sufficient details about the incident of abuse, or may not present physical evidence or witnesses during the hearing. Information in relation to whether the defendant has access to firearms may also be unknown. In addition to the gaps in the information available to judges, judges have limited time to review case files and to hear each case.

Ellison, Louise and Vanessa Munro, 'Better the Devil You Know? 'Real Rape' Stereotypes and the Relevance of a Previous Relationship in (Mock) Juror Deliberation' (2013) 17 International Journal of Evidence and Proof 299.

The authors conducted a study in which 160 members of the public were recruited and, after observing one of four mini trial reconstructions involving an alleged rape by the complainant's ex-partner, were divided into juries and asked to deliberate towards a verdict. The vast majority of the 'jurors' were receptive, in principle, to the idea that a woman could be raped by a man with whom she had previously had a relationship. However the 'jurors' continued to consider these cases to be 'less clear-cut', 'more delicate' and 'a lot harder' than rapes involving a stranger. The authors found that 'notwithstanding the fact that [the 'jurors'] received an extended judicial direction which, in line with guidance now contained in the [relevant UK] Benchbook, emphasised that rape by an acquaintance or intimate partner is no less serious than rape by a stranger, [the] findings suggest that jurors continued to struggle to convict because of engrained expectations regarding resistance and sexual miscommunication, which often interacted in heightened and quite specific ways with the fact of a previous sexual relationship' (p303). Also see especially pp315-316 detailing the 'jurors' considerations in relation to the complainant and defendant's previous relationship, noting that they were less likely to accept the complainant may have 'frozen' during the sexual attack because the attacker was a former partner, except for where there 'had been a history of domestic abuse at the hands of the defendant, in which case it was felt that a frightened 'freezing' response might have been more credible' (p315).

Gauthier, Sonia, 'The Perceptions of Judicial and Psychosocial Interveners of the Consequences of Dropped Charges in Domestic Violence Cases' (2010) 16 Violence Against Women 1395.

This article presents a qualitative study exploring the dismissal of criminal charges in domestic violence cases and the various consequences of the decision to dismiss the charges. At p1376-1377 the article notes reasons why victims of domestic violence often do not cooperate with the judicial process including refusing to testify. Reasons include: fear of spousal retaliation, forgiveness of or reconciliation with the offender, emotional dependence on the offender, victim's lack of confidence in the judicial system and inadequate protection for victim's as a witness.

Goodmark, Leigh, 'Autonomy Feminism: An Anti-Essentialist Critique of Mandatory Interventions In Domestic Violence Cases' (2009) 37 Florida State University Law Review 1.

In this article Goodmark argues that domestic violence law and policy prioritizes the goals of policymakers and battered women's advocates - safety and batterer accountability- over the goals of individual women looking for a way to address the violence in their relationships. While the focus of this article is on mandatory policies, including prosecution and reporting, it can be extrapolated to other aspects of the justice process in Australia. It looks at the conflict between women's autonomy in coercive and controlling relationships and their autonomy in the legal process (i.e. paternalism) from pp25-28. The article goes on to analyse (dis)empowerment, and its importance for battered women in the legal system.

Krahe, Barbara et al, 'Prospective Lawyers' Rape Stereotypes and Schematic Decision Making about Rape Cases' (2008) 14(5) Psychology, Crime and Law 461.

This article reports on two studies. In Study 1, 451 undergraduate law students rated rape scenarios with respect to defendant–complainant relationship and coercive strategy (force versus exploitation of the complainant's alcohol-induced defencelessness). Study 2 involved 129 postgraduate trainee lawyers and showed that sentencing recommendations also varied as a function of defendant–complainant relationship and coercive strategy. The authors conclude that the studies show that 'there is a general tendency to attribute less blame to the perpetrator and more blame to the victim of a rape scenario when the rape occurred between dating or marital partners than when victim and perpetrator were presented as strangers' (p462). Results from the study are presented on p467 and indicate that participants perceived the defendant's liability to be reduced in acquaintance and ex-partner perpetrated rapes, compared to stranger rapes, especially where force was used. This demonstrated that 'whilst defendant-complainant relationship did not affect perceptions of defendant liability among participants unaccepting of rape myths, those who accepted rape myths held the defendant less liable the closer his relationship to the complainant' (p467). Moreover, 'more blame was attributed to the complainant in the stranger and acquaintance rapes when the defendant exploited the complainant's alcohol-induced incapacity than when he used force. This was reversed in the ex-partner rapes, where the complainant was blamed less in the alcohol-related than in the force-related cases.' (p468)

Littwin, Angela, 'Coerced Debt: The Role of Consumer Credit in Domestic Violence' (2012) 100 California Law Review 951.

The author defines coerced debt as 'all nonconsensual, credit-related transactions that occur in a violent relationship, not just matters that depend on the express application of force. Because intimidation and control pervade the type of abusive relationships in which coerced debt emerges, the line that separates fraudulent transactions from those of a coercive nature is blurry at best' (p954). Specific methods of coercing debt are considered from p986, including through fraud (p986), force (p989), and misinformation (p990). The author highlights particular issues in these sections for women who may not read/speak English, and gay and lesbian victims. 'Issues specific to secured debt' (from p992) also discusses non-consensual refinancing and home equity fraud.

Logan, TK, Robert Walker and Jennifer Cole, 'Silenced Suffering: The Need for a Better Understanding of Partner Sexual Violence' (2015) 16 Trauma, Violence and Abuse 111.

This article considers how domestic violence limits a victim's capacity to consent to sexual behaviour. At pp 112-113 the authors discuss the widely held assumption that prior consensual sex is evidence of present consent. The authors posit that there are three areas to examine to better define the role sexual violence plays in coercive control: (1) sexual degradation and humiliation often serve as a potentially significant undercurrent in the context of partner sexual violence (p121); (2) the boundaries of sexual autonomy and consent- identifies tactics used to obtain 'consent': sexual coercion in the context of implicit threat; substance facilitated; incapacitated (p122); (3) the trajectory of sexual violence with other forms of abuse (p121) considers links between separation and sexual violence and stalking and sexual violence. The authors analyse the role sexual violence plays in relationships characterised by coercive control – 'the core of a violent relationship is coercive control, thus sexual consent may be rendered meaningless within the context of a controlling and abusive relationship' (p122).

Impact on Disclosure

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, Report 114 (2010).

This report discusses reasons behind victim's reluctance to disclose sexual offences. Includes considerations specific to those experiencing sexual or other abuse in domestic and family violence context: ongoing relationship between the victim and perpetrator; economic dependence and potential homelessness; the presence of children; and other avenues for redress such as civil protection orders. P1193-1196

Cox, Peta, Violence against women in Australia: Additional analysis of the Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey, 2012 (ANROWS, 2016 Rev.ed.).

This report provides substantial additional analysis of the data produced through the Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2012. It highlights important statistics around rates of disclosure. (Note: this article refers to a previous release of the ABS' Personal Safety Survey, but the analysis remains useful. See Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2016 for most recent release.)

In relation to their most recent incident of sexual assault by a male, one in six women had not told anyone about the sexual assault (p 3). When a woman's most recent incident of male-perpetrated sexual assault was perpetrated by a male cohabiting partner and she did not contact the police, the three key reasons given were: they did not want to ask for help or felt they could deal with it themselves; fear of the person responsible; and that they did not regard it as a serious offence or crime (p 69). When a woman's most recent incident of male-perpetrated physical assault was perpetrated by a male cohabiting partner, one in nine had not told anyone about the assault—this is higher than the number of women whose most recent incident of male-perpetrated physical assault was perpetrated by a stranger or an "other known male" (p 111). When a woman's most recent incident of male-perpetrated physical assault was perpetrated by a male cohabiting partner and she did not contact the police, the two key reasons given were: they did not want to ask for help or felt they could deal with it themselves; fear of the person responsible (p 106). A graph on page 104 shows the low levels of perception of sexual and physical assault as a crime when it is perpetrated by a cohabiting partner.

Note: this article refers to a previous release of the ABS' Personal Safety Survey, but the analysis remains useful. See Australian Personal Safety Survey (PSS) 2016 for most recent release.

Jennings, Chris 'Disclose Family Violence and Risk Homelessness' (2003) 16(10) Parity 24.

This paper reviews literature and identifies unique barriers to disclosure for women with disabilities including: greater social isolation; the impact of previous help-seeking experiences; the difficulty many experience in being believed or taken seriously; the sheer practical obstacles they face in obtaining information or assistance; a lack of awareness and skills on the part of service-providers in dealing with women with disabilities who experience domestic violence; a lack of coordination and cooperation across services regarding these women's needs (p24).

Kaye, Miranda; Julie Stubbs and Julie Tolmie, ' Negotiating child residence and contact arrangements against a background of domestic violence: research report 1.' Socio-Legal Research Centre, Griffith University, 2003.

This research study interviewed 40 women who were involved in child residence and contact negotiations with an abusive ex-partner. The report also includes interviews with 22 professional personnel, including lawyers, counsellors, refuge workers, domestic violence court assistant scheme workers and supervised contact centre workers, who have involvement in these cases. 'In general, it appeared that women felt constrained by the lack of responsiveness of the system to hear and validate their thoughts about what was in the best interest of their children or to ensure that safety mechanisms were in place. Many questioned the ability of the court and professionals to determine these critical factors. Contrary to some views, 70.9% of women found it very difficult to disclose domestic violence to professionals they came in contact with, at least initially.

Kirkwood, Debbie Behind Closed Doors: Family Dispute Resolution and Family Violence (Discussion Paper No. 6) (2007, Domestic Violence and Incest Resource Centre, Melbourne).

Literature review considers issues around Family Dispute Resolution and family violence. Identifies that there are many reasons why women may not disclose family violence, including fear for their safety and that of their children or other family members, denial, embarrassment, concern about their children knowing about the abuse, and a lack of faith in other people's ability to help them. The majority of victims do not report the violence to police or other services. Women from CALD backgrounds, Indigenous women and women with disabilities can experience even greater barriers to disclosure, including cultural and communication barriers and isolation. (p27) 'The requirement to consider the willingness and ability of a parent to facilitate a close and continuing relationship between the child and the other parent fails to recognise that a reluctance to do so can result from genuine concern about the wellbeing of the child where there has been family violence or child abuse. This requirement may further discourage women from disclosing family violence because they fear being perceived as a 'hostile' parent' (p12).

Lievore, Denise 'Non-Reporting and Hidden Recording of Sexual Assault: An International Literature Review' (Commonwealth Office of the Status of Women, AIC, 2003).

This review considers 'non-reporting as a rational response' (from p37). It discusses the reasons why a victim may not report sexual assault including victimisation, agency issues, self-esteem. It notes that 'if agency is understood as an ongoing, negotiated process that is facilitated by social structures, practices, relationships and contexts, it becomes easier to understand that women's silence around sexual victimisation is produced both by the effects of oppression and through their attempts to balance the varying and often conflicting demands of their personal and social situations' (p38). It observes that 'incentives and barriers to reporting are mediated by a range of factors, such as access to resources, the values of the community, knowledge about options and legal processes, geographical and social isolation, and so on. Apprehension of an offender who is a family member or intimate partner may deprive victims who are emotionally or socially dependent on the perpetrator of the minimal social and emotional resources already available' (p38).

Meyer, Silke 'Responding to Intimate Partner Violence Victimisation: Effective Options for Help-Seeking' (2010) Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice, Australian Institute of Criminology No. 389.

Draws on International Violence Against Women Survey data (2002-2003- see Mouzos and Makkai below) and examines formal and informal forms of help-seeking among victims of intimate partner violence to identify predictors and illuminate opportunities for improving formal intervention measure.

In particular the 'findings highlight the role of children, partners' prior counselling experiences and the severity of abuse as key predictors of victims' decisions to seek formal, in addition to informal, support' 'the observed association between abuse severity and victims' help-seeking behaviours illuminates the opportunity for further reducing harm. Victims who experienced more severe and often life-threatening types of abuse are significantly more likely to approach formal sources including, but not limited to, medical professionals.' (p5)

Mouzos, Jenny and Toni Makkai, Women's Experience of Male Violence: Findings from the Australian Component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS) , Research and Policy Series No 56 (Australian Institute of Criminology, 2004).

This paper reports on the findings of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS), which was conducted across Australia between December 2002 and June 2003. A total of 6,677 women aged between 18 and 69 years participated in the survey, and provided information on their experiences of physical and sexual violence including childhood violence. Notes reasons for non-reporting: (pp97-98)

- In some cases women may not regard it as unacceptable behaviour (evidenced by the fact that only 26% of victims in the IVAWS considered their experience a crime), and may fear the reactions of others. The reactions and support of family and friends were reported to impact significantly on women's wellbeing.
- Notes the Australian ideal of privacy in the home would also prevent many neighbours or friends from reporting known incidents of domestic violence to police.

From IVAWS survey data identifies statistics on lack of reporting:

- few women who experienced violence by an intimate partner or some other male had reported the most recent incident to police or judicial authorities (see figures 40 and 41).
- 14 per cent of women who experienced violence from an intimate partner, and 16 per cent of women who experienced violence by someone else reported the most recent incident to police.
- Differences emerged in levels of reporting based on the victim-offender relationship. In terms of women victimised by intimate partners, a greater proportion of women who were victimised by a previous husband/partner reported the most recent incident to police (24%) compared to women who were victimised by a current husband/partner or current/previous boyfriend (8%; Figure 40).' (p101)

Spangaro, Joanne M; Anthony B Zwi and Roslyn G Poulos, '"Persist. Persist": A Qualitative Study of Women's Decisions to Disclose and Their Perceptions of the Impact of Routine Screening for Intimate Partner Violence' (2011) 1 Psychology of Violence 150.

This article presents the findings from a small qualitative study of routine screening for intimate partner violence (IPV) among health services in New South Wales. The researchers conducted interviews with 20 women six months after they had given positive response to IPV screening questions.

The research identifies three elements - direct asking, a trustworthy or trusted person, and choice, constituted key aspects of the screening that supported disclosure' (p155). Results indicated that disclosure facilitated when women judged it safe on three dimensions; from the abuser, from shame and from losing control (p158).

Spangaro, Joanne M; et al, 'Who Tells and What Happens: Disclosure and Health Service Responses to Screening for Intimate Partner Violence' (2010) 18(6) Health and Social Care in the Community 671.

Two samples of women were surveyed between March 2007 and July 2008; those who reported abuse during screening 6 months previously (122) and those who did not report abuse at that time (241). Twenty-three per cent (27/120) of women who reported abuse on screening were revealing this for the first time to any other person. Of those who screened negative, 14% (34/240) had experienced recent or current abuse, but chose not to disclose this when screened. The main reasons for not telling were: not considering the abuse serious enough, fear of the offender finding out and not feeling comfortable with the health worker.

Twenty-nine women provided explanation for their decision not to disclose IPV. The women were given a list of six reasons which they ranked as follows: abuse not considered serious enough (8); fear of offender finding out (4); not comfortable with the health worker (2); embarrassment or shame (1); worry about who else would be told (1). None of the women selected the option 'Thought it was own fault' as the main reason for not disclosing. Nine women ticked 'Other' and gave diverse explanations such as, 'Abuse is infrequent and manageable', 'Wasn't a priority to talk about it then, just wanted to get better', 'Not with that person anymore.' (p676)

Stavrou, Efty, Suzanne Poynton and Don Weatherburn, 'Intimate partner violence against women in Australia: related factors and help-seeking behaviours' [2016] 200 Crime and Justice Bulletin 1.

The aim of this study was to 'determine which factors were associated with (1) female experiences of intimate partner violence (IPV), (2) female reporting of physical or sexual assault by an intimate partner to the police and (3) females seeking help and support after experiencing IPV'. It found that, '[t]he risk of IPV varies greatly across the community. Factors associated with a higher risk of IPV included being younger, Australian-born, having a long-term health condition, lacking social support, experiencing financial stress, having previously been a victim of child abuse and having experienced emotional abuse by an intimate partner' (p.1)

It also found that, '[w]here the most recent incident of physical or sexual assault in the last two years was perpetrated by an intimate partner, less than one in three assaults were reported to the police. Intimate partner assaults were less likely to be reported to the police if the perpetrator was still a current partner of the victim at the time of the interview, the assault was sexual (not physical) and if the victim perceived the assault was "not a crime" or "not serious enough". Having a physical injury after the incident was associated with an increased likelihood of reporting the assault to the police. Where the most recent incident of violence (assaults and threats) was perpetrated by an intimate partner, a counsellor or social worker was consulted after 30% of all incidents' (p.1).

Voce, Isabella and Hayley Boxall, Who Reports Domestic Violence to Police? A Review of the Evidence (Research Report No 559, September 2018, Australian Institute of Criminology)

The police play an important role in the management of immediate harm and risk associated with domestic violence. However, the hidden nature of domestic violence incidents means that the involvement of police is dependent on a report being made. Set against the backdrop of increasing levels of reporting of domestic violence in Australia, the current study analysed 21 Australian and international quantitative studies of victim self-report data to identify factors associated with victim reporting of domestic violence to police. The analysis found that victims who are female, non-white, experiencing frequent violence and who have been abused in the past are more likely to report. Incidents that involve serious violence, an intoxicated offender and/or child witnesses are also more likely to be reported to the police.

Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws: Report (2006).

Notes: ‘ Victims report that sexual forms of family violence, such as rape or other forced sexual acts, are particularly difficult to talk about, even when other violence has been disclosed’ (p102)

Explains that in many courts applications for protection orders are made in a public place. Notes: ‘This is not only unsafe, but the application requires victims to list the reasons they need an order, which will require the disclosure of the family violence they have suffered. For some people, this constitutes the disclosure of many years of abuse, some of which may be of a particularly sensitive nature (eg sexual violence). A public place is obviously not the most appropriate venue for such a process’ (p226).

Wendt, Sarah, Donna Chung, Alison Elder, Antonia Hendrick and Angela Hartwig, Seeking help for domestic and family violence: Exploring regional, rural, and remote women’s coping experiences – Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2017).

This qualitative study examined the experiences of women seeking help for domestic and family violence who live in regional, rural, and remote areas in Australia. The research drew on interviews with 23 women and interviews / focus groups involving 37 managers and practitioners. Some key findings from the study help to understand experiences of women living in social and geographical isolation. This includes (p 4):

- Women coping alone with violence for extended periods through various active strategies such as placating and trying to help their partner;
- shame and embarrassment delaying help-seeking;
- Aboriginal women’s dignity and pride being associated with being able to keep their children safe and rely on families;
- Aboriginal women using temporary stays at refuges as a way of staying safe; and
- Social isolation affecting help-seeking more than physical distance from local communities”.

Wendt, Sarah, Donna Chung, Alison Elder, Lia Bryant, Seeking help for domestic violence: Exploring rural women's coping experiences: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This literature review focuses on the unique experiences and specific barriers faced by women experiencing family or domestic violence in rural and remote areas. It notes that women living in socially and geographically isolated places often cope with domestic and family violence by themselves for long periods of time (p 1). See p5-6 which discusses the structural barriers and cultural factors that prevent rural women from disclosing, including that 'self-reliance was so valued and upheld in families that to disclose or ask for help about domestic and family violence was perceived as a failure or shameful' (p 6).

The review notes that effect of social and geographical isolation is particularly important for Indigenous women's ability to disclose, and that the small and tight-knit nature of Indigenous communities can influence decisions to report (p 10).

Pages 10-12 discuss the particular barriers for culturally and linguistically diverse women (such as racism, lack of access to interpreters, and cultural isolation), those identifying as LBTIQ (such as discrimination, homophobic or transphobic attitudes, and a lack of specialist services), and women with disabilities (such as relying on the abuser for transport, and a lack of specialist services).

Willis, Matthew 'Non-Disclosure of Violence in Australian Indigenous Communities' Trends and Issues in Crime and Criminal Justice (No 405, AIC, 2011).

This paper reviews literature and explores some of the reasons for the high rates of non-disclosure of violence generally and domestic violence specifically in Indigenous communities. Reasons include:

- 'Victims may fear retaliation from the perpetrator, friends or family. This may be particularly so if the victim feels that reporting the incident may lead to police intervention but not prosecution, such as where the police treat family violence or spousal sexual assault as a 'private matter' and deal with it through conciliation or mediation rather than charging. The victim's decisions, particularly those of female victims in family violence situations, may also be heavily influenced by power, control and manipulation on the part of the offender' (p4)

- ‘Victims may not want to disrupt the perpetrator’s relationship with children, or affect relationships with other family members or friends. Anxiety about the effects on family was found to be the second most common reason for not reporting, after not being believed, in a New Zealand sample of sexual assault survivors/ victims. Whether the perpetrator is known to the victim or not, the victim may weigh up the impacts on the perpetrator of being charged with an offence, such as loss of employment, reputation or possible imprisonment’ (p4)

International

Alaggia, Ramona; Cheryl Regehr and Angelique Jenney, ‘Risky Business: An Ecological Analysis of Intimate Partner Violence Disclosure’ (2012) 22(3) Research on Social Work Practice 301.

This research reports on interviews with individuals and focus groups undertaken to collect data from 98 IPV survivors and service providers. The research concludes that ‘IPV disclosure remains a “risky business” with perceived negative outcomes outweighing benefits. Results reinforce that social work interventions need to occur at all levels of the human ecology in order to provide effective responses.’

This article provides a good overview of barriers to and decision-making around disclosing intimate partner violence. It considers intrapersonal factors (such as mental health and distress, resilience and resistance; p306), family and cultural dilemmas (such as shame, and presence of children), community services (including the inappropriate responses some women experienced, racism, accessibility, numerous issues around police intervention including losing control over the process that comes into play; p307), and policy and program impacts (including immigration and deportation issues, child welfare reporting, and financial vulnerability; p307-8). It concludes that ‘Individuals will carefully assess their situational context and only disclose in varied degrees and amounts, depending on their reading of anticipated risks and benefits. Until the benefits clearly outweigh the risks, disclosure will be withheld’ (p309).

Calton, Jenna M; Lauren Bennett Cattaneo and Kris T Gebhard, ‘Barriers to Help Seeking for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer Survivors of Intimate Partner Violence’ (2015) (May) Trauma, Violence, Abuse.

This article reviews the literature on LGBTQ intimate partner violence and suggests three major barriers to help-seeking exist for LGBTQ IPV survivors: a limited understanding of the problem of LGBTQ IPV, stigma, and systemic inequities (p7).

Evans, Maggie A and Gene S Feder, 'Help-Seeking Amongst Women Survivors of Domestic Violence: A Qualitative Study of Pathways towards Formal and Informal Support' (2016) 19(1) Health Expectations 62.

This article reports on interviews with 31 women survivors of domestic violence abuse to explore their pathways to support and their experiences of barriers and facilitators to disclosure and help-seeking. Notes that 'for most women, disclosure to others only began after leaving the relationship. Many justified not seeking help or leaving their partner sooner by prioritising their role as a mother who needed to keep the family together' (p67). Barriers to disclosure identified include (from p68): women's self-perception (i.e. not recognising behaviour as abusive, depression, low self-esteem, perceptions of their role in the family as supporting others, fearing a judgmental response); past relationship experience (i.e. multiple abusive relationships contributing to the perception that help would not be available or being fearful of change and not being taken seriously); and fear of repercussions of disclosure.

Fanslow, Janet L and Elizabeth M Robinson, 'Help-Seeking Behaviors and Reasons for Help Seeking Reported by A Representative Sample of Women Victims of Intimate Partner Violence in New Zealand' (2010) 25(5) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 929.

This article identifies the link between disclosure and help. Using data from the New Zealand Violence Against Women Study the authors report on the help-seeking behaviours of the women who had ever in their lifetime experienced physical and/or sexual violence by an intimate partner (n = 956). More than 75% of respondents reported that they had told someone about the violence however, more than 40% of women indicated that no one had helped them. (p942)

Garcia-Moreno, Claudia; et al, '[WHO Multi-Country Study on Women's Health and Domestic Violence Against Women: Initial Results on Prevalence, Health Outcomes and Women's Responses]' (World Health Organisation, 2005).

Identifies high rates of non-disclosure of domestic and family violence globally. Notes that the respondents' most common reason for not seeking help was either that they considered the violence normal or not serious' (p19).

Ver Steegh, Nancy 'The Uniform Collaborative Law Act and Intimate Partner Violence: A Roadmap for Collaborative (and Non-Collaborative) Lawyers' (2009) 38 Hofstra Law Review 699.

Among other issues this article considers reasons why victims may not report abuse. The author observes: 'Victims of coercive-controlling violence have good reason to deny or minimize violence. If disclosure is discovered or even suspected by the perpetrator, the victim and children will likely be subjected to additional abuse… A victim may be more likely to disclose coercive-controlling violence after establishing a trusted relationship with an open and empathetic listener' (p719). Note also her suggestion that there should be multiple opportunities for victims to disclose throughout the process (p730).

Impact on consent and disclosure - Other Resources

- False allegations of abuse - or not? Understanding the reality of domestic violence & sexual assault.

Victim experience of court processes

Where a victim is a party to domestic and family violence related proceedings, their experience of court processes is likely to be improved where the judicial officer has a good understanding of domestic and family violence. Researchers have identified a range of judicial behaviours that may have the effect of either exacerbating a victim's experience of domestic and family violence (also known as secondary abuse) or helping to empower a victim to regain control of their circumstances, wellbeing and future. Studies have found that respectful and inclusive approaches may positively affect victims' mental health as well as their sense of satisfaction [Fleury 2002] with court processes. The following tables highlight a number of common victim experiences and suggest proactive approaches by judicial officers to improve satisfaction and minimise the risk of secondary abuse.

Judicial conduct of proceedings

Experiences	Proactive approaches
Sense of limited opportunity to speak and be heard [Kaye 2019]	> Ask about victim's fears, concerns and needs, both personal and relating to children eg child support > Allow victim opportunity to raise other issues, and ask questions to clarify > Convey clear message that victim has been heard and respected, and that the process and outcome have the force of judicial authority
Sense that abuse minimised, denied or made light of [Roberts et al 2014], or of being blamed for abuse [Ptacek 1999]; a sense of being on trial [Laing 2013]	> Recognise the complexity, seriousness and possible financial impact [Braaf & Meyering 2009] of the victim's circumstances and experiences and the impact on children's wellbeing and safety > Where possible facilitate the use of screens, phone or video evidence where victim fears having to testify against perpetrator or being in perpetrator's presence [Vulnerable witness provisions (Australia)] > Demand high standards of probity and respectful demeanour from all legal representatives acting in the proceedings > Avoid labelling behaviours as 'relationship conflict' or 'couple fighting' that can be resolved through couple-counselling, reconciliation, separation or the making mutual orders [Hunter 2006] > Avoid routine approach to duration of orders; consider how long they are needed [Hunter 2006] having regard to the victim's particular circumstances and experiences

	Avoid routine approach to shared parental responsibilities; consider how violence impacts on children's wellbeing and safety, and parents' respective capacity to care for children
Sense that greater concern for perpetrator than for protection of victim and children [Ptacek 1999], and that perpetrator not being held accountable for actions [Braaf & Meyering 2009]	Avoid familiar or colluding demeanour towards perpetrator Emphasise that court will not tolerate violence and abuse Question perpetrator's possible misuse of court processes (systems abuse) eg where multiple applications for adjournment; cross applications that publicly shame victim, seek to trivialise the victim's experiences, or seek an advantage in Family Court proceedings; applications that seek to have matters heard separately Impose sanctions for perpetrator's breach of orders or systems abuse appropriate to level of seriousness and harm caused Encourage victim to return to the court if they need to

Legal representation

Experiences	Proactive approaches
Absence of, or inability to access, or refusal of legal representation resulting in self-representation for victim and/or perpetrator	Explain to party/ies the possible consequences of self-representation including unfamiliarity with court processes, having to deal directly with the other party's legal representative, an imbalance of bargaining power between parties, consent orders or inappropriate outcomes, perpetuation of abuse through court process [Kaspiew et al Survey of Family Law Practices 2015] Where victim is self-represented, consider whether the victim's fear of the perpetrator diminishes or negates their capacity to cross-examine the perpetrator and jeopardises the court's ability to receive the necessary evidence in order to make decisions for the safety and protection of victims and children [Vulnerable witness provisions (Australia)] Where perpetrator is self-represented, consider the likely adverse impact on the victim and the victim's evidence of the perpetrator's direct cross-examination and whether steps should be taken to protect the victim from further abuse by the perpetrator while ensuring procedural fairness and access to justice (eg screens, video link) [Vulnerable witness provisions (Australia)] Ask questions of self-represented party/ies to ensure understanding of nature and effect of orders/outcomes Demand high standards of probity from legal representatives See "Judicial conduct of proceedings" above

Courthouse and courtroom

Experiences	Proactive approaches
Sense of intimidation arriving at court Lack of safety Lack of privacy [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016, JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016] Lack of safe waiting areas [Ptacek 1999] Fear of or actual confrontation with perpetrator/family and friends [Roberts et al 2014] Long waiting times	> Consider introducing 'greeters' at courts [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016, JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016] > Consider whether there is space available to establish a safe room (eg such as using an existing interview room) > Consider segregating waiting area > Consider (improved) waiting area security > Ensure court staff trained in safety and risk procedures appropriate to managing court precinct > Consider separate entries to court for victims and perpetrators. > Consider seating parties and witnesses so as to prevent eye contact between perpetrators and those they target > Where possible, facilitate the use of screens, phone or video evidence where victim fears being in perpetrator's presence [Vulnerable witness provisions (Australia)] > Consider whether victims are safe to leave the court and whether it is possible for security officers /police to escort victims to their transport > Consider splitting court days into morning and afternoon sessions so waiting is limited to half a day [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016, JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016].
Lack of facilities/services for children, people with special needs [Ptacek 1999], for example: Appropriate space Appropriate access Communication: it may be assumed that interpreters are not needed, or there may be cross-cultural communication issues, for example for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people who don't speak English as their first language, communication may be difficult, and they may find non-verbal expression and body language confusing or	> Consider whether there is space available to establish a room appropriate for children while parties wait for/participate in proceedings > Ensure that all areas are accessible by wheelchair > Ensure appropriate interpreter or translator services are provided > Make court interpreter policies publicly available [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016] > Consider whether information about legal options can be made available in different forms, eg written, visual, aural > Consider whether support person can be made available > Consider playing educational videos in court waiting areas [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016] > Consider whether Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander elders or cross-cultural liaison officers [JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016] may be needed to assist with communication issues or the practicalities of giving sworn oral evidence [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016].

intimidating; for culturally and linguistically diverse people who wear a form of headscarf, it may be wrongly assumed that they are of the Muslim faith
Lack of information about processes [Gillis et al 2006] and options, and lack of appropriate court support [Ptacek 1999]	> Ensure information about legal options made available in appropriate form > Consider whether support person can be made available > Consider whether representatives from local support services can be available in the court precinct for referrals
Unfamiliar, intimidating and demeaning environment [Gillis et al 2006] Bureaucratic and indifferent treatment by court staff [Ptacek 1999]	> Consider introducing 'greeters' at courts [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016] > Ensure that court staff speak to and treat victim and children respectfully, take steps to alleviate victim's fears where possible, and follow safety and risk procedures
Exclusion from courtroom in response to safety concerns resulting in sense of marginalisation and lack of participation in process [Kaspiew et al Survey of Family Law Practices 2015]	> Consider how courtroom layout and presence/absence of particular individuals may accommodate victim's presence in courtroom while alleviating safety concerns

Victim experience of court processes - Key Literature

Australia

Braaf, Rochelle, and Isobelle Barrett Meyering, 'When Does It End? The Continuation of Family Violence through the Court Process, Financial Outcomes for Women and Good Practice' (Paper presented at Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration Family Violence Conference, Brisbane, 1-3 October 2009).

Working with eight services across Queensland, South Australia and Victoria, the authors conducted interviews and focus groups with approximately forty staff and sixty female clients who have experienced abuse. It identifies a number of issues women experience with the court system, including access to and satisfaction with Legal Aid and legal representation, and financial costs. In terms of their experience of the court process generally, women commented on feeling disempowered and lacking faith in the courts due to safety issues and not feeling as if they were being heard (p3), and perpetrators not being held accountable by the courts (p4).

Douglas, Heather, 'Domestic and Family Violence, Mental Health and Well-Being, and Legal Engagement' (2017) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law (online).

This article draws from interviews with a group of diverse women who have engaged with the legal system after experiencing domestic and family violence (DFV). The study sought to investigate how women's experiences of legal processes 'affected their mental health and well-being' (p 1). Almost all the women experienced some type of mental health issue directly attributable to DFV (p 5). Many women engaged preventative measures prior to attending court, including pre-court counselling, contacting mental health practitioners, and taking prescribed medication (p 2). Other women self-medicated and avoided seeking help fearing that proof of mental health concerns may lead to negative court outcomes (p 2). Many women highlighted attending court (pp 5-6), having to face the perpetrator in court (pp 6-8), and giving evidence (pp 8-9) as negatively affecting their mental health (p 10). A number of suggestions are made for improving women's experiences in court, including:

- minimising the frequency with which victims are required to attend court (p 10);
- allowing women to give evidence remotely (p 10);

- minimising contact between the victim and abuser, through ensuring there are safe waiting spaces (p 10), and staggering attendance and departure times of the parties (p 11);
- providing effective training to court personnel regarding the dynamics of DFV (p 11); and
- ensuring cross-examination, and legal proceedings in general, are not misused by the abuser (p 11).

Douglas, Heather, 'The Criminal Law's Response to Domestic Violence: What's Going On?' (2008) 30(3) Sydney Law Review 439.

This article draws on a study of criminal prosecutions of breaches of domestic violence protection orders in Queensland, Australia and explores the process of criminal intervention in the context of domestic violence. See especially at p457 describing the added stress victims are likely to experience in the court process for domestic violence matters due to the fact that '…breach defendants were more likely to be legally represented than in other criminal matters heard in the magistrates courts; there were more returns to court for breach of domestic violence matters than other criminal matters and there was a reduced rate of pleading guilty compared to other offences' (p457).

Hunter, Rosemary, 'Narratives of Domestic Violence' (2006) 28 Sydney Law Review 733.

See 'Judicial 'Knowledge' About Domestic Violence' (from p754) drawing on observations of court proceedings the author notes that magistrates varied greatly in being supportive or minimising harm, affirming or not affirming women, with some questioning why the applicant stayed with her abuser (p755). Several themes emerge from this court observation study:

- magistrates' emphasis on physical violence, especially recent incidents, as discrete incidents rather than patterns of abusive behaviour;
- understanding relationship conflict as the cause of violence (resulting in obligations to leave, encouraging reconciliation, making mutual orders, and providing potentially insufficient duration of orders);
- approaching inconsistency around child contact by allowing an exception to protection orders to exercise child contact;
- denying and minimising violence through reactions to stories; engaging in narratives that frame women as ‘bad mothers’ or strategically using intervention orders for the purposes of family law proceedings.

Kaye, Miranda, ‘Accommodating Violence in the Family Courts’ (2019) 33(2) Australian Journal of Family Law, 100-121

This article argues that allegations of family violence are 'the new normal' in family court matters in Australia and calls for the family law system to prioritise victim safety. It presents findings from a study with independent children's lawyers from Victoria and New South Wales, highlighting their views on issues of family violence, self-representation, safety, and physical court premises, which are in contrast to the recommendations of the recent Australian Law Reform Commission into the family law system, which failed to address the safety of court users. There needs to be a shift in thinking from providing 'special' arrangements to victim safety being the standard approach.

Jordan, Lucinda, and Lydia Phillips, ‘Women’s Experiences of Surviving Family Violence and Accessing the Magistrates’ Court in Geelong, Victoria’ (Report, Centre for Rural and Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University, 2013).

Drawing on interviews with 37 women who had survived family violence and 23 workers supporting women survivors this research considers among other things the experience of court processes in relation to domestic violence. Of particular relevance is section 3.The research found:

- many women felt they had a limited opportunity to speak and be heard (from p23)
- women who reported magistrates were ‘fair described magistrates as demonstrating compassion and understanding family violence (from p24)
- some women reported their partners made cross applications which they described as ‘a game to further manipulate and shame them’ (from p26)
- women had a strong perception that family law was over-emphasised at the expense of their protection (from p27)
- women reported that undertakings were ineffective and inappropriate (from p28)

Kaspiew, Rae, et al, 'Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences' (Report, Australian Institute of Family Studies, October 2015).

This report presents the findings of Responding to Family Violence: A Survey of Family Law Practices and Experiences (Survey of Practices). This report draws on surveys and interviews with professionals (n653) (judicial officers and registrars, lawyers and non-legal family law professionals) working across the family law system and telephone interviews with parents (n2,473) who used family law system services in the period of approximately 12 months preceding August 2014. The report considers allegations of false reports of family violence and tactical use of domestic violence protection orders in family law proceedings ([8.2]; p174). The report considers the question of further abuse of victims of family violence through legal processes [8.3]. Some extracts of quotations include:

- 'We are seeing the courts being used increasingly for frivolous matters and it does to some extent seem that the courts are increasingly being used as a continuation of abuse for victims of domestic and child abuse. The legal aid funding, which cannot be divorced from this analysis, is also being used in matters where there does not seem to be any merit and often the other party who is the victim experiences a great deal of difficulty in obtaining legal aid funding.' (L18, lawyer)(p177)
- 'Victims tend to be excluded from courtrooms because of their safety concerns (which is unhelpful because they don't get to hear what the judicial officer says, and it feels like marginalisation which is kind of a repeat of the abusive tactics). There needs to be better resourcing of these matters to ensure victims can fully participate.' (L402, lawyer)' (p177)

Laing, Lesley, 'It's Like this Maze You Have Make Your Way Through': Women's Experiences of Seeking a Domestic Violence Protection Order in NSW (Faculty of Education and Social Work, University of Sydney, 2013).

Draws on interviews conducted with 40 women who were asked about their experiences in obtaining an Apprehended Violence Order (AVO) in Sydney. Chapter 2 explores the experiences of 'Going through the legal process', including applying for an AVO, going to court (facing the perpetrator and the importance of court support), and the risk of using the law. Women commonly felt that facing the offender in court was a 'challenge' and often that they were the ones 'on trial', the experience was particularly challenging when women were not sure about the processes (p26). Chapter 3 looks at 'Key issues from women's perspectives' and identifies the importance of the appropriate response and support, and issues involved in the process of prosecution. Further chapters explore the issues with intersecting, and fragmented legal systems, and identify themes around 'struggling to be heard' and 'senses of injustice'.

Ragusa, Angela, 'Rural Australian Women's Legal Help Seeking for Intimate Partner Violence: Women Intimate Partner Violence Victim Survivors: Perceptions of Criminal Justice Support Services' (2012) 28(4) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 685.

This study draws on 36 in-depth face-to-face interviews. Findings reveal police and court responses reflect broader social inequalities and rurality exacerbates concerns such as anonymity and lack of service. It finds that police and the criminal justice system play an important role in de-stigmatizing intimate partner violence and legitimating its unacceptability.

Roberts, Donna, Peter Chamberlain and Paul Delfabbro, 'Women's Experiences of the Processes Associated with the Family Court of Australia in the Context of Domestic Violence: A Thematic Analysis' (2014) 22(4) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 599.

Draws on interviews conducted with 15 women to examine the psychological impact of the Family Court process on women who have left abusive relationships. Women reported that the experience of engaging with the court process caused considerable distress. Principal themes related to fear of the ex-partner and having to confront him at hearings, constantly reliving the relationship via affidavits, and the insensitivity of some legal professionals to the difficulties experienced by women confronted with these experiences.

Women's Safety and Justice Taskforce (2021) Hear her voice volume 2 (Brisbane, Women's Safety and Justice Taskforce).

See pp 206- 229 where the Taskforce reports on submissions it received about judicial officers.

Examples of unsatisfactory treatment of victims by judicial officers are listed at p209 and include:

- judicial officers refusing to grant protection orders and instead, telling victims to go to the family courts.
- judicial officers refusing to put any protection orders in place unless the respondent came to court and then placing the burden on the victim to go away and collect further evidence to get protection.

- a judicial officer requiring victims to provide a letter from a medical practitioner before they would allow the victim to make an application that the victim not be cross-examined by the perpetrator.
- judicial officers applying the law inconsistently, including in relation to coercive control.
- a judicial officer who described a perpetrator placing surveillance cameras throughout the house to watch the movements of the victim as merely being signs of an unhealthy relationship breakdown rather than domestic violence.
- a victim making her own application felt unable to pursue it due to a lack of support and inconsistent guidance from the judicial officer.
- a judicial officer who, without speaking to the aggrieved, dismissed an application for a protection order on the basis that the respondent had contacted the court to advise that they were overseas and unlikely to return.

International

Epstein, Deborah, and Lisa A Goodman, 'Discounting Credibility: Doubting the Testimony and Dismissing the Experiences of Domestic Violence Survivors and Other Women' (2018) 167 University of Pennsylvania Law Review (forthcoming).

This article addresses the ways in which the credibility of female victims of intimate partner violence is discounted through their experiences of legal and social services (pp 3-4). The authors conclude that women's experiences are frequently discounted, which itself can have further traumatic impacts. Judges and other professionals often discount women's stories of abuse as implausible, particularly where the victims suffer from psychological trauma that may impact memory and comprehension (p 7). Women who suffer traumatic brain injuries (pp 9-11) or PTSD (pp 11-3) as a result of domestic violence are particularly susceptible to relaying inconsistent stories. The authors also find that cultural assumptions resulting in the prioritisation of physical over psychological violence causes judges and other authority figures to expect 'real' survivors to also prioritise physical harm, while in reality, victims may feel more significantly impacted by psychological abuse (pp 17-20).

Moreover, the results of the study indicate that gatekeepers often unjustly discount women's personal trustworthiness, based on perceptions of their demeanour (pp 21-5), their perceived motive (pp 25-32), and their social location (pp 32-7). Even women who are able to overcome initial scepticism often find that the systems intended to provide assistance dismiss the importance of their experiences (p 37). In spite of meaningful progress, 'the criminal justice system continues to discount important aspects of women's experiences and to trivialize some of the harmful consequences that policies focused primarily on offender accountability often impose on survivors' (p 38). Ultimately, 'the arbiters of justice and social welfare adopt and enforce legal and social policies and practices with little regard for how they perpetuate patterns of abuse' (p 1).

These experiences of minimisation often echo women's previous experiences of abuse (p 46). The impacts of this discrediting are multifaceted: the dismissal itself constitutes its own injury, which can compound the harm such women experience directly from the abuse (pp 47-50); additionally, this instinctive devaluing of women's testimony becomes an independent obstacle to attempts to obtain safety and justice (pp 50-2). The authors conclude that credibility discounting is widespread and pervasive, and requires genuine institutional reform (p 59). Particularly, actors must be aware of these internalised assumptions, and seek to engage more openly with victims (see pp 54-6).

Fleury, Ruth, 'Missing Voices: Patterns of Battered Women's Satisfaction with the Criminal Legal System' (2002) 8(2) Violence Against Women 181.

This research explored intimate partner violence survivors' patterns of satisfaction with the criminal legal system response. 178 female survivors of intimate partner male violence from three sites were interviewed after a domestic violence-related court case closed. This article's introductory discussion highlights how a victim's sense of control over the prosecution and court system enhances their sense of satisfaction with the system. This study supports this assertion, and includes an assessment of women's satisfaction with a number of aspects of the criminal justice system, including the police and courts.

Gillis, Joseph, et al, 'Systemic Obstacles to Battered Women's Participation in the Judicial System: When Will the Status Quo Change' (2006) 12(12) Violence Against Women 1150.

The present study presents research from focus groups conducted in Canada with 20 abused women. It examines the experiences of women victims in domestic violence cases and the barriers they faced in dealing with the justice process. In particular generally women described a lack of knowledge of what to expect from court proceedings and actual court proceedings as intimidating, impersonal and demeaning (p1160).

Klein, Andrew, 'Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges' (National Institute of Justice (US), 2009).

This report reviews research in the United States on domestic violence to determine what works best in protecting victims and stopping abuse. The section on judicial responses (from p52) is helpful. It recommends:

- Judges should strive to create user-friendly, safe court environments for petitioners, be sympathetic to the parties before them, but firm with respondents once abuse has been determined. Thus, victim concerns are validated, and respondents' abusive behaviors are clearly condemned. (p60) (Based on limited studies on the impact of judicial demeanour.)
- Judicial attention before trial to address the risk to victims posed by alleged abusers will result in quicker case resolution and decrease re-abuse by defendants who fail to show for trial. (p62) (based on multiple studies).
- Judges should respond to noncompliant abusers immediately to safeguard victims. (p72) (based on multiple studies).

Miller, Susan L, and Nicole L Smolter, '"Paper Abuse": When All Else Fails, Batterers Use Procedural Stalking' (2011) 17(5) Violence Against Women 637.

Using data from interviews with women who have exited violent relationships, attorneys, and practitioners/policy specialists, this research note explores the continuation of control as women encounter "paper abuse." It observes that women exiting violence may confront frivolous lawsuits, false reports of child abuse, and other system-related manipulations that force contact, and financially burdens them. The section 'Limits of protection orders for paper abuse' (from p643) identifies some ways in which the court system itself re-victimises victims of abuse – e.g. in one instance a woman was required to act out the abuse, and then the protection order request was dismissed anyway.

National Judges Association, Domestic Violence and the Courtroom: Knowing the Issues… Understanding the Victim (n.d.).

This resource provides practical guidance for judges in engaging with victims of domestic violence in the courtroom, including information on how judges can improve the court experiences of victims, such as:

- listening carefully;
- recognising coping mechanisms, such as denial and minimisation;
- acknowledging that victims may be overwhelmed by court proceedings;
- being proactive in ensuring victims are aware of their options;
- ensuring victims are given effective, meaningful opportunities to contribute to proceedings;
- minimising aspects of the court experience that may be intimidating for victims, including through implementing safety strategies (p 1).

Ptacek, James, Battered Women in the Courtroom: The Power of Judicial Responses. (Northeastern University Press, 1999).

This book was one of the first to look at the role of judges in the domestic violence protection order process. Ptacek approaches the issue using three inquiries. He asks: “What do judges do with their authority in restraining order hearings? How do judges interpret their role in responding to woman battering? What effect do judges have on women seeking restraining orders?” (ix).

Ptacek’s research was conducted primarily through interviews. He consulted widely with women in shelters, staff at shelters, feminist lawyers, judges, court support staff, and criminal justice researchers. He focused on two courts in Massachusetts that are considered to treat battered women with respect and take seriously their allegations. However, Ptacek identifies types of judicial behaviour can negatively affect victims in court. This form of abuse is sometimes referred to as ‘secondary abuse’.

Ptacek has illustrated the judicial responses reinforce women’s entrapment in a diagram available here and extracted in the table below.

Neglecting women's fears	> ignoring women's fears > lack of safe waiting areas in courthouse	> lack of coordination with police and probation > inadequate training of court personnel
Courtroom intimidation	> inattention to the impact of a courtroom on victims > bureaucratic and indifferent treatment of abused women	> failure to provide women with information about their legal options
Condescending or harsh demeanour	> patronising displays of authority > harsh or hostile remarks	> racist attitudes toward women of colour > bias against unmarried women
Furthering women's isolation	> failure to provide advocates > lack of resources for non-English speakers	> lack of resources for deaf and disabled women > lack of coordination with community resources
Minimising, denying, and blaming	> mirroring batterers' actions by making light of the abuse > saying the abuse didn't happen	> saying she caused it > making her feel guilty > saying it's just a "lovers' quarrel"
Neglecting the needs of children	> failing to see how batterers manipulate women through their children	> no space in the courthouse for children > lack of concern for safety of children
Colluding with violent men	> showing greater concern for defendants than for women seeking protection	> unwillingness to impose sanctions on batterers > joking and bonding with defendants
Blindness to the economic aspects of battering	> ignoring women's requests for child support and restitution	> bias against women on welfare

Conversely, Ptacek has also illustrated how the judicial responses that empower battered women in a diagram available here and extracted in the table below.

Prioritising women's	> asking about women's fears	> training court personnel on battering safety	> asking about weapons > confiscating weapons	> making a safe space for women to wait for hearings

Making the court hospitable to abused women	> providing a separate restraining order office > informing women of their legal options	> providing translators > making the building handicap accessible
Supportive judicial demeanour	> listening to abused women > asking questions	> looking women in the eye > recognising the complexity of women's circumstances and choices
Connecting women with resources	> Providing advocates for battered women	> developing relationships with shelters, batterers' programs, and community services
Taking the violence seriously	> communicating through words and actions that the court will not tolerate battering	> encouraging women to return to the court if they need to
Focusing on the needs of children	> demonstrating concern for the safety of children > making space in the courthouse for children	> recognising the effects of battering on children
Imposing sanctions on violent men	> imposing sanctions for violating court orders > refusing to joke and bond with violent men	> correcting institutional bias toward men
Addressing the economic aspects of battering	> asking whether women need child support	> connecting women with community resources around housing and financial assistance

Victim experience of court processes - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

This bench book discusses the challenges faced by a range of vulnerable groups (Aboriginal people, people from CALD backgrounds, people of a particular religious affiliation, people with disabilities, children and young people, women, GLBTIQ people, and older people) in their experience of court processes. The discussion is mostly not specific to proceedings relating to domestic and family violence matters, however the practical guidance provided to judicial officers is likely to be useful in those proceedings.

QLD

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Bench Book (2nd ed, 2016).

- Chapter 14 of the bench book recognises that women maybe disadvantaged generally in legal proceedings. It notes that: 'The fact that a majority of legal aid approvals are for criminal matters, in respect of which male applicants are heavily over-represented, means that less funding is available to women in family disputes, in which they represent the vast majority of applicants. A potential consequence of being unable to receive legal aid funding is the increased pressure to settle proceedings out of court, even if the terms of the settlement are inadequate. In addition, where women are at a disadvantage in terms of bargaining power (due to a lack of independent means, amongst other factors) there is an increased likelihood that women will not advocate for their rights or will be unable to advocate effectively' (p.167).
- Under 'C Domestic violence and the court process', there is a discussion of the obstacles women may face in prosecuting perpetrators of domestic violence. It notes that domestic violence is prosecuted far less often than it occurs and reasons for this include fear of further violence or other revenge from the perpetrator, feelings of shame or embarrassment, belief that the incident was too trivial or unimportant, previous negative experiences of reporting (e.g., to health professionals), a continuing emotional attachment to the perpetrator, and issues relating to children from a relationship with the perpetrator (p.173).
- The bench book also notes other issues relating to access to justice experienced by women in the legal system including: (pp.167-170).

- Issues with accessing legal aid;
- A lack of childcare facilities in most courts, as well as difficulty making outside arrangements;
- Recognition of power imbalances in alternative dispute resolution processes;
- Issues for women as witnesses and the need to consider alternative approaches to giving evidence;
- The need to be aware that women may be excluded through the use of gender-specific language.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

3.1 discusses the court's power to make vexatious litigation restraint orders. 3.7 discusses the court's power to make a costs order where the application was frivolous, vexatious or made in bad faith. 5.8.6 notes that judicial officers and court staff should consider modifying their usual approach to effective communication with parties and assessing credibility and competence of witnesses when dealing with affected family members or respondents with disabilities.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Chapter 10 includes very useful pointers for judges about how to deal with victims of domestic violence. Guidelines include: emphasising that domestic violence is not the victim's fault, avoiding repetition of unfounded myths about domestic violence, understanding that sex workers and women who are not in a heterosexual relationship can also be victims of domestic violence.

Chapter 13.3 'Children and family, domestic and sexual violence' provides useful practical considerations around dealing with children in Family Court proceedings, restraining order matters, family and domestic violence and sexual assault, evidentiary issues, the effects of prolonged abuse, directions to the jury and sentencing and other decisions.

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Chapter 7: Perpetration Characteristics and Litigation Tactics 'discusses options in response to the rationalizations and litigation tactics of domestic violators who engage in the coercive, controlling, dominating aspects of domestic violence in order to gain the upper hand in family and child protection litigation.'

Section 7.4: Perpetrator litigation tactics discusses the use of litigation to control or harass: '[p]rotracted litigation not only forces the targeted parent into continuing contact with the domestic violator, it also depletes resources, increases stress, and interferes with recovery from DV'. The section goes onto consider judicial responses to litigation tactics, including:

- Explicit findings in judgments relating to and denouncing the misuse of litigation;
- Engaging in coordinated case management and information sharing;
- Exercising the court's authority to prevent abuse of process by declaring a litigant to be vexatious;
- Potential cost options (e.g. interim cost orders);
- Appeal options (i.e. appealing orders is a litigation tactic; responses include requiring security for costs or requiring the appellant to comply with existing orders before entertaining the appeal);
- Avoiding orders that enable harassment and control;
- Additional options in response to excessive litigation (e.g. cost orders to pay for targeted parent's legal representation; prohibit the presence of the abusive party during discovery of documents)

Section 5.3: Detection and prevention of intimidation in discovery proceedings and hearings notes the continued tactics of intimidation and harassment targeted persons may experience in court, emphasising they may be quite subtle. Some possible judicial responses to such actions are identified:

- Monitoring cross examination, and ensuring this is conducted by a lawyer;
- Redirecting perpetrator's testimony to relevant issues;
- Enabling the victim to testify without directly facing the perpetrator (e.g. via video link of from behind a screen);
- Providing separate waiting rooms for the parties;
- Staggering the parties' entrances and exits;

- Allowing a support person to assist the victim.

It should be noted that '[s]tressful surroundings can exaggerate underlying psychological reactions and harm produced by domestic violence. Witnesses are being asked to recount traumatic abuse and violence by persons who breached an intimate trust. In such circumstances, it is particularly important for lawyers and service providers, particularly male professionals, to put the witness at ease and to ensure that all questions are phrased in a non-threatening, non-accusatory manner' (Section 5.3.3).

Victim experience of court processes - Other Resources

- Diagram: Judicial responses that empower battered women.
- Diagram: Judicial responses that reinforce woman's entrapment.

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (2019) Reconciliation Action Plan 2019-2021: Federal Circuit Court of Australia.

This Indigenous Action Plan 2014–2016 aims to address the following identified barriers that exist for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders when accessing the Family Court of Australia:

- a lack of understanding about the family law system among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander clients
- resistance to engagement with, and even fear of, family law system services
- literacy and language barriers
- a need for indigenous specific and culturally competent mainstream services
- the challenges arising from lengthy and multi-step Court processes for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander clients
- the setting being based on Western notions of child-rearing, kinship and family, and concerns as to whether they operated in a culturally safe way; and
- lack of access to services for communities in regional and remote areas.

Judicial College of Victoria (2021) Note 11: Victims of family violence; Victims of crime in the courtroom: a guide for judicial officers (eManual).

This note explains:

- What is family violence;
- Why victims stay or return to abusive relationships; and
- Key points to consider

An understanding of the dynamics of family violence can help judicial officers avoid unintentionally affirming the perpetrator's narrative in the courtroom or in sentencing reasons.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Experience of the Courts (2016).

See p6: 'this report is a summary of consultations undertaken by the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity. As such, the views expressed in the document are those of stakeholders who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait women. The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;
- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

At p7: 'Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women had trouble communicating in the language of the justice system, adversely impacting on their ability to deal with police, engage with support services including legal representatives, and communicate with court staff and judicial officers.'

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Migrant and Refugee Women's Experience of the Courts (A report for the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity), (2016).

See the Executive Summary (p6-9) which makes a number of recommendations. It also identifies and discusses key pre-court barriers:

- Lack of knowledge of legal rights;
- Lack of financial independence;
- The importance of integrated support services;

- Poor police responses;
- The impact of pre-arrival experiences and traumatic backgrounds;
- Community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- Uncertainty about immigration status and fear of deportation; and
- The cost of engagement with the legal system.

Identifies communication barriers: Working with interpreters:

- Lack of clarity about who is responsible for engaging an interpreter;
- Failure to assess the need for an interpreter, or incorrectly assessing need;
- The skill of interpreters being engaged;
- Lack of awareness amongst judicial officers and lawyers about how to work with interpreters;
- Engaging interpreters who are inappropriate in the circumstances; and
- Unethical and poor professional conduct by interpreters.

Identifies barriers to full participation in attending court:

- The intimidating process of arriving at court;
- Safety while waiting at court;
- Lack of understanding of court processes;
- Difficulty understanding forms, charges, orders or judgments;
- Courtroom dynamics;
- The impact of attitudes and actions of judicial officers;
- The need for judicial officers to receive cultural competency training;
- Lack of availability of men's behaviour change programs; and
- Abuse of court processes by perpetrators.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity Website.

The Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity is an advisory body formed to assist Australian courts, judicial officers and administrators to positively respond to the diverse needs of the judiciary, including the particular issues that arise in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. This website includes a number of useful resources and links.

Vulnerable witness provisions, Australia.

The approach to the protection of adult victims of domestic and family violence and sexual assault complainants / witnesses (sometimes called vulnerable or special witnesses) in domestic violence protection order matters and criminal cases varies throughout Australia. Protections may include closed courtrooms, using closed circuit television rather than being in court, using a screen in court, having evidence recorded so the person is only cross-examined once, allowing the presence of a support person and disallowing direct cross-examination of one party by another in certain proceedings. See 9.2.3 Vulnerable or Special Witnesses for a table outlining jurisdictional approaches.

Note that detailed information about children giving evidence in criminal proceedings can be found here: Bench Book For Children Giving Evidence In Australian Courts

Victim experience of court processes - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Angelina

Anna

Carol

Faith

Felicity

Fiona

Francis

Gillian

Hilary

Ingrid

Jane

Jennifer

Julia

Leah

Lisa

Melissa

Sally

Sandra

Susan

Yvonne

Safety and protection of victim and witnesses

A number of investigations by Australian courts, law reform bodies and researchers have recognised that there are circumstances in the context of domestic and family violence related judicial proceedings where it may be appropriate or necessary to take steps to ensure the safety and protection of individuals, including those who qualify as vulnerable witnesses [Vulnerable witness provisions (Australia)] [NT Dept of Justice 2011].

Victims of violence may be in physical danger [Douglas & Stark 2010], they may feel fear and anxiety at the prospect of facing the perpetrator or the perpetrator's family and supporters in the courtroom or court precinct, they may be concerned about how their own fear and anxiety may impact on their children [Roberts et al 2015], or they may be re-traumatised by having to recount their experiences of violence [Qld Special DFV Taskforce Report 2015]. For some, their court appearance may be the first time they have spoken publicly about the violence [Douglas & Stark 2010]. Some victims reported further intimidation and abuse by the perpetrator (ranging from staring [Coy et al 2012] to physical attack [George & Harris 2014]) while waiting for their case to be called or during the conduct of the proceedings [Douglas & Stark 2010] or on leaving the court after the hearing [George & Harris 2014]. Studies have observed that on some occasions judges and court staff failed to recognise these acts of aggression [Coy et al 2012].

In regional and rural communities where individuals and families are often well known to one another, victims may also have concerns about their high visibility [Wendt et al 2015] to others, the lack of confidentiality [WESNET 2000], the ramifications of airing private matters, and may fear the shame and public exposure of giving oral evidence [George & Harris 2014]. These issues may be heightened for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people who may experience language barriers in understanding the proceedings and in giving oral evidence, and may not have access to appropriate interpreter services [Alford 2012]. Any of these fears or concerns may have an impact on a victim's capacity to report and disclose their experiences of violence and to seek the legal protections they need to feel and be safe [Loddon CLC 2015].

There is a considerable variation in the resources available to courts across Australia's state, territory and federal jurisdictions. Courts in capital cities and larger metropolitan areas are likely to be able to provide a range of facilities and services for the safety and protection of victims and witnesses that are unavailable to courts in smaller or more isolated centres. While the following measures are considered best practice, it is acknowledged that best practice may not be supported by legislation or be possible or practical in some circumstances and, as a result, judicial officers and court staff must prioritise their resources and adapt their practices to address the most critical safety and protection issues consistently with local legislation.

Physical and logistical measures

- Separate waiting areas
- Separate entry and exit points [Jordan & Phillips 2013]
- Separate interview rooms [Lynch & Laing 2013]
- Staggered arrivals and departures
- Dedicated area for children [George & Harris 2014]
- Screen; or telephone, video link or closed-circuit television attendance
- Security guard escort to and from court
- Police attendance [Chisholm 2009]

Planning and informing [Sarre et al 2013]

- Ensure court staff (including counter staff and security) are properly trained in domestic and family violence [Douglas & Stark 2010]
- Familiarisation visits (providing access to court in advance of hearing)
- Determine risk [Sarre et al 2013] and need, including preparation of safety plan [FCA/FCCA 2016]
- Identify existing orders or notifications
- Provide information about court process and support/referral options [Chisholm 2009]

Procedural measures [NT Dept of Justice 2011]

- Give evidence in courtroom from behind screen, or from outside the courtroom via telephone, video link or closed-circuit television
- Support person attendance while giving evidence
- Court closure while giving evidence, including special sittings that are recorded
- Admittance of recorded statement into evidence as all or part of the witness's evidence in chief
- Imposition of time limits within which proceedings must be commenced
- Prohibition on cross-examination [Loughman 2016] of complainant where defendant in a sexual offence or domestic violence matter is unrepresented

- Additional protections for children
- Careful determination of appropriateness or risks of parties engaging in family dispute resolution processes [Field 2010]

Safety and protection of victim and witnesses - Key Literature

Australia

Alford, Amanda, 'Presentation by Australian Law Reform Commission Legal Officer' (Speech delivered at the National Aboriginal Family Violence Prevention Legal Service Annual Conference, Melbourne, 23 November 2012).

The speech draws information obtained as a result of consultations and submissions undertaken by the Australian Law Reform Commission. It highlights some of the difficulties faced specifically by Indigenous people in attending or participating in court proceedings. These include: logistical difficulties, including transportation and movement between communities; fear of giving evidence in open court; feelings of shame, blame and privacy concerns associated with not wanting issues publicly aired as well as community/family pressure through presence in court; language barriers and difficulties in giving oral evidence, including judicial attitudes towards the necessity of interpreters; and the potential for cross-examination of a victim by a person who has allegedly used violence.

Chisholm, Richard, Family Courts Violence Review : A Report (2009).

This report was referred to in the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Circuit Court of Australia's Family Violence Plan 2014-16. The report refers to the Family Court's Safety at Court Protocol which provides overarching guidance for ensuring the safety of court clients (page 154). This protocol contains a series of defined steps that must be followed where it is brought to the Court's attention that a client has safety concerns.

In essence, this involves engaging the client and:

- providing information about support options (including referrals to police and domestic violence agencies as appropriate);
- determining the level of need;
- checking for a family violence order or Notice of Child Abuse or Family Violence; and
- explaining the safety options available. These can include:
  - familiarisation visits,

- separate waiting areas,
- separate interviews,
- staggered arrivals and departures,
- telephone, video link or CCT attendance,
- security guard escort,
- police attendance and
- the presence of a support person at Court'.

Once the options have been discussed with the client and an approach agreed upon, a safety plan will be drawn up by a Client Services Officer and placed in the Court's electronic case management system (page 155).

Court Network, Submission to Royal Commission into Family Violence (Victoria), June 2015.

Court Network recommends: providing a safe space for women to wait and receive support and advice; implementing creative solutions such as creating a 'window' for the woman to leave the court while the respondent is finalising paperwork; exiting the court through a back door (page 15).

Day, Andrew, Sharon Casey, Adam Gerace, Candice Oster and Deb O'Kane, The forgotten victims: prisoner experience of victimisation and engagement with the criminal justice system – Research report (ANROWS, 2018).

The following summarises the key aspects of this research report:

Premise

Many women in prison have experienced intimate partner violence. As this form of violence is often intergenerational and entrenched, women in prison are widely considered to be at particular risk of ongoing victimisation following release from custody. And yet, their support needs often go unrecognised, and it is likely that a range of barriers exists that prevent ex-prisoners from accessing services.

Approach

This research documents data from interviews with and surveys of 22 women incarcerated in Adelaide Women's Prison, as well as interviews with 12 key South Australian agencies and service providers, to arrive at an understanding of help-seeking behaviour and how this might inform service responses. The analysis is positioned within a review of current help-seeking theories that highlight how a wide range of individual, socio-cultural and structural factors can complicate a woman's decision to seek help when concerned for her personal safety, noting that the circumstances and personal histories of women in prison increase the barriers to effective help-seeking when they face violence following release.

Key observations

- The interviews with the women prisoners revealed their:
  - lack of awareness of when they should seek external support
  - lack of knowledge of available services
  - pervasive sense of mistrust and under-confidence in existing services
  - sense that better approaches can be developed drawing on the strengths of women, their peers and families.
- Women's experience of formal and informal support-seeking (positive and negative) often determine how they define intimate partner violence and whether they decide to seek to change their circumstances.
- Agencies and service providers expressed a range of views about the services that should be made available to women leaving prison, and these views were commonly shared by the women prisoners interviewed. It was acknowledged by both groups that services are not always visible or accessible to the women. There was also no sense that any integrated pathway for identifying and managing risk currently exists.

Conclusions

- Need identified for all jurisdictions: to clearly identify women in prison as a particularly vulnerable group who are likely to be at elevated risk of ongoing victimisation and intimate partner violence and who face significant barriers preventing them from accessing the types of services that may help them to keep safe; and take a specialised and integrated approach in addressing their needs. Successful models of reintegration are discussed.
- Need identified for people with lived experience of incarceration to be part of the service framework (design, delivery and goverance) in the community sector.

- Need identified for services and programs to reflect an understanding of the role violence in the lives of people who seek help (ie trauma-informed care)

Limitations

This research did not make conclusions about different cohorts of women prisoners having specific needs, for example women from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultural backgrounds.

Department of Justice, Northern Territory Government, Report: Review of Vulnerable Witness Legislation (2011).

Although this report is specifically about vulnerable witness legislation in the Northern Territory, it is useful in terms of highlighting the types of protection that may be able to be offered to vulnerable witnesses in other jurisdictions (i.e. which may include victims of domestic violence).

For example vulnerable witnesses may:

- give evidence by way of a closed circuit television from a place outside of the courtroom;
- give evidence in the courtroom from behind a screen so that they cannot see, or be seen by, the alleged offender;
- be accompanied by a friend, relative or other support person while giving evidence; and
- have the court closed while giving evidence.

In some cases other possibilities for protecting a witness include:

- a recorded statement may be admitted into evidence as all or part of the witness's evidence in chief;
- the examination of a vulnerable witness may be undertaken in a special sitting of the court, which is recorded…;
- when a vulnerable witness is giving evidence, the court must be closed;
- time limits within which proceedings must be commenced and
- a prohibition on cross-examination of a complainant in sexual offence proceeding by an unrepresented defendant.

In the Northern Territory there are specific protections for children and vulnerable witnesses which include:

- the court must be closed where the only protected person in the matter is a child, and while a vulnerable witness gives evidence;
- evidence of children must be given by written or recorded statement;
- a child cannot be cross-examined; and
- a vulnerable witness is entitled to given evidence by way of audio visual link and be accompanied by a support person.

Douglas, Heather and Tanja Stark, Stories from Survivors: Domestic Violence and Criminal Justice Interventions (2010).

This research draws on interviews with 20 women who had experienced domestic violence, many of whom gave evidence in domestic violence-related court proceedings. Some of the women reported:

- Speaking out in court was the first time many women spoke publicly about their abuse;
- Some women felt that they were in danger when they went to court (p 70);
- That court staff should be properly trained about domestic violence;
- Tt would be helpful if court staff could advise when the violent partner had left court (p 71);
- It was extremely stressful waiting in the court foyer for their matter to be called. Some women experienced further intimidation and abuse from their former partners while waiting for their case to be called on while others were worried that further trouble might arise;
- When they had access to safe rooms to wait they felt much safer and less intimidated (p 73);
- Different access points to the court for victims and offenders (p 74).

Family Court of Australia, Family Violence Best Practice Principles, 4th edition (2016)

These Best Practice Principles are designed to provide practical guidance to courts, legal practitioners, service providers, litigants and other interested persons in cases where issues of family violence or child abuse arise in the Family Court. Statement of Principle on pp. 2-3 refers to the entitlement of all people visiting the courts to feel safe and the responsibility of the courts to ‘take all appropriate measures to ensure the safety of their users’ (page 3). These appropriate measures may include the creation of an individually tailored safety plan where necessary:

'A safety plan is a document that can be varied at any time and which includes a variety of options available to a person to ensure their safety at court. These include:

- attendance by electronic medium,
- attendance with support persons,
- staggered attendances,
- use of security entrances and,
- where necessary, security personnel.

All court staff are able to prepare a safety plan. Safety planning is one of the strategies that may be implemented to ensure that a person who fears for their safety remains protected from harm. A safety plan for attendances at court events is but one component of safety planning that needs to be incorporated into the individual's overall plan for their safety' (page 3).

Field, Rachael, 'FDR and victims of family violence: Ensuring a safe process and outcomes' (2010) 21(3) Australasian Dispute Resolution Journal 185.

The author identifies that family dispute resolution (FDR) is a positive first-stop process for family law matters, particularly those relating to disputes about children. However the author identifies a range of issues that arise for victims of family violence in FDR that can make it dangerous and unsafe:

- because of the power and control dynamic in cases involving domestic violence it is very difficult to achieve party self-determination in matters where there is a history of family violence. (p6)
- because family violence is about a perpetrator's use of power and control over the victim, it is very difficult for a victim of violence to confidently represent, and negotiate for, their own interests, or those of the children (p6)
- some victims may not identify violence as they feel that mediation is the only affordable option (p7)
- separation is particularly dangerous so there should not be an assumption that because the parties are separated the violence has ended (p7).

The author suggests that safety in mediation can be improved where parties understand and are properly informed about mediation, when they are well-prepared and have legal advice.

George, Amanda and Bridget Harris, Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria (Deakin University School of Law's Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, 2014).

Drawing on interviews with survivors of domestic violence and support workers this report considers the experiences of and outcomes for women survivors of family violence in regional and rural Victoria. Of particular relevance, this report looks at women's experience of the court setting and draws attention to a number of issues surrounding safety and protection for women:

- Fear of giving evidence, shame and public exposure: 'While shame and fear are feelings that many women in cities experience when taking a family matter to court, in smaller communities such feelings can prevent women making the decision to seek protection and safety from the court. The relative anonymity of city courts is not available to rural and regional women' (page 84).
- 'The use of court-based video-link facilities can reduce the fear and distress experienced by being in the physical presence of the defendant. However, lawyers and workers said that even in newer courts this technology is infrequently used' (page 85).
- Leaving court: 'Leaving court after a hearing can be an intimidating and dangerous time for women applicants, regardless of whether they have an order. Perpetrators may use their network of family or friends to intimidate or attack survivors' (page 86).
- Children at court: 'There is an urgent need to address the issue of children coming to court in intervention order matters, both to shield them from any further exposure to harm through hearing about family violence and to ensure that women are able to get the best outcomes from their applications. None of the courts the researchers visited have dedicated areas for children' (page 87).

Jordan, Lucinda and Lydia Phillips, Women's experiences of surviving family violence and accessing the Magistrates' Court in Geelong, Victoria (Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University Australia, 2013).

In looking at women's experiences of applying for FVIOs at the Geelong Magistrates' Court, this report highlights women's experiences of the court building. It notes that '[c]onsistently, participants pointed to the need for the Geelong Magistrates' Court to provide separate waiting areas and separate entry and exit points for women appearing for FVIO applications. Workers in particular agreed that the promotion of the safe room at the court would be beneficial, as many applicants were unaware of this facility' (p 21).

Kaye, Miranda, 'Accommodating Violence in the Family Courts' (2019) 33(2) Australian Journal of Family Law, 100-121

This article argues that allegations of family violence are 'the new normal' in family court matters in Australia and calls for the family law system to prioritise victim safety. It presents findings from a study with independent children's lawyers from Victoria and New South Wales, highlighting their views on issues of family violence, self-representation, safety, and physical court premises, which are in contrast to the recommendations of the recent Australian Law Reform Commission into the family law system, which failed to address the safety of court users. There needs to be a shift in thinking from providing 'special' arrangements to victim safety being the standard approach.

Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Will Somebody Listen to Me? Insight Actions and Hope for Women Experiencing Family Violence in Regional Victoria (2015).

The Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre (LCCLC) provides family violence duty lawyer, advice and ongoing case work across the Loddon and Campaspe region. This project examines the experiences of women who have experienced family violence and the legal system, and aims to improve their safety, social and health outcomes. 190 women were surveyed at Bendigo, Echuca, Maryborough, Kyneton and Swan Hill Magistrates' Courts and in-depth conversations were undertaken with 27 women as part of this project (page 8). As part of examining court structures and processes, the report looks at the safety of women at court. It notes that:

- '[t]here was an overwhelming consensus with the women about the lack of court safety and privacy. The women felt that the fear they hold at facing the offender in court is not understood. None of the women felt safe or particularly comfortable waiting for their case and in the court room' (page 68).
- 'For many women this fear had an impact on their capacity to disclose their lived experiences to either the lawyer or magistrate in a way that did them justice. They recommended well-signed supervised waiting areas for applicants and respondents, and separate entrances and exits…The lack of court safety in all the courts compounds the chronic fear these women have felt for a long time' (page 69).

- The report also highlights that a lack of adequate security systems is also a concern for women. 'While police are in the precinct they do not have a consistent presence throughout the court space' (page 70).

Loughman, Janet, 'Protecting vulnerable witnesses in family law' (2016) 3(1) Law Society of NSW Journal 26.

This article considers the traumatic impact of cross-examination of vulnerable witnesses by perpetrators of violence (page 26).

Lynch, Denise and Lesley Laing, 'Women get lost in the gaps' – Service providers' perspectives on women's access to legal protection from domestic violence (2013).

Drawing on focus groups with service providers in NSW, the authors identify the need for a well-designed and appropriately located 'safe room' (a separate room, in the courthouse, specifically for women applying for ADVOs) for both women and workers (ideally with direct access into the court room and an adjourning room for solicitors and a bathroom and kitchen). Some interviewees noted that safe rooms sometimes are too small; are located in areas defendants commonly walk past (for example to get to the men's toilets or be some distance from the court room) (page 14).

Queensland, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Drawing on submissions and consultations this report identified issues with courtroom safety including being re-traumatised by the requirement to repeat the story of the abuse and having to face perpetrators in and outside the court room (lack of separate waiting areas, particularly in remote areas (p 268).

Roberts, Donna, Peter Chamberlain and Paul Delfabbro, 'Women's Experiences of the Processes Associated with the Family Court of Australia in the Context of Domestic Violence: A Thematic Analysis' (2015) 22(4) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 599.

Drawing on interviews with 15 women who had left abusive relationships and who had, or were currently, engaged with the Federal Family Court process the authors identify, relevant to safety and protection, fear and anxiety as another core theme in the sample results and was evident in several contexts: 'fear of the ex-partner, anxiety around attending court, and how their thoughts and feelings impacted on the children' (page 607).

Salter, M., Conroy, E., Dragiewicz, M., Burke, J., Ussher, J., Middleton, W., Vilenica, S., Martin Monzon, B., & Noack-Lundberg, K., "A deep wound under my heart": Constructions of complex trauma and implications for women's wellbeing and safety from violence (Research report, 12/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Complex trauma refers to multiple, repeated forms of interpersonal victimisation and the resulting health problems and psychosocial challenges. Women with experiences of complex trauma are a significant but overlooked group of victims and survivors of gender-based violence in Australia. They often have interlinked health and safety needs, and are frequently in contact with crisis services and police. This research project sought to develop a comprehensive picture of how complex trauma is being constructed in public policy and practice, and how it is viewed by women with experiences of complex trauma. It found that at the policy level, complex trauma overlaps with frameworks on violence against women and mental health. However, the impact of complex trauma is not comprehensively addressed by these frameworks, which contributes to the fragmented response to women in distress. The research demonstrated that there is a strong need for a whole-of-government commitment to the implementation and coordination of trauma-informed practice across sectors.

Sarre, Rick and Alikki Vernon, 'Access to Safe Justice in Australian Courts: Some Reflections upon Intelligence, Design and Process' (2013) 2(2) International Journal for Crime, Justice and Social Democracy 133.

This article examines broadly the issue of safety in courts in Australia. The report collected data from three Australian state jurisdictions (Victoria, South Australia and Western Australia) and one federal jurisdiction (Family Court of Australia) over a three period from 2009-2012.

Four safety and security aspects were identified as most important to addressing and managing risk:

- improving the communication and the sharing of information across security personnel within courts and across jurisdictions and states;
- security personnel working collaboratively and cooperatively with court staff and the judiciary on 'safety planning';
- encouraging more thorough reporting of critical incidents; and
- implementing proactive (not just reactive) approaches to reducing or avoiding incidents in or around the courts' (page 135).

The report notes the Family Court's approach to involve the victim in the process of risk assessment through the development of a 'safety plan' is viewed as an advance on reactive strategies that were adopted on the day of the hearing without planning or specific measures put in place (like staggered arrivals, separate waiting areas, security guard escort, and so forth' (page 137).

In terms of court design, the report notes that older courts, designed for functionality rather than safety, continue to provide safety concerns (page 140). In other court buildings, the general layout of entrances and exits is raised as being an issue, especially in domestic violence cases. However, even more than improved security measures and separate entrances/exists is having separate rooms for people to retreat to. These should be standard and known to individuals before they reach the building (page 141). Finally, the report notes that importance of developing policies and procedure manuals regarding safety and security in and around courts, and to provide ongoing training to court staff (p 142).

Sentencing Advisory Council, Sentencing of Adult Family Violence Offenders Final Report No. 5 (2015).

The report considers the role of specialist family violence lists or courts in dealing with family violence offences. In relation to court safety it notes some special arrangements for victim safety: Some courts will also include specially designed rooms and separate entrances to ensure the safety of victims, and may offer facilities which enable vulnerable witnesses to give evidence remotely.

Offender programs: Some courts have the capacity to order or refer an offender to a program which aims to educate the offender and address personal issues to prevent re-offending, usually through counselling. Some courts have offender support workers to engage and refer offenders to behavioural change programs.

Wendt, Sarah, Donna Chung, Alison Elder and Lia Bryant, Seeking help for domestic violence: Exploring rural women's coping experiences – State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

This literature review focuses on the unique experiences and specific barriers faced by women experiencing family or domestic violence in rural and remote areas. It notes that women living in socially and geographically isolated places often cope with domestic and family violence by themselves for long periods of time (p 1). See p5-6 which discusses the structural barriers and cultural factors that prevent rural women from disclosing, including that 'self-reliance was so valued and upheld in families that to disclose or ask for help about domestic and family violence was perceived as a failure or shameful' (p 6).

The review notes that effect of social and geographical isolation is particularly important for Indigenous women's ability to disclose, and that the small and tight-knit nature of Indigenous communities can influence decisions to report (p 10).

Pages 10-12 discuss the particular barriers for culturally and linguistically diverse women (such as racism, lack of access to interpreters, and cultural isolation), those identifying as LBTIQ (such as discrimination, homophobic or transphobic attitudes, and a lack of specialist services), and women with disabilities (such as relying on the abuser for transport, and a lack of specialist services).

Women's Services network (WESNET), Domestic Violence in Regional Australia: A Literature Review – A Report for the Commonwealth Department of Transport and Regional Services (2000).

Lack of confidentiality also presents a unique set of circumstances for women living in rural and remote areas. Given the stigma attached to domestic violence in rural and remote communities, the public attention often afforded to women seeking legal protections, including write-ups in the local newspaper, is a major deterrent for women (p 17).

International

Coy, Maddy et al, Picking up the pieces: domestic violence and child contact (Rights of Women and CWASU, 2012).

Section 5 of this report presents quantitative and qualitative data on women and legal professional's experience of legal proceedings. Pages 41-45 summarise issues surrounding women's safety at court. 'Three quarters of women (74%, n=23) said they had concerns for their safety while attending court. Some feared that they would be in physical danger, being fully aware of their ex-partners' capacity for violence. Many perceived that their ex-partners 'took advantage of the fact that they were required to be present in order to be intimidating' (Kaye et al, 2003: 7; see also Rights of Women, 2011)' (page 41).

Several women reported their ex-partners 'staring' at them throughout the proceedings and in some cases, judges and other courtroom personnel failed to recognise this act of aggression. In addition, women were particularly fearful of leaving the courtroom at the close of proceedings (page 42).

Special measures have been developed in the criminal courts to provide women with protection during proceedings namely, separate waiting rooms are provided and sometimes separate exits for victims and witnesses. However, 'almost half of legal professionals (47%, n = 35) reported that special facilities were not advertised for vulnerable and intimidated court users' (page 43).

When asked what could be done to improve their safety while at the courtroom, many suggested that safe spaces and measures to avoid seeing their ex-partner would have made a significant difference (page 44).

Safety and protection of victim and witnesses - Other Bench Books

Australia

Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration Incorporated, Bench Book for Children Giving Evidence in Australian Courts (updated 2020)

This bench book is intended primarily for judicial officers who deal with children giving evidence in criminal proceedings as complainants or witnesses, not as accused. It does not specifically address domestic violence, however is relevant in that context where child witnesses are involved in proceedings. Chapter 3 discusses the issues related to children and the court process, including cross-examination and good practices for questioning children. Chapter 4 discusses the judicial role in child sexual abuse cases and preparation for trial. Chapter 5 discusses procedures for children giving evidence.

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Criminal Trial Courts Bench Book (2022).

[1-358]: In relation to closed courts, the bench book provides that '[w]here proceedings are in respect of a prescribed sexual offence… [the Act requires] that certain proceedings or parts of proceedings, for a prescribed sexual offence be held in camera'

[1-360] Another section of the bench book 'addresses directions or warnings where evidence is given by alternative means particularly Closed Circuit Television (CCTV), alternative seating arrangements, the use of screens, support persons, the admission of pre-recorded out-of-court representations to police and evidence given via audio visual link'. There is a useful Table setting out in summary form many of the relevant provisions for a 'vulnerable person', a complainant/sexual offence witness and a domestic violence complainant

[1-840] Finally, the bench book deals with the cross-examination of victims and witnesses in sexual offence proceedings and vulnerable witnesses in criminal proceedings by unrepresented litigants. Special procedures apply in these circumstances in that 'any cross-examination must be conducted through a court-appointed intermediary'. 'The purpose of the provisions is to spare the witness 'the need to answer questions directly asked by him or her by the person said to have committed the offence' (Clark v R [2008] NSWCCA 122).

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

See section 7.5 discussing violence against women including especially 7.5.6 on sexual assault. See also 7.7 which highlights practical considerations.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (2022).

Section [8-000] discusses evidence by domestic violence complainants.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sexual Assault Trials Handbook (2022).

Section [10-500] discusses important general directions in sexual assault trials. Section [7-000] contains relevant literature, including [7-240] procedure in prescribed sexual offence cases.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 14 Practice and Procedure for Court Proceedings discusses a number of issues relevant to the safety and protection of victims and witnesses, including the sexual assault counselling privilege, explanation of proceedings and orders, protection of children, cross-examination, protected witnesses, impaired capacity, abuse of process.

Queensland Courts, Supreme and District Courts Criminal Directions Benchbook (2022).

Chapters 7 and 8 discuss procedures and approaches in relation to different types of protected witnesses. Chapters 10 and 11 discuss procedures in relation to child and special witnesses respectively. The bench book's additional material includes guidelines for pre-recording evidence of an affected witness.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1.7 discusses the prohibition on personal cross-examination of protected witnesses in the context of family violence intervention order proceedings. 2.4.6 notes the court's power to prevent improper questioning of witnesses. 2.5.3 discusses measures for minimising the trauma children can suffer when participating in court proceedings, and notes that children are automatically protected witnesses.

Judicial College of Victoria, Open Courts Bench Book (2019).

This bench book addresses the principle of open justice in the context of Victorian courts and tribunals, and the qualifications to that principle. Chapter 3 considers the grounds and categories under which a suppression or closed court order can be made. The relevant grounds and categories to family violence are:

[3.4] Ground 1: Administration of justice (preventing prejudice to the jury or ensuring a fair trial for the accused);

[3.6] Ground 3: Safety of persons.

[3.7] Grounds 4 and 5: Undue distress or embarrassment to a complainant or witness in sexual offence and family violence proceedings, and to child witnesses in criminal proceedings.

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Criminal Charge Book (2017).

2.3 discusses procedures for taking evidence in certain circumstances, including to reduce the stress of giving evidence on particular witnesses, to prevent the accused from personally cross-examining certain witnesses, and to allow evidence that has been pre-recorded to be used in certain legal proceedings.

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Criminal Proceedings Manual (2015).

Chapter 13 of the manual examines the procedures for taking evidence from witnesses. The same material is produced in the Criminal Charge Book (above).

WA

Fryer-Smith, Stephanie, Aboriginal Benchbook for Western Australia Courts (2nd ed, 2008).

- The appearance of an Aboriginal accused by video/audio link may be appropriate and advantageous for a number of reasons including '[t]o assist the court to obtain the best evidence from special witnesses or where an Aboriginal accused or an Aboriginal witness is intimidated by the court environment' (7.1.2).
- Female Aboriginal witnesses may face particular difficulties in giving evidence including: the feeling that 'the physical courtroom is intimidating'; 'the presence of the accused person or other Aboriginal people in the courtroom may exacerbate the intimidation experienced by the female witness'; and 'sign language may be used by someone in the back of the court to intimidate the witness while she is giving evidence, which sign language goes unnoticed by the court' (7.5.2).
- The court may order that certain persons leave or be excluded from the courtroom proceedings 'to facilitate Aboriginal witnesses giving full and frank evidence to the court. Otherwise, Aboriginal customary law barriers (such as bans upon speaking in front of certain people, or revealing particular kinds of information to certain people) may inhibit the giving of such evidence' (7.5.4).

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

In Section 5.3, the bench book discusses detection and prevention of intimidation in court rooms. In terms of detecting intimidation in the court, the bench book notes that the targeted person may be subject to subtle forms of intimidation in the courtroom, and further, that subtle forms of intimidation can have different meanings in different cultures. It provides possible strategies for judges to employ when cultural factors may be an issue (Section 5.3.1).

A list of options for preventing in-court intimidation is provided, including: monitoring communication between parties; learning about DFV; consulting cultural experts; preventing abusive questioning; ensuring cross-examination is conducted by a lawyer; redirecting perpetrator testimony; allowing the victim to testify without being confronted by the perpetrator; providing separate waiting rooms; and adjourning to take relevant actions (Section 5.3.2).

The bench book also discusses court options available if a child is to offer direct testimony in a family law case involving domestic violence in Section 6.8. These may include, relevant to safety and protection: preventing cross-examination of the child by a party (as opposed to lawyer for a party); allowing the child to testify behind a screen or from another room via video link; allowing a support person to sit near the child; removing a party or parent from the court during the child's testimony; preventing age-inappropriate questioning.

Safety and protection of victim and witnesses - Other Resources

Australia

Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, Do you have fears for your safety when attending court? (2020).

This guideline provides contact numbers, web and email addresses for parties who have concerns about safety when attending court.

No to Violence (2021) Tips for engaging men on their use of family violence (fact sheet) Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria.

This resource gives five tips for engaging men on their use of family violence:

1. Safety – do not engage in a way likely to increase risk to the safety of vicitms;
2. Identify invitations by men to collude in their behaviour - when responding to a man's attempts to minimise, excuse or justify their use of violence, it is important to encourage them to re-evaluate their behaviour and self-exploration;
3. Open the conversation - being curious and asking questions can help put his behaviour on the table;
4. Experience of ex/partners and kids - encourage empathy for how his partner/kids are experiencing his behaviour, rather than his intentions or identity; and
5. Change and support - identifying what a desirable future looks like can help reflection around what needs to change.

International

Ramsay, Gordon and Rhonda Martinson, 'Building Attention to Witness Intimidation into Your Domestic Violence Policy', (2014) The Police Chief Magazine 34-37.

This article outlines the steps taken by criminal justice agencies and other service providers in Duluth, Minnesota, to address witness intimidation in the context of domestic violence. Duluth was selected as one of three demonstration sites for creating a Blueprint for Safety, a comprehensive plan integrating knowledge, research, demonstration projects and practice into a "blueprint" for city and county agencies responding to domestic violence. In 2011, Duluth criminal justice agencies partnered with other service providers to introduce the use of the safety audit process to determine where and how witness intimidation arises in the justice system, and how successful the system was in providing safety to victims and witnesses. Results of the audit found that while the Blueprint for Safety policy work incorporated attention to witness intimidation, it did not offer guidance for police officers and other responders to identify, document, or respond to witness intimidation. To address this gap, recommendations were made to create practice guides and training to police officers and responders to aid in identifying, documenting, investigating and prosecuting witness intimidation, as well as providing education to and safety planning with victims about the potential for witness intimidation. It was recommended that systemic problems that provide windows of opportunity for offenders to intimidate victims into dropping out of the criminal justice process, such as delays or gaps in information sharing, be addressed using Duluth’s existing coordinated community response structure.

Safety and protection of victim and witnesses - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Skey* [2020] QDC 27 (9 March 2020) – Queensland District Court

Per Cash QC DCJ:

[17] The evidence discloses sufficient reason to receive the evidence of the complainant in a manner that differs from usual procedures. As noted, the prosecution proposed that the complainant testify over video-link with a support person and that the evidence be recorded before the trial. The defendant did not object to a support person but opposed the other measures. The defendant submitted that to receive evidence by video-link would detract from the "atmosphere" of the trial and the ability of the jury to assess the reactions and demeanour of the complainant in a case where her credit was central to the trial. In this way the defendant would suffer impermissible disadvantage.

[18] I did not accept this submission. Taking evidence by video-link is now almost commonplace. The notion that juries who see video evidence are less able to determine issues of credit is not a proposition with which I would readily agree. There is research to suggest that an average person's ability to detect lies based on "demeanour" is little better than chance.*

* Citing: Ekman, P, Telling Lies: Clues to Deceit in the Marketplace, Politics and Marriage (Norton, New York, 1985); Aamodt, MG and Custer H, 'Who can best catch a liar? A meta-analysis of individual differences in detecting deception' (2006) (Spring) The Forensic Examiner, 6–11; Bond, CF and DePaulo, BM, 'Accuracy of deception judgments' (2006) 10 Personality and Social Psychology Review, 214–234.

Legal representation and self-represented litigants

Where a party is self-represented in domestic and family violence related proceedings, there may be adverse consequences to both parties and more generally to the administration of justice.

Bench books, best practice guidelines and other resources have been developed in a number of Australian jurisdictions [Other Bench Books] [Other Resources] to assist judicial officers in ensuring that self-represented parties are afforded procedural fairness and access to justice while maintaining their independence and neutrality (see Judicial Action guide [Self-Represented Litigants - Judicial Actions]).

Where a party who is a victim of domestic and family violence is self-represented and required to cross-examine the perpetrator, their capacity to appropriately and fully question may be diminished or negated by their fear of the perpetrator [Coy et al 2012]. Where the perpetrator is represented, a self-represented victim may feel particular pressure to withdraw or not proceed with an application [Qld Special DFV Taskforce 2015], or to consent to orders or undertakings as a result of fear or intimidation, or to avoid being compromised or intimidated by a hearing or other ongoing proceedings [Kaspiew et al 2009].

A perpetrator may choose to be self-represented so as to secure the opportunity to directly cross-examine the victim. The victim's capacity to give evidence or the quality of the victim's evidence in these circumstances may be compromised by the victim's fear of the perpetrator and, as a consequence, the probative value of the evidence may be diminished or negated. Importantly, there are some jurisdictions where in certain circumstances direct cross-examination of the victim by the perpetrator is prohibited or limited – see 7.2.1 table and 9.2.3 table for legislation references and summaries of the restrictions on direct cross-examination.

Where a perpetrator uses their own or the victim's self-represented status to subject the victim to further abuse through judicial processes, the victim may experience a form of secondary abuse.

Not only does the absence of legal representation potentially prejudice the self-represented party and limit their access to justice, it may also jeopardise the ability of the court to receive the necessary evidence and to make decisions for the safety and protection of victims and children [Chisholm 2009].

Research has shown the value to the court and parties of self-represented parties receiving advice and information on appropriate conduct and language in the courtroom prior to any court appearance or hearing [Central Coast CLC 2014]. Legal assistance providers deliver duty lawyer services to self-represented litigants in many courts, including providing legal advice and information about court processes, help with the preparation of documents, and in some cases, representation.

Australian studies reveal that many victims, mostly women, appear in protection order application proceedings without legal representation; this may be due to lack of access to legal assistance or the cost of engaging private lawyers [George & Harris 2014]. A party may not qualify for legal assistance if they own property, notwithstanding earning a low income [Braaf & Meyering 2011].

The problem of lack of private legal representation may be exacerbated in regional and rural communities where there may be fewer lawyers available, and the perpetrator may be given priority based on their standing in the community, their prior dealings or relationship with lawyers, or their financial resources [Kyle et al 2014]. Further in this context, where the perpetrator is aware that the victim may be in a financial position to engage legal representation, the perpetrator may use a tactic known as 'conflicting out', which involves seeking preliminary advice from multiple lawyers in the geographical area so as to deny the victim access to legal representation on the basis of conflict of interest.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016] and people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds may also be less likely to be legally represented or to seek representation due to language barriers, limited knowledge of their legal rights, and a lack of trust in judicial processes [Cleak et al 2015].

The approach to the protection of adult victims of domestic and family violence and sexual assault complainants / witnesses (sometimes called vulnerable or special witnesses) in domestic violence protection order matters and criminal cases varies throughout Australia. Protections may include closed courtrooms, using closed circuit television rather than being in court, using a screen in court, having evidence recorded so the person is only cross-examined once, allowing the presence of a support person and disallowing direct cross-examination of one party by another in certain proceedings. See 9.2.3 Vulnerable or Special Witnesses for a table outlining jurisdictional approaches.

Note that detailed information about children giving evidence in criminal proceedings can be found here: Bench Book For Children Giving Evidence In Australian Courts

Important note: The expression "self-represented" is used in this bench book to refer to any situation where a party is not represented by a lawyer. It is acknowledged that the expression may be inappropriate in some contexts. It may, for example, suggest that a party has exercised a choice to represent themselves, when in fact they do so due to lack of financial resources or access to legal assistance. On the other hand, some parties choose to represent themselves because they believe they are best equipped to do so and may object to the use of an expression such as “unrepresented” on the basis that it may, for example, be interpreted to suggest that they are unable to properly or fully participate in the proceedings in their own right.

Legal representation and self-represented litigants - Key Literature

Australia

Braaf, Rochelle and Isobelle Barrett Meyering, Seeking security: promoting women's economic wellbeing following domestic violence (Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2011).

This report specifically examines 'the impact of domestic violence on women's economic wellbeing and the intersection of this with their recovery overall' (p 3). The report identifies legal issues as being key to issues affecting women's financial outcomes (p 55). In terms of legal costs, some of the women surveyed did not qualify for legal assistance but could not afford private services. 'They found they were ineligible if their cases were deemed too complex or would take too long to settle; if their ex-partner was already represented by Legal Aid; or if they owned property, even though they were on low incomes' (p57). Ultimately, many women 'felt that their access to justice was compromised because they lacked the financial means to pursue legal action or to access quality legal representation. 'If I had money' was a recurrent theme in the interviews' (p 58).

Bryant, Diana and John Faulks, 'The 'helping court' comes full circle: The application and use of therapeutic jurisprudence in the Family Court of Australia' (2007) 17 Journal of Judicial Administration 93.

The Family Court has taken a range of initiatives in response to the increasing number of self-represented litigants entering their court. They produced Litigants in Persons Guidelines. These guidelines are as follows:

- A judge should ensure as far as is possible that procedural fairness is afforded to all parties whether represented or appearing in person in order to ensure a fair trial;
- A judge should inform the litigant in person of the manner in which the trial is to proceed, the order of calling witnesses and the right which he or she has to cross-examine the witnesses;
- A judge should explain to the litigant in person any procedures relevant to the litigation;
- A judge should generally assist the litigant in person by taking basic information from witnesses called, such as name, address and occupation;

- If a change in the normal procedure is requested by the other parties such as the calling of witnesses out of turn the judge may, if he or she considers that there is any serious possibility of such a change causing any injustice to a litigant in person, explain to the unrepresented party the effect and perhaps the undesirability of the interposition of witnesses and his or her right to object to that course;
- A judge may provide general advice to a litigant in person that he or she has the right to object to inadmissible evidence, and to inquire whether he or she so objects. A judge is not obliged to provide advice on each occasion that particular questions or documents arise;
- If a question is asked, or evidence is sought to be tendered in respect of which the litigant in person has a possible claim of privilege, to inform the litigant of her or his rights;
- A judge should attempt to clarify the substance of the submissions of the litigant in person, especially in cases where, because of garrulous or misconceived advocacy, the substantive issues are either ignored, given little attention or obfuscated (Neil v Nott (1994) 121 ALR 148 at 150);
- Where the interests of justice and the circumstances of the case requires it, a judge may:
  - Draw attention to the law applied by the court in determining issues before it;
  - Question witnesses;
  - Identify applications or submissions which ought to be put to the court;
  - Suggest procedural steps that may be taken by a party; and
  - Clarify the particulars of the orders sought by a litigant in person or the bases for such orders.

The above list is not intended to be exhaustive and there may well be other interventions that a judge may properly make without giving rise to an apprehension of bias (p 103).

Chisholm, Richard, Family Courts Violence Review (2009).

In discussing appropriate legal representation, the report notes that the ‘importance of appropriate legal representation can hardly be overstated in parenting cases, especially those that involve issues of family violence’. Where one or more parties are unrepresented this jeopardises the ability of the court to receive appropriate evidence and to make decisions about the child’s best interests (p 168).

Cleak, Helen et al, 'Family violence in culturally and linguistically diverse communities: An evaluation of a family relationship centre' (2015) 26 Australasian Dispute Resolution Journal 26.

This article evaluates a family relationship centre, in this context considers the reasons for why many people from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) groups often do not access legal services. It reviews recent research and notes reasons include language barriers, limited knowledge about rights and lack of trust toward legal authorities. It notes that the available data suggests that people from CALD communities often struggle to find a visible entry point into the legal system' (p 28).

Central Coast Community Legal Centre, Lawyerless and Lost at Court: Are we really helping? (Law and Justice Foundation of NSW, 2014).

This report examines the effectiveness of the Central Coast Community Legal Centre (CCCLC)'s AVO Legal Advice Clinic at Wyong Local Court in improving unrepresented defendants' knowledge in AVO matters (p 3). It found 78% of surveyed defendants said they would not have obtained legal advice if the CCCLC service had not been available at the court. 81% of defendants obtained advice prior to the first mention of their AVO matter in Court. (p 13).

The research underlines the importance of legal advice and indicates that 'there has been a clear increase in defendants' self-reported knowledge after obtaining legal advice from the CCCLC' (p 26). Defendant knowledge of legal options improved dramatically after obtaining legal advice relating to the AVO application against them. 'Common enquiries that defendants have relate to where they physically stand in court, how they address the Magistrate when they speak as well as what they are expected to say in court'. The report reports that procedural advice provided a calming or reassuring impact on defendants before court (p 17).

George, Amanda and Bridget Harris, Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria (Deakin University School of Law's Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, 2014).

This report draws and extends upon a 2013 report released by the Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice (Victoria) (Jordan, Lucinda and Lydia Phillips, Women's experiences of surviving family violence and accessing the Magistrates' Court in Geelong, Victoria (Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University Australia, 2013)). George and Harris' report 'examines the experiences of and outcomes for women survivors of family violence in regional and rural Victoria' (p 2). Of relevance, the report looks at the role of lawyers in the Family Violence Intervention Order (FVIO) process. It found:

- very few private lawyers appeared for applicants', many women appeared in court without legal representation;
- the (often prohibitive) cost of lawyers means that many survivors and respondents cannot secure representation.

Kaspiew, Rae et al, Evaluation of the 2006 Family Law Reforms (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2009).

This evaluation of the impact of the 2006 changes to the Family law Act involved the collection of data from some 28,000 people involved or potentially involved in the family law system - including parents, grandparents, family relationship service staff, clients of family relationship services, lawyers, court professionals and judicial officers - and the analysis of administrative data and court files. Of relevance here see:

- See Chapter 9: 'Legal system professionals regularly made the point that women felt pressured to agree to outcomes in negotiations that they didn't feel were in their children's interests. While this was said to be happening frequently, particular concerns were expressed about the nature of the agreements reached in two different situations. The first concerned cases where there had been a history of family violence. The second situation causing concern involved matters where a lack of legal representation at all, or a perceived imbalance in the quality of the legal representation, failed to alleviate the apparent pressure caused by the imbalance in bargaining power, resulting in women agreeing to inappropriate arrangements' (p 221).
- Also see '15.1.2 Consent orders' (from p337), noting that 'The tensions in this area are succinctly summarised in this comment by a legal practitioner about the choice litigants face in deciding whether or not to settle: "Most of them settle by consent and you've got a real tension because those that settle by consent feel as if they've been bullied into it, get a settlement because they can't afford it and they want to get it over and done with. Those that run the full trial feel as though they got shafted anyway because they didn't get heard properly. So either way they feel as though they've lost". In reflecting on their practices concerning consent orders, a common observation among registrars and judicial officers was the limited supervisory role courts have in the context of a system that encourages parties to reach agreement by themselves'.

Kaye, Miranda, 'Accommodating Violence in the Family Courts' (2019) 33(2) Australian Journal of Family Law, 100-121

This article argues that allegations of family violence are 'the new normal' in family court matters in Australia and calls for the family law system to prioritise victim safety. It presents findings from a study with independent children's lawyers from Victoria and New South Wales, highlighting their views on issues of family violence, self-representation, safety, and physical court premises, which are in contrast to the recommendations of the recent Australian Law Reform Commission into the family law system, which failed to address the safety of court users. There needs to be a shift in thinking from providing 'special' arrangements to victim safety being the standard approach.

Kyle, Louise, Richard Coverdale and Tim Powers, Conflict of Interest in Victoria Rural and Regional Legal Practice (Deakin University, 2014).

Based on interviews with legal practitioners and others and surveys with legal practitioners this research found:

- 'Conflicts of interest are more likely to occur in regional communities where there are smaller numbers of practising solicitors; parties are more likely to be known to each other and past dealings with others in the community are more likely to have occurred. (p 11).
- 'A common frustration among family violence service providers is that lawyers will 'go with the status quo' when a decision has to be made about who will be their client. This manifests in the legal practitioner more frequently acting for the alleged perpetrator for several reasons- the alleged perpetrator is the person who: has to answer to an application to the court; is often a person of standing in the local community; the client who is able to pay. The outcome of this approach is that women are too often appearing in court without legal support and representation and therefore with reduced access to the protection from further violence that a court order might offer' (p 70).

Queensland, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Submissions to taskforce raised the lack of legal representation and assistance as a major concern for victims, particularly where a male respondent can afford legal representation. Submissions stated that this often results in the victim withdrawing or not pursuing a legal response and can lead to a failure in protection for an aggrieved. Submissions also noted the benefits from a duty lawyer system:

- 'Mitigating the trauma of the court process for victims;
- Parties are better informed of their rights and the legal process and know what they can and cannot ask of the court
- Victims will receive assistance and advice with completing their application forms. This will ensure all relevant information is before the court. The court process will proceed more smoothly as a consequence of properly prepared documents and legally informed clients appearing before it
- Queensland Police Prosecutors will also indirectly benefit as a consequence in the same way as the court will
- More appropriate orders and conditions can be applied for which improves victims safety, and reduces the risk of recidivism, breach and applications for variations of the orders
- Timely legal advice and information to respondents could lead to a less litigious approach to proceedings and appropriate referrals
- Victims will be empowered to pursue their matters and not withdraw because of fear or intimidation by the perpetrator or because of lack of knowledge of the complex legal system. The result will be greater safety for older people, women and children experiencing domestic and family violence. (p 312)

Wangmann, J., Booth, T., & Kaye, M. (2020). "No straight lines": Self-represented litigants in family law proceedings involving allegations about family violence (Research report, 24/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Abstract: This research focuses on documenting current practice and generating new knowledge about the impact and effect of self-representation by one or both parties in Family Law proceedings involving allegations of family violence.

The research team conducted semi-structured interviews with SRLs and professionals who engage with SRLs in family law proceedings to produce a general interview sample. The researchers then also undertook an intensive case study that involved court observation, case file review, and interviews with SRLs or other representatives involved in those observed/reviewed cases.

The research confirmed that there are high numbers of SRLs engaged in family law cases involving allegations of family violence, and the primary motivation for self-representing is financial. The study revealed that SRLs are impacted by their self-representation, as well as histories of family violence, in numerous ways. Primarily, SRLs lack knowledge of the legal process: for example, they are often unaware of the heavy emphasis on paperwork and negotiation in family law cases, and they are unprepared to complete paperwork, or negotiate, in ways that effectively support their case. Intersecting with the lack of knowledge is the impact of family violence: ability to complete paperwork and negotiate is also affected by experiences of violence and resulting trauma, and perceptions of safety.

Given these findings, the report stresses the importance of enhanced, up-to-date and practical information for SRLs in multiple formats, as well as increased access to lawyers and legal advice. The report also raises the need to explore possible system change, particularly with a view to the fragmentation of areas of law that respond to family violence. Alongside enhancing family violence expertise across key court personnel, the report recommends integrating information about safety into routinely accessed documents in order to raise awareness about available services.

International

Buel, Sarah M, 'Fifty Obstacles to Leaving, aka, Why Abuse Victims Stay' (1999) 28(10) The Colorado Lawyer 19.

'When the victim lacks a tenacious advocate, she often feels intimidated, discouraged, and, ultimately, hopeless about being able to navigate the complex legal and social service systems needed to escape the batterer. Some well-intentioned advocates engage in dangerous victim-blaming with the assumption that there is something about the victim's behaviour or past that precipitates the violence' (p 19).

Coy, Maddy et al, Picking up the pieces: domestic violence and child contact (Rights of Women and CWASU, 2012).

Section 5 of this report presents quantitative and qualitative data on women and legal professionals' experience of legal proceedings. In relation to legal representation, this report found that there were instances where women had to represent themselves (and thus have to cross-examine men who had been violent to them) or face the prospect of being cross-examined by their ex-partners. Women were afraid of these two scenarios (p 38). Solicitors and barristers surveyed identified two issues relating to potential abuse and intimidation that self-representation raises. First, 'perpetrators representing themselves used cross-examination as another route to harass and undermine their ex-partners'. Second, fearful victim-survivors representing themselves may not disclose the full details of their abuse and may inhibit themselves from questioning perpetrators about their actions and motivations (p 39). The report identifies multiple ways in which the outcome of the case can be influenced where women and/or their abusive ex-partners represent themselves:

- Victim-survivors are not enabled to give their best evidence about histories of abuse, which may be crucial to determining whether contact, and in what form, is deemed appropriate.
- The difficulties of cross-examining their perpetrators may mean they do not ask sufficiently probing questions or challenge responses, which again informs what evidence is available to the court.
- They are rarely equipped with the legal knowledge and experience to prepare documentation and negotiate family law processes e.g. requesting finding of fact hearings.
- Pressure to reach speedy resolution may mean that women accede to arrangements which are not necessarily in their own or their children's best interests' (p 40).

Przekop, Mary, 'One More Battleground: Domestic Violence, Child Custody, and the Batterers' Relentless Pursuit of their Victims Through the Courts' (2010-2011) 9 Seattle Journal for Social Justice 1053.

Although the article is not directly about legal representation, it makes the observation that female abuse survivors in family court settings 'are far less likely than men to be represented, which places them at a disadvantage. The most common reason why they are without representation is because they cannot afford to hire an attorney. This fact is not surprising, as studies show that the financial situation of divorced fathers improves after a divorce, which places men in a better position to afford representation in the first place' (p 1062).

Legal representation and self-represented litigants - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Civil Trials Bench Book (2022).

Section [1-0800] discusses the issues related to unrepresented litigants and lay advisers in the context of court proceeedings.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Criminal Trial Courts Bench Book (2022).

[1-800]. This part details court procedure in relation to self-represented accused. It is noted that '[a]n accused person may appear personally, and may conduct his or her own case…While the election by an accused to appear self-represented is a fundamental right which should not be interfered with…the operation of the adversarial system 'may be severely impaired' by the absence of legal representation'. The bench book goes on to discuss the duty of the trial judge, suggested advice and information to be provided to the accused in the absence of the jury, and the right of the accused to challenge in empanelling the jury

[1-845] The bench book also provides discussion of cross-examination of complainants in prescribed sexual offence proceedings and vulnerable witnesses in criminal proceedings by unrepresented litigants. Special procedures apply in these circumstances. 'If the accused is self-represented, any cross-examination must be conducted through a court-appointed intermediary'. 'The purpose of the provisions is to spare the witness 'the need to answer questions directly asked by him or her by the person said to have committed the offence' (Clark v R (2008) 185 A Crim R 1)'. A suggested procedure to follow is detailed.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 10 discusses a range of issues affecting self-represented parties and their experience of court processes.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sexual Assault Trials Handbook (2021).

Section [10-500] discusses important general directions in sexual assault trials. Section [7-000] contains relevant literature, including [7-240] procedure in prescribed sexual offence cases.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 14.9 deals with the rights of appearance and representation of parties to the proceeding, and adjournment where a child has not had a reasonable opportunity to obtain legal representation.

Queensland Courts, Supreme and District Courts Criminal Directions Benchbook (2022).

Chapter 5 discusses procedures and approaches in relation to unrepresented defendants.

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Benchbook (2nd ed, 2016).

- Chapter 12 of the bench book considers the equal treatment of self-represented litigants in court proceedings. While all litigants have the right to appear in person, self-represented litigants both face and pose a significant challenge to the administration of justice in Queensland. Part II examines the areas of difficulty faced by self-represented litigants including: a lack of understanding of the relevant law and legal process, an inability to assess the merits of their claim accurately, and lacking the specialist skills of cross-examination and testing of evidence.
- Part III provides a working guide for judges to assist with dealing with self-represented litigants during a hearing. The issues covered in this section include: (1) examination of the evidentiary issues that may arise for self-represented litigants (2) matters specific to criminal proceedings (3) McKenzie friends (4) pro bono assistance (5) vexatious proceedings. The bench book also provides guidance for judges on their role before and after a hearing.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Criminal Charge Book (2017).

2.3 discusses procedures for taking evidence in certain circumstances, including to reduce the stress of giving evidence on particular witnesses, to prevent the accused from personally cross-examining certain witnesses, and to allow evidence that has been pre-recorded to be used in certain legal proceedings.

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Criminal Proceedings Manual (2015).

- Chapter 9 of the manual issues relating to self-represented accused persons. It notes that while representation is not compulsory, '[a] self-represented accused lacks the qualities of a professional skill and objective judgment that legal representatives bring to a case'.
- In part 9.2.1, the bench book provides a discussion of the degree of assistance required for self-represented litigants. The bench book cites with approval Family Court guidelines for conducting family law hearings involving self-represented litigants. These guidelines include:
- A judge should ensure as far as is possible that procedural fairness is afforded to all parties whether represented or appearing in person in order to ensure a fair trial.
- A judge should inform the litigant in person of the manner in which the trial is to proceed, the order of calling witnesses and the right which he or she has to cross-examine the witnesses.
- A judge should explain to the litigant in person any procedures relevant to the litigation.
- A judge should generally assist the litigant in person by taking basic information from witnesses called, such as name, address and occupation.
- If a change in the normal procedure is requested by the other parties such as the calling of witnesses out of turn the judge may, if he/she considers that there is any serious possibility of such a change causing any injustice to a litigant in person, explain to the unrepresented party the effect and perhaps the undesirability of the interposition of witnesses and his or her right to object to that course.
- A judge may provide general advice to a litigant in person that he or she has the right to object to inadmissible evidence, and to inquire whether he or she so objects. A judge is not obliged to provide advice on each occasion that particular questions or documents arise.
- If a question is asked, or evidence is sought to be tendered in respect of which the litigant in person has a possible claim of privilege, to inform the litigant of his or her rights.

- A judge should attempt to clarify the substance of the submissions of the litigant in person, especially in cases where, because of garrulous or misconceived advocacy, the substantive issues are either ignored, given little attention or obfuscated: Neil v Nott (1994) 121 ALR 148 at 510.
- Where the interests of justice and the circumstances of the case require it, a judge may:
- draw attention to the law applied by the Court in determining issues before it;
- question witnesses;
- identify applications or submissions which ought to be put to the Court;
- suggest procedural steps that may be taken by a party;
- clarify the particulars of the orders sought by a litigant in person or the bases for such orders.
- Part 9.2.2 provides a discussion of appropriate intervention and assistance.
- Part 9.2.3 provides a discussion of a McKenzie Friend. When determining whether to permit an accused to have the assistance of a McKenzie Friend, the court should consider the following factors: 'the complexity of the evidence and the issues; the accused's ability to understand the evidence and the course of proceedings; the accused's ability to express him or herself in the court setting; whether the accused can receive the same benefits by conferring with his friend or lay adviser during adjournments'. In criminal trials, the courts are reluctant to grant leave for a McKenzie friend because 'experience has shown that the practice is fraught with danger. Proceedings are more likely to become protracted, or miscarry'.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Chapter 8 of the bench book considers issues facing self-represented litigants in terms of equality before the law. It provides a list of the reasons why people represent themselves. These include the fact that a person may:

- 'be appearing in a jurisdiction where self-representation is encouraged or representation is statutorily precluded;
- have been refused Legal Aid or presume they are ineligible;
- not be able to afford legal representation;
- have been told by lawyers that their case has no merit, but believe that it does have merit;

- have been considered by lawyers to be in some way too “difficult” (for example, they are unable to speak English or to communicate well or sufficiently logically);
- not trust lawyers;
- believe they are the best person to put their case across;
- have withdrawn instructions from their lawyer relatively recently and not had time to find alternative representation; and /or
- represent themselves for part of the court proceedings and engage a lawyer only for the part they consider (or have been advised) is most important or critical’.
- Further, in discussing the difficulties faced by self-represented litigants, the bench book notes that self-represented people may:
- not understand the complexities of relevant legislation and case law;
- not fully understand legal language;
- not fully understand the purpose of the proceedings and/or the interlocutory steps in the proceedings;
- not fully understand and/or be able to apply properly the court rules (for example, what they must file when, the rules of evidence and cross-examination);
- need an interpreter;
- not be skilled in advocacy and able to test adequately an opponent’s evidence, or crossexamine effectively;
- be intimidated by the other party or witnesses in proceedings involving family or domestic violence; and/or
- as a result of many or all of these issues, be feeling anxious, frightened, frustrated, and/ or bewildered. The case may also be impacting, or starting to impact, on their emotional and/or physical health’.
- Self-represented litigants may also present difficulties for the court itself and for the parties involved.
- The bench book stipulates practical considerations judges may have a mind to when confronted with a self-represented litigant before a court appearance, at the start of court proceedings, as the court proceedings progress, directions to the jury, and in sentencing, other decisions and judgment writing or decision writing.

Legal representation and self-represented litigants - Other Resources

Australia

Family Court of Australia, Reconciliation Action Plan 2018-2020.

The Family Court of Australia's Reconciliation Action Plan identifies the following barriers to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people using the Family Court's services:

- lack of understanding about the family law system among Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander clients;
- resistance to engagement with, and even fear of, family law system services;
- literacy and language barriers;
- need for Indigenous-specific and culturally competent mainstream services;
- the challenges arising from lengthy and multi-step court processes for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander clients;
- the setting being based on Western notions of child-rearing, kinship and family, and concerns as to whether they operated in a culturally safe way; and
- lack of access to services for communities in regional and remote areas

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Experience of the Courts (2016).

See p6: 'this report is a summary of consultations undertaken by the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity. As such, the views expressed in the document are those of stakeholders who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait women. The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;

- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Indigenous women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

At p7: 'Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women had trouble communicating in the language of the justice system, adversely impacting on their ability to deal with police, engage with support services including legal representatives, and communicate with court staff and judicial officers.'

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity Website.

The Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity is an advisory body formed to assist Australian courts, judicial officers and administrators to positively respond to the diverse needs of the judiciary, including the particular issues that arise in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. This website includes a number of useful resources and links.

LawAccess NSW, Representing Yourself – Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Self-Represented Litigants - Judicial Actions.

There are steps judicial officers can take to ensure that self-represented litigants are afforded procedural fairness and access to justice while maintaining their independence and neutrality. The following actions are identified in Australian state and territory bench books [Other Bench Books]. They serve as a non-exhaustive guide to assist judicial officers in exercising their discretion in proceedings involving self-represented litigants (SRL). For specific legislative requirements on limits to cross-examination where a defendant is self-represented or judicial duties/discretions to disallow improper questions, see 5.4 Legal representation and self-represented litigants statement.

Stage of proceedings	Judicial action
Prior to commencement	> Check that SRL has considered all legal representation options > Check with parties whether matter capable of being resolved by mediation/negotiation > Check that SRL has access to information about court processes and relevant services/agencies > Check that SRL has filed/served on other party all necessary documents/statements and received any subpoenaed documents > Check that SRL's witnesses available to give evidence
At commencement	Where provided in local bench books, follow specific directions in addressing SLR. Otherwise, explain to SRL in simple, direct, non-legal language: > Conventions >> who is in court, their names and roles, and how they are to be addressed >> no recording of the proceedings, handwritten notes permitted >> mobile phones must be off or in silent mode >> SRL to ask judicial officer if they don't understand something or need a break >> one person speaks at a time, each party has the opportunity to present their case, politeness and respect required, no badgering of witnesses >> no interjection or disturbance to proceedings by SRL family and friends > Purpose and scope of proceedings > Central issues to be considered/decided > Role of judicial officer >> duty to ensure fairness to all parties and neutrality in actions and language >> duty to ensure that neither party uses the court process to intimidate or abuse the other party >> ask questions/intervene to ensure SRL understands >> respond to any questions/concerns raised by the other party regarding fairness/neutrality >> explain the reason for any intervention >> intervene in a neutral and non-provocative manner > Order of proceedings/procedures >> who does what, when >> when SRL will have the opportunity to speak/present case/cross-examine >> where there is a change in normal procedure, explain to SRL the effect of the change and right to object

	- Court room approaches
	  - direct SRL where to sit so that other party (and their lawyer) have ready access to/from court room without having to pass SRL
	  - direct SRL to sit while asking questions if their stature, demeanour or mood is likely to be intimidating or heighten tensions between the parties
	  - where SRL unable to control their behaviour, direct SRL to attend proceedings via video link

In progress	Explain to SRL in simple, direct, non-legal language:
	- SRL evidence
	  - Steps in presenting/proving case: standard and onus of proof applicable; giving own evidence; calling witness evidence; purpose of sworn evidence; what is allowed to be said/shown in evidence; purpose and scope of final submissions
	  - Giving own evidence: swearing in; admitting written statement (if admissible), confirm true and correct, opportunity to correct; oral evidence in absence of written statement, a sequential account of what SRL has personally seen; judicial officer may intervene to clarify SRL's account or counsel on relevance/admissibility and applicable law
	  - Other party entitled to question (cross-examine) SRL evidence: judicial officer may intervene where other party's questions unfair or improper
	  - SRL entitled to add to/clarify own evidence following cross-examination and to seek leave to admit new evidence: other party entitled to question in response
	  - SRL to call witnesses in the order they determine best explains their case: refer guidance for 'giving own evidence' above; limit questions to matters not covered in statement and likely to help prove case; short questions to elicit witness's account
	  - Other party entitled to question (cross-examine) SRL witness
	  - SRL entitled to ask witness further questions to clarify earlier answers: judicial officer may intervene where SRL fails to ask necessary questions
	  - Other party entitled to question witness where new or altered evidence introduced
	  - Judicial officer to consider whether necessary to take steps to have a party declared a vexatious litigant
	- SRL testing of other party's evidence
	  - Other party entitled to present their case following the same rules as applied to SRL
	  - SRL may only interrupt where they believe other party/witness is saying something that breaks the rules, otherwise remain silent; judicial officer to decide, and may intervene to advised SRL where they have right to object to inadmissible evidence or a claim of privilege
	  - SRL entitled to question (cross-examine) other party and witnesses: judicial officer to explain purpose of cross-examination, permissible questions, short questions one at a time; intervene if SRL questioning not assisting in testing evidence > Judicial officer may, following SRL cross-examination, question other party/witnesses to clarify a point or test the validity of any evidence

Final submissions	Explain to SRL in simple, direct, non-legal language: > Purpose and scope of final submissions > Standard of proof applicable > SRL opportunity to explain to the court how they have proved their case, why SRL evidence should be accepted, any problems with the other party's case/evidence, and the outcome they are seeking; judicial officer may seek to clarify any submissions or identify any substantive issues overlooked > SRL and other party entitled to make final submissions without interruption unless one believes the other is not following the rules or needs to ask a question to clarify a point > Judicial officer to advise when decision will be given and in what form
Directions to jury	> Explain that a party's self-represented status must not influence their decision > Where applicable, explain why self-represented defendant not permitted to directly cross-examine complainant and that this fact must not influence their view of the evidence
Sentencing, other decisions & judgment writing	> Be aware of potential for bias either in favour of SRL or represented party and eliminate bias > Consider whether appropriate to refer to the difficulties the fact of self-representation raised and how they were addressed > Consider whether necessary to take steps to have a party declared a vexatious litigant > Ensure SRL is advised of outcome, sentence and effect of decision explained, appeal rights

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

International

Lee, Kaofeng and Ian Harris, How to Gather Technology Abuse Evidence for Court, Self-represented Litigants Series, Safety Net Project at the National Network to End Domestic Violence (February 2018).

This is a resource to assist self-represented litigants to gather evidence of their experience of technology abuse in a form that will be allowed by a court. It also provides links to additional resources including information about documenting technology abuse and technology safety. Note however that this is an American resource and the helpline number provided is unlikely to be available to those calling from Australia.

The introduction reads: If someone is using technology like text messages, email, or social media (like Facebook) to harass you, this guide will help you “capture” the evidence of the harassment, so you can bring it to court. You might think you can just show the judge your phone in court—but you probably won’t be allowed to just show your device. Even if you are allowed, you could risk the court taking your device as evidence. To be sure the judge considers your evidence and that you don’t lose your phone (or other device), you need to gather evidence in a form allowed by the court. This guide will provide suggestions on how to capture evidence that can be admitted in court from your devices, such as your cell phone, computer, or tablet (such as an iPad).

Legal representation and self-represented litigants - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Ingrid

Interpreters and translators

To ensure a fair hearing in domestic and family violence related proceedings and the full participation by parties, it may be appropriate for judicial officers to facilitate the engagement of interpreter or translator ("language") services where a party has limited linguistic ability, hearing impairment or other physical or mental disability. For example, among the groups identified in this bench book as being at greater risk of experiencing domestic and family violence or more vulnerable to its impacts, people from culturally and linguistically diverse [JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016] or Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander backgrounds, and people who experience disability, mental illness, or poor literacy may indicate a need for language services. Where people are unable to access language services to ensure their full participation in proceedings, they may experience heightened vulnerability to the impacts of domestic and family violence [Wakefield & Taylor 2015].

Research acknowledges the complexity of the issues [Hale The Need to Raise the Bar 2011], for the parties involved and the judicial officers making decisions about the use and nature of language services in a given case [Wakefield & Taylor 2015]; and the value of best practice guidelines [Eckert 2013-14] to assist in decision making [JCCD, The Path to Justice (ATSI) 2016, JCCD, The Path to Justice (CALD) 2016]. Some of the issues judicial officers may need to consider include:

- A party's need for language services. A party may be reluctant to disclose a need for language services or may overstate their linguistic ability for a variety of reasons including: embarrassment and shame, fear of being mocked by the other party, distressing prior experience with a language service provider, reluctance to disclose their story to an unknown person or a person known to both parties, privacy and confidentiality concerns, or a mistaken belief that their linguistic ability will be sufficient in a courtroom environment [Hunter 2008].

  Where a judicial officer questions a party to determine the need for language services, it is important to reassure the party that the purpose is to ensure a fair hearing and their full participation in proceedings [Barassi-Rubio 2011].Where it is determined that a party requires language services, it may be appropriate for the judicial officer to take steps to ensure that these services will be made available to the party for the duration of all proceedings.
- The consequences of a party being denied access to language services during the police process [Cavallaro 2010] prior to the matter coming before the court and the steps that may need to be taken to ensure the party's understanding of the matter and confidence in the ongoing judicial process.

- The availability of language service providers appropriate to the party's specific needs [Hale Breaking Through the Language Barrier 2011]. For example, there is a widespread shortage throughout Australian jurisdictions of language service providers who have a specialised understanding of domestic and family violence matters and the legal terminology used in related proceedings. Further, there may be limited language service providers available for some Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander and new and emerging languages, and this may be more prevalent in rural and remote communities. Where it is established that a party speaks more than one language, it may be possible to access language service providers more readily for one language than for another. In some countries it is not uncommon for people to speak three or four languages. It is important not to make assumptions about a party's predominant language based on their country of origin or residence; they may have moved often, or spent extended periods in refugee camps, which may influence their language choice and usage. Certain countries and territories may also have multiple distinct language groups.

  In some circumstances, based on a belief that there are no alternative options they would be comfortable or confident with, a party may express a preference for their own linguistically able child to provide the language services they require. It is important for judicial officers to appreciate the range of potential adverse impacts on children providing language services to a parent in legal proceedings [Hale Breaking Through the Language Barrier 2011] especially when they involve allegations of domestic and family violence.

- The qualifications and competencies of language service providers. The National Accreditation Authority for Translators and Interpreters (NAATI) [Outline of NAATI Credentials 2010] is Australia's national standards and accreditation body. While it is the only agency authorised to issue accreditations for practitioners who wish to work in these roles in Australia, the profession is unregulated, and there is no statutory requirement that translators and interpreters be accredited. At times, there may be no NAATI-accredited language service provider available, or the language service provider is not accredited at the appropriate level. In these circumstances a judicial officer may need to consider options for the best possible practice taking into account the practicalities of the particular case.
- The appropriate gender of the language service provider [Hale Breaking Through the Language Barrier 2011]. A party requiring language services may feel more comfortable and confident with a provider of the same gender.

- Whether it is appropriate to engage separate providers for each party requiring language services [Beutz 2004]. A party may be reluctant to disclose their story to a provider who is also providing language services to the other party, and therefore may feel more comfortable and confident with an independent provider. It is likely that a party will not object to the same provider for themselves and their witnesses.
- The independence and neutrality of the language service provider having regard to the familial, social, financial and proprietary interests of all parties to the proceedings [Hunter 2008]. This is especially important in the context of a small community where parties are likely to be concerned about privacy and confidentiality [Ostapiej-Piatkowski & Allimant 2013]. It may in some circumstances be necessary for parties to access language services located outside the particular community.
- The most appropriate and practical means of providing the language services, whether face-to-face or via telephone [Barassi-Rubio 2011]. These considerations extend to the availability of appropriate language service providers and technical facilities in the courtroom, and arrangements necessary for the payment of associated expenses.
- The potential for injustice [Cussen & Lyneham 2012] where a party is not provided with the language services they require, or the services are inadequate, incompetent or poorly managed [Assafiri & Dimopoulos 1995].

Interpreters and translators - Key Literature

Australia

Assafiri, Hana and Maria Dimopoulos, 'The Legal System's Treatment of NESB Women Victims of Male Violence' (Paper presented at the Australian Institute of Criminology Conference, "The Criminal Justice System in a Multicultural Society", 1995).

Abstract: 'This [presentation] considers the way NESB women are perceived and defined in their dealings with the legal system. The authors provide examples which highlight how some magistrates unwittingly perpetuate racist assumptions about the prevalence of domestic violence in ethnic communities.'

Some non-English speaking women's negative experiences of Magistrates are reported, including a woman asked to rely on her daughter to interpret, another woman required to 'act' out the violence, and a failure to address the cultural dissonance experienced by a Croatian woman who was provided with a Serbian interpreter.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response, Report 114 (2010).

The Report notes that the provision of interpreters is essential (p74). This conclusion is based on submissions that emphasised the following in regards to reporting, prosecution and pre-trial processes:

- 'Women from CALD backgrounds also face a range of cultural and systemic barriers—based on language and other issues —including: … cultural and linguistic communication barriers, such as the lack of information in diverse community languages or of professional interpreters …' (p1195)
- 'The Immigrant Women's Support Service highlighted the need for service providers to provide 'relevant information in appropriate community languages' as well as the need for professional interpreters' (p1210).

Barassi-Rubio, Cecilia, 'Working with Interpreters' (2011) 9(4) Centre for Domestic and Family Violence Research Reader 15.

Author notes that ‘making a decision about engaging an interpreter should be based on fact rather than assumption…a person may have a reasonable level of conversational English but may find it difficult to understand more abstract information…’ This paper also identifies several helpful points for dealing with interpreters:

- Ideally the interpreter should be briefed before undertaking the interpreting;
- Explain your role and make the purpose of the procedure clear;
- Allow time;
- Communicate your understanding of what was said;
- Speak in your normal tone of voice. For example, speaking too slowly or loudly will not ensure better understanding;
- Use concise and well-constructed sentences;
- Direct all communication to the person accessing the service. (e.g Ms. Jones please tell me how I can help you today? Instead of: ‘Interpreter please ask Ms. Jones how I can help her today.)
- Avoid jargon and slang.
- Always ask the person what is the language they speak. Never rely on physical appearance or accent to identify the language spoken by the person.

Cavallaro, Lisa, ‘I Lived in Fear because I Knew Nothing’: Barriers to the Justice System Faced by CALD Women Experiencing Family Violence (InTouch Multicultural Centre Against Family Violence, Victoria Law Foundation, 2010).

The primary objective of this research was to identify and explore the barriers faced by Victorian CALD women who have been in situations of family violence and who have accessed or attempted to access the legal system. The methodology comprised three components including: surveys and focus groups with over 50 CALD women, consultations with representatives of 180 service providers and an online survey with 144 individual service providers. Workshops were also conducted to help formulate recommendations.

The use of interpreters is analysed throughout, but see especially:

- ‘Failure to utilise interpreters’ (p20), discussing the main ‘failings around police intervention’ being not using interpreter services;

- '4.2.2 Barriers to court processes and legal representation: Interpreters' (p21) recounting comments by women and service providers about the lack of access to family violence-trained interpreters in court
- 'Challenges when working with interpreters' (p23), noting broader issues with accessing 'confidential and competent interpreters with expertise in legal language'
- '5.2 Overcoming language barriers' (p27) providing an overview of the need for consistent use of interpreters, including by courts.

Cussen, Tracy and Mathew Lyneham, 'ACT Family Violence Intervention Program Review' (Technical and Background Paper 52, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2012).

This report presents the results of the review of the ACT Family Violence Intervention Program (FVIP). The main purpose of the review was to describe the effectiveness of the current program including its governance arrangements' (p xiii). It explores a number of areas including the profile of family violence in the ACT and insider views of the Family Violence Intervention Program. The section 'Experience of family violence' (from p71) is most relevant, briefly identifying some cases where interpreter services would have been beneficial to ensure the victim from a CALD background had full access to the criminal justice system. These include cases where the victims noted that: a statement to the police contained inaccuracies (p74); a police report contained mistakes and should have been made with the presence of an interpreter (p83); the victim's husband 'wasn't given the opportunity for an interpreter' (p89).

Eckert, Rebecca, 'Good Practice Principles for Working With Refugee Women Experiencing Domestic Violence' (2013-2014) 54 Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse Newsletter 11.

This paper identifies several principles of good practice for working with interpreters. Page 12 briefly discusses the need to provide access to appropriate interpreters for refugee women who are survivors of domestic violence. Issues for considerations include: requests for female interpreters; that interpreters not be family members; and that interpreters understand the expectations of their role and need for confidentiality.

Hale, Sandra, 'The Need to Raise the Bar: Court Interpreters As Specialised Experts' (2011) 10(2) Judicial Review 237.

Abstract: ‘In this paper, [Hale] examines the complexities of the court interpreting process and identifies the key competencies for court interpreters. Apart from a high level bilingual competence, an interpreter requires an understanding of the interpreting process; cross-linguistic differences; the discourse strategies of the courtroom; and the nature of his or her role; as well as the expertise to know when and how to intervene. [Hale] opines that the responsibility for the quality of court interpreting must lie with all participants in the process and urges systemic improvements, highlighting the pressing need for pre-service specialised court interpreter training.’

Hale, Sandra, ‘Breaking through the Language Barrier: Empowering Refugee and Immigrant Women to Combat Domestic and Family Violence through Cultural and Language Training’ (Report, University of Western Sydney, 2011).

This project emphasises the need for professional interpreters for women of CALD backgrounds affected by domestic and family violence (p7). It identifies the lack of professional interpreters, particularly female interpreters, for new and emerging languages. The section ‘3.1.2 Language issues’ (from p23-25) is very relevant, noting respondents’ views from a discussion group on the difficulties that arise around interpreting in domestic violence contexts. The main issues identified include: ‘shortage of interpreters in the relevant languages, the need for female interpreters when domestic violence issues were discussed, the problem with using children to provide language brokerage and the problem with unethical and incompetent interpreters’ (pp23). The also analyses a survey of interpreters, including ethical considerations around interpreting for a woman experiencing domestic violence.

Hunter, Rosemary, Domestic Violence Law Reform and Women's Experience in Court (Cambria Press, 2008).

- This research investigates how civil courts hear and understand women's experiences of domestic violence, and examines women's experiences of attempting to tell their stories in those settings, focusing on domestic violence intervention order and family law proceedings in Australia. As part of the research there is some discussion about the use of interpreters in domestic and family violence cases.
- The difficult context of using interpreters, including their lack of training in domestic violence or being from a small community is noted.

- The section ‘Language Barriers’ discusses issues relating to assessing women’s need for an interpreter; the availability of interpreters in court (e.g. only be used for particular types of matters due to funding, or magistrates looking for children to interpret); and the difficulties women may have with interpreters even if they are available (e.g. unprofessionalism, issues with confidentiality, women being uncomfortable relating their stories through a third person).

National Council to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, Time For Action: The National Council’s Plan for Australia to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children, 2009-2021 (2009).

In relation to interpreting and translating in the context of domestic and family violence, this report’s recommendations include:

- 3.3.7 At every point in the service and justice system, ensure services are adequately funded to provide professional interpreting to victims/survivors who are not confident in their English language competency.
- 3.3.8 Ensure interpreter services for women experiencing violence (including interpreters competent in Auslan) receive training to ensure interpreters understand issues related to sexual assault, and domestic and family violence, and are able to interpret in a sensitive yet impartial manner

The Plan also identifies that continuing barriers to women’s access to justice include not having trained interpreters available, or only having one interpreter for both the complainant and defendant (p96); and emphasises the importance of having appropriately screened and selected interpreters for sexual assault and domestic and family violence victims (p139).

Ostapiej-Piatkowski, Beata and Annabelle Allimant, ‘Best Practice Considerations when Responding to People from Cald Backgrounds, Including Refugees, with Mental Health Issues and Experiences Of Domestic And Sexual Violence’ in Zannettino, Lana, et al (eds), Improving Responses to Refugees with Backgrounds of Multiple Trauma: Pointers for Practitioners in Domestic and Family Violence, Sexual Assault and Settlement Services (Practice Monograph 1, Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2013). (from p14)

This chapter notes best practice considerations that should be followed by practitioners when using interpreters with people from CaLD backgrounds, including the need to use professional interpreters, respond to gender requirements, and be aware of potential issues where the interpreter and client are from a small community (p18).

Wakefield, Shellee, and Annabel Taylor, 'Judicial Education on Family Violence: State of Knowledge Paper' (State of Knowledge Paper 2, Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety Landscapes, June 2015).

Abstract: 'The experience in court of domestic and family violence matters may be particularly difficult for people from vulnerable communities and magistrates have the challenging task of responding to people with various needs. For example, one issue for many migrant women participating in court procedures is the need to have access to interpreters. A lack of proficiency in English language becomes an obstacle when providing evidence in court, communicating, and understanding information or advice on legal rights, and understanding obligations and consequences (Erez and Hartly, 2002; Schetzer, Mullins, and Buanamano, 2002). To ensure meaningful understanding of legal matters, interpreters may be provided. However, these interpreters may be known to the women and this may lead to women fearing community shame associated with domestic and family violence, which in turn deters them from accessing the legal system (Women's Legal Services Australia, 2014).' (p14)

Also notes Ptacek's research on p16, which advised that providing interpreters can improve the hospitableness of the court experience for immigrant women, consequently empowering them; and Braun and Clarke's study which found a number of judicial officers surveyed had noted linguistic barriers (and lack of interpreters) as a major issue for domestic violence victims from diverse backgrounds (p22).

International

Beutz, Molly, et al, Government Response To Domestic Violence Against Refugee and Immigrant Women In The Minneapolis/St. Paul Metropolitan Area: A Human Rights Report (Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights, 2004).

The discussion in this report is based on more than 150 interviews with judges, lawyers, prosecutors, public defenders, advocates, probation officers, immigration officials, medical service providers, interpreters, and child protection employees in the Minneapolis/St. Paul metropolitan area (USA) about their engagement with battered refugee and immigrant women. Of particular relevance at pp145-146 the report provides some key points about interpreters:

- Courts should consider appointing two interpreters, one for each party, in civil and criminal proceedings involving domestic violence;
- Ensure that documents provided or sent by the court to limited English proficient individuals are translated into the appropriate languages.
- In criminal cases where either party has limited English proficiency, request information regarding interpretation services available to both the offender and the victim at the time of arrest, during the investigation and throughout the pre-trial proceedings. To the extent they are relying on such information for their decisions regarding risk analysis, bail evaluation and release of offenders, judges should assess whether interpretation services were adequate during those stages.
- In both civil and criminal cases, during court appearances where interpreters are present, begin court proceedings with a statement of the interpreter's proper role in the courtroom.
- Take steps to be aware of possible interpreter bias in domestic violence cases. Such steps should include asking interpreters about their experience and possible conflicts in the case prior to any appearance or hearing. If bias is detected, judges should immediately disqualify the interpreter for purposes of the proceeding.
- Use female interpreters whenever possible when requested in domestic violence cases involving limited English proficient women.
- Require interpreters appointed to interpret at protection order hearing to remain available to interpret the order at the time it is issued, so that the interpreter may translate the order for limited English proficient parties and facilitate the correction of mistakes or the elimination of confidential information included in the order.

Erez, Edna, and Carolyn Hartley, '[Battered Immigrant Women and the Legal System: A Therapeutic Jurisprudence Perspective]' (2003) 4(2) Western Criminology Review 155.

In part of this essay the USA based authors consider 'Interpreters, Immigrant Battered Women and the Justice System' (from p159). They analyse a number of relevant issues for Immigrant Battered women who do not speak English. Issues include the need to rely on family, friends or community members when seeking out help, who may not be well-informed about woman battering or may collude with the abuser. Similarly, relying on children can be problematic if they are uncooperative or feel their loyalties are being divided, or where it endangers those children where the abuser views assistance as collusion. It also illustrates issues that may arise where there is a lack of professional, unbiased interpreters, and police are therefore required to act on incomplete information and sometimes the account of the abuser.

Interpreters and translators - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Civil Trials Bench Book (2022).

Section [1-0900] discusses the issues related to litigants and witnesses requiring the assistance of an interpreter in the preparation and giving of evidence.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

In the context of people from CALD backgrounds, 3.3.1 discusses the assessment of need for an interpreter or translator, the engagement of appropriate services and liability for costs, national standards to be adhered to, and guidelines for judicial officers when working with interpreters in court. In the context of Aboriginal people, 2.3.3.4 notes that an interpreter should be used where there is any doubt about an Aboriginal person who speaks Aboriginal English understanding the questions being asked.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (2022).

Section [14-000] discusses the issues related to parties and witnesses requiring the assistance of an interpreter during court proceedings.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 11.3 discusses the court's option to engage interpreters or other assistance to explain the proposed order to the parties.

Queensland Courts, Supreme and District Courts Criminal Directions Benchbook (2022).

Chapter 21 discusses issues relating to interpreters and translators.

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Benchbook (2nd ed, 2016).

- Chapter 6, 'Effective Communication in Court Proceedings' focuses on the issues judges may encounter when dealing with legal matters involving people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and identifies some guidelines and strategies that judges may choose to employ to address such issues. The first part of the Chapter looks at the use of interpreters and translators in court to enable comprehension and prevent misunderstanding. It provides a detailed overview of the different interpretation techniques and the standards of accreditation before examining the issue of legal interpreting in Part III (p.46). The bench book notes the Guidelines for Magistrates and Judges on Working with Interpreters in Court that have been developed at p.47.
- Chapter 9 of the bench book, 'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Language and Communication, also looks at interpretation and translation in court proceedings. It highlights significant cases which have recognised the importance of defendants being able to understand the proceedings and evidence in a criminal trial, before providing an overview of how to determine competency in English generally and practical difficulties specifically in Aboriginal interpreting (such as lack of trained interpreters, inability to obtain the services of an interpreter, effects of the court environment, use of untrained interpreters, lack of conceptual equivalence in the language, and language/semantic differences).
- Chapter 11, 'Persons with Disability', also looks at the specific issues arising in relation to communication and interpreters for people with a disability (p.130 onwards)

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.4 notes that a witness may give evidence through an interpreter. 5.6.1 notes factors that may explain the small number of applications for intervention orders by people from CALD backgrounds recorded as accessing interpreter services. 5.6.4 notes that language and literacy issues, a lack of knowledge of Australian law and available services, and poor interpreting services are among a range of barriers inhibiting the ability of people from CALD backgrounds to access the family violence system.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

A very detailed section on interpreting and translating is provided from 7.3.1. It highlights when to use an interpreter or translator, including the different translating techniques that may be used by translators. The presumption that people who need a translator are provided one is noted, with reference to the specific relevant legislative provisions from 7.3.1.1. While there is no right to an interpreter in WA, the importance of having access to one when necessary for a fair trial is emphasised, along with a useful overview of when an interpreter should be used. The section goes on to detail the type of interpreter or translator to use, specific suppliers of interpreters, information on who pays for an interpreter of translator, and practical considerations for working with an interpreter. The added difficulties of cultural differences in understandings of the role of the legal system is also explored from 7.3.1.1, while practical difficulties involved in the availability of interpreters for people speaking Aboriginal languages is specifically highlighted in 9.3.4 (including useful contacts).

Fryer-Smith, Stephanie, Aboriginal Benchbook for Western Australia Courts (Australian Institute for Judicial Administration, 2nd ed, 2008).

- 'Chapter Six: Pre-Trial Matters' deals specifically with interpreters from 6:16. Includes discussion of the right to an interpreter, practical difficulties (such as determining competency in English, obtaining services of accredited interpreters, lack of conceptual equivalence of words/phrases, interpreter's conduct etc), and calls for accredited Aboriginal Interpreter Training Programs. It also provides appendices detailing guidelines for testing whether an Aboriginal interpreter is required, and contacts for interpreter services in WA.

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Section 20.9.1 considers language issues, including the right to an interpreter (Section 20.10.1.1), and assessing the need for an interpreter (Section 20.10.1.2). Relevant considerations when choosing an interpreter include whether the proposed interpreter is related to any party, is aligned with any party, is familiar with the particular dialect, and is competent, as well as whether the interpreter understands the impact of domestic violence on the victim, and whether the interpreter's gender may impact the victim's testimony (Section 20.10.1.3). It is also noted in Section 18.2.7 that it is important to ensure that the relevant parties have 'confidence in the ability and neutrality of the interpreter, particularly if the interpreter is a member of either party's community'.

Interpreters and translators - Other Resources

Communication barriers and family violence: Fact sheet (ANROWS 2016).

This fact sheet summarises the ASPIRE Project findings about the impact of communication barriers on women's experiences of family violence.

Australian Department of Home Affairs "Hints and tips for working with interpreters video.

Australian Institute of Interpreters and Translators (AUSIT) Code of Ethics

Sets the standards for ethical conduct of interpreters and translators in Australia and New Zealand.

Department of Immigration and Border Protection, 'Working with TIS National Interpreters'.

This webpage has some general tips on how to make interpreting as effective as possible (including who to address, what language to use).

- Department of Social Services (Cth) (2019) Interpreters and Family Safety. (fact sheet)
- Department of Social Services (Cth) (2019) Using interpreters and family safety. (fact sheet)

[Former] Federal Circuit Court of Australia, Reconciliation Action Plan 2019 – 2021

"This RAP provides a platform to introduce practical measures to promote reconciliation, and addresses some of the barriers faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples in interacting with the Court. It also prioritises establishing relationships with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and community leaders, agencies servicing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, legal services and other stakeholders, in order to assist Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples to access the Court."

Interpreters and family violence: Fact Sheet (ANROWS 2016).

This fact sheet summarises the ASPIRE Project findings about the impact of interpreting issues on women's experiences of family violence.

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Women's Experience of the Courts (2016).

See p6: 'this report is a summary of consultations undertaken by the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity. As such, the views expressed in the document are those of stakeholders who work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait women. The purpose of the document is to inform the thinking of the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity in its deliberations on matters relating to access to justice for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women.

At p. 7: The key pre-court issues consistently raised were:

- Fear that reporting violence will mean that authorities will remove children;
- Geographical barriers;
- The impact of poor police responses;
- Family and community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- The complexity of legal problems experienced by Indigenous women;
- Lack of access to legal assistance and advice; and
- Lack of legal knowledge and understanding of their rights under the law.

At p7: 'Many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women had trouble communicating in the language of the justice system, adversely impacting on their ability to deal with police, engage with support services including legal representatives, and communicate with court staff and judicial officers.'

Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity, The Path to Justice: Migrant and Refugee Women's Experience of the Courts (A report for the Judicial Council on Cultural Diversity), (2016).

See the Executive Summary (p6-9) which makes a number of recommendations. It also identifies and discusses key pre-court barriers:

- Lack of knowledge of legal rights;
- Lack of financial independence;

- The importance of integrated support services;
- Poor police responses;
- The impact of pre-arrival experiences and traumatic backgrounds;
- Community pressure on women seeking to protect themselves and their children;
- Uncertainty about immigration status and fear of deportation; and
- The cost of engagement with the legal system.

Identifies communication barriers: Working with interpreters:

- Lack of clarity about who is responsible for engaging an interpreter;
- Failure to assess the need for an interpreter, or incorrectly assessing need;
- The skill of interpreters being engaged;
- Lack of awareness amongst judicial officers and lawyers about how to work with interpreters;
- Engaging interpreters who are inappropriate in the circumstances; and
- Unethical and poor professional conduct by interpreters.

Identifies barriers to full participation in attending court:

- The intimidating process of arriving at court;
- Safety while waiting at court;
- Lack of understanding of court processes;
- Difficulty understanding forms, charges, orders or judgments;
- Courtroom dynamics;
- The impact of attitudes and actions of judicial officers;
- The need for judicial officers to receive cultural competency training;
- Lack of availability of men's behaviour change programs; and
- Abuse of court processes by perpetrators.

Law Society Northern Territory, Indigenous Protocols for Lawyers (second edition, 2015).

This handbook is written for lawyers and identifies and discusses six protocols to assist lawyers in communicating with their clients. See p5 which sets out the six protocols. The remaining part of the document discusses these protocols in depth.

Protocol 1:	Assess whether an interpreter is needed before proceeding to take instructions.
Protocol 2:	Engage the services of a registered, accredited interpreter through the Aboriginal Interpreter Service.
Protocol 3:	Explain your role to the client.
Protocol 4:	Explain the relevant legal or court process to the client prior to taking instructions.
Protocol 5:	Use 'plain English' to the greatest extent possible.
Protocol 6:	Assess whether your client has a hearing or other impairment that may affect their ability to understand

National Accreditation Authority for Translators and Interpreters, 'Outline of NAATI Credentials' (Version 1.0, October 2010).

Summarises the various levels of NAATI accreditation, including what the accreditation enables interpreters and translators to do.

Interpreters and translators - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Rosa

Trisha

Support person in court

Australian research [Laing 2011] has shown that victims participating in domestic and family violence related proceedings value having a support person accompany them in the courtroom and court precinct. The protections afforded by a support person are set out in various state bench books [Other Bench Books], and are similar to those available to vulnerable witnesses in some jurisdictions [NT Dept of Justice 2011]. These protections reflect recent inquiry findings highlighting the difficulties victims experience navigating the court system without support [Qld Special DFV Taskforce Report 2015] and the benefits of making a range of specialised court services available to victims [Tas Sentencing Advisory Council 2015].

Women victims who are supported report [George & Harris 2014] feeling less vulnerable in the courtroom, safer in the court precinct, better able to understand and deal with the court process, and that their experience of domestic and family violence has been recognised and validated [Laing 2011]. A significant aspect of victims' fears relates to their experience of violence and the prospect of ongoing contact with the perpetrator in the court context [Laing 2011].

Support person in court - Key Literature

Australia

Department of Justice, Northern Territory Government, Report: Review of Vulnerable Witness Legislation (2011).

Although this report is specifically about vulnerable witness legislation in the Northern Territory, it highlights that in most jurisdictions one of the protections available to vulnerable witnesses is the entitlement to be accompanied by a friend, relative, or other support person while giving evidence (p 4). A vulnerable witness, in the NT, relevantly includes a child (defined as someone under the age of 18); a witness who is a victim of a sexual offence to which the proceeding relates; or is the protected person named in a domestic violence order (DVO) (p 3).

George, Amanda and Bridget Harris, Landscapes of Violence: Women Surviving Family Violence in Regional and Rural Victoria (Deakin University School of Law's Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, 2014).

This report draws and extends upon a 2013 report released by the Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice (Victoria) (Jordan, Lucinda and Lydia Phillips, Women's experiences of surviving family violence and accessing the Magistrates' Court in Geelong, Victoria (Centre for Rural Regional Law and Justice, Deakin University Australia, 2013)). George and Harris' report 'examines the experiences of and outcomes for women survivors of family violence in regional and rural Victoria' (p 2). It briefly explores women's experiences of support workers at courts. It notes that their presence in the courtroom, standing beside survivors, was usually appreciated. It made women feel 'less vulnerable and braver' in the courtroom (p125). 'Survivors recounted how, in addition to escorting women to their cars, workers organised separate waiting rooms for them. Workers from ATSI services explained that dedicated support at court was vital for ATSI women, who often have little trust in the court system and face complex layers of disadvantage and need. An ATSI survivor insisted that 'women won't go [to court] unless they are supported … they will do it if they are supported'. Support workers also provided assistance to survivors in 'demystifying the court process'. 'Workers thus had significant roles as advocates for women because of their knowledge about court processes' (p 125).

Laing, Lesley, No way to live: Women's experiences of negotiating the family law system in the context of domestic violence (2010).

Women attending court for domestic violence matters found domestic violence services and workers extremely helpful. 'Practical support from domestic violence workers, such as accompanying women to the Family Court, was appreciated' (page 82).

Laing, Lesley, 'They should have this in every court'. Evaluation of the NSW Women's Refuge Movement: Women's Family Law Support Service (2011).

This report presents an evaluation of the Women's Family Law Support Service (WFLSS) in NSW. The evaluation draws on interviews with 16 clients who engaged with the service and 9 interviews with court staff. The women interviewed for this study reported that the support provided in accompanying women in court was highly valued: 'I was over the moon to have someone who knows the system standing beside me' (Woman 3); 'Because I had suffered domestic violence, facing him and being alone would have been even harder. She sat beside me the whole time' (Woman 4); 'Now I'm back in Court again this month and [Coordinator] is going to be there with me the whole way' (Woman 11). The interviewee reported that the support was highly important to a woman whose family was in a distant state and she had to give testimony about her abuse. Other aspects of the service that were praised included the flexibility of the support, ongoing nature of the support, the emotional support provided (page 12), and the validation that the woman had experienced violence (page 13).

Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre, Will Somebody Listen to Me? Insight Actions and Hope for Women Experiencing Family Violence in Regional Victoria (2015).

The Loddon Campaspe Community Legal Centre (LCCLC) provides family violence duty lawyer, advice and ongoing case work across the Loddon and Campaspe region. This project examines the experiences of women who have experienced family violence and the legal system. 190 women were surveyed at Bendigo, Echuca, Maryborough, Kyneton and Swan Hill Magistrates' Courts in Victoria and in-depth conversations were had with 27 women as part of this project (p 8). As part of examining court structures and processes, the report briefly notes the importance of support for women going to court. Many of the women commented positively on the support provided. As per Sophie, the support workers ‘did not leave my side. They were really supportive and made me comfortable because he was doing the stare thing. And they’re going just don’t look, don’t…they sat like this side of me and they were wonderful. So so wonderful. They were great’ (p73).

Queensland, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

The taskforce noted that ‘Many victims experience difficulties when attempting to navigate the justice response to domestic and family violence’ including: ‘Lack of court support workers, for women and men’ (p 268). It found that ‘having adequate court support workers available to assist parties to understand the process is essential to ensure the best possible outcome for all parties’. The report also notes that providing information to male respondents is ‘important in increasing engagement and accountability of perpetrators’ (p 310).

Sentencing Advisory Council, Sentencing of Adult Family Violence Offenders Final Report No. 5 (2015).

The report considers the role of specialist family violence lists or courts in dealing with family violence offences. Specialist family violence courts share a number of common elements. These are identified in the Joint Report and include: specialised personnel including specialised victim support workers and may be chosen because of their specialised skills, or be given specialised training in family violence. This report notes the emphasis on specialised support services: There will be someone, employed by the court or another organisation available to support family violence victims in managing the court process, and often these workers are responsible for referring victims to other services, such as counselling.

Support person in court - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Criminal Trial Courts Bench Book (2022).

Section [1-368] discusses the right to a support person of a complainant in sexual offence proceedings and vulnerable people in criminal proceedings. See ‘support person’ section of table at [1-360].

Judicial Commission of NSW, Sexual Assault Trials Handbook (2021).

Section [10-500] discusses important general directions in sexual assault trials. Section [7-000] contains relevant literature, including [7-240] procedure in prescribed sexual offence cases.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 14.7 notes that an aggrieved is entitled to have an adult support person with them throughout the proceeding. Chapter 14.11.1 notes that the court must consider the appropriateness of an order that a protected witness be accompanied by an approved support person.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Criminal Charge Book (2017).

Chapter 2.3.1 contains bench notes with respect to alternative arrangements for giving evidence. One of these measures is ‘permitting a person chosen by the witness and approved by the court to be beside the witness while he or she is giving evidence, for the purpose of providing emotional support (‘emotional support person’). In proceedings relating wholly or partly to a sexual offence or family violence offence, ‘the court must direct that the complainant’s evidence be given from a place other than the courtroom, unless: the prosecution applies for the complainant to give evidence in the courtroom; the court is satisfied that the complainant is aware of his or her right to give evidence from another place; and the court is satisfied that the complainant is able and wishes to give evidence in the courtroom'. Irrespective of where the complainant gives evidence, 'the court must direct that he or she be permitted to have an emotional support person beside him or her when giving evidence, unless it is satisfied that the complainant is aware of the right to have an emotional support person with him or her, and he or she does not want such a person to be present'.

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Note some of the suggestions identified are specific to Canadian context.

- The bench book notes that one of the options by which to facilitate accurate victim witness testimony includes '[a]llowing a support person or a domestic violence victim advocate to assist and sit near the victim witness'. It notes the court may wish to clarify explicitly the role of the support person (Section 5.3.3).
- 'If referral to mediation or to another settlement process would be helpful in the circumstances of the case, there are a number of safety provisions that can be considered as part of the referral process, for example: … A provision that the targeted parent is to be permitted to include an advocate or other support person in the process' (Section 17.26.3). Furthermore, allowing 'victim witnesses to bring a support person to meetings and to court' may help to enhance the accuracy of victim testimony (Section 20.9.1).
- In terms of procedure for a Judicial Dispute Resolution (JDR) session, the bench book suggests '[a]llowing the targeted party to include a support person' in addition to the lawyer. Further, it suggests that special precautions should be taken 'such as having the parties' lawyers or support persons relay suggestions or options rather than the JDR judge relaying options and suggestions directly – to ensure that participants and particularly the targeted party does not feel unduly obligated or pressured to accept judicial suggestions' (Section 18.2.7).

Support person in court - Other Resources

Supporting Victims and Witnesses at Court

This document has been adapted from DDP New South Wales, 'Supporting Victims and Witnesses at Court' (prepared by the Witness Assistance Service (WAS) at the Office of the Director of Public prosecutions (ODPP NSW)) 2021, the original document is available at: https://www.odpp.nsw.gov.au/sites/default/files/2021-08/Supporting-Victims-and-Witnesses-at-court.pdf.

Information for court support persons

A support person might be required to provide court support for a victim of crime or witness in a hearing in the Local or Magistrates Court or a hearing or trial in the District / County or Supreme Court. This information sheet refers to both these proceedings as "hearings".

What is a support person?

A support person is a person who assists and supports a witness, when that person gives evidence at court. A support person might also provide support for the family in matters where the primary victim died as a result of the crime.

Who can be a support person for a witness?

A witness can say who they would like their support person to be. A support person should be an adult and can be a friend or family member, a worker or volunteer from a support group or court support service or a professional counsellor. A support person cannot be someone who is going to give evidence in the case. Sometimes if the defence object to the choice of support person, the Judge or Magistrate may have to make decisions about who the support person will be. In some specific cases there can be two court support persons.

What is your role as a support person?

Your role as a support person is to assist and support the witness before, during and after they give their evidence. This might include being with the witness while they are waiting at court, sitting and listening while the witness gives evidence, giving emotional support, reassuring the witness and explaining what is happening.

Once they have finished giving their evidence and have been allowed to leave the witness box by the Court the witness can leave the court and go home or if they wish they can sit in court and hear other evidence.

In some cases a support person might provide support for a victim, witness or family member who wishes to sit in court and listen to the proceedings or at critical times such as the Crown closing address, the Judge or Magistrate's summing up, when the jury give their verdict, or for the sentencing judgment.

Supporting victims and witnesses who are giving evidence

Before the court hearing:

Before the court hearing you should ask the witness how they would like you to assist and support them when they give evidence in court. Prior to the court hearing the witness usually meets with the ODPP Lawyer and the Crown Prosecutor to discuss their evidence. You can accompany the witness to this meeting and, if the witness and ODPP Lawyer agree, you can sit in the meeting to support the witness or wait outside and provide support after the meeting.

Planning

- When and where will you meet the witness?
- Is there an arrangement for the witness to meet the Police or the Prosecutor?
- Has the witness let the Police or Prosecutor know where you will be waiting or given them a mobile number so they can contact you or the witness urgently?
- At some courts there may be a special witness room where you and the witness can wait.
- Be prepared to do some waiting at court. Sometimes the witness will have to come back to court for more than one day.
- It is a good idea for the witness to bring something along to read or do while waiting at court. Some people also bring something to eat and drink with them. If the witness has a medical condition they might need to bring along any medications that they have to take during the time at court.

At the court hearing:

- When providing support for a witness giving evidence, you may be sitting in the courtroom, or in some specific cases, you will be in a separate witness room where the witness gives evidence via closed circuit television (CCTV) or Audio Visual Link (AVL) from another location.
- Make sure you tell the ODPP lawyer and Crown Prosecutor that you are the support person for the witness. If the court hearing is a 'closed court' (i.e. closed to the public) the ODPP Lawyer or Crown Prosecutor will need to seek permission from the court, for you to stay in the courtroom or CCTV room.
- If the witness is giving their evidence from the courtroom, check that you are allowed into the courtroom and determine the best place to sit so that the witness can see you easily and you are not close to the accused person. Often a good place to sit is in the public gallery on the side of the courtroom that the prosecutor is sitting. If there is a good reason for you to sit closer to the witness then discuss this with the ODPP Lawyer or Crown Prosecutor so they can seek permission from the Judge or Magistrate.

- Generally a prosecution witness gives their evidence to the court with the prosecutor asking questions. They will then be cross examined by the defence lawyer. The prosecutor can then ask a few more questions if they need to which is called re-examination. The Judge or Magistrate will then excuse the witness which means they have finished giving their evidence and they are free to leave the witness box

After the witness has finished giving evidence:

After a witness has finished giving their evidence they might want to talk with you as their support person about how they are feeling. The witness can stay in touch with the prosecutor or Police Officer-in-Charge as to the progress or outcome of the hearing. The witness may be able to claim witness expenses while they are at court. This can be discussed with the prosecutor or Police Officer-in-Charge.

What if the witness gives evidence via closed circuit television?

- When closed circuit television (CCTV) is used, the witness gives evidence from a separate witness room to the courtroom. The ODPP Lawyer or Crown Prosecutor can seek permission for a support person to sit with the witness in the CCTV room.
- While separated from the court the CCTV room is still part of the Court and the same rules apply as in the courtroom. A court officer should be in the CCTV room with you and the witness. You will be guided by the Judge / Magistrate and court officer as to where to sit and generally this will be to the side of the witness.
- The court officer ensures that the CCTV room functions as part of the Court and will assist with providing tissues and water for the witness and showing the witness any exhibits requested by the Court. There is a phone in the CCTV room so the court officer can speak with the Court. The witness will give an oath or affirmation to promise to tell the truth from the CCTV room. The witness can be seen by all the people sitting in the courtroom on a larger TV screen. In some courts the Judge or Magistrate also has a small TV screen so they can see everyone in the CCTV room.

Things to know about CCTV

- When the equipment is turned on, everyone present in the court can see and hear the witness on the TV screens in the courtroom;

- The witness in the CCTV room should be able to see and hear the lawyer asking questions or the Judge or Magistrate on one of the screens;
- The witness should not be able to see the accused person on any of the screens;
- The witness should not see themselves on the screens. If this is the case, this image can be turned off by the court officer;
- The witness should be able to clearly hear and see the Judge or Magistrate and the lawyers asking questions, and their taped evidence if relevant.
- The witness can ask for a break e.g. if they need to use the toilet.
- If there is a short adjournment the equipment is usually turned off. However this is not always the case and the court may still be able to see and hear the witness even though the witness cannot see anything on their screen;
- When the equipment is turned off, is not transmitting or breaks down, you may assist or comfort the witness, however you must not talk about the case, the evidence or the questions they are being asked.
- Some witnesses might have their electronically recorded statement played to the court as part or all of their evidence. In this case they will watch their tape on one of the screens in the CCTV room while it is played to the court. The court cannot see the witness whilst they are watching their recorded evidence. They will then will be cross-examined by the defence and possibly re-examined by the prosecutor.
- Before going into the CCTV room, it is a good idea to discuss with either the prosecutor or court officer, what will happen if there are any problems with the technology while the witness is giving evidence. If you notice any problems such as the witness not hearing very well or the accused can be seen on the screen, you can quietly bring this to the attention of the court officer who will inform the Court. Witnesses can also tell the Judge or Magistrate if there is a problem with technology. If there is still a problem, you or the witness can tell the prosecutor during the break.

Supporting family victims

A support person may be supporting family members in a case where the primary victim died as a result of the crime. Sometimes family members are witnesses and the information about supporting witnesses will be relevant. The family of a deceased victim may also want to be at court to hear the court proceedings for some or all of the case. Attending court and listening to the evidence can at times be stressful, upsetting and draining and the family may appreciate some contact with a support person during the court proceedings. If you are the support person in this type of case it is important to check with the family what type of support they would like and how often they would like you to come to court.

Hints for court support people

- Remember as a support person you are there for the witness or victim of crime.
- Even if you have had your own experience at court in another court case, now is not the time to discuss that case or your own experience.
- Allow the victim or witness some space and time while waiting at court – sometimes they just want a bit of timeout on their own.
- In some cases you may hear some distressing evidence so it is also important to take care of yourself and find someone other than the victim or witness to discuss your feelings.
- It is best that you don't show your emotions while the witness is giving evidence
- As a support person it is important to stay calm for the witness.
- If you or the person you are supporting are not sure about what is happening speak to the Police Officer-in-Charge or the prosecutor.
- If you or the witness have concerns about safety or security speak to the Police Officer-in-Charge, the prosecutor or court security;
- Whether supporting someone giving evidence or someone who is listening to the court proceedings it is important to observe the basic rules and traditions of the Court.

Basic court rules

- Switch off mobile phones before entering the courtroom
- Be polite
- Maintain a quiet and respectful manner in court
- Sit quietly in the courtroom
- Dress appropriately, this means smart casual, comfortable and warm
- Take off your hat, cap or sunglasses
- Do not eat, drink, chew gum or smoke inside the courtroom
- Remember to bow when you go in or leave the court
- Remember the Magistrate or Judge is the person in charge in the court.

The prosecution case must be conducted fairly and the Judge or Magistrate will ensure that basic rules of the court are followed and that each person is carrying out their role correctly. When you are the support person for a witness there are some additional things you need to know that you cannot do.

Things you must not do when supporting a witness at court

- You must not talk about the evidence with the witness at any time. You must not help the witness to prepare the evidence and you must not rehearse what he or she is going to say.
- You must not help the witness to answer questions or tell the witness what to say when he or she is giving evidence. You must not give body signals to the witness about the evidence or behave in a way that looks as if you are helping or telling the witness what to say. If you do you may be removed from the courtroom.
- You must not take notes in the court hearing.
- You must not touch the witness during the court hearing.
- If the witness becomes upset, or if you have any concerns, please raise these in the first instance with the court officer, the prosecutor or where necessary, with the Court.
- You must not speak during the court hearing, even if the witness is upset, unless the Judge or Magistrate asks you a question.
- You cannot do anything that might influence or interfere with the court case.

Support for the support person

If you are unsure about your role as a support person, or concerned about the person you are supporting, you can speak to the ODPP solicitor or Police Officer.

If as a support person you feel that you are affected by the court process or what you have heard while the witness is giving evidence it is important to seek out support for yourself. If you need to talk to someone about how you are feeling you can contact the following counselling line:

Lifeline: on 131114 or go to www.lifeline.org.au for more information

Referral to support services

On some occasions it may be appropriate for courts to refer victims and perpetrators of domestic and family violence to in-court and external support services. While it is the responsibility of the perpetrator to stop or prevent domestic and family violence, there may be a range of services available for both the victim and the perpetrator. Such support services may include providing assistance with filling out forms, legal advice, interpreting and translating, counselling, housing, substance misuse, mental health and perpetrator interventions. The extent and efficacy of court referrals [Chisholm 2009] are significantly influenced by key systemic factors including a party's understanding of their rights and willingness to seek help, their experience of vulnerability, and the availability of services tailored to their needs.

Research indicates that there are certain groups in the community that are less likely to access support services for particular reasons. For example, gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, queer or intersex people [ACON 2014] may fear blame or disbelief or the threat of being outed; Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people [Cox et al 2009] may feel misunderstood or marginalised by approaches that are not culturally or historically sensitive, or be at risk of homelessness [Fabinyi 2014] due to having to leave an unsafe home occupied by the perpetrator; culturally and linguistically diverse people [Allimant & Anne 2008] may not be able to recognise domestic and family violence by reference to their cultural norms and experiences, language and social [Allimant & Ostapiej-Piatkowski 2011] barriers may prevent them from accessing the information they need, and they may fear engagement with the Australian legal and immigration systems [WLS NSW 2007]; and people with disability [Duric 2003] may be deterred by their physical isolation, prior negative experiences in seeking help such as not being believed or taken seriously, or a lack of awareness and skills on the part of service providers in responding to their specific needs. Courts may be able to play a role in promoting awareness of appropriate support service in particular cases or in linking parties to services where appropriate referrals can be made.

Many experiences are common to victims across diverse groups and inform their reluctance to seek help, including a lack of available local services, a lack of financial resources, feelings of shame and embarrassment, fear of the perpetrator and the potential for retribution, fear of homelessness [Moshinsky Vic RCFV 2015], fear of child protection services removing children from their care, discrimination and stigma [Allimant & Ostapiej-Piatkowski 2011]. Where victims face multiple challenges, they are likely to experience multiple barriers to service provision [Zweig et al 2002].

Studies have shown that the most positive outcomes for victims in the court process [Laing 2013] are linked to well-coordinated and prioritised service provision or referral, effective liaison between service providers, and services that are tailored to victims' needs and resources [Alford & Croucher 2011]. It is widely acknowledged by Australian courts that these support services are vitally important to the protection and recovery of victims of domestic and family violence; however their capacity to deliver access is constrained by court resources, especially in smaller and more remote registries [Chisholm 2009].

Referral to support services - Key Literature

Australia

ACON, Submission No 75 to Australian Senate Finance and Public Administration References Committee, Inquiry into domestic violence in Australia, 31 July 2014.

This report identifies that Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI) people are less likely than people in the general community to seek support from mainstream domestic and family violence services and further, when they do seek support, 'they are less likely to find support services that meet their specific needs' (p 6). Reasons for this include:

- Similar to others experiencing domestic and family violence, LGBTI people are 'less likely to report abuse to police for fear of ostracism, fear of police, fear of escalating the abuse, fear of disbelief, fear of blame, self-blame, shame and embarrassment, and protection of the abuser';
- However, there are also reasons specific to LGBTI that prevent them from seeking assistance and these include 'the fear of being outed, and a lack of awareness that what participants had experienced was domestic and family violence' (p 7).

Alford, Amanda and Rosalind Croucher, 'The ALRC and Indigenous People – Continuing the Conversation' (2011) 7(22) Indigenous Law Bulletin 18.

In the context of family violence, Indigenous people face a number of issues in terms of access to services and facilities. These issues include: linguistic and cultural barriers but also broader access issues including lack of 'designated services for Indigenous women, legal services and advice; support services; liaison and contact office positions within government and non-government services'. A number of measures should be taken to mitigate this disadvantage including prioritising the provision of, and access to, culturally appropriate victim support services such as:

- legal advice (including specialised legal advice and representation for Indigenous women),
- counselling and
- other support services, but ensuring victims are able to –choose whether to access culturally-specific services;

- Ensuring the provision of professional translating and interpreting services where required and/or requested; and
- Introducing or re-introducing Indigenous-specific victim liaison, support and advocacy positions throughout the legal system, including within the police, the courts and service providers (p 20).

Allimant, Annabelle and Stephanie Anne, 'No Room…Homelessness and the Experiences of Women of Non-English Speaking Backgrounds' (Paper presented at 5th National Homelessness Conference, Adelaide, 21st-23rd May 2008).

Access to emergency accommodation and long term housing that is both secure and affordable is an issue relevant to many Australians, but especially for women and children of non-English speaking backgrounds (NESB) escaping domestic and family violence in Australia. Women from NESB experience a heightened risk of homelessness due to multiple barriers in reporting their experiences of domestic violence and in accessing relevant information and support services' (page 1). Personal barriers include 'recognising and defining violence; knowledge of rights/access to information; communication barriers; personal fears; isolation; cultural barriers; residency status of women and income support' (p 3). Systemic barriers for women from NESB include 'inappropriate use of professional interpreters; limited understandings of refugee experience; experiences of racism and discrimination; poor recruitment of people from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds and limited or no provision of information in community languages (p 6).

Allimant, Annabelle and Beata Ostapiej-Piatkowski, 'Supporting women from CALD backgrounds who are victims/survivors of sexual violence: Challenges and opportunities for practitioners' (2011) 9 Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault (ACSSA) Wrap 1.

This literature review identifies that women survivors of sexual abuse from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) backgrounds face a number of specific personal and systemic barriers in accessing support. Personal barriers include:

- failure to recognise sexual violence,
- physical and emotional isolation,
- communication barriers,

- cultural barriers such as spiritual beliefs, rituals, traditions and world-views,
- fears about breaches of confidentiality, and
- residency status and access to income support.

Systemic barriers to accessing support include:

- language,
- lack of informed understanding (leading to documents being signed without awareness of the content), and
- racism and discrimination (pp. 8-10).

Breckenridge, Jan et al, National mapping and meta-evaluation outlining key features of effective 'safe at home' programs that enhance safety and prevent homelessness for women and their children who have experienced domestic and family violence: Key findings and future direct (ANROWS, 2016).

In most Australian jurisdictions and in other countries around the world, governments have implemented 'safe at home' programs or approaches which aim to mitigate the specific homelessness and safety impacts of domestic violence on women and their children. This report maps and evaluates key features of 'safe at home' programs.

Chisholm, Richard, Family Courts Violence Review (2009).

This review does not provide a comprehensive survey of the support provided by the courts to those who have experienced violence but some of the types of assistance they provide includes 'an array of pamphlets, referral service, assistance filling out forms, (p150) and where possible provide a setting for the operation of other services such as lawyers working in duty solicitor schemes, support groups for victims of violence'. The report notes that these services are of enormous importance but are constrained by resources, especially in smaller and more remote registries (p 151).

Cox, Dorinda, Mandy Young and Alison Bairnsfather-Scott, 'No justice without healing: Australian Aboriginal people and family violence' (2009) 30 The Australian Feminist Law Journal 151.

This article emphasises that service delivery for Aboriginal people must be tailored to the history, culture and needs of Aboriginal people in a particular location. These programs must be developed from an Aboriginal perspective and aimed at meeting the needs identified by the local Aboriginal community. Current justice initiatives in Australia: programs vary by jurisdiction but most of these programs target Aboriginal participation in the justice process and the ability of Aboriginal communities to be responsible for their communities e.g. Circle Sentencing in NSW, Koori Courts in Victoria and the Murri Courts in Queensland.

Day, Andrew, Sharon Casey, Adam Gerace, Candice Oster and Deb O'Kane, The forgotten victims: prisoner experience of victimisation and engagement with the criminal justice system – Research report (ANROWS, 2018).

The following summarises the key aspects of this research report:

Premise

Many women in prison have experienced intimate partner violence. As this form of violence is often intergenerational and entrenched, women in prison are widely considered to be at particular risk of ongoing victimisation following release from custody. And yet, their support needs often go unrecognised, and it is likely that a range of barriers exists that prevent ex-prisoners from accessing services.

Approach

This research documents data from interviews with and surveys of 22 women incarcerated in Adelaide Women's Prison, as well as interviews with 12 key South Australian agencies and service providers, to arrive at an understanding of help-seeking behaviour and how this might inform service responses. The analysis is positioned within a review of current help-seeking theories that highlight how a wide range of individual, socio-cultural and structural factors can complicate a woman's decision to seek help when concerned for her personal safety, noting that the circumstances and personal histories of women in prison increase the barriers to effective help-seeking when they face violence following release.

Key observations

- The interviews with the women prisoners revealed their:
  - lack of awareness of when they should seek external support

- lack of knowledge of available services
- pervasive sense of mistrust and under-confidence in existing services
- sense that better approaches can be developed drawing on the strengths of women, their peers and families.

- Women's experience of formal and informal support-seeking (positive and negative) often determine how they define intimate partner violence and whether they decide to seek to change their circumstances.
- Agencies and service providers expressed a range of views about the services that should be made available to women leaving prison, and these views were commonly shared by the women prisoners interviewed. It was acknowledged by both groups that services are not always visible or accessible to the women. There was also no sense that any integrated pathway for identifying and managing risk currently exists.

Conclusions

- Need identified for all jurisdictions: to clearly identify women in prison as a particularly vulnerable group who are likely to be at elevated risk of ongoing victimisation and intimate partner violence and who face significant barriers preventing them from accessing the types of services that may help them to keep safe; and take a specialised and integrated approach in addressing their needs. Successful models of reintegration are discussed.
- Need identified for people with lived experience of incarceration to be part of the service framework (design, delivery and goverance) in the community sector.
- Need identified for services and programs to reflect an understanding of the role violence in the lives of people who seek help (ie trauma-informed care)

Limitations

This research did not make conclusions about different cohorts of women prisoners having specific needs, for example women from Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultural backgrounds.

Duric, Chris Jennings, 'Disclose Family Violence and Risk Homelessness' (2003) 16(1) Parity 24.

This article discusses service pathways for women with disabilities experiencing violence and finds they can be complex. Women with disabilities face a number of unique barriers to disclosure or help-seeking in relation to domestic violence. Of particular importance are:

- their greater social isolation,
- the impact of previous help-seeking experiences,
- the difficulty many experience in being believed or taken seriously,
- the sheer practical obstacles they face in obtaining information or assistance,
- a lack of awareness and skills on the part of service-providers in dealing with women with disabilities who experience domestic violence, and
- a lack of coordination and cooperation across services regarding these women's needs.

In addition, those in need of crisis support accommodation are rarely confident that their needs will be met (p 24).

Fabinyi, Helen, 'Domestic Violence and Homelessness in the Northern Territory' (2014) 27(9) Parity 12.

This article starts with the observation that 'domestic violence is the leading cause of homelessness in Australia'. Very often it is the victim of domestic violence who has to leave an unsafe home. In many cases, perpetrators are bailed to their home address and this means victims are forced to relocate elsewhere. Even where the perpetrator is remanded in custody, victims may still be forced to leave because of violence and harassment from the perpetrator's family. The rates of homelessness among Aboriginal people in Australia are particularly high. Additionally, women who find themselves homeless as a result of domestic violence are often exposed to further physical or sexual violence (p 12). 'Homelessness or the of homelessness for victims of domestic and family violence can also act as a precursor to other issues, including child protection involvement, alcohol abuse and risk of involvement with the criminal justice system'. Hence, safe housing for victims of domestic and family violence is crucial to assisting families to live in safety and to prevent the further social, health and legal issues and risks that are associated with homelessness (p 13).

Fileborn, Bianca, Sexual violence and gay, lesbian, bisexual, trans, intersex, and queer communities (Australian Centre for the Study of Sexual Assault (ACSSA) Resource Sheet, 2012).

This report identifies that there is a lack of appropriate support available for Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender, Intersex and Queer (GLBTIQ) communities. Key concerns for GLBTIQ people in accessing services include:

- fear that they will be met with homophobic or heterosexist response from service providers;
- fear that violence in same-sex relationships will not be taken seriously;
- service provision that is not sensitive to the unique needs of GLBTIQ;
- services that are not accepting of GLBTIQ communities;
- particularly limited access in regional or rural communities;
- many GLBTIQ people do not access support facilities; and
- accessing services is gendered in nature i.e. lesbian women are more likely to access services than gay men or bisexual people (pp. 7-8).

Harman J, Joe, Evidential Considerations in Cases Involving Family Violence.

Harman J encourages 'all practitioners to embrace the obligations imposed upon them by the Family Law Act (1975) Cmth to provide clients with information about Family Counselling and Family Dispute Resolution Services and encourage the use of those service especially family counselling'. 'Referral to such services will provide very real assistance to vulnerable parties and assist them in engaging with the Court process and achieving an outcome that properly and adequately addresses the issues that arise in the case' (p 40).

Humphreys, Cathy and Ravi Thiara, 'Mental Health and Domestic Violence: 'I Call it Symptoms of Abuse'' (2003) 33 British Journal of Social Work 209.

This article identifies that research evidence now clearly shows a direct link between women's experiences of domestic violence and heightened rates of depression, trauma symptoms, and self-harm. It also notes that their experiences of mental health services were often found to be negative. The authors identify a number of practices within the medical model of mental health that are unhelpful including:

- the lack of recognition of trauma or provision of trauma services;
- making the abuser invisible through focusing on the woman's mental health reified from her experiences of abuse;
- blaming the victim;

- offering medication rather than counselling support;
- the negative, consequent efforts on child contact and child protection proceedings if the woman is labelled with mental health problems.

Alternatively, women found services, often in the voluntary sector, helpful when they provided the following interventions:

- helping women name domestic violence;
- actively asking about the abuse;
- attending to safety planning;
- responding to women's specialist needs; and
- actively working with women to recover from abuse experiences.

Support for her children was also seen as very helpful. Implications for practice include the commissioning of further services in the voluntary sector, addressing the inadequate response within the medical model, and increasing the sensitivity of responses to women's emotional distress across all sectors' (p 209).

Laing, Lesley, 'It's like this maze that you have to make your way through': Women's experiences of seeking a domestic violence protection order in NSW (Faculty of Education and Social Work, University of Sydney, 2013).

This research specifically looks at women's experience of seeking a domestic violence protection order in NSW. Chapter 3 looks at key issues from women's perspectives. Relevantly, it examines support (its availability and importance, and in some cases its absence) as an important issue raised by all women. Many women noted the importance of support in providing them with the reassurance to continue with the legal process. Further, women underlined the particular importance of advocacy in providing information needed – discussing whether something is a breach or not, giving women the resources needed, pointing out phone numbers for refuges, providing names of good solicitors where necessary etc. (p 42). Finally, support beyond the court is noted as being essential to help women rebuild their lives. Women talked about the importance of assistance they received from specialist women's and domestic violence services (p 43).

Morgan, Anthony and Hannah Chadwick, 'Key issues in domestic violence' (Summary Paper No 7, Australian Institute of Criminology, Australian Government, 2009).

Although looking specifically at victims accessing support services, this report also identifies barriers to accessing support networks and services that are relevant to the victim's experience of the justice system. barriers include:

- a lack of available services;
- the cost or limited availability of transport;
- limited awareness of available services;
- a lack of culturally appropriate services; a perception that services will be unsympathetic or judgemental;
- shame or embarrassment; fear that they will not be believed;
- fear of the perpetrator and
- the potential for retribution; and a perception that services will not be able to offer assistance' (p 8).

Opening statement of Day 7 Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, Melbourne, 21 July 2015, (Mark Moshinsky).

The speaker identifies that the issue of housing and homelessness is related to family violence in three ways:

- women and children who flee a violent and abusive relationship often end up homeless due to the shortage of affordable housing and social housing.
- because of that shortage of housing, women and children are often forced to stay in violent and abusive relationships, hence the absence of affordable housing and social housing directly impacts on their experience of violence.
- where perpetrators are excluded from a home, they may end up homeless if they do not have other accommodation.

This increases the risk of reoffending and the risk that the victim will permit the perpetrator to return to the house' (pp. 890-91).

Women's Legal Services NSW, A Long Way to Equal – An Update of 'Quarter Way to Equal: A Report on Barriers to Access to Legal Services for Migrant Women' (2007).

This report identifies barriers to migrant and refugee women in accessing legal services. Understanding these barriers may help to identify what support services are required by such women and whether extra support in obtaining these services is needed. These barriers include: lack of knowledge among migrant and refugee women of the legal system, their legal rights and how to access legal help; the perceived cost of legal services; the absence of information available in a form that is accessible to migrant and refugee women (in terms of lack of literacy among women, the language of the available legal information, and the content of this information being too complex); poor translation and interpreting services; the lack of effective referral processes between migrant service providers and legal service providers; physical location and accessibility of community legal centres and other legal services; lack of knowledge and misconceptions among migrant and refugee women about their immigration status; fear or interaction with the Australian legal system; and the absence of a co-ordinated approach to access and equity strategies for culturally and linguistically diverse women (pages 19-30).

International

Harvey, Shannon, et al, Barriers faced by Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender People in Accessing Domestic Abuse, Stalking, Harassment and Sexual Violence Services (Welsh Government Social Research, 2014).

First, this paper highlights that LGBT people face a range of barriers in accessing services that relate 'to their perception of self and the abuse (individual barriers) and the actions of people they have relationships with (interpersonal barriers)'. LGBT people may not realise they are experiencing domestic abuse and further, they may not realise they are 'covered' by domestic violence laws. They may feel shame about their sexuality and abusers may use this to exercise control e.g. they may threaten 'outing' someone to control them (p 11), and they may isolate the victim. Further, LGBT may face abuse from relatives or others in their community because of their identity (p 12).

Second, alongside these individual and interpersonal barriers, 'there are important structural and cultural issues in the way domestic and sexual violence (D/SV) services are designed and delivered that may discourage LGBT people from accessing them'. LGBT people's experience of societal discrimination may prevent them from seeking assistance and further, service providers often do not provide information tailored LGBT people. LGBT people expose themselves to risk in physically accessing services (p 13). A number of negative stereotypes about LGBT's sexual behaviour may also discourage these victims from reporting sexual violence (p 14).

Zweig, Janine M, Kathryn A Schlichter, and Martha R Burt, 'Assisting Women Victims of Violence who Experience Multiple Barriers to Services' (2002) 8(2) Violence Against Women 162.

Because violence against women affects victims in different ways, most victim service programs have developed a wide array of core services with which to assist victims. However, some women victims of violence face certain additional obstacles in their lives that require unique approaches to service provision. Women victims with such multiple barriers to service provision (i.e., substance abuse issues, mental health problems, cognitive disabilities, incarceration, and/or involvement in prostitution) face greater impediments to service than those encountered by mainstream women and, as a result, are underserved by mainstream services' (p 162-163). This study interviewed staff from 20 programs focusing on service provision for women facing multiple barriers to service provision. It concludes that '[p]roblems encountered by such women include lack of services dealing with multiple barriers, uneducated service providers, and batterers using women's barriers to further control or victimise them' (p 162).

Referral to support services - Other Bench Books

Australia

WA

Western Australia Department of Justice, Equal Justice Bench Book (updated 2021).

This bench book contains a section on family and domestic violence. Relevant to referral to support services, this benchbook highlights the impact family and domestic violence can have on women victims. Health outcomes (which could be targeted in referral to support services) include:

- self-harming behaviours;
- physical injuries including bruising, lacerations or tears, and fractures;
- sexually transmitted diseases and other reproductive health issues;
- depression and anxiety; eating disorders; traumatic and post-traumatic stress symptoms; phobias, somatisation and dissociative disorders;
- harmful tobacco and alcohol use;
- illicit and licit drug use;
- chronic pain disorders gastrointestinal and digestive disorders; and
- sleep problems' [13.2.2].

Additionally, the bench book notes the impact of family violence on male victims and notes that the damage caused may be largely psychological causing:

- fear of disclosing;
- depression;
- humiliation;
- guilt;
- anger with abuser;
- fear of continued violence;
- fear of loss of male identity;
- concern about financial security; and

- changed behaviour to suit the abuser' [13.4.2].

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

Looking at perpetrator characteristics and litigation tactics, the bench book briefly touches upon the issue of referral to support services. It is noted in Section 7.2.5 that '[w]hen domestic violators have serious drug, alcohol or mental health problems, these needs associated with risk need to be addressed if domestic violence intervention is to be effective. Thus, to the extent permitted by statute or with domestic violator consent, it is important, for the health and well-being of all family members, to ensure seamless delivery of mental health, drug and alcohol, as well as domestic violence intervention (with specialized parenting services), to ensure that the services are working in unison and not at cross purposes, and to ensure monitoring matched to level of risk or danger with notification in the event of non-compliance so that appropriate protective action can be taken'.

Adjournments and timely decision making

It is acknowledged that courts across Australia have different approaches to managing domestic and family violence related proceedings. Where possible the safety and wellbeing of victims, their children and other affected people should be promoted and perpetrators/offenders should be held accountable for domestic and family violence behaviours. Expeditious trial processes are likely to contribute to achieving these outcomes; and may be used by judicial officers, where possible, in the exercise of their power to regulate the court's proceedings. Making adjournment orders is integral to this case management power and, in some cases, an adjournment may be necessary to ensure that parties are afforded fair and equal access to justice. Judicial officers should be familiar with any legislative provisions and practice directions in their jurisdiction requiring them to consider issues specific to the management of domestic and family violence related cases and to deal with these matters expeditiously.

Adjournment orders are commonly made by courts dealing with matters involving domestic and family violence for a range of reasons, including to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter, to allow police to have more detailed discussions with the victim, their children or other affected people, to clarify child and parenting arrangements, or to provide more information about the matter before the court [Gelb 2015]. Adjournments may also be granted to ensure procedural fairness where a party seeks further and better particulars about the application or where the other party requires an opportunity to fully respond [VRCFV 2016]; or where a party requires legal representation, an interpreter [Qld DFV Taskforce 2015] or other support services that are not immediately available. In some cases it may be appropriate to adjourn a matter even though, for example, the applicant or a key prosecution witness has not attended court. In such cases an adjournment will allow inquiries to be made about the safety of the relevant person before concluding the matter.

There may be cases where a party does not have a legitimate reason for seeking to delay proceedings; their motivation may be to abuse court processes as a means of continuing the perpetration of domestic and family violence against the victim (this is also known as "systems abuse" [Vic FVBB 2014]). Tactics include seeking adjournments at short notice, initiating applications or making cross-applications without proper grounds, failing to appear at mentions and hearings, and evading service of orders [VRCFV 2016]. These tactics may not be readily apparent to a particular judicial officer if used by a party in multiple courts before different judicial officers and, as a consequence, may be difficult to scrutinise and assess [Gelb 2015]. Courts should carefully scrutinise a party's request for an adjournment. Appropriate case management may include refusing an adjournment if it appears the respondent seeks the adjournment to prolong the proceedings and maintain control over the victim [Vic FVBB 2014].

When an order for the adjournment of proceedings involving domestic and family violence is made, judicial officers should consider whether it is appropriate to make additional interim orders, directions or arrangements for the duration of the adjournment to ensure the safety and wellbeing of the victim and their children.

Adjournments and timely decision making - Key Literature

Australia

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2015) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome in intervention order proceedings is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40).

King, Michael and Becky Batagol, 'Enforcer, manager or leader? The judicial role in family violence courts', (2010) 33 International Journal of Law and Psychiatry 406.

The authors note that judicial supervision of offenders is an important component of many family violence courts. Skepticism concerning the ability of offenders to reform and a desire to protect victims has led some judges to use supervision as a form of deterrence. Supervision is also used to hold offenders accountable for following court orders. Some family violence courts apply processes used in drug courts, such as rewards and sanctions, to promote offender rehabilitation. This article suggests that while protection and support of victims should be the prime concern of family violence courts, a form of judging that engages offenders in the development and implementation of solutions for their problems and supports their implementation is more likely to promote their positive behavioural change than other approaches to judicial supervision. The approach to judging proposed in this article draws from therapeutic jurisprudence, feminist theory, transformational leadership and solution-focused brief therapy principles.

Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

The report notes that where an application for a protection order indicates that an interpreter is required, 'a Magistrate will assess whether or not an arrangement should be made for the first court mention. Where the matter is brought to the attention of the court at the first mention, an adjournment will likely be necessary to obtain the services of an interpreter. This potentially creates a gap in protection for victims of domestic and family violence' (p 295).

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

Delays are discussed at p 124. It is noted that often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek 'further and better particulars' about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).

However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, perpetrators could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. These tactics – 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127.

Adjournments and timely decision making - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of New South Wales, Civil Trials Bench Book (updated 2022).

Part [2-0200] contains general discussion about a court's power of adjournment in the civil context. This general discussion is relevant to the domestic and family violence context.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

3.1 discusses the court's power to make vexatious litigation restraint orders. 3.7 discusses the court's power to make a costs order where the application was frivolous, vexatious or made in bad faith.

Information sharing

The Family Law Amendment (Information sharing) Bill 2023 (Cth) is currently before Parliament. The bill gives effect to the National Strategic Framework for Information Sharing [National Strategic Framework 2023] between the Family Law and Family Violence and Child Protection Systems by amending the Family Law Act 1975 to expand the information sharing framework for information relating to family violence, child abuse and neglect risks in parenting proceedings before the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia, and the Family Court of Western Australia.

More information can be found here:
www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Bills_LEGislation/Bills_Search_Results/Result?bId=r7009

Information-sharing provisions in domestic and family violence legislation vary in scope and detail between jurisdictions and only some provide for information sharing in the conduct of protection order proceedings (see Table 1 below). The practice of information sharing involves interagency coordination and cooperation through protocols [Taylor et al 2015] developed and regularly reviewed in collaboration between courts, the police and service agencies. These protocols have been shown to improve responses to the enforcement of protection orders, including improved approaches to the assessment and management of risk [Taylor et al 2015]. There are also differences in how jurisdictions have legislated to prevent the inappropriate sharing of information and to protect people's privacy.

In addition, all Australian jurisdictions have enacted information-sharing provisions facilitating the National Domestic Violence Orders Scheme (NDVOS), under which a domestic violence order issued on or after 25 November 2017 is automatically nationally enforceable. Every jurisdiction has enacted provisions that enable its courts or law enforcement agencies to obtain information about a DVO from a court or law enforcement agency in another jurisdiction, and use that information for the purpose of making, varying or revoking a DVO. The provisions further require courts or law enforcement agencies in one jurisdiction to provide information about a DVO to a court or law enforcement agency of another jurisdiction that the court or law enforcement agency reasonably requests for the purposes of exercising its functions.

Recent research indicates that the broader potential for sharing information between state/territory agencies responsible for responding to domestic and family violence, such as police, courts, child welfare and health authorities and support and referral services, has become an important factor in the overall effectiveness of responses to domestic and family violence. Information sharing in this context may mean that victims of violence are more likely to engage with the agency to which they have been referred if they know they will not be required to repeatedly re-tell their experiences to other agencies [Qld Special DFV Taskforce Report 2015], and therefore avoid further trauma and distress. In addition, where the details of past violence or the risks of future violence are shared between agencies, timely action may be taken to address the risks and to ensure the safety and protection of the victim and other people at risk of harm [Taylor et al 2015].

The Commonwealth is piloting the Co-location of State and Territory child protection and other officials in Family Law Court Registries [Co-location of state and territory child protection and policing officials] in Federal Circuit and Family Court registries across Australia, to enhance information sharing and collaboration between federal family law and state and territory child protection and family violence systems. The Department of Social Sevices' National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children website describes the intended outcomes of this program as:

- a more coordinated response to family safety issues (demonstrated in part by the sharing of data relating to information or intervention requests in matters where child abuse is suspected or alleged)
- judicial officers being able to make decisions with full knowledge of prior involvement by child protection and law enforcement agencies
- strengthened judicial decision-making, with family safety risks identified and addressed earlier in family law proceedings
- improved inter-jurisdictional understanding and cooperation, leading to better information sharing practices.

Table 1:

Jurisdiction	Information sharing provisions under domestic violence legislation	Information sharing provisions under NDVOS
Australian Capital Territory	s18 Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986 (ACT) – if ACT/Federal police reasonably suspect domestic violence is being/has been committed/is likely, they may disclose to an approved crisis support agency (s17) any information that will help the agency to assist the victim/children.	Part 9, Div. 9.4 Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)
New South	Part 13A Information Sharing	Part 13B, Div. 4, Crimes

Wales	(ss 98C-98L) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) – Provides for disclosure by limited agencies (government and health), court, police, designated referral/coordination points to referral/coordination points and support agencies in relation to personal and health information about the victim and (alleged) perpetrator for the purposes of arranging/providing support to the victim, and where there is a domestic violence threat. Disclosure by government/health agencies and support agencies requires the consent of (and by a court - no express objection by) the threatened person/victim (s98D, E, H). S98J Protocols may be required for this collection, use and disclosure of information. s98M A government /health agency may collect/use /disclose information if it reasonably believes the threat is serious, disclosure is necessary to prevent/lessen the threat and consent of the victim has been refused or is unreasonable/impractical to obtain. The NSW Justice Department has developed a protocol for sharing and dealing with information under Part 13A available here.	(Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)
Northern Territory	s124A Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) Failure of an adult to report to the police harm (or likely harm) or serious/imminent threat because of domestic violence is an offence. S124A(4) Police must investigate such a report. s125 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) Such a report made in good faith is not a breach of a professional code of conduct and cannot attract civil or criminal liability – the report/reporter may only be used in proceedings with leave of the court. Sections 3(2)(d), 4, Chapter 5A Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) provides for disclosure by police, government and health agencies if the entity has reasonable grounds to believe that a person is experiencing domestic violence and the information would help reduce a threat to their health or safety (s 124E). An information sharing entity should obtain the consent of the person unless it is not possible to do so. In the case of Aboriginal persons, disclosure should promote cultural safety and be culturally sensitive (s 124C).	Chapter 3A, Part 3A.4 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT)
Queensland	Part 3 Domestic violence orders s55 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) If the respondent is contesting the naming of a child on the protection order or conditions relating to the child, the court	Part 6, Div. 5 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld)

	may request relevant information from the child protection authority. The parties must be given a copy and the opportunity to make submissions on the information received unless it would expose the victim or a child at increased risk of domestic and family violence. Part 5A Information Sharing ss169A – s169O Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) Government entities and specialist DFV service providers may give information to another government entity or specialist DFV service provider for assessing domestic violence threat or for responding to serious domestic violence threat. A support service provider (other than a specialist DFV service provider) may give information to government entity, specialist DFV service provider or other support service provider for responding to serious domestic violence threat. Whenever safe, possible and practical, a person's consent should be obtained before information sharing. However, safety and protection takes precedence over a person's consent. Government entity or specialist DFV service provider may use information given to it to assess whether there is a serious threat to a person's life, health or safety or to lessen or prevent a serious threat. A support service provider may use information given to it to lessen or prevent a serious threat to a person's life, health or safety. Guidelines for sharing and dealing with information under Part 5A have been developed pursuant to s169M and are available here.
Tasmania	s37 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) – It is not a breach of the Personal Information Act 2004 (Tas) (which regulates the collection and use of information) for an agency under that Act, acting in good faith, to collect, use, disclose personal information for the purpose of furthering the objects of the Family Violence Act. s39 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) Providing information (voluntarily or as required) to police based on a belief/reasonable suspicion of family violence (or likely family violence) with weapon, physical, sexual violence or where child affected, is not a breach of professional ethics/requirements and cannot, if done in good faith, incur civil or criminal liability.	Part 4, Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2016 (Tas)
Victoria	s140 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) – Information from an interview or report relating to (respondent) court ordered counselling may be used in proceedings for a	Part 5, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme Act 2016 (Vic)

	contravention relating to counselling orders or the underlying offence. (Power relating to court ordered counselling is limited to the Family Violence Court Division or other court specified by the Minister s126). Part 5A Information Sharing ss144A-144SG Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) 'Information sharing entities' (prescribed by regulation) may share any personal, health or sensitive information relevant to assessing and/or managing family violence between each other, provided the information is not excluded; sharing it does not contravene another law; and applicable consent requirements have been met. The information may relate to a victim survivor, alleged or established perpetrator or third party. Information may be shared for a "family violence assessment purpose" or "family violence protection purpose" and the relevance and reasonable belief required to share the information varies according to the purpose. Consent requirements vary according to the party to whom the information relates. Information sharing entities must comply with requests for information meeting the requirements of Part 5A. Guidelines for sharing and dealing with information under Part 5A have been developed pursuant to s 144P and are available, alongside various other resources on the Part's operation, here.
Western Australia	s70A Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) – Limited government agencies, including police and children's services, may disclose to each other information about person protected by an order or affected child if the disclosure is necessary to ensure the safety of the person protected or the wellbeing of a child.	Part 4, Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2016 (WA)
South Australia	s38 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) – A public sector agency or contractor that is bound by the State's Information Privacy Principles, must, on request, make available to a police officer information to assist in locating a person for service of a protection order.	Part 3A, Div. 4 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)

Acknowledgement of (adapted) source: Taylor, A., et al, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement – State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015) – Table 3, p15 [Taylor et al 2015]

Information sharing - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response: Final Report, Report No 114 (2010).

Chapter 30 'Information Sharing' considers the way to improve information flow between critical elements of the family violence system (courts, government agencies and other people and institutions involved in the family violence, family law and child protection systems). These include improving the way information is collected from parties and shared between courts (including the establishment of a national register of relevant court orders), changes to confidentiality and privacy legislation, and the development of information sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding (p.1397). The aim is to 'avoid, as far as possible, victims falling into gaps between the various systems due to lack of relevant information' (p.1398).

The report covers a number of issues relating to information sharing. In particular, it examines strategies to improve information sharing. The report notes that barriers to information sharing are not always legislative and are often administrative and cultural. One strategy to remedy this is to put in place information sharing protocols and MOUs between elements in the family law, family violence and child protection systems to clarify and formalise what information can be shared, with whom, and in what circumstances (p.1443). A number of these protocols exist in the child protection area, but they are less common in the family violence context.

Breckenridge, Jan, Susan Rees, Kylie Valentine and Samantha Murray, Meta-evaluation of existing interagency partnerships, collaboration, coordination and/or integrated interventions and service responses to violence against women: Key findings and future directions (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper evaluates existing interagency collaboration and integrated responses to violence against women, of which the criminal justice system is an important element. It provides an overview of approaches to integration and collaboration between sectors, as well as criticisms of current approaches (pp 13-15). An overview of approaches from the US (pp 16-18) the UK (pp 19-20), and other Australian jurisdictions is provided (pp 27-35). The paper also considers the appropriateness of integrated responses for different women, highlighting that women with complex needs, such as Indigenous women, and those in remote and rural areas, may require specific, tailored approaches (pp 21-26). It highlights that integration itself should not be the goal, but that such efforts must be client-focussed (p 14).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Information sharing is a critical part of an integrated response to domestic and family violence. The report notes that '[t]he ability for different agencies to discuss cases and share relevant details on an ongoing basis is at the core of coordinating a tailored response to a person's individual circumstances. Effective and efficient information sharing ensures that victims of domestic and family violence do not have to re-tell their stories repeatedly to different service providers and enables service providers to provide timely responses, particularly in high-risk cases'. While there are clear benefits to information sharing, there is a need to ensure sufficient safeguards are in place to protect confidentiality. Unnecessary or inappropriate sharing of information could have negative consequences including: 'destroying relationships of trust between a service provider and a client, leading to disengagement of a client, becoming a barrier to victims' willingness to seek help. Similarly, information can be untested or based on service provider opinion and could be highly prejudicial to one or both of the parties if used inappropriately in legal proceedings' (pp.230-231).

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

In relation to information sharing legislation that pertains to enforcement of protection orders, this report notes that 'information sharing' is 'the sharing or disclosing of personal details between agencies that respond to domestic and family violence, such as police, child welfare authorities and support services as a referral tool, to minimise the risk of victims falling through the cracks and to support victims to more easily and quickly engage with the agency to which they have been referred. Additionally, information sharing can be an important risk management tool, where the circumstances of abuse or risk indicators are shared to ensure that swift action can be taken to address risks, including police investigation, removing a victim to safety and development of a safety plan' (p.13).

The paper looks at the practice of information sharing (pp40-43). It notes that for the effective enforcement of protection orders, 'coordinated integrated responses that are adequately resourced are important'. This facilitates access to relevant services through inter-agency referrals and therefore fosters victim safety, and allows awareness of the risk to the victim and the behaviour and dangerousness of the perpetrator (p.40). Integrated responses are reliant on mechanisms for inter-agency collaborations, particularly through information sharing protocols.

Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Western Australia, Western Australia's Family and Domestic Violence Prevention Strategy to 2022: Achievement Report to 2013 (2013).

'In 2009–2010 the 'Memorandum of Understanding: Information sharing between agencies with responsibilities for preventing and responding to family and domestic violence in Western Australia' (MoU) was endorsed and signed by State and Commonwealth Government agencies. In 2010–2011 community sector agencies provided their endorsement and became signatories to the MoU. The MoU provides recognition of 'duty of care' including the commitment to share information without client consent if: the case is assessed to be high risk; a crime has been committed or is going to be committed; it is believed a child is likely to suffer significant harm; or a client is in need of urgent medical or psychiatric care. In 2013, the MoU was updated to reflect changes in multi agency case management and signature agencies were invited to provide their ongoing endorsement' (p.9). The Report provides an overview of these initiatives.

Victoria, Royal Commission into Family Violence, Summary and Recommendations (2016).

Chapter 7 discusses information sharing in relation to family and domestic violence generally. The Report notes that legislation alone will not create a culture of information sharing throughout the family violence system. Further, Chapter 16 of the report discusses court-based responses to family violence in Victoria. Of particular relevance, the report discusses the limitations on information sharing between courts and other parts of the family violence system.

Information sharing - Other Bench Books

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 18 discusses the operation of the information sharing provisions of the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

3.10 discusses the family violence information sharing regime.

Information sharing - Other Resources

Co-location of State and Territory child protection and other officials in Family Law Court Registries

Open via Department of Social Services: National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children website.

This initiative has funded the co-location of 16 child protection officials and 6 policing officials at family law court registries until 30 June 2025. It's intended outcomes include:

The intended outcomes of this program include:

- a more coordinated response to family safety issues (demonstrated in part by the sharing of data relating to information or intervention requests in matters where child abuse is suspected or alleged)
- judicial officers being able to make decisions with full knowledge of prior involvement by child protection and law enforcement agencies
- strengthened judicial decision-making, with family safety risks identified and addressed earlier in family law proceedings
- improved inter-jurisdictional understanding and cooperation, leading to better information sharing practices.

National Strategic Framework for Information Sharing between the Family Law and Family Violence Child Protection Systems. (webpage) 2023

This Framework supports the appropriate and timely two-way information exchange between the Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia and the Family Court of Western Australia (the family law courts) on the one hand, and state and territory courts, child protection, policing, and firearms agencies on the other.

Implicit bias

It is fundamental to the proper administration of justice and to public confidence in the judicial system that all parties are, and believe they are, treated fairly and without discrimination. Judicial officers must ensure that any personal biases or prejudices, or tendencies to stereotype or make false assumptions about people do not influence their decision making [Other Bench Books]. This duty extends to ensuring transparency and particularity in their judicial reasoning [Bagaric 2015].

The legal system provides mechanisms for enabling challenges to impartiality by reasons of apprehended bias or conflict of interest. Where there is proven or even the appearance of bias, a judicial decision may be set aside. Decisions made by judicial officers in circumstances where a fair-minded lay observer might reasonably apprehend that the judicial officer might not bring an impartial mind to the resolution of the question, may be set aside, unless waiver or necessity is established [Mason 2001].

In recent years, there has been significant research into how mental short cuts, known as heuristics, affect the way decisions are made. Researchers have considered how implicit bias [Greenwald et al 2006] (sometimes called unconscious or unintended bias) can affect decision-making [Implicit Association Test]. Implicit bias may affect an individual's understanding, actions and decisions in an unconscious manner, and operate without the individual's awareness or intentional control [Staats 2014]. Seminal research by psychologists, Daniel Kahneman [Kahneman 2011] and Amos Tversky, identify two systems of thinking (intuitive or fast thinking; and conscious or slow thinking) and examine the biases (or systematic errors) of intuitive thinking. Intuitive thinking suppresses doubt and ambiguity in order to quickly assemble coherent interpretations. Conscious thinking, on the other hand, accommodates doubt and incompatible possibilities in the process of deliberation.

Set out below are some of the key implicit biases identified in the literature; they can apply across all facets of decision-making. Judicial decision-making in domestic and family violence related cases frequently involves identifying factors affecting risk, assessing risk, and exercising a heightened awareness of the cautions associated with typologising, stereotyping and making false assumptions about parties, their circumstances and their motivations. In understanding the potential for bias in the context of judicial decision-making, and learning, through self-examination and reflection [Other Resources] of any particular personal biases, judicial officers can develop strategies for eliminating bias from their decision-making [Staats 2016].

Representativeness v base-rate information

When making a judgment about facts, there is a tendency to ignore base rates and doubts about the veracity of a description and favour a judgment of representativeness. Representativeness results from a focus on aligning a description with a stereotype. Base rates are relevant statistical facts. In many cases, there is some truth to the stereotypes that govern judgments of representativeness, and the predictions that follow may be accurate. In other situations the stereotypes are false and the representativeness misleading, especially if the base-rate information points in a different direction.

Availability

When estimating the likelihood of an event or outcome or the frequency or prevalence of a category (eg people, behaviours), it is likely that the estimate will be based on the instances most easily retrievable from memory; if retrieval is easy, the estimate is likely to be high. What is more obvious or more vivid will appear to be more probable.

Anchoring

When making a decision there is a common tendency to rely too heavily on the first piece of information offered. For example, information may be offered about a numerical value. This information tends to have the effect of anchoring the decision to that numerical value, even where that value may bear no reasonable relation to what the value ought to be. Once an anchor is set, there is a bias toward interpreting later information around the anchor.

Framing

Logically equivalent statements—posed or framed differently—can evoke different meanings and responses. For example, risk preferences depend on whether outcomes are framed in terms of gains or losses vis-à-vis a particular reference point, which could be the status quo or current position or, alternatively, an expectation or aspiration regarding a particular position (also known as prospect theory). There is a tendency to take more risks with losses than with gains.

Hindsight

When an unpredicted event occurs, the view of the past and future is adjusted immediately to accommodate the surprise, and there is a tendency to lose the ability to recall what was previously believed to be probable. Hindsight bias may result in the quality of a decision being assessed not by whether the beliefs on which it was based were sound and reasonable, but by whether the outcome was good or bad. Further, a propensity to make sense of the past may lead to an illusion that the future can be predicted or controlled.

Over-confidence

Subjective confidence in personal opinions or judgments reflects a personal feeling about the coherence of a self-constructed story and the cognitive ease of processing it. The amount and quality of the evidence have little or no bearing in this context.

Small numbers

There is a tendency to exaggerate the consistency and coherence of what is witnessed, and to believe that small samples are representative of the much larger population from which they are drawn. With little evidence, conclusions are accelerated, and a bigger story is constructed based on that evidence; this is also known as narrative fallacy.

False consensus

There is a tendency to view personal behaviour and responses as typical and appropriate while viewing alternatives as odd and inappropriate.

Implicit bias - Key Literature

Australia

Bagaric, Mirko, 'Sentencing: From Vagueness to Arbitrariness: The Need to Abolish the Stain that is the Instinctive Synthesis' (2015) 38(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 76.

In this article, Bagaric argues that the instinctive synthesis approach to sentencing results in arbitrary decision making in courts. He quotes from Kirby J in Markarian v The Queen [2005] HCA 25:

> 'With all respect to those of the different opinion, the phrase 'instinctive synthesis' sends quite the wrong signals for the law of sentencing in Australia. Who are those who have the 'instincts' in question? Only the judges. This is therefore a formula that risks endorsement of the deployment of purely personal legal power. It runs contrary to the tendency in other areas of the law, notably administrative law, to expose to subsequent scrutiny the use of public power by public officials. It is contrary to the insistence of Australian courts, including this Court, that judicial officers must give reasons for their decisions. At this stage in the development of the Australian law of sentencing, this Court should be encouraging, not impeding, transparency and accountability of judicial decision-making. I remain of the view that '[i]t is too late (and undesirable) to return to unexplained judicial intuition'. Talk of 'instinctive synthesis' is like the breath of a bygone legal age. It resonates with a claim, effectively, to unexplainable and unreviewable power'.

Bagaric explores recent empirical research that shows that judges may be influenced by considerations of which they are unaware, including race, sex and income.

Hamilton, John P, 'Judicial Independence and Impartiality: Old Principles, New Developments' (Paper presented at South Pacific Judicial Conference, 28 June to 2 July 1999).

This paper discusses aspects of judicial independence generally. The Honourable Justice Hamilton briefly examines the modern concept of judicial independence and considers a number of recent issues concerning the independence of judicial officers. Most relevantly, this paper deals briefly with the issue of judicial dismissal and complaints made against the judiciary. In 1997-1998 the Judicial Commission of New South Wales' found that: 'The most common ground of complaint involved apprehension of bias, failure to give a fair hearing or conduct which was said to display hostility to discourtesy towards the complainant. In the period under consideration a high proportion of complaints alleged that the judicial officer in question unfairly or improperly prevented the losing party to litigation from properly putting his or her case, or favoured the winning party' (p.10).

His Honour further notes: 'As in past years, a high proportion of complaints arose out of applications for apprehended violence orders. This is not surprising, as these proceedings usually involve emotional stress and frequently one party is not legally represented. Sometimes both parties are unrepresented. Judicial officers who deal with these applications are obliged to behave in an impartial manner, but this is sometimes construed as a failure to show appropriate concern for the situation of one of the parties. As a result, this form of litigation generates many complaints to the Commission' (p.10).

Mason, Keith, 'Unconscious Judicial Prejudice' (Paper presented at Supreme and Federal Courts Judges' Conference, January 2001).

This speech is available at pp.240-249 of the document. His Honour explores 'the impact of unconscious prejudice upon judicial decision-making in law and fact'. In the paper Justice Mason examines different types of bias and prejudice.

He considers heuristic illusions: 'The study of "cognitive heuristics" has revealed judgmental rules of thumb that we use to simplify complex and uncertain tasks. Some heuristics are demonstrably valid in some circumstances, but in many circumstances they lead to systematic error or bias. The term "cognitive illusion" is often used to describe these inferential shortcomings. Psychological studies reveal illusions such as: hindsight illusion, overconfidence concerning one's own judgments and predictions, false-consensus bias, and framing bias' (see article for a more detailed description of these) (p.7).

Compensatory bias: where a judge may have leant too far in the opposite direction to avoid the actuality or appearance of prejudice in a particular direction (p.8).

Justice Mason concludes asking 'what is to be done?' He makes the following suggestion: 'Come clean about the role that [unconscious prejudices] actually play both in the grand design and in the exquisite details of our legal structure. Get real about the hard work that it takes to redeem the promise of those concepts' (p.8).

Pagone, GT, 'Centipedes, Liars and Unconscious bias' (Speech delivered at Melbourne University Law School 'JD Guest Lecture Series', Melbourne, 7 April 2009).

Pagone writes that, '[a]n important element at play in faulty decision-making is the unconscious bias that we bring with us when making any decision…The mental process by which we 'find' new facts, knowledge or information (that is, heuristics), is affected by many illusions, preconceptions, biases and error. Often we rely upon certain facts to 'anchor' our decision, which controlled studies suggest can have greater influence than is independently justified' (p.8).

Patricia Easteal, Lorana Bartels and Reeva Mittal, 'The Importance of Understanding the Victims' 'Reality' of Domestic Violence' (2018) Alternative Law Journal.

The authors argue that unconscious assumptions may filter out the diverse experiences and 'realities' of domestic violence victims. This is particularly evident in the differences between the court's perceptions of domestic violence, and the victim's experiences of it. Despite legal and policy reform, these assumptions may continue to affect how relevant legislation is applied and interpreted. The authors consider a small sample of recent Queensland domestic violence order breach cases to underscore the systemic failure in recognising the seriousness and harm of psychological or mental abuses (i.e. the victims' 'reality' of domestic violence), and the lack of understanding of the long-term effects of domestic violence on its victims. The authors conclude that sentencing for domestic violence offences and breaches of protection orders should be underpinned by knowledge of the long-term effects of emotional abuse. Further, an analysis of Queensland cases indicates that the Benchbook is not always applied consistently. Consequently, the authors suggest the creation of a report that particularises the specific issues in each individual case in order to enhance the knowledge of judicial officers and other stakeholders, and to adjust their lenses so they can better understand the victim's perspective.

International

Casey, Pamela M et al, 'Helping Courts Address Implicit Bias: Resources for Education' (National Center for State Courts, 2012).

'[A]lthough courts may have made great strides in eliminating explicit or consciously endorsed racial bias, they, like all social institutions, may still be challenged by implicit biases that are much more difficult to identify and change' (pp 1-2). This report explores the content and delivery of educational programs on implicit bias for judicial and court staff.

Danziger, Shai, Jonathan Levav and Liora Avnaim-Pesso, 'Extraneous factors in judicial decisions' (2011) 108(17) Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences 6889.

The authors ask: are judicial rulings based solely on laws and facts? The authors test the common caricature that justice is "what the judge ate for breakfast" by examining sequential parole decisions made by experienced judges. We record the judges' two daily food breaks, which result in segmenting the deliberations of the day into three distinct "decision sessions." We find that the percentage of favorable rulings drops gradually from ˜65% to nearly zero within each decision session and returns abruptly to ˜65% after a break. Our findings suggest that judicial rulings can be swayed by extraneous variables that should have no bearing on legal decisions.

Epstein, Deborah, and Lisa A Goodman, 'Discounting Credibility: Doubting the Testimony and Dismissing the Experiences of Domestic Violence Survivors and Other Women' (2018) 167 University of Pennsylvania Law Review (forthcoming).

This article addresses the ways in which the credibility of female victims of intimate partner violence is discounted through their experiences of legal and social services (pp 3-4). The authors conclude that women's experiences are frequently discounted, which itself can have further traumatic impacts. Judges and other professionals often discount women's stories of abuse as implausible, particularly where the victims suffer from psychological trauma that may impact memory and comprehension (p 7). Women who suffer traumatic brain injuries (pp 9-11) or PTSD (pp 11-3) as a result of domestic violence are particularly susceptible to relaying inconsistent stories. The authors also find that cultural assumptions resulting in the prioritisation of physical over psychological violence causes judges and other authority figures to expect 'real' survivors to also prioritise physical harm, while in reality, victims may feel more significantly impacted by psychological abuse (pp 17-20).

Moreover, the results of the study indicate that gatekeepers often unjustly discount women's personal trustworthiness, based on perceptions of their demeanour (pp 21-5), their perceived motive (pp 25-32), and their social location (pp 32-7). Even women who are able to overcome initial scepticism often find that the systems intended to provide assistance dismiss the importance of their experiences (p 37). In spite of meaningful progress, 'the criminal justice system continues to discount important aspects of women's experiences and to trivialize some of the harmful consequences that policies focused primarily on offender accountability often impose on survivors' (p 38). Ultimately, 'the arbiters of justice and social welfare adopt and enforce legal and social policies and practices with little regard for how they perpetuate patterns of abuse' (p 1).

These experiences of minimisation often echo women's previous experiences of abuse (p 46). The impacts of this discrediting are multifaceted: the dismissal itself constitutes its own injury, which can compound the harm such women experience directly from the abuse (pp 47-50); additionally, this instinctive devaluing of women's testimony becomes an independent obstacle to attempts to obtain safety and justice (pp 50-2). The authors conclude that credibility discounting is widespread and pervasive, and requires genuine institutional reform (p 59). Particularly, actors must be aware of these internalised assumptions, and seek to engage more openly with victims (see pp 54-6).

Greenwald, Anthony G and Linda Hamilton Krieger, 'Implicit Bias: Scientific Foundations' (2006) 94(4) California Law Review 945.

The article starts by contrasting implicit bias with the 'naïve' psychological conception of social behaviour, which sees human beings as guided only by their explicit beliefs and their conscious intentions to act. 'A belief is explicit if it is consciously endorsed. An intention to act is conscious if the actor is aware of taking an action for a particular reason'. By contrast, 'the science of implicit cognition suggests that actors do not always have conscious, intentional control over the processes of social perception, impression formation, and judgment that motivate their actions' (p.946).

The article notes that research began on implicit mental processes in the 1980s and this included research on implicit memory, implicit attitudes (attitude as 'an evaluative disposition'), and implicit stereotypes ('a mental association between a social group or category and a trait) (pp.947-950). It then examines response bias and implicit bias specifically in Part III. It defines implicit biases as 'discriminatory biases based on implicit attitudes or implicit stereotypes'. It continues, 'implicit biases are especially intriguing, and also especially problematic because they can produce behaviour that diverges from a person's avowed or endorsed beliefs or principles. The very existence of implicit bias poses a challenge to legal theory and practice, because discrimination doctrine is premised on the assumption that, barring insanity or mental incompetence, human actors are guided by their avowed (explicit) beliefs, attitudes, and intentions'. Biases can be either favourable or unfavourable (p.951).

This article also points out that the Implicit Association Test (IAT) (see 'Other Resources' in this section) is a measure of implicit bias and it has shown that implicit biases are highly prevalent. The article notes that research has shown that implicit attitudes produce discriminatory behaviour (p.961).

Guthrie, Chris, Jeffrey J Rachlinski, Andrew J Wistrich, 'Judging by Heuristic: Cognitive Illusions in Judicial Decision Making' (2002) 86(1) Judicature 44.

The article notes that 'people rely on mental shortcuts or 'heuristics' to make complex decisions. Reliance on heuristics sometimes causes people to draw systematically inaccurate inferences – these heuristics can create cognitive illusions of judgment' (p.44). The authors gave a brief questionnaire to judges and found that a number of cognitive illusions influenced their decision-making process (p.44). The authors usefully note and explain a number of heuristics used by judges including anchoring, framing, hindsight bias, inverse fallacy, and egocentric bias.

Guthrie, Chris, Jeffrey J Rachlinski, Andrew J Wistrich, 'Blinking on the Bench: How Judges Decide Cases' (2007) 93 Cornell Law Review 1.

In this article, the authors posit an answer to the question, 'how do judges judge?' The authors argue that key insights from both the formalist and realist models of judging provide a more accurate view of how decisions are made. This model, the 'intuitive-override' model of judging, 'posits that judges generally make intuitive decisions but sometimes override their intuition with deliberation. Less idealistic than the formalist model and less cynical than the realist model, our model is best described as "realistic formalism." The model is "realist" in the sense that it recognizes the important role of the judicial hunch and "formalist" in the sense that it recognizes the importance of deliberation in constraining the inevitable, but often undesirable, influence of intuition' (p.3).

In Part I of the Article, the authors present their intuitive-overdrive model of judging. They state that the 'proposed dual-process model of judging, which is based on a general model developed by Daniel Kahneman (see above) and Shane Frederick, posits that judges make initial intuitive judgments (System 1), which they might (or might not) override with deliberation (System 2).

In Part II, the authors present their results that show judges commonly make judgments intuitively rather than reflectively. Thus, these results support the intuitive overdrive model.

In Part III, the authors examine the implications of these findings for the judicial system. They note that deliberative decision making is more likely to lead to just outcomes and provide some suggestions as to what the justice system can do to encourage judges to decide matters more deliberatively such as: 'the amount of time that judges have to make rulings, the potential disciplining effect of opinion writing, the amount of training and feedback judges receive, the use of scripts, checklists, and multifactor tests in judging, and the allocation of decision-making resources' (pp.35-43).

The authors relevantly note at p.5: 'Eliminating all intuition from judicial decision making is both impossible and undesirable because it is an essential part of how the human brain functions. Intuition is dangerous not because people rely on it but because they rely on it when it is inappropriate to do so. We propose that, where feasible, judges should use deliberation to check their intuition'.

Kahneman, Daniel, Thinking, fast and slow (Allen Lane, 2011).

Defining 'fast' and 'slow' thinking: This book examines the biases (i.e. systematic errors made by people) of intuitive thinking. The book presents a view of how the mind works, with a particular focus on the 'marvels' and 'flaws' of intuitive thought (pp.4-10). Kahneman uses two metaphorical agents ('two systems') to explain how we think:

System 1 ('fast thinking'): 'operates automatically and quickly, with little or no effort and no sense of voluntary control' (p.20), intuitive thinking.

System 2 ('slow thinking'): 'allocates attention to the effortful mental activities that demand it, including complex computations. The operations of System 2 are often associated with the subjective experience of agency, choice and concentration' (p.21), effortful decision-making.

Intuitive thinking as the main architect of our decisions and judgments: While we tend to identify ourselves with System 2, 'the conscious, reasoning self that has beliefs, makes choices, and decides what to think about and what to do' (p.21), it is the automatic System 1 that is responsible for many of the choices and judgments people make.

Problems of intuitive thinking: System 1 can cause 'cognitive illusions', illusions of thought (p.27) and it is a machine for jumping to conclusions. In Chapter 7, Kahneman argues that System 1 thinking both seeks coherence in the world but it is also 'radically insensitive to both the quality and the quantity of information that gives rise to impressions and intuitions' (p.86). Thus, it produces intuitive beliefs which may be incorrect and which System 2 endorses because it is lazy much of the time. This characteristic of System 1 type thinking is so important to the book that Kahneman gives it its own acronym. 'WYSIATI, which stands for what you see is all there is' (p.86). 'WYSIATI facilitates the achievement of coherence and of the cognitive ease that causes us to accept a statement as true. It explains why we can think fast, and how we are able to make sense of partial information in a complex world. Much of the time, the coherent story we put together is close enough to reality to support reasonable action. However WYSIATI helps explain a long and diverse list of biases of judgment and choice, including the following:

- Overconfidence: neither the quantity nor the quality of the evidence counts for much in subjective confidence. The confidence that individuals have in their beliefs depends mostly on the quality of the story they can tell about what they see, even if they see little. We often fail to allow for the possibility that evidence that should be critical to our judgment is missing – what we see is all there is. Furthermore, our associative system tends to settle on a coherent pattern of activation and suppresses doubt and ambiguity' (pp.87-88).
- Framing effects: Different ways of presenting the same information often evoke different emotions. The statement that 'the odds of survival one month after surgery are 90%' is more reassuring than the equivalent statement that 'mortality within one month of surgery is 10%'. Similarly cold cuts described as '90% fat-free' are more attractive than when they are described as '10% fat'. The equivalence of the alternative formulations is transparent, but an individual normally sees only one formulation, and what she sees is all there is' (p.88).
- Base-rate neglect: Recall Steve, the meek and tidy soul who is often believed to be a librarian. The personality description is salient and vivid, and although you surely know that there are more female than male librarians, that statistical fact almost certainly did not come to your mind when you first considered the question. What you saw was all there was' (p.88).

How to overcome these?: 'What can be done about biases? How can we improve judgments and decisions, both our own and those of the intuitions that we serve and that serve us?'

'The short answer is that little can be achieved without a considerable investment of effort'. People can improve their ability to recognise situations in which errors are likely and it is easier to recognise the errors of others rather than the errors of oneself. 'The way to block errors that originate in System 1 is simple in principle: recognise the signs that you are in a cognitive minefield, slow down, and ask for reinforcement from System 2'. But this procedure is difficult to apply as cognitive illusions are difficult to recognise. However, Kahneman explains that it is easier to identify cognitive illusions as an observer (p.417).

Further, organisations are better than individuals at avoiding errors because they think more slowly and can impose procedures. They can enforce the application of useful checklists plus other exercises, and they can also encourage people to watch out for each other when approaching minefields (pp.417-418).

Note: the References and Notes at the back of the book contain comprehensive lists of sources reflecting the substantial academic literature in this research area.

Levinson, Justin D., Mark W. Bennett and Koichi Hioki, 'Judging Implicit Bias: A National Empirical Study of Judicial Stereotypes' (2017) 69 Florida Law Review 63.

This US study tested 239 federal and state judges to examine whether they exhibit implicit bias in white-collar sentencing. The authors used the Implicit Association Test to test implicit bias and a hypothetical sentencing case study to test sentencing decisions.

It found that judges harboured strong to moderate negative implicit stereotypes against Asian-Americans and Jewish people, associating them with traits such as 'greedy', 'dishonest' and controlling', while holding favourable implicit stereotypes towards Whites and Christians, associating them with traits such as 'trustworthy', 'honest' and 'giving' (p 104). The study also found that federal district court judges sentenced Jewish defendants to marginally longer prison terms than identical Christian defendants, and the disparity was likely the result of implicit bias (p 109).

Mitchell, Gregory and Philip E Tetlock, 'Implicit Attitude Measures' in Robert Scott and Stephen Kosslyn (eds), Emerging Trends in Social and Behavioural Sciences (John Wiley & Sons, 2015).

- Contemporary measures of implicit attitudes such as the popular 'Implicit Association Test' 'equate spontaneous responses to stimuli with attitudes about those stimuli.' The authors here note that while these measures have opened new and important lines of inquiry, 'they suffer from reliability and construct validity problems and administrative limitations' (p.1). These include:

- Implicit attitude measures can be difficult to implement. These measures involve considerable time and effort in laboratory settings and it is not feasible to use some of the measures outside the laboratory (p.7).
- There is evidence that participants can consciously mediate their responses. 'Participants often infer the purpose behind the task and can intentionally alter their pattern of responses and thus the attitudes ascribed to them, controlled processes contribute to responses on the implicit tasks even when those processes are beyond the awareness of participants, and reactivity biases can affect responses on these measures' (p.7).
- These new measures may be affected by factors other than attitude e.g. 'individual differences in working memory that affect the speed with which information is processed? … Factors such as the respondent's amount of practice on the task, age, general processing speed and ability to switch tasks quickly and effectively, and familiarity with the attitude-object stimuli, if not accounted for, will contaminate the results and lead to erroneous conclusions about the attitudes of respondents' (p.8).
- '[T]he new implicit measures raise basic construct validity questions concerning the meaning of an attitude and how to go about measuring attitudes…a researcher considering the use of the new implicit measures should be aware of ongoing debates about the proper definition of attitude and whether the new implicit measures actually measure anything that should be called an attitude' (pp.7-8).
- These measures 'often exhibit low split-half and test-retest reliability scores' (p.8).
- '[T]he new implicit measures often fail to outperform simple explicit measures of attitudes in the prediction of behaviour' (p.9).

- The authors argue: 'Researchers conducting basic research on attitudes may fruitfully utilize implicit measures as part of a multipronged measurement strategy, but researchers seeking to predict behaviour from attitudes should continue to rely on explicit measures of attitudes, taking care to minimize reactive bias and to formulate the attitude questions at the same level of specificity as the behaviour to be predicted' (p.1).

National Judges Association, Domestic Violence and the Courtroom: Knowing the Issues… Understanding the Victim (n.d.).

This resource provides practical guidance for judges in engaging with victims of domestic violence in the courtroom. It includes a checklist designed to assist judges in becoming more informed about cultural issues and the challenges culture may present in individual cases (p 9):

- Examine your own cultural heritage and identity.
- Does your cultural identity affect, limit, or enhance your work as a judge?
- What do you believe about people who are different?
- How can you become more aware of potentially blinding preferences, such as pre-existing beliefs or assumptions about other cultures?

Additionally, it is important to consider how cultural factors may impact the parties (p 10):

- How does cultural difference impact remedies to assist the victim or minimise harm to the victim?
- How does cultural difference facilitate the imposition of meaningful interventions for perpetrators?

Richardson, L. Song, 'Systemic Triage: Implicit Racial Bias in the Criminal Courtroom' (2017) 126 Yale Law Journal 862.

Richardson draws on social science evidence to argue that biases influence discretionary decisions, perceptions and practices in ways that are not readily observable and thrive in conditions of 'systemic triage'.

'Systemic triage' is defined as the process of allocating scarce resources in a criminal justice system overloaded with 'tough on crime' policies and policing practices, which disproportionately affect indigent, urban and minority communities (p 878). These policies and practices burden the system with more cases than it can handle. Richardson argues that defenders, prosecutors and judges are constantly subject to cognitive depletion and incomplete information, which is a typical situation in which implicit biases arise (p 881). Unconscious biases emerge for public defenders and police prosecutors in the sorting process to determine which cases are deserving of prosecution (p 880).

Staats, Cheryl, 'State of the Science: Implicit Bias Review 2014' (Kirwan Institute for the Study of Race & Ethnicity, 2014).

Chapter 1 of the text provides an introduction to the topic of implicit biases.

Defining implicit biases – Implicit biases are: 'the attitudes or stereotypes that affect our understanding, actions, and decisions in an unconscious manner. These biases, which encompass both favourable and unfavourable assessments, are activated involuntarily and without an individual's awareness or intentional control.' (p.16).

On p.17 the review provides a useful list of key characteristics of implicit biases namely, that they are pervasive and robust; implicit and explicit biases are generally regarded as related but distinct mental constructs; implicit associations do not necessarily align with our declared beliefs; we generally hold implicit biases that favour our own ingroup; implicit biases have real-world effects on behaviour; and implicit biases are malleable.

Staats, Cheryl et al, 'State of the Science: Implicit Bias Review, 2016 Edition' (Kirwan Institute for the Study of Race & Ethnicity, 2016).

'The 2016 State of the Science: Implicit Bias Review is the fourth edition of this annual publication. By carefully following the latest scholarly literature and public discourse on implicit bias, this document provides a snapshot of the field, both in terms of its current status and evolution as well as in the context of its relevant antecedents. As in previous editions, this publication highlights the new 2015 academic literature through the lenses of five main domain areas: criminal justice, health and health care, employment, education, and housing. Accompanying these five content areas is a discussion of the latest research-based strategies for mitigating the influence of implicit biases, as well as a recognition of major contributions that expand beyond these domain-specific boundaries'.

There is an excellent, up-to-date fact sheet on pp.14-15 which provides an introduction to implicit bias.

It defines implicit bias as: 'The attitudes or stereotypes that affect our understanding, actions and decisions in an unconscious manner. Activated involuntarily, without awareness or intentional control. Can be either positive or negative. Everyone is susceptible'.

Implicit bias matters because everyone possesses such associations and they affect our decisions, behaviours and interactions with others.

What can be done about it? (1) Educate yourself – take the Implicit Associate Test (IAT) on implicit.harvard.edu (2) Take action (3) Be accountable.

Williams, Joan et al, 'You Can't Change What You Can't See: Interrupting Racial & Gender Bias in the Legal Profession' American Bar Association, 2018.

This report details the endemic bias women and minority lawyers continue to face compared to their white male counterparts, and also provides tools to disrupt the status quo. Current efforts to advance women and minorities have largely failed, and bias and discrimination (both explicit and implicit) persist. In addition to gender bias, the report also documents sexual harassment at work and outlines four major patterns of systemic bias in the workplace. Relevant to decision-makers may be the section implementing bias interrupters at pp102-104.

Wistrich, Andrew J. and Rachlinski, Jeffrey J., Implicit Bias in Judicial Decision Making How It Affects Judgment and What Judges Can Do About It (March 16, 2017). Chapter 5: American Bar Association, Enhancing Justice (2017); Cornell Legal Studies Research Paper No. 17-16.

This paper discusses strategies that judges and judicial officers can employ to reduce excessive reliance on intuition and implicit biases. Part I (see pp 90-104) discusses research demonstrating that judges are vulnerable to errors caused by intuitive decision-making (p 92). For an example of anchoring, one study found that judges imposed shorter sentences when asked to impose a sentence in months than years: the average sentence in months was 63 months, compared to 9 years (p 94). Part B offers suggestions for judges to combat unconscious bias. For example, that judges take an Implicit Association Test to alert judges to their racial bias, because most judges (like most people) tend to rate themselves above the median judge with respect to avoiding racial bias (p 106). It also suggests auditing (pp 108-10), appointing more judges and support staff from diverse backgrounds (p 110-1), writing opinions more often (p 117-8), and making use of rules and checklists (p 119). However, there is a risk involved, because any of these solutions that require more cognitive effort from judges may make them susceptible to other types of error (p 107).

Implicit bias - Other Bench Books

Australia

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 1.2 of the bench book provides a discussion on the avoidance of bias and stereotyping. It states that, '[j]udicial officers need to ensure that they do not treat anyone as a stereotype and/or make false assumptions about a particular individual, based on what they believe most people from that individual's group value, or based on how they believe most people from that individual's group behave. Judicial officers need a reasonable understanding of the range of values, cultures, lifestyles and life experiences of people from different backgrounds, together with an understanding of the potential difficulties, barriers or inequities people from different backgrounds may face in relation to court proceedings'.

The bench book further notes that while it is important to understand which groups are most likely to experience inequity, discrimination and/or disadvantage (see the rest of the bench book for a discussion of these groups), 'every individual is the product of many different influences. Characteristics such as ethnicity, gender, religious affiliation, disability, sexuality and socio-economic background may or may not have a determining influence on any particular individual's values, life experience or behaviour'.

There is a discussion of gender bias at 10.3.1 & 10.3.2

Judicial College of Victoria, Victorian Sentencing Manual (2021).

[2.2.2.2.3] Apprehended bias: The bench book notes:

> At sentencing the judge or magistrate should maintain a neutral role and avoid adopting an inquisitorial position. This does not mean they cannot disclose concerns about aspects of the case. In fact there may be circumstances where the failure to do so amounts to a denial of procedural fairness. As Kirby P said in Chow v DPP, 'there is a fine line between excessive and unjudicial intervention…and candid disclosure of matters of concern to invite response'. [Chow v DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 593, [606], cited with approval in R v Grillo [2003] VSCA 143, [17]].
>
> In informing the parties of its developing views, a court should take care not to give rise to an apprehension of bias. That is, it should not create a perception that it may not bring an impartial and unprejudiced mind to its task. [Livesey v New South Wales Bar Association(1983) 151 CLR 288, 293-94; Clarkson v The Queen (2011) 32 VR 361, 393–94 [132] ('Clarkson')].

To that end, a judge should avoid gratuitous or intemperate remarks as they may be taken out of context and misinterpreted. [Clarkson 394 [133]. See also R v Wise [2004] VSCA 88, [16]; Gild v The Queen [2017] VSCA 367, [28] ('Gild')].

The expression of tentative views during argument on matters that the parties are then permitted to address does not manifest bias [Gild [24]]. But a greater number of judicial interjections and the degree of their intrusiveness or tone, considered within the context of the entire proceeding, may create a reasonable suspicion of prejudgment [R v Charter [2002] VSCA 214, [24]].

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (2022).

Section 1 explains the principle of equality before the law and duty of judicial officers to act fairly and without discrimination. 1.4 discusses the need for judicial officers to be conscious of any possible personal biases or prejudices about people from different backgrounds and actively seek to neutralise these. 2.3.4 cautions judicial officers not to let stereotyped views about Aboriginal people unfairly influence their assessment. 3.3.5.2 provides guidance on avoiding stereotyping people from CALD backgrounds. 4.4.5 cautions judicial officers not to let personal views about a particular religion's views or practice unfairly influence their assessment. 7.2 discusses gender bias in court. 8.5.3 and 9.6.4 respectively caution judicial officers not to let stereotyped views about lesbianism, homosexuality or bisexuality or stereotyped views about gender diverse people unfairly influence their assessment.

Supreme Court of Queensland, Equal Treatment Benchbook (2nd ed, 2016).

In Chapter 4 'Family Diversity', the bench book states that, 'when approaching issues of family violence, stereotypes about the gender of abusers and victims should be avoided: all family members, regardless of gender/sex or age, may be affected'.

There is a general discussion in Chapter 14 'Gender Equality' on the dangers of stereotyping (see p.188).

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2020).

The bench book provides a discussion in Chapter 3: Social Context Use and Misuse at Section 3.2.2 of whether social context education can create judicial bias. It notes that 'social context information, if misinterpreted or misused, can create bias'. Further, '[i]n the absence of evidence and proof of applicability of the social context information to the particulars of the case, it cannot be assumed that an individual has acted in accordance with a social trend or gender characteristic. In addition, the case law is clear that social context knowledge may not be used to determine individual credibility.' The bench book also provides a list of questions that can identify the proper or improper use of social context information.

In Supplementary Reference Chapter 5: Culture in a Domestic Violence Context, there is an extensive discussion of cultural bias. It notes that 'the first step in cultural awareness is appreciating the impact of dominant cultural identity on our own perception, values and self-identity. Individuals in dominant cultures commonly assume cultural education is unnecessary because they pride themselves in being 'colour-blind', just and equitable. It is important to realize, however, that this perspective may in fact be the result of lack of self-identification as a culturally or ethnically influenced being'. The bench book goes on to show that culture can affect judging in ways that we do not realise, and warns against cultural generalisation.

Implicit bias - Other Resources

Project Implicit, Implicit Association Test (IAT).

Project Implicit is a non-profit US based organization developed by researchers interested in implicit social cognition - thoughts and feelings outside of conscious awareness and control. The goal of the organization is to educate the public about hidden biases and to provide a “virtual laboratory” for collecting data on the Internet.

The researchers have developed the Implicit Association Test (IAT). The IAT measures attitudes and beliefs that people may be unwilling or unable to report. The IAT may be especially interesting if it shows that you have an implicit attitude that you did not know about. Their test is available on the website: https://implicit.harvard.edu/implicit/takeatest.html

It is important to note that since the development of the Implicit Association Test in the mid-1990s, numerous studies have been conducted by researchers in a range of disciplines endeavouring to gauge the accuracy and efficacy of the test. Whilst it is widely acknowledged as a useful measure of implicit bias, researchers caution that it be used as part of a multipronged measurement strategy. [Mitchell & Tetlock 2015]

Staats, Cheryl et al, ‘State of the Science: Implicit Bias Review 2015’ (Kirwan Institute for the Study of Race & Ethnicity, 2015).

On pp.4-5, there is a fact sheet debunking myths around implicit bias.

Staats, Cheryl et al, ‘State of the Science: Implicit Bias Review, 2017 Edition’ (Kirwan Institute for the Study of Race & Ethnicity, 2017).

There is an up-to-date summary of implicit bias on p 10.

Ward, Stephanie and Jeffrey Rachlinkski, ‘How can lawyers fight implicit bias?’ (podcast 34 minutes with transcript) (American Bar Association Journal, 23 January 2017).

In this podcast Stephanie Ward interviews Professor Jeffrey Rachlinski of the Cornell Law School. He holds a JD and a PhD in Psychology from Stanford University. He studies the influence of human psychology on decision-making by courts, administrative agencies, and regulated communities. In this interview he discusses a research project involving American trial judges that analysed their decision-making and measured their implicit bias. Specifically, his research measured the implicit connection judges make between African-American faces and positive or negative imagery, and white faces and positive and negative imagery. They found that the judges, like most adults, more closely associate African-American faces with negative concepts and more closely associate white faces with positive concepts.

Trauma-informed judicial practice

An important aspect of ensuring fair hearing and safety is considering the impact that experiences of trauma may have on the experience of the court process. For some victims their engagement with law enforcement agencies and the courts may exacerbate or prolong the trauma they have experienced as a result of the domestic and family violence. For example, absence of legal representation, lack of interpreter services, giving oral evidence, being cross examined, being present in the court room or court precinct with the perpetrator, or having to repeatedly return to court for mentions, adjournments and hearings may contribute to a victim's revictimisation or secondary abuse through the court system. Judicial officers should ensure, where reasonably practicable and where resources permit, that any adverse consequences associated with court processes are addressed or at least mitigated.

Many people who are victims and perpetrators of domestic and family violence have experienced trauma. Studies have indicated that people involved with the criminal justice system have high rates of personal histories of trauma [Substance Abuse and Mental Health Service Administration 2014]. Trauma is a result of the "overwhelming of coping mechanisms in response to perception or experience of extreme threat [Kezelman et al 2016]". If underlying trauma is unresolved it may cause ongoing adverse effects which may not necessarily be apparent and may include the inability to:

- cope with the normal stresses and strains of daily living;
- trust and benefit from relationships;
- manage cognitive processes, such as memory, attention, thinking;
- regulate behaviour; or
- control the expression of emotions.

Trauma may stem from a single traumatic incident or event or be complex trauma, which is cumulative from multiple, repeated interpersonal vicitmisation, causing health problems and psychosocial challenges [Salter et al 2020]. They may develop post-traumatic stress disorder ("PTSD") or complex post-traumatic stress disorder (cPTSD). People who have experienced complex trauma often have interlinked health and safety needs and frequent contact with crisis services and police. It is important to understand the behaviours of people affected by trauma as strategies or behavioural adaptations developed to cope with the physical and emotional impact of past trauma [Essential Components of Trauma-Informed Judicial Practice 2014]. Trauma is particularly prevalent among Australia's Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities and studies have shown that culture plays a significant role in how victim/survivors manage and recount their experiences of trauma [Atkinson et al 2014].

People with complex trauma may benefit from a trauma-informed approach across all support services they have contact with, including courts. Interaction with courts may re-traumatise people who have histories of trauma [Substance Abuse and Mental Health Service Administration 2014]. Alternatively, embedding trauma-informed principles and practices in court processes may contribute to feelings of wellbeing and safety.

A United States resource identifies that, at its core, trauma-informed judicial practice includes treating individuals with dignity and respect and ensuring the physical and emotional safety of participants without sacrificing security or formality of judicial proceedings [Essential Components of Trauma-Informed Judicial Practice 2014]. This resource identifies three essential components of trauma-informed judicial practice:

- Communication: trauma can influence the way individuals perceive what judges and others in authority say and how they say it. Using language which expresses concern and is less judgemental, negative and punitive has a positive effect on those effected by trauma.
- Clarity about court processes and procedures: giving individuals clear explanations of what is going to happen may alleviate fears and decrease the possibility of disruption to proceedings. Understanding what is going to happen and why helps engender a perception of physical and emotional safety in those affected by trauma.
- Safety in the courtroom environment: many courtroom practices, including the placement of participants (including for some, the experience of being restrained), the presence of victims and perpetrators in the same physical space and practices in courtrooms, including the processes of giving evidence and/or being cross-examined, may be confronting for any individual experiencing them for the first time, let alone a person who has a history of trauma.

A trauma-informed judicial officer will [Essential Components of Trauma-Informed Judicial Practice 2014]:

- provide clear explanations about what will happen to the person in the courtroom and when;
- explain why particular orders are made;
- provide information about the scheduling of matters to the greatest extent possible - what will be expected and when;

- explain why a conversation with legal representatives, is happening; and
- use language that is not threatening.

Those who work with people affected by trauma, including judicial officers, court staff and lawyers, may experience secondary, indirect or vicarious trauma [Kezelman et al 2016].

The effect of trauma on evidence/credibility

Memories associated with traumatic events and experiences, including the experience of domestic and family violence victimisation, are often fragmented, disorganised and lack coherence. [Bishop et al 2018]

Victims may remember only sensations or emotions rather than chronological details of events. They may be able to describe events with little evidence of distress or emotion and may not be able to describe how they felt at the time domestic and family violence was being perpetrated as details and emotions may be stored separately from each other. When intentionally recalled, as when interviewed by police or in court, recounting may be disorganised, with variability and errors in recall across time. Very intense emotional experiences may lead to distorted memories and amnesia, meaning witnesses cannot give a coherent narrative of a traumatic event or experience.

The experience of giving evidence may itself trigger a traumatic flashback, causing a witness to become confused or disorientated. They may consequently become anxious, forget where they are momentarily or be unable to understand or answer questions.

Such witnesses may be perceived to lack credibility and reliability. An understanding of the impact of trauma on memory and witness responses may ameliorate the impact of this on perceptions of witness credibility and reliability. The use of special witness provisions may also help to ameliorate the impact of trauma on witnesses, in particular by ensuring that witnesses perceive that the court prioritises their safety.

Trauma-informed judicial practice - Key Literature

Australia

Atkinson, J., Nelson, J., Brooks, R., Atkinson, C., and Ryan, K. (2014). Addressing individual and community transgenerational trauma. In P. Dudgeon, H. Milroy, & R. Walker (Eds.), Working together: Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander mental health and wellbeing principles and practice (2nd ed.). Canberra, ACT: Attorney-General's Department.

This chapter provides further insights into trauma as cause and effect, which may manifest within and across generations, resulting in physical, mental, emotional, spiritual, and social distress for the individuals involved and beyond. Although trauma not only affects members of particular racial, cultural, religious, or socio-economic groups, it is well-established that Australia's disadvantaged and isolated communities experience the most trauma-related behaviours and attitudes. The result of colonisation, combined with recent government policies and practices, have led to the traumatisation of many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders. In particular, the chapter explains how culture plays a significant role in how victim/survivors manage and recount their experiences of trauma. A coordinated approach should incorporate all the services and supports necessary to help individuals, families and communities enhance their physical, social, spiritual, cultural and emotional wellbeing. Practice shows that approaches founded on Aboriginal culture and Western health and healing practices, such as neuroscience, are likely to support the healing and recovery process. Evidence also suggests that an ecological approach, which takes into account every system that adversely affects an individual and community situation, is more effective than a separation of services. The authors argue that well-resourced and appropriately-qualified trauma-specific services are critical to improve current levels of mental health and social and emotional wellbeing.

Bevis, M., Atkinson, J., McCarthy, L., and Sweet, M. (2020).Kungas' trauma experiences and effects on behaviour in Central Australia (Research report, 03/2020). Sydney, NSW: ANROWS.

Kungas' trauma experiences and effects on behaviour in Central Australia is a pilot project operating under the Kunga Stopping Violence Program (KSVP), based in Alice Springs. The project aims to encourage Aboriginal women who are clients of the KSVP to provide insights into life events that led to their incarceration. It is theorised that the majority of Aboriginal women incarcerated for violent crime have a potential diagnosis of complex trauma. It was found that the women had experienced several life stressors, many of which involved early childhood abuse, and which contributed to the continuation of their victimisation and offending, as well as to their resilience under extreme circumstances (p 5). The causes and results of trauma were felt across generations: "the outcome of violence may be traumatic (cause), and the response to trauma may result in behaviour which continues the cycle (effect)". The women recounted frequent memories and flashbacks of being unsafe, which may lead to future alcohol and drug use and an inability to communicate fear, anxiety and despair. Many of the women also came from disrupted mother-child, family and community relationships. This included witnessing parental or community violence, bullying, homelessness and deaths of family members (p 6). The women detailed their experiences of discrimination and judgment from police, as well as in the court and prison systems. There is also a serious communication disconnect. The majority of women in the KSVP speak a local Aboriginal language, whereas most services (police, legal services, service providers and corrective services) are dominated by English speakers (p 7).

According to the women, KSVP staff and stakeholders, the KSVP plays an important role in listening to and supporting the women via an "educaring" approach in a four-week course and through the provision of support while the women were in prison and on release. Educaring is a "trauma- specific blend of Aboriginal traditional healing activities and Western therapeutic processes. It uses experiential learning to enable participants to explore their individual and community transgenerational trauma". An educaring and relational approach facilitates listening to the women’s experiences and needs, working with them after prison, and advocating for them. Furthermore, local Aboriginal women are employed as the KSVP case managers (p 8).

Douglas, Heather, ‘Domestic and Family Violence, Mental Health and Well-Being, and Legal Engagement’ (2018) 25(3) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 341-356.

This article draws from interviews with a group of diverse women who have engaged with the legal system after experiencing domestic and family violence (DFV). The study sought to investigate how women’s experiences of legal processes ‘affected their mental health and well-being’ (p 1). Almost all the women experienced some type of mental health issue directly attributable to DFV (p 5). Many women engaged preventative measures prior to attending court, including pre-court counselling, contacting mental health practitioners, and taking prescribed medication (p 2). Other women self-medicated and avoided seeking help fearing that proof of mental health concerns may lead to negative court outcomes (p 2). Many women highlighted attending court (pp 5-6), having to face the perpetrator in court (pp 6-8), and giving evidence (pp 8-9) as negatively affecting their mental health (p 10). A number of suggestions are made for improving women's experiences in court, including:

- minimising the frequency with which victims are required to attend court (p 10);
- allowing women to give evidence remotely (p 10);
- minimising contact between the victim and abuser, through ensuring there are safe waiting spaces (p 10), and staggering attendance and departure times of the parties (p 11);
- providing effective training to court personnel regarding the dynamics of DFV (p 11); and
- ensuring cross-examination, and legal proceedings in general, are not misused by the abuser (p 11).

Kezelman, C, and Stavropoulos, P, Trauma and the Law: Applying Trauma-informed Practice to Legal and Judicial Contexts (2016, Blue Knot Foundation)

There is evidence that demonstrates that "more effective, fair, intelligent, and just legal responses must work from a perspective which is trauma-informed". The paper identifies the following principles of trauma-informed practice:

1. Basic understanding of how stress affects the brain and body;
2. Consistently focussing on "safety, trustworthiness, choice, collaboration and empowerment", how a service is delivered, and the client's experience rather than trying to identify any fault in them;
3. Recognising that adverse behaviour may be the result of an ability or inability to deal with, and to try to protect oneself against, negative experiences. If the effects of trauma are not considered, behaviour is frequently and incorrectly seen as 'pathological', rather than personal adjustments to deal with the vagaries of life;
4. A 'strengths-based' approach which takes into account people's capabilities, despite the fact that they may be hard-pressed to cope with extremely difficult circumstances.

Implementing these principles has many advantages. Positive experiences with other people have been found to help restore the disruption which trauma causes to the human nervous system, and to improve overall wellbeing. Trauma-informed practice also assists in lessening arousal and minimising stress for victims, witnesses, defendants and legal personnel who engage with them. Trauma-informed principles recognise the disruptive effects that stress has on a traumatised person's ability to recount their experience coherently such that their testimony can often appear unreliable, and further, they facilitate formulation of policies and development of strategies designed to help people interact with others in a manner which is both stable and safe. Therefore, testimony can be given in an environment which minimises further stress, the risk of re-traumatisation can be reduced and a person's account may be more consistent and perceived as more reliable.

Salter, M., Conroy, E., Dragiewicz, M., Burke, J., Ussher, J., Middleton, W., Vilenica, S., Martin Monzon, B., & Noack-Lundberg, K., "A deep wound under my heart": Constructions of complex trauma and implications for women's wellbeing and safety from violence (Research report, 12/2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

Complex trauma refers to multiple, repeated forms of interpersonal victimisation and the resulting health problems and psychosocial challenges. Women with experiences of complex trauma are a significant but overlooked group of victims and survivors of gender-based violence in Australia. They often have interlinked health and safety needs, and are frequently in contact with crisis services and police. This research identifies the core principles of trauma-informed care (p27 Report):

- Ensuring a safe environment for clients and service providers;
- Promoting interpersonal relationships;
- Cultural awareness and knowledge;
- Supporting consumer control, choice, and autonomy;
- Understanding trauma and its impact;
- Sharing power, inspiring hope, and supporting recovery;
- Integrating different healthcare services;
- Sharing power and governance.

International

Bishop, C and Bettinson, V, Evidencing domestic violence, including behaviour that falls under the new offence of "Controlling or coercive behaviour" (2018) 22(1) The International Journal of Evidence & Proof 2-29

Memories associated with traumatic events and experiences, including the experience of domestic and family violence victimisation, are fragmented, disorganised and lack coherence.

Victims may remember only sensations or emotions rather than chronological details of events. They may be able to describe events with little evidence of distress or emotion and may not be able to describe how they felt at the time of the attack as details and emotions may be stored separately from each other. When intentionally recalled, as when interviewed by police or in court, recount may be disorganised, with variability and errors in recall across time. Very intense emotional experiences may lead to distorted memories and amnesia, meaning witnesses cannot give a coherent narrative of a traumatic event or experience.

The experience of giving evidence may itself trigger a traumatic flashback, causing a witness to become confused or disorientated. They may consequently become anxious, forget where they are momentarily or be unable to understand or answer questions.

Such witnesses may be perceived to lack witness credibility and reliability. An understanding of the impact of trauma on memory and witness responses may ameliorate the impact of this on perceptions of witness credibility and reliability.

Elliott, D. E., Bjelajac, P., Fallot, R. D., Markoff, L. S., and Reed, B. G., 'Trauma-informed or trauma-denied: Principles and implementation of trauma-informed services for women' (2005) 33(4) Journal of Community Psychology 461-477.

The article highlights the importance of providing trauma-informed services, namely, "those in which service delivery is influenced by an understanding of the impact of interpersonal violence and victimisation on an individual's life and development". The authors argue that trauma-informed services are more effective for and accessible to survivors. Effective trauma-informed service delivery requires a coordinated approach, where all staff (from receptionists to direct care workers) understand how violence affects people's lives, so that each interaction is consistent with the advancement of the recovery process and minimises potential re-traumatisation. Ten principles are identified, reflecting the values and practices that define a trauma-informed service organisation. The authors submit that trauma-informed services:

1. Recognise the impact of violence and victimisation on development and coping strategies (p 465);
2. Identify trauma recovery as a main goal (p 465);
3. Use an empowerment model by facilitating a client's ability to take control over her actions (p 465);
4. Aim to maximise a woman's choices and control over her recovery (p 466);
5. Are founded in a relational collaboration (p 466);
6. Create an environment that is mindful of survivors' need for safety, respect and acceptance (p 467);
7. Emphasise women's strengths and recognise symptoms as deriving from adaptations to traumatic events, which, in turn, reduces a client's guilt and shame, increases self-esteem and provides guidance for developing new skills (p 467);
8. Aim to minimise potential re-traumatisation (p 467);
9. Aim to be culturally aware and to understand every woman in light of her life experiences and cultural upbringing (p 468);
10. Encourage women to be involved in designing treatment services and the ongoing evaluation of those services (p 469).

Epstein, Deborah, and Lisa A Goodman, 'Discounting Credibility: Doubting the Testimony and Dismissing the Experiences of Domestic Violence Survivors and Other Women' (2018) 167 (2) University of Pennsylvania Law Review 399-461

This article addresses the ways in which the credibility of female victims of intimate partner violence is discounted through their experiences of legal and social services (pp 3-4). The authors conclude that women's experiences are frequently discounted, which itself can have further traumatic impacts.

Judges and other professionals often discount women's stories of abuse as implausible, particularly where the victims suffer from psychological trauma that may impact memory and comprehension (p 7). Women who suffer traumatic brain injuries (pp 9-11) or PTSD (pp 11-3) as a result of domestic violence are particularly susceptible to relaying inconsistent stories. The authors also find that cultural assumptions resulting in the prioritisation of physical over psychological violence causes judges and other authority figures to expect 'real' survivors to also prioritise physical harm, while in reality, victims may feel more significantly impacted by psychological abuse (pp 17-20).

Moreover, the results of the study indicate that gatekeepers often unjustly discount women's personal trustworthiness, based on perceptions of their demeanour (pp 21-5), their perceived motive (pp 25-32), and their social location (pp 32-7). Even women who are able to overcome initial scepticism often find that the systems intended to provide assistance dismiss the importance of their experiences (p 37). In spite of meaningful progress, 'the criminal justice system continues to discount important aspects of women's experiences and to trivialize some of the harmful consequences that policies focused primarily on offender accountability often impose on survivors' (p 38). Ultimately, 'the arbiters of justice and social welfare adopt and enforce legal and social policies and practices with little regard for how they perpetuate patterns of abuse' (p 1).

These experiences of minimisation often echo women's previous experiences of abuse (p 46). The impacts of this discrediting are multifaceted: the dismissal itself constitutes its own injury, which can compound the harm such women experience directly from the abuse (pp 47-50); additionally, this instinctive devaluing of women's testimony becomes an independent obstacle to attempts to obtain safety and justice (pp 50-2). The authors conclude that credibility discounting is widespread and pervasive, and requires genuine institutional reform (p 59). Particularly, actors must be aware of these internalised assumptions, and seek to engage more openly with victims (see pp 54-6).

Franklin, C. A., Garza, A. D., Goodson, A., & Bouffard, L. A., Trauma Informed Training & Police Perceptions of Victim Behaviors (2019) Crime Victims Institute and Texas State University.

This paper considers previous research which has shown that as a consequence of PTSD, survivors may present with restricted affect, emotional numbing, and avoidance of eye contact. Disjointed recollection has also been a common consequence of PTSD. Oftentimes, the memory encoding process is disrupted during traumatic experiences, which can result in amnesia or fragmented memories. This can be contrasted to stereotypical understandings of trauma response, such as emotional expressiveness, hysteria, timely reporting, and linear recollections.

This study compared responses of police who have not received trauma-informed training with those who had. Police personnel in this study who had not received training endorsed attributions that support stereotypical trauma response. Endorsing these attributions has the potential to exacerbate secondary victimization among survivors and aggravate case attrition.

Police officers who had participated in the trauma-informed training reported significantly decreased levels of trauma misperceptions as compared to police officers in the pre-training sample.

Katirai, N 2020, 'Retraumatized in Court', Arizona Law Review, vol. 62, no. 1, pp. 81–124.

US based research. Abstract: In addition to the indignities associated with the violence itself, intimate partner violence survivors very often risk being retraumatized when trying to access the justice system. While the "me too" movement has shed light on how survivors of sexual assault and harassment often experience victim-blaming and other types of retraumatization when they try to tell their stories, few legal scholars have written about the retraumatization that occurs when survivors of intimate partner violence attempt to seek help through the courts. This retraumatization risk presents a barrier to effective justice: it has a chilling effect on the criminal prosecutions of domestic violence crimes; and it deters civil domestic relations and dependency actions, including child custody trials. This Article details how courts are implicated in retraumatization and is the first to propose cross-cultural communication to improve the quality of justice for survivors of intimate partner violence. Adequate justice requires combatting an institutional culture that all too frequently trivializes the impacts of intimate partner violence. While adapting the legal process to address this problem is a long-term task, the focus of this Article is to lay out more immediate strategies for advocates of survivors of intimate partner violence to improve the experience of their clients. Key to this urgent endeavour are: (1) employing "habits" of cross-cultural communication to better prepare our clients for how retraumatizing the legal system can be and (2) expanding the services provided by legal services organizations, including law school clinics, to include supportive services such as case management and counseling.

Reeves, E., 'A Synthesis of the Literature on Trauma-Informed Care' (2015) 36(9) Issues in Mental Health Nursing 698-709.

This literature review provides an overview of the existing research on trauma-informed care for survivors of physical and sexual abuse, and closely examines concepts including, inter alia, trauma screening, patient disclosure, provider-patient relationships, minimising distress and maximising autonomy, and trauma-informed care in diverse settings. The development and widespread implementation of trauma-informed care that is sensitive to a patient's individual needs is crucially important, given that the healthcare system may re-traumatise those with a history of traumatic life events. Patients who present at Emergency Departments are often not asked whether they have experienced traumatic life events by service providers. This highlights a missed opportunity to provide trauma-informed care and referrals to women at a high risk for past and present abuse and for whom the hospital is an entry-point into the healthcare system. Current trauma screening methods may also impede patient disclosure, and some victims have reported being dismissed or belittled by healthcare providers or made to feel that they were not believed.

Trauma-informed care requires that providers identify and work against power imbalances in provider-patient relationships (p 701). Minimising patient distress and maximising patient autonomy may guide healthcare decision-making. Patient distress can be appropriately managed or minimised if providers have a strong knowledge of trauma symptoms, limit unnecessary procedures, obtain patient consent to perform or continue procedures, and are flexible in service delivery by checking that patients feel comfortable and pausing or stopping procedures when they feel overwhelmed. Patients may feel more autonomous and empowered when service providers acknowledge and respect their agency in making healthcare decisions and their willingness to participate. Female survivors also felt more comfortable when they were allowed to bring a support person to medical appointments (p 702). Further, trauma survivors can benefit from appropriate referrals to other necessary services, such as addiction counselling or trauma-specific therapy (p 703).

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Service Administration, Concept of Trauma and Guidance for a Trauma-Informed Approach. 2014 (US)

This resource provides general guidance for a trauma-informed response. It describes individual trauma as resulting from an event, series of events or set of circumstances that is experienced by an individual as physically or emotionally harmful or life threatening and that has lasting effects on the individual's functioning and mental, physical, social, emotional, or spiritual well-being.

It identifies three Es of trauma:

- Events (actual or threat of harm- physical/ psychological), single or repeated occurrence.
- Experience: ‘The individual’s experience of these events or circumstances helps to determine whether it is a traumatic event. A particular event may be experienced as traumatic for one individual and not for another.’
- Effects: short or long lasting / adverse effects. Connection between effect and trauma may not be clear, or understood by the person who is traumatised. ‘[A]dverse effects include an inability to cope with the normal stresses and strains of daily living; to trust and benefit from relationships; to manage cognitive processes, such as memory, attention, thinking; to regulate behavior; or to control the expression of emotions. In addition to these more visible effects, there may be an altering of one’s neurobiological make-up and ongoing health and well-being.’

This paper then outlines six principles fundamental to trauma-informed approaches:

- Safety – prioritise safety as defined by those the organisation serve; all staff and the people they serve feel physically and psychologically safe;
- Trustworthiness and transparency – transparent operations and decisions with the aim of building and maintaining trust with all participants;
- Peer support and mutual self-help – "key vehicles for establishing safety and hope, building trust, enhancing collaboration, and utilizing their stories and lived experience to promote recovery and healing";
- Collaboration and mutuality – recognition that everyone has a role to play, "healing happens in relationships and in the meaningful sharing of power and decision-making;
- Empowerment, voice, and choice – "workforce development and services are organised to foster empowerment for staff and clients alike"; "staff are facilitators of recovery rather than controllers of recovery";
- Cultural, historical, and gender issues – "The organization actively moves past cultural stereotypes and biases (e.g. based on race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, age, religion, gender-identity, geography, etc.); offers, access to gender responsive services; leverages the healing value of traditional cultural connections; incorporates policies, protocols, and processes that are responsive to the racial, ethnic and cultural needs of individuals served; and recognizes and addresses historical trauma". (p11)

Guidance is provided for implementing a trauma-informed approach, with specific attention drawn to ten implementation domains:

- Governance and leadership – support and investment in implementing and sustaining a trauma-informed approach, an identified point of responsibility for this and inclusion of the peer voice;
- Policy – written policies and protocols reflecting trauma-informed principles;
- Physical environment – promotes a sense of safety and collaboration, experienced as safe, inviting, not a risk to physical or psychological safety; supports collaboration through openness, transparency and shared spaces;
- Engagement and involvement – of people in recovery, trauma survivors, people receiving services and family members receiving services;
- Cross-sector collaboration – people with significant trauma histories often have complex needs;
- Screening, assessment, treatment services – practitioners use and are trained in interventions based on best available evidence and science, culturally appropriate and reflect principles of a trauma-informed approach; referrals connect individuals with appropriate trauma treatment;
- Training and workforce development – ongoing training and peer support, procedures to support staff with trauma histories and/or significant secondary traumatic stress or vicarious trauma;
- Progress monitoring and quality assurance – ongoing assessment, tracking and monitoring and effective use of evidence-based trauma specific screening, assessments and treatment;
- Financing – including resources for staff training on trauma and trauma-informed approach, appropriate and safe facilities, peer support, evidence-supported trauma screening, assessment, treatment and recovery supports, development of cross-agency collaborations;
- Evaluation – evaluation design reflects an understanding of trauma and appropriate research instruments.

Communities that respond to individual trauma with understanding and self-determination may facilitate healing and recovery for traumatised individuals. Communities as a whole may experience trauma, which may be transmitted from generation to generation in a pattern of historical, community or intergenerational trauma. Telling the story of the trauma experience using the language and framework of the community is an important step towards healing community trauma.

Substance Abuse and Mental Health Service Administration, Essential Components of Trauma-Informed Judicial Practice (2014).

This paper provides information, specific strategies, and resources that many treatment court judges have found beneficial (in US). It provides a list of physical court environment 'triggers' that may cause certain responses in trauma survivors. It suggests a series of communication and court management strategies (p8) to help reduce the traumatic experiences often associated with going to court. Strategies include:

- Providing clear explanations about what will happen to the person in the courtroom and when.
- Explaining why particular orders are made.
- Providing information about the scheduling of matters to the greatest extent possible - what will be expected and when.
- Where the court has conversation with legal representatives, explain why this is happening.

This paper also provides helpful suggestions about how to use language that does not retraumatise (p4).

Swanson Ernst, Joy and Tina Maschi, 'Trauma-informed care and elder abuse: a synergistic alliance' (2018) 30(5) Journal of Elder Abuse & Neglect 354-367.

This article provides a comprehensive analysis of elder abuse - a problem in which one or more traumatic or stressful life experience directly affect older adults, their families and communities. The authors detail the principles and practices of trauma-informed care and how it can form a synergistic alliance with the prevention and intervention efforts across the life course. The authors identify six guiding principles for trauma-informed care (TIC). These principles are:

1. Safety: throughout the organization staff and the people they service feel physically and psychologically safe;
2. Trustworthiness and transparency: organizational operations and decisions are conducted with openness and the goal of building and maintaining trust among staff, clients, and family members of those receiving services.
3. Peer support and mutual self-help: Empowering older adults to help one another when feasible may be an important ingredient moving them from victim to survivor status.

4. Collaboration and mutuality: recognizing that healing happens in relationships and in the meaningful sharing of power and decision making and everyone has a role to play in the healing process.
5. Empowerment, voice, and choice: organization recognizes, builds on, and validates individuals' strengths and assists in development of new skills as necessary.
6. Cultural, historical, and gender issues: incorporation of cultural, historical, and gender issues into an organization's practice means that the agency moves beyond cultural stereotypes and biases.

Trauma-informed judicial practice - Other Resources

Australia

Merrin Wake, Understanding the impact of trauma (Webinar).

This webinar explains trauma informed care and practice for judicial officers.

International

Antonia Porter, In their words: domestic abuse support workers reflect on criminal justice and supporting survivors to thrive, Scriberia on Vimeo (2020)

This short animation outlines some of the findings in relation to encouraging trauma informed lawyering from Chapter 6 of Antonia Porter's book Prosecuting Domestic Abuse in Neoliberal Times: Amplifying the Survivor's Voice, Palgrave Socio-Legal Studies, Palgrave Macmillan (2020).

Trauma-informed judicial practice - Cases

James v James No 3 [2020] NSWDC 797 (16 November 2020) – New South Wales District Court

The court noted that the plaintiff's ongoing psychiatric problems would have a continuing impact on her (including her earning capacity) and that the avoidance of a trial would minimise trauma to the plaintiff (at [29]):

> "When this case is finished no doubt she can try to put the events of the past behind her and try to get on with her life. Not having to relive the events by coming to Court and telling the Court of them will no doubt assist in her recovery".

R v Ney [2011] QSC Indictment No 597 of 2008 (8 March 2011) sentence - unreported – Queensland Supreme Court

In sentencing Ney, Dick AJ referred to the reports of a psychologist (Dr Sundin) and a psychiatrist (Associate Professor Carolyn Quadrio):

'As you know, I have been given a number of psychiatric and psychological reports. The prosecution tendered the report of Dr Josephine Sundin. Dr Sundin has come to the opinion that as a result of the multiple traumas you have suffered in your life since your young teenage years and the series of violent intimate relationships that you have endured since that time, and the fact that you have suffered physical, sexual and psychological abuse over a long period of time, you suffer chronic post-traumatic stress disorder and borderline personality disorder.

The connection between those two matters is explained in her report and in other reports. Associate Professor Carolyn Quadrio, spells it out in her addendum report. She said, "Trauma and abuse have profound effects on mental processes and on psycho-social and psychological functions so that a disorganisation of personality occurs and leads to lasting disorder. Similarly, substance abuse which commonly develops in the context of adolescent trauma, also has a profound effect on mental and psycho-social processes and secondly, incapacitates the person so they are rendered highly vulnerable to further traumas and abuse thus creating a vicious cycle…

I have been assisted by the addendum report of Associate Professor Quadrio where she says that, "At times, however, she returned when she may have been able to escape because she experienced him as someone who loved her. This is explained as traumatic attachment relationship. Further it is also the case that in chronic or complex post-traumatic stress disorder there is both paralysis of initiative whereby the person is greatly compromised in her capacity to take action and there are alterations in perception so they have difficulty perceiving themselves accurately or others and thus in perceiving the true nature of the relationship with an abuser."

Later on she says, "If this psycho physiological disturbance is sustained over time and especially when it occurs in the crucial development years of childhood and adolescence, it eventually leads to disorganisation of personality, sustained hyper vigilance and hyper reactivity become chronic and irreversible."

Further on, "The inability to leave can be explained, partly, as a manifestation of personality disturbance but it is also the case that in domestic violence a woman feels trapped and unable to leave and knows it is not safe to leave so she remains captive and experiences more abuse and trauma and undergoes more personality disorganisation."

I have also noted from the report of Associate Professor Quadrio that those matters which are described as chronic or complex PTSD personality disorder with poly substance dependence or abuse, she says, "These disturbances reflected a lifetime of trauma, a highly chaotic and unsustainable lifestyle and both past and present intimate partner violence."

R v RT (No 2)* [2020] QDC 158 (13 July 2020) – Queensland District Court

The defendant argued that there were:

> [39] a constellation of features inconsistent with [the complainant's] account being truthful. These included her demeanour when speaking to police that night, her failure to immediately mention being choked and her preparedness to remain living at the house and tell the Doctor she felt safe.

The judge held that:

> [39] The first and last of these matters do not in my view undermine the credit of the complainant. We are far past the days where the law expected an immediate and uncontrolled emotional reaction to an assault, and adversely viewed the credit of those who did not behave as expected. And, as noted above, staying in the house is understandable for other reasons.

Tatnell v Tasmania* [2020] TASCCA 13 (7 August 2020) – Tasmanian Court of Criminal Appeal

On the inconsistency between the complainant's evidence and prior statements made to police, at [29]-[32]:

> "When challenged about various inconsistencies between her evidence and her police statement in cross-examination, the complainant's response was, in summary, that when she made her statement to police, she was still traumatised as a result of the events at the house. She noted that she had been assaulted by the appellant, and found the whole process of giving the statement stressful. She agreed that she had signed the statutory declaration but said that "it was just quite late at night and I just wanted to go home". When counsel challenged her about having had the chance to read the document through before signing it, she said: "Well, I assumed the things that I put across were correctly documented. I'd just been through a horrible ordeal. I just wanted to get out of there and get home".
>
> When asked why she purported to have a better memory now than at the relevant time, she said that she had had time to refocus and she has "remembered a lot more".
>
> In my opinion, there is nothing improbable or unreasonable about the complainant's explanation of the inconsistencies when challenged in cross examination about them. In respect of the police statement, her answers were consistent with the objective evidence, that is her statement was made within hours of what she claimed was a traumatic and violent attack on her. She is not a trained witness and it is entirely understandable that, when interviewed by the police, she may not have been capable of describing the events which had just taken place, sequentially and with precision, particularly when she was likely to be emotionally and psychologically affected by the relevant events. Further, although the statement was made in the form of a statutory declaration, the circumstances in which it was made can be distinguished from the formal and dispassionate environment of the court. It can be more readily accepted that a witness giving a version to police may not exercise the same care as to accuracy of detail as can be expected from sworn evidence in court. Finally, evidence in court is given after an opportunity for reflection, and hence can be expected to differ, particularly in respect of matters of detail and sequence, from a version given at an earlier time. This does not necessarily mean that the evidence in court is less reliable. Of course, it is possible that the reliability of the testimony in court might be adversely affected by innocent or deliberate > reconstruction, but it can also be expected that dispassionate and honest reflection will bring to mind details overlooked in the initial statement and clarify aspects of the witness's recollection of the relevant events."

R v Margolis [2021] VSC 341 (15 June 2021) – Victorian Supreme Court

As to Verdins principles, Beale J stated:

[54] Dr Zimmerman found that you have a borderline personality disorder and long-term PTSD. Associate Professor Carroll found that you have a severe personality disorder and long-term PTSD, both conditions commencing in your teens and likely to be permanent.

[55] I accept the findings of Associate Professor Carroll that you have a severe personality disorder and long-term PTSD. Neither diagnosis was disputed by the prosecution. I find that your mental health problems enliven principles 1, 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the well-known case of R v Verdins. In other words, your moral culpability is somewhat reduced by your mental health issues, which I find contributed causally to the commission of the offence. Because of your entrenched mental health issues, you are not an appropriate medium for giving full effect to general and specific deterrence. Although it seems you are currently feeling well supported by the prison mental health services, it is also likely that the substantial prison term which I must impose on you will exacerbate your mental health issues and make jail harder for you than for prisoners who do not have such issues.

Evidence issues

The following sections of this bench book consider some evidence related issues in certain contexts:

Chapter 5 Fair hearing and safety

- 5.2. Victim experience of court processes
- 5.4. Legal representation and self-represented litigants

Chapter 7 Protection orders

- 7.2.1. Cross-examination

Chapter 9 Responses in criminal proceedings

- 9.2.1. Relationship, context, tendency and coincidence evidence
- 9.2.2. Expert or opinion evidence
- 9.2.3. Vulnerable or special witnesses

Chapter 10 Family law proceedings

- 10.3. Court and case management
  - 10.3.1. Child-related proceedings
  - 10.3.2. Cross-examination
  - 10.3.3. Self-represented litigants
- 10.4. Family consultants and expert witnesses
- 10.5. Information sharing
- 10.6. Unacceptable risk and best interests

Protection orders

Note: a general list of sources relevant to protection orders is included in the Key Literature and Other Resources tabs for subsections 7.1, 7.2, 7.4, 7.6, 7.7 and 7.10 as there is significant overlap.

Protection orders - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

LawAccess NSW and Legal Aid NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence

- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Protection orders - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Angelina

Anna

Barbara

Ben

Bianca

Brenda

Carol

Cassy

Celia

Celina

Erin

Faith

Felicity

Fiona

Francis

Gillian

Hilary

Ingrid

Jennifer

Julia

Leah

Leyla

Lisa

Melissa

Rosa

Sally

Sandra

Sara

Trisha

Yvonne

Purpose

Under the National Domestic Violence Order Scheme, protection orders made in any Australian jurisdiction on or after 25 November 2017 are automatically recognised and enforceable nationally.

Protection orders made before 25 November 2017 (except Victorian protection orders and New Zealand protection orders registered in Victoria, which are recognised retrospectively) are not automatically recognised and enforceable in other jurisdictions. All jurisdictions have legislation to enable protection orders made before 25 November 2017 to become nationally recognised by being 'declared' as a protection order recognised under the scheme. The protected person may apply to any local court in Australia for such a declaration.

Key points:

- Civil protection orders can supplement criminal justice interventions or provide a remedy where criminal law may not apply, including where the risk is of future abuse or where abusive behaviour does not include physical violence.
- Victims may struggle to adequately present clear written narrative or oral evidence of abuse, particularly where applications are not made on their behalf by police.
- The paramount consideration should be the safety and protection of the victim and other protected people.

All Australian states and territories have a statutory regime [FLC 2015] that provides for the making of civil protection orders to protect victims and other protected people [Jeffries et al 2013] from further domestic and family violence, and to promote the accountability of perpetrators for their actions (see table below). Protection orders are available in a range of situations, including emergencies; and they can supplement criminal justice interventions or provide a remedy where the criminal law does not apply, for example in the event of the future likelihood of domestic and family violence [Dowling et al 2018] or where the abusive behaviour experienced by the victim has not included physical violence and is coercive and controlling in nature [Fitzgerald & Douglas 2019]. All protection order legislation in Australia has some provision for the making of a protection order in circumstances where the abusive behaviour experienced by the victim has not included physical violence

(see s8 Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT), ss 7 and 8 Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW), s 5 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT), s 8 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld); s 8 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA); s 7 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas); s 5 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic); Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic); s 5A Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA)).

A person may be subject to a protection order in a number of ways, depending on the legislation applicable in the particular jurisdiction: a victim may apply to the court for an order; the police may apply to the court for an order on the victim's behalf; and in some jurisdictions the police may issue an order in their own right without court approval [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]. Increasingly, after a shift in policing practices under policy reforms, in a number of Australian jurisdictions most protection orders are now initiated by police rather than an individual victim. In Queensland in 2016-17 73.4% of DVO applications were lodged by police and Queensland research has shown that where a protection order applicant is a police officer 90% of applications are successful (as opposed to 26-56% of applications where the aggrieved is the applicant) [Fitzgerald & Douglas 2019].

Section 3.1 and Section 3.2 of this bench book set out examples of behaviour or threatened behaviour that may be understood as domestic and family violence, and section 4 sets out a range of factors that may be relevant in making protection orders in a particular case. These include factors affecting risk and the vulnerabilities of the parties to the proceedings. The paramount consideration should be the safety and protection of the victim and other protected people. As a protection order is a civil order, the court must apply the civil standard of proof in considering the evidence, although the more serious the allegation the more cogent the evidence should be.

A protection order will have implications for the perpetrator and, depending on the circumstances and the jurisdiction, it may affect contact time and arrangements to see their children, family law proceedings, access to or licensing of firearms and/or explosives, and employment (eg where it involves children or the use of a firearm and/or explosives).

Jurisdiction	Relevant legislation	Commonly-issued orders
Australian Capital Territory	Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)	family violence order
New South Wales	Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)	apprehended domestic violence order
Northern Territory	Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT)	domestic violence order

Queensland	Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld)	domestic violence order
South Australia	Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)	intervention order
Tasmania	Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas)	family violence order
Victoria	Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic)	family violence intervention order
Western Australia	Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA)	family violence restraining order

Purpose - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney General Department (Cth) (2015) Family Law Council Report to the Attorney-General on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems: Interim Report – June 2015 (Terms 1 & 2).

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 368-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-480). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Dowling, Christopher, Anthony Morgan, Shann Hulme, Matthew Manning and Gabriel Wong, Protection orders for domestic violence: A systematic review (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 551 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Protection orders are a common legal response to domestic violence which aim to prevent further re-victimisation by the perpetrator.

The current study systematically reviews research into the use and impact of protection orders, using the EMMIE framework (Effectiveness, Mechanisms, Moderators, Implementation and Economy).

Meta-analysis is used to examine the overall effect of protection orders, while narrative synthesis is used to examine the underlying mechanisms and moderators of their effectiveness, their implementation and economic viability.

Protection orders are associated with a small but significant reduction in domestic violence. They appear to be more effective under certain circumstances, including when the victim has fewer ties to the perpetrator and a greater capacity for independence, and less effective for offenders with a history of crime, violence and mental health issues.

Fitzgerald ,Robin and Heather Douglas, The Whole Story: The Dilemma of the Domestic Violence Protection Order Narrative, The British Journal of Criminology, Volume 60, Issue 1, January 2020, Pages 180–197, https://doi.org/10.1093/bjc/azz043.

This article examines the role the quality of narratives of victim experiences of domestic and family violence prepared in support of applications for protection orders plays in the success of protection order applications. It found that where victims prepare their own narrative accounts of their experiences of domestic and family violence in support of their applications for protection orders a lack of structure and quality is correlated with a lack of success in obtaining a protection order:

“Our study shows that the way the narrative is constructed influences the results of the application, with success much more strongly associated with applications prepared by police.”

Gelb, Karen, ‘Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates’ Court of Victoria’ (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates’ Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, ‘to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident’ (p 40). Gelb notes that, ‘The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

Meyer, Silke & Rose Stambe (2022) Increasing compliance with domestic violence protection orders: investing in perpetrator education and support as an investment in victim and family safety, Policing and Society, 32:9, 1071-1086, DOI:10.1080/10439463.2021.2016756

Abstract: Domestic Violence (DV) is a persistent public health issue of global proportions affecting an estimated one in four women worldwide. Civil protection orders or domestic violence orders (DVO) are a legal tool used in many jurisdictions, including Australia, to hold the alleged perpetrators accountable and improve the safety of victims. However, the research on the effectiveness of these orders are mixed and perpetrator non-compliance with such orders continues to be a concern. Few studies examine the situational factors that impact compliance with orders, especially in relation to service engagement and support needs of perpetrators of DV during and beyond the protection order court process. Our study uses focus group data to explore the perceptions of police officers (n = 16) and prosecutors (n = 3) involved in policing and prosecuting DV and the compliance with relevant protection orders in two court districts in Queensland, Australia. Alleged perpetrators' comprehension of their order conditions and intersecting experiences of social disadvantage and complex needs emerged as key factors influencing compliance, along with the role of timely engagement with alleged perpetrators during the court process to maximise respondent comprehension of order conditions and engagement with available and relevant support services. In concluding, we highlight the importance of protective and preventive aspects of the DVO process that combine holistic wraparound support with perpetrator accountability in order to maximise perpetrator compliance and thus victim and family safety.

Reeves, E. 'I'm Not at All Protected and I Think Other Women Should Know That, That They're Not Protected Either': Victim–Survivors' Experiences of 'Misidentification' in Victoria's Family Violence System. (2021) 10 (4) International Journal for Crime, Justice and Social Democracy 39-51.

This article explores the impacts of misidentification on the lives of women victim–survivors of family violence in Victoria (Australia. Using data from interviews with 32 system stakeholders and survey responses from 11 women who have experienced misidentification in Victoria, this study explores misidentification within the family violence intervention order system. It demonstrates that being misidentified as a predominant aggressor on a family violence intervention order can have a significant impact on women's lives and their access to safety, highlighting the need for improved policing and court responses to the issue beyond existing reforms.

Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever – Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Several sections in this report consider issues relevant to protection orders made in Queensland. The report noted that in considering whether to make or vary a domestic violence order, magistrates have power under s 78 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) to 'revive, vary, discharge or suspend a family law order allowing contact between a respondent and child that may be restricted under the proposed Domestic Violence Order' (p 270). Of particular relevance, the report considers the use of ouster conditions at pp 297-298. Ouster conditions in domestic violence orders prohibit the respondent from remaining, entering or being within a stated distances of stated premises.

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the 'applicant experience'. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant's safety – 'To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim's recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services' (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek "further and better particulars" about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – 'A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. '(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, 'Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?' (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties' relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, 'The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making' (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, 'Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women' (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women's use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order' (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a 'helpful strategy' (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed. See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Topliffe, Elizabeth, 'Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not' (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective. Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Purpose - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20.1).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1 discusses the intervention order process. 2.2 discusses making interim and final intervention orders, and conditions of orders. 2.3 discusses changing orders.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Purpose - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW and Legal Aid NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (last reviewed 2018).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Purpose - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Jennifer

Management of application proceedings

Key points:

- A protection order application can indicate a victim's recognition that they face immediate danger and require immediate protection.
- Dealing with applications expeditiously can benefit all parties: The restrictions imposed by interim orders can cause frustration to respondents.
- Applications for adjournments, delays, cross-applications and other interim applications by respondents can indicate an intention to further harass, control or abuse the victim.
- Withdrawal of applications or consent to dismissal may indicate protective behaviour in response to victim fear of retaliation.

Where possible, judicial officers should endeavour to dispose of protection order application proceedings in a timely manner, as these proceedings are frequently stressful [Vic FVBB 2014]. A victim's application (or an application by police that a victim is willing to support) for a protection order may signify their recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending their relationship with the perpetrator. The application period may therefore be a time of heightened risk for the victim, and the victim may require immediate protection [VRCFV 2016]. Interim orders can also be a source of frustration to perpetrators; these orders are usually made on limited evidence and may impose significant restrictions on their liberty until the application is finally determined [Vic FVBB 2014]. Adjournments may be necessary to ensure that parties are afforded fair and equal access to justice. However, there may be some cases where a party delays proceedings, fails to appear, evades service, initiates applications or makes cross-applications with the intention of further harassing, controlling and abusing the victim and may be a form of systems abuse. Whether there are legitimate or questionable reasons for an adjournment, judicial officers may need to make additional interim orders or arrangements for the duration of the adjournment to ensure the safety and wellbeing of the victim and other protected people.

In some cases, a victim may withdraw their application for a protection order or consent to the dismissal of the proceedings. Sometimes the reason for this may be the victim's fear of retaliation by the perpetrator [Jordan et al 2008]. A study found that the higher the threat and the closer the victim's attachment to the perpetrator, the less likely the victim was to complete the application process [Zoellner et al 2000]. This may be alleviated if the police make the application on the victim's behalf. Another reason for the victim not completing the application process may be a perception by the victim of positive changes in the perpetrator's behaviour [Roberts et al 2008]. Courts may consider it appropriate in these circumstances to adjourn rather than dismiss the application proceedings to give the perpetrator the opportunity to sustain positive behavioural changes. Where an application has been withdrawn or dismissed, the parties should be made aware that this does not preclude a subsequent fresh application in the event that a party requires protection from further domestic and family violence. In some jurisdictions there may be a mechanism available for parties to revive and amend an earlier application rather than having to make a fresh application.

Where a victim makes an application for a protection order (rather than the police on the victim's behalf), and particularly in cases where the victim is self-represented, judicial officers should be aware of how the victim may be adversely impacted by the proceedings if, for example, they feel a responsibility to prosecute their own case, or if they feel at risk of further harm or abuse, or if they feel the abuse they've experienced is being denied or minimised or is somehow their fault. Judicial officers should, where possible, be proactive in taking steps to improve the victim's experience of court processes and minimise the risk of secondary abuse.

Management of application proceedings - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Interim report to the Attorney-General in response to the first two terms of reference on families with complex needs and the intersection of the family law and child protection systems' (2015) Family Law Council.

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 368-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-480). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Fitzgerald ,Robin and Heather Douglas, The Whole Story: The Dilemma of the Domestic Violence Protection Order Narrative, The British Journal of Criminology, Volume 60, Issue 1, January 2020, Pages 180–197, https://doi.org/10.1093/bjc/azz043.

This article examines the role the quality of narratives of victim experiences of domestic and family violence prepared in support of applications for protection orders plays in the success of protection order applications. It found that where victims prepare their own narrative accounts of their experiences of domestic and family violence in support of their applications for protection orders a lack of structure and quality is correlated with a lack of success in obtaining a protection order:

"Our study shows that the way the narrative is constructed influences the results of the application, with success much more strongly associated with applications prepared by police."

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Katzen, Hayley, 'It's a Family Matter, Not a Police Matter: The Enforcement of Protection Orders' (2000) 14 (2) Australian Journal of Family Law 119-141.

This article considers police responses to breaches of protection orders that occur in the context of contact hand-overs. The study, upon which the article is based, found that officers rarely prosecute offenders for a violation of an order when it occurs during contact hand-overs. The article draws on data collected in the late 1990s: police reports of breaches of protections orders (n186); interviews with women (n32), focus groups with police (n33 police).

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

Meyer, Silke & Rose Stambe (2022) Increasing compliance with domestic violence protection orders: investing in perpetrator education and support as an investment in victim and family safety, Policing and Society, 32:9, 1071-1086, DOI:10.1080/10439463.2021.2016756

Abstract: Domestic Violence (DV) is a persistent public health issue of global proportions affecting an estimated one in four women worldwide. Civil protection orders or domestic violence orders (DVO) are a legal tool used in many jurisdictions, including Australia, to hold the alleged perpetrators accountable and improve the safety of victims. However, the research on the effectiveness of these orders are mixed and perpetrator non-compliance with such orders continues to be a concern. Few studies examine the situational factors that impact compliance with orders, especially in relation to service engagement and support needs of perpetrators of DV during and beyond the protection order court process. Our study uses focus group data to explore the perceptions of police officers (n = 16) and prosecutors (n = 3) involved in policing and prosecuting DV and the compliance with relevant protection orders in two court districts in Queensland, Australia. Alleged perpetrators' comprehension of their order conditions and intersecting experiences of social disadvantage and complex needs emerged as key factors influencing compliance, along with the role of timely engagement with alleged perpetrators during the court process to maximise respondent comprehension of order conditions and engagement with available and relevant support services. In concluding, we highlight the importance of protective and preventive aspects of the DVO process that combine holistic wraparound support with perpetrator accountability in order to maximise perpetrator compliance and thus victim and family safety.

New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report 46, 2012).

Chapter 9 extensively considers protection orders (known as apprehended domestic violence orders (ADVOs)). ADVO conditions are considered from pp 250-260. It was noted that some ADVO conditions are unworkable and exclusion orders are often problematic. Moreover, where an ADVO is accompanied by an associated criminal charge there are often delays before the order is finalised, in which time the parties may have reconciled and it may not be appropriate to make the conditions of the final order the same as the interim order. Exclusion orders are considered from pp 254-256. Strategies to improve the effectiveness of ADVO conditions are considered at p256-257. These strategies include tailoring conditions to suit individual circumstances. The report notes that the response to domestic violence should be victim-centric, while at the same time ensuring that ADVO conditions are workable (p 258). It notes that impracticable ADVO conditions could be avoided using greater consultation with the respondent. Even a short conversation with the respondent may be sufficient (p 259).

Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever – Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Several sections in this report consider issues relevant to protection orders made in Queensland. The report noted that in considering whether to make or vary a domestic violence order, magistrates have power under s 78 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) to 'revive, vary, discharge or suspend a family law order allowing contact between a respondent and child that may be restricted under the proposed Domestic Violence Order' (p 270). Of particular relevance, the report considers the use of ouster conditions at pp 297-298. Ouster conditions in domestic violence orders prohibit the respondent from remaining, entering or being within a stated distances of stated premises.

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the 'applicant experience'. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant's safety – 'To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim's recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services' (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek "further and better particulars" about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – 'A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. '(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, 'Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?' (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties' relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, 'The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making' (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, 'Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women' (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women's use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order' (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a 'helpful strategy' (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed. See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Topliffe, Elizabeth, 'Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not' (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective. Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Management of application proceedings - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20.1).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1 discusses the intervention order process. 2.2 discusses making interim and final intervention orders, and conditions of orders. 2.3 discusses changing orders.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Management of application proceedings - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW and Legal Aid NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Management of application proceedings - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Susan

Cross-examination

Where a self-represented perpetrator wishes to cross-examine the victim, the victim's capacity to give evidence or the quality of the victim's evidence in these circumstances may be compromised by the victim's fear of the perpetrator and, as a consequence, the probative value of the evidence may be diminished or negated.

In some cases a perpetrator may even choose to be self-represented hoping to secure the opportunity to directly cross-examine the victim.

These scenarios should be understood in the context of the complex dynamics of domestic and family violence characterised by a pattern of abusive behaviour involving a perpetrator's exercise of control over the victim, often for an extended period. Where a self-represented perpetrator uses direct cross-examination to further abuse the victim through court processes, the victim may experience a form of secondary abuse. Recent changes to state and territory legislation address this issue, by, in certain circumstances, restricting a perpetrator's right to directly cross-examine the victim in domestic and family violence related court proceedings. The nature and extent of these restrictions vary across the state and territory jurisdictions, as summarised below.

State/Territory	Legislation	Section	Restriction on cross-examination
Australian Capital Territory	Family Violence Act 2016	63	Under s 63(2), a self-represented respondent cannot examine an affected person personally in a proceeding for a family violence order. An affected person includes any child who hears, witnesses or is otherwise exposed to family violence committed against another person. Under s 63(4)(a), the court may appoint a person to examine an affected person on the respondent's behalf.
New South Wales	Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007	41A	Under s 41A (1), a child witness in apprehended domestic violence order proceedings cannot be questioned directly by the defendant. The child can only be questioned by a legal practitioner or a suitable person appointed by the court.
	Criminal	289VA	In circumstances where a person accused of a domestic violence

	Procedure Act 1986	and 289T	offence is not represented by a legal practitioner a complainant cannot be directly examined by the accused. The court may appoint another person to carry out the examination. This applies to apprehended violence order proceedings but only when the defendant in the proceedings is charged with a domestic violence offence.
Northern Territory	Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007	114	Under s 114(2) a self-represented defendant is not entitled to question a witness who is in a domestic relationship with the defendant unless the court grants leave. The court will not grant leave if the witness is a child or has a cognitive impairment (s 114(3)). Per s 114(4), leave will not be granted unless the court is satisfied that the witness's ability to testify will not be adversely affected. In making this assessment, the court will have regard to any trauma or distress that could be caused (s 114(5)). Under s 114A(3)(b), the Court may determine to appoint a legal practitioner to cross-examine the witness for the defendant.
Queensland	Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012	151	Under s 151(2), the court may order that an unrepresented respondent may not cross-examine a protected witness in person if the court is satisfied that the cross-examination is likely to cause the protected witness to- (a) Suffer emotional harm or distress; (b) Be so intimidated as to be disadvantaged as a witness. Under s 151(3), if the protected witness is a child, the court must make an order that the unrepresented respondent may not cross-examine the child in person.
South Australia	Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009	29	Under s 29(4)(b), the defendant cannot directly cross-examine a person against whom it is alleged they have committed, or might commit, an act of abuse or a child exposed to the effects of an alleged act of abuse by the defendant. Cross-examination is to be by the defendant's counsel, or if unrepresented, the defendant must submit their proposed questions of the witness to the Court, and the Court will ask the witness such questions as the Court determines allowable. See also section 13B Evidence Act 1929 (SA).
Tasmania	Family Violence Act 2004	31	S 31(2B) provides that s 8A of the Evidence (Children and Special Witnesses) Act 2001 applies to the cross-examination of an alleged victim in a proceeding for a family violence offence. Under s 8A, an unrepresented defendant cannot cross-examine an alleged victim in these circumstances.
Victoria	Family Violence Protection Act 2008	70	Under s 70(3) a protected witness cannot be personally cross-examined by the respondent unless (a) The protected witness is an adult; and

			(b) The protected witness consents to being cross-examined by the respondent; and (c) If the protective witness has a cognitive impairment, the court is satisfied the protected witness understands the nature and consequences of giving consent; and (d) The court decides that it would not have a harmful impact on the protected witness.
Western Australia	Restraining Orders Act 1997	44C and 53D	Under s 44C, an unrepresented respondent cannot directly cross-examine a person with whom they are in a family relationship or imagined personal relationship. The unrepresented respondent may put the question to a judicial officer or a person approved by the Court who is to repeat the question to the person being cross-examined. Under s 53D, an unrepresented person cannot directly cross-examine a child who has given oral evidence. The unrepresented person may put the question to a judicial officer or a person approved by the Court who is to repeat the question to the child.

Cross-examination - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Interim report to the Attorney-General in response to the first two terms of reference on families with complex needs and the intersection of the family law and child protection systems' (2015) Family Law Council.

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 368-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-480). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report 46, 2012).

Chapter 9 extensively considers protection orders (known as apprehended domestic violence orders (ADVOs)). ADVO conditions are considered from pp 250-260. It was noted that some ADVO conditions are unworkable and exclusion orders are often problematic. Moreover, where an ADVO is accompanied by an associated criminal charge there are often delays before the order is finalised, in which time the parties may have reconciled and it may not be appropriate to make the conditions of the final order the same as the interim order. Exclusion orders are considered from pp 254-256. Strategies to improve the effectiveness of ADVO conditions are considered at p256-257. These strategies include tailoring conditions to suit individual circumstances. The report notes that the response to domestic violence should be victim-centric, while at the same time ensuring that ADVO conditions are workable (p 258). It notes that impracticable ADVO conditions could be avoided using greater consultation with the respondent. Even a short conversation with the respondent may be sufficient (p 259).

Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever – Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Several sections in this report consider issues relevant to protection orders made in Queensland. The report noted that in considering whether to make or vary a domestic violence order, magistrates have power under s 78 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) to 'revive, vary, discharge or suspend a family law order allowing contact between a respondent and child that may be restricted under the proposed Domestic Violence Order' (p 270). Of particular relevance, the report considers the use of ouster conditions at pp 297-298. Ouster conditions in domestic violence orders prohibit the respondent from remaining, entering or being within a stated distances of stated premises.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the 'applicant experience'. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant's safety – 'To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim's recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services' (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek "further and better particulars" about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125).

Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – ‘A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. ‘(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, ‘Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?’ (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties’ relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, ‘The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making’ (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, ‘Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women’ (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women’s use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order’ (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a 'helpful strategy' (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed. See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Topliffe, Elizabeth, 'Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not' (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective. Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Cross-examination - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20.1).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1 discusses the intervention order process. 2.2 discusses making interim and final intervention orders, and conditions of orders. 2.3 discusses changing orders.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Cross-examination - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Information sharing

Information-sharing provisions in domestic and family violence legislation vary in scope and detail between jurisdictions; and only some provide for information sharing in the conduct of protection order proceedings (see table below). The practice of information sharing involves interagency coordination and cooperation through protocols [Taylor et al 2015] developed and regularly reviewed in collaboration between courts, the police and service agencies. These protocols have been shown to improve responses to the enforcement of protection orders, including improved approaches to the assessment and management of risk [Taylor et al 2015]. There are also differences in how jurisdictions have legislated to prevent the inappropriate sharing of information and to protect people's privacy.

In addition, all Australian jurisdictions have enacted information-sharing provisions facilitating the National Domestic Violence Orders Scheme (NDVOS), under which a domestic violence order issued on or after 25 November 2017 is automatically nationally enforceable. Every jurisdiction has enacted provisions that enable its courts or law enforcement agencies to obtain information about a DVO from a court or law enforcement agency in another jurisdiction, and use that information for the purpose of making, varying or revoking a DVO. The provisions further require courts or law enforcement agencies in one jurisdiction to provide information about a DVO to a court or law enforcement agency of another jurisdiction that the court or law enforcement agency reasonably requests for the purposes of exercising its functions.

The table below also identifies the provisions in each jurisdiction's domestic violence legislation that provide for information-sharing in the conduct of protection order proceedings, and the information-sharing provisions in each jurisdiction that give effect to the NDVOS.

Recent research indicates that the broader potential for sharing information between state/territory agencies responsible for responding to domestic and family violence, such as police, courts, child welfare and health authorities and support and referral services, has become an important factor in the overall effectiveness of responses to domestic and family violence. Information sharing in this context may mean that victims of violence are more likely to engage with the agency to which they have been referred if they know they will not be required to repeatedly re-tell their experiences to other agencies [Qld Special DFV Taskforce Report 2015], and therefore avoid further trauma and distress. In addition, where the details of past violence or the risks of future violence are shared between agencies, timely action may be taken to address the risks and to ensure the safety and protection of the victim and other people at risk of harm [Taylor et al 2015].

Jurisdiction	Information sharing provisions under domestic violence legislation	Information sharing provisions relevant to the National Domestic Violence Orders Scheme (NDVOS)
Australian Capital Territory	s18 Domestic Violence Agencies Act 1986 (ACT) – if ACT/Federal police reasonably suspect domestic violence is being/has been committed/is likely, they may disclose to an approved crisis support agency (s17) any information that will help the agency to assist the victim/children.	Part 9, Div. 9.4 Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)
New South Wales	Part 13A Information Sharing (ss 98C-98L) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) – Provides for disclosure by limited agencies (government and health), court, police, designated referral/coordination points to referral/coordination points and support agencies in relation to personal and health information about the victim and (alleged) perpetrator for the purposes of arranging/providing support to the victim, and where there is a domestic violence threat. Disclosure by government/health agencies and support agencies requires the consent of (and by a court - no express objection by) the threatened person/victim (s98D, E, H). S98J Protocols may be required for this collection, use and disclosure of information. s98M A government /health agency may collect/use /disclose information if it reasonably believes the threat is serious, disclosure is necessary to prevent/lessen the threat and consent of the victim has been refused or is unreasonable/impractical to obtain. The NSW Justice Department has developed a protocol for sharing and dealing with information under Part 13A available here.	Part 13B, Div. 4, Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)
Northern Territory	s124A Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) Failure of an adult to report to the police harm (or likely harm) or serious/imminent threat because of domestic violence is an offence. S124A(4) Police must investigate such a report. s125 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT) Such a report made in good faith is not a breach of a professional code of conduct and cannot attract civil or criminal liability – the report/reporter may only be used in proceedings with leave of the court.	Chapter 3A, Part 3A.4 Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT)

	Chapter 5A provides for disclosure by police, government and health agencies if the entity has reasonable grounds to believe that a person is experiencing domestic violence and the information would help reduce a threat to their health or safety (s 124E). An information sharing entity should obtain the consent of the person unless it is not possible to do so. In the case of Aboriginal persons, disclosure should promote cultural safety and be culturally sensitive (s 124C).
Queensland	Part 3 Domestic violence orders s55 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) If the respondent is contesting the naming of a child on the protection order or conditions relating to the child, the court may request relevant information from the child protection authority. The parties must be given a copy and the opportunity to make submissions on the information received unless it would expose the victim or a child at increased risk of domestic and family violence. Part 5A Information Sharing ss169A – s169O Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld) Government entities and specialist DFV service providers may give information to another government entity or specialist DFV service provider for assessing domestic violence threat or for responding to serious domestic violence threat. A support service provider (other than a specialist DFV service provider) may give information to government entity, specialist DFV service provider or other support service provider for responding to serious domestic violence threat. Whenever safe, possible and practical, a person's consent should be obtained before information sharing. However, safety and protection takes precedence over a person's consent. Government entity or specialist DFV service provider may use information given to it to assess whether there is a serious threat to a person's life, health or safety or to lessen or prevent a serious threat. A support service provider may use information given to it to lessen or prevent a serious threat to a person's life, health or safety. Guidelines for sharing and dealing with information under Part 5A have been developed pursuant to s169M and are available here.	Part 6, Div. 5 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld)
Tasmania	s37 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) – It is not a breach of the Personal Information Act 2004 (Tas) (which regulates the collection and use of information) for an agency under that	Part 4, Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2016 (Tas)

	Act, acting in good faith, to collect, use, disclose personal information for the purpose of furthering the objects of the Family Violence Act. s39 Family Violence Act 2004 (Tas) Providing information (voluntarily or as required) to police based on a belief/reasonable suspicion of family violence (or likely family violence) with weapon, physical, sexual violence or where child affected, is not a breach of professional ethics/requirements and cannot, if done in good faith, incur civil or criminal liability.
Victoria	s140 Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) – Information from an interview or report relating to (respondent) court ordered counselling may be used in proceedings for a contravention relating to counselling orders or the underlying offence. (Power relating to court ordered counselling is limited to the Family Violence Court Division or other court specified by the Minister s126). Part 5A Information Sharing ss144A-144SG Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Vic) 'Information sharing entities' (prescribed by regulation) may share any personal, health or sensitive information relevant to assessing and/or managing family violence between each other, provided the information is not excluded; sharing it does not contravene another law; and applicable consent requirements have been met. The information may relate to a victim survivor, alleged or established perpetrator or third party. Information may be shared for a "family violence assessment purpose" or "family violence protection purpose" and the relevance and reasonable belief required to share the information varies according to the purpose. Consent requirements vary according to the party to whom the information relates. Information sharing entities must comply with requests for information meeting the requirements of Part 5A. Guidelines for sharing and dealing with information under Part 5A have been developed pursuant to s 144P and are available, alongside various other resources on the Part's operation, here.	Part 5, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme Act 2016 (Vic)
Western Australia	s70A Restraining Orders Act 1997 (WA) – Limited government agencies, including police and children's services, may disclose to each other information about person protected by an order or affected child if the disclosure is necessary to ensure the safety of the person protected or the wellbeing of a child.	Part 4, Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2016 (WA)

South Australia	s38 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA) – A public sector agency or contractor that is bound by the State's Information Privacy Principles, must, on request, make available to a police officer information to assist in locating a person for service of a protection order.	Part 3A, Div. 4 Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)

Acknowledgement of (adapted) source: Taylor, A., et al, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement – State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015) – Table 3, p15 [Taylor et al 2015]

Information sharing - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response: Final Report, Report No 114 (2010).

Chapter 30 'Information Sharing' considers the way to improve information flow between critical elements of the family violence system (courts, government agencies and other people and institutions involved in the family violence, family law and child protection systems). These include improving the way information is collected from parties and shared between courts (including the establishment of a national register of relevant court orders), changes to confidentiality and privacy legislation, and the development of information sharing protocols and memorandums of understanding (p.1397). The aim is to 'avoid, as far as possible, victims falling into gaps between the various systems due to lack of relevant information' (p.1398).

The report covers a number of issues relating to information sharing. In particular, it examines strategies to improve information sharing. The report notes that barriers to information sharing are not always legislative and are often administrative and cultural. One strategy to remedy this is to put in place information sharing protocols and MOUs between elements in the family law, family violence and child protection systems to clarify and formalise what information can be shared, with whom, and in what circumstances (p.1443). A number of these protocols exist in the child protection area, but they are less common in the family violence context.

Mulroney, Jane. 2003. 'Trends in Interagency Work'. Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse.

The report provides an examination of integrated service provision in the context of family violence. The report notes that integrated responses may stall in a number of circumstances, including where there is a lack of appropriate judicial responses (p.13).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Information sharing is a critical part of an integrated response to domestic and family violence. The report notes that '[t]he ability for different agencies to discuss cases and share relevant details on an ongoing basis is at the core of coordinating a tailored response to a person's individual circumstances. Effective and efficient information sharing ensures that victims of domestic and family violence do not have to re-tell their stories repeatedly to different service providers and enables service providers to provide timely responses, particularly in high-risk cases' (p 230). While there are clear benefits to information sharing, there is a need to ensure sufficient safeguards are in place to protect confidentiality (p 231). Unnecessary or inappropriate sharing of information could have negative consequences including: 'destroying relationships of trust between a service provider and a client, leading to disengagement of a client, becoming a barrier to victims' willingness to seek help (p 231). Similarly, "information can be untested or based on service provider opinion and could be highly prejudicial to one or both of the parties if used inappropriately in legal proceedings (p 231).

Taylor, A., et al Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

In relation to information sharing legislation that pertains to enforcement of protection orders, this report notes that 'information sharing' is 'the sharing or disclosing of personal details between agencies that respond to domestic and family violence, such as police, child welfare authorities and support services as a referral tool, to minimise the risk of victims falling through the cracks and to support victims to more easily and quickly engage with the agency to which they have been referred. Additionally, information sharing can be an important risk management tool, where the circumstances of abuse or risk indicators are shared to ensure that swift action can be taken to address risks, including police investigation, removing a victim to safety and development of a safety plan' (p.13).

The paper looks at the practice of information sharing (pp40-43). It notes that for the effective enforcement of protection orders, 'coordinated integrated responses that are adequately resourced are important'. This facilitates access to relevant services through inter-agency referrals and therefore fosters victim safety, and allows awareness of the risk to the victim and the behaviour and dangerousness of the perpetrator (p.40). Integrated responses are reliant on mechanisms for inter-agency collaborations, particularly through information sharing protocols.

Western Australia, Western Australia's Family and Domestic Violence Prevention Strategy to 2022: Achievement Report to 2013 (2013).

'In 2009–2010 the 'Memorandum of Understanding: Information sharing between agencies with responsibilities for preventing and responding to family and domestic violence in Western Australia' (MoU) was endorsed and signed by State and Commonwealth Government agencies. In 2010–2011 community sector agencies provided their endorsement and became signatories to the MoU. The MoU provides recognition of 'duty of care' including the commitment to share information without client consent if: the case is assessed to be high risk; a crime has been committed or is going to be committed; it is believed a child is likely to suffer significant harm; or a client is in need of urgent medical or psychiatric care. In 2013, the MoU was updated to reflect changes in multi agency case management and signature agencies were invited to provide their ongoing endorsement' (p.9). The Report provides an overview of these initiatives.

Victoria, Royal Commission into Family Violence, Summary and Recommendations (2016).

Chapter 7 discusses information sharing in relation to family and domestic violence generally. The Report notes that legislation alone will not create a culture of information sharing throughout the family violence system. Further, Chapter 16 of the report discusses court-based responses to family violence in Victoria. Of particular relevance, the report discusses the limitations on information sharing between courts and other parts of the family violence system.

Information sharing - Other Bench Books

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 18 discusses the operation of the information sharing provisions of the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

3.10 discusses the family violence information sharing regime.

Conditions

Key points:

- It can be important to tailor orders to the particular abusive behaviour, and otherwise address the specific needs of the parties.
- Dealing with related criminal proceedings contemporaneously in the same court can ensure bail conditions are consistent with protection order conditions.
- It is important parties are able to readily understand protection order conditions and sufficient time is allocated to proceedings to ensure the conditions address the parties' specific needs.

The types of conditions a judicial officer can impose in a protection order (whether interim or final) vary to some extent across Australian state and territory jurisdictions. Typically, the protection order will prohibit the perpetrator from committing domestic and family violence against the victim and other protected people (such as children). In addition, there may be conditions necessary to specifically address the needs and circumstances of the parties to the particular case, for example, conditions that prohibit the perpetrator from: committing certain forms of domestic and family violence; entering the victim's residence, workplace or other specified premises; being within a specified distance of the victim or a specified location; telephoning or otherwise contacting the victim; interfering with the victim's property; locating or attempting to locate the victim; or possessing firearms or prohibited weapons [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]. A protection order may also be an appropriate means of ensuring that children are not exposed to ongoing domestic and family violence [WA Equal Justice Bench Book 2021].

In some jurisdictions, where it is necessary to ensure the safety of the victim and other protected people, a court may also be empowered to prohibit a perpetrator from entering and remaining in a residence shared with the victim (whether as co-owner or co-tenant) or to terminate an existing tenancy agreement and replace it with one for the benefit of the victim; these are commonly referred to as exclusion or ouster orders [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]. It may be important to consider whether orders need to provide for a party to have or relinquish control of camera or other electronic systems in relation to a property which may be used to stalk, monitor or harass a party or to desist from use of, or desist from engaging in, particular activities involving use of digital /online systems which may also be used to stalk, monitor or harass a party. Other appropriate conditions may need to be included to keep family pets, companion and other animals safe to ensure they are not used to enact further abuse against the victim. Conditions in protection orders may also overlap with general prohibitions or requirements imposed by the criminal law; bail conditions; pre-sentencing orders; or orders made on sentencing [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]. It is desirable that criminal charges, including breach charges, relating to matters that are also the subject of a protection order application be dealt with contemporaneously in the same court to ensure that any bail conditions are consistent with protection order conditions. Where this is not possible, it is important that judicial officers are made aware of bail or protection orders issued by other courts (by tendering or by annexing to the application) to ensure consistency of orders.

Australian research has shown that where insufficient time is allowed in application proceedings for judicial officers to give particularised attention to the conditions of protection orders, conditions may not be tailored to the particular circumstances. This outcome may also occur where the victim and other protected people are not present at the hearing to explain their protection needs, or have limited language skills to do so. In tailoring conditions, a judicial officer may need to consider the potential for breaches of a protection order in the context of, for example, child contact hand-over arrangements [Katzen 2000], other court orders or remote communities [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]. It also important that protection order conditions are consistent and readily understood by the parties [NSWLC DV Trends & Issues 2012].

Consent orders are a common outcome of protection order application proceedings. Research demonstrates no observable relationship between the nature of the conditions sought and the willingness of the perpetrator to consent to the order. It is likely that these matters will be the subject of negotiations between the parties outside the courtroom [Gelb 2016].

Conditions - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Interim report to the Attorney-General in response to the first two terms of reference on families with complex needs and the intersection of the family law and child protection systems' (2015) Family Law Council.

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 367-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-481). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Dowling, Christopher, Anthony Morgan, Shann Hulme, Matthew Manning and Gabriel Wong, Protection orders for domestic violence: A systematic review (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 551 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Protection orders are a common legal response to domestic violence which aim to prevent further re-victimisation by the perpetrator.

The current study systematically reviews research into the use and impact of protection orders, using the EMMIE framework (Effectiveness, Mechanisms, Moderators, Implementation and Economy).

Meta-analysis is used to examine the overall effect of protection orders, while narrative synthesis is used to examine the underlying mechanisms and moderators of their effectiveness, their implementation and economic viability.

Protection orders are associated with a small but significant reduction in domestic violence. They appear to be more effective under certain circumstances, including when the victim has fewer ties to the perpetrator and a greater capacity for independence, and less effective for offenders with a history of crime, violence and mental health issues.

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Katzen, Hayley, 'It's a Family Matter, Not a Police Matter: The Enforcement of Protection Orders' (2000) 14 (2) Australian Journal of Family Law 119-141.

This article considers police responses to breaches of protection orders that occur in the context of contact hand-overs. The study, upon which the article is based, found that officers rarely prosecute offenders for a violation of an order when it occurs during contact hand-overs. The article draws on data collected in the late 1990s: police reports of breaches of protections orders (n186); interviews with women (n32), focus groups with police (n33 police).

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

Meyer, Silke & Rose Stambe (2022) Increasing compliance with domestic violence protection orders: investing in perpetrator education and support as an investment in victim and family safety, Policing and Society, 32:9, 1071-1086, DOI:10.1080/10439463.2021.2016756

Abstract: Domestic Violence (DV) is a persistent public health issue of global proportions affecting an estimated one in four women worldwide. Civil protection orders or domestic violence orders (DVO) are a legal tool used in many jurisdictions, including Australia, to hold the alleged perpetrators accountable and improve the safety of victims. However, the research on the effectiveness of these orders are mixed and perpetrator non-compliance with such orders continues to be a concern. Few studies examine the situational factors that impact compliance with orders, especially in relation to service engagement and support needs of perpetrators of DV during and beyond the protection order court process. Our study uses focus group data to explore the perceptions of police officers (n = 16) and prosecutors (n = 3) involved in policing and prosecuting DV and the compliance with relevant protection orders in two court districts in Queensland, Australia. Alleged perpetrators' comprehension of their order conditions and intersecting experiences of social disadvantage and complex needs emerged as key factors influencing compliance, along with the role of timely engagement with alleged perpetrators during the court process to maximise respondent comprehension of order conditions and engagement with available and relevant support services. In concluding, we highlight the importance of protective and preventive aspects of the DVO process that combine holistic wraparound support with perpetrator accountability in order to maximise perpetrator compliance and thus victim and family safety.

New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report 46, 2012).

Chapter 9 extensively considers protection orders (known as apprehended domestic violence orders (ADVOs)). ADVO conditions are considered from pp 250-260. It was noted that some ADVO conditions are unworkable and exclusion orders are often problematic. Moreover, where an ADVO is accompanied by an associated criminal charge there are often delays before the order is finalised, in which time the parties may have reconciled and it may not be appropriate to make the conditions of the final order the same as the interim order. Exclusion orders are considered from pp 254-256. Strategies to improve the effectiveness of ADVO conditions are considered at p256-257. These strategies include tailoring conditions to suit individual circumstances. The report notes that the response to domestic violence should be victim-centric, while at the same time ensuring that ADVO conditions are workable (p 258). It notes that impracticable ADVO conditions could be avoided by using greater consultation with the respondent. Even a short conversation with the respondent may be sufficient (p 259).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Information sharing is a critical part of an integrated response to domestic and family violence. The report notes that '[t]he ability for different agencies to discuss cases and share relevant details on an ongoing basis is at the core of coordinating a tailored response to a person's individual circumstances. Effective and efficient information sharing ensures that victims of domestic and family violence do not have to re-tell their stories repeatedly to different service providers and enables service providers to provide timely responses, particularly in high-risk cases' (p 230). While there are clear benefits to information sharing, there is a need to ensure sufficient safeguards are in place to protect confidentiality (p 231). Unnecessary or inappropriate sharing of information could have negative consequences including: 'destroying relationships of trust between a service provider and a client, leading to disengagement of a client, becoming a barrier to victims' willingness to seek help (p 231). Similarly, "information can be untested or based on service provider opinion and could be highly prejudicial to one or both of the parties if used inappropriately in legal proceedings (p 231).

Queensland Police Service, Australian Journal of Family Law The Domestic and Family Violence GPS-Enabled Electronic monitoring Technology, Evaluation Report, April 2019, Government of Queensland.

This report presents the findings of a trial of GPS tracking for family violence offenders and victims in Queensland. The trial assessed the effectiveness, reliability and responsiveness of GPS-enabled technology to track an individual accurately and activate an alert in the event of a pre-programmed zone being breached. The GPS-enabled technology was tested in different geographical areas and with police personnel rather than actual offenders and victims. Thirty-five tests were carried out, with the technology failing to respond in 26% of cases. The technical issues are discussed in more detail. Overall, the findings demonstrate that electronic monitoring does not provide an effective risk-mitigating solution for high-risk perpetrators and is not a reliable substitute for perpetrator case management. However, it may be of use in some lower-risk cases, in conjunction with other measures. This trial was a suggestion of the 2015 Queensland Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence, which noted how little was known about electronic monitoring programs.

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the 'applicant experience'. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant's safety – 'To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim's recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services' (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek "further and better particulars" about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – ‘A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. ‘(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, ‘Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?’ (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties’ relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, ‘The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making’ (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, ‘Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women’ (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women’s use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order’ (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a ‘helpful strategy’ (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed. See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Speed, A., & Richardson, K. (2022). 'Should I Stay or Should I Go Now? If I Go There will be Trouble and if I Stay it will be Double': An Examination into the Present and Future of Protective Orders Regulating the Family Home in England and Wales. The Journal of Criminal Law, 86(3), 179–205. 10.1177/00220183211073639

Occupation orders are the dedicated legal remedy through which victims of domestic abuse can be supported to remain in the family home following a relationship breakdown. Case law indicates, however, that victims experience barriers to securing orders due to the high threshold criteria and because concerns about protecting the rights of perpetrators has led to judicial reluctance to grant extensive protection to victims. The options for providing protection to victims of abuse in respect of the family home are shortly set to be reformed by the Domestic Abuse Act 2021, which creates a new Domestic Abuse Protection Order (DAPO). It is anticipated that DAPOs will be easier to secure because they will have a lower threshold criteria, they will be available in family, civil and criminal proceedings, and both victims and third parties will be able to make an application thereby alleviating the burden on victims who feel unable to take any action. Whilst there is no intention at this point to repeal occupation orders, the Home Office has acknowledged that 'DAPOs will become the 'go to' protective order in cases of domestic abuse' suggesting that occupation orders will be replaced by DAPOs in most cases.

By drawing on data obtained from an analysis of court statistics, a questionnaire of legal practitioners and domestic abuse specialists, and in-depth interviews with victims of domestic abuse, this paper offers original empirical insights into where the current law fails victims of domestic abuse. The analysis reveals three key barriers to securing occupation orders. Firstly, despite the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 making efforts to preserve legal aid for victims of domestic abuse, the means test is difficult for victims to satisfy, resulting in increases both to the number of victims taking no action to pursue protection and who act as litigants in person in occupation order proceedings. Secondly, the prospects of a victim securing protection can be adversely affected by their unrepresented status. Thirdly, despite case law indicating a less restrictive approach to granting occupation orders, many victims continue to struggle to satisfy the strict threshold criteria. Some judges are seemingly willing to bypass this by granting alternative remedies which may offer victims a weaker form of protection in respect of the family home. Where orders are granted, the data suggest this is on restricted terms and for limited durations which reduce their effectiveness at preventing post-separation abuse and supporting victims to regulate their short and longer-term housing situation. These empirical findings are then situated within a discussion of the Domestic Abuse Act 2021. The authors analyse whether forthcoming DAPOs are likely to offer a more accessible and effective form of protection than occupation orders. The analysis suggests that by increasing the scope of applicants, the breadth and flexibility of available protection and the sanctions for breach, DAPOs have the potential to remedy many of the existing barriers to securing protection over the family home. As is always the case with new legislation however, the key will be in its implementation, to ensure that existing issues are not simply transferred across to the new regime. The findings are novel because academic commentaries on protective injunctions typically focus on ‘personal protection’ offered by non-molestation orders, domestic violence protection orders, and restraining orders, meaning that both occupation orders and protection for victims in respect of the family home are under-researched areas of domestic abuse.

Topliffe, Elizabeth, ‘Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not’ (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective.

Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Conditions - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20.1).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1 discusses the intervention order process. 2.2 discusses making interim and final intervention orders, and conditions of orders. 2.3 discusses changing orders.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Conditions - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Property

Key points:

- It may be important to include conditions in relation to access to property.
- Conditions may be inconsistent with existing family court orders or be relied upon in future proceedings in relation to property matters.
- Conditions may need to provide for a party to have or relinquish control of camera and other electronic systems in relation to a property.

A protection order may provide that a party is excluded from a named residence or that the party is entitled to limited access to the residence to recover specified items of personal property, or may otherwise impose conditions about the parties' property. In some cases, these conditions may be inconsistent with the terms of an existing property order made under the Family Law Act, or may be sought to be relied upon in support of a claim for ownership or possession of particular property in future property proceedings under the Family Law Act [ALRC FV – Improving legal frameworks 2010]. Some jurisdictions require the consideration of the accommodation needs of victims and children. It may be important to consider whether orders need to provide for a party to have or relinquish control of camera or other electronic systems in relation to a property which may be used to stalk, monitor or harass a party.

When determining the appropriate conditions of a protection order, a judicial officer should where possible inquire as to the existence and substance of any property orders made or pending under the Family Law Act. In making the protection order, the judicial officer should consider whether it is appropriate to expressly state in the order that the conditions do not alter or affect the parties' ownership rights to any property and are subject to the terms of any property order made under the Family Law Act [ALRC/NSWLRC FV – National Legal Response 2010].

Property - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission, Family Violence: Improving Legal Frameworks, Consultation Paper No 1 (2010).

The ALRC has examined property conditions in protection orders. The paper notes that family violence legislation in each of the states and territories allows the court to issue protection orders to prohibit a person entering or approaching the protected person's residence. 'With the exception of the ACT, this legislation states that the orders may cover a property in which the person against whom the order was made has a legal or equitable interest (exclusion orders). Most family violence laws provide for a court to make orders permitting an excluded person or victim of violence to gain access to the premises for the purpose of taking personal possessions, usually by an arrangement or in the company of police'. These are referred to as 'personal property directions' by the paper. The paper notes that personal property directions can interact with property proceedings where they:

- influence future property proceedings under pt VIII of the Family Law Act—for example, where a party gains possession of property pursuant to a personal property direction and no longer needs or wants to contest ownership in the family courts;
- are directly inconsistent with existing property orders made under the Family Law Act; and
- are used as an indication of possessory or ownership rights by a federal family court and thereby impact on the outcome of future property proceedings under the Family Law Act (p.430).

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

The final report notes that '[m]ost state and territory family violence legislation provides for the recovery of personal property. This is usually achieved by giving a court the discretion to include specific conditions in the protection order to deal with property recovery' (p 738). These conditions or orders made to enable a person to recover property in protection orders are referred to as 'personal property directions' here.

The report discusses strategies to prevent inconsistencies between personal property orders under state and territory family violence legislation and ownership or possessory rights declared under Family Law Act property proceedings. In the Consultation Paper above, the Commission set out two proposals to assist state and territory courts making protection orders to obtain information about, and consider, property orders made under the Family Law Act—thus avoiding inconsistencies between orders.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. The legislative context of protection order enforcement, including impact on property rights, is considered at p7. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Property - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Duration

Key points:

- Interim/temporary orders may be made pending a final hearing of the matter.
- Final protection orders may be made for a fixed period or until further order.

The court may make a final protection order for a fixed period of time or until further order; or the court may make an interim or temporary order to ensure the protection of the victim and other protected people pending a final hearing of the matter [FLC 2015]. This is on the basis that the need for protection is urgent and it would be inconsistent with the principle of safety to defer the granting of protection until the perpetrator has been served with an application. There is a variety of circumstances that may delay the finalisation of an application, for example interim orders may be made or extended to allow proper preparation for a final hearing, monitoring of safety arrangements and other concurrent family law related proceedings.

Most jurisdictions do not prescribe a maximum duration for a final protection order, instead allowing the court to specify an appropriate period of time, or to provide for no expiration date [FLC 2015]. US research indicates that flexibility is necessary to tailor the order to the totality of the circumstances of the particular case with regard to any aggravating factors such as increased risk of harm or recidivism, rather than adopting a one-size-fits-all approach [Conner 2015].

Duration - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Interim report to the Attorney-General in response to the first two terms of reference on families with complex needs and the intersection of the family law and child protection systems' (2015) Family Law Council.

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 368-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-480). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Dowling, Christopher, Anthony Morgan, Shann Hulme, Matthew Manning and Gabriel Wong, Protection orders for domestic violence: A systematic review (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 551 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Protection orders are a common legal response to domestic violence which aim to prevent further re-victimisation by the perpetrator.

The current study systematically reviews research into the use and impact of protection orders, using the EMMIE framework (Effectiveness, Mechanisms, Moderators, Implementation and Economy).

Meta-analysis is used to examine the overall effect of protection orders, while narrative synthesis is used to examine the underlying mechanisms and moderators of their effectiveness, their implementation and economic viability.

Protection orders are associated with a small but significant reduction in domestic violence. They appear to be more effective under certain circumstances, including when the victim has fewer ties to the perpetrator and a greater capacity for independence, and less effective for offenders with a history of crime, violence and mental health issues.

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report 46, 2012).

Chapter 9 extensively considers protection orders (known as apprehended domestic violence orders (ADVOs)). ADVO conditions are considered from pp 250-260. It was noted that some ADVO conditions are unworkable and exclusion orders are often problematic. Moreover, where an ADVO is accompanied by an associated criminal charge there are often delays before the order is finalised, in which time the parties may have reconciled and it may not be appropriate to make the conditions of the final order the same as the interim order. Exclusion orders are considered from pp 254-256. Strategies to improve the effectiveness of ADVO conditions are considered at p256-257. These strategies include tailoring conditions to suit individual circumstances. The report notes that the response to domestic violence should be victim-centric, while at the same time ensuring that ADVO conditions are workable (p 258). It notes that impracticable ADVO conditions could be avoided using greater consultation with the respondent. Even a short conversation with the respondent may be sufficient (p 259).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Information sharing is a critical part of an integrated response to domestic and family violence. The report notes that '[t]he ability for different agencies to discuss cases and share relevant details on an ongoing basis is at the core of coordinating a tailored response to a person's individual circumstances. Effective and efficient information sharing ensures that victims of domestic and family violence do not have to re-tell their stories repeatedly to different service providers and enables service providers to provide timely responses, particularly in high-risk cases' (p 230). While there are clear benefits to information sharing, there is a need to ensure sufficient safeguards are in place to protect confidentiality (p 231). Unnecessary or inappropriate sharing of information could have negative consequences including: 'destroying relationships of trust between a service provider and a client, leading to disengagement of a client, becoming a barrier to victims' willingness to seek help (p 231). Similarly, "information can be untested or based on service provider opinion and could be highly prejudicial to one or both of the parties if used inappropriately in legal proceedings (p 231).

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the 'applicant experience'. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant's safety – 'To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim's recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services' (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek "further and better particulars" about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen, 'Recent Innovations in Australian Protection Order Law – A Comparative Discussion: Topic Paper 19' (Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, Sydney, 2010).

This paper provides an overview of the state of domestic violence legislation in Australia at 2010, focusing particularly on the law relating to protection orders. See from p 18, where 'key features' in protection order law from each state/territory which promote 'good practice' are summarised. Inconsistency between family law orders and protection orders are also considered (p 20).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – ‘A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. ‘(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, ‘Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?’ (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties’ relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, ‘The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making’ (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, ‘Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women’ (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women’s use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order’ (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a ‘helpful strategy’ (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed. See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Topliffe, Elizabeth, 'Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not' (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective. Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Duration - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20.1).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1 discusses the intervention order process. 2.2 discusses making interim and final intervention orders, and conditions of orders. 2.3 discusses changing orders.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Duration - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Related family law proceedings

Key points:

- Protection order conditions may vary existing parenting or other orders made in the family courts.
- Protection orders which alter the status quo of parenting arrangements for children may have a significant impact on the final outcome of family court proceedings.
- Family courts must take into account any inferences which may be drawn from the making of a protection order in parenting proceedings.
- Protection order applications withdrawn on the basis of undertakings by parties, orders made by consent without admission and mutual orders made following cross-applications may not allow family courts to draw inferences from protection order proceedings.

Where the parties to protection order application proceedings are also engaged, or likely to be engaged, in family law proceedings, tensions or inconsistencies may arise between the purpose and effect of a protection order made by a court of summary jurisdiction and a parenting order made by the Family Court of Australia or Federal Circuit Court of Australia (called here 'the Family Court'). On the one hand, the protection order may direct the perpetrator [Croucher 2014] to keep away from the victim and any protected children. On the other hand, the parenting order may stipulate that the protected children spend time with or live with the perpetrator. In some circumstances it may be appropriate for magistrates to vary existing parenting or other orders under the Family Law Act.

There may also be circumstances where, for example, in the absence of parenting orders, a victim obtains a protection order naming her children as protected people, and the perpetrator (the father of the children) subsequently applies to the Family Court for parenting orders so that he may have contact with his children otherwise disallowed under the protection order. Judicial officers should be aware when making protection orders naming children as protected people in these circumstances that there may be a considerable delay before parenting matters, including contact, can be dealt with by the Family Court, and that the new status quo established by the protection order may impact on the outcome of any subsequent parenting proceedings. Where the protection order is made with the consent of the parties (which is often the case [Gelb 2016]) judicial officers should ensure the parties are made aware of this potential impact, in particular where one or both parties are self-represented. In some Australian jurisdictions, judicial officers are required to include children as protected people on protection orders.

Parties are required to ensure that a copy of any protection order is filed with the Family Court when making an application for parenting orders; and if a protection order is in force the court must consider any relevant inferences that can be drawn from the protection order by taking into account the nature of the order, the circumstances in which the order was made, any evidence admitted in proceedings for the order, any findings made in the protection order proceedings and any other relevant matter. Where, however, a party withdraws their protection order application on the basis of undertakings given by the other party to the court; or a protection order is made by consent without admission; or the responding party makes a cross application resulting in mutual orders [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010], there may be no admission of fact capable of being relied upon by the Family Court in making a determination regarding the perpetration of domestic and family violence.

Related family law proceedings - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Interim report to the Attorney-General in response to the first two terms of reference on families with complex needs and the intersection of the family law and child protection systems' (2015) Family Law Council.

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 368-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-480). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

Meyer, Silke & Rose Stambe (2022) Increasing compliance with domestic violence protection orders: investing in perpetrator education and support as an investment in victim and family safety, Policing and Society, 32:9, 1071-1086, DOI:10.1080/10439463.2021.2016756

Abstract: Domestic Violence (DV) is a persistent public health issue of global proportions affecting an estimated one in four women worldwide. Civil protection orders or domestic violence orders (DVO) are a legal tool used in many jurisdictions, including Australia, to hold the alleged perpetrators accountable and improve the safety of victims. However, the research on the effectiveness of these orders are mixed and perpetrator non-compliance with such orders continues to be a concern. Few studies examine the situational factors that impact compliance with orders, especially in relation to service engagement and support needs of perpetrators of DV during and beyond the protection order court process. Our study uses focus group data to explore the perceptions of police officers (n = 16) and prosecutors (n = 3) involved in policing and prosecuting DV and the compliance with relevant protection orders in two court districts in Queensland, Australia. Alleged perpetrators' comprehension of their order conditions and intersecting experiences of social disadvantage and complex needs emerged as key factors influencing compliance, along with the role of timely engagement with alleged perpetrators during the court process to maximise respondent comprehension of order conditions and engagement with available and relevant support services. In concluding, we highlight the importance of protective and preventive aspects of the DVO process that combine holistic wraparound support with perpetrator accountability in order to maximise perpetrator compliance and thus victim and family safety.

New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report 46, 2012).

Chapter 9 extensively considers protection orders (known as apprehended domestic violence orders (ADVOs)). ADVO conditions are considered from pp 250-260. It was noted that some ADVO conditions are unworkable and exclusion orders are often problematic. Moreover, where an ADVO is accompanied by an associated criminal charge there are often delays before the order is finalised, in which time the parties may have reconciled and it may not be appropriate to make the conditions of the final order the same as the interim order. Exclusion orders are considered from pp 254-256. Strategies to improve the effectiveness of ADVO conditions are considered at p256-257. These strategies include tailoring conditions to suit individual circumstances. The report notes that the response to domestic violence should be victim-centric, while at the same time ensuring that ADVO conditions are workable (p 258). It notes that impracticable ADVO conditions could be avoided using greater consultation with the respondent. Even a short conversation with the respondent may be sufficient (p 259).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Information sharing is a critical part of an integrated response to domestic and family violence. The report notes that '[t]he ability for different agencies to discuss cases and share relevant details on an ongoing basis is at the core of coordinating a tailored response to a person's individual circumstances. Effective and efficient information sharing ensures that victims of domestic and family violence do not have to re-tell their stories repeatedly to different service providers and enables service providers to provide timely responses, particularly in high-risk cases' (p 230). While there are clear benefits to information sharing, there is a need to ensure sufficient safeguards are in place to protect confidentiality (p 231). Unnecessary or inappropriate sharing of information could have negative consequences including: 'destroying relationships of trust between a service provider and a client, leading to disengagement of a client, becoming a barrier to victims' willingness to seek help (p 231). Similarly, "information can be untested or based on service provider opinion and could be highly prejudicial to one or both of the parties if used inappropriately in legal proceedings (p 231).

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the 'applicant experience'. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant's safety – 'To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim's recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services' (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – 'Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek "further and better particulars" about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request' (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics 'are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – 'A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. '(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, 'Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?' (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties' relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, 'The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making' (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, 'Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women' (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women's use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order' (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a 'helpful strategy' (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed.

See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Topliffe, Elizabeth, 'Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not' (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective. Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Related family law proceedings - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.6 discusses the interaction between family violence orders and parenting orders, recovery orders and other orders under the Family Law Act. 5.14 discusses the relationship between family violence and family law.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Related family law proceedings - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence

- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Parenting orders

Key points:

- Where parties to a protection order application have children Part VII, Division 11 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Part 5, Division 10 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) should be considered.
- Where domestic or family violence has commenced or escalated since the making of parenting orders courts of summary jurisdiction considering protection order applications may revive, vary, discharge or suspend an existing parenting order.
- When varying an existing parenting order in the context of making or varying a final protection order, the judicial officer should be aware of the consequences of making variations to the parenting order that may not be sustainable or that the parties may not be capable of complying with in the longer term.
- If the protection order is made or varied on an interim basis, the court of summary jurisdiction must not discharge the parenting order.

In making a protection order where the parties have children the applicability of Part VII, Division 11 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Part 5, Division 10 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) should (and in some jurisdictions, must) be considered. The term, 'family violence order', is used in this statement to reflect the relevant provisions of the family law legislation; the equivalent term, 'protection order', is used elsewhere in this chapter.

The stated purposes (Section 68N FLA; Section 173 FCA) of part VII, Division 11 of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth) and Part 5, Division 10 of the Family Court Act 1997 (WA) are: to resolve inconsistencies between family violence orders and orders that provide for a child to spend time with a person (here called parenting orders); to ensure that parenting orders do not expose people to domestic and family violence; and to ensure the best interests of the child. Family violence orders collectively describe orders generally made by state and territory courts of summary jurisdiction. Parenting orders are generally made by a family court, however it is important to note that proceedings for a parenting order can be instituted in a state or territory court of summary jurisdiction subject to the limitations set out in Section 69N FLA and Section 43 FCA.

Section 68R FLA and Section 176 FCA permit a court of summary jurisdiction (on its own initiative or on application), when making or varying a family violence order, to revive, vary, discharge or suspend an existing parenting order (or family law injunction for personal protection, parenting plan, or recovery order) where the court has before it material that was not before a family court when the parenting order was made. These provisions are a mechanism for ensuring the safety of the victim and their children in domestic and family violence matters where there are parenting orders already in place that provide for contact between the children and the perpetrator [FLC 2015]. This mechanism is relevant in cases where domestic and family violence has commenced or escalated since the parenting orders were made. For example, where a parenting order is made by a family court in the absence of the victim of family violence and the other party (the perpetrator) has failed to disclose the violence to the court, or violence commences or escalates in the context of child changeover arrangements stipulated in the parenting order. If the provisions of Section 68R FLA or Section 176 FCA are used effectively, a victim in these circumstances, having obtained a final family violence order [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010], would not face potential contravention proceedings for breaching a parenting order, and would not be required to make application to a family court for a variation of the parenting order.

When a court of summary jurisdiction exercises its power to vary an existing parenting order in the context of making or varying a final family violence order, the judicial officer should be aware of the consequences of making variations to the parenting order that may not be sustainable or that the parties may not be capable of complying with in the longer term. For example, a variation that requires a party to have supervised contact with their children at a designated contact centre. It is unlikely that a contact centre would agree to a long term commitment of this nature; it is far more likely to be an interim measure only. The judicial officer should be satisfied that they have sufficient evidence and information about the particular matter, including any relevant details arising from the parenting proceedings, before varying the parenting order.

If the family violence order is made or varied on an interim basis, the court of summary jurisdiction must not discharge the parenting order. Any revival, variation or suspension of a parenting order made by a court of summary jurisdiction in Western Australian ceases to have effect either when the interim order ends or 21 days from the date of the interim order, whichever time is earlier (Section 178 FCA). It is important to note however that in any other state or territory, any revival, variation or suspension of a parenting order made in proceedings to make or vary an interim family violence order by a court of summary jurisdiction ceases to have effect at the earliest of: the time the interim family violence order stops being in force; the time specified in the interim family violence order as the time at which the revival, variation or suspension ceases to have effect; and the time the parenting order is affected by any another court order made after the revival, variation or suspension (Section 68T FLA).

It has been observed that the Part VII Division 11 FLA/Part 5 FCA provisions are rarely applied by courts of summary jurisdiction. Reasons in individual cases may include:

- In some instances the judicial officer may determine that parenting orders are sufficient to protect children without naming the children on the family violence order [FLC 2015].
- In interim family violence order proceedings, the judicial officer may be concerned that the period prescribed in Section 178 FCA (and previously in Section 68T FLA) does not allow the victim sufficient time to bring an application before a family court to have the allegations of violence considered, and if substantiated, the parenting order varied, so elects instead to preserve the parenting order and name only the victim in the family violence order [FLC 2015].
- A party or parties to the family violence order proceedings may not have access to appropriate legal advice and other support before seeking to vary a parenting order [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010]. A judicial officer may be reluctant to disturb existing orders in these circumstances.
- Judicial officers may also be concerned about disturbing a parenting order where they believe they may not be apprised of all of the information and evidence that supported the making of the parenting order [FLC 2015].

It is important to note that judicial officers can elect to suspend the parenting order for the prescribed period, and set repeating return dates at the expiration of each period until the parties are able to have their application heard by a family court. Judicial officers should also be aware that parties who are self-represented may not be equipped to establish the grounds required by Section 68R FLA or Section 176 FCA on which the court may revive, vary, discharge or suspend an existing parenting order.

Judicial officers considering a family violence order application may decide that it is appropriate in a particular case (and in some Australian jurisdictions, they are required) to name the children in the (interim or final) family violence order and to specify the conditions governing contact between the children and perpetrator. In this way, the victim and children have immediate protection that remains in effect if or until parenting orders are made by a family court. Given that there may be a considerable delay before parenting matters, including contact, can be dealt with by a family court, the new status quo established by the family violence order may impact on the outcome of any subsequent parenting proceedings.

In cases where the family violence order is made prior to parenting order proceedings, Section 68P FLA and Section 174 FCA permit a family court to make a parenting order (or make a recovery order or grant an injunction) that is inconsistent with the family violence order, however the court must ensure the parties fully understand the nature and effect of the parenting order. This may occur in cases where information or evidence comes before the court that was not available to the court of summary jurisdiction that made the family violence order. In circumstances of ongoing violence, where a protected person is having difficulty with enforcement of a family violence order as a result of the operation of a parenting order made by a family court, the protected person may need to return to the court of summary jurisdiction and make application under Section 68R FLA or Section 176 FCA to ensure consistency and enforceability of orders.

Parenting orders - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Chapter 16 of the Report examines 'the way in which state and territory courts exercise jurisdiction under family violence legislation and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth)'. The Commission notes that s 68R is rarely used to revive, vary, discharge or suspend a parenting order because (p.702):

- Judicial officers, lawyers, police and others involved in protection order proceedings may not be sufficiently aware of the existence, or understand the nature, of s 68R.
- Some judicial officers, lawyers and police appear to consider that issues in relation to parenting orders should be a matter for federal family courts;
- Judicial officers may not have the information or evidence necessary to amend a parenting order; and
- Parties to proceedings may not have access to appropriate legal advice and other support before seeking to amend a parenting order.

The Commission concluded that 'increasing and improving the use of s 68R in state and territory magistrates courts is necessary to fill a gap in the protection of victims of family violence caused by the interaction between family law and state and territory family violence legislation. In particular, s 68R is necessary to protect victims of family violence where violence arises or escalates after parenting orders have been made—for example, during handover arrangements. In such cases, if s 68R is not used to amend the parenting order, a victim of violence may need to go to a federal family court to seek an amendment to the parenting order as well as a state or territory magistrates court to seek a protection order' (p 702).

Bryant, Diana, 'The Family Courts and Family Violence' (Paper presented at the Judicial Conference of Australia Colloquium, Adelaide, 9-11 October 2015).

The paper focuses on the issue of family violence in parenting proceedings (not in property proceedings). Her Honour notes that the family courts are widely criticised for making orders which are inconsistent with family violence orders (see Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, South Australian Social Development Committee) but identifies that these criticisms overlook the complexity of the task posed to the family courts and the reasons why ss 68R and 68T of the Family Law Act are drafted the way they are (p.4).

She identifies that under federal legislation, a federal court can make orders for contact with are inconsistent with an existing family violence order and, if they do so, the family violence order is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency (s 68Q). If the parenting order is inconsistent with the family violence order, s 68P imposes a number of obligations as to what must be included in the judgment that accompanies the parenting order. Her Honour notes that, '[w]hile s 68P is relied upon from time to time, family violence orders in the majority of cases that come to the family courts either do not include the children as affected family members or, more frequently, include an exception for any orders made by the family courts' (p.5).

Courts making or varying family violence orders may discharge or suspend existing orders made under the Family Law Act (s 68R). In interim family violence proceedings, the court can only vary or suspend, but cannot discharge, an order made under the Family Law Act (s 68T). Again, there are considerations that must be taken into account before making this order (s 68R(5)).

The justification for ss 68R and 68T are elaborated upon by Her Honour at p.5:

'Although the subject of criticism, there are reasons for permitting courts to make inconsistent orders. The clue to this is in s 68R(3), which limits the power of a court making a family violence order to vary, discharge or suspend a family court order unless it has material before it that was not before the court that made that order or injunction. That is perfectly sensible — when a violent incident occurs involving a family which has had parenting orders in place, then the state court making the family violence orders is, of course, going to have information available to it that was not available to the judge when the original order was made.

Similarly, when family violence orders are made, often on an interim basis, the family courts subsequently considering making parenting orders may well have evidence that was not before the court making the family violence order. This would often be the case, for example, where there is an order made by consent without an admission of the allegations upon which it is based'.

Family Law Council, Interim Report to the Attorney-General: In response to the first two terms of reference on Families with Complex Needs and the Intersection of the Family Law and Child Protection Systems (2015).

The Family Law Council report provides an excellent summary of the issues that arise in practice relating to ss 68R and 68T. First, in relation to s 68R, they note that several stakeholders reported that some magistrates rarely apply s 68R in family violence hearings, or are reluctant to make family violence protection orders naming children where there are parenting orders in place. It cites a case study from Legal Aid Western Australia and concerns raised in a Victorian report. Second, in relation to s 68T, the Council also notes that concerns were raised as to the time limits imposed. It notes the report of the Australian and New South Wales Law Reform Commission's consideration of these issues and their recommendations (pp.40-42).

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Parenting orders - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 9.11 discusses the interaction between domestic violence orders and family law orders, including parenting orders, an applicant's obligation to inform the court about any family law orders, and the matters the court must consider before deciding to make or vary a domestic violence order. Chapter 20.9.2.10 discusses the situation where parties have ongoing contact due to Family Court parenting orders.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.6 discusses the interaction between family violence orders and parenting orders, recovery orders and other orders under the Family Law Act. 5.14 discusses the relationship between family violence and family law.

Parenting orders - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence

- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Recognition of interstate orders

Key points:

- All protection orders made in any Australian jurisdiction on or after 25 November 2017 are automatically recognised and enforceable nationally, without any further action by the protected person.

All Australian states and territories have passed legislation giving effect to the National Domestic Violence Order (DVO) Scheme [NDVOS]. Under the scheme, all protection orders made in any Australian jurisdiction on or after 25 November 2017 are automatically recognised and enforceable nationally. without any further action by the protected person.

Prior to the commencement of the scheme, protection orders were only enforceable in the state or territory in which they were issued. For the order to be enforceable in another state or territory, the protected person had to manually apply to have the order registered in that individual state or territory.

In all jurisdictions except Victoria, protection orders issued prior to 25 November 2017 are not automatically nationally recognised, but can be 'declared' as a recognised order by a court to ensure the order is enforceable and applicant is protected nationwide, rather than just in the state or territory in which the order was issued (and any additional jurisdiction in which the order was previously registered). The protected person may apply to any local court in Australia for such a declaration.

Protection orders which were issued in Victoria prior to 25 November 2017 and which were still active at 25 November 2017 are automatically nationally recognised, without the need for the protected person to obtain a declaration. However, interstate orders that were registered in Victoria prior to 25 November 2017, rather than issued there, are not automatically nationally recognised and require declaration.

Protection orders issued in New Zealand on or after 25 November 2017 are not automatically nationally recognised in Australia, but can be registered in any Australian local court. Once registered, the New Zealand protection order is recognised and enforceable throughout Australian jurisdictions in the same way as Australian protection orders issued on or after 25 November 2017, or which have been declared.

Below is a table identifying the legislation in each state or territory that gives effect to the scheme, and under which an application to have a protection order issued before 25 November 2017 'declared' may be made.

For an overview click here.

National recognition of protection orders: provisions under state/territory domestic and family violence legislation

Jurisdiction	Protection order issued on or after 25 November 2017 recognised under:	Protection order issued prior to 25 November 2017 may be declared under:
Australian Capital Territory (ACT)	Part 9 Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)	Part 9 (Div 9.6) Family Violence Act 2016 (ACT)
New South Wales (NSW)	Part 13B Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)	Part 13B (Div. 6) Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)
Northern Territory (NT)	Chapter 3A Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT)	Chapter 3A (Part 3A.6) Domestic and Family Violence Act 2007 (NT)
Queensland (Qld)	Part 6 Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld)	Part 10 (Div. 3) Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 (Qld)
South Australia (SA)	Part 3A Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)	Part 3A (Div. 6) Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009 (SA)
Tasmania (Tas)	Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2016 (Tas)	Part 6 Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2016 (Tas)
Victoria (Vic)	National Domestic Violence Order Scheme Act 2016 (Vic)	Part 7 National Domestic Violence Order Scheme Act 2016 (Vic) Note: Victorian courts may still declare orders issued in other jurisdictions prior to 25 Nov 2017 as "recognised" in Victoria. Orders issued prior to 25 Nov 2017 in Victoria are automatically nationally recognised.
Western Australia (WA)	Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2017 (WA)	Part 6 (Div. 3) Domestic Violence Orders (National Recognition) Act 2017 (WA)

Further Resources:

National	https://familyviolencelaw.gov.au/domestic-violence-orders/what-if-i-move-interstate/
Australian Capital Territory	https://www.courts.act.gov.au/magistrates/o/courts/protection/How-to-register-an-order-from-another-State,-Territory-or-New-Zealand-in-the-ACT
New South Wales	https://legalanswers.sl.nsw.gov.au/hot-topics-domestic-violence/avos-other-states-and-territories
Northern Territory	https://nt.gov.au/law/courts-and-tribunals/domestic-violence-orders/dvo-now-enforced-nationally
Queensland	https://www.courts.qld.gov.au/going-to-court/domestic-violence/national-domestic-violence-order-scheme
South Australia	https://www.courts.sa.gov.au/going-to-court/representing-yourself/intervention-orders/
Tasmania	https://www.justice.tas.gov.au/national-domestic-violence-order-scheme
Victoria	https://www.mcv.vic.gov.au/intervention-orders/family-violence-intervention-orders/interstate-intervention-orders-fvio
Western Australia	https://www.magistratescourt.wa.gov.au/_files/Civil_Factsheet_46.pdf

Recognition of interstate orders - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 19 discusses the National Domestic Violence Order Scheme and its implementation in the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld) for the mutual recognition and enforcement of orders.

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

3.3 discusses the enforceability of interstate (and New Zealand) orders in Victoria.

Recognition of interstate orders - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

LawAccess NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence

- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Breach

Key points:

- Breach of a protection order attracts criminal penalties and the breach behaviour may also constitute an additional criminal offence and further penalties may be imposed.
- Undertakings given to courts are not enforceable (although may be considered an act of contempt).
- Mutual orders can minimise serious domestic and family violence by the predominant perpetrator as one party may be at greater risk of violence than the other.

Where a perpetrator breaches the conditions of an interim or final protection order, criminal penalties apply in all Australian state and territory jurisdictions. The breach behaviour may also constitute another criminal offence in the relevant jurisdiction (for example, assault or stalking) for which further criminal penalties may be imposed [Mackay et al 2015].

A breach of an undertaking given to the court is not enforceable (although it may be considered by the court an act of contempt), and should a person require protection in the event of further domestic and family violence, fresh application proceedings or an application to reinstate proceedings must be initiated. Mutual orders [Douglas & Fitzgerald 2013] may have the effect of minimising or neutralising serious domestic and family violence by one party on the basis that both parties are considered to be at fault, notwithstanding that one party is likely to be at greater risk of violence than the other.

Breach - Key Literature

Australia

Attorney-General's Department (Cth), 'Interim report to the Attorney-General in response to the first two terms of reference on families with complex needs and the intersection of the family law and child protection systems' (2015) Family Law Council.

See especially chapter 5 which considers 'integrated multi-jurisdiction family violence courts'. It provides an overview of the protection order system as well as the application process for obtaining a protection order in each state and territory. Appendix C contains a table of relevant legislation and terminology in each jurisdiction.

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114) 2010.

Many aspects of this report contain material relevant to domestic violence protection orders. Chapter 5 discusses the need for a 'common interpretative framework', in relation to definitions in family violence legislation with a view to increasing victim safety. Chapter 9 entitled 'Police and Family Violence' discusses police-issued protection orders (pp 368-371). Concerns with police-issued orders are discussed. Police duties to investigate/apply for a protection order are considered from pp 381-386. At p 420 consideration of 'bail conditions and protection order conditions'. The Report notes that bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. Chapter 11 considers protection orders and the criminal law. The Report notes that conditions prohibiting a respondent from locating or attempting to locate the victim are particularly important where victims are fleeing family violence, will not be appropriate in all cases (p 470-471) and notes that 'no contact' conditions ought to be minimised unless absolutely necessary, particularly in remote communities, so as to reduce the risk of unintentional breaches (p 471). Exclusion orders are considered from p 472. It was noted that exclusion orders are likely to be more effective and victims' safety would also be increased if reasonable steps are taken to secure temporary accommodation for perpetrators (p 479-480). Issues relating to the method and quality of evidence given in protection order proceedings are considered from p 843-864. The use of undertakings is considered from p 864-869. Protection orders made by consent are considered from p 869.

Cordier, Reinie, Donna Chung, Sarah Wilkes-Gillan and Renée Speyer, 'The Effectiveness of Protection Orders in Reducing Recidivism in Domestic Violence: A Systematic Review and Meta-Analysis' (2019) Trauma, Violence & Abuse (advance)

This article reviews the Australian and international literature on the effectiveness of protection orders in domestic violence cases. It presents a systematic review and meta-analysis, and identifies the factors associated with an increased risk of reoffending following a protection order being issued. It also compares differences in violation rates reported by victims and police and discusses issues in how the effectiveness of a protection order is defined and measured across various studies, beyond simple recidivism. The article finds mixed evidence on their effectiveness: protection orders were not effective in completely preventing violence toward the victim but some groups do report reduced subsequent violence.

Croucher, Rosalind, 'Family Law: Challenges for Responding to Family Violence in a Federal System' in Alan Hayes and Daryl Higgins Families, Policy and the Law: Selected Essays on Contemporary Issues for Australia (Australian Institute of Family Studies, 2014) 207.

This essay discusses (among other things) the interaction between state and territory-based civil protection orders and the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth), particularly in relation to children and child protection issues. See especially from p 209.

Douglas, Heather and Robin Fitzgerald, 'Legal Processes and Gendered Violence: Cross-Applications for Domestic Violence Protection Orders' (2013) 36(1) University of New South Wales Law Journal 56.

This article gives extensive consideration to the issue of cross-applications for domestic violence protection orders. It firstly considers feminist jurisprudence in the context of the development of the civil protection order system, particularly focusing on the issue of cross-applications. The complexities around the use of cross-orders are noted – 'a cross-order means much more than that the parties simply have a protective order. It has implications for the residence of children, engagement with the criminal justice system and most importantly victim safety' (p 86).

Dowling, Christopher, Anthony Morgan, Shann Hulme, Matthew Manning and Gabriel Wong, Protection orders for domestic violence: A systematic review (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 551 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Protection orders are a common legal response to domestic violence which aim to prevent further re-victimisation by the perpetrator.

The current study systematically reviews research into the use and impact of protection orders, using the EMMIE framework (Effectiveness, Mechanisms, Moderators, Implementation and Economy).

Meta-analysis is used to examine the overall effect of protection orders, while narrative synthesis is used to examine the underlying mechanisms and moderators of their effectiveness, their implementation and economic viability.

Protection orders are associated with a small but significant reduction in domestic violence. They appear to be more effective under certain circumstances, including when the victim has fewer ties to the perpetrator and a greater capacity for independence, and less effective for offenders with a history of crime, violence and mental health issues.

Gelb, Karen, 'Understanding Family Violence Court Proceedings: The Impact of Family Violence on the Magistrates' Court of Victoria' (2016) Karen Gelb Consulting.

This report prepared for the Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence contains data from family violence matters arising out of a study conducted in various Magistrates' Courts in Victoria. See especially from p 38, which summarises and discusses the data. Gelb notes that while the most common outcome is that the court issues an intervention order, many adjournments are still made. Gelb identifies that adjournments are often made to synchronise the civil matter with an associated criminal matter or, 'to allow police to undertake further discussions with the affected family member, to find out about related custody matters, or to provide more information on the precise circumstances of the incident' (p 40). Gelb notes that, 'The use of adjournments for either purpose may be problematic, both for the court (in terms of requiring additional court resources when matters are relisted) and for the parties (especially the affected family member, who must return to court time and again)' (p 40). Gelb observed that most orders where respondents were present in court were finalised by consent (p 38).

Jeffries, Samantha et al, 'Protecting Australia's Children: A Cross Jurisdictional Review of Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation' (2015) 22(6) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law, 800-813.

This article argues that domestic violence protection order legislation may offer an important legal option for the protection of children affected by domestic violence. The article reviews the provisions of State and Territory domestic violence protection order legislation to consider the focus on the protection of children and concludes that 'protection depends on the jurisdiction in which the child lives' (p 812).

See in particular at p 804 – 'Domestic violence protection orders offer a critical civil legal remedy for the protection of children at risk due to domestic violence. Protection orders have the potential to impact positively on the safety and welfare of children by providing non-violent caregivers and in some instances, other concerned parties (such as police and child protection workers), as well as the children themselves, a means of seeking legally enforceable protection'.

Jeffries, Samantha et al., 'Australian Domestic Violence Protection Order Legislation: A Comparative Quantitative Content Analysis of Victim Safety Provisions' (2013) 25(2) Current Issues in Criminal Justice 627.

This article uses comparative quantitative content analysis to assess the victim safety focus of domestic violence protection order legislation in each Australian state and territory. The authors consider four 'dimensions' of victim safety: protective scope of the legislation; specified matters to be considered by the court; procedural mechanisms and order options. The authors note that emergency orders of short duration with a limited range of conditions provides victims with less protection than orders in force for extended periods with unrestricted conditions that can be better suited to the individual circumstances of the case (p 634). The findings of the study are discussed at pp 637-638.

Katzen, Hayley, 'It's a Family Matter, Not a Police Matter: The Enforcement of Protection Orders' (2000) 14 (2) Australian Journal of Family Law 119-141.

This article considers police responses to breaches of protection orders that occur in the context of contact hand-overs. The study, upon which the article is based, found that officers rarely prosecute offenders for a violation of an order when it occurs during contact hand-overs. The article draws on data collected in the late 1990s: police reports of breaches of protections orders (n186); interviews with women (n32), focus groups with police (n33 police).

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This paper provides detailed discussion on perpetrator pathways in every state and territory in Australia. Civil protection orders are discussed at pp 3-4. Care should be taken as some jurisdictions have updated legislation since this resource was published.

Meyer, Silke & Rose Stambe (2022) Increasing compliance with domestic violence protection orders: investing in perpetrator education and support as an investment in victim and family safety, Policing and Society, 32:9, 1071-1086, DOI:10.1080/10439463.2021.2016756

Abstract: Domestic Violence (DV) is a persistent public health issue of global proportions affecting an estimated one in four women worldwide. Civil protection orders or domestic violence orders (DVO) are a legal tool used in many jurisdictions, including Australia, to hold the alleged perpetrators accountable and improve the safety of victims. However, the research on the effectiveness of these orders are mixed and perpetrator non-compliance with such orders continues to be a concern. Few studies examine the situational factors that impact compliance with orders, especially in relation to service engagement and support needs of perpetrators of DV during and beyond the protection order court process. Our study uses focus group data to explore the perceptions of police officers (n = 16) and prosecutors (n = 3) involved in policing and prosecuting DV and the compliance with relevant protection orders in two court districts in Queensland, Australia. Alleged perpetrators' comprehension of their order conditions and intersecting experiences of social disadvantage and complex needs emerged as key factors influencing compliance, along with the role of timely engagement with alleged perpetrators during the court process to maximise respondent comprehension of order conditions and engagement with available and relevant support services. In concluding, we highlight the importance of protective and preventive aspects of the DVO process that combine holistic wraparound support with perpetrator accountability in order to maximise perpetrator compliance and thus victim and family safety.

New South Wales Legislative Council Standing Committee on Social Issues, Domestic Violence Trends and Issues in NSW (Report 46, 2012).

Chapter 9 extensively considers protection orders (known as apprehended domestic violence orders (ADVOs)). ADVO conditions are considered from pp 250-260. It was noted that some ADVO conditions are unworkable and exclusion orders are often problematic. Moreover, where an ADVO is accompanied by an associated criminal charge there are often delays before the order is finalised, in which time the parties may have reconciled and it may not be appropriate to make the conditions of the final order the same as the interim order. Exclusion orders are considered from pp 254-256. Strategies to improve the effectiveness of ADVO conditions are considered at p256-257. These strategies include tailoring conditions to suit individual circumstances. The report notes that the response to domestic violence should be victim-centric, while at the same time ensuring that ADVO conditions are workable (p 258). It notes that impracticable ADVO conditions could be avoided using greater consultation with the respondent. Even a short conversation with the respondent may be sufficient (p 259).

Queensland Government, Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland, Not Now, Not Ever: Putting an End to Domestic and Family Violence in Queensland (2015).

Information sharing is a critical part of an integrated response to domestic and family violence. The report notes that '[t]he ability for different agencies to discuss cases and share relevant details on an ongoing basis is at the core of coordinating a tailored response to a person's individual circumstances. Effective and efficient information sharing ensures that victims of domestic and family violence do not have to re-tell their stories repeatedly to different service providers and enables service providers to provide timely responses, particularly in high-risk cases' (p 230). While there are clear benefits to information sharing, there is a need to ensure sufficient safeguards are in place to protect confidentiality (p 231). Unnecessary or inappropriate sharing of information could have negative consequences including: 'destroying relationships of trust between a service provider and a client, leading to disengagement of a client, becoming a barrier to victims' willingness to seek help (p 231). Similarly, "information can be untested or based on service provider opinion and could be highly prejudicial to one or both of the parties if used inappropriately in legal proceedings (p 231).

Stambe, R.-M., & Meyer, S. (2022). Police and Duty Lawyer Perceptions of Domestic Violence Protection Order Proceedings Involving Parents: Towards Greater System Accountability and Family-Centred Decision-Making. Journal of Family Violence. https://doi.org/10.1007/s10896-022-00449-8.

Abstract

Purpose: Domestic violence (DV) is a problem of global significance and remains a gendered issue that disproportionately affects women and children. Prevalence studies on women's experiences of DV suggest that around 50% of victims identify as mothers. The effects of DV on mothers and children are well documented, raising implications for their protection. Civil protection orders are a legal tool used to reduce and prevent experiences of DV. Research on protection order effectiveness is mixed with research suggesting that the ongoing relationship between a respondent and aggrieved parent around child contact presents ongoing opportunities for re-victimization. This study contributes to the scant literature on the implications of protection orders on parental responsibilities.

Method: The study draws on surveys with duty lawyers and focus groups with police officers. A thematic analysis was used to examine perceptions and experiences of 'no contact' protection orders and respondent parent non-compliance where mutual children are involved.

Results: Findings suggest that ambiguous 'no contact' conditions and a lack of clarity around their implications for child contact play a key role in respondent parent non-compliance, ranging from uninformed non-compliance to the strategic use of children as a form of coercive control in non-compliance.

Conclusion: Findings raise implications for specialist legal advice and support for parents affected by DV to sit alongside protection order court proceedings. Findings highlight the need for greater system accountability to ensure court-issued protection orders take a family-centred approach that align with parental responsibilities and ensure child and adult victims' safety and wellbeing.

Taylor, Annabel, Nada Ibrahim, Shellee Wakefield and Katrina Finn, Domestic and family violence protection orders in Australia: An investigation of information sharing and enforcement: State of knowledge paper (ANROWS, 2015).

Various tables summarising the position in each jurisdiction in relation to weapons, enforcement and information sharing, penalties and aiding and abetting are provided. See at pp 9, 11, 12, 15, 17 & 18. Care should be taken with this report as many jurisdictions have changed their legislation since this report was produced.

The authors note: “The penalties for breaches of protection orders vary across states and territories which can be expected given that each respective domestic violence law has had its own history of development and amendments. The maximum penalties for a breach of an order vary between 1 year and 5 years’ imprisonment with some variation for first or subsequent breach-related offences or other circumstances of aggravation. In almost all states (except South Australia) varying amounts of penalty units (or fines) may be applied instead of or in addition to the term of imprisonment”. There is an overview of available monetary penalties for breach of protection order in Australian jurisdictions as at 2015 on pages 16-17.

Victorian Royal Commission into Family Violence, (Volume 3, 2016).

This report contains extensive discussion of protection orders. See in particular from p 120 which discusses the ‘applicant experience’. Relevantly, delays in the protection order application process, particularly for interim orders, are considered from p 122. It was noted that initial delays in applications for interim orders can have detrimental effects on applicants such as an immediate and serious risk to the applicant’s safety – ‘To the extent that applying for an FVIO might signify a victim’s recognition that they are in danger and be a definitive step towards ending or altering a violent relationship, the application period will be a time of heightened risk for the applicant. During this period the victim does not have the protection of an intervention order and might not have had contact with police or specialist services’ (p 123). Delays caused by respondents are discussed at p 124. Often, there are legitimate reasons for delays caused by respondents to protection order applications – ‘Delays can be caused by the perpetrators lawful assertion of procedural rights; for example, it is not uncommon for the respondent to seek “further and better particulars” about the application and to be given the opportunity to consider those particulars. There may need to be an adjournment to allow the applicant to respond to that request’ (p 124).However, sometimes respondents abuse processes and cause delays without legitimate reasons. For example, respondents could make a cross-application without legitimate reasons (p 124). Other tactics include failing to appear at hearings, evading service of orders and seeking adjournments at short notice. The report observed that these tactics ‘are part of the violence perpetrated against the victim and are calculated to terrorise, disempower, humiliate and undermine the victim's attempts to protect herself (or himself) and other family members' (p 125). Furthermore, delays associated with parallel criminal proceedings are discussed from pp 126-127. Police applications for intervention orders are discussed at pp 128-129.

Wangmann, Jane, 'Gender and Intimate Partner Violence: A Case Study from NSW' (2010) 33(3) University of New South Wales Law Journal 945.

This article considers the issue of gender and its importance in understanding intimate partner violence (IPV) through an examination of the differences in men's and women's complaints for civil protection orders in New South Wales (known as Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders or ADVOs). This research focused on cross applications, that is, cases where the male and the female partner to a relationship are both making allegations that the other has used violence or abuse against them' (p 947). The case study of cross-applications in New South Wales at the problems with seeing domestic violence as discrete incidents, rather than the context of such acts of violence or abuse' (p 947).

Wilcox, Karen and Ludo McFerran, 'Staying Home, Staying Safe: the Value of Domestic Violence Protection Order Provisions in Homelessness Strategies' (2009) 294 Australian Law Reform Commission Journal 24.

This article considers the legal framework and broader relationship between homelessness and domestic violence. In doing so, it considers two provisions in protection order legislation which impact on homelessness – exclusion/ouster orders and court-ordered changes to residential tenancy agreements. Notes the concern about the property rights and accommodation needs of the defendant as well as 'deferral of occupancy issues to property settlements under family law, or a belief that exclusion is only warranted when the violence was physical…Community beliefs about 'rights' to real property has complicated the issue further' (p 25). The authors note that if exclusion orders are to be effective in safeguarding victims' safety and preventing homelessness, there is a need for a supportive service system, including funding for practical security measures in houses (p 26).

International

Conner, Dana Harrington, 'Civil Protection Order Duration: Proof, Procedural Issues and Policy Considerations' (2015) 24:2 Temple Political and Civil Rights Law Review 343.

This article gives extensive consideration to the debate around the duration of civil protection orders in the American context. See also from p 369, where the author discusses the appropriate duration of orders in relation to specific types of domestic and family violence behaviours. The article concludes – 'A "one size fits all" solution to duration is enticing because it avoids many complicated issues related to enacting laws that both define duration and provide guidelines that judges will follow when fixing order length. '(pp 373-374).

Goldfarb, Sally F, 'Reconceiving Civil Protection Orders for Domestic Violence: Can Law Help End the Abuse without Ending the Relationship?' (2008) 29 Cardozo Law Review 1487.

This American article extensively considers the nature and efficacy of civil protection orders in preventing domestic violence. It contains an overview and critique of civil protection orders. It then considers expanding the role of civil protection orders by offering protection orders that do not terminate the parties' relationship. The article considers the use of protection orders in ongoing relationships (p 1551).

Jordan, Carol et al, 'The Denial of Emergency Protection: Factors Associated with Court Decision Making' (2008) 23 Violence and Victims 603.

This American study examines cases where victims of intimate partner violence are denied access to temporary orders of protection. The study sample included a review of 2,205 petitions that had been denied by a Kentucky court during the 2003 fiscal year. The study offers important insights into the characteristics of petitioners and respondents to denied orders and outlines individual, contextual, structural, qualitative/perceptual, and procedural factors associated with the denial of temporary or emergency protective orders.

Murphy, Jane C, 'Engaging with the State: The Growing Reliance on Lawyers and Judges to Protect Battered Women' (2003) 11(2) American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and Law 499-521.

Part II (p 503) of this article discusses battered women's use of civil protection orders, drawing on a prior

American study into the use of protection orders. The authors found that having an attorney substantially increased the rate of success in obtaining a protection order' (p 511). Also, it was noted that a substantial sample of women surveyed considered filing for a civil protection order a 'helpful strategy' (p 509).

Roberts, James C, Loreen Wolfer and Marie Mele, 'Why Victims of Intimate Partner Violence Withdraw Protection Orders' (2008) Journal of Family Violence 23(5) 369-375.

In this American study fifty-five women who were in the process of withdrawing a protection order against a male intimate partner were surveyed. Recognizing that reasons given for withdrawing a protection order often follow common themes, individual responses were organized into several "domains," or groupings of such reasons. The most commonly cited domain involved a "concrete change" on behalf of the victim or defendant, which made the protection order less necessary in the victim's view. This was closely followed by the domain addressing emotional attachment to the abuser. Implications for future research and policy are discussed. See in particular at p 373 – 'Taken together, these findings suggest that, among this sample of women, concrete change (especially the defendant actually attending counseling or rehabilitation) and emotional attachment (especially no longer fearing the defendant) interacted to create a push/pull relationship between the offender and victim where the victim's faith in programs aimed at helping batterers overcome their abusive behavior and the victim's emotional attachment to the offender lead the victim to no longer feel that the (protection order) was necessary.'

Topliffe, Elizabeth, 'Why Civil Protection Orders are Effective Remedies for Domestic Violence but Mutual Protection Orders Are Not' (1991-1992) 67 Indiana Law Journal 1039.

This American article firstly considers the advantages and disadvantages of civil protection orders. It then discusses mutual orders (orders made against both the perpetrator and the victim of domestic violence). It concludes that mutual orders harm women, in contrast to ordinary protection orders which are effective. Concerns about mutual protection orders include due process issues, in particular where mutual orders are issued without hearing any evidence or only hearing evidence about the violent behaviour of one party (p 1056-1060). There are also concerns about the accountability of the perpetrator – 'The issuance of a mutual order can reinforce the batterer's belief that the problem is not his but is the result of external factors. He could easily understand a mutual protection order to mean that the court blames the victim as much as the batterer. The implication is that there is no accountability by the batterer' (p 1060-1061). The victim could also recognise this message and blame themselves for the abuse. Other concerns with mutual orders are discussed at pp 1061-1064.

Zoellner, Lori et al, 'Factors Associated With the Completion of the Restraining order Process in Female Victims of Partner Violence' (2000) 15(10) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 1081.

This American study examined factors associated with completion of this process. Sixty-five women who initiated the process of securing a restraining order against a male partner participated in the study. Participants completed an interview, self-report measures, and were followed up to determine final restraining order status. Less than half of the women who initiated the process obtained final orders. Women who indicated an attachment to the abusive partner were less likely to complete the process. "Perceived threat to the women facilitated persistence with the process; however, when the threat involved her children, women were less likely to persist. Understanding factors influencing persistence in help seeking, especially attachment and threat, is a crucial step toward enhancing interventions to facilitate efforts toward violence-free lives" (p 1081).

Breach - Other Bench Books

NSW

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [22-000] discusses the procedures for dealing with applications for Apprehended Violence Orders, hearing applications, the making and variation of orders, consent orders, duration and conditions, and the National Domestic Violence Order recognition scheme.

QLD

Magistrates Court, Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

This bench book discusses in detail the legislation, case law and procedural issues relating to application proceedings for protection orders under the Domestic and Family Violence Act 2012 (Qld),including the jurisdiction of Magistrates and Judicial Registrars (Chapter 2); police, private and cross applications (Chapter 3); service of applications (Chapter 4); hearing of applications (Chapter 5); making a temporary protection order (Chapter 6); making a protection order (Chapter 7); consent orders (Chapter 8); naming of parties and standard/other conditions in orders (Chapter 9); duration of orders (Chapter 10); explanation of orders (Chapter 11); service of orders (Chapter 12); variation of orders (Chapter 13); and breach of an order (Chapter 20.1).

Vic

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.1 discusses the intervention order process. 2.2 discusses making interim and final intervention orders, and conditions of orders. 2.3 discusses changing orders.

WA

Department of Justice (WA), Equal Justice Bench Book (2nd edition September 2021).

Section 13.9.3 entitled ‘Restraining Orders’, contains practical points for judicial officers to consider in restraining order applications (particularly in relation to children). For example,

- ‘When considering whether to make a violence restraining order, you should have regard to the need to ensure that children are not exposed to acts of family and domestic violence.
- You should not assume that children who are not direct targets of violence want or will benefit from contact with the perpetrator of violence…
- Be aware that restraining orders may be used by perpetrators of domestic violence as a way to control and punish the primary victim…
- If an applicant has not contacted an external support agency prior to the application for a restraining order you may wish to let them know that such support is available. A list of agencies and organisations which help people who are at risk of family and domestic violence can be found at the end of this chapter.’

Breach - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

LawAccess NSW and Legal Aid NSW, Apprehended Violence Orders.

An online resource with clear and comprehensive information about Apprehended Violence Orders in NSW, including:

- types of AVO
- the application process
- going to court
- after court
- Victims Support Scheme
- immigration issues
- protection of children
- defending an AVO
- family law issues

LawInfo Northern Territory, Domestic Violence.

LawInfoNT is an open access website with plain language information about the law, including domestic violence. The information is presented in a variety of formats for easy comprehension. The domestic violence section sets out a series of commonly asked questions and answers relating to: the nature of DV, types of DVOs, applications for DVOs, protection of children, property damage, breach of DVO, other support services.

Legal Aid ACT, Domestic and Family Violence.

Legal Aid ACT's Domestic Violence and Personal Protection Order Unit offers a service to assist with:

- applications for DVOs
- understanding and responding to DVOs
- non-legal solutions and support services

Legal Aid Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence.

This section of the Legal Aid Qld website provides information about: the nature of DFV, applying for a DFV protection order, the types of protection orders, children and protection orders, complying with a protection order, DFV duty lawyer services, and useful factsheets to help applicants and respondents navigate the legal system.

Legal Aid Western Australia, Family violence and your safety.

This section of the website helps users to understand the nature of family violence, the help available including protection orders, and how the family law deals with cases involving family violence.

Legal Services Commission of South Australia, Domestic Violence Advice.

The Commission provides services free of charge to assist with domestic violence matters, including:

- intervention orders
- the victim's role and rights in the criminal justice process
- family law matters
- child welfare matters
- credit, debt and housing matters
- immigration matters arising as a result of domestic violence
- application for legal aid or referrals to other services.

National Legal Aid, Family Violence Law Help.

A national online resource to: assist people affected by domestic and family violence; promote State and Territory advocacy and support services; and clearly explain the operation of Australia's various laws and courts in domestic and family violence matters.

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Victoria Legal Aid, Violence, abuse and personal safety.

This webpage provides information about violent behaviour, abuse and personal safety, including Family violence intervention orders and the Commonwealth Family Violence and Cross-Examination of Parties Scheme.

Breach - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Susan

Breach - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

Suksa-Ngacharoen v Regina [2018] NSWCCA 142 (10 August 2018) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

Wilson J said at [132]:

> 'The criminality of breaching an ADVO rests in the complete disregard for an order of a court, conduct which has the practical effect of undermining the authority of the courts, and preventing the courts from extending effective protection to persons at risk of harm from another. The legislative intent of the scheme for apprehended domestic violence orders is to permit a court to restrain the conduct of an individual who poses a risk to a person with whom he or she is or was in a domestic relationship… Conduct which involves deliberate disobedience of a court order must be treated as serious, and should ordinarily be separately punished from any offence that occurs at the same time, always having regard to the requirements of the totality principle as set out in Pearce v The Queen (1989) 194 CLR 610.'

Director of Public Prosecutions (Victoria) v Turner [2017] VSC 358 (23 June 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

Bell J at [18]: That you committed this contravention in circumstances associated with the crime of manslaughter is a very serious matter. Family violence intervention orders are not worthless pieces of paper. The general purpose of a family violence intervention order is to provide legally enforceable protection for the safety of the individual, usually a woman at risk of violence from a man.

Queensland Police Service v KBH [2023] QDC 26 (16 February 2023) – Queensland District Court

In holding that the sentences were manifestly inadequate Coker DCJ observed:

[30] With the greatest of respect to the learned Magistrate, these were not minor breaches by any stretch of the imagination. Rather, they were repeat instances of exactly the behaviour which had previously led to periods of imprisonment being imposed in relation to this matter.

[31] I set out at some length those particular issues in relation to this matter because, in my assessment, it is important that they be detailed so as to explain the reason why, in my assessment, this appeal must be upheld. It was not simply a situation where the penalty imposed was more lenient than might have been expected or, more particularly, more lenient than I might have imposed in relation to this matter. Rather, it was manifestly inadequate and, as indicated within the cases, an imposition in relation to the matter which simply indicates that it was unreasonable and inadequate in all of the circumstances; noting particularly, as I do, the acknowledgement on the part of the respondent himself, that imprisonment was well within range.

[32] I am satisfied, that, therefore, the imposition of a fine of a very lenient character in itself is simply outside the range of what might have been appropriate in relation to this matter. In that regard, I note particularly the more recent developments in relation to the domestic violence legislation, and of the very real need to accept that domestic violence is something far more than simply the imposition of physical force by one party to an intimate relationship upon another. There are a multitude of means by which there can be control exercised upon another and it is important, in fact, in my view, overwhelmingly so, that penalties imposed reflect the recognition of the importance of ensuring that such behaviours do not continue.

[33] As was indicated by President McMurdo, as her Honour then was. In R v Fairbrother; ex parte the Attorney-General [2005] QCA 105 the following was said:

> Domestic violence has a deleterious on-going impact not only on the immediate victim but on the victim's wider family and ultimately on the whole of society. It is not solely a domestic issue; it is a crime against the State warranting salutary punishment ... Perpetrators of serious acts of domestic violence must know that society will not tolerate such behaviour. They can expect the Courts to impose significant sentences of imprisonment involving actual custody to deter not only individual offenders, but also others who might otherwise think they can commit such acts with near impunity.

[34] I would hasten to add here that this is not a serious act of domestic violence but it is a repeat act of domestic violence in circumstances where, clearly, the respondent to this appeal has failed to accept the opportunities previously given and, as such, more significant penalties are appropriately required to be imposed in relation to this matter. It is not a situation where the offending is minor or trivial, lacking in real impact. It has continued to impact upon the aggrieved and, as identified by President McMurdo in R v Fairbrother, is a situation where it is a crime against the State warranting salutary punishment.

[35] Here it is clear, in circumstances where the respondent had prior convictions, 10 it is submitted, - for domestic violence offences, all against this same aggrieved, and had previously been sentenced to various penalties, including terms of imprisonment subject to operational periods for suspended sentences, that it was a significant consideration, as well as the fact that the reoffending occurred only 21 days after the most recent sentence, prior to coming before the Court.

[36] In my view the imposition of a fine was unreasonable and unjust. It fell below what could even be considered the most lenient of penalties that might be imposed in relation to the matter and, as I have indicated, it is my view, therefore, that the appeal must be successful.

In accepting the appellant's submission that the sentence imposed was so lenient that it should be considered an erroneous exercise of the court's jurisdiction, and it amounts to a manifestly inadequate sentence that ought to be corrected on appeal, citing JRB v Bird [2009] QDC 277, TZL v QPS [2015] QDC 171, PFM v QPS [2017] QDC 210 and Queensland Police Service v JSB [2018] QDC 120, Coker DCJ observed:

[38] What those particular cases show is that there are significantly greater penalties warranted in relation to offending, even where there are not direct indications of domestic violence of a physical character. As was clear in each of those cases, penalties can and should be imposed which reflect the continued and repetitive nature of offending and of the very real need to ensure that there is a clear indication, not only to the individual offender but also to the community at large, that such offending will be met with significant penalties.

Undertakings

Key points:

- Accepting an undertaking may compromise the safety of a victim.
- Breach of undertakings given to courts are not enforceable (although may be considered an act of contempt).
- Victim fear of the perpetrator may cause them to feel pressure or intimidation to accept an undertaking and not proceed with their application for a protection order.
- Family court proceedings may give little or no weight to an undertaking.
- It is important that a victim understands the implications of accepting an undertaking before agreeing to withdraw their application.

A victim of domestic and family violence seeking a protection order may agree to withdraw their application on the basis that the perpetrator provides an undertaking to the court to do, or refrain from doing, certain things. The undertaking may include the same types of conditions and prohibitions as may be included in a protection order. Undertakings may be given orally or in writing and signed. There may be cases where both parties provide undertakings to the court [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

Concerns have been raised about the use of undertakings in domestic and family violence proceedings, including:

- An undertaking is no more than a promise (made to the court) by the perpetrator to refrain from further domestic and family violence. The perpetrator may have previously broken similar promises made to the victim and others [Vic FVBB 2014].
- A victim may feel pressured or intimidated by the perpetrator into accepting an undertaking rather than proceeding with their application for a protection order. This may be due to the victim's ongoing fear of the perpetrator who may use the court process to continue to exercise control over the victim [Vic FVBB 2014]; or, if the victim is self-represented, a lack of understanding of the process. There may also be pressures on the judicial officer to expedite the resolution of the matter [LRCWA 2014].
- Unlike a breach of a protection order, a breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence and is unenforceable (although it may be considered by the court an act of contempt). Accepting an undertaking may therefore compromise the safety of a victim. If an undertaking is breached, and the victim still requires protection, they must return to the court and make a fresh application for a protection order [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

- In proceedings before the Family Court of Australia or the Federal Circuit Court of Australia, the court may give an undertaking little or no weight as it is not considered an order of the court [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

It is however also acknowledged that there may be circumstances where an undertaking is the most appropriate outcome in a particular case. For example:

- Accepting an undertaking may be the first step a victim is prepared to take in seeking protection against domestic and family violence. Should the violence continue, it may encourage the victim to seek a protection order.
- Where there is insufficient evidence to support the making of a protection order. A breach of the undertaking may however be evidentiary support in a subsequent protection order application [Vic FVBB 2014].

Where a judicial officer decides that an undertaking is the most appropriate outcome in a particular case, it is important that the victim understands the consequences of accepting an undertaking, especially where they are self-represented [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

Undertakings - Key Literature

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Family Violence – A National Legal Response (Report 114, 2010).

Undertakings – Chapter 18

18.153 A person seeking a protection order may agree to withdraw his or her application on the basis that the person against whom the protection order is sought (the respondent) provides an undertaking. An undertaking is a promise to the court that a person will do, or refrain from doing, certain things. Usually, the undertaking will include the same types of conditions and prohibitions which could have been included in the protection order had it been issued. Undertakings may either be given orally by the respondent or the respondent's lawyer, or given in writing and signed. It is also possible for both the applicant and respondent to give undertakings to the court.

18.156 …unlike breach of a protection order, breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence and cannot be enforced. Agreeing to an undertaking instead of pursuing an application for a protection order may, therefore, compromise the protection and safety of a victim of family violence…Stakeholders noted that victims of family violence who have accepted an undertaking often return to court to seek a protection order because the undertaking has been breached. In such cases, both the undertaking and the breach may be used as evidence in support of an application for a protection order.

18.157 …there is a concern that victims of family violence may be pressured into withdrawing an application for a protection order and accepting an undertaking, particularly where that party is unrepresented.

18.158 …the Initiating Application (Family Law) form, which must be completed by a person wishing to commence proceedings in a federal family court, asks if there are any existing undertakings to a court about family violence issues concerning any of the parties or children in the application. There is, however, no obligation on parties to inform a court exercising jurisdiction under the Family Law Act about undertakings in relation to family violence, nor is the existence of an undertaking a specified factor to be considered when determining the best interests of a child. A number of stakeholders expressed the view that while information about undertakings is sometimes included in affidavits, federal family courts give them little weight because undertakings are not orders of a court.

Recommendation 18–4 State and territory courts should require that undertakings by a person against whom a protection order is sought should be in writing on a standard form. The form should require each party to sign an acknowledgment that he or she understands that:

(a) breach of an undertaking is not a criminal offence nor can it be otherwise enforced;

(b) the court's acceptance of an undertaking does not preclude further action by the applicant to address family violence; and

(c) evidence of breach of an undertaking may be used in later proceedings.

Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, Enhancing Family and Domestic Violence Laws (Final Report 2014).

Undertakings

In its Discussion Paper (at pp121-123) the Commission referred to a number of concerns among stakeholders in relation to undertakings. Undertakings are promises by one party (or sometimes both parties) not to behave in a particular manner and are sometimes entered into by parties in lieu of a final violence restraining order. An undertaking may contain the same types of conditions as would ordinarily be included in a violence restraining order. There is nothing in the Restraining Orders Act that deals with undertakings and, although they can be made orally or in writing, the Commission understands that, generally, undertakings in Western Australia are made in writing. There is no sanction for failing to comply with this type of undertaking and they are not enforceable by the police. However, a breach of an undertaking may be evidence to support a future application for a violence restraining order.

There was significant concern expressed during consultations that victims of family and domestic violence are being pressured into accepting undertakings instead of proceeding with their application for a violence restraining order. This pressure may arise because of a fear of or lack of understanding of the process or because the applicant is unrepresented. It was suggested that pressure to enter into undertakings is sometimes applied by the magistrate because of workload and court listing demands.

Victorian Law Reform Commission, Review of Family Violence Laws (Report 2005).

This report reviews the Victorian justice system's response to family violence—particularly the intervention order system—and provides detailed recommendations for improvement. Undertakings are dealt with at pp296-303 of the report.

Undertakings

8.126 Under the current intervention order system, applicants for intervention orders are sometimes persuaded by the magistrate, the respondent's lawyer or their own lawyer to accept an undertaking from the perpetrator rather than go ahead with an application for an intervention order. When respondents make an undertaking to the court, they agree to refrain from behaving in a certain way, such as assaulting, harassing, or threatening the protected person. The Act does not provide for the respondent to give an undertaking as an alternative to the court making an intervention order. If respondents breach an undertaking, they have not committed an offence and the police cannot take any action unless another criminal offence has been committed.

8.127 Under the Magistrates' Court Family Violence and Stalking Protocols, the giving of an undertaking results in the applicant withdrawing the intervention order application. If the respondent fails to adhere to the undertaking, the applicant can complete a 'Notice of Reinstatement' which reinstates the application. The protocols also state: It is preferable that any undertaking document used NOT look like a Court order to avoid confusion. It should also have a statement on it 'This is not an intervention order'.

8.128 In 2004–05, approximately 1000 applications for intervention orders were withdrawn, with the respondent accepting an undertaking rather than an intervention order. This represents 5% of all applications for family violence intervention orders.

Recommendations

99. The Magistrates' Court Protocols should state that an undertaking should only be accepted by the court where the court is satisfied that:

- the applicant fully understands the consequences of accepting an undertaking (eg if the applicant has received legal advice or is legally represented);
- in all the circumstances of the case, it is more appropriate to accept an undertaking rather than make an intervention order.

100. The Magistrates' Court Protocols should state that when deciding whether it is appropriate to accept an undertaking, the court should have regard to:

- the respondent's age (ie that an undertaking may be more appropriate where the respondent is aged under 18 years);
- the nature of the violence perpetrated by the respondent, as disclosed in the application; and
- whether making an intervention order with a condition that the respondent not assault or harass the applicant as the only condition is more appropriate in all the circumstances of the case, rather than accepting an undertaking.

101. The Magistrates' Court Protocols should make it clear that an undertaking has the legal effect of suspending the intervention order application for the period of the undertaking. If an undertaking is breached, the applicant has a right of reinstatement of the original application or may make a new application for an interim order.

Undertakings - Other Bench Books

Australia

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

2.2.4 discusses the advantages and limitations of undertakings when deciding whether to accept an undertaking instead of making an interim or a final order, with safety being the paramount consideration.

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2021).

In Section 16.10.11.5: Concerns about undertakings: Domestic violence context, the bench book raises these questions in the context of Hague Convention matters:

- ‘Are undertakings from a parent who has engaged in domestic violence or who has demonstrated disrespect for law or who has a history of non-compliance with court orders likely to be reliable?’
- ‘What happens to the safety of the custodial parent and child if the undertaking parent decides to ignore or to retract the undertakings upon the child’s return in the other jurisdiction?’

Undertakings - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Susan

Summary of considerations

The following table sets out a range of issues for consideration by judicial officers in protection order application proceedings. It is not an exhaustive list. There may be other issues requiring specific attention depending on the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

Issue	Consider
Safety of individuals	Who requires protection – applicant/victim, children, others (including extended family)
	Who is/not in attendance
	Protection necessary/available in courtroom and court precinct
	Appropriateness of remote witness facilities
Risk	Nature and extent of domestic and family violence behaviours alleged Respondent/perpetrator's use of/access to/location of/licences for firearms or other weapons
	Living and work/school/study arrangements of all affected parties
	Risk factors – general, and specific to particular case incl parties' vulnerabilities (eg health, disability, cultural and linguistic)
	Need for assessment of risk of future domestic and family violence
Consent/disclosure	Whether applicant/victim's capacity to consent or disclose may be affected
	Consent in the context of applicant/victim agreeing to consent orders (see below)
	Consent in the context of applicant/victim agreeing to withdraw application (see below)
Existing orders – Children/parenting	Family law or child protection orders – availability of/access to copies, specific conditions
	Whether child contact with respondent/perpetrator is safe for child, applicant/victim
Existing orders – Respondent/perpetrator	Bail or sentencing orders – availability of/access to copies, specific conditions

	Availability of/access to police records
Practical issues affecting ongoing parenting & family law matters	Proximate timing of listed Family Court/Federal Circuit Court hearing re parenting matters and whether safe and appropriate to defer protection order application proceedings pending outcome of hearing
	Where no current application for parenting orders, whether naming children as protected parties on protection order will unduly impact on outcome of any subsequent parenting proceedings
	How parties will communicate re safe changeover arrangements, joint parenting decisions, ongoing joint financial/business and family law matters if one or both are self-represented
Procedure	Matters affecting fair hearing – conduct of proceedings, availability and use of remote witness facilities, legal representation, interpreters/translators, support person in court, referral to support services
	Need for/length of adjournment/s – timely decision making
Protection order conditions	Naming protected parties – applicant/victim, children, others
	Tailoring conditions to reflect particular circumstances of the case
	Prohibition of certain domestic and family violence behaviours against protected parties
	Prohibition on respondent/perpetrator from contacting or being within a certain distance of protected parties or their residence, workplace, or other location/s
	Prohibition on respondent/perpetrator's possession/use of firearms or other weapons
	Prohibition on respondent/perpetrator from causing another person to engage in conduct prohibited by the order
	Exclusion of respondent/perpetrator from protected person's residence
	If child contact with respondent/perpetrator is not safe for child or other protected parties – consider no contact or alternative safe contact arrangements (eg contact centre)
	If family law order inconsistent with proposed protection order – vary family law order to ensure consistency (s 68R Family Law Act 1975 (Cth))
	If no family law order and child contact with respondent/perpetrator is safe for child and other protected parties – consider specific conditions dealing with contact arrangements (and negotiation of) consistent with protection order

	If child protection order – consider whether consistent/need for consistency
	If bail or sentencing orders – consider whether consistent/need for consistency
	Duration – proportionate to risk and protected parties' need for protection, observe any legislative prescriptions
Cross application – Mutual protection orders	Whether the cross application by the respondent/perpetrator may be intended to further harass, control or abuse the applicant/victim
	Whether the risk of further domestic and family violence to each party is equivalent or one is at greater risk than the other
	Whether the mutual orders may have the effect of minimising the domestic and family violence experienced by one party
Protection orders by consent	Whether applicant/victim's agreement to accept consent order may not be voluntary
	Whether order made with or without admission of matters of fact Possible effects of consent orders without admission of matters of fact
Undertakings – single/mutual	Whether protection order a more appropriate response
	Whether applicant/victim's agreement to accept undertaking may not be voluntary Recording and notifying the parties of the limitations of undertaking: unenforceable; breach not a criminal offence
Withdrawal of application	Whether applicant/victim's withdrawal/agreement to withdraw may not be voluntary
Explanation of protection orders	Protected parties – how the order protects, specific conditions relating to children/contact arrangements, rights in the event of breach, query personal safety plans, available victim support programs
	Respondent/perpetrator – consequences of breach, denounce domestic and family violence, encourage compliance and participation in any behavioural change programs, recommend seeking legal advice

Sample conditions

Overview

In many jurisdictions there are standard directions and conditions included in a protection order; these vary to some extent between jurisdictions due to differences in legislation and practice. The following sections provide examples of plain English directions and conditions that may, where appropriate, be adapted by judicial officers to the particular case and jurisdiction. In addition to ensuring the protection of people and belongings, it may also be necessary in particular cases to impose conditions for the protection of pets and other animals. 'You' refers to the person against whom the protected person/people is/are protected. These examples are drawn from the documents referenced in 'Other resources'.

General Directions

(a) You must follow all of the directions and conditions of this court order. It is a criminal offence not to follow this court order, even if you only attempt to, and no matter what reason you may have. If you are convicted, you could go to prison or be fined. You could also be charged with other criminal offences. If you are convicted of these offences, you could receive a longer prison sentence or higher fine.

(b) You must follow this court order even if the Protected Person/People doesn't/don't want you to, or tells/tell you that you don't need to, or make/makes contact with you first.

(c) You must not cause, allow or encourage another person to do anything forbidden by this court order.

(d) You will be personally responsible whether you act or speak or publish pictures, photos or recordings in person or through another person or through any other means, including electronic communication and devices, for example, by post, facsimile, phone, text messages, emails, skype, Facebook or other social networking site or internet platform, or GPS tracking.

(e) When the child of Protected Person, […] is born, that child will also be a Protected Person protected by this court order.

(f) You must follow this court order until […] OR You must always follow this court order.

(g) You have consented to this court order without admitting any facts about what has happened previously.

Conditions About Behaviour

1. You must be of good behaviour towards the Protected Person/People and you must not commit domestic and family violence against the Protected Person/People.
2. You must not do any of the following to the Protected Person/People:
   (a) assault or threaten;
   (b) stalk, harass or intimidate;
   (c) intentionally or recklessly destroy or damage any property or pet that belongs to them (even if it belongs only partly to the protected person/people) or is in their possession.

Conditions About Contact

3. You must not approach the Protected Person/People within […] metres.
4. You must not contact the Protected Person/People in any way, unless through a lawyer/this person […].
5. You must not approach within […] metres of the boundary of:
   (a) any place the Protected Person/People might go to for work;
   (b) the school or any other place the Protected Person/People might go to for study or training;
   (c) any place the Protected Person/People might go to for childcare;
   (d) any other place listed here: […]
6. You must not approach within […] metres or be in the company of the Protected Person/People for at least 12 hours after drinking alcohol or taking illicit drugs.
7. You must not try to find the Protected Person/People, unless ordered by a court.

Conditions About Family Law and Parenting

8. You must not approach within […] metres or contact the Protected Person/People in any way, unless:

(a) through a lawyer; or

(b) to attend legally accredited or court-approved counselling, mediation or conciliation; or

(c) as ordered by this or another court to enable contact with any children; or

(d) as agreed in writing between you and the parent/s and/or the person with parental responsibility to enable contact with any children.

9. You must follow the conditions of the Order made by Justice […] of the FCCA/FCA on […], which is revived/varied/discharged/suspended by this court order as follows: […].

Conditions About Where You Cannot Go

10. You must not live at:
    (a) the same address as the Protected Person/People; or
    (b) any address listed here: […].

11. You must not go within the boundary of:
    (a) any place where the Protected Person/People lives/live;
    (b) any place where the Protected Person/People works/work;
    (c) any place where the Protected Person/People studies or trains/study or train;
    (d) any place listed here: […].

12. You must not go within […] metres of the boundary of:
    (a) any place where the Protected Person/People lives/live;
    (b) any place where the Protected Person/People works/work;
    (c) any place where the Protected Person/People studies or trains/study or train;
    (d) any place listed here: […].

Conditions About Belongings

13. You are allowed to collect these belongings […] from this address […] between these times […] on this date […], but only if a police officer/this person […] attends with you.
14. You are allowed to collect these belongings […] from this address […] between these times […] on this date […].
15. You must return these belongings […] to this address […] between these times […] on this date […], and you must have a police officer/this person […] attend with you.
16. You must return these belongings […] to this address […] between these times […] on this date […].
17. You must allow the Protected Person/People attended by a police officer/this person […] to collect these belongings […] from this address […] between these times […] on this date […].
18. You must allow the Protected Person/People to collect these belongings […] from this address […] between these times […] on this date […].

Conditions About Weapons

19. You must not possess any firearms, ammunition or any of these weapons or articles: […].
20. You must immediately surrender your licence/permit […] to the relevant authority.
21. You must use this firearm/weapon: […] only on these conditions: […].

Conditions About Intervention Programs

22. You must contact […] and make and attend an appointment for assessment, and if assessed as suitable, undertake any intervention program advised as appropriate and comply with any direction given by your case manager.

Sample conditions - Other Resources

Australian Government: Attorney-General's Department, National Domestic Violence Order Scheme.

An online resource with information on the national recognition and enforcement of protection orders throughout Australia. It contains links to information in numerous languages, as well as links to state and territory courts.

- Cannon, A and AIJA, Draft recommendations for standard national intervention orders.
- Judicial College of Victoria, Decision making in family violence intervention order matters: prescriptive requirements and limitations.
- NSW Final apprehended domestic violence order (pdf).
- SA intervention order proforma (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 1) (pdf).
- Queensland Courts, Southport Domestic and Family Violence Specialist Court (orders 2) (pdf).

Queensland Courts, Domestic violence videos (2016).

'This series of videos explain the court process for domestic and family violence to provide [people] with the information [needed] to take part in the legal process'. Whilst these videos were developed in Queensland, they offer some general observations that may provide assistance for those in other jurisdictions. These videos include:

- What is domestic and family violence?
- What is a Domestic Violence Order?
- How to apply for a Protection Order.
- What happens in court?
- What if I'm served?
- Understanding the conditions of a Domestic Violence Order.

Perpetrator interventions

Information in this section focuses on perpetrator intervention programs that work intensively with men who perpetrate domestic and family violence; these programs are generally referred to as Men's Behaviour Change Programs (MBCPs). Importantly, the need for integrated responses to domestic and family violence including the integration of perpetrator programs within the wider system is increasingly recognised including within the Council of Australian Government's (COAG) National Outcome Standards for Perpetrator Interventions (NOSPI) [Perpetrator Interventions National Standards 2015], and is "crucial in terms of holding men accountable for their behaviour" and increasing the safety of victims [Mackay et al 2015 Part 1]. When considering referral to a MCBP, the priority should be the safety of the victim and children. Where appropriate, judicial officers should seek evidence of behaviour change following program completion and prior to consideration of further orders.

Evaluating the effectiveness of MBCPs is costly and complex, with little research [Urbis 2013] conducted in Australia to date [Chung et al 2014]. Recent research [Bloomfield & Dixon 2015] of Domestic Violence Perpetrator Program effectiveness in the UK [Kelly & Westmarland 2015] has suggested some positive outcomes. However evidence from the US [Eckhardt et al 2013] concerning Batterer Intervention Programs [Buzawa et al 1999] (which have less in common with most Australian programs than their UK counterparts) are more mixed and subject to significant methodological limitations [Centre for Innovative Justice Report 2015]. Most evaluations, for example, have failed to consider the multiple ways in which these programs contribute towards the safety of women and children, and operate as part of an integrated service system rather than as stand-alone interventions.

Options for referral of those perpetrating domestic and family violence to an intervention program vary between jurisdictions. As a general principle, earlier intervention is preferable in order to minimise further offending and costs to the community [Centre for Innovative Justice Report 2015]. In civil proceedings within some jurisdictions a respondent may be ordered to attend an intervention program either as a condition of a protection order, or in some states through specific provisions (Vic - Counselling Orders; Qld - Intervention Orders; cf NSW – Apprehended Domestic Violence Orders can only prohibit behaviours not compel participation in programs [Mackay et al 2015 Part 2]). In criminal matters options include bail conditions, probation or parole order conditions, with the latter having the advantage of being overseen by corrections officers. The consent of the offender is preferable (ideally supported through informal court support processes) and assists in engagement and compliance, but is not necessarily a prerequisite for successful intervention.

While generally referred to as Men's Behaviour Change Programs (MBCPs) in Australia, other jurisdictions may refer to these programs as Stopping Violence Programs (New Zealand), Domestic Violence Perpetrator Programs (United Kingdom), or Batterer Intervention Programs (United States). MBCPs are run by community-sector or government organisations and should have demonstrated experience, understanding and skill in specialist domestic and family violence work. In some states (WA, Qld, Vic & NSW) these programs operate according to minimum standards or professional practice guidelines, with movement in other states and territories and at a national level to similarly adopt agreed minimums of practice [Other Resources].

Programs for women who perpetrate domestic and family violence are different in a number of ways, including that for most participants, prior experience of violence is a significant factor in their offending. Where available, due to the relatively lower numbers of referrals, they are almost exclusively provided as individual counselling rather than group programs. Notably, a significant proportion of female offenders not only have a prior history of experiencing violence, but they also experience violence by their current or former partner against whom they have offended [Fanslow et al 2015].

MBCP work is highly specialised, and quite distinct from other types of intervention. Anger management programs or generalist counselling [Harne & Radford 2008] are contra-indicated [Klein 2009] for assisting perpetrators to stop their use of domestic and family violence for a number of reasons including lack of consideration of power and control dynamics or gender socialisation, an absence of partner contact, an absence of safeguards against collusion and absence of risk assessment or risk management framework. Relationship counselling and family therapy are generally contra-indicated for similar reasons and because the basis for safe communication between the parties usually does not exist without prior specialist intervention over a period of time [Harne & Radford 2008].

Where alcohol or other drug use, mental health issues, including post-traumatic stress disorder, brain injury and cognitive disabilities, are also a concern, MBCP programs may not be suitable unless they are appropriately designed and delivered. Substance misuse or mental health interventions can complement MBCP work and are effective with concurrent participation in an MBCP [Klein 2009]. In the most severe cases, the MBCP assessment process may identify the need for substance misuse or mental health intervention prior to and in preparation for MBCP participation.

MBCPs have the fundamental aim of working towards the safety, wellbeing, and agency of women, children and men affected by domestic and family violence. As well as teaching behaviour change strategies, ideally these programs:

- directly address women's needs through partner support work conducted separately and alongside the work with men
- directly address children's needs through support for their mother and work with their father or male guardian
- achieve at least short-term behavioural and attitudinal changes regarding at least some of the tactics and ways in which the man uses violent and controlling behaviour
- reduce the likelihood that he will perpetrate violence in the medium and long term, and in some cases, achieve comprehensive, sustained desistance from all forms of violence in the long-term
- help monitor the use of violence by male participants, in collaboration with courts, police, corrections or child protection,
- work with the criminal justice system to support processes that lead to appropriate sanctions for men who continue to use criminal violence, and/or who contravene protection order conditions
- help manage high-risk situations involving the safety of any person [Juodis et al 2014]
- contribute to the achievement of coordinated community responses to domestic and family violence, and stronger integration between government and non-government agencies involved in the local or regional family violence service system, towards information sharing, assessing and managing risk.

MBCP practitioners work consciously towards avoiding the potential for harm during men's behaviour change work, given the risks that some men might use their participation in the program mainly or solely to attempt to minimise sanctions for their behaviour, or to misrepresent what occurs in the program to their partner as a means of increasing their control over them [Other Resources].

Men who are referred to a MBCP typically engage in an initial intake and assessment phase to determine their suitability and eligibility for participation in the program. At that early stage, most men have only limited understanding or acceptance of responsibility for their perpetration of violence, and limited empathy regarding its effects. MBCPs are indicated for the majority of male domestic and family violence perpetrators aged 18 and over. There is currently no conclusive research demonstrating that particular cohorts or 'types' of male adult perpetrators are more suited to these programs than others. A relatively small percentage of perpetrators referred are assessed as not suitable, or not suitable at that particular time, for reasons including:

- High levels of chronic, trait-based psychopathy (e.g. men with severe personality disorders)
- Acute mental illness
- Severe substance misuse problems [Juodis et al 2014]
- Significant cognitive impairment
- The absence of any self-recognition of their perpetration of domestic and family violence.

Generally, manageable mental illness or substance misuse issues, and others such as housing insecurity and problem gambling can be addressed concurrently with the man's participation in the MBCP, either by the same organisation/provider, or by working in collaboration with specialist providers in these fields.

There is only a small number of specialist MBCPs focusing exclusively on particular cultural or identity-based contexts. In Victoria for example, there are MBCPs conducted in Vietnamese and Arabic, a program for South Asian men, and one for gay and bisexual men. However, these are rare instances, and in general, mainstream MBCP providers are expected to adapt their interventions to take into account the cultural and identity characteristics of particular participants. A small but growing number of programs are being developed to work with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander perpetrators of domestic and family violence, often within a holistic family and community context, and with a significant component focusing on cultural dispossession, intergenerational trauma and the effects of colonisation [Mackay et al 2015 Part 1].

After intake and assessment—generally conducted through one or more individual interviews with the man—most MBCPs then work with men in a group-based format. While the structure and nature of MBCP group work varies, including open, closed and modular formats, group work provides participants with an opportunity to assist one another to develop attitudes, language and a mutually supportive culture consistent with non-violence. For most programs, intervention intensity consists of one group work session per week, over a period of three to six months. Most programs adopt a blended approach within these sessions, drawing upon feminist and gender-based psychoeducational techniques to address men's perception of entitlement and use of power and control, cognitive-behavioural strategies targeting violence-supporting attitudes and behaviours, and narrative approaches supporting the development of non-violent ways of being [Mackay et al 2015 Part 1].

Support (including risk assessment, safety planning, and recovery counselling) is offered to the man's current and/or former partner alongside the work conducted with him, either by the MBCP provider or by a women's service working in collaboration with the provider. This work can also include a focus on how children are affected by the violence, even if the provider does not work with the children directly [Harne & Radford 2008].

In Australia, MBCPs are part of a renewed focus on building 'webs of accountability' for those perpetrating domestic and family violence [No to Violence 2017]. These broader strategies include case management and supplementary individual work with participants [Vlais 2014]; longer and, where appropriate, more intense interventions to bring Australian programs in line with international best practice; strengthened partner support work; support for participants once they complete a program; and working with perpetrators on how their domestic and family violence affects children and harms the mother-child bond.

Perpetrator interventions - Key Literature

Australia

Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety. (2021). Interventions for perpetrators of domestic, family and sexual violence in Australia (ANROWS Insights, 02/2021). ANROWS.

Extract: This ANROWS research explores how human services agencies (particularly mental health, alcohol and other drugs, and child protection services) could be recognised as essential parts of broader perpetrator intervention systems. Human services agencies could play a pivotal role in linking men into behaviour change interventions, and could work together with the legal system and men's family violence interventions to keep perpetrators' use of violence in view. This means having agencies monitor perpetrators' risk over time, sharing information and working collaboratively to manage risk.

Improving services and systems to better respond to men's use of violence will require:

- addressing trauma and inequality
- providing early and holistic support for associated issues
- supporting community-led approaches
- integrating service systems
- building workforce capacity.

Much work remains to be done to evaluate the effectiveness of perpetrator interventions. In undertaking this evaluation work, it is essential that the safety and wellbeing of victims and survivors remain the central focus.

The research makes 9 key policy recommendations (see p1) including the need for guidance to be developed for courts on trauma-informed ways of working, including recognising how trauma affects the capacity to give evidence.

Blagg, H et al., Understanding the role of law and culture in Aboriginal and/or Torres Strait Islander communities in responding to and preventing family violence (2020) Sydney: ANROWS

The project explored the roles Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Law and Culture play in prevention, intervention and healing in family violence and how they can be supported using a strengths-based approach.

It was grounded in an understanding shaped by the impact of colonisation and took place in six communities which retain strong connections to Law and Culture.

It found that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Law and Culture are features of everyday life in many Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities, although the mainstream legal system and forms of governance undermine their practice. Responses to family violence in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities should move away from the mainstream legal system and be grounded in Law and Culture, including Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander dispute resolution processes. Healing (including addressing trauma and restoring wellbeing) is fundamental to addressing family violence. Participants recommended interventions that worked at the family, rather than individual, level.

Recommendations include: a greater focus on prevention, healing and diversion from the criminal legal system; involvement of men and women in the design and implementation of local family violence strategies; acknowledging the link between violence and issues that stem from colonisation such as alcohol misuse and intergenerational trauma, rather than focusing solely on gender inequality and male power increases the effectiveness of policy and service responses; and an improved understanding within mainstream systems and services of the nature of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander family obligations and interconnections.

Boxall H et al. 2020. Responding to adolescent family violence: Findings from an impact evaluation. Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 601. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Despite growing recognition of the prevalence of and harms associated with adolescent family violence, our knowledge of how best to respond remains underdeveloped.

This paper describes the findings from the outcome evaluation of the Adolescent Family Violence Program. The results show that the program had a positive impact on young people and their families, leading to improved parenting capacity and parent–adolescent attachment. However, there was mixed evidence of its impact on the prevalence, frequency and severity of violent behaviours.

The evaluation reaffirms the importance of dedicated responses for young people who use family violence, and the potential benefits, and limits, of community-based programs.

Centre for Innovative Justice report, Opportunities for Early Intervention : Bringing Perpetrators of Family Violence into View , (2015, RMIT University).

While this report is focussed on early interventions for perpetrators of domestic and family violence in a very broad sense chapter two of this report titled 'Perpetrator Programs' provides a detailed literature review of current debates and evidence about the effectiveness of programs.

Chung, Donna, Damian Green, Gary Smith, and Nicole Leggett, Breaching safety: Improving the effectiveness of Violence Restraining Orders for victims of family and domestic violence (2014, Curtin University).

This Western Australian draws on interviews with ten men recruited from a Western Australian men's behaviour change program. The interviews were complemented with a focus group of service providers including representatives from men's and women's domestic violence services, Family Violence Court, Family Court, Legal Aid and the Department for Child Protection and Family Support. This study provides useful insights for Magistrates regarding perpetrator views of protection orders and what might be needed to increase their effectiveness. Key study findings include participants' lack of empathy or regard for the safety and wellbeing of their current or former partners. Men often perceived court processes as unfair (including protection order processes and decision making around child contact). Participants' explanations for breaches of violence restraining orders could be grouped into three categories: men who took responsibility for the breach and related consequences; describing the partner as being responsible and 'accidental breachers' where the breach occurred because the protected person and respondent were 'accidentally' in the same physical location. The issue of partner initiated contact does raise an important issue for the women who require flexibility to their protection order to enable them to remain safe and legally protected from unwanted partner contact, but allow communication and face to face contact if necessary (p3).

Chung, D., et al., Improved accountability: The role of perpetrator intervention systems (2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

The aim of this research was to develop a detailed understanding of Australian perpetrator intervention (PI) systems upon which the range and breadth of responses to DFV could be mapped; to ascertain the most common pathways of identification, assessment and intervention for DFV perpetrators; and to identify opportunities to further strengthen PI systems and perpetrator accountability. In developing an understanding of PI systems, it was important to acknowledge that perpetrators come into contact with government and non-government services in various capacities that may or may not address their violence, while most perpetrators do not come to the attention of any services. This research has highlighted the extent to which multiple systems are involved in responding to perpetrators, areas where there are strong and frequently used pathways, and areas where there are weak or no linkages to respond to perpetrators.

Chung, Donna et al (2020). Prioritising women's safety in Australian perpetrator interventions: Mapping the purpose and practices of partner contact (2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

This project documents the practices of men's behaviour change programmes (MBCPs) in contacting victims/survivors and children of participants. The project considers how partner contact is operating in Australia, its strengths and challenges, and the experiences of victim/survivors who received partner contact support.

Key findings of the report include:

- Lack of partner contact as part of an MBCP can lead to some perpetrators using their participation in the program to perpetrate abuse towards the victim/survivor and/or other family members.
- Partner contact is labour-intensive, under-resourced, and often a secondary priority.
- There is currently a lack of consistency in partner contact practices and interventions, and limited awareness about existing guidelines and standards.
- Perpetrator accountability has been a growing focus of work in Australia since the launch of the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children 2010–2022 and the subsequent National Outcome Standards for Perpetrator Interventions.
- Men's behaviour change programs (MBCPs) are a key site of perpetrator accountability that aim to improve safety for women and children.
- Partner contact is known and understood to be a critical element of MBCPs, however a review of literature shows that little has been documented in Australia about safety practices in this context.

The report's key recommendations are:

- Partner contact support should be offered to all women (either directly or through organisational partnerships) through all MBCPs.

- National minimum practice standards for partner support as a component of MBCPs should be developed, and these standards should be formally recognised within contractual arrangements and funding service agreements.
- Partner contact services should be resourced and funded in ways that enable those national minimum practice standards to be met, and that ensure women have ongoing access to support irrespective of a perpetrator's MBCP attendance.

Fitz-Gibbon, K., Maher, J., Thomas, K., McGowan, J., McCulloch, J., Burley, J., & Pfitzner, N., The views of Australian judicial officers on domestic and family violence perpetrator interventions (Research report, 13/2020), Sydney: ANROWS.

Despite increasing acknowledgement of the importance of perpetrator interventions in the delivery of integrated responses to domestic and family violence (DFV) and promoting perpetrator accountability, there remains very little understanding of how Magistrates and other judicial officers view, manage and use perpetrator interventions. This research project aimed to address this gap in evidence.

IN BRIEF

- Judicial officers hold mixed views on the effectiveness of perpetrator interventions, in particular men's behaviour change programs, in DFV matters.
- When a DFV case is before them, judicial officers have limited access to information about which (if any) perpetrator interventions have been previously used with a perpetrator.
- Judicial officers across Australia express a lack of knowledge about perpetrator program referral options, in relation to both the availability and nature of the programs.
- A central register of perpetrator program referral options, where information about referrals (and perpetrators who return to court after completion of a specific program) could be recorded would build evidence on the effectiveness of specific interventions.
- The role of judicial officers in holding perpetrators to account remains unclear, as does the place of judicial officers within the system of perpetrator interventions itself.

Key recommendations:

- To assist in judicial decision-making, consideration should be given to developing guidance on seeking and making use of a perpetrator's history of interventions (e.g. FVIOs, prior sentences, and program attendance) in all DFV matters, including in sentencing.
- All states and territories should consider contributing to the development and maintenance of a centralised online register of perpetrator intervention programs, to be coordinated through the relevant government departments, to ensure that information is readily available to support judicial decision-making and referral in DFV matters.
- Courts and judicial educational bodies should consider exploring and developing guidance on the role of judicial officers in creating system accountability regarding perpetrators of DFV. Clarity on the parameters of this role will allow for the development of more consistent sentencing and other outcomes for DFV perpetrators across jurisdictions.

Fisher, C. et al. (2020). Best practice principles for interventions with domestic and family violence perpetrators from refugee backgrounds (2020). Sydney: ANROWS.

This Western Australian project involved: literature review; in-depth interviews with 20 men and 20 women from refugee backgrounds, including men who had perpetrated and women who had experienced domestic and family violence (countries of birth were Burma, Afghanistan, Sudan, Iraq and Iran); and two focus groups with service providers working in men's behaviour change programs, women's services, women's health, refugee services and domestic and family violence services.

It developed a set of best practice principles for interventions with men from refugee backgrounds who use domestic and family violence.

Healey, Lucy, et al., Invisible Practices: Intervention with fathers who use violence—Final Report (ANROWS, 2018).

This project sought to develop the workforce capacity of practitioners to intervene with fathers who use domestic and family violence (DFV).

The report argues that working with a whole-of-family approach can help to bridge the contradiction between DFV and child protection services, who encourage or expect women to leave violent partners, and the family law system, which values contact (even in cases with known DFV). It argues that a whole-of-family approach also acknowledges the well-known facts that separation is not an end to the abuse, or that non-offending parents may not be in a position to separate from an abusive partner. In this way, they may lessen the chances of mothers being held accountable for "failing to protect" their children.

From the findings of the report, the authors developed a practice guide, which can be found at https://www.anrows.org.au/project/invisible-practices-intervention-with-fathers-who-use-violence/. It steps through techniques and considerations when working with fathers who use violence.

Hine, L. et al. Intervention programme for fathers who use domestic and family violence: Results from an evaluation of Caring Dads. Online 2022 Child, Family and Social work, https://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/full/10.1111/cfs.12919

This article presents findings from an evaluation of a trial of the Caring Dads programme in an Australian jurisdiction. Caring Dads is a non-mandated group-based programme for fathers who have been physically and/or emotionally abusive towards their children, their children's mothers or both. The programme aims to engage men around their fathering and is ultimately vested in and focused on children's safety, well-being and the intrinsic link this has with the safety of the mother. Fathers undertaking the programme (n = 40), and associated mothers (n = 17), participated in a mixed-methods self-report questionnaire administered at programme commencement and conclusion. Results show overall positive outcomes for mother experiences of violence, psychological well-being and safety, along with fathers' increased awareness and understanding of what constitutes abusive behaviour.

Hulme, Shann, Anthony Morgan and Hayley Boxall, Domestic Violence Offenders, Prior Offending and Reoffending in Australia, Research Report No 580, September 2019, Australian Institute of Criminology.

Developing effective strategies to reduce domestic violence offending requires an understanding of perpetrator characteristics, offending patterns and recidivism. This study consolidates the Australian evidence base through a systematic review of 39 quantitative studies that examined domestic violence offending and reoffending. Despite the wide range of data sources, samples and measures of violence, findings are remarkably consistent across studies. The findings further reinforce the importance of targeting male perpetrated violence, and reducing violence in Indigenous communities. Alcohol featured in a significant proportion of domestic violence incidents. Finally, the study demonstrates the importance of reducing repeat offending, particularly among prolific offenders, to reduce overall rates of violence.

Humphreys, Cathy and Monica Campo, Fathers who use violence: Options for safe practice where there is ongoing contact with children (CFCA Paper No. 43 – June 2017, Australian Institute of Family Studies).

The following summarises the key aspects of this paper:

Background

This paper responds to a challenge that has continued to frustrate workers attempting to intervene to support women and children living with DFV – that the DFV intervention system (in the specialist women's DFV sector and statutory child protection) is structured around women and their children separating from men who use violence. However, many women and children may not be in a position to separate from their abusive and violent partners, and some women and children's wellbeing and safety may not be enhanced by separation.

Inquiry

The paper explored these questions by conducting a review of exisitng literature:

- What is the practice or evidence base for working with families where the perpetrator remains in the home?
- Are there safe ways to work with women and children living with a perpetrator of DFV, or for women and children who still have significant contact with a perpetrator post-separation?
- In particular, whether there are strategies for working with fathers who use violence, that engage and address the issues for children, women and men who are continuing to live with DFV.

Observations

This review demonstrates that there is a paucity of evidence for effective approaches for responding to DFV in families where the perpetrator remains in the home or in regular contact with women and children. There are, however, a number of practices developing in these areas: nurse home visits; restorative justice approaches; couple counselling; statutory child protection investigations; and interventions with vulnerable families/whole of family approaches. All urge caution and all recommend a priority on training workers, and only ever bringing men and women together under certain circumstances and with strict caveats. This is necessary if work is to be effective and not inadvertently escalate danger and/or collude with the power and controlling tactics of the perpetrator of violence.

Conclusions

There is some experimentation with interventions in these complex family situations, and some early signs of success. The challenges of working with the diverse nature of fathers who use violence are significant. Nevertheless, this may prove to be an important practice development for future DFV intervention.

Kaspiew, R., Horsfall, B., Qu, L., Nicholson, J. M., Humphreys, C., Diemer, K., … Dunstan, J. Domestic and family violence and parenting: Mixed method insights into impact and support needs (ANROWS, 2017).

The Domestic and Family Violence and Parenting Research program examined the impact of domestic and family violence (DFV) on parenting capacity and parent–child relationships in Australia. It focused on three main issues:

- parental conflict in families and impacts on the emotional health and parenting behaviours of mothers and fathers and child functioning;
- how DFV experienced before separation, after separation, or both affects parents' emotional health and parent–child relationships; and
- mothers' experiences of engagement with services in the domestic and family violence, child protection, and family law systems in the context of DFV.

A mixed method approach involved: literature review; analysis of the Longitudinal Study of Australian Children; analysis of two (Australian Institute of Family Studies) datasets of over 16,000 separated parents; qualitative in-depth interviews with 50 women who had experienced DFV and engaged with services in the DFV sector, the child protection system, or the family law system.

The Key findings and future directions research summary related to this report identifies specific implications for practitioners engaging with mothers, fathers, and children against a background of DFV:

- Women who engage with services against a background of DFV have a number of complex material and psycho-social needs.
- If women are not already engaged with a specialist DFV service, then such a referral is usually necessary.
- It is likely that women and their children are experiencing ongoing abuse unless contact with the perpetrator has ceased and other safety measures to prevent abuse are available (e.g. being legally permitted to live at an undisclosed address to prevent stalking).
- Women may need assistance and referral in relation to financial and housing needs, including being informed about the availability of Financial Wellbeing and Capability services and Financial Counselling.
- Women and their children may be experiencing physical and emotional consequences from DFV and abuse and may need long-term therapeutic assistance.
- Mothers may need referrals to programs and services that will support the restoration of parenting capacity from a perspective of understanding the dynamics of DFV, including programs that offer services to mothers and children together. Children may also need assistance separately.
- Where relationships between fathers and children are being maintained, fathers may need referral to services in relation to parenting. Where this is occurring, the wellbeing and safety of children need to be monitored.
- Service providers should be alert to the fact that their services and other types of services and agencies may be used in a pattern of systems abuse. Staff, including legal professionals, should be trained to recognise this and provide appropriate advice and referrals wherethis is occurring.

Liang, Lesley, Risk Assessment in Domestic Violence (Australian Domestic and Family Violence Clearinghouse, 2004).

This article presents insights into the characteristics of perpetrators and the risk factors which influence abuse and explains why they may be useful considerations for judges. The author identifies that risk assessment is an important aspect of sentencing as it can help to identifythe amount and types of treatment. For example, abuse of alcohol appears in many risk assessment lists. Screening for alcohol problems may identify the need to provide treatment for alcohol abuse, in addition to perpetrator treatment. It can also help the criminal justice system to identify which offenders need closer supervision), particularly given the rise in number of domestic violence perpetrators now before the courts in jurisdictions with strong arrest and prosecution policies. (p2)

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part one – Literature review (ANROWS, 2015).

This extensive literature review examines both domestic violence and sexual assault perpetrator programs, including the types available and their effectiveness. This review identifies that perpetrator programs are just one form of perpetrator intervention. It notes that the majority of perpetrator programs in Australia are voluntary and often use group work and counselling (p 10).

The review identifies a number of different program approaches:

- Psychoeducational (p11): views violence against women as a deliberate and intentional tactic used by men to control and dominate women. Psychoeducational programs require men to accept responsibility for their actions and then attempt to educate men about power, social constructions of gender and the patriarchal nature of society. The psychoeducational approach has been criticised for lacking empirical support, being ineffective at promoting authentic and self-directed change, andadopting a ‘one size fits all’ approach.
- Psychotherapeutic (p11): operate on the understanding that factors such as behavioural deficits, trauma or psychopathology are the causes of family/ domestic violence. This approach is criticised for not adequately addressing the more personal and embedded aspects relating to men’s use of violence and its connections with wider structural inequalities. Cognitive behaviour therapy / CBT programs maybe a subset and focus on the idea that violence is learned and so can be unlearned.
- Families and couples counselling (p12): family therapists or couples counsellors tend to approach the issue of family/domestic violence from the perspective that domestic and family violence is a consequence of a dysfunctional relationship and that it is the role of the therapist to address this underlying dysfunction or discord in the relationship. It has been critiqued over concerns for women’s safety, and the implication that the victim/survivor also bears responsibility for the violence.
- Combined approaches (p12): A mix of psychoeducational and CBT approaches.
- Matched interventions (p12): These programs are based on the understanding that a range of psychological, psychiatric, bio-physiological and sociological factors explain men’s use of violence towards women. Because of this, matched intervention programs should be individualised to the particular perpetrator. Research has shown that matched interventions are not well established in the domestic violence sector.

The report also outlines programs for specific populations, such as:

- Programs for Indigenous men (pp 14-15): such programs need to acknowledge Indigenous views of family/domestic violence, and the different causes of family violence in Indigenous communities (such as the impact of colonialism, loss of culture and kinship relationship, substance abuse, or geographical isolation). They must have a strong cultural foundation and be delivered as part of a holistic approach that encompasses the social, emotional, spiritual and cultural wellbeing of individuals and the community as a whole. They must also operate with recognition of the fear and impact of involving external agencies.
- Programs for men from CALD backgrounds (culturally and linguistically diverse) (pp 16-17): specific programs are needed, but there can be difficulty in accurately defining a cultural group.

The report covers emerging/evolving approaches to family/domestic violence, including restorative justice (which is sometimes preferred by Indigenous victims), and narrative therapy, a form of psychotherapy that sees family/domestic violence as manifesting from dominant narratives within society. Consequently, the narrative therapist tries to explore alternative narratives or stories, for example, inviting perpetrators to consider the effects of their violence or explore alternative ways of being within relationships..

The report also discusses the Risk Needs and Responsivity (RNR) Model (p18), which requires the intensity of the program to be tailored to the level of risk of re-offending posed by the offender, the nature of the intervention to respond to the offender's rehabilitative needs, and the delivery of the intervention to conform to suit the offender's ability and way of learning. The authors note that the RNR model may help reduce dropout rates as it is tailored to be responsive to the particular perpetrator.

Mackay, Erin, Althea Gibson, Huette Lam, David Beecham, Perpetrator interventions in Australia: Part two – Perpetrator pathways and mapping (ANROWS, 2015).

Summary at page 43: "There are … subtle differences between jurisdictions in terms of domestic violence orders mandating perpetrators to attend a specific perpetrator intervention program. For example, in South Australia a man issued with a domestic violence order can be mandated to attend a specific program and non-attendance is considered a contravention of the order. Conversely, in some jurisdictions such as Victoria, courts can mandate a perpetrator to attend an eligibility interview under a domestic violence order; but need to issue a counselling order in order to mandate eligible perpetrators to attend programs.

“Within many jurisdictions there are few pre-sentence perpetrator intervention programs delivered by community correctional services or other government organisations[and] there are limited programs available for perpetrators on remand. Access to specific perpetrator intervention programs in custodial settings is also limited, as many perpetrators are given short sentences and programs in custody are often only available to those on sentences of more than 12 months. It is also the case that there is a shortage of programs specifically designed for Indigenous and CALD perpetrators in custody or on community-based orders in many jurisdictions.

“Perpetrators generally do have the opportunity to avail themselves of help and support from non-governmental organisations, although there is a disparity between jurisdictions in terms of the number of organisations available, with Victoria and New South Wales having more program providers than other jurisdictions… Support can also be limited for those perpetrators residing in rural and remote areas in Tasmania, South Australia, Northern Territory and Queensland.”

Meyer, Silke & Rose Stambe (2022) Increasing compliance with domestic violence protection orders: investing in perpetrator education and support as an investment in victim and family safety, Policing and Society, 32:9, 1071-1086, DOI:10.1080/10439463.2021.2016756

Abstract: Domestic Violence (DV) is a persistent public health issue of global proportions affecting an estimated one in four women worldwide. Civil protection orders or domestic violence orders (DVO) are a legal tool used in many jurisdictions, including Australia, to hold the alleged perpetrators accountable and improve the safety of victims. However, the research on the effectiveness of these orders are mixed and perpetrator non-compliance with such orders continues to be a concern. Few studies examine the situational factors that impact compliance with orders, especially in relation to service engagement and support needs of perpetrators of DV during and beyond the protection order court process. Our study uses focus group data to explore the perceptions of police officers (n = 16) and prosecutors (n = 3) involved in policing and prosecuting DV and the compliance with relevant protection orders in two court districts in Queensland, Australia. Alleged perpetrators’ comprehension of their order conditions and intersecting experiences of social disadvantage and complex needs emerged as key factors influencing compliance, along with the role of timely engagement with alleged perpetrators during the court process to maximise respondent comprehension of order conditions and engagement with available and relevant support services. In concluding, we highlight the importance of protective and preventive aspects of the DVO process that combine holistic wraparound support with perpetrator accountability in order to maximise perpetrator compliance and thus victim and family safety.

Morgan, Anthony, Hayley Boxall and Rick Brown, Targeting repeat domestic violence: Assessing short term risk of reoffending (Australian Institute of Criminology Report No. 552 June 2018).

Report abstract:

Drawing on repeat victimisation studies, and analysing police data on domestic violence incidents, the current study examined the prevalence and correlates of short-term reoffending.

The results showed that a significant proportion of offenders reoffended in the weeks and months following a domestic violence incident. Individuals who reoffended more quickly were more likely to be involved in multiple incidents in a short period of time. Offenders with a history of domestic violence—particularly more frequent offending—and of breaching violence orders were more likely to reoffend. Most importantly, the risk of reoffending was cumulative, increasing with each subsequent incident.

The findings have important implications for police and other frontline agencies responding to domestic violence, demonstrating the importance of targeted, timely and graduated responses.

Morgan, A, Boxall, H, Dowling, C & Brown, R 2020, 'Policing repeat domestic violence: Would focused deterrence work in Australia?', Trends & issues in crime and criminal justice no. 593. Canberra: Australian Institute of Criminology.

Abstract: Focused deterrence approaches to domestic violence have been developed in the US to increase offender accountability and ensure appropriately targeted responses to victims. While innovative, the model has strong theoretical and empirical foundations. It is based on a set of fundamental principles and detailed analysis of domestic violence patterns and responses. This paper uses recent Australian research to explore the feasibility of adapting this model to an Australian context. Arguments in favour of the model, and possible barriers to implementation, are described. Based on an extensive body of Australian research on patterns of domestic violence offending and reoffending, and in light of recent developments in responses to domestic violence, this paper recommends trialling focused deterrence and 'pulling levers' to reduce domestic violence reoffending in an Australian pilot site.

No to Violence, Men's Behaviour Change: Minimum Standards and Quality Practice (2017).

This paper discusses the notion of the 'web of accountability' that has been influential in policy circles. A web of accountability around a man potentially comprises strands based on:

- attempts to hold him accountable through the formal criminal justice, civil justice and child protection systems (involving informed, consistent and coordinated actions by police, courts, corrections and child protection, where appropriate)
- the actions of non-mandated service systems that attempt to engage him through proactive, assertive outreach (for example, at court through a Respondent Worker, or telephone-based via men's enhanced intake or the MRS After Hours Service)
- women's (and in some cases, a community's) own informal attempts to 'draw a line in the sand' about his behaviour, and to hold him accountable to the promises he might have made to change his behaviour, and to her and her children's needs for safety and dignity. (p5)

Urbis, Literature Review on Domestic Violence Perpetrators (Urbis 2013).

This commissioned literature review into domestic violence perpetrators covers a wide range of topics. With regard to sentencing, predominately the efficacy of perpetrator programs is addressed. In discussing this, the review mainly considers international sources and research, noting Australian research on the topic is scarce. The review makes a number of general conclusions: Treatment conducted in a group format is limited in its capacity to respond to individual needs, and group dynamics may reduce the willingness to self-disclose and engage among perpetrators who are less motivated to change (p 11). Individual or individualised interventions increase the likelihood of program completion, which in turn reduces recidivism (p 11). There is no clear positive impact of court-mandated interventions (p 12). The effectiveness of intervention programs has been found to vary as a function of characteristics associated with the evaluation methodology as well as the perpetrators (p 12). Programs should be matched to offender characteristics (p 12). Court-monitoring of program attendance can improve program completion (and therefore recidivism) (p 14)

Vlais, Rodney, Domestic violence perpetrator programs: Education, therapy, support, accountability 'or' struggle (No to Violence, Male Family Violence Prevention Association, 2014).

This article was written on behalf of No to Violence (the peak body for those working with male perpetrators of family violence in Victoria) and presents a literature review. The article focuses on the ways in which men's attitudes and behaviour can be changed. As such, it does not primarily refer to court-ordered programs however the programs and models discussed are ones the court could consider utilising when sentencing.

The report discusses and recommends education, therapy (provided it is tailored for the individual) and 'support' (which includes programs and counselling).

The report recommends that all five 'elements' of DV perpetrator programs listed (education, therapy, support, accountability and 'solidarity and struggle' – i.e. standing in solidarity with victims and perpetrators and recognising the struggle to change) are woven together to provide the best and most effective system.

Vlais, Rodney, Sophie Ridley, Damian Green & Donna Chung, 'Family and domestic violence perpetrator programs' (2017) Stopping Family Violence Inc.

This report provides a national perspective on trends and developments to encourage discussion and action about the steps needed to build perpetrator intervention systems which will improve existing family and domestic violence (FDV) efforts, and MBCPs (men's behaviour change programs) within that system. The report also comprehensively considers recent national and international research and innovative practice to inform and challenge ideas about the future of MBCPs in Australia. The report is divided into a discussion of several topics, such as philosophical debates, funding, the place and role of perpetrator programs within integrated/coordinated community responses, research and program evaluation, adapting interventions for different cohorts of perpetrators, responding to risk vs changing men, program provider accountabilities, supporting program providers to become compliance-ready, practice issues in a range of areas, developing a sufficiently skilled, diverse and sized workforce, and the relevance of broader community responses and primary prevention to program provision (p 8). There is a call for more diverse approaches to meet the needs of rural, Indigenous and culturally and linguistically diverse communities, as well as communities living in LGBTIQ and non-nuclear family settings. The report identifies some key questions and challenges on p 6.

Wendt, S. et al. for Women's Safety. (2019). Engaging men who use violence: Invitational narrative approaches (2019). Sydney: ANROWS.

This project conducted a literature review and interviews with 'invitational narrative' practitioners in South Australia and engaged with men who use violence, their invitational narrative practitioners and where consent was able to be obtained, each man's partner/ex-partner. 'The aim of narrative practice is to enable people to "re-author" their stories and, in doing so, enhance their sense of agency and capacity for change.' This research explores how invitational narrative approaches work and how this approach may contribute to change.

International

Bloomfield, Sinead and Louise Dixon, 'An outcome evaluation of the integrated domestic abuse programme (IDAP) and community domestic violence programme' (National Offender Management Service, UK Gov. 2015).

This paper reports on reviews of two perpetrator programmes in the UK. Among other findings- it found that the programmes were effective in reducing domestic violence and reoffending in the two year follow up period.

Boots, Denise et al. 'A Comparison of the Batterer Intervention and Prevention Program with Alternative Court Dispositions on 12-Month Recidivism' (2015) Violence Against Women 1-24.

The purpose of this study was to examine the effectiveness of a 20 week Batterer Intervention and Prevention Program (BIPP) for cases assigned to a misdemeanour family court. This study focused on determining whether BIPP cases, compared with alternative sanctions, had significantly lower recidivism rates 12 months after program involvement. The study was undertaken by randomly sampling cases appearing before two county courts in Texas in 2007. The BIPP was a 20 week program with state mandated programming (Psychoeducational and psychotherapeutic combined model- includes both group work and individual counselling).

The study found that the general recidivism / arrest was significantly related to being non-White, younger in age, younger at time of first official arrest, more counts of prior arrests, having a female victim, not cohabitating with the victim, being under the influence of substances during intimate partner violence offense, receiving jail time, and living in neighbourhoods with higher disadvantage and residential mobility. Findings indicated that BIPP was more effective than jail or regular dismissal in reducing the likelihood of future arrests, but not plea deferred adjudication and conditional dismissal. Results argue toward the efficacy of some form of treatment versus simply receiving jail time.

Buzawa, E., G. Hotaling, A. Klein, and J. Byrnes. Response to Domestic Violence in a Pro-Active Court Setting. Final report for National Institute of Justice, Washington, DC: U.S. Department of Justice, National Institute of Justice, 1999.

This study draws on a sample of 353 cases of male-to-female domestic violence cases heard during a 7 month data collection period at a US court. Drawing on a range of data this study draws on recidivism data, police reports and perpetrator / victim perspectives to determine likelihood of reabuse. (Summary of findings from p154)

The study found that the type of program does not affect re-abuse (p 65); those who complete batterer programs are less likely to re-abuse than those who fail to attend, are non-compliant or drop out (p 68); court monitoring can enhance program attendance (p 69); most victims are satisfied with their abuser's referral to a program (p 73); anger management programs on their own were found to not be effective (p 66); suggests that alcohol and drug treatment: generally effective in reducing re-abuse and should be incorporated as a standard component of batterer intervention programs (p 67)

California State Association of Counties, Support Hub for Criminal Justice Programming, Legislative Report Year 1: Applying evidence based practices to batterers for intervention programs. (2021)

In 2019, six counties in California endeavored to pilot alternative programming and supervision for people both convicted of domestic violence offenses and mandated to batterer intervention programming. This report identifies program participant demography, social-economics, and criminal history. This data is included in the appendix of the report. This initial report does not look at program outcomes but does lay out the framework for measuring recidivism. Key findings of those entering the program on July 1, 2019 to June 30, 2020 include:

- 1,156 people were placed on DV caseloads in the first year of the pilot
- 89 percent identified as male
- 38 percent were unemployed
- 44 percent had previously served 30 days or more in county jail
- 51 percent had a prior domestic violence assault reported to the police
- 49 percent were considered to be low risk to reoffend
- 33 percent were considered at high risk of committing future acts of intimate partner violence

Cissner et al., A National Portrait of Restorative Approaches to Intimate Partner Violence: Pathways to Safety, Accountability, Healing, and Well-Being (2019).

This study seeks to document how these restorative approaches are being applied to intimate partner violence across the USA. It draws on a national survey of programs along with five in-depth cases studies based on follow-up site visits. The survey results suggest a wide variation in how restorative approaches are being used, some overarching themes emerge: programs that responded prioritize survivor agency and safety, focus on active accountability for those who have caused harm, and emphasize voluntary participation.

Cordier, Reinie, Donna Chung, Sarah Wilkes-Gillan and Renée Speyer, 'The Effectiveness of Protection Orders in Reducing Recidivism in Domestic Violence: A Systematic Review and Meta-Analysis' (2019) Trauma, Violence & Abuse (advance)

This article reviews the Australian and international literature on the effectiveness of protection orders in domestic violence cases. It presents a systematic review and meta-analysis, and identifies the factors associated with an increased risk of reoffending following a protection order being issued. It also compares differences in violation rates reported by victims and police and discusses issues in how the effectiveness of a protection order is defined and measured across various studies, beyond simple recidivism. The article finds mixed evidence on their effectiveness: protection orders were not effective in completely preventing violence toward the victim but some groups do report reduced subsequent violence.

Eckhardt, Christopher et al, 'The Effectiveness of Intervention Programs for Perpetrators and Victims of Intimate Partner Violence' (2013) 4(2) Partner Abuse 196 – 231.

This article presents a review of studies of perpetrator programs undertaken since 1990. The article reviews:

- 20 studies investigating the effectiveness of "traditional" forms of batterer intervention programs (BIPs) aimed at perpetrators of IPV
- 10 studies that investigated the effectiveness of alternative formats of BIPs
- 16 studies of brief intervention programs for IPV victim-survivors,
- 15 studies of more extended intervention programs for IPV victim-survivors
- Based on the results reported for all of the studies examined the authors conclude: Interventions for perpetrators showed equivocal results regarding their ability to lower the risk of IPV; available studies had many methodological flaws; among interventions for victim-survivors of IPV, a range of therapeutic approaches have been shown to produce enhancements in emotional functioning, with the strongest support for cognitive-behavioral therapy (CBT) approaches in reducing negative symptomatic effects of IPV.

Fanslow, Janet, Pauline Gulliver, Robin Dixon and Irene Ayallo, 'Women's initiation of physical violence against an abusive partner outside of a violent episode' (2015) 30(15) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 2659.

This article explores women's use of physical violence against an abusive male partner, outside of a violent episode. Data were drawn from the New Zealand Violence Against Women Study, a cross-sectional household survey. Factors associated with women initiating physical violence against their male partners were identified. Of the 845 women who had experienced physical violence perpetrated by their intimate partner, 19% reported physically mistreating their partner at least once outside of a male initiated violent episode, while 81% never initiated violence against their partner. Analyses showed that women's initiation of violence under these circumstances was strongly associated with either or both partners having alcohol problems, her recreational drug use, her number of violent partners, and her mother being hit or beaten by her father when she was a child.

Gondolf, Edward W., 'Evaluating batterer counseling programs: A difficult task showing some effects and implications' (2004) 9 Aggression and Violent Behaviour 605.

A US study. Abstract: Over 40 published program evaluations have attempted to address the effectiveness of ''batterer programs'' in preventing reassaults. Summaries and meta-analysis of these evaluations suggest little or no ''program effect.'' Methodological shortcomings, however, compromise most of these quasi experimental evaluations. Three recent experimental studies appear to confirm little or no effect, but implementation problems, intention-to-treat design, and sample attrition limit these results. A longitudinal 4-year follow-up evaluation in four cities poses additional considerations and evidence of at least a moderate program effect. There is a clear deescalation of reassault and other abuse, the vast majority of men do reach sustained nonviolence, and about 20% continuously reassault. The prevailing cognitive–behavioral approach appears appropriate for most of the men, but the following enhancements are warranted: swift and certain court response for violations, intensive programming for high-risk men, and ongoing monitoring of risk. Program effectiveness depends substantially on the intervention system of which the program is a part.

Harne, Lynne and Jill Radford, Tackling Domestic Violence: theories, policies and practice (Open University Press, 2008).

See chapter 4 (Policing, prosecution and the courts) and 5 (Preventing domestic violence). In relation to perpetrator programs the authors critique three types: (p 156)

- Psycho-therapy models: tend to reinforce the 'poor me syndrome', where violent men redefine themselves as the main 'victims' and as the ones who need help and the focus moves away from their responsibility and the impact of their violence on women and children
- Couples counselling: poses risks to survivors – it has almost ceased to be used in the US.
- Social learning approaches and anger management programs: Anger management courses do not recognise domestic violence as being connected to male dominance on women in intimate relationships. May feed excuse that men have 'uncontrollable tempers.' Although they may reduce violence in the short term, they do not deal with the control element.
- Authors observe that many women express fears of further violence once the program had ended and felt that being referred to a program was a soft option – the program was only effective when combined with the sanction of imprisonment for further violence.

Hyman, Hon. Eugene M. And Liberty Aldrich, 'Rethinking access to justice: the need for a holistic response to victims of domestic violence' (2012) 33 Women's Rights Law Reporter 449.

Writing in the USA context the authors emphasise that a judge who has information that a particular offender previously failed to complete a mandated batterer program may be less likely to simply re-order attendance at that program (at 11).

Juodis, Marcus et al. 'What Can be Done About High-Risk Perpetrators of Domestic Violence?' (2014) 29 Journal of Family Violence 381-390.

This article presents a useful literature review about how perpetrators who present as high risk should be dealt with. See pp2-3 where the concurrent need for safety planning for women while perpetrators attend programs must be considered. Notes that some perpetrators assessed as high-risk maybe particularly resistant to treatment and so particular efforts may need to be made to ensure they remain in program. Pre-treatment is suggested. Includes a discussion of appropriate risk assessment and treatment programs for psychopathic perpetrators.

Kelly, Liz and Nicole Westmarland, Domestic Violence Perpetrator Programmes: Steps Towards Change (Project Mirabal: Final report, London Metropolitan University and Durham University, 2015).

This important UK study examines whether domestic violence perpetrator programs (DVPP) work in reducing men's violence and abuse and in increasing the freedom of women and children. The study is longitudinal (see p6) and includes program data from 11 UK base sites; 64 interviews with DVPP staff and stakeholders across four locations; survey with 100 women DVPP intervention group, 62 women comparison group (5 interviews over 6 time points); interviews 64 men on programmes (the programmes all followed the RESPECT guidelines) and 48 women (ex) partners at time 1 (near start) and time 2 (near end). Interviews and surveys were also undertaken with children and staff about the impact on children and there was further analysis associated with program integrity.

Results: As a result of participation in a Domestic Violence Perpetrator Program, there was found to be positive change with regard to:

- Respectful communication (p11)
- Space for action (p14) “This measure draws explicitly on the understanding that safety is insufficient to undo the harms of abuse, women need to have the freedom restored that abuse restricts.”
- Safety and freedom from violence and abuse for women and children (p18)
- Shared parenting (p23) “safe, positive and shared parenting.”
- Awareness of self and others (p25) “enhanced awareness of self and others for men on programmes, including an understanding of the impact that domestic violence has had on their partner and children.”
- Safer, healthier childhoods (p30)

Identified a different way of thinking about change: “Change is better understood as a series of sparks, different for each man, and not all of which are activated.” (p34)

Klein, Andrew Practical Implications of Current Domestic Violence Research: For Law Enforcement, Prosecutors and Judges (National Institute of Justice, U.S. Department of justice Programs: 2009).

This is a comprehensive review of US based research on issues relevant to domestic violence and law enforcement. The recommendations are made in the US context.

See 8.3 for a discussion of couples counselling and anger management programs as a response to domestic and family violence: ‘There is no evidence that couples counselling or anger management programs effectively prevent court-referred batterers from reabusing or committing new offenses after treatment. (Research basis: The limited research conducted thus far has been, at best, inconclusive regarding the effectiveness of these programs. One large state study found that court-referred batterers are less apt to commit new offenses [including both domestic and nondomestic violence offenses] if they completed batterer programs rather than anger management programs. The difference, however, may be because the batterer programs were twice as long as the anger control programs.)’ (p67)

See 8.4 for a discussion of Drug and alcohol programs as a response to domestic and family violence. ‘Incorporating alcohol and/or drug treatment as a standard component of batterer intervention programs adds to the likelihood of reductions in reabuse among batterers, many of whom abuse alcohol and drugs. Effective treatment should include abstinence testing to assure sobriety and no drug use. (Research basis: Extensive research in both clinical and court settings confirms the correlation between substance abuse and the increased likelihood of reabuse as well as the reduction in reabuse among offenders successfully treated for drug abuse.)' (p67)

In relation to failure to comply with conditions of perpetrator programs: 'Judges should respond to noncompliant abusers immediately to safeguard victims. (Research basis: Multiple studies have found that doing nothing with regard to noncompliant, court-referred abusers results in significantly higher rates of reabuse.)' (p72)

Mach, Jami, et al., The Impact of Perpetrator Characteristics on the Completion of a Partner Abuse Intervention Program (2020) 35 (22-24) Journal of Interpersonal Violence 5228-5254 doi: 10.1177/0886260517719904

Data were collected from 192 male perpetrators of intimate partner violence (IPV) who were court mandated to attend a perpetrator abuse intervention program. Participants were categorized as family only violent or generally violent based on a combination of their self-report and official records of violence. Stake in conformity has been defined as the degree to which an individual is invested in the values and institutions of a society. A composite stake in conformity score was computed for each participant based on his education level, and marital and employment status. Each participant was also assigned a stage of change score based on his responses on a validated measure of stage of change for domestic violence perpetrators. Analyses indicated that stage of change was not related to program completion or attendance. Type of perpetrator and stake in conformity composite score were significantly related to program completion. Perpetrators with higher stake in conformity scores and individuals categorized as family only attended more perpetrator abuse intervention program sessions and were more likely to complete the program. When both predictors were examined together, only stake in conformity composite score uniquely predicted program attendance and completion.

Mazurek, L. et al., Comparing recidivism rates among domestically violent men enrolled in ACTV versus Duluth/CBT. (2021) 89(5), Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, 469–475 doi:

10.1037/ccp0000649

The goal of the study was to replicate and extend published preliminary evidence demonstrating that a relatively new treatment (Achieving Change through Value-Based Behavior [ACTV]) for men convicted of domestic violence significantly reduces recidivism compared to the standard treatment offered across the United States (the Duluth Model and/or cognitive-behavioral approaches). Men convicted of domestic assault and court-mandated to a Batterers Intervention Program [N = 725] were assigned to attend ACTV or treatment-as-usual (TAU). Recidivism, defined as any new convictions, any violent convictions, and any domestic assault convictions, was examined up to 5 years posttreatment. Only men classified as medium or high risk were included. The study found that men in TAU were more likely to receive any conviction, a violent conviction, and a domestic assault conviction compared to men in ACTV. Time to new conviction posttreatment was shorter for men in TAU versus ACTV. Finally, the risk of receiving any new conviction (95% CI [1.46, 7.11]) was more strongly associated with noncompletion for TAU than ACTV participants. The study concluded that ACTV shows great promise for reducing recidivism compared to TAU.

Miller, M; E., Drake, and M. Nafziger, What works to reduce recidivism by domestic violence offenders? (Document No. 13-01-1201). (Olympia: Washington State Institute for Public Policy: 2013).

The authors present a literature review particularly examining the effectiveness of perpetrator programs from the perspective of whether they reduce recidivism. The authors found no effect on DV recidivism with the 6 Duluth like interventions reviewed although they note there may be other reasons for referring perpetrators to such programs. The authors observe that their review indicates that there may be other group based treatments for male domestic violence offenders that effectively reduce domestic violence recidivism.

See p 2 which states that the Duluth model: ‘approach assumes that domestic violence “…is a gender-specific behaviour which is socially and historically constructed. Men are socialized to take control and to use physical force when necessary to maintain dominance… the model assumes that DV does not result from mental illness, substance abuse, anger, stress or dysfunctional relationships.”

Rempel, Michael Evidence based strategies for working with offenders. Centre for Court Innovation. (2014), Bureau of Justice Assistance, US Department of Justice.

This American resource presents a succinct summary of some fundamental issues in promoting court-based perpetrator accountability.

Renehan, N. & Fitz-Gibbon, K. (2022) Domestic Violence perpetrator programmes and neurodiversity. Durham University.

Based on research conducted in UK and Australia (through surveys with programme providers and interviews with international experts, practitioners and organisation representatives working in the field of domestic abuse, the authors found there was a broad consensus amongst practitioners that understanding the experiences of neurodivergent men was important when working with perpetrators, but they were clear that domestic abuse and the drivers of violence should not be medicalised as autism and/or ADHD. Practitioners were concerned that ADHD in particular could be mislabelled as and/ or mask childhood trauma and neglect. (p8)

Practitioners relayed that autistic/ADHD men face many challenges. Firstly, screening and diagnosis are often not available which sometimes led programme practitioners with limited, if any, training on neurodiversity to mistakenly view neurodivergent men as 'belligerent and disruptive' or disengaged. Secondly, sensory sensitivities, programme structure, and comprehension of programme content presented challenges. However, practitioners also recognised that these men had individual strengths to support their own engagement, and that of neurotypical men in groupwork. A tailored and flexible approach to programme delivery was viewed as important. (p8)

Travers, A., et al (2021) The effectiveness of interventions to prevent recidivism in perpetrators of intimate partner violence: A systematic review and meta-analysis. Clinical Psychology Review, 84: 101974.

This systematic review and meta-analysis assesses evidence for interventions situated in a risk-need-responsivity framework, in comparison with the more traditional 'one-size-fits-all' intervention approach. It reviewed 31 studies.

It explains the 'risk-need – responsivity (RNR) model. The risk principle requires targeting treatment intensity based on an individual's risk- the higher risk perpetrators receive the highest-intensity treatment. The RNR model focuses on eight central risk factors that have been empirically associated with general criminal offending. These are: 1) history of antisocial behaviour, 2) antisocial personality pattern, 3) antisocial cognition, 4) antisocial associates, 5) family/marital circumstances, 6) school/work, 7) leisure/recreation problems and 8) substance abuse. The ‘need’ principle entails attending to what are termed ‘criminogenic needs’ which are needs that the perpetrator presents with that are potentially related to the maintenance of their offending behaviours. Finally, the ‘responsivity’ principle necessitates taking factors into account that may impact an individual's adherence to treatment, such as their level of motivation, abilities, learning styles etc.

The review concludes: Risk-need-responsivity treatments showed promise in the short-to-medium term, but the challenge of sustaining effects into the longer term remains.

Perpetrator interventions - Other Bench Books

Australia

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

5.4.2 discusses the preferred approach to men's behaviour change programs. 5.4.4 discusses judicial responses to men's behaviour. 3.6 discusses the court's power to order a respondent to attend counselling.

International

Neilson, Linda C, Domestic Violence Electronic Bench Book (National Judicial Institute, 2021).

Section 7.2.3: Stress and anger rationalization

'While stress and anger often accompany domestic violence, they do not explain it. Most people who experience stress and anger do not engage in DV. Moreover … stress and anger do not explain the cumulative, patterned nature of domestic violence, the associated pattern of coercion and control, nor why the violence is often employed strategically – in the privacy of the home.

While debate continues as to whether or not there is value in teaching anger management as a component of specialized domestic violence intervention programs, anger management by itself is not considered useful for the following reasons:

Anger management does not focus on the underlying causes of DV; worse, anger management programs can serve to enhance skills of coercion and control.

More particularly such programs:

- Have no proven lasting effect on domestic violence;
- Lack standards to ensure those offering such programs have specialized DV expertise;
- Offer a false sense of hope and safety when, in fact, there is little evidence such programs help;
- Focus attention on intimate partner behaviours that trigger anger instead of focusing attention on violator perceptions and actions that give rise to domestic violence;
- Imply that it is the targeted party's behaviour that causes the violator to engage in domestic violence;

- Shifts responsibility for the domestic violence onto the targeted partner by implying it is the latter's behavior that causes the violator to engage in domestic violence; and,
- Teach new control skills when the goal is eradication of the need to control.'

Section 20.9.4: What if the domestic violator has mental health, alcohol or drug abuse problems?

'A domestic violator's mental health problems and alcohol or drug abuse increases the risk of serious injury for all family members. Consequently, these issues, and access to services, should be addressed in any agreement or order together with reporting mechanisms and review processes to ensure accountability and provisions to ensure notification in the event of non-compliance.

Some violators will require mental health or substance abuse treatment in order to benefit from domestic violence intervention.'

Perpetrator interventions - Other Resources

Australia

ANROWS Perpetrator Interventions Research.

Research funded by ANROWS on perpetrator interventions to improve systems and service effectiveness, as well as the responsiveness to the diversity of perpetrators.

National Outcome Standards for Perpetrator Interventions (21 November 2015).

The National Outcome Standards for Perpetrator Interventions (national outcome standards) were endorsed by the Council of Australian Government (COAG) on 11 December 2015. The standards are based on extensive consultation with government and non-government sector experts, and designed to guide and measure the outcomes achieved by perpetrator interventions across Australia.

NSW

> Department of Attorney General and Justice, Towards Safe Families: A Practice Guide For Men's Domestic Violence Behaviour Change Programs, (2017).

QLD

> Department of Justice and Attorney General, Practice principles, standards and guidance (2021).

SA

Domestic and Family Violence Intervention program

> Domestic and Family Violence Intervention program (2020, Government of South Australia)

VIC

No To Violence, Interventions for People Who use Violence, (2019: Victorian Government)

No to Violence (2021) Tips for engaging men on their use of family violence (fact sheet) Domestic Violence Resource Centre Victoria.

This resource gives five tips for engaging men on their use of family violence:

1. Safety – do not engage in a way likely to increase risk to the safety of vicitms;
2. Identify invitations by men to collude in their behaviour - when responding to a man's attempts to minimise, excuse or justify their use of violence, it is important to encourage them to re-evaluate their behaviour and self-exploration;
3. Open the conversation - being curious and asking questions can help put his behaviour on the table;
4. Experience of ex/partners and kids - encourage empathy for how his partner/kids are experiencing his behaviour, rather than his intentions or identity; and
5. Change and support - identifying what a desirable future looks like can help reflection around what needs to change.

WA

Department for Child Protection and Family Support, Practice Standards for Perpetrator Intervention: Engaging and Responding to Men who are Perpetrators of Family and Domestic Violence, 2015.

International

Freyd, J et al., What is DARVO? Website: https://dynamic.uoregon.edu/jjf/defineDARVO.html.

DARVO refers to a reaction perpetrators of wrong doing, particularly sexual offenders, may display in response to being held accountable for their behaviour. DARVO stands for "Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender." The perpetrator or offender may Deny the behaviour, Attack the individual doing the confronting, and Reverse the roles of Victim and Offender such that the perpetrator assumes the victim role and turns the true victim -- or the whistle blower -- into an alleged offender. This occurs, for instance, when an actually guilty perpetrator assumes the role of "falsely accused" and attacks the accuser's credibility and blames the accuser of being the perpetrator of a false accusation. This website includes links to empirical research about the concept and discussions about its impact on victims and others. It also includes podcasts and other materials.

Respect (2022) The Respect Standard, 4th edition: Accreditation framework for safe, effective and survivor-focused work with perpetrators of domestic abuse in the UK**.

CAFCASS (Childrens and Family Court Advisory and Support Service). This organisation represents children in family court cases. It is independent of the courts, social services, education and health authorities and all similar agencies. They offer a Domestic Violence Perpetrator Programme for parties involved in family court cases.

Perpetrator interventions - Cases

Attorney-General (SA) v Pennington [2019] SASC 180 (25 October 2019) – South Australian Supreme Court

At [45], the Court noted:

> 'Traditional western psychological therapy is better equipped than therapy from traditional healers to address some of the respondent's specific issues that might lead to reoffending such as control of aggression, anger and avoiding alcohol.'

Responses in criminal proceedings

Responses in criminal proceedings - Victim experiences

These de-identified victim experiences summarise the content of interviews undertaken with people who have experienced domestic and family violence and legal system engagement. The interviewees' names and some minor details of their narratives have been changed to protect their identities. In many cases the names have been selected by the interviewees.

Cautionary note: some people may find reading these victim experiences distressing or traumatising.

Note: To read a person's experiences, click their name below.

Celia

Bail

The approach to bail in domestic and family violence related cases varies between Australian jurisdictions (see table below). In a number of jurisdictions, bail laws have incorporated special provisions that either displace or reverse the general presumption in favour of bail (see table below). In all Australian jurisdictions the safety and protection of the victim and any children or other people at risk is a key consideration in the decision to grant bail.

Where a judicial officer considers that a grant of bail is appropriate in a case where a domestic and family violence related offence is alleged, bail conditions may be imposed to minimise the risk of further harm to the victim and any children or other people at risk. For example the accused may be monitored by GPS. If GPS monitoring is used, consider imposing a significant exclusion zone (eg several kilometres) around the victim's home so that once police are alerted to the accused's breach they have sufficient time to attend directly at the victim's address. Further conditions may include prohibiting the accused from contacting, harassing, threatening or intimidating the victim or others; or conditions requiring the accused to vacate the family home (exclusion/ouster), or to not go within a certain distance of the victim's home, or to undergo treatment or counselling (perpetrator interventions). Bail conditions should be carefully balanced having regard, along with other relevant matters, to the circumstances of the accused and the victim, the accused's history of violence towards the victim, and the fact that the conditions are imposed in a context where there is not yet a finding of guilt. For example, a condition forcing an unwilling accused to participate in a perpetrator intervention program may increase the risk of breaching bail and the later imposition of a custodial sentence [Ng & Douglas 2016]. When determining the most appropriate bail conditions in a particular case, judicial officers should ensure where possible that they have access to all available information regarding, for example, existing orders and prior convictions; and, if necessary, make enquiries of the prosecution.

There may be particular considerations relevant to bail where the victim or accused is from a vulnerable group.

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people may experience particular difficulties in obtaining bail or meeting bail conditions. For example, an accused may be denied bail because of lack of legal of representation, insufficient assets to provide a surety, no stable address, or absence of a responsible person to care for children; and yet being remanded in custody may cause further disadvantage and harm to an accused who is detained far from community and family or has problems with drug or alcohol addiction [WA Aboriginal BB 2008]. In ordering bail conditions in these circumstances, it may be appropriate for the judicial officer to consider an accused's kinship and family ties with a particular location and the availability of community or family-based support that may be engaged to ensure that bail conditions are observed [Judicial Commission of NSW Equality before Law BB 2022]. The safety and protection of the victim and other people may override these considerations.

Bail may be imposed alongside a protection order. It is important that bail conditions and protection order conditions are consistent (or, if different, not inconsistent) as inconsistency may increase confusion and the likelihood of breach [WALRC 2014]. Bail conditions may also be imposed when there are also child protection orders or family law orders in place [Vic Family Violence BB 2014]. Such orders should also be considered in determining appropriate bail conditions and inconsistency should be avoided where possible.

A bail condition may require an accused to comply with the conditions of a protection order, with the consequence that a breach of the protection order amounts to a breach of bail. Where there is no protection order in place, and the bail conditions alone may not protect a victim adequately, it may be appropriate for the judicial officer, where legislation permits, to also issue a protection order [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010].

Where an accused applies for bail upon being charged with a breach of a protection order, the judicial officer should consider the risk of breach of bail in light of the alleged breach of the protection order. Where an accused's conduct amounts to a breach of both a bail order and a protection order, and the accused applies for bail, the judicial officer should consider the possibility of heightened risk of harm to the victim and any children or other people at risk.

It is important that those affected by the bail conditions understand the nature and effect of the bail decision [ALRC/NSWLRC 2010], and that any order, or any condition of an order, can only be varied or revoked by the court, not by agreement between the accused and victim or other individuals. The victim and those affected by bail conditions should be made aware of the grant of bail and the conditions of the bail granted to the accused.

Jurisdiction	Relevant legislation
Australian Capital Territory	Bail Act 1992 ss 9B(b)(iv)-(vi); 25(4) (f)(i)-(vi)
New South Wales	Bail Act 2013 ss 16A, 16B, 17
Northern Territory	Bail Act 1982 ss 7A(1)(dd), (dh); 27A(1)
Queensland	Bail Act 1980 s 16(2)(f)
South Australia	Bail Act 1985 s 10A(2)(ba); 11(2)(a)(ii)
Tasmania	Family Violence Act 2004 s 12
Victoria	Bail Act 1977 s 5AAAA
Western Australia	Bail Act 1982 Sch1, Part D (2); (2a); (2AB); (2AC)

Bail - Key Literature

Australia

Australian Law Reform Commission and New South Wales Law Reform Commission, 'Family Violence – A National Legal Response', ALRC Report 114; NSWLRC Report 1280 (2010).

Chapter 10 deals with 'Bail and Family violence'. The interaction between bail conditions and protection order conditions is considered from p 420. The Commissions note that bail conditions can be imposed in parallel to protection order conditions. Bail conditions and protection order conditions should be consistent because inconsistency increases confusion which increases the likelihood of breach. This compromises victim safety and could also have serious consequences for accused persons.

The report notes that while bail conditions simply requiring an accused to abide by existing protection order conditions avoids inconsistencies, this formula should not be used at the expense of victim safety (p 422).

The Commissions commented that upon granting bail, judicial officers should consider whether to also grant a protection order because bail conditions do not serve the same purpose as protection order conditions and may not be able to adequately protect the victim (p 422 & 424-425).

The issue of informing victims about bail decisions is considered from p 425.

Cussen, Tracey and Mathew Lyneham, 'ACT Family Intervention Program Review' (Technical and Background Paper No 52, Australian Institute of Criminology, 2012).

This report evaluated the approach to bail in the context of domestic and family violence in the Australian Capital Territory. This approach (under the Family Violence Intervention Program) imposes presumptions against bail for domestic violence offences. The threshold for police bail is extremely high, with a police officer unable to grant bail unless satisfied that the accused person would pose no danger to the victim while released on bail. It was found that this approach increased victim safety (see at p 109).

Law Reform Commission of Western Australia, Enhancing Family and Domestic Violence Laws, Report No 104 (2014).

Chapter 4 discusses bail from p 134. In family violence matters, the court will often impose 'protective bail conditions'. The report notes that an accused may be subject to protective bail conditions and a protection order concurrently. The Commission's view was that protection order conditions should be considered in addition to protective bail conditions and pointed out that once a charge is dismissed or otherwise dealt with, bail conditions will lapse. This leaves no ongoing legal protection for the victim (p 134). The Commission emphasised the importance of thorough risk assessment when determining bail in the domestic and family violence context, noting 'In cases where an accused seeks a relaxation of protective bail conditions in order to enable contact to occur between the accused and the victim, it is necessary for the court to properly assess the risk to the safety of the victim before making a decision'. This may involve attaining a bail risk assessment report (p 137). Therefore, it is clear that the imposition of appropriate bail conditions can reduce the risk of harm to victims. The Commission also noted that it is important that protective bail conditions and protection order conditions are consistent so as to avoid confusion and unintended breaches (p 135).

Ng, Emily and Heather Douglas, 'Domestic and Family Violence and the Approach to Bail' (2016) 34(2) Law in Context 36-57.

This article examines the different approaches taken to bail in domestic violence legislation and cases across Australia.

The authors note there is a 'patchwork' approach to bail and family violence between jurisdictions. Some jurisdictions specifically define domestic violence offences for the purposes of bail, while other jurisdictions do not give domestic and family violence special status. Bail conditions are considered from p 51. The authors note that it is important to avoid conflict between bail and protection order conditions because conflict increases the likelihood of breach (p 51). Two common types of bail conditions in domestic and family violence matters (exclusion conditions and perpetrator programs) are discussed.

Exclusion conditions are problematic when the accused has no alternative accommodation. An integrated response is required. This 'can be achieved through police training and the establishment of collaborative relationships between police and support services, rather than by imposing a legislative duty on the police to take reasonable steps to secure accommodation' (p 53).

The authors note that 'in cases concerning family violence, the safety of women and children should always be a key consideration in the bail response.' (p 57).

Queensland Police Service, 'The Domestic and Family Violence GPS-Enabled Electronic monitoring Technology, Evaluation Report, April 2019, Government of Queensland.

This report presents the findings of a trial of GPS tracking for family violence offenders and victims in Queensland. The trial assessed the effectiveness, reliability and responsiveness of GPS-enabled technology to track an individual accurately and activate an alert in the event of a pre-programmed zone being breached. The GPS-enabled technology was tested in different geographical areas and with police personnel rather than actual offenders and victims. Thirty-five tests were carried out, with the technology failing to respond in 26% of cases. The technical issues are discussed in more detail. Overall, the findings demonstrate that electronic monitoring does not provide an effective risk-mitigating solution for high-risk perpetrators and is not a reliable substitute for perpetrator case management. However, it may be of use in some lower-risk cases, in conjunction with other measures. This trial was a suggestion of the 2015 Queensland Special Taskforce on Domestic and Family Violence, which noted how little was known about electronic monitoring programs.

Richards, Kelly and Lauren Renshaw, 'Bail and Remand for Young People in Australia: A National Research Project' (2013) (Research and Public Policy Series No 125, Australian Institute of Criminology).

This report, which deals extensively with bail, discusses domestic violence offences from p 64. 'In this study, domestic violence emerged as one offence in particular that may impact on rates of young people on custodial remand.

Victorian Law Reform Commission (VLRC), Review of the Bail Act: Final Report (2007) 120.

See at p 74 which discusses 'Victims' Views on Safety and Welfare'. It notes, 'if the offence is one of family violence, police should set bail conditions that ensure the safety of victims'. See also from p 120 where the report discusses how appropriate bail conditions can reduce the risk of further harm to victims.

However, the Commission was concerned (particularly in relation to police bail) about 'reports of police imposing inappropriate and unnecessarily onerous bail conditions. Such conditions include blanket restrictions on travel by public transport, broad geographic exclusion zones, and abstinence conditions without referral to any support services. Anecdotally, it appears that many of the most inappropriate bail conditions are imposed by police. Accused people may feel pressured to accept overly onerous conditions to be released, putting them at increased risk of breach. Breach may ultimately lead to remand, which might have been avoided if more appropriate conditions were initially imposed, together with referral to support services' (p 62).

International

Sadusky, Jane M, 'Pretrial Release Conditions in Domestic Violence Cases: Issues and Context' (2006) Battered Women's Justice Project.

While this paper discusses the American context, some of the commentary has broad relevance to the Australian context.

'This paper explores the issues related to pretrial release, highlights the experiences of several communities, and provides guidelines to communities for examining this aspect of criminal case processing in domestic assault cases' (p 5).

The authors note: 'The question of pretrial conditions in domestic violence cases is one of balance, balance between constitutional rights of the accused and protection of victims of crime, between safety and accountability, between ensuring appearance at trial and protecting others from harm, between a consistent response and the unique aspects of each case, each person, and sometimes the balance between space in the jail and the goal of safety' (p 5).

See also at p 11 – 'While the general standards of pretrial release set a foundation that permits close attention to the safety of any person or the public, a judicial officer may be reluctant to invoke processes or conditions that account for the specific context of domestic violence crimes. Yet domestic violence is a pattern crime and research has increasingly identified key factors associated with dangerousness, including prior history of domestic violence; estrangement, separation or divorce; obsessive, extreme jealously, escalating violence; access to guns; use of or threats with weapons; serious injury in prior incidents of abuse; threats of homicide and suicide; forced sex; stalking; prior police involvement; and, drug or alcohol use…Satisfying the second prong of the purpose of bail – "protect the community, victims, witness or any other persons" – is difficult without some level of inquiry into these aspects of dangerousness'.

Bail - Other Bench Books

Australia

Fryer-Smith, Stephanie, Aboriginal Benchbook for Western Australia Courts (2nd ed, 2008).

See generally chapter 6 (6.1) which deals with bail issues in relation to Aboriginal people.

Judicial College of Victoria, Family Violence Bench Book (2014).

4.1.4 discusses bail and family violence offences.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Equality before the Law: Bench Book (updated 2022).

2.3.2 discusses considerations in determining the appropriateness of bail and bail conditions for Aboriginal alleged offenders, however it does not deal specifically with domestic and family violence related offences.

Judicial Commission of NSW, Local Court Bench Book (updated 2022).

Section [20-000] discusses the range of issues relevant to the granting, refusal, enforcement, and variation of bail.

Magistrates Court of Queensland, Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book (2021).

Chapter 7.6 discusses the situation where bail conditions mean that a domestic violence order is neither necessary or desirable. Chapter 22 discusses a range of issues relating to bail, including rebuttable presumption, conditions, and the definition of a domestic violence offence.

International

Brigner, Mike, The Ohio Domestic Violence Benchbook – A Practical Guide to Competence for Judges & Magistrates (2003) Family Violence Prevention Center (at the Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services).

The chapter dealing with courts having criminal jurisdiction discusses considerations relating to bonds and pretrial release.

Bail - Other Resources

New South Wales Police Force, Code of Practice for the NSW Police Force Response to Domestic and Family Violence (2018).

See pg 43: 'The victim, offender and witnesses (if applicable) are to be interviewed, statements taken and physical evidence is to be gathered and a determination made as to whether sufficient evidence exists to commence criminal proceedings. If sufficient evidence is present, the offender is charged with appropriate criminal offence/s and/or police apply for a Provisional/ urgent ADVO. Ensure that appropriate ADVO and/or bail conditions are placed on the offender to ensure victim's safety.'

Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (NSW), Prosecution Guidelines (at March 2021).

See Chapter 5.4 :- Information about bail.

The victim must be:

- notified whenever the accused applies for bail, including any application to vary the conditions of bail
- consulted about any need for protection they may have prior to the hearing of the bail application
- promptly informed of the outcome of any bail application, including any special bail conditions designed to protect the victim or the victim's family.

Information about the date, time and location of court listings:

- The prosecutor must inform the victim about the date, time and location of any mention or hearing of the case, including bail, committal, trial, sentence, appeal and breach of sentence hearing.

Information about the outcome of hearings:

- The prosecutor must inform the victim about the outcome of any part of the proceedings, including bail, criminal case conference, committal, trial, sentence, appeals and breach of sentence.

Victoria Police, Code of Practice for the Investigation of Family Violence, 3rd ed, version 4 (2019) 1-77.

Section 4.3.4 discusses charge and bail –

'Bail does not replace the need to seek a (protection order). In any situations where the accused person is to be charged and bailed and a (protection order) is also to be sought, bail conditions should seek to protect AFMs (Affected Family Members) and witnesses, as with any other serious criminal offence. Bail conditions are to ensure the attendance of the respondent at court and to protect AFMs and witnesses so should include any condition/s sought in the (protection order) relevant to (non) contact with the AFM.

If conditions are imposed when granting bail, the bail decision maker must make sure they are consistent with each condition of an (protection order), Family Violence Safety Notice or recognised DVO. When a bail decision maker imposes conditions that are inconsistent with an (protection order), they must be satisfied that the bail condition better protects the victim. Should such conditions be made, the informant must apply to vary the original order to ensure the civil action is consistent with the bail conditions.'

Bail - Cases

The cases identified here provide examples of the way judicial officers have dealt with some of the issues raised in the context statement.

Click on the citation to be directed to a summary of the case in the Case Database.

R v Saedam* [2015] ACTSC 85 (1 April 2015) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

Refshauge J at [30]-[34]: 'In a somewhat similar case, R v Laipato (No 2) [2014] ACTSC 363, I said (at [1]): 'Despite some laypeople thinking otherwise, bail is not intended to punish people for offences with which they have been charged. Indeed, to the lawyer such a notion is offensive, for it must be recognised that persons who have been charged but not found guilty of offences are, by law, presumed to be innocent'.

'It is also important to state clearly that the Bail Act, as a whole, evinces an intention that real regard must be had by those charged with the grant of bail to the safety of complainants, especially those involved in allegations of domestic violence. It is well known that those who complain of domestic violence are particularly vulnerable, hence s 9F of the Act provides a restriction on the grant of bail by authorised officers, unless they are satisfied that the applicant poses no danger to the complainant.

'Similarly, s 23A of the Bail Act requires a court to consider the concerns of the complainant to be taken into account when considering, inter alia, whether the applicant, while on bail, might commit further offences, which would clearly include domestic violence against the complainant. This does not mean, however, that a person charged with a domestic violence offence must be denied bail.

'The court, in granting such a person bail, may be required to have a keen appreciation of the need to ensure that the vulnerability of such complainants is carefully and properly considered when the likelihood of reoffending is being taken into account. Bail to applicants charged with such offences is not, of course, a minimisation of such charges, much less an endorsement of the behaviour said to constitute that offence.

'That, of course, applies to all bail applications. It is regrettable that it is sometimes necessary to say this. Nevertheless, it is worth recalling what Giles J said in Dunstan v Director of Public Prosecutions [1999] FCA 921; (1999) 92 FCR 168 at 184; [56]: 'It should be borne in mind, when considering this topic, that refusal of bail upon the basis of s 22(1)(c) alone is tantamount to preventative detention. In my view, this is a cogent reason for not permitting a finding to be made on this issue on the basis of suspicion and speculation.

Discussion of the matter in terms of risk is calculated to encourage that basis".

R v Saunders* [2017] SASCFC 86 (27 July 2017) – South Australia Supreme Court (Full Court)

'Parliament has enacted laws designed to provide protection to those subjected to domestic violence. The making of intervention orders is intended to provide this protection. If that protection is to be effective and orders of the court or conditions in bail agreements not to be mere scraps of paper, the court must impose punishments for the breach of those orders or agreements which will deter those who contravene the orders or agreements and others who might be minded to do so from offending in that way' (per Stanley J at [27]).

R v Fox* [2017] SASC 5 (3 February 2017) – South Australia Supreme Court

The applicant was charged with two counts of contravening a term of an intervention order and these involved threats to use violence. This enlivened s 10A of the Bail Act namely, that the applicant was not to be granted bail unless he established the existence of special circumstances justifying his release on bail. Hinton J at [16]-[17]: 'Thus Parliament's approach reflects the response that it considers must be made, the ordinary response, to an alleged act of defiance to a protective order allegedly perpetrated in circumstances involving violence. It is a response that only tolerates release into the community on bail if special circumstances can be established. Such response pays no heed to whether the accused is a flight risk. Its implementation will also, ordinarily, result in the loss of employment, the fracturing of relationships, the discontinuation of education, financial hardship and hardship to dependents.

'One further point should be made here. Parliament's response may be accepted as in no small part reflecting the growing awareness in the community of the prevalence of domestic violence. For intervention orders to fulfil their protective purpose, strict compliance must be insisted upon. This approach informs the inclusion of the breach of an intervention order in circumstances of violence within s 10A and explains why specific reference is made to the Intervention Orders (Prevention of Abuse) Act 2009(SA) in s 10(1)(b)(iv)'.

Hinton J continued at [19]: '[S]pecial circumstances will only exist where the applicant can demonstrate that he or she does not pose the risk which Parliament had in contemplation in reversing the presumption and in relation to whom the denial of bail would result in consequences beyond the contemplation of Parliament'. Here, the 'relevant risk contemplated is of further defiance of an order and violence threatened or perpetrated in doing so, hence incapacitation in the form of the refusal of bail is appropriate to prevent the offender further offending and to protect the victim'.

Re S* [2005] TASSC 89 (19 September 2005) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

Slicer J at [2]: 'Bail is a form of conditional, not absolute, liberty (see generally Griffiths v R [1977] HCA 44; (1977) 137 CLR 293) and has long been a method of accommodating the presumption of innocence, the impact of prolonged detention before trial with the ensuring of receiving attendance at trial and potential risk to the community or the State (see distinctions made in the Statute of Westminster I, "A History of the English Law", Holdsworth, Vol IV, 525-528)'.

At [26]: 'It is neither appropriate nor possible for a court to determine the "merits" of a complaint concerning domestic violence at first instance. That remains an issue for trial. A court is responsible for "future risk" and in making that decision must have confidence in the primary material. The community at large must have confidence in the application of the legislative scheme. The administration of the legislation as required by the Act, s14, is central to that confidence. Application of policy, irrespective of the circumstances of each case, will not enhance the process. The Statute of Westminster (supra) permitted a grant of bail in enumerated cases according to the nature of the crime or offence alleged, and prohibited it in others. That is not the model here used by the Parliament. The tensions created by the understandable need for future protection of a family and the traditional concepts of presumption of innocence and liberty of the suspect, make it more important that the primary material can be relied upon. In this case the applicant was afforded bail upon the provision of a reliable surety and the imposition of residential, geographical and contact provisions'.

Re Williams* [2018] VSC 76 (23 February 2018) – Victorian Supreme Court

Justice Champion at [57]-[59] discussed the applicant's contention that the prosecution case is weak because it relies on the complainant's evidence:

> … the prosecution points out that cases involving family violence frequently involve 'word on word' evidence and that this is often the very nature of these types of cases. The prosecution submits that this circumstance does not of itself warrant the prosecution case as being regarded as weak, or without merit.

> It is clear enough that the case will be strongly defended, and that there are arguable issues to be decided. That said, it was not submitted to me that the case should be regarded as inherently weak.
>
> From what I have been able to glean in this application I cannot conclude that the prosecution case is weak.

Dickerson v The State of Western Australia [2020] WASC 425 (18 November 2020) – Western Australia Supreme Court

It was significant that the applicant had refused to have contact with the complainant while remanded in custody, even though she was permitted to do so. The court noted at [96]:

> "It is an irony in matters of this kind that a person who is remanded in custody for having breached a condition that prevented contact with a complainant is not prohibited from having contact with the complainant once they are in custody".

And continued at [97]:

> "Of course, in circumstances in which the applicant is well aware that she may put her prospects of being released on bail at risk if she were to have contact with the complainant, one might understand that she would exercise caution in that regard. However, the applicant has gone further. She has made an application and been granted the FVRO to prevent the complainant, Mr N, from having contact with her or approaching her. In other words, she has taken positive steps to give effect to the purpose to which cl 2(c) and (d) of sch 1 pt D of the Act are directed. That, it seems to me, is an unusual situation which, in combination with the applicant's steps towards rehabilitation and the hardship that she will be required to endure if she remains in custody in the metropolitan area while her mother and her young child remain in Carnarvon, does amount to exceptional reasons why the applicant should not be kept in custody".

Evidence

In this chapter the following evidence issues are considered:

See also chapter 5 Fair hearing and safety:

Relationship, context, tendency and coincidence evidence

Evidence which demonstrates that allegations of domestic and family violence do not occur in a vacuum can be valuable in establishing victim credibility and perpetrator propensity to engage in abusive behaviour. Relationship, context, tendency (propensity) and coincidence (similar fact) evidence can all be invaluable in establishing a case against an accused perpetrator, however if used to infer guilt such evidence is also inherently prejudicial.

In most Australian jurisdictions the law of evidence is codified in evidence acts collectively referred to as the Uniform Evidence Law ("UEL"). The UEL is comprised of Evidence Act 1995 (Cth), Evidence Act 2011 (ACT), Evidence Act 1995 (NSW), Evidence (National Uniform Legislation) Act 2011 (NT), Evidence Act 2001 (Tas) and Evidence Act 2008 (Vic).

While not identical in each jurisdiction, the UEL provides a cohesive approach to evidence issues across much of Australia. Queensland, South Australia and Western Australia each retain a unique combination of common law and statute (Evidence Act 1977 (Qld), Evidence Act 1929 (SA) and Evidence Act 1906 (WA). In Queensland s 132B of the Evidence Act 1977 specifically provides that evidence of the history of the domestic relationship between the defendant and the complainant is admissible evidence in criminal proceedings.

In UEL jurisdictions a number of judicial bench books provide assistance in directing a finder of fact where tendency or coincidence evidence is relevant:

New South Wales

Judicial Commission of New South Wales, Civil Trials Bench Book.

- Tendency and coincidence - Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) - Pt 3.6 (ss 94–101); Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW), s 161A Judicial Commission of New South Wales, Criminal Trial Courts Bench Book.

- Tendency, coincidence and background evidence – Evidence Act 1995 (NSW), Pt 3.6 (ss94-101)

Victoria

Judicial College of Victoria, Uniform Evidence Manual.

- Part 3.6 Tendency and coincidence- Evidence Act 2008 (Vic)

In other jurisdictions the following bench books may be helpful:

Queensland

Magistrates Court of Queensland (2022) Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act 2012 Bench Book 10th ed.

- 15.5 Use of evidence from other proceedings (r33)
- 15.8 Use of similar fact evidence

Queensland Courts (2020) Supreme and District Courts Criminal Directions Benchbook.

- Similar fact evidence
- Evidence of other sexual or discreditable conduct of the defendant

South Australia

Courts Administration Authority of South Australia (2021) South Australian Criminal Trials Bench Book.

- 4.12 Discreditable conduct evidence
- 4.12.2 Admissibility of evidence for non-propensity uses (including context/relationship evidence)
- 4.12.3 - Admissibility of evidence for particular kinds of propensity uses
- 4.12.4 - Assessing probative value and prejudicial effect
- 4.12.5 - Directions on discreditable conduct evidence
- 4.12.6 - Directions on non-propensity uses
- 4.12.7 - Directions on propensity uses

- 4.12.8 - Jury directions – Discreditable conduct evidence

Relationship, context, tendency and coincidence evidence - Cases

Some cases that have considered relationship, context, tendency and coincidence evidence in the context of domestic and family violence include:

Queen v Pamkal* [2019] NTSC 80 (15 October 2019) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

'Evidence' – 'Probative value' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Sexual and reproductive violence' – 'Tendency purposes'

Relationship evidence:

"[4] Defence counsel has conceded that the evidence of past assaults is relevant for this "relationship" or "context" purpose but contends that it should be excluded under Evidence (National Uniform Legislation) Act 2011 (NT) ("UEA") s 137 because its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant. The unfair prejudice identified is that the jury may be emotionally repelled by the horrific details of the violence the accused committed against the complainant in the past and so be diverted from a rational consideration of the issues in the case. At the very least, counsel submitted, if evidence of past violent conduct by the accused against the complainant is let in, it should be by way of agreed facts that simply refer to past assaults and do not reveal the details. I disagree with that. That would not be to explain the nature of the relationship but to conceal it. He did what he did. It was the things he did to her that caused her to fear the consequences of displeasing him by refusing his demand for sex.

[5] Nor do I agree that the evidence should be excluded under UEA s 137. Its probative value – in conjunction with other evidence in the case (ie her evidence that he demanded sex and threatened her if she did not comply and her evidence in the interview with police that ever since she met him he threatened her, "Oh you gotta do this, do that … otherwise I'll get bashed") is high. It explains something that may otherwise be inexplicable – namely why she would physically comply with his demands even though she told him she didn't want to have sex.

[6] In my view it is also high on the issue of whether he knew she was not consenting or was reckless about that fact. Given his history of controlling violence towards her he would have been aware that she would be likely to give in to his threats to avoid being bashed.

[7] The jury will be warned against rank propensity reasoning and I consider the risk that they will engage in it is not high. As to the risk that they will be emotionally repelled by the accused and diverted from their task of rationally considering the facts, I agree that there is such a risk. The jury will also be warned against that sort of approach both in the opening (before they hear this evidence) and in the summing up (after they have heard it) and in my experience jurors tend to take such warnings seriously. I agree that there is no guarantee that such a warning will be 100% effective with all jurors. However, I do not think that the risk that the jurors may misuse the evidence in this way outweighs the probative value of the evidence which I consider to be high.

[8] The evidence of prior assaults (and the assault the subject of count 2) will be admitted as relationship evidence."

Tendency evidence:

" [18] The first question is the extent to which the evidence sought to be adduced tends to establish that the accused had the tendency to act in the way asserted in the notice. In my view the evidence does support proof of a tendency in the accused to engage in violent behaviour towards his domestic partner, especially after consuming alcohol, for the purpose of controlling her behaviour and/or punishing her for perceived failings – in fact for displeasing him.

[19] The next question for consideration is whether, if the jury accepts that the accused had this tendency (or tendencies) that "strongly supports proof of a fact that makes up the offence charged". In my view it does, for the same reason that its probative value as relationship evidence is high. It explains what might otherwise be inexplicable and strongly supports proof of a fact in issue – namely whether the complainant consented to have sex with the accused and also, to perhaps a slightly lesser extent, proof that he knew of or was reckless as to her lack of consent.

[20] I am therefore satisfied that the threshold test in UEA s 97 has been met. The evidence sought to be adduced as tendency evidence does in conjunction with other evidence which will be adduced have significant probative value."

"[24] In this case, the potential prejudice identified by the defence is a possibility that the jury may engage in rank propensity reasoning and the possibility that the jury may be so emotionally repelled by the accused's conduct that they are diverted from their function of rationally considering the evidence against him and become motivated by a desire to punish him for his past conduct.

[25] While I concede that there is a potential for the jury to be misled in both of these respects, I consider that this can largely be mitigated by appropriate warnings. Further, I consider the probative value of the evidence to be high and that its probative value does substantially outweigh the risk of prejudice. The use of this kind of tendency evidence of course involves a kind of permissible propensity reasoning. As the plurality said in Hughes:[6]

The trier of fact reasons from satisfaction that a person has a tendency to have a particular state of mind, or to act in a particular way, to the likelihood that the person had the particular state of mind, or acted in the particular way, on the occasion in issue.

[26] Defence counsel submitted, relying on McPhillamy v The Queen,[7] that the tendency sought to be proved is not specific and that the more general the tendency, the greater should be the caution with which it is approached. The more general the alleged tendency, the more its probative value is decreased and its potential prejudice increased. When the tendency is nothing more than a tendency to engage in violence, the only use that could be made of the evidence is to all intents and purposes rank tendency reasoning.

[27] While there is force on that submission in general terms, it is necessary in each case to look at the precise tendency alleged to be established by the evidence and to assess what probative value that has on the particular issues in the case. For the reasons outlined above, in my view, this particular evidence strongly supports proof of the alleged tendency and the existence of the alleged tendency is highly probative of the issue of whether the complainant consented to sexual intercourse and whether the accused knew of or was reckless as to that lack of consent."

Roach v The Queen* [2011] HCA 12 (4 May 2011) – High Court of Australia (appeal from Queensland Court of Appeal)

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Directions and warnings for/to jury' – 'Probative value' – 'Propensity evidence' – 'Relationship evidence'

Charge/s: Assault occasioning bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: Mr Roach was convicted of assault occasioning bodily harm of his female partner. At trial, Howell DCJ admitted evidence of previous (uncharged) assaults that Mr Roach committed on the complainant during their relationship. The relevant Queensland provision—s 132B of the Evidence Act 1977—applies to proceedings for assault occasioning bodily harm and provides that '[r]elevant evidence of the history of the domestic relationship between the defendant and the person against whom the offence was committed is admissible in evidence in the proceeding'. However, s 130 of the Evidence Act 1977 gives the judge power to exclude otherwise admissible evidence if it is deemed unfair to the accused to admit.

Issue/s: Whether the trial judge should have applied the test in Pfennig v The Queen [1995] HCA 7; (1995) 182 CLR 461 and whether 'viewed in the context of the prosecution case, there is a reasonable view of [the relationship evidence] which is consistent with innocence'. Only if there is no reasonable view, can the evidence be admissible because its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect on the accused.

The appellant argued that in considering whether to admit evidence under s 132B, the trial judge ought not to admit that evidence if there was a reasonable view of that evidence consistent with innocence ('the rule in Pfennig'). The appellant argued that the rule in Pfennig recognises the prejudicial effect of evidence used to prove a propensity of the accused ("propensity evidence"), and applies at common law to propensity evidence as a measure of the probative force of that evidence. (see Roach v The Queen [2010] HCATrans288 (5 November 2010)).

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. French CJ, Hayne, Crennan and Kiefel JJ of the High Court held firstly that s 132B has a 'potentially wide operation'. Section 132B contemplates evidence of other acts of domestic violence throughout the relationship being admitted. The section could also be used to admit similar fact evidence to prove the accused's propensity to commit similar crimes. The Court found it could also be used to admit other types of evidence including evidence of a person's state of mind, evidence of the circumstances of the crime or to provide context to the history the relationship. It could also be used as evidence in a provocation or self-defence case, or where the offender is a victim of domestic violence. (See at [30]-[31]). The Court then held that the Pfennig test has no application to the common law residual discretion enshrined in s 130. As such, the test of admissibility under s 132B is whether the evidence is relevant, which is subject to the exercise of the discretion preserved in s 130.

The purpose of admitting the evidence here was not to show a propensity of the accused (re the rule in Pfennig); rather, the evidence:

'was tendered to explain the circumstance of the offence charged. It was tendered so that she could give a full account and so that her statement of the appellant's conduct on the day of the offence would not appear "out of the blue" to the jury and inexplicable on that account, which may readily occur where there is only one charge. It allowed the prosecution, and the complainant, to meet a question which would naturally arise in the minds of the jury' at [42].

The High Court noted the permissible ambit of 'relationship evidence', and the need for clear directions for juries about the use of such evidence and the purpose for which it is tendered:

[45] In the present case the evidence, if accepted, was capable of showing that the relationship between the appellant and the complainant was a violent one, punctuated as it was with acts of violence on the part of the appellant when affected by alcohol. Without this inference being drawn, the jury would most likely have misunderstood the complainant's account of the alleged offence and what was said by the appellant and the complainant in the course of it. To an extent Holmes JA acknowledged this in the conclusions to her reasons. Whilst her Honour identified the relevance of the evidence as showing the particular propensity of the appellant, she also concluded that it made the appellant's conduct in relation to the alleged offence intelligible and not out of the blue.

[47] The importance of directions in cases where evidence may show propensity should not be underestimated. It is necessary in such a case that a trial judge give a clear and comprehensible warning about the misuse of the evidence for that purpose and explain the purpose for which it is tendered. A trial judge should identify the inferences which may be open from it or the questions which may have occurred to the jury without the evidence. Those inferences and those questions should be identified by the prosecution at an early point in the trial. And it should be explained to the jury that the evidence is to allow the complainant to tell her, or his, story but that they will need to consider whether it is true.

[48] The directions in this case were sufficient. At the conclusion of the evidence the trial judge directed the jury of the need to exercise care and that it would be dangerous to convict on the complainant's evidence alone unless they were convinced of its accuracy. His Honour told the jury that the history of the relationship between the complainant and the appellant had been led "for a very specific purpose" and that they must be "very, very careful in relation to the limited use that [they] may make of such evidence." He explained how evidence could be used as evidence of propensity and directed them that they were not to use the evidence in that way. His Honour informed the jury that the evidence was led so that the incident charged was not considered in isolation or in a vacuum but "to give [them] a true and proper context to properly understand what the complainant said happened on the 13th of April 2006."

Norman v The Queen* [2012] NSWCCA 230 (9 November 2012) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

'Evidence' – 'Rape' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge/s: Rape x 3.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and appeal against sentence.

Facts: During the course of the complainant's 13 year marriage to the appellant, the complainant and the appellant had anal intercourse five times but only twice with her consent. At trial, the Crown sought to tender evidence of non-sexual domestic violence (see [22]). They argued that the evidence was not being admitted as evidence indicating a propensity on the part of the appellant which rendered it more likely that he had committed the crimes with which he was charged (therefore ss 97 and 101 of the Evidence Act and the test in Pfennig v R [1995] HCA 7; 182 CLR 461 did not apply). The trial judge accepted this argument and ruled that evidence of non-sexual domestic violence could be admitted for the purpose of showing the relationship between the appellant and the complainant. The appellant was found guilty.

Issue/s: One of the grounds of appeal was that 'relationship' evidence should not have been admitted.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. MacFarlane J noted the relevant law, stating that: 'As pointed out in Roach v R [2011] HCA 12; 242 CLR 610, evidence which incidentally shows propensity but which is otherwise relevant will not be excluded provided that the jury is properly warned against its use as propensity evidence (see also BBH v R [2012] HCA 9 at [146] - [149])'.

Relationship evidence may be relevant if it assists in the evaluation of other evidence such as that of a complainant. His Honour continued at [26]: 'In other words, relationship evidence may be admitted on the basis that, without it, the jury would be faced with a seemingly inexplicable or fanciful isolated incident. To enable complainants to give their account of events comprehensively, they must be permitted to place the incidents of which they complain in a meaningful context'.

However, the Courts have emphasised that it is necessary to consider carefully the basis upon which 'relationship' evidence is relevant in a particular case (see Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95; 171 A Crim R 463 at [112]; DJV v R [2008] NSWCCA 272; 200 A Crim R 206 at [28] - [30] and RG v R [2010] NSWCCA 173 at [36] - [37]) (at [29]).

Here, MacFarlane J held that evidence of two isolated incidents of non-sexual domestic violence was irrelevant and should have been excluded. While the Crown submitted that the evidence was relevant to demonstrate 'the nature of the relationship,' MacFarlane J noted:

'[C]onsistently with the approach taken by this Court in Qualtieri and DJV, it is insufficient to rely solely upon such a proposition. Evidence "is not relevant merely because it discloses aspects of the relationship between an accused and a complainant. There must be an issue which the evidence may explain or resolve by placing the alleged events in their true context": DJV per McClellan CJ at CL at [29]. Particularly because of its potentially prejudicial character, the precise basis upon which the evidence is relevant must be closely analysed'.

The evidence was also not relevant to demonstrate why the alleged sexual assaults were not reported earlier, and nor could it be said that the evidence would have assisted the jury, in any permissible way, in evaluating the complainant's evidence (see [32]-[34]).

Therefore, His Honour concluded at [35]-[36]:

'[E]vidence of the two isolated incidents of non-sexual domestic violence was not necessary to place the sexual assaults within a meaningful context… [I]t is difficult to see what, if any, use the jury could have made of the evidence other than to engage in impermissible propensity reasoning that the appellant was the type of man who might have sexual intercourse with a woman without her consent. Whilst the trial judge directed the jury not to reason in that way, there was unfairness to the appellant in the evidence being before the jury when it was not relevant on any basis'.

Despite this, on the facts, there was no substantial miscarriage of justice. The Crown case against the appellant was so overwhelming there was no significant possibility that a jury would have acquitted the appellant (See [38]).

Pasoski v The Queen* [2014] NSWCCA 309 (15 December 2014) – New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal

'Admissibility' – 'Assault occasioning actual bodily harm' – 'Context evidence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse' – 'Sexual assault' – 'Tendency evidence'

Charges: Assault occasioning bodily harm x 2, sexual assault x 5.

Appeal type: Application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The applicant and complainant lived together with their daughters and were in a relationship since 2003. In November 2010, the applicant physically assaulted the complainant in their home on two occasions, by kicking her in the legs, and slapping her face, causing her to fall (see [13]). The sexual assault charges were alleged to have occurred on one night, where the applicant had vaginal penile intercourse five times without her consent (see [13]).

At a voir dire during trial, the applicant's trial counsel successfully objected to the admission of other evidence of previous penile vaginal penetration without consent (see [27]). That evidence was not admitted because the trial judge found that the 'evidence is more in the nature of tendency evidence than contextual evidence' (see [31]). However, evidence of the applicant's controlling behaviour was admitted, and was relied upon at trial (see [12]).

In summing up, the trial judge gave directions as to the use of the evidence of controlling behaviour, stating that 'the Crown relies upon this evidence only for one purpose… to put the complainant's allegations concerning the offences in November 2010 into a realistic context' (see [42]). Her Honour also stated: 'if that evidence was not there, you would be asking yourselves, well, why would the accused throw his weight around in this horrible manner with the complainant completely out of the blue, when they had been in an apparently normal relationship for the previous six years?' (see [42]).

Issues: Two of the grounds of appeal concerned 'context evidence' (see [6], [44]):

1. 'A miscarriage of justice was occasioned by the admission of the so-called context evidence' because it was not relevant and was prejudicial, and
2. The trial judge erred by failing to identify the precise issues to which the evidence was directed.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave to appeal was refused on both the 'context evidence' grounds.

In relation to the first ground, Meagher JA referred to the use of context evidence as being admissible if it is used to 'remove implausibility that might attach to a complainant's account of what otherwise would be seen as isolated incidents' (see [24]). His Honour referred to HML v The Queen [2008] HCA 16; 235 CLR 334 [6] to observe that 'by doing so, it bears upon the assessment of the probability of the existence of facts directly in issue (Evidence Act 1995 (NSW), s 55) … Similar observations were made in Roach v The Queen [2011] HCA 12; 242 CLR 610 at [42] and BBH v The Queen [2012] HCA 9; 245 CLR 499 at [146]-[150].'

Meagher JA held that the evidence was properly admitted (see [45]). His Honour found that from the conduct of the trial, 'it was apparent that the Crown was relying upon it only as showing that the relationship was an unhappy one from the complainant's perspective so as to make more plausible her evidence that she did not consent to having sexual intercourse with the applicant on the five occasions in question' (see [33]). Furthermore, the fact that trial counsel had not objected to the evidence at the voir dire, despite having objected to the evidence of the other sexual assaults on the grounds that it might invite propensity reasoning, indicated that 'the parties and the Court were conscious that evidence tendered to explain the context in which the alleged offences occurred might, depending on its content, be relied on or used for a tendency purpose' (see [30]).

In relation to the second ground, regarding the directions given by the trial judge to the jury, Meagher JA held that the directions did not give rise to a real risk that the jury might employ propensity reasoning, and thus did not occasion a miscarriage of justice (see [49]). His Honour found that the direction regarding the applicant 'throwing his weight around' did verge on an invitation to the jury to employ propensity reasoning (see [47]). However, his Honour held that, assessed in context, the other directions made clear to the jury that the evidence of controlling behaviour was not being relied upon to suggest a 'propensity of the applicant physically or sexually to impose his will on the complainant' (see [48]).

The other issues concerned two failures of the trial judge. First, the trial judge failed to properly comply with s 55F(2)(b) of the Jury Act 1977 (NSW), and therefore two counts of sexual assault were quashed (see [8]-[11]). Second, the trial judge erred in taking into account as an aggravating factor in sentencing that the offences were committed in the complainant's home: EK v R [2010] NSWCCA 199; 79 NSWLR 740 at [79] (see [54]). Accordingly, the aggregate sentence of imprisonment was reduced from five years and six months with a non-parole period of two years and nine months to four years and eleven months with a non-parole period of two years and five and a half months.

R v Grant* [2016] NTSC 54 (31 October 2016) – Northern Territory Supreme Court

'Relationship evidence' – 'Tendency evidence' – 'Unlawfully causing harm' – 'Unlawfully causing serious harm'

Charge/s: Unlawfully causing serious harm or unlawfully causing harm.

Hearing: Voir dire hearing.

Facts: The accused was charged with the offence of unlawfully causing serious harm to his female partner, the complainant, or, in the alternative, unlawfully causing harm to the complainant. The Crown sought the admission of tendency evidence related to the following fact in issue: whether the accused applied physical violence to the complainant in the early morning of 26 January 2016 and/or caused injuries to the complainant. The tendency sought to be proved was the tendency of the accused:

(a) To act in a particular way, namely engaging in verbal abuse and physically violent behaviour towards the complainant; and/or

(b) To have a particular state of mind, namely a violent and controlling disposition towards the complainant which he sometimes acted upon when he had been consuming alcohol.

If the evidence (detailed at [5]) was not admissible as tendency evidence, the Crown sought to have it admitted as relationship evidence.

Decision and Reasoning: The rulings on the voir dire hearing were –

1. Evidence of incidents on 25 May 2013, 7-8 June 2013, 12 July 2013, 10 December 2013 and 18 June 2015 were admissible in the trial as tendency evidence (see [61]-[72]).

   In order to be admitted for tendency purposes, the evidence had to satisfy the requirements in ss 97 and 101 of the Evidence (National Uniform Legislation) Act 2011 (NT) ('ENULA'). Two questions arose in determining the admissibility of the evidence: (1) did the evidence have significant probative value? The relevant test is whether 'the features of commonality or peculiarity which are relied upon are significant enough logically to imply that because the offender committed previous acts or committed them in particular circumstances, he or she is likely to have committed the act or acts in question': CEG v The Queen [2012] VSCA 55 (see [30]-[60]); (2) did the probative value of that evidence substantially outweigh any prejudicial effect it may have on the accused? As per the Court, '[t]he test of a danger of unfair prejudice is not satisfied by the mere possibility of such prejudice. There must be a real risk of unfair prejudice by reason of the admission of the evidence' R v Lisoff [1999] NSWCCA 364.

2. Evidence of incidents on 25 May 2013, 7-8 June 2013, 12 July 2013, 10 December 2013 and 18 June 2015 were admissible as 'relationship' or 'context evidence' (see [73]-[82]).

   Evidence may also be admitted for non-tendency purposes. One example of non-tendency purpose is 'relationship' or 'context' evidence that is not relied on for a tendency inference. The High Court in HML

v The Queen is authority for the proposition that evidence of other conduct by an accused may, depending upon the circumstances, be admissible for non-tendency purposes, including the following purposes (see [75]):

(a) as affecting the plausibility of other evidence or to assess the credibility and coherence of the complainant's evidence (at [6], [155]–[156]);

(b) as essential background against which the evidence of the complainant and the accused necessarily falls to be evaluated, to show the continuing nature of the conduct and to explain the offences charged (at [425], [431]);

(c) to overcome a false impression that the event was an isolated one, that the offence happened "out of the blue", where the acts are closely and inextricably mixed up with the history of the offence (at [500], [513]);

(d) to ensure that the jury are not required to decide issues in a vacuum (at [428], [498]); and

(e) as negativing issues raised such as accident or mistake (at [430]).

Although HML was a case involving sexual offences, relationship evidence may also be admissible in cases involving violence, including assault-type offences (see examples at [76]).

The admissibility of relationship evidence is governed by the general test of relevance in s 55 of the ENULA and the directions and obligations contained in Part 3.11 (especially ss 135 and 137). The Crown contended that the evidence was relevant and admissible as relationship or context evidence because it was necessary to:

(a) Avoid the circumstances of the alleged offence appearing inexplicable or being misunderstood in isolation; see Roach v The Queen [2011] HCA 12 at [45]

(b) Negative the defence case of self-inflicted injury; R v Quach [2002] NSWCCA 519; (2002) 137 A Crim R 345 at [15], [22]-[45]; Bryant v The Queen [2011] NSWCCA 26 at [92]; McDonald v The Queen [2014] VSCA 80 at [28]- [29]

(c) Show the state of mind of the accused at the time of the alleged offence. R v Atroushi [2001] NSWCCA 406 at [33], [45], [47]; Boney v The Queen [2008] NSWCCA 165 at [29]

The relationship evidence here was both relevant ([79]-[80]) and not excluded (its probative value was neither outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused nor substantially outweighed by the danger that the evidence might be unfairly prejudicial to the accused) ([81]-[82]).

Tasmania v Finnegan (No 2)* [2012] TASSC 1 (19 January 2012) – Tasmanian Supreme Court

'Admissibility' – 'Evidence - relationship' – 'Evidence - tendency' – 'Motive' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Probative value' – 'Unlawful wounding'

Charge: Unlawful wounding

Proceeding: Ruling as to the admissibility of evidence

Facts: The accused was charged with unlawfully wounding the complainant (his partner) by striking her to the face with a glass. He pleaded not guilty. The Crown sought to lead evidence from the complainant given on a voir dire about the accused's conduct towards her on other occasions, both before and after the alleged wounding. The accused objected to the admission of some of the evidence ([6]).

Issues: Whether some of the evidence given by the complainant should be ruled inadmissible on at least one of the following bases:

1. Irrelevance;
2. Failure to satisfy the common law rule established in Pfennig v R whereby propensity or similar fact evidence is not admissible if, viewed in the context of the prosecution case, there is a reasonable view of that evidence that is consistent with innocence;
3. The danger of unfair prejudice to the accused outweighing the probative value of the evidence: s 137 Evidence Act 2001 (Tas); or
4. The probative value of the tendency evidence not substantially outweighing any prejudicial effect that it may have on the accused: s 101(2) Evidence Act 2001 (Tas)

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed. The evidence led from the complainant as to the conduct of the accused was admissible. It was relevant on a number of bases: as 'relationship evidence', enabling the jury to assess the evidence as to what occurred at the time of the alleged wounding; as evidence of motive (jealousy); as evidence explaining why the complainant asserted she was injured because of a fall and why there was delay in her reporting what occurred; and as tendency evidence, showing that the accused had a tendency to be jealous of anyone who had a friendship/relationship with the complainant and to be generally violent towards her ([11]-[15]).

Further, the probative value of all the evidence under consideration substantially outweighed the prejudicial effect and danger of unfair prejudice to the accused. In this regard, Blow J noted at [30]-[31]:

'In my view the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused is not great… [A] properly instructed jury, having heard all the evidence of jealousy and violence, is unlikely to be distracted from its duty of impartiality and its duty to give a true verdict in accordance with the evidence.

'In my view the evidence of jealousy has substantial probative value. Without that evidence the jury might well take the view that the accused had not given any indication of jealousy on any other occasion. If the only evidence available for the jury as to violence on other occasions was the evidence of the three charged assaults, two of which shortly preceded the first report to the police of the accused wounding the complainant with the glass, that could result in the jury overestimating the likelihood of the complainant having fabricated the critical allegations. Having regard to that factor, and to the various bases on which the evidence of violence is relevant, I consider that all the evidence of violence also has substantial probative value'.

Here, there was nothing about the facts that made it one where s101(2) or s137 [Evidence Act 2001 (Tas)] required the Pfennig test to be applied (at [32]).

Note: this decision has been overtaken by legislative changes effective 12 December 2017. See section 13B Family Violence Act 2004.

Benson v The Queen* [2014] VSCA 51 (28 March 2014) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Exposing children' – 'Miscarriage of justice' – 'Rape' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Sexual and reproductive abuse'

Charge/s: Rape.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The male appellant and the female complainant had been in a relationship for 13 years. The complainant alleged that in April 2011 the appellant hit her after she refused to have sex with him. She described this as the 'last straw' and told the appellant she was leaving him. They remained living in the same house. One month later, the intoxicated appellant forced her into bed and penetrated her with his penis. Their son saw the incident and called the police.

At trial, the Crown sought to admit evidence of physical assaults by the appellant against the complainant that occurred between 1999 and 2003 (none of these assaults happened after the complainant refused to have intercourse with the appellant). The Crown argued that this evidence explained the context in which the alleged rape occurred, and was relevant to whether the complainant had freely agreed to have intercourse with the appellant and whether the appellant was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting on the night of the alleged offence. The trial judge took account of the highly prejudicial nature of the evidence but considered that it was both relevant to and probative of the facts in issue and should be admitted for the limited purpose described in her ruling (see [19]-[23]).

Issue/s: The trial judge erred in admitting evidence of past conduct by the appellant because the evidence was not relevant.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed. Neave JA held (Bongiorno and Coghlan JJA agreeing) that the evidence was inadmissible. Bongiorno and Coghlan JJA also held that there was a miscarriage of justice (Neave JA in dissent). Neave JA first considered whether the 'relationship evidence' (evidence of physical assaults) was relevant. Her Honour stated generally at [29]:

'Evidence of the relationship between an accused and the alleged victim of an offence may be relevant and admissible for the purpose of placing the event which is the subject matter of the offence in context, where such evidence may assist the jury to evaluate the conduct of the complainant and the applicant on the occasion which gave rise to the charge. Where the evidence is of criminal or other disreputable acts committed by the accused, so that there is a danger that the jury will treat it as evidence that the accused has a propensity to commit acts of the kind charged, the judge must warn the jury of the limited purpose for which the evidence can be used. In particular the jury must be told that the relationship evidence cannot be regarded as a substitute for the evidence that the accused committed the charged acts, or for the purpose of showing that the accused is 'the kind of person' likely to have committed that offence (R v Grech (1997) 2 VR 609)'.

Neave JA went on to consider the circumstances in which relationship evidence may be relevant. At [31], Her Honour noted that relationship evidence of prior violence by the accused towards the complainant may be admissible in sexual offence cases 'because it assists the jury to evaluate whether the complainant had freely agreed to sexual activity on the occasion to which the charge relates, or whether the accused knew that the complainant had not consented or might not have consented to having sex on that occasion': see, for example, R v Loguancio [2000] VSCA 33; (2000) 1 VR 235, 23 (Callaway JA).

At [33], Her Honour noted that relationship evidence of prior acts of violence by the accused 'may also be admissible where a person is charged with homicide or an offence arising out of the infliction of injury on a victim, because such evidence is relevant in evaluating the accused person's claim that he or she had an amicable relationship with the victim, or that he or she acted in self-defence': see, for example, Wilson v The Queen [1970] HCA 17; (1970) 123 CLR 334 and R v Mala (Unreported, Court of Appeal, Brooking, Ormiston, Batt JJA, 27 November 1997).

In this case, the appellant correctly conceded that evidence of the April 2011 assault when she refused to have sexual intercourse with him only a month before the alleged rape was relevant in assessing the likelihood that she had in fact voluntarily agreed to have intercourse with him or he believed that she had done so (see [35]). However, Neave JA held at [36]-[37] that:

'[D]espite the appalling nature of the earlier assaults, I consider that the evidence of those assaults was not sufficiently relevant to the nature of the relationship which existed at the time of the alleged rape to the admission of that evidence. There was a lengthy time lapse between the earlier assaults and the alleged rape. Of itself, that time lapse might not have made the evidence irrelevant…'

'However in this case there was not only a significant time delay between the alleged rape and the earlier assaults, but the complainant remained with the applicant despite the assaults and bore him children after those assaults had occurred. It may be that she did not leave him earlier because she was afraid of him, but there was no evidence that he had assaulted her because she refused to have sex with him, prior to April 2011'.

Bongiorno and Neave JJA agreed with the reasons set out by Neave JA as to why the evidence was inadmissible. However, they also held that there was a substantial miscarriage of justice as a conviction in this case was not inevitable: see Baini v The Queen [2012] HCA 59; (2012) 246 CLR 469. Neave JA in dissent at [52]-[61].

Lewis (a pseudonym) v The Queen* [2018] VSCA 40 (27 February 2018) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Admissibility of evidence' – 'Hearsay rule' – 'Interlocutory appeal' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Tendency evidence'

Charges: Aggravated burglary x 1; Intentionally cause injury x 2; Recklessly cause injury x 2; Intentionally damage property x 1; Extortion with a threat to kill x 1; False imprisonment x 1; Making threat to kill x 1; Contravening family violence intervention order x 1; Attempt to pervert the course of justice x 2.

Case type: Application for leave to appeal against interlocutory decisions.

Facts: The charges related to an incident of violence committed by the applicant against the aggrieved, his partner. The aggrieved was to be the central witness for the prosecution ([5]-[7]). The aggrieved invoked s 18 Evidence Act 2008 (Vic), which provides that a person can avoid giving evidence against their partner if there is a sufficient likelihood that harm would be caused to the person ([9]-[11]). The prosecution then gave notice under s 65 Evidence Act 2008 that they would rely on statements that the aggrieved had made to the police as tendency evidence as an exception to the hearsay rule ([16]).

Issues: The applicant appealed against 3 main interlocutory decisions made by the judge. First, admitting the statements the aggrieved made to the police. Second, refusing to certify the appeal, which is a precondition to appeal against an interlocutory decision under s 295(3) of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic). Third, refusing to sever the proceedings for each of the applicant's charges.

Decision and Reasoning: The Court dismissed all grounds of the appeal. On the first ground, it was reasonably open for the judge to admit the evidence as an exception to the hearsay rule. The applicant argued that admitting the evidence might lead to prejudice because the aggrieved could not be cross-examined (since she had invoked the protection against giving evidence against a de facto partner) ([58]). The Court held that there were sufficient protections available to ensure a fair trial, including directions against giving too much weight to untested statements ([59]). Accordingly, in relation to the second ground, it was reasonably open for the judge to refuse to certify ([64]). On the third ground, the Court held that many charges stemmed from the same factual basis, so there was no basis to sever the charges ([68]).

The Court observed that the applicant did not seek to challenge the judge's ruling that the tendency evidence satisfies the requirements of ss 97 and 101, 'presumably' because 'he regards a submission of that kind as foredoomed to fail, based upon the recent decision of the High Court in Hughes v The Queen' [2017] HCA 20 (14 June 2017). [72] The Court stated at [73] that:

> It is, however, worthy of note that the general evidence of the history of domestic violence, which forms the basis of the tendency notice, may not have quite the probative force in relation to the allegation of the threat to kill and extortion, as it does in relation to the other charges brought against the applicant.

The Court concluded by cautioning trial judges about the use of tendency evidence: '[if the tendency] evidence were led, the judge would have to give a careful direction as to how it could be used and, more importantly, how it could not be used' ([75]).

DPP (Victoria) v Paulino (Ruling No 1) [2017] VSC 343 (17 June 2017) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Admissibility' – 'Relationship evidence'

Charges: Murder.

Case type: Pre-trial hearing.

Facts: The defendant and deceased had been in a relationship, and had two children ([3]). They separated acrimoniously in 2010 ([3]). The defendant was accused of murdering the deceased. The prosecution wished to lead evidence relating to the relationship between the accused and deceased ([4]) in order to establish that the accused's enmity and hatred towards the deceased was the motive for the murder ([5]). The evidence included: threats made by the defendant; relationship evidence; the fact that the accused had an intervention order taken out against him by the deceased; and the accused's actions in relation to a pornographic video allegedly depicting the deceased.

Issues: Whether the 'relationship evidence' should be admitted.

Decision and Reasoning: Justice Bell set out the relevant principles in relation to the Court's mandatory duty to exclude evidence where the probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused (see [33]-[36]). In this context, evidence of a poor relationship between the accused and deceased has been admitted where that evidence may be relevant to whether the accused killed the deceased and whether the accused had a motive to do so ([37]).

Threats

The deceased's statements about her fear of the accused (for example, that if something happened to her, it would be because of the accused) were not admissible. In deciding the admissibility of a victim's fear of the accused perpetrator, the issue is 'whether the evidence of the deceased's fear of the accused was relevant to the probability of the existence of a fact in issue, usually whether the accused had a motive for killing, and actually did kill, the deceased' ([57]). However, the statements were merely evidence of her subjective state of mind, not the accused's ([70]). Further, the content and volume of evidence would be highly prejudicial to the accused ([71]).

By contrast, evidence of threats made by the accused to kill the deceased and her family were admissible, because it was relevant to the accused's state of mind towards the deceased ([76]).

Relationship evidence

Evidence of the defendant's feelings of hatred and enmity towards the deceased was admissible ([42]-[43]). However, most the evidence of the state of their marriage before 2010 was not relevant ([41], [51]). Bell J held that the jury should be told generally that the marriage was unhappy ([85]-[87]), but not the precise details of the aggressive behaviour of the accused ([88]).

Intervention order

Evidence of the intervention order was admissible as a feature of the relationship leading up to the death of the deceased ([91]). There was a danger of unfair prejudice to the accused, but that could be mitigated by proper instruction ([92]).

Pornographic video

The accused had alleged that the deceased had participated in a pornographic video, and had shown his colleagues and the deceased's family ([94]). Evidence of the video and the accused's actions were admissible to demonstrate the extremely negative attitude of the accused towards the deceased ([96]).

R v De Beyer* [2017] NSWSC 752 (13 June 2017) – New South Wales Supreme Court

'Children's evidence' – 'Murder' – 'Relationship evidence'

Charges: Murder x 1.

Case type: Judgement on the admissibility of relationship evidence.

Facts: The accused and deceased were married. The accused was on trial for her murder. It was the Crown case that the accused had stabbed his wife. He gave evidence that she stabbed herself. The prosecution case was circumstantial ([1]).

Issues: Whether evidence of the accused and deceased's relationship was admissible ([2]).

Decision and Reasoning:

Evidence that was admitted without objection:

- Eyewitness evidence from the accused and deceased's son and daughter, including witnessing the accused punching and kicking the deceased, throwing things at the deceased and threatening to kill her ([3], [17]).
- Statements made to the police by one child, the deceased and police officers after police attendance at a violent incident ([9]-[10], [15]).
- Parts of recordings made by the deceased of arguments between her and the deceased ([13], [25]).

Evidence that was objected to, and admitted:

- A conversation between the deceased and her sister, including statements that the accused would not let the deceased out of the house or have a phone "because he was scared she would call the police", and that she would not leave him "because if he found her he would kill her" [23]. The statements were objected to on the basis that they were representations of the accused state of mind ([23]). The Court held that they were expressions of fear, and were admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule ([24]).
- Notes and diary entries made by the deceased, which included assertions of fact about episodes of abuse, and statements about the deceased's state of mind about the relationship ([31]). Only general statements of fact were admitted, because they were not hearsay evidence ([30]).

Evidence that was not admitted:

- Statements made by the deceased to her daughter that the accused attempted to drown her. The daughter only recollected these statements once she was shown the deceased's diary. The daughter's recollection did not appear to be firm. Therefore, Hidden AJ held that evidence was not highly probable to be reliable ([20]-[22]-[22]).

Expert or opinion evidence

Note: S64 of the Domestic and Family Violence Protection (Combating Coercive Control) and Other Legislation Amendment Act 2023 (Qld) provides for a new Part 6A, Division 1A of the Evidence Act 1977 (Qld) which will commence on a date to be fixed by proclamation. It will include:

- s103CC which permits expert evidence about domestic violence in criminal proceedings (which may include evidence about the nature and effects of domestic violence on persons generally and about the effect of domestic violence on a particular person); and
- s103CD which abrogates the ultimate issue and common knowledge rules in relation to expert evidence of domestic violence.

In some cases domestic and family violence has been considered an area of specialised knowledge and opinion or expert evidence has been admitted. This type of evidence may include evidence about so-called 'battered woman syndrome' (a subset of post-traumatic stress disorder - although evidence as to victim post-traumatic stress disorder is more common); the general dynamics of violent relationships; the cycle of violence; and the complex reasons some people stay in violent relationships, or do not report violence, or behave in certain ways to protect themselves. Expert witnesses qualified to give such evidence have included psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers, and academics.

Some jurisdictions have specific provisions in relation to the admission of expert evidence on the subject of domestic and family violence.

S38 of the Evidence Act 1906 (WA) defines evidence of family violence very broadly (including ways in which social, cultural, economic or personal factors have affected any help-seeking behaviour undertaken by the person, or the safety options realistically available to the person, in response to family violence). S39 Evidence Act 1906 (WA) permits relevant expert evidence about domestic violence in criminal proceedings (which may include evidence about the nature and effects of domestic violence on persons generally and about the effect of family violence on a particular person) and defines an expert on the subject of family violence to include a person who can demonstrate specialised knowledge, gained by training, study or experience, of any matter that may constitute evidence of family violence. The Evidence Act 1906 (WA) also contains a provision (s39B) relating to the relevance of evidence of family violence to the defence of self-defence.

S322J of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) defines evidence of family violence broadly (including the social, cultural and economic factors which impact on a person affected by family violence and the psychological effect of relationships affected by family violence. The Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) also contains specific provisions relating to the relevance of evidence of family violence to defences of self-defence (s322M(2)) and duress (s322P).

Part 3 Division 4 (sections 34U-34Z) of the Evidence Act 1929 (SA) provides that where a defendant claims an offence occurred in circumstances of family violence a court may receive evidence of family violence (s34W), including expert evidence consisting of 'social framework evidence' about family violence where the defendant asserts the offence occurred in circumstances of family violence, and for which any of the defences of self-defence, duress and/or sudden or extraordinary emergency are raised. Where such evidence is received the judge must identify and explain the purpose for which the evidence may and may not be used (s 34Y).

The following cases have admitted opinion or expert evidence about the context of domestic and family violence in relevant criminal proceedings.

Evidence of Psychiatrists and Psychologists - Examples

Osland v R [1998] HCA 75; 197 CLR 316 (10 December 1998) – High Court of Australia

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Directions and warnings for/to jury' – 'Evidence' – 'Expert testimony - psychologist' – 'History of abuse' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Provocation' – 'Self-defence'

Charge/s: Murder

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The appellant and her son were jointly tried in the Supreme Court of Victoria for the murder of her husband Mr Osland (the appellant's son's step-father). The jury convicted the appellant but was unable to reach a verdict with respect to her son. Her son was later retried and acquitted. The prosecution case was that the appellant and her son planned to murder her husband. The appellant mixed sedatives with her husband's dinner in sufficient quantity to induce sleep within an hour. The appellant's son later completed the plan by hitting Mr Osland on the head with an iron pipe while he was asleep. He and the appellant then buried

Mr Osland in a grave they had earlier prepared. At trial, the appellant and her son relied on self-defence and provocation raised against ‘an evidentiary background of tyrannical and violent behaviour by Mr Osland over many years’ which had allegedly been ‘escalating in the days prior to his death’ (at [4]). The prosecution accepted that Mr Osland had been violent in the past but maintained that this behaviour had ceased well before he was murdered. The appellant raised expert evidence of the ‘battered woman syndrome’ (BWS) in support of her case. A psychologist’s evidence indicated that the appellant’s relationship with her husband was ‘consistent with it being a battering relationship’ (at [50]).

The psychologist outlined the general characteristics of battered women as follows (at [51]):

1. they are ashamed, fear telling others of their predicament and keep it secret.
2. they tend to relive their experiences and, if frightened or intimidated, their thinking may be cloudy and unfocussed.
3. they have an increased arousal and become acutely aware of any signal of danger from their partner.
4. they may stay in an abusive relationship because they believe that, if they leave, the other person will find them or take revenge on other members of the family.
5. in severe cases, they may live with the belief that one day they will be killed by the other person.

Issue/s: Some of the issues concerned –

1. Provocation - Whether the trial judge erred in ‘failing to make clear the connection between the evidence of "battered woman syndrome", admitted at the trial, and the law of provocation’ (see at [155]).
2. Self-defence – Whether the trial judge erred in ‘failing to make clear the connection between the evidence of "battered woman syndrome", admitted at the trial, and the law of self-defence’ (see at [155]).

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was dismissed by majority (Gaudron and Gummow JJ dissenting). However, all members of the Court were unanimous in holding that the trial judge’s directions with respect to ‘battered woman syndrome’ (BWS) were appropriate.

Gaudron and Gummow JJ:

“Expert evidence is admissible with respect to a relevant matter about which ordinary persons are "[not] able to form a sound judgment … without the assistance of [those] possessing special knowledge or experience in the area" and which is the subject "of a body of knowledge or experience which is sufficiently organized or recognized to be accepted as a reliable body of knowledge or experience"" (at [53])

"…there may be cases in which a matter of apparently slight significance is properly to be regarded as evidence of provocation when considered in light of expert evidence as to the battered woman's heightened arousal or awareness of danger. And evidence of that may also be relevant to the gravity of the provocation, as may the history of the abusive relationship." (at [55])

"So, too, expert evidence of heightened arousal or awareness of danger may be directly relevant to self-defence, particularly to the question whether the battered woman believed that she was at risk of death or serious bodily harm and that her actions were necessary to avoid that risk. And, of course, the history of the particular relationship may bear on the reasonableness of that belief." (at [56])

"…there is an obligation on counsel to make clear to the jury and the trial judge the precise manner in which they seek to rely on expert evidence of battered wife syndrome and to relate it to the other evidence and the issues in the case. In circumstances where evidence of battered wife syndrome is given in general terms, is not directly linked to the other evidence in the case or the issues and no application is made for any specific direction with respect to that evidence, it cannot be concluded that the trial judge erred in not giving precise directions as to the use to which that evidence might be put." (at [60])

Callinan J (while agreeing that the directions with respect to BWS were appropriate) held that to adopt a new and separate defence of BWS 'goes too far for the laws of this country' (see at [239]). His Honour also noted that these issues could be matters for expert evidence as well as matters of common sense for a jury to decide with the assistance from the trial judge.

McHugh J did not make any comments on BWS.

Kirby J:

His Honour discussed the relevance of the BWS defence in abusive relationships. His Honour was of the opinion that the term should not be restricted to women because there may be situations where men are the victims such as similarly abusive same-sex relationships, and 'unlike conception and childbirth, there is no inherent reason why a battering relationship should be confined to women as victims' (at [159]).

His Honour was broadly supportive of BWS evidence but did note some controversies around it and was somewhat critical of it: "…it appears to be an "advocacy driven construct" designed to "medicalise" the evidence in a particular case in order to avoid the difficulties which might arise in the context of a criminal trial from a conclusion that the accused's motivations are complex and individual: arising from personal pathology and social conditions rather than a universal or typical pattern of conduct sustained by scientific data' (at [161]).

Further, he was critical of the term itself and stated it should not be used. He was also aware that the syndrome was 'based largely on the experiences of Caucasian women of a particular social background' (whose) '"passive" responses may be different from those of women with different economic or ethnic backgrounds' (at [161]).

Ultimately however, his Honour was supportive – 'Although BWS does not enjoy universal support, there is considerable agreement that expert testimony about the general dynamics of abusive relationships is admissible if relevant to the issues in the trial and proved by a qualified expert. The greatest relevance of such evidence will usually concern the process of "traumatic bonding" which may occur in abusive relationships' (at [167]).

R v Lorenz* [1998] ACTSC 275 (14 August 1998) – Australian Capital Territory Supreme Court

'Assault occasioning bodily harm' – 'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Exposing children' – 'General deterrence' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing' – 'Unlawful confinement' – 'Where the offender is also a victim'

Charge/s: Robbery with an offensive weapon.

Trial: Judge only trial.

Facts: On 20 November 1996, Ms Lorenz ('the accused') entered a supermarket and attempted to purchase some cigarettes with her EFTPOS card from the complainant. The transaction could not be completed because there were insufficient funds in the account. The accused maintained she was sure there were funds in the account and re-tried the card but it was again declined. She then left the store. Ten minutes later, the accused returned to the store with a pen knife. She approached the complainant, held the knife out in front of her and said, 'give me all your fucking money or I'll slit your throat'. The complainant gave the accused $360 in cash and the accused left the store. While initially denying any involvement, the accused made admissions to the police.

Counsel for the accused argued that the accused was acting out of duress on the basis of a threat made by Ms Lorenz's partner on the night before the robbery and repeated the following morning to the effect that if she did not obtain enough money to enable him to re-register his car he would kill her. This threat followed a pattern of violent and threatening behaviour towards the accused over a number of years (See [11]). On the morning of the robbery, the accused, who was pregnant with the couple's third child, found out that she was unable to get the immediate payment of an advance payment from the Department of Social Security to pay the re-registration.

Decision and Reasoning: There was some discussion in this case of 'battered woman syndrome' (See [26]-[31]). Crispin J accepted that upon failing to receive advance payment from the Department of Social Security, the accused became frightened and confused and the robbery was an impulsive act due to her fear that her partner would kill her. His Honour stated: 'In my view her failure to attempt to extricate herself from the situation whether by leaving him or otherwise is largely explicable by her fear and confusion. Furthermore, she may have thought that any escape would have been only temporary and that sooner or later [her partner] would have been bound to have caught up with her and carried out his threat' at [30].

However, 'a diagnosis of battered woman syndrome does not of itself give rise to any defence. The law does not recognise any general principle that people should be absolved from criminal conduct because they had been beaten or abused or because a psychological condition caused by such treatment may have led them to commit the offences with which they are charged. Nonetheless, evidence that such a person may have had a psychological condition of this kind may be relevant to several defences known to the law' at [31].

Here, counsel for the appellant unsuccessfully attempted to rely on the defence of duress. In the accused's favour, His Honour found that the threat was effective at the time of the offence, the accused did not fail to take advantage of a reasonable opportunity to render the threat ineffective, and, in light of the extremity of the actual and threatened violence displayed by the accused's partner, a person of ordinary firmness of mind may have acted in the way the accused did (See [35]-[37]). However, the accused's partner did not direct the accused to commit the offence and accordingly the defence of duress failed (See [38]-[41]). In the alternative, counsel for the accused attempted to rely on the defence of necessity. However, His Honour held that the imminence of danger fell well short of the required standard for the successful proof of the defence (See [42]-[45]). She was accordingly found guilty.

The accused left her partner shortly after the robbery and had formed a relationship with another man. She had just turned 23, had three children and was pregnant to her new partner. The new relationship was apparently a happy one. In these circumstances, and to give her the opportunity to start a new life for herself and her children, Crispin J found it appropriate to defer passing sentence on the condition that she enter into recognisance to be of good behaviour for a period of three years.

R v Silva* [2015] NSWSC 148 (6 March 2015) – New South Wales Supreme Court

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Expert evidence - psychiatrist' – 'Manslaughter by excessive self-defence' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Post-traumatic stress disorder' – 'Sentence'

Charge/s: Manslaughter by excessive self-defence.

Hearing: Sentencing.

Facts: The offender stabbed and killed her partner, James Polkinghorne. The relationship had been characterised by escalating physical and verbal abuse from the deceased towards the offender. On the 13 May 2012, the deceased made increasingly threatening and abusive telephone calls and messages to the offender. That night, he went to the home of the offender's parents, where the offender was present. He was highly aggressive and high on methylamphetamine. The facts of what followed were confused and confusing (see [29]-[36]). In summary, the deceased threatened to kill the offender, he assaulted the offender, and the offender's brother and father intervened. They began fighting with the deceased. The offender retrieved a knife from inside and, while the offender was on top of her brother, stabbed and killed the deceased. The offender was found not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter.

Decision and Reasoning: A sentence of 18 months imprisonment, wholly suspended was imposed. Hoeben CJ first made a number of factual findings. At [38] His Honour found that:

'the offender stabbed the deceased with an intention to inflict grievous bodily harm because she believed her act was necessary to defend not only herself but her brother and father. However, in accordance with the jury's verdict, the offender's conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as she perceived them, thereby rendering her guilty of the crime of manslaughter by way of excessive self-defence'.

His Honour also had regard, with some qualifications, to the evidence of Associate Professor Quadrio, a consultant psychiatrist. In her report, Professor Quadrio concluded that during her relationship with the deceased, the offender developed chronic and complex Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) with particular features which were described as 'Battered Woman Syndrome'. She also concluded that the offender continued to suffer from PTSD. Hoeben CJ found at [40]:

'In the absence of any psychiatric opinion to the contrary, I would normally accept such a diagnosis. In this case I am not prepared to do so. This is because the diagnosis is based upon significant pieces of history from the offender which are different to the evidence at trial and to what the offender said in her ERISP. I am prepared to accept that the offender currently suffers from PTSD. The events of the night of 13 May 2012 would of themselves be sufficient to bring about such a condition and there is no reason to doubt the existence of the symptoms which the offender described following the deceased's death. What I am not prepared to accept is that the Post Traumatic Stress Disorder was due to the offender's relationship with the deceased and was in existence before the deceased's death'.

However, His Honour did accept that the offender stabbed the deceased when she was in a highly emotional and hysterical state (see [41]-[43]).

In reaching an appropriate sentence, Hoeben CJ took into account a number of considerations. These included that specific deterrence were not relevant in light of the offender's rehabilitation and the unlikelihood of re-offending (see [58]). General deterrence was not accorded substantial weight in light of exceptional factual circumstances (the deceased had made escalating threats of violence approaching the offender's home and the offender's state of mind was affected by being already brutally assaulted and witnessing the struggle between her family members and the deceased) (see [59]). The objective seriousness was at the lower end of the range as was the offender's culpability (see [60]-[61]).

As against these matters, Hoeben CJ had regard to the sanctity of human life, the need to denounce the conduct of the offender and hold her accountable for her actions (see [62]).

The offender successfully appealed against her conviction to the Court of Appeal. See Silva v The Queen [2016] NSWCCA 284 (7 December 2016).

Inkamala v An Assessor under s 24 of the Victims of Crime Act* [2022] NTCAT 20 (8 December 2022) – Northern Territory Civil and Administrative Tribunal

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Coercive control' – 'Complex post traumatic stress disorder' – 'Consultant psychiatrist evidence' – 'Contributory negligence' – 'Financial assistance' – 'Learned helplessness' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Physical violence' – 'Post traumatic stress disorder' – 'Victims of crime'

Matter: Application for review of a decision to award the applicant financial assistance of $13,170.99 under the Victims of Crime Assistance Act 2006 (NT) arising from injuries sustained by the applicant as a result of violent acts committed by her sometime domestic partner.

Facts: The applicant is a Western Arrarnta woman who is a “deeply traumatised survivor of sustained, repeated and brutal intimate partner violence” which resulted in two children (now teenagers) and numerous incidents of violence resulting in medical or hospital treatment, numerous protection orders to protect the applicant from the offender and numerous sentences of imprisonment imposed on the offender. Many of the documented offences occurred when either or both of the offender and applicant were intoxicated. In 2010 the applicant was awarded $18,750 for physical injuries (partial loss of vision, fractured forearm, scarring to the right arm) caused by the offender between 2006 and 2009.

A second application was received on 18 December 2014 in relation to physical injuries from assaults by the offender on about 3 occasions, which was amended on 15 January 2015 to include a claim for psychological or psychiatric injuries. The claim took seven years to process, and the offender continued to assault the applicant causing the claim to continue to increase. A consultant psychiatrist provided reports and it was not in dispute that the applicant has sustained a Complex Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (CPTSD) and a Major Depressive Disorder “as a direct result of domestic violence perpetrated buy the offender between 2006 and 2020”, attributing 30 per cent of the CPTSD to the assaults between 2006 and 2009 and 70 per cent to the assaults between 2009 and 2020 [12]. The initial assessment awarded the applicant $13,170.99, with the amount awarded for her physical and psychological injuries reduced by 50 per cent due to the applicant’s contribution to the injuries.

Grounds:

1. The initial assessment of $35,000 for psychiatric or psychological disorder is inadequate;
2. the award of $110.99 for financial loss is inadequate; and
3. the reduction of 50% of the compensation for injuries is excessive.

Decision and reasoning:

1. The decision of the respondent to award the applicant $13,170.99 be set aside.
2. An award of $21,006.99 to the applicant be substituted.

[63] The Victorian Court of Appeal has recently described battered wife syndrome as “a learned helplessness process in which women who have been abused repeatedly within a relationship they believe they cannot escape from, learn ‘good coping skills as a trade-off for escape.’

Battered woman syndrome is a subset of PTSD. The label “battered wife syndrome” has not been applied to the applicant in this case. However, in my view the evidence supports a finding that the applicant, who has sustained CPTSD as a result of violence perpetrated against her by a coercively controlling partner over many years, is likely a person whose behaviour in repeatedly returning to live with the offender is in large part due to learned helplessness. Accordingly, this case is to be distinguished on its facts from Lankin v Northern Territory of Australia [(Local Court of the Northern Territory, unreported case number 21337307, 1 September 2015].

[64] In her written submissions on behalf of the respondent and the intervener, Ms Thompson submits that the applicant “willingly recommenced her relationship with the offender at various times”. I reject that submission. I am satisfied that the applicant recommenced her relationship with the offender reluctantly and unwillingly, and that her decisions to do so were to a significant extent a consequence of the psychological injury the offender had inflicted on her.

[65] In my opinion, a reduction of 50% of the award to which the applicant is entitled would be unfair and inequitable. The offender and the applicant are not equally culpable or responsible for the injuries she sustained. I consider that the applicant’s behaviour in resuming her relationship with the victim and engaging in the harmful consumption of liquor contributed indirectly to her injuries. In my view, a fair and equitable apportionment of responsibility for the applicant’s injuries is to attribute the offender’s responsibility as being 80%, and the applicant’s as 20%. I find accordingly.”

R v Falls, Coupe, Cummings-Creed & Hoare* [2010] QSC (3 June 2010) summing up - unreported – Queensland Supreme Court

‘Abused person’ – ‘Battered woman syndrome’ – ‘Expert evidence - psychiatrist’ – ‘Murder’ – ‘Self defence’

Charge: Murder.

Result: Acquitted.

Facts: In May 2006, the accused, Susan Falls, shot and killed her husband, Rodney Falls. Throughout their relationship, Susan Falls was subject to significant physical and emotional abuse. This included: numerous incidents of physical violence, beating one of the family's dogs to death; numerous incidents of sexual violence and rape; threatening to kill her or harm the couple's children. Susan Falls drugged the deceased and shot him twice as he dozed in a chair. She was charged with murder. Both self-defence, ss 271(2), 273 Criminal Code 1899 (Qld) and the defence of killing for preservation in an abusive domestic relationship, s 304B Criminal Code 1899 (Qld) were raised at trial. Two forensic psychiatrists (Dr Lawrence and Associate Professor Quadrio) were called by the defence and gave evidence about the history of violence and its effect on the offender. (Note Coupe, Cumming-Creed and Hoare were charged with being accessories to the murder but were also acquitted).

Applegarth J, summing up (3 June 2010):

'Evidence of what, for want of a better expression, is referred to as "battered woman syndrome", is admitted, not because battered woman syndrome is a disorder, or because battered woman syndrome is a defence. Battered woman syndrome isn't a defence. The fact that someone is battered for years doesn't automatically give them a defence. Whether they have a defence depends on whether they acted as they did in circumstances that the law provides is a defence.

However, what is conveniently, and perhaps somewhat inaccurately, described as "battered woman syndrome" is relevant to legal defences.

It doesn't have to be a psychological disorder to be relevant to behaviour and to the defences in this case. It's relevant to the mental state of Ms Falls, and whether she exhibited hyperarousal and other symptoms that are recognised in such cases.

I won't repeat it. You will remember the evidence of Dr Lawrence and Associate Professor Quadrio about the mental state of persons who are subjected to prolonged abuse, their vigilance and so on. Associate Professor Quadrio summed it up pretty simply in saying they're "revved up all the time".

The behaviour of people, be they soldiers or civilians who are subjected to trauma, has been the subject of organised study. It's not every form of behaviour that is or needs to be the subject of expert evidence. Someone's grief reaction when a loved one dies, or the anxiety that most of us feel when we talk in public, or the anxiety that most people experience when they sit exams, these are things that are familiar to us because we might remember sitting exams or we've had children who sit exams. So we don't need expert evidence to tell us about how people become anxious in certain circumstances, when they're going for an exam or a driver's licence or something of that kind, that we all know about or most of us know about. But because battered wife syndrome is relatively rare it is a legitimate matter for expert evidence and it is the proper subject for expert evidence because, without the assistance of expert evidence, ordinary people who don't know or study these things, might find the behaviour perplexing, counterintuitive or unreasonable.

It might seem odd why there would be a bond between the abuser and the abused. Why there might be, what Dr Lawrence referred to as, an ambivalent relationship, or what Associate Professor Quadrio referred to as a traumatic attachment. The behaviour of someone with a vulnerability because of past abuse who remains with their abuser.

Dr Lawrence and Associate Professor Quadrio, who are experts in their field, were able to address what was described as the "cycle of violence". How, over time the situation worsens. How often it's the case that the abuser isolates the partner. The common symptoms of a variation in mental state. The loss of self-esteem. The belief that the person who is being abused is somehow at fault. The shame they feel when they return, contrary to the advice of police. The belief that in those circumstances the police won't help them again. The reasons they don't leave: children; lack of support; lack of financial support; threats to the woman; threats to people they love; threats over the custody of children.

And apart from giving you evidence about those characteristics and observed behaviours, Dr Lawrence and Associate Professor Quadrio gave you evidence about the fact that victims of prolonged abuse can have quite correct perceptions as to the risks that are posed to them if they try to leave….

Battered wife syndrome isn't a psychological disorder. As Dr Lawrence and Dr Quadrio explained it's a pattern of behaviours. It's been the subject of research, and it's a field of study by practitioners and scholars whose research and reports are open to contest, as you'd expect scientific inquiry and research to be in a proper field of scientific study.

Dr Quadrio described how there is what she described as a "learned helplessness". How abused women are afraid to leave because they correctly assess that they're at risk. That there may have been past attempts to leave. She referred to the triggers that occur for a violent response. That the level of risk is perceived to increase or has in fact increased. Often there are threats to harm children, and the threats become specific in terms of how, when and where they will be carried out.

R v Ney* [2011] QSC Indictment No 597 of 2008 (8 March 2011) sentence - unreported – Queensland Supreme Court

'Diminished responsibility' – 'Expert evidence - psychiatrist - psychologist' – 'Manslaughter' – 'Post traumatic stress disorder'

Charge: Manslaughter

Proceeding: Sentencing

Facts: Ney killed her partner, Haynes, striking him in the head and face with an axe. Haynes was hospitalised and died two days later. Initially charged with murder she pleaded guilty to manslaughter. She was sentenced to nine years imprisonment - eligible for release on parole after serving three years. In sentencing Ney, Dick AJ referred to the reports of a psychologist (Dr Sundin) and a psychiatrist (Associate Professor Carolyn Quadrio):

'As you know, I have been given a number of psychiatric and psychological reports. The prosecution tendered the report of Dr Josephine Sundin. Dr Sundin has come to the opinion that as a result of the multiple traumas you have suffered in your life since your young teenage years and the series of violent intimate relationships that you have endured since that time, and the fact that you have suffered physical, sexual and psychological abuse over a long period of time, you suffer chronic post-traumatic stress disorder and borderline personality disorder.

The connection between those two matters is explained in her report and in other reports. Associate Professor Carolyn Quadrio, spells it out in her addendum report. She said, "Trauma and abuse have profound effects on mental processes and on psycho-social and psychological functions so that a disorganisation of personality occurs and leads to lasting disorder. Similarly, substance abuse which commonly develops in the context of adolescent trauma, also has a profound effect on mental and psycho-social processes and secondly, incapacitates the person so they are rendered highly vulnerable to further traumas and abuse thus creating a vicious cycle…

I have been assisted by the addendum report of Associate Professor Quadrio where she says that, "At times, however, she returned when she may have been able to escape because she experienced him as someone who loved her. This is explained as traumatic attachment relationship. Further it is also the case that in chronic or complex post-traumatic stress disorder there is both paralysis of initiative whereby the person is greatly compromised in her capacity to take action and there are alterations in perception so they have difficulty perceiving themselves accurately or others and thus in perceiving the true nature of the relationship with an abuser."

Later on she says, "If this psycho physiological disturbance is sustained over time and especially when it occurs in the crucial development years of childhood and adolescence, it eventually leads to disorganisation of personality, sustained hyper vigilance and hyper reactivity become chronic and irreversible."

Further on, "The inability to leave can be explained, partly, as a manifestation of personality disturbance but it is also the case that in domestic violence a woman feels trapped and unable to leave and knows it is not safe to leave so she remains captive and experiences more abuse and trauma and undergoes more personality disorganisation."

I have also noted from the report of Associate Professor Quadrio that those matters which are described as chronic or complex PTSD personality disorder with poly substance dependence or abuse, she says, "These disturbances reflected a lifetime of trauma, a highly chaotic and unsustainable lifestyle and both past and present intimate partner violence."

R v Runjanjic and Kontinnen (1991) 53 A Crim R 362; (1992) 56 SASR 114; [1991] SASC 2951 (28 June 1991) – South Australia Supreme Court (Full Court)

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Expert evidence - psychologist' – 'False imprisonment' – 'Grievous bodily harm'

Charge/s: False imprisonment, grievous bodily harm.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: The two female appellants were in a relationship with a man named Hill. There was a consistent pattern of domineering and violent conduct by Hill towards both appellants. The appellants were part of a plan to help Hill forcibly confine the complainant and cause her injury. At trial, they sought to admit expert evidence of 'battered woman syndrome' to support a claim of duress. The trial judge ruled that the evidence was inadmissible on the ground that the test for duress was objective and expert evidence of the state of mind of the appellants was therefore irrelevant.

Issue/s: Whether the expert evidence of battered woman syndrome ought to have been admissible to support a claim of duress.

Decision and Reasoning: King CJ (with whom Bollen and Legoe JJ agreed) held that the evidence ought to have been admissible and a re-trial was ordered. In reaching this decision, King CJ first held that the trial judge's reason did not provide a sound basis for excluding the evidence. It ignored the subjective aspect of the test for duress and it also misunderstood the main thrust of the proffered evidence. While the expert might have been in a position to comment on the state of mind of the appellants, the primary thrust of such evidence was to establish a pattern of responses commonly exhibited by battered women. At [23]:

'The proffered evidence is concerned not so much with the particular responses of these appellants as with what would be expected of women generally, that is to say women of reasonable firmness, who should find themselves in a domestic situation such as that in which the appellants were. It is designed to assist the court in assessing whether women of reasonable firmness would succumb to the pressure to participate in the offences. It also serves to explain why even a woman of reasonable firmness would not escape the situation rather than participate in criminal activity. As such it is relevant'.

Second, King CJ considered whether expert evidence of battered woman syndrome met the essential pre-requisite that it had been accepted by experts in the field of psychology or psychiatry as a scientifically accepted facet of psychology. Following significant consideration of scientific literature, at [24] and [26], King CJ held that the evidence was admissible:

'It is not sufficient, in order to justify the admission of expert evidence of the battered woman syndrome, as was argued by counsel for the appellant, that the ordinary juror would have no experience of the situation of a battered woman. Jurors are constantly expected to judge of situations, and of the behaviour of people in situations, which are outside their experience. Much conduct which occupies the attention of the criminal courts occurs in the criminal underworld, or in sordid conditions and situations, of which jurors would generally have no experience. It is not considered to be beyond the capacity of juries, or of the Court if it is the trier of the facts, to judge of the reactions and behaviour of people in those situations. Expert evidence of how life in criminal or sordid conditions might affect a person's responses to situations, would not be admitted.

'This is an area in which the courts must move with great caution. The admission of expert evidence of patterns of behaviour of normal human beings, even in abnormal situations or relations, is fraught with danger for the integrity of the trial process. The risk that, by degrees, trials, especially criminal trials, will become battle grounds for experts and that the capacity of juries and courts to discharge their fact-finding functions will be thereby impaired is to be taken seriously. I have considered anxiously whether the situation of the habitually battered woman is so special and so outside ordinary experience that the knowledge of experts should be made available to courts and juries called upon to judge behaviour in such situations. In the end, I have been impressed by what I have read of the insights which have been gained by special study of the subject, insights which I am sure would not be shared or shared fully by ordinary jurors. It seems to me that a just judgment of the actions of women in those situations requires that the court or jury have the benefit of the insights which have been gained'.

Rowan (a pseudonym) v The King* [2022] VSCA 236 (28 October 2022) – Victorian Court of Appeal

'Appeal against conviction' – 'Battered wife syndrome' – 'Bestiality' – 'Common law duress' – 'Continuing or ever-present threats sufficient' – 'Criminal law' – 'Defence of duress' – 'Duress of circumstances' – 'Expert evidence' – 'Incest' – 'Indecent act with child under 16' – 'Inferred threat' – 'People with an intellectual disability' – 'People with mental illness' – 'Post-traumatic stress disorder' – 'Psychologist evidence' – 'Rape' – 'Relationship evidence' – 'Sexual abuse' – 'Specific, overt threat' – 'Threat by implication' – 'Threat of physical and sexual abuse' – 'Victim as (alleged) perpetrator'

Note: a Crown special leave application to appeal to the High Court of Australia was granted on 16 June 2023 and the matter has been listed for hearing in October 2023. The Crown argues that the Court of Appeal "committed an error in principle by extending the law of duress as it applies to both common law and by operation of statute, to cover what is known as duress of circumstances".

Charges: Incest x 11; indecent act with a child under 16 x 1.

Proceedings: Application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The applicant was convicted following trial of 11 counts of incest (s 44(1) and one count of indecent act with a child under 16 (s 47(1)) contrary to the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic). Her partner, JR, was the father of the two complainant daughters and had previously been convicted of sexual offences against them. At the applicant's trial it was argued that JR had directed the applicant to commit the offences, and she had complied due to an ever-present threat of physical and sexual violence by JR if she did not do what he demanded of her. It was submitted that this constituted duress. The judge, however, ruled that this did not constitute duress, as duress required there to have been a specific or overt threat, not just an ever-present threat. Consequently, duress was not left to the jury and the applicant was convicted of the offences on the basis that she was present and encouraged the daughters to comply with his abuse.

The applicant and JR's relationship commenced when the appellant was 18 years old. They lived on a rural property owned by JR's father and had 4 children. The applicant had a mild intellectual disability and was financially and socially dependent on JR. There was evidence that JR was physically, emotionally and sexually violent to the applicant, he isolated her on the farm, was highly controlling of her movements and had a bad temper. The prosecution accepted that JR's violence towards the applicant was 'severe' [57]. It was reported that the applicant had tried to leave in the past but had returned because she 'would struggle with the kids' and that she had not reported the violence to the police because 'noone would believe her because she was nothing.' [107] A psychologist gave evidence that the applicant suffered from learned helplessness and low self-esteem characteristic of 'battered women's syndrome', a subset of post-traumatic stress disorder. The applicant's counsel submitted that 'JR's conduct created and maintained a serious, standing threat of significant, ongoing harm, namely, angry subjection to the domineering, violent, rape-embracing regime of life imposed by a brute upon a traumatised, vulnerable person. Under that regime, refusal was said to always have its consequences and this had the effect of overbearing the applicant's will so that she always submitted to the will of JR.' [132]

Grounds: The trial judge erred in ruling that the defence of duress was not open on the evidence and thereby caused a substantial miscarriage of justice.

Decision and Reasoning: Leave to appeal granted; appeal against conviction upheld; new trial ordered; unnecessary to consider appeal against sentence.

Kyrou & McLeish JJA:

Their Honours found there was 'considerable overlap' in the elements of each form of the defence [188].

They made the following remarks regarding element (i) of common law duress in the context of the case:

[155] We accept that no previous case has expressly accepted the proposition that a continuing or ever present threat — whether overt or tacit — as distinct from a specific, overt threat, is sufficient. However, no case has expressly considered that proposition and rejected it. …. Further, the analysis of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia in Runjanjic [(1992) 56 SASR 114] is consistent with the proposition that a continuing or ever present threat may be sufficient.

[156] In our opinion, a continuing or ever present threat which is subsisting at the time an accused committed the charged offence can suffice if, in all other respects, the defence of duress can be made out. We cannot think of any reason in principle or policy that requires exclusion of a continuing or ever present threat where, due to the threat, the accused has lost his or her freedom to choose to refrain from committing the charged offence. In this context, it is relevant to note the additional limiting factors identified in element (iii) [common law duress above] which requires that the threat be present and continuing, imminent and impending at the time each offence is committed.

[169] Having regard to the above features of the relationship between JR and the applicant … it would have been open to the jury to conclude that it was reasonably possible that the applicant understood that there was a continuing or ever present threat of physical and sexual violence (including rape) by JR if she did not do what he demanded of her. If the jury reached this conclusion, it would have been open to them to find that it was reasonably possible that, when JR requested the applicant to be involved in each of the sexual offences against the complainants, she understood that, if she did not comply, he would physically and sexually harm her, including by raping her.

[174] We are also of the opinion that it is not fatal in this case that there is no direct evidence that JR told the applicant shortly prior to each offence that, unless she performed the acts that constitute each of the charged offences, he would physically and sexually abuse her. That is because it would be open to the jury to infer that this was a reasonable possibility based upon the history of the relationship between JR and the applicant as set out in the …[evidence].

Their Honours made the following remarks regarding element (ii) of common law duress in the context of the case:

[180] A person of 'ordinary firmness of mind' in the present case would be a female domestic partner of JR who was of the applicant's age and who has lived with JR in the same circumstances as the applicant and has endured the physical and sexual abuse that she has experienced. That person would also have the same isolated lifestyle as the applicant and possess her knowledge of JR's personality and behaviour. However, that person would not have the applicant's history of sexual abuse as an adolescent or her mild intellectual disability.

There was evidence that the AR suffered 'battered woman syndrome':

[181] In our opinion, upon the basis of the [evidence], it would have been open to the jury to conclude that there was a reasonable possibility that a person of ordinary firmness of mind having the characteristics described… above would have been likely to:

(a) develop a battered woman syndrome with the consequence of learned helplessness, and yield to JR's continuing or ever present threat in the way the applicant did; and

(b) not seek to escape the situation.

Their Honours then briefly considered elements (iv), (v), (vii) and (viii) of Common Law duress in turn but did not consider element (vi) because the accused was not charged with murder, or any other crime excepted from common law duress:

[184] In relation to element (iv), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant reasonably apprehended that the threat would be carried out based upon JR's history of punishing her if she sought to disobey him.

[185] In relation to element (v), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant was induced by the continuing or ever present threat to commit the charged offences based upon our previous analysis regarding her will being overborne by that threat.

[186] In relation to element (vii), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant did not, by fault on her part when free from the duress, expose herself to its application. That is because the threat was a continuing or ever present threat and the jury could conclude that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant was not free of the threat at any time during the period of the offending.

[187] In relation to element (viii), the jury could find that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant did not have the means, with safety to herself, of preventing the execution of the threat. That is because the jury could conclude that there was a reasonable possibility that the applicant's battered woman syndrome rendered her incapable of escaping from her abusive relationship with JR.

McLeish JA agreed with the reasons given by Kyrou and Niall JJA in respect of elements of the defence of duress' both under common law and under 32O.' [228] McLeish JA also observed:

[208] It is not necessary that the threat which underpins a defence of duress be the subject of direct evidence of the accused. There is no reason in principle why the requisite threat might not be found by a process of inference from other evidence. That inference may, in principle, be drawn from evidence about an ongoing course of conduct. The threat may also be conveyed to the accused by implication rather than express words.

Naturally, the defence may very well be weaker in the absence of direct evidence from the accused; but that is not the only way it may be raised.

Evidence of a Social Worker - Examples

R v Kina [1993] QCA 480 (29 November 1993) – Queensland Court of Appeal

'Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people' – 'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Expert evidence - social worker' – 'Fresh evidence' – 'Murder' – 'Physical violence and harm'

Charge/s: Murder.

Appeal Type: Appeal against conviction.

Facts: In September 1988, after a trial which lasted less than a day, the female appellant, an Aboriginal woman, was convicted of murder for killing her abusive male partner of three years and was sentenced to life imprisonment. The appellant did not give or call evidence at her trial. It was only five years later, after the appellant had spent years speaking to a particular social worker (Mr Berry) in prison, that evidence of the abuse she suffered emerged. Kina applied to the Governor in Council for the exercise in her favour of the royal prerogative of mercy. Section 672A of the Criminal Code preserves the pardoning power of the Governor, adding in para. (a) 'that the Crown Law Officer may refer the whole case to the Court of Appeal, to be heard and determined as in the case of an appeal by a person convicted.' Under this provision on 24 May 1993 the Attorney General referred to the Court of Appeal 'the whole case with respect to the conviction of … Robyn Bella Kina on the charge of murder …' of Anthony David Black.

Issue/s:

1. The appellant did not receive a fair trial and a miscarriage of justice occurred because of problems of communication between the appellant and her lawyers which led to fundamental errors at trial.
2. There was fresh evidence of such a nature that, had it been placed before the jury who decided the case, there was a substantial possibility of acquittal.
3. The fresh evidence was of such a nature that refusal of it would lead to a miscarriage of justice.

Decision and Reasoning: The appeal was allowed, the conviction and verdict set aside and a new trial ordered. Evidence of Mr Berry, the social worker, was important in this case. Mr Berry first saw the appellant before her trial in April 1988. Over the following months, the appellant slowly disclosed her story to Mr Berry – that the deceased had continually beaten her up, forced her to have anal sex with him and that he tied her up. Mr Berry tried to communicate with the appellant's lawyers before the trial but was advised that her legal representatives wished that he 'would not interfere with proceedings'. After the trial, the social worker saw the appellant in a counselling capacity. The appellant's self-esteem improved and in 1991 she was able to give evidence about the deceased's threat to anally rape her 14 year old niece.

In finding there was a miscarriage of justice, Fitzgerald P and Davis JA held that:

"In this matter, there were, insufficiently recognised, a number of complex factors interacting which presented exceptional difficulties of communication between her legal representatives and the appellant because of: (i) her aboriginality; (ii) the battered woman syndrome; and (iii) the shameful (to her) nature of the events which characterised her relationship with the deceased. These cultural, psychological and personal factors bore upon the adequacy of the advice and legal representation which the appellant received and effectively denied her satisfactory representation or the capacity to make informed decisions on the basis of proper advice".

R v Yeoman* [2003] NSWSC 194 (21 March 2003) – New South Wales Supreme Court

'Battered woman syndrome' – 'Difficulty leaving an abusive relationship' – 'Expert evidence - psychosocial report - specific experience in drug and alcohol related domestic violence issues' – 'Manslaughter' – 'People affected by substance misuse' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Where the victim is an offender' – 'Women'

Charge/s: Manslaughter.

Hearing: Sentencing.

Facts: The female offender had lived with her male de facto partner, the deceased, for 25 years (since she was 17 years old). The deceased had been violent towards the offender throughout their relationship, including hitting her in the eye with a baseball bat, but she did not have the means to leave the relationship. The deceased would often taunt the offender and dare her to stab him. They both suffered from alcoholism. One evening, the offender was heavily intoxicated and stabbed the deceased in the chest, killing him. At the time, she did not intend to kill him nor did she realise he was dead and she went to bed. The next morning she called the police and made full admissions. The offender's recollection of events was imperfect because of her intoxication.

Decision and Reasoning: Buddin J had extensive regard to a psychological report prepared by Ms Danielle Castles, who had 17 years' experience working in the social welfare field, with particular expertise about drug and alcohol issues and domestic violence (See [32]-[35]). Ms Castles commenced her report by explaining the nature of domestic violence and stated at [32] that:

'domestic violence is the term used to describe the violence and abuse perpetrated upon a partner in a marriage or marriage like relationship. It is essentially the misuse of power and the exercise of control by one person, usually the man, over another, usually the woman. "Women experiencing domestic violence are often subjected to physical, sexual, emotional/psychological, social and economic abuse. Abuse may be overt (physical violence) or it might be deceptively subtle (emotional abuse). It is the interplay between making the woman fearful and reducing her self-esteem which results in the abuse having significant and prolonged effects on the woman."

The effects of domestic violence are such that women in violent relationships are convinced they are hopeless, that they need to be dependent upon the abuser and could not possibly survive without him. The most significant aspect of prolonged abuse is the gradual breaking down of a woman's autonomy'.

Ms Castles then set out the ways in which domestic violence impacted upon the offender here (See [33]-[34]).

Buddin J ultimately found that the offender's criminality was at the lower end of the scale of culpability of an offence of this kind i.e. non-intentional homicide in circumstances of tragic misadventure. Her intention was no more and no less than to engage in a desperate and objectively dangerous gesture, without intending any real harm or worse to the deceased. This, in conjunction with the very powerful subjective case advanced on behalf of the offender, meant that an exceptional sentence of a good behaviour bond for four years was appropriate, notwithstanding the fact that a life was taken (See [50]). The subjective factors that mitigated sentence included that 'the offence took place against the background of continuing domestic violence over a prolonged period of time, the impact upon her of which cannot, for the reasons advanced by Ms Castles and others, be underestimated' (See [45]). Buddin J also derived assistance from cases involving 'battered spouse or partner syndrome' (See [48]).

Liyanage v Western Australia* [2017] WASCA 112 (22 June 2017) – Western Australia Supreme Court (Court of Appeal)

'Expert evidence' – 'Risk' – 'Social context evidence' – 'Social worker'

Charges: Manslaughter x 1.

Appeal type: Appeal against conviction and sentence.

Facts: The appellant and the deceased were married. The appellant killed the deceased by striking him with a mallet [1]. The appellant gave evidence that the deceased was violent and controlling, and regularly sexually assaulted her [2]. She had no memory of the night on which she killed the deceased [47]. At trial, she was found not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter [4]. She was sentenced to 4 years' imprisonment [5].

Issues: The appellant appealed on several grounds including that the trial judge should not have excluded evidence from a social worker about domestic violence [7].

Decision and Reasoning:

All grounds of appeal were dismissed.

Social worker's risk assessment evidence

The social worker's risk assessment evidence was in relation to the psychological impact of prolonged exposure to domestic violence (popularly known as 'battered women's syndrome'). The evidence was based on a risk assessment which used actuarial risk assessment tools and clinical guides, including the 'Power and Control Wheel' (see Chapter 4 Context Statement) ([108]). The Court held that: the evidence did not explain the appellant's state of mind ([123]-[129]); that the evidence did not quantify the extent of the risk, and did not specifically address the question of the risk of homicide ([130]-[148]); and the actuarial tools had not 'been accepted by the relevant scientific community' as defining the risk of homicide ([149]-[154]).

Social context evidence

The Court remarked that there is a body of academic literature that is supportive of 'social context evidence' in family violence cases ([160]). This may include evidence about the history of the parties' relationship, the defendant's culture, the non-psychological impediments to leaving a violent relationship ([160]-[165]). However, the Court emphasised that in order for contextual evidence to be admitted, counsel must 'explain precisely and specifically how it is relevant to the issues which the jury are required to decide' ([166]).

The social worker gave evidence in relation to the dangers of leaving a domestic violence relationship ([169]-[177]) and the exercise of power and control which characterises domestic and family violence ([178]-[183]). The Court held that the evidence was too general, and would not assist the jury beyond the knowledge and inferences able to be drawn by a reasonable person ([177],[183]).

Evidence of an Academic - Examples

DPP v Williams [2014] VSC 304 (27 June 2014) – Victorian Supreme Court

'Aggravating factor' – 'Defensive homicide' – 'Emotional and psychological abuse' – 'Evidence' – 'Expert evidence - academic' – 'History of violence' – 'Lack of disclosure of family violence' – 'Mitigating factors' – 'Physical violence and harm' – 'Sentencing'

Charges: Defensive Homicide.

Hearing: Sentence.

Facts: The defendant was charged with murdering her de facto partner but was found guilty of defensive homicide. She struck the deceased to the head 16 times with an axe. She buried the deceased's body in the backyard and lied about his whereabouts to family and friends for more than four years, claiming that he had gone interstate. The defendant gave an account of a violent fight which led to the deceased's death which included the deceased taunting and goading the defendant. She attested to a long history of family violence by the deceased.

Issue/s: The appropriate sentence to be imposed.

Decision and Reasoning: The defendant was sentenced to 8 years' imprisonment, with a non-parole period of 5 years. In finding the defendant guilty of defensive homicide, the jury had to be satisfied that the killing took place in the context of a serious history of family violence. Hollingworth J noted at [20] that, while there was no evidence that the defendant or her children had ever complained about family violence, this is not uncommon.

The deceased was the dominant person in the relationship. He had a long history of violence and drank heavily. His behaviour towards the defendant 'over many years, was abusive, belittling and controlling, and involved both physical and psychological abuse' ([26]). Her Honour noted, 'The final act or acts of the deceased may well be relatively minor, if looked at in isolation; but what happens in such cases is that the victim of family violence finally reaches a point of explosive violence, in response to yet another episode of being attacked. In such a case, it is not uncommon for the accused to inflict violence that is completely disproportionate to the immediate harm or threatened harm from the deceased' ([32]).

The Court heard (largely unchallenged) expert evidence from Professor Patricia Easteal regarding the complex dynamics of family violence, the reasons why women often do not leave violent partners and the use of weapons by female victims of family violence against male partners ([33]-[34]). Given this evidence, Her Honour noted that while ordinarily, striking 16 blows with an axe in response to a minor physical and verbal attack by an unarmed attacker would seem disproportionate, this may not be the correct conclusion in family violence cases involving a female offender ([36]). However, aggravating factors included the defendant's deceit and a lack of remorse. Her offending had a large impact on the deceased's family.

Vulnerable or special witnesses

The approach to the protection of adult victims of domestic and family violence and sexual assault complainants / witnesses (sometimes called vulnerable or special witnesses) in family law matters, domestic violence protection order matters and criminal cases varies throughout Australia. Protections may include closed courtrooms, using closed circuit television rather than being in court, using a screen in court, pre-recording evidence in chief, allowing the presence of a support person and disallowing direct cross-examination of one party by another in certain proceedings. Below is a brief overview of relevant provisions.

Note that detailed information about children giving evidence in criminal proceedings can be found here: Bench Book For Children Giving Evidence In Australian Courts

Place	Relevant statutes	General overview
C'th	Evidence Act 1995 (Cth) Part 2.1, Div 3, 5	The court has control over the questioning of witnesses and can make orders about the way evidence is given; can disallow questions etc.
ACT	Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1991 (ACT) Chapter 4: Part 4.1; 4.2; 4.3	Protections are provided for complainants in a sexual or violent offence, generally for people with a cognitive impairment and for evidence in domestic violence proceedings.
	Evidence Act 2011 (ACT) Part 2.1, Div 2.1.3, 2.1.5	The court has control over the questioning of witnesses and can make orders about the way evidence is given; can disallow questions etc.
NSW	Criminal Procedure Act 1986 (NSW) Chapter 6: Parts 4B, 5, 6	Protections are provided for domestic violence complainants in proceedings for a domestic violence offence; complainants in sexual assault matters and cognitively impaired persons.
	Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) Part 2.1, Divs 3 and 5	The court has control over the questioning of witnesses and can make orders about the way evidence is given; can disallow questions etc.
	Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW) Part	Protections for children in protection order proceedings and right to presence of a support person for a party in protection order proceedings.

	9
NT	Evidence Act 1939 (NT) Part 3, Part 3A.	Protections are provided for a 'vulnerable witness' - includes a person who is a child, suffers from an intellectual disability, a victim of a sexual offence to which the proceedings relate, or in the opinion of the court is vulnerable. (Provisions apply to variety of criminal offence proceedings). Protections specific to domestic violence proceedings include a requirement for self-represented defendants to obtain leave to cross-examine vulnerable witnesses.
